OF

THE DOMINION OF CANADA

THIS WORK

IS MOST RESPECTFULLY DEDICATED.

PREFACE

TO THE THIRD EDITION.

The Criminal Code and the Canada Evidence Act (as originally passed and from time to time amended), were, with other Dominion Acts referred to in former editions of the present work, repealed, and—with changes in the arrangement and the numbering of the sections thereof—were re-enacted as distinct chapters of the Revised Statutes of 1906.

The changes made in the arrangement of the Code and in the numbering of its sections were very extensive and somewhat perplexing; and, for this reason, as well as, in view of the many amendments made to the criminal law of Canada and of the numerous decisions, in relation to criminal law and procedure, rendered in Canada, in England, and in the United States, since the publication, in 1901, of the Author's second edition, the new edition now presented has become a matter of necessity.

The work, besides being a complete annotation of the new Criminal Code and of the Canada Evidence Act, makes occasional references to provincial legislation relating to criminal law and the administration of justice in criminal matters; it contains appropriate extracts from and references to the Interpretation Act, the Inspection and Sale Act, the Fertilizers Act, the Adulteration Act, the Indian Act, the Royal Northwest Mounted Police Act, the Canada Shipping Act, the Trade Unions Act, the Conciliation and Labor Act, the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, 1907, the Penitentiary Act, the Prisons and Reformatories Act, and the Alberta and Saskatchewan Act; and considerable attention is given to many of the penal and punitive clauses of (among other statutes) the Dominion Elections Act, the Bank Act, the Militia Act, the Customs Act, the Inland Revenue Act, the Post Office Act, the Tobacco Restraint Act, and the Juvenile Delinquents Act, 1908.

There is a thorough and up-to-date revision of the annotations and comments; and special attention is given to the practice and procedure at preliminary enquiries, at jury trials, at summary trials of non-indictable offences, and at summary and speedy trials of indictable offences, and also to the practice and procedure in matters of contempt of court, of mandamus, of prohibition, of certiorari and of habeas corpus.

At the end of the book is inserted a carefully prepared double table of concordance (a) between the sections (set out in consecutive order) of the new Code and the sections of the old Code, and (b) between the sections (also set out in consecutive order) of the old Code and the sections of the new Code; so that a comparison may be made, at a glance, between the number of a given section of the old Code and the number of the corresponding section of the new Code, and vice versa.

At the end of Part XIV. (relating to preliminary enquiries into indictable offences) there is a table of indictable offences, of their respective punishments, of the tribunals by which they are triable, and of the limitations of time for prosecuting some of them; at the end of Part XV. (relating to summary convictions), there is an alphabetical list of non-indictable offences and some special forms in connection with appeals from judgments in summary conviction cases; the special forms in connection with the subjects of mandamus, of prohibition, of certiorari and of habeas corpus, are given in the course of the commentaries on these several subjects; the Code Forms are contained in Part XXV.; and a form of indictment, with examples of statements of offences, are placed at the end of the Code, immediately after the Code Forms.

In the Appendix are contained (with annotations and citations of cases thereon), the following Imperial statutes, namely, the Criminal Evidence Act, the Criminal Appeal Act, and the Foreign Enlistment Act, and the following Canadian statutes, namely, the Alien Labor Act, the Lord's Day Act, the Quebec Sunday Observance Act, the Money Lenders' Act, the Identification of Criminals Act, the Ticket of Leave Act, the Fugitive Offenders' Act, and the Extradition Act; the Extradition Conven- tions with the United States, a list (to date) of Great Britain's extradition treaties with foreign countries (followed by a reference to certain treaties and arrangements giving the Crown of England power and jurisdiction over British subjects and others in the Ottoman dominions and in China, Japan, Corea and Siam); also the Yukon Act (so far as it relates to criminal matters), and some extracts from the Meat and Canned Foods Act (the Canned Goods Act being repealed).

Montreal, 18th April, 1910. J. C.

PREFACE

TO THE SECOND EDITION.

In the present edition, the statutory changes, additions and amendments made to the Code and to the Canada Evidence Act since they came into force (including the provisions of the Amending Acts of 1900 and 1901), have been incorporated in and added to the sections affected thereby.

Many of the comments and annotations of the first edition have been revised and amplified, the cases and authorities—English, Canadian and American—relating to the subjects thereof having been brought down to the present date.

Some of the subjects which have thus received special attention are Capacity for Crime, Compulsion, Necessity, Insanity, Execution of Warrants and Sentences, Suppression of Riots, Self-Defence, Defence of Dwelling-house, Chastisement, Excess, Parties to Offences, Criminal Liability of Masters for Acts of Servants, Treason, Levying War, Riots, Forcible Entry and Detainer, Prize Fights, Sedition, Perjury, Escapes and Rescues, Sunday Observance, Indecent Acts, Obscene Publications, Seduction, Gaming, Betting, Lotteries, Vagrancy, Criminal Negligence, Murder, Manslaughter, Circumstantial Evidence, Indecent Assaults, Kidnapping, Unlawful Imprisonment, Rape, Abortion, Bigamy, Polygamy, Abduction, Libel, Theft, Receiving Stolen Goods, False Pretences, Fraud, Conspiracy, Threats, Forgery, Fraudulent Marking of Merchandise, Personation, Mischief, Cruelty to Animals, Intimidation, Extent of Criminal Law of Canada, Separate Custody and Trial of Young Offenders, Industrial Schools and Reformatories, Search Warrants, Service of Summons, Preliminary Enquiries, Coroners, Dying Declarations, Accomplices, Indictments and objections thereto, Criminal Proceedings against Corporations, Preferring Indictments, Change of Venue, Arraignment, Trial, Postponement of Trial, Juries, Challenges, Evidence under Commission, Depositions of Sick Witnesses, Evidence of other Crimes, Appeals (including Appeals from Summary Convictions), Speedy Trials, Summary Trials of Indictable Offences, Summary Convictions, Certiorari, Habeas Corpus, and the General Law of Criminal Evidence.

The statutes relating to the Identification of Criminals and to the Granting of Tickets of Leave to Penitentiary and Prison Convicts are set out in their proper places; while appropriate extracts from and references to provincial statutes affecting the Criminal Law and the administration of Criminal justice have been made and annotated; and some of the penal clauses of the Customs Act, of the Inland Revenue Act, of the Banking Act, and of the Dominion Elections Act, 1900, as well as all the important sections of the Adulteration Acts, have been introduced and annotated.

In Extra Appendices, at the end of the book, will be found the Imperial Criminal Evidence Act, the Foreign Enlistment Act, the Canadian Interpretation Act Amendment Act, the Victoria Day Act, the Demise of the Crown Acts, the Alien Labor Act (as amended to date), the Yukon Territory Acts, and the Canadian Fugitive Offenders' Act and Extradition Acts, with a list of extradition treaties between Great Britain and foreign countries and references to certain special treaties, etc., which provide for the transfer to British territory, for purposes of trial, of any British subject who, after having committed a criminal offence within the limits of the British Empire, has escaped to and is found in certain of the territories of a foreign State with which there is any such special treaty, etc., such, for instance, as the Dominions of the Turkish Empire, of Japan, of Corea and of Siam; which treaties, etc., have the effect of extending, as to British subjects, the provisions of the Fugitive Offenders' Act to certain places beyond the limits of the British Empire.

To make room for the additional matter above referred to, without materially increasing the bulk of the work as a whole, the Parliamentary Debates inserted at the end of the first edition have been eliminated from the present edition. These debates were never intended to serve as authority; but were included in the first edition, because it was thought that, while the Code was new, they might be considered useful in elucidating some of the subjects debated by the Parliamentary Committee which discussed the sections of the Code before being passed into law.

The Tables of Offences (indictable and non-indictable), of their respective punishments, and of the tribunals by which they are triable, are placed, as in the first edition, at the end of the different titles which relate to them; but, with regard to the list of limitations of time for prosecuting offences and with reference to the forms of indictment (with statements of offences), a change has been made by placing this list and these forms all together at the end of the first division of the work

TO THE FIRST EDITION.

The present edition of the CRIMINAL CODE OF CANADA is designed to give a full general view of our criminal law and criminal procedure, and to be of practical use to Judges, Magistrates, Crown Officers, Lawyers, and others concerned in the administration of Justice. To this end, appropriate references to and extracts from the leading English, Canadian and American authors and reports, Imperial and Canadian Statutes, and the English Draft Code, with the Report of the Royal Commissioners thereon, have been made, in the preparation of the notes and comments. many of the different sections of the Code itself are compared and collated; forms of indictment, tables of offences, indictable and non-indictable, and lists of the limitations of time for prosecuting offences, are placed at the end of the different Titles to which they respectively relate; the full text of the Canada Evidence Act 1893, is placed after the sections of the Code relating to procedure; and, at the end of the book, there is an extra appendix containing the Extradition Act, the Extradition Convention of 1889-90 with the United States, the Fugitive Offenders' Act, and the House of Commons Debates, of 1892, on the Code.

INTRODUCTION.

BASIS OF THE CODE.—The CRIMINAL CODE OF CANADA, as enacted by chapter 146 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, is a revision and consolidation of the Criminal Code, 1892, as, from time to time, amended.

Before its enactment in 1892, the Criminal Code was submitted to and carefully considered and revised by legal experts selected from and forming a Joint Committee of the two Houses of the Parliament of Canada, and was also critically examined and fully discussed in each House by a Committee of the whole. It was based upon the Draft Code, formulated by the English Royal Commissioners appointed to consider the advisability of codifying the criminal law of England,—(which draft, however, was never adopted by the Imperial Parliament),—and also upon Stephens' Digest of the Criminal Law of England, upon Burbidge's Digest of the Criminal Law of Canada, and upon Canadian Statutes. It codified both the common and the statutory law relating to criminal matters and criminal procedure; but, while it aimed at superseding the statutory law, it did not abrogate the rules of the common law; these being retained, and left available, whenever necessary, to aid and explain the express provisions of the Code and of statutes remaining unrepealed, or to supply any possible omissions, or to meet any new combination of circumstances that may arise; so that, in this respect, all that elasticity which is claimed for the common law rules and principles of the old system is preserved for the system established by the Code.

CODIFICATION.—In the course of their Report of 1880, the Royal Commissioners appointed to consider the provisions of the English Draft Code, after describing the efforts made, under certain previous commissions, issued in 1833, 1836, 1837 and 1845, to ascertain the desirability and practicability of reducing the criminal law of England, written and unwritten, into one Code, and, after referring to the reports made under those commissions, as well as to some plans of codification subsequently made by Lord St. Leonards, Lord Cranworth and others, (all finally abandoned), and to the Acts afterwards passed and known as the Greaves' Criminal Consolidation Acts; and, after discussing, at some length, the principle of codification, its object and its limits, and combatting the objection most frequently made to codification, namely, that it would deprive the common law of its elasticity, they continued their report as follows:—

"We believe, upon the whole, that upon a detailed examination of the Draft Code, it will be found that, in respect of elasticity, it makes very little, if any, change in the existing law. It clears up many doubts and removes many technicalities, but it neither increases nor diminishes, to any material extent, if at all, any discretion at present vested in either judges or juries.

"It may be objected that section 5 of the Draft Code constitutes an exception to this general remark. It provides that, for the future, all offences shall be prosecuted either under the Code or under some other statute, and not at common law. The result of this provision would be to put an end to a power attributed to the judges, in virtue of which they have (it has been said) declared acts to be offences at common law, although no such declaration was made before. And it is indeed the withdrawal of this supposed power of the judge to which the argument of want of elasticity is mainly addressed.

"It is worth while to give instances of the manner in which at different times this doctrine has been put forward and acted upon. Of the weakness of the administration of justice in the Middle Ages, the impediments opposed to it by what was then called maintenance, the establishment of the Court of Star Chamber professedly to remedy its defects, and the abuses which led to the abolition of that Court in Charles I.'s reign, it is unnecessary to speak. It would seem, however, that in early times the courts were so little disposed to exercise the supposed power of declaring new offences that perjury by a witness was never treated as an offence (except under certain statutes of Henry VIII. and Elizabeth), till it was declared to be one by the Court of Star Chamber.

"After the Restoration, the Court of King's Bench took upon itself some of the functions of the Star Chamber. In the well known case of Sir Charles Sedley, for instance, who conducted himself in public with gross indecency, the justices told him that notwithstanding there was not then any Star Chamber, yet they would have him know that the Court of King's Bench was the custos morum of all the King's subjects (17 St. Tri. 155). (1) In the case of Edmund Caril, who was prosecuted for publishing obscene libels in 1727, the court seems to have proceeded upon a similar principle, and the same course appears also to have been taken in several instances upon the prosecution of blasphemous libels. The principle was stated in very wide terms in discussions upon the law of copyright, first by Mr. Justice Willes (Lord Mansfield's colleague), and afterwards by Lord Chief Baron Pollock. Mr. Justice Willes spoke of justice, moral fitness, and public convenience which when applied to a new subject make common law without a precedent. (Millar v. Taylor, 4 Burr. 2312), (2) Lord Chief Baron Pollock, many years afterwards, referring to this passage, observed: 'I entirely agree with the spirit of this passage so far as it regards the repressing what is a public evil, and preventing what would become a public mischief.' (Jefferys v. Boosey, 4 H. L. C., 936. (3)

"Though the existence of this power as inherent in the judges has been asserted by several high authorities for a great length of time, we do not think that any attempt would be made to exercise it at the present day; and any such attempt would be received with great opposition and would place the Bench in an invidious position.

(2) Millar v. Taylor, 4 Burr., 2312.
(3) Jefferys v. Boosey, 4 H. L. C., 936.

"In by-gone ages, when legislation was scanty and rare, the powers referred to may have been useful and even necessary; but that is not the case at the present day. Parliament is regular in its sittings and active in its labors; and if the protection of society requires the enactment of additional penal laws Parliament will soon supply them. If Parliament is not disposed to provide punishments for acts which are upon any ground objectionable or dangerous, the pre-umption is that they belong to that class of misconduct against which the moral feeling and good sense of the community are the best protection. Besides, there is every reason to believe that the criminal law is and for a considerable time has been sufficiently developed to provide all the protection for the public peace and for the property and persons of individuals which they are likely to require under almost any circumstances which can be imagined; and this is an additional reason why its further development ought in our opinion to be left in the hands of Parliament. If it should turn out that we have overlooked some common law offence, we think it better to incur the risk of giving a temporary immunity to the offender than to leave any one liable to a prosecution for an act or omission which is not declared to be an offence by the Draft Code itself or some other Act of Parliament.

"But whilst we exclude from the category of indictable offences any culpable act or omission not provided for by this or some other Act of Parliament, there is another branch of the unwritten law which introduces different considerations, namely, the principles which declare what circumstances amount to a justification or excuse for doing that which would be otherwise a crime, or at least would alter the quality of the crime. In the cases of ordinary occurrence, the decisions of the Courts and the opinions of great lawyers enable us to say how the principles of the law are to be applied. And, so far, the unwritten law may be digested without extreme difficulty and with practical advantage, and, so far, it may be settled and rendered certain. In our opinion, the principles of the common law on such subjects, when rightly understood, are founded on sense and justice. There are a few points on which we venture to suggest alterations, which we shall afterwards state in detail. At present, we desire to state that in our opinion it is, if not absolutely impossible, at least not practicable, to foresee all the various combinations of circumstances which may happen but which are of so unfrequent occurrence that they have not hitherto been the subject of judicial consideration, although they might constitute a justification or excuse, and to use language at once so precise and clear and comprehensive as to include all cases that ought to be included and not to include any case that ought to be excluded."

JUDICIAL OBJECTIONS TO THE ABOLITION OF THE COMMON LAW. —Although, as stated by the Royal Commissioners, in the beginning of their remarks, on codification, the opinions of English judges, on the Bills sent to them by Lord Cranworth, were unfavorable, it would seem that the main objection of these judges was not directed so much against the principle of codification itself as against any such system of codification as involved the abolition of the common law and all its rules.

For instance, LORD CHIEF BARON POLLOCK said: "The abolition of the common law might be productive of very dangerous consequences. I have no such confidence in the sagacity of any man or any set of men as to expect that every contingency be provided for. Under the protection of the common law (aided by such statutes as have been passed in furtherance of it), I know that the peace of society and the safety of individuals is amply provided for; but I cannot feel the same security if the common law be abolished, and we have nothing to look to but a code."

BARON PARKE said: "In my opinion, the proposed measure, which is to abrogate the common law with respect to criminal offences, and put an end to all its rules and definitions of offences, is a measure likely to produce no benefit in the administration of criminal justice, but decidedly the reverse. My objection to the proposed measure is founded on the danger of confining provisions against crimes to enactments and repealing in this respect the rules of the common law, which are clear and well understood and have the inculculable advantage of being capable of application to new combinations of circumstances, perpetually occurring, which are decided, when they arise, by inference and analogy to them and upon the principles on which they rest. Whatever care be used in defining offences and in the language of the proposed enactments, it will be impracticable to make the definitions embrace every possible case that can arise, and consequently many acts which are criminal, and closely fall within the principle of the rules of the common law, will be dispunishable, whereas, if the common law is suffered to continue, it may justly and legally be applied to them."

And Mr. Justice Crompton said: "I think it unadvisable to lose the advantage of the power of applying the principles of the common law to new offences, and combinations of circumstances, arising from time to time, which it is hardly possible that any codification, however able and complete, should effectually anticipate."

The Criminal Code of Canada does not repeal the common law.—The clause above referred to by the Royal Commissioners as forming section 5 of the English Draft Code, is not inserted in the Criminal Code of Canada. We preserve the common law not only so far as it affords a DEFENCE (see section 16 at p. 22, post), in cases not expressly provided for, but also so far as it may afford a GROUND OF PROSECUTION in cases not expressly provided for.

THE CRIMINAL CODE OF CANADA.

REVISED STATUTES OF CANADA, 1906
CHAPTER 146.

An Act respecting the Criminal Law.

SHORT TITLE.

1. This Act may be cited as the Criminal Code. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 1.

INTERPRETATION.

2. Definitions.—In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires,—

(1) 'ANY ACT,' or 'ANY OTHER ACT,' includes any Act passed or to be passed by the Parliament of Canada, or any Act passed by the legislature of the late province of Canada, or passed or to be passed by the legislature of any province of Canada, or passed by the legislature of any province now a part of Canada before it was included therein;

(2) 'ATTORNEY GENERAL' means the Attorney General or Solicitor General of any province in Canada in which any proceedings are taken under this Act, and, with respect to the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory, the Attorney General of Canada;

(3) 'BANKER' includes any director of any incorporated bank or banking company;

(4) 'BANK-NOTE' includes all negotiable instruments issued by or on behalf of any person, body corporate, or company carrying on the business of banking in any part of the world, or issued by the authority of the Parliament of Canada, or any governor or other authority lawfully authorized thereto in any of His Majesty's dominions, or by the authority of any foreign prince, or state or government, and intended to be used as equivalent to money, either immediately upon their issue or at some time subsequent thereto, and all bank bills and bank post bills;

This clause was part of section 420 of the old Code under the part relating to forgery.

A forged paper purporting on its face to be a bank note is a bank note as defined by this clause, although there be no such bank as therein named. (1).

Even if the illegality of the note would be a defence, the onus of proving illegality is upon the accused. (2).

(5) 'CATTLE' includes any horse, mule, ass, swine, sheep or goat, as well as any neat cattle or animal of the bovine species, and by whatever technical or familiar name known, and shall apply to one animal as well as to many;

(6) 'CHIEF CONSTABLE' includes the chief of police, city marshal or other head of the police force of any city, town, incorporated village or other municipality, district or place, and in the province of Quebec, the high constable of the district, and means any constable of a municipality, district or place which has no chief constable or deputy chief constable; (3).

(7) 'COURT OF APPEAL' includes,

(a) in the province of Ontario, the Court of Appeal for Ontario.

(b) in the province of Quebec, the Court of King's Bench, appeal side.

(c 1) in the province of British Columbia, the Court of Appeal; (4).

(1) R. v. McDonald, 12 U. C. Q. B. 543.
(2) R. v. Brown, 3 Allen (N. B.) 13.
(3) This was section 575[a] of the old Code
(4) As amended by 7 and 8 Edw. VII. c. 10, s. 4, it being, however, provided by s. 5 thereof that the amending Act is not to come into force until the British Columbia provincial statute (7 Edw. VII. c. 10) constituting a Court of Appeal has been brought into force, the Court of Appeal in British Columbia being, in the meantime, the Supreme Court in banc, as declared by the above clause (c) of paragraph (7) before its amendment by said 7 & 8 Edw. VII. c. 10, (Can.), s. 4.

(d) in the province of Prince Edward Island, the Supreme Court,

(e) in the province of Manitoba, the Court of Appeal,

(f) in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, the Supreme Court of the Northwest Territories in banc, until the same is abolished, and thereafter such court as is by the legislature of the said provinces respectively substituted therefor;

(g) in the Yukon Territory, the Supreme Court of Canada;

(8) 'COPPER COIN' includes any coin of bronze or mixed metal and every kind of coin other than gold or silver; (5)

(11) 'DOCUMENT OF TITLE TO GOODS' includes any bill of lading, India warrant, dock warrant, warehouse-keeper's certificate, warrant or order for the delivery or transfer of any goods or valuable thing, bought and sold note, or any other document used in the ordinary course of business as proof of the possession or control of goods, authorizing or purporting to authorize either by endorsement or by delivery, the possessor of such document to transfer or receive any goods thereby represented or therein mentioned or referred to;

(12) 'DOCUMENT OF TITLE TO LANDS' includes any deed, map, paper or parchment, written or printed, or partly written and partly printed, being or containing evidence of the title, or any part of the title, to any real property, or to any interest in any real property, or any notarial or registrar's copy thereof, or any duplicate instrument, memorial, certificate or document authorized or required by any law in force in any part of Canada respecting registration of titles, and relating to such title;

(5) Taken from s. 460*c* of the old Code.
(6) Taken from s. 575 (5) of the old Code.
(6*a*) For the meaning of "district" or "county," in relation to summary conviction, see section 705 (c) post.

(13) 'EVERY ONE,' 'PERSON,' 'OWNER,' and other expressions of the same kind include His Majesty and all public bodies, bodies corporate, societies, companies, and inhabitants of counties, parishes, municipalities or other districts in relation to such acts and things as they are capable of doing and owning respectively;

As, by the terms of this clause, the expression "person" includes bodies corporate, etc., in relation, only, to acts and things which they are capable of doing, it has been held that a corporation is not subject to indictment upon a charge of any crime the essence of which is either personal criminal intent or such a degree of negligence as amounts to a wilful incurring of the risk of causing injury to others, and that consequently it cannot be indicted for manslaughter; (7).

But, although a corporation cannot be guilty of the crime of manslaughter, it may, nevertheless, be indicted under section 284, post, for the crime of having caused grievous bodily injury, by omitting, without lawful excuse, to perform the duty (imposed upon every one, by section 247, post), of using reasonable care to avoid danger to human life, from anything in its charge or under its control, and the fact that the consequence of the omission to perform such duty might, in the case of a human being, have justified a charge of manslaughter, is no ground for quashing the indictment; (8).

(14) 'EXPLOSIVE SUBSTANCE' includes any materials for making an explosive substance; also any apparatus, machine, implement or materials, used or intended to be used, or adapted for causing, or aiding in causing, any explosion in or with any explosive substance; and also any part of any such apparatus, machine or implement;

(16) 'INDICTMENT' and 'COUNT' respectively include information and presentment as well as indictment, and also any plea, replication or other pleading, any formal charge under section 873a, and any record; (As amended by 6 & 7 Edw. VII. c. 8, s. 2);

(17) 'INTOXICATING LIQUOR' means and includes any alcoholic, spirituous, vinous, fermented or other intoxicating liquor, or any mixed liquor a part of which is spirituous or vinous, fermented or otherwise intoxicating, and any such liquor shall be presumed to be intoxicating if it contains more than two and one-half per cent. of proof spirits; (As amended by 6 & 7 Edw. VII. c. 9, s. 1);

By the Quebec License Act, 1900 (63 Vict. c. 12, s. 2), the words intoxicating liquors mean "brandy, rum, whiskey, gin, wines of all descriptions, ale, beer, lager- beer, porter, cider and all other liquors containing an intoxicating principle, and all beverages composed wholly or in part of any such liquors."

The English Licensing Act, 35 and 36 Vict. c. 94, s. 74, defines intoxicating liquors as "spirits, wine, beer, porter, cider, perry, and sweets, and any fermented, distilled, or spirituous liquor which cannot, according to any law for the time being in force, be legally sold without a license from the Commissioners of Inland Revenue."

The Canada Temperance Act, R. S. 1906, c. 152, s. 2, defines intoxicating liquors as "every spirituous or malt liquor and every wine, and any and every combination of liquors or drinks that is intoxicating and any mixed liquor capable of being used as a beverage and part of which is spirituous or otherwise intoxicating."

(18) 'JUSTICE' means a justice of the peace, and includes two or more justices, if two or more justices act or have jurisdiction and also a police magistrate, a stipendiary magistrate and any person having the power or authority of two or more justices of the peace;

slaughter or murder, the coroner, according to section 667, post, must,—if the person so affected be not already charged with the offence before a magistrate or justice,—have him brought or made to appear before a magistrate or justice for prosecution.

A criminal information is an accusation of crime made against a person by the Attorney-General or the Solicitor-General without sending an indictment before a grand jury, and is usually filed, as explained by Sir James F. Stephen, "in cases of misdemeanours having a tendency to disturb the public peace or to interfere with good government, as, for instance, cases of seditious libels or other libels in which the public are interested, cases of official corruption or fraud or misconduct, cases of bribery." (4)

Although a PRESENTMENT is made of a true bill when found by a grand jury upon an indictment laid before them, a presentment properly so called is a written charge made against a particular person by a grand jury accusing such person of an offence of which the grand jury have taken notice from their own knowledge and observation, without any previous indictment being laid before them. Lord Coke says, "every indictment is a presentment, but every presentment is not an indictment." (5)

6. Meaning of expressions in other Acts.—In every case in which the offence dealt with in this Act relates to the subject treated of in any other Act the words and expressions used herein in respect to such offence shall have the meaning assigned to them in such other Act. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 4.

7. Carnal knowledge.—Carnal knowledge is complete upon penetration to any, even the slightest degree, and even without the emission of seed. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 266.

(h) if the time limited by any Act for any proceeding, or the doing of anything under its provisions, expires or falls upon a holiday, the time so limited shall be extended to, and such thing may be done on the day next following which is not a holiday;

(6) 'GOVERNOR,' 'Governor of Canada,' or 'Governor-General,' means the Governor-General for the time being of Canada, or other the chief executive officer or administrator for the time being carrying on the Government of Canada on behalf and in the name of the Sovereign, by whatever title he is designated;

(7) 'GOVERNOR IN COUNCIL,' or 'Governor-General in Council' means the Governor-General of Canada, or person administering the Government of Canada for the time being, acting by and with the advice of, or by and with the advice and consent of, or in conjunction with the King's Privy Council for Canada;

(8)'GREAT SEAL' means the Great Seal of Canada;

(9) 'HEREIN' used in any section shall be understood to relate to the whole Act, and not to that section only;

(10) 'HIS MAJESTY,' 'THE KING,' or 'THE CROWN,' or other reference to the sovereign reigning at the time of the passing of the Act, means the Sovereign of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, his heirs and successors;

(11) 'HOLIDAY' includes Sundays, New Year's Day, the Epiphany, Good Friday, the Ascension, All Saints' Day,

Conception Day, Easter Monday, Ash Wednesday, Christmas Day, the birthday or the day fixed by proclamation for the celebration of the birthday of the reigning sovereign, Victoria Day, Dominion Day, the first Monday in September, designated Labour Day, and any day appointed by proclamation for a general fast or thanksgiving;

(15) 'MAGISTRATE' means a justice of the peace;

(16) 'MONTH' means a calendar month;

(17) the name commonly applied to any country, place, body, corporation, society, officer, functionary, person, or thing, means such country, place, body, corporation, society, officer, functionary, person or thing, although such name is not the formal and extended designation thereof;

(18) 'NOW' or 'NEXT' shall be construed as having reference to the time when the Act was presented for the Royal Assent;

(19) 'OATH' includes a solemn affirmation or declaration, whenever the context applies to any person and case by whom and in which a solemn affirmation or declaration may be made instead of an oath; and in like cases the expression 'sworn' includes the expression 'affirmed' or 'declared';

(20) 'PERSON' includes any body corporate and politic, and the heirs, executors, administrators or other legal representatives of such person, according to the law of that part of Canada to which the context extends;

(23) 'REGISTRAR' or 'REGISTER' means and includes indifferently registrars or registers in the several provinces of Canada;

(24) 'SHALL' is to be construed as imperative, and 'MAY' as permissive;

When a statute confers an authority to do a judicial act upon the occurrence of certain circumstances and for the benefit of an interested party, the exercise of the judicial authority so conferred is imperative and not discretionary when applied for by the interested party. (6) So that it has been held that section 751, par. 2, post,—enacting that, on affirmance of a conviction appealed from, the Court may order the fine and costs to be paid out of moneys deposited under sub-section c of section 880 of the old Code, —is not to be construed as giving the Court a discretion to refuse the application of the party to be benefited by making the order.(7)

Where a statute directs the doing of a thing for the sake of justice or the public good, the word "may" is the same as the word "shall." (8)

Enabling words are construed as compulsory whenever the object of the power is to effectuate a legal right, and if, by enabling words, a Court is empowered to pass sentence on one convicted of a crime, it would be the duty of the Court to pass that sentence. (9)

Where a statute provided that execution may be issued by leave of the Court upon motion for a rule to shew cause, and that it shall be lawful for such Court to make absolute or discharge such rule, or to make such order as to such Court shall seem fit, it was held that the statute left no discretion to the Court, which had nothing more to do than to see that the execution creditor had complied with all the conditions which the Legislature had thought fit to impose upon him. (10)

But where a statute provided that upon information and complaint laid, etc., the justices receiving the same may, if they shall think fit, issue a summons or warrant, they have a discretion, and, if they think the charge frivolous or vexatious, they are not bound to grant an application for summonses; what the justices have to consider is whether there is prima facie evidence of a criminal offence which in their judgment calls upon the alleged offender to answer. If they think there is such prima facie evidence, it is their duty to issue summonses, and, if they refuse,—not because they disbelieve the evidence or for any other reasonable ground,—but from some ground which they ought not to have taken into account, a mandamus may be ordered to compel them to hear and determine the matter of the application. (1)

(25) 'STATUTORY DECLARATION' means a solemn declaration made by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act.

(26) 'SUPERIOR COURT' means,—

(a) in the province of Ontario, the Court of Appeal for Ontario, and the High Court of Justice for Ontario;

CRIMINAL CODE (RESUMED.)

PART I.

GENERAL.

Application of this Act.

8. Not to affect His Majesty's forces.—Nothing in this Act shall affect any of the laws relating to the government of His Majesty's land or naval forces. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 983.

9. Scope of Act.—Except in so far as they are inconsistent with the Northwest Territories Act and amendments thereto as the same existed immediately before the first day of September, one thousand nine hundred and five, the provisions of this Act extend to and are in force in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, the Northwest Territories, and, except in so far as inconsistent with the Yukon Act, the Yukon Territory. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 983.

Application of the Criminal Law in England.

10. To Ontario.—The criminal law of England, as it existed on the seventeenth day of September, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, in so far as it has not been repealed by any Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom having force of law in the province of Ontario, or by any Act of the Parliament of the late province of Upper Canada, or of the province of Canada, still having force of law, or by this Act or any other Act of the Parliament of Canada, and as altered, varied, modified or affected by any such Act, shall be the criminal law of the province of Ontario. R. S., c. 144, s. 1.

11. To British Columbia.—The criminal law of England as it existed on the nineteenth day of November, one thousand eight hundred and fifty-eight, in so far is it has not been repealed by any Ordinance or Act—still having the force of law—of the colony of British Columbia, or the colony of Vancouver Island, passed before the union of the said colonies, or of the colony of British Columbia passed since such union, or by this Act or any other Act of the Parliament of Canada, and as altered, varied, modified or affected by any such Ordinance or Act, shall be the criminal law of the province of British Columbia. R. S., c. 144, s. 2.

12. To Manitoba.—The criminal law of England as it existed on the fifteenth day of July, one thousand eight hundred and seventy, in so far as it is applicable to the province of Manitoba, and in so far as it has not been repealed, as to the province, by any Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom, or by this Act or any other Act of the Parliament of Canada, and as altered, varied, modified or affected, as to the province, by any such Act, shall be the criminal law of the province of Manitoba. 51 V., c. 33, s. 1.

Effect of Act on Remedies.

13. Civil Remedy not suspended.—No civil remedy for any act or omission shall be suspended or affected by reason that such act or omission amounts to a criminal offence. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 534.

Before the enactment of the Code, there were various English statutes expressly declaring that in connection with certain specified offences, a person's civil remedy should not be lessened or affected; and the same principle was, by section 534 of the old Code (now section 13) extended to all criminal offences in Canada, and to thus remove all doubt from a question which was not altogether free from uncertainty in England. For,—although in regard to section 430 of the English Draft Code (which is identical with our section), the Royal Commissioners say that it seems to be the existing law, in England, as laid down in Wells v. Abrahams, and Osborn v. Gillett, —(2) there are English cases in which the law does not appear to have been so laid down, but in which it was held that a person who suffered from a felony could not maintain his civil action against the felon, before discharging himself of his duty to the public, by prosecuting the felon for the public wrong, and that, when, in a civil suit, the facts amounted to felony, the case must be stopped or be suspended, in order that public justice might be first vindicated by the prosecution of the offender. (3)

In the province of Quebec, it has been doubted whether this section, 13, is constitutionally valid as to that province. (4)

14. Distinction between felony and misdemeanor abolished.—The distinction between felony and misdemeanor is abolished, and proceedings in respect of all indictable offences, except so far as they are herein varied, shall be conducted in the same manner. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 535.

With reference to this subject, the English Commissioners have the following remarks, at p. 14 of their Report:—

"The distinction between felony and misdemeanor was, in early times, nearly, though not absolutely, identical with the distinction between crimes punishable with death and crimes not so punishable.

(3) Bullock v. Dodds, 2 B. & Ald., 258; Wellock v. Constantine, 2 H. & C., 146; Gimson v. Woodfull, 2 C. & P., 41; Ashby v. White, 1 Sm. L. C., 6th Ed., 255, 267; Peace v. McAloon, 1 Kerr, 111; Prosser v. Rowe, 2 C. & P., 421; Walsh v. Nattrass, 19 U. C. C. P., 453; Williams v. Robinson, 20 U. C. C. P., 255; Livingstone v. Massey, 23 U. C. Q. B., 156; White v. Spettigue, 13 M. & W., 603.

(4) Paquet v. Lavoie, Que. Jud. Rep., 7 Q. B., 277.

For a long time past, this has ceased to be the case. Most felonies are no longer punishable with death; and many misdemeanors are now punishable more severely than many felonies.

The great changes which have taken place in our criminal law have made the distinction nearly if not altogether unmeaning.

It is impossible to say on what principle embezzlement should be a felony, and the fraudulent appropriation of money by an agent, or the obtaining of goods by false pretences a misdemeanor; why bigamy should be a felony, and perjury a misdemeanor; why child stealing should be a felony, and abduction a misdemeanor.

The result of this arbitrary classification is that the right to be bailed, the liability to be arrested without warrant, and (to a certain extent) the right of the Court to order the payment of costs of prosecutions, vary in a manner equally arbitrary and unreasonable.

Moreover, the old distinction still regulates the question whether a person accused of an offence should be entitled or not to be bailed as of right, (5) and should be liable or not to summary arrest; (6) and it also regulates the mode of trial, including the right of peremptory challenge.

The jury in a case of felony, however trifling it may be, must be kept together till they gave their verdict; in cases of misdemeanor, however serious, they may be allowed to separate.

As regards the right of challenging jurors we propose that the number of challenges to be allowed shall be proportioned to the possible severity of the punishment which might follow on conviction. (7) We have also provided for the jury being allowed to separate during the trial of all but capital cases." (8)

A provincial statute, passed before the Criminal Code and providing that a person committed for trial on a charge of felony should be discharged, after two terms have been allowed to pass without indicting him, applies equally to a person accused of what was a misdemeanor before the abolition of the distinction between felony and misdemeanor. (9)

By the abolition of the distinction between felony and misdemeanor, the consent of counsel for the accused,—which, before the Code, would have been effective in misdemeanors only,—is held now to be effective in the case of an offence which was formerly a felony. (10)

With regard to indictable offences which, before the Code, were misdemeanors, the accused on committal for trial is, upon habeas corpus, entitled to bail as a matter of right; but an accused committed for trial, in respect of an indictable offence which was a felony before the Code, is not entitled as of right to bail. It is discretionary with the Superior Court, upon habeas corpus proceedings, to allow or refuse bail in such a case. (1)

15. Offences punishable under more than one Act.—Where an act or omission constitutes an offence punishable on summary conviction, or on indictment under two or more Acts, or both under an Act and at common law, the offender shall, unless the contrary intention appears, be liable to be prosecuted and punished under either or any of such Acts, or at common law, but shall not be liable to be punished twice for the same offence. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 933.

Where an accused may be prosecuted on the same facts under two statutes or laws for substantially the same offence, he may be tried under either of the two statutes or laws, but he cannot be tried twice. (2)

Still, a person may, by the same unlawful acts, be guilty of two separate offences, for both of which he may be convicted. (3)

In order that a conviction or an acquittal may be a bar, the issue in the second proceeding must be identical with that in the first one, although the facts may vary and although the charges formulated may not be the same. (4)

Where a person, who had been acquitted of personating an elector at a polling booth, was afterwards prosecuted for perjury in taking the oath of identity on the same occasion, it was held that, although the oath of identity and the alleged personation were in regard to the same elector, a plea of autre fois acquit was inapplicable and could not be supported by the record of the acquittal of personation, on account of the different nature of the charges, but that, as the acquittal on the first charge became res judicata, as between the Crown and the accused, it was not open to the Crown to proceed on the second charge, and that the accused was entitled to a verdict of "not guilty." (5)

Justification or Excuse.

16. Common law rule in force.—All rules and principles of the common law which render any circumstances a justification or excuse for any act, or a defence to any charge, shall remain in force and be applicable to any defence to a charge under this Act except in so far as they are hereby altered or are inconsistent herewith. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 7.

As already mentioned in the Introduction, (ante), the English Draft Code contained a clause,—not inserted in our Code,—providing that NO criminal offence should be prosecuted at COMMON LAW, but that, in future, a party should only be proceeded against under some provision of the English Code or of some unrepealed statute not inconsistent therewith; and the English Draft Code also contained a clause, identical with the provisions of the foregoing section 16 of our own Code, keeping in force, when not expressly altered, such common law rules as rendered any circumstances a justification or excuse for any act or a defence to any charge.

In addition to the remarks already quoted in the Introduction, (ante), the Royal Commissioners, at page 10 of their Report, made the following statement upon this subject:—

"We have already expressed our opinion that it is, on the whole, expedient that no crimes not specified in the Draft Code should be punished, though in consequence some guilty persons may thus escape punishment. But we do not think it desirable that if a particular combination of circumstances arises of so unusual a character that the law has never been decided with reference to it, there should be any risk of a Code being so framed that it would deprive an accused person of a defence to which the common law entitles him and render it the duty of the judge to direct the jury to find him guilty, although the facts proved shew that he had a defence on the merits and would have an undoubted claim to be pardoned by the Crown. While, therefore, digesting and declaring the law as applicable to the ordinary cases, we think that the common law, so far as it affords a defence, should be preserved in all cases not expressly provided for. This we have endeavored to do by section 19 of the Draft Code." (6)

By the provisions of the above section 16 and by the omission of any prohibitory clause such as that inserted in the English Draft Code against proceeding at common law, our own Code preserves the common law not only so far as it affords a DEFENCE in cases not expressly provided for, but also so far as it may afford A GROUND OF PROSECUTION in cases not expressly provided for.

17. Children under seven.—No person shall be convicted of an offence by reason of any act or omission of such person when under the age of seven years. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 9.

18. Children between seven and fourteen.—No person shall be convicted of an offence by reason of an act or omission of such person when of the age of seven, but under the age of fourteen years, unless he was competent to know the nature and consequences of his conduct, and to appreciate that it was wrong. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 10.

It is well established, as a general principle, that the essence of a criminal offence is the evil or wrongful intent with which the act is done. This is the doctrine embodied in the legal maxim, Actus non facit reum nisi mens sit rea, "the act itself does not make a man guilty unless his intention were so." (7) Of course, this principle is not to be taken as absolute and without limitation. For instance, "whenever the law positively forbids a thing to be done, it becomes thereupon ipso facto illegal to do it wilfully, or in some cases even ignorantly." (8) Thus, it has been held, in England, that a dealer in tobacco having in his possession adulterated tobacco, is, although ignorant of the adulteration, liable under the Imperial statute 5 and 6 Vic., c. 93, s. 3, to the penalties therein mentioned. (9) And there are a number of other cases affirming the doctrine that penalties may be incurred under a prohibitory statute without any intention on the part of the individual offending against the statute to infringe its provisions. (10) Even the wilful act of a servant has been held sufficient to make a master liable to a conviction under the licensing laws. As, where the servant of an innkeeper knowingly supplied liquor to a police constable on duty, it was held that the innkeeper was liable to conviction under the Imperial statute 35 and 36 Vic., c. 94, s. 16, sub-sec. 2, although he was ignorant of his servant's act. (1)

"In general, however, the intention of the party at the time of committing an act charged as an offence is as necessary to be proved as any other fact laid in the indictment, though it may happen that the proof of intention consists in shewing overt acts only, the reason in such cases being that every man is prima facie supposed to intend the necessary or even probable or natural consequences of his own act." (2)

Therefore, every person of the age of fourteen years and upwards is presumed to have capacity to discern good from evil, or right from wrong, and to be capable of committing crime; and he is responsible and punishable for any criminal offence that he may commit, unless the presumption of his capacity be rebutted by positive proof of his incapacity,—from insanity, for example. (3)

A child within the age of seven is considered to be without any capacity to discern good from evil or right from wrong. Such a child is so conclusively, so absolutely presumed to be incapable of committing crime that the presumption of its incapacity cannot be rebutted.

Between the ages of seven and fourteen, there is still a presumption, but only prima facie, that the child is incapable; that is, the presumption is one which may be rebutted by clear and conclusive evidence of actual capacity. Therefore, when a child between seven and fourteen is charged with an offence, it must be proved not only that the child committed the act charged, but that he or she did it with a guilty knowledge of wrong doing. (4) So, that, where for instance a child between seven and fourteen was indicted for murder, it was held that it must be proved to have been conscious of the nature of the act. (5) And where a boy of eleven was charged with manslaughter, his schoolmaster had to be examined as a witness to shew the amount of his intelligence. (6)

This prima facie presumption of incapacity will, undoubtedly, grow weaker and become easier of rebuttal as the child advances towards its fourteenth year. In one case, an infant between eight and nine was convicted of and executed for the offence of burning two barns, it appearing, upon the evidence adduced, that he had malice, revenge, craft and cunning. (7) In another case, a child having, after killing his companion, hid himself, and, as it appeared by his hiding that he could discern between good and evil, he was hanged. (8). And where a boy of ten was found guilty upon his own confession of the murder of a girl of five, and the whole of his conduct shewed undoubted tokens of a mischievous discretion, the judges all agreed that he was a proper subject for capital punishment. (9).

In some of the United States of America the law prescribes different ages under which an infant is incapable of committing crime. In Texas, for instance, an infant under nine is absolutely incapable; and, in the case of an accused who is between 9 and 13, there is a prima facie presumption of its incapacity, so that evidence must be given of its capacity. (10) And in Illinois the ages respectively are 10 and 14. (1)

Section 298, post, enacts that no one under the age of fourteen can commit the offence of rape. This is the common law rule. (2) Under the common law, a boy under 14 is presumed to be incapable of committing a rape. In the case of other crimes, malitia supplet ætatem; but, in the case of rape, the law presumes that a person under fourteen is physically impotent,—not merely wanting in discretion. (3*a*) In other words, a child under fourteen is absolutely presumed to be physically unable to accomplish the sexual act to an extent necessary to make him guilty of rape.

But, although a boy under fourteen is absolutely presumed under the law of England and under the law of Canada, to be physically incapable himself of committing a rape or any offence in which carnal connection is a necessary ingredient,—such as an assault with intent to commit a rape, (4*a*) carnally

A charge of perjury cannot be sustained against a boy under fourteen, without proof of guilty knowledge by him of wrong doing. (9)

19. Insanity.—No person shall be convicted of an offence by reason of an act done or omitted by him when laboring under natural imbecility, or disease of the mind, to such an extent as to render him incapable of appreciating the nature and quality of the act or omission, and of knowing that such an act or omission was wrong.

2. A person labouring under specific delusions, but in other respects sane, shall not be acquitted on the ground of insanity, under the provisions hereinafter contained, unless the delusions caused him to believe in the existence of some state of things which, if it existed, would justify or excuse his act or omission.

3. Every one shall be presumed to be sane at the time of doing or omitting to do any act until the contrary is proved. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 11.

THE DIFFERENT KINDS OF INSANITY.—The word "insane" is a general term, which is not confined, in its application, to persons wholly without understanding, but is applicable to every person who is non compos mentis, or of unsound or deranged mind, without regard to the cause or duration of the malady. (10)

Among persons who are insane or non compos mentis, are included idiots, lunatics, persons laboring under delirium tremens, imbeciles, persons suffering from delusions and hallucinations, monomaniacs, and homicidal maniacs.

IDIOTS.—An idiot is one who has been without understanding from his birth and who never has any lucid intervals. He is described as a person who, for instance, cannot number twenty nor tell the days of the week and does not know his father or mother, etc. (1)

LUNATICS.—A lunatic is a person who has possessed reason, but who, through disease, grief or other cause, has lost it. The term is especially applicable to one who has lucid intervals and may yet in contemplation of law recover his reason. (2) By "lucid interval" is meant not merely a cessation of the violent symptoms of the disorder, but a temporary restoration of reason such as to create responsibility for acts done during its continuance. (3) A lunatic is one who labors under a species of dementia accidentalis vel adventitia, which affects him at certain periods and vicissitudes, he having intervals of reason. The prevailing distinction in law is between idiocy and lunacy; the first being a fatuity a nativitate or dementia naturalis, which excuses the party as to his acts, and the other being accidental or adventitious madness, which—whether permanent and fixed, or with lucid intervals,—goes under the name of lunacy, and excuses equally with idiocy as to acts done during the existence of the frenzy. (4).

DELIRIUM TREMENS.—Delirium tremens or mania a potu is that diseased condition of the brain which is produced by excessive and prolonged use of spirituous liquors. It is properly a disease of the nervous system; and is one of the legally recognized forms of insanity. (5) See Drunkenness, post.

IMBECILES.—Imbecility may be physical or mental. An imbecile is one who is weak, feeble, impotent, decrepit, in body or in mind. Mental imbecility is a weakness of the mind due to defective development or to loss of the faculties; and may exist in different degrees between the limits of absolute idiocy on the one hand and perfect capacity on the other. (6)

DELUSIONS OR HALLUCINATIONS.—Delusions or hallucinations constitute that species of mental unsoundness which is marked by persistent and incorrigible beliefs that things which exist only in the patient's imagination are real. (7)

MONOMANIA.—This is a species of insanity in which there is a more or less complete limitation of the perverted mental action to a particular field, —such as a particular delusion, or an impulse to do some particular thing,— though the other mental functions may shew some signs of degeneration. (8)

HOMICIDAL MANIA.—Much has been written by alienists and metaphysicians on this subject; (9) but homicidal mania has failed to obtain a standing in Court as an excuse for crime. One who kills another under circumstances which would otherwise amount to murder cannot escape punishment on the ground of insanity, unless it be shewn that, at the time, his reason was dethroned so as to render him incapable of knowing that he was doing wrong, or that, at the time, he was laboring under an insane delusion causing him to believe in a state of things which if real would justify or excuse his act. (10)

DEAF AND DUMB PERSONS.—At one time, deaf and dumb persons were presumed to be idiots; but, as the law now stands, a person who is deaf and dumb is not thereby relieved from responsibility for crime, if he is shewn to have sufficient understanding to distinguish between right and wrong. There appears, however, to be a prima facie presumption that a person who is deaf and dumb,—especially if he has been so from his birth, —does not possess this sufficient understanding; so that the general rule of law is, in his case, reversed, and it is incumbent upon the prosecution to prove that he had capacity and reason sufficient to distinguish between right and wrong. INSANITY AS A DEFENCE.—It will be seen by the above section, 19 of our Code, that the defence of insanity, in order to be of any avail, must be supposed by evidence establishing that the offence was committed by the accused, either—

(1) When laboring under natural imbecility or disease of the mind to such an extent that he could not appreciate the nature and quality of his act, and could not know that it was wrong, or

(2) While laboring under specific delusions causing him, though sane in other respects, to believe in the existence of some state of things which if it existed would justify or excuse his act.

So, that, if the defence be actual insanity, the mere fact of the accused being insane would not of itself be sufficient. It must be shewn also that when he committed the offence the accused was so insane, insane to so great an extent, as to render him incapable of appreciating the nature and quality of his act and to prevent him from knowing that it was wrong; and if the defence be that the accused, though sane in other respects, was when he committed the offence laboring under some delusion, it must be shewn that the specific delusion under which he was laboring caused him to believe that there then existed a state of things which if it had existed in reality would have justified or excused his act.

Taking the law, therefore, as here expressed, a man may be insane and still be convicted of an offence: in other words, notwithstanding his insanity he will be held responsible and punishable, unless his insanity was such that it rendered him incapable of knowing that what he did was wrong; and although a man may be laboring under some delusion when he commits an offence he may still be convicted of and punished for that offence, unless the delusion were such that it made him believe that something then existed which if it had been a reality woould have justified or excused what he did, as for instance a delusion that he was being violently attacked and in danger of being murdered, and that he was obliged in self defence to kill his supposed antagonist.

Thus, where, on a trial for murder, the defence was insanity, and the evidence in support of it shewed a great amount of senseless extravagance and absurd eccentricity of conduct, coupled with habits of excessive intemperance causing fits of delirium tremens,—the prisoner, however, not having been laboring under the effects of such a fit at the time of the act, but shewed also sense and deliberation and a perfect understanding of the nature of the act,—it was held that the evidence was not sufficient to support the defence of insanity, inasmuch as it tended rather to shew wilful excesses and extreme folly than mental incapacity; and in the course of his remarks, the Judge,—Erle, C.J.,—said that the law did not say that when some degree of insanity existed, the party was not responsible, but that, when he was in such a state of mind as to know the distinction between right and wrong and the nature of his act, he was responsible. (2)

Medical experts assert that a knowledge of the wrongfulness of an act may co-exist with insanity, that "in all lunatics and in the most degraded idiots the feeling of right and wrong may be proved to exist," and that "the whole management of insane asylums presupposes a knowledge of right and wrong on the part of their inmates." (3)

On this account, it is contended by some that the legal rule of responsibility should include "not only the knowledge of good and evil but the power to choose the one and refrain from the other." (4) that responsibility depends upon power, not upon knowledge, still less upon feeling."—that "a man is responsible to do that which he can do, not that which he feels or knows it right to do;" (5), and that, therefore, it should be a good defence to establish that the accused's insanity prevented him from controlling his actions and rendered him unable to refrain from doing the act, although he knew it to be wrong. (6)

This is said to be the law under the French and German Codes, and the same principle has been adopted by some American Courts. (7) The late Sir James F. Stephen has stated that it is even the law of England. For, although section 19 of our Code is identical in meaning, if not in exact wording, with section 22 of the Draft of the English Criminal Code, as revised by the four Royal Commissioners appointed to consider and report thereon, and although, in their joint report, these Commissioners declared that section 22, as so revised by them, expressed the existing law, Sir James F. Stephen,—who was one of the Commissioners,—has, in one of his own works on Criminal Law, expressed a different opinion, and, in giving his own understanding of the Law of England on this subject, he there says that "no act is a crime if the person who does it is, at the time when it is done, prevented, either by defective mental power or by any disease affecting his mind, from controlling his own conduct." And again he says, "It has been thought that the law of England is that the fact that a man is disabled from controlling his conduct by madness is not, if proved, a good defence to a charge of crime in respect of an act so done. This appears to me to be a mistake traceable in part to a misunderstanding of the meaning and in part to an exaggeration of the authority of the answers of the Judges in MacNaghten's Case." (8)

Mr. Justice Kay, at the trial of Joseph Gill, in 1883, took a similar view. In charging the jury, he said that, if a man's mind was in such a diseased condition that he was subject to uncontrollable impulse, they would be justified in finding him irresponsible for his actions, that what the jury had to ask themselves was: Was the prisoner's mind subject to an uncontrollable impulse over which his will had no power? If so, they must acquit him on the ground of insanity. (9)

The view thus taken by Sir James F. Stephen and by Mr. Justice Kay, has been shared by a few other judges; but it is not the one taken, as above shewn, by Chief Justice Erle, in Leigh's case (10), and by English judges in general.

For instance, in the case of Arnold, who was tried for malicious shooting, it was clearly shewn that the prisoner was, to a certain extent, deranged; and yet the jury were told by Mr. Justice Tracey, that it is not every kind of idle and frantic humor of a man nor something unaccountable in his actions that will shew him to be such a madman as to be exempt from punishment. (1) And in a case of shooting and wounding in 1812, Mr. Justice LeBlanc charged the jury that, if they were of opinion that the prisoner when he committed the offence was capable of distinguishing right from wrong and was not under the influence of any illusion disabling him from discerning that he was doing a wrong act, he would be guilty in the eye of the law. (2)

In another case, where the prisoner was on trial for murder, Chief Justice Mansfield told the jury that, in order to support the defence of insanity, it ought to be proved by the most distinct and unquestionable evidence that the prisoner was incapable of judging between right and wrong. (3)

In another murder trial at Bury, in 1831, Lord Lyndhurst expressed his complete accordance in the observations of Lord Mansfield, C.J., in the Bellingham Case. (4) And in a case where the prisoner was charged with shooting at Queen Victoria, Lord Denman, C.J., said to the jury, "The question is whether the prisoner was laboring under that species of insanity which satisfies you that he was quite unaware of the nature, character and consequence of the act he was committing, or, in other words, whether he was under the influence of a diseased mind and was really unconscious, at the time he was committing the act, that it was a crime. (5)

In effect, the same doctrine was laid down by Mr. Justice Maule, in a murder trial in 1843, (6) by Chief Justice Tindal, in MacNaghten's Case, (7) and Vaughan's Case, (8) by Baron Parke, in Barton's Case, (9) by Baron Bramwell, in Haynes' Case, (10), by Baron Rolfe, in Stokes' Case, (11), and Layton's Case, (12), by Mr. Justice Wightman, in Burton's Case, (13), and by Baron Martin, in the Townley murder case. (14)

In a case of murder at Chatham, in 1875, Mr. Justice Brett said: "The man may be mad. I assume that he is so in the medical sense of the term; but the question here is whether he is so mad as to be absolved from the consequences of what he has done? He is not so absolved, though he is mad, if he be not so mad as not to know what he was doing or not to know that he was doing wrong. (15) And, in a case tried in 1888, in which the prisoner, a lad of 21, was convicted of having murdered his sister by blowing out her brains with a discharge from a double-barrelled gun, it was proved that he had suffered for many years from epilepsy and that his mother had been, on two occasions, insane, the second occasion being shortly before the prisoner's birth; but Mr. Justice Field, after referring to the evidence of the conversations and acts of the prisoner, including a letter written by him just before the shooting, as shewing his rationality and knowledge of the nature and quality of his act and that it was wrong, charged the jury that, even if they were satisfied that the prisoner was insane at the time of the crime, they could only return a verdict of guilty. (16)

This well-established rule was followed in Canada, in the Riel case, (17); and leave to appeal was refused by the Privy Council. (18)

On this subject of Insanity the remarks of the English Commissioners (at pp. 17 and 18 of their Report), are as follows:

"Section 22 (19), which relates to insanity, expresses the existing law. The obscurity which hangs over the subject cannot be altogether dispelled until our existing ignorance as to the nature of the will and the mind, the nature of the organs by which they operate, the manner and degree in which these operations are interfered with by disease, and the nature of the diseases which interfere with them, is greatly diminished. The framing of the definition has caused us much labor and anxiety; and though we cannot deem the definition to be altogether satisfactory, we consider it as satisfactory as the nature of the subject admits of. Much latitude must in any case be left to the tribunal which has to apply the law to the facts in each particular case. The principal substantial difference between section 22 of the Draft Code and the corresponding section of the Bill is that the latter recognizes as an excuse the existence of an impulse to commit a crime so violent that the offender would not be prevented from doing the act by knowing that the greatest punishment permitted by law for the offence would be instantly inflicted, the theory being that it is useless to threaten a person over whom, by the supposition, threats can exercise no influence. This provision of the Bill assumes that the accused would not be protected by the preceding part of the section, and, therefore, that he was at the time he did the act capable of appreciating its nature and quality, and knew that what he was doing was wrong. The test proposed for distinguishing between such a state of mind and a criminal motive, the offspring of revenge, hatred, or ungoverned passion, appears to us on the whole not to be practicable or safe, and we are unable to suggest one which would satisfy these requisites and obviate the risk of a jury being misled by considerations of so metaphysical a character. It must be borne in mind that, although insanity is a defence which is applicable to any criminal charge, it is most frequently put forward in trials for murder, and for this offence the law — and we think wisely — awards upon conviction a fixed punishment which the Judge has no power to mitigate. In the case of any other offence, if it should appear that the offender was afflicted with some unsoundness of mind, but not to such a degree as to render him irresponsible—in other words, where the criminal element predominates, though mixed in a greater or less degree with the insane element—the Judge can apportion the punishment to the degree of criminality, making allowance for the weakened or disordered intellect. But in a case of murder this can only be done by an appeal to the Executive; and we are of opinion that this difficulty cannot be successfully avoided by any definition of insanity which would be both safe and practicable, and that many cases must occur which cannot be satisfactorily dealt with otherwise than by such an appeal."

See sec. 900, post, and the cases there cited, as to the course to be pursued when an accused refuses to plead or will not answer when called upon to plead; and see sections 966 and 967, post, and cases there cited, as to proof of the accused's insanity at the time of the commission of the offence charged and as to the trial of an accused who, on arraignment or at any time before verdict appears, on account of insanity, to be incapable of conducting his defence.

DRUNKENNESS.—With regard to derangement of the mind by the use of intoxicating liquors, the rule is that if drunkenness be contracted voluntarily it will not relieve a person from responsibility for a criminal offence committed by him while in a drunken condition, whether at the time he knows what he is doing or not. (20) Still if the act be one which must in order to render it a criminal offence be done with some particular intent the fact of its being done when the offender is in a state of intoxication should be taken into account in deciding whether he has such intent or not. (1)

If the drunkenness be involuntary, as if a person be made drunk by stratagem or fraud, or by some mistake, as by a physician unskilfully administering some drug or intoxicant to a patient, or if a man become intoxicated in any other way than by his own voluntary act, he will not be responsible for an offence committed while so affected to an extent which prevents him from knowing that he is doing wrong. (2) Or, if by habitual drinking a person become affected by a fixed frenzy, delirium tremens or other form of insanity, whether permanent or intermittent, he cannot be held responsible for an act done by him while thus affected, if he be thereby rendered incapable of knowing that the act is wrong, or if he be thereby subjected to some specific delusion causing him to believe in the existence of some state of things which if real would justify or excuse his act. (3)

20. Compulsion by threats.—Except as hereinafter provided, compulsion by threats of immediate death or grievous bodily harm from a person actually present at the commission of the offence shall be an excuse for the commission, by a person subject to such threats, and who believes such threats will be executed, and who is not a party to any association or conspiracy, the being a party to which rendered him subject to compulsion, of any offence other than treason as defined by this Act, murder, piracy, offence deemed to be piracy, attempting to murder, assisting in rape, forcible abduction, robbery, causing grievous bodily harm, and arson. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 12.

According to this section (the provisions of which, together with those of section 21, are included in section 23 of the English Draft Code), a person is relieved from responsibility for any offence (other than the offences specially excepted by the section), when any such offence is committed under compulsion by threats, if it be proved, — 1st, that the threats were of immediate death or grievous bodily harm, made by some one actually present at the commission of the offence; 2nd, that the person so threatened believed such threats would be executed, and 3rd, that he was not a party to any association or conspiracy rendering him subject to compulsion.

On this subject, the Royal Commissioners have in Note A at p. 43 of their Report, the following remarks:—

"There can be no doubt that a man is entitled to preserve his own life and limb; and, on this ground, he may justify much which would otherwise be punishable. The case of a person setting up as a defence that he was compelled to commit a crime is one of every day. There is no doubt on the authorities that compulsion is a defence when the crime is not one of a heinous character. But killing an innocent person, according to Lord Hale, can NEVER be justified. He lays down the stern rule: "If a man be desperately assaulted and in peril of death, and cannot otherwise escape, unless to satisfy his assailant's fury he will kill an innocent person then present, the fear and actual force will not acquit him of the crime and punishment of murder, if he commit the fact; for he ought rather to die himself than kill an innocent."

"On the trials for high treason in 1746, the defence of the prisoners was in many cases that they were compelled to serve the rebel army. The law was laid down somewhat more favorably for the prisoners than it had been before, as the defence of compulsion was stated to apply not merely to furnishing provisions to the rebel army, but even to joining and serving in that army. It was laid down, (see Foster, 14), that, "The only force that doth excuse is a force upon the person and present fear of death; and this force and fear of death must continue all the time the party remains with the rebels. It is incumbent upon every man, who makes force his defence, to show an actual force, and that he quitted the service as soon as he could." It is noticeable that though most of those who set up this defence must have fought in actual battle, and must have killed, or at least have assisted in killing the loyalists and so brought themselves within the stern rule laid down by Hale, it was never suggested that this made a difference. The Indian Commissioners proposed in the first draft of the Indian Code to make compulsion in no case a defence, but to have it merely a ground for appealing to the mercy of the government. The Indian Code as published contains a section more lenient than that originally proposed; but more severe than that laid down in Foster. We have framed section 23 of the Draft Code, (4) to express what we think is the existing law, and what at all events we suggest ought to be the law."

force, etc., the deceased was killed, it was held that this indictment was not supported by evidence shewing that the prisoner was working at the windlass with two other men, and that, by his going away, and thus withdrawing his assistance, the other two men were not strong enough to work it, and so they had to let go; it being decided that the words "compel" and "force" must be taken to mean "active force." (6)

COMPULSION BY NECESSITY.—The law of necessity is paramount over all other laws; and it has been well said that every law of man, common law or statutory law, has in it the implied exception, which is of the same force as if expressed, that obedience shall not be required when obedience is impossible, and that an act which is unavoidable is no crime. (7) And, as everything which is necessary for a man to do to save his life is treated as compelled, it follows that if I am attacked by a ruffian who seeks my life, I may kill him if I cannot otherwise preserve my own life. (8) And, if during an embargo a vessel is by stress of weather compelled to put into a foreign port and there sell her cargo, for the preservation of the lives and property on board, she will not be adjudged guilty of a breach of the Embargo Act. Where shipwrecked sailors and passengers were escaping in a boat which would not hold all, the sailors threw some of the passengers overboard. Held that, unless the presence of the sailors was necessary for the common safety, the passengers should have been kept in the boat in preference to the sailors. (1)

A and B swimming in the sea, after being shipwrecked, get hold of a plank not large enough to support both. A pushes off B, who is drowned. It has been said that A commits no crime. (2)

But Lord Coleridge in delivering judgment in the case of R. v. Dudley and Stephens, seems to deny that this is the law. (3) And the English Royal Commissioners, by their remarks, set out below, on the subject of "Necessity," appear to confirm his view.

In the English Draft Code, as originally prepared, there was a clause on "Necessity;" but, upon the revision of the Bill by the Royal Commissioners, the clause was struck out; and, in giving their reasons for striking out the clause, the Commissioners say:—

"Compulsion is only one instance of a justification on the ground that the act, otherwise criminal, was necessary to preserve life. A case of frequent occurrence is where a thief says he was starving and could not save his life unless he stole. Lord Hale, after stating the rule laid down by some casuists that this was justifiable, says, emphatically, "I do therefore take it that where persons live under the same civil government, as here in England, that rule, at least by the laws of England, is false; and, therefore, if a person, being under necessity for want of victuals or clothes, shall upon that account clandestinely and animo furandi steal another man's goods, it is felony." And he gives an excellent reason; "Men's properties would be under a strange insecurity, being laid open to other men's necessities, whereof no man can possibly judge but the party himself."

But Lord Hale admits that this general principle is subject to some exceptions. He says: "Indeed this rule, in casu extremæ necessitatis omnia sunt communia, does hold in some particular cases, where, by the tacit consent of nations, or of some particular countries or societies it hath obtained. . . . By the Rhodian Law and the common maritime custom, if the common provision for the ship's company fail, the master may, under certain temperaments, break open the private chests of the mariners or passengers and make a distribution of that particular and private provision for the preservation of the ship's company." (4)

"Such cases have frequently happened, and the law has been settled as to them. But ingenious men may suggest cases which, though possible, have not come under practical discussion in our Courts of justice. Casuists have for centuries amused themselves, and may amuse themselves for centuries to come, by speculating as to the moral duty of two persons in the water struggling for the possession of a plank capable of supporting only one. If ever such a case should come up for decision before a court of justice (which is improbable), it may be found that the particular circumstances render it easy of solution. We are certainly not prepared to suggest that necessity should, in every case, be a justification. We are equally unprepared to suggest that necessity should, in no case, be a defence; we judge it better to leave such questions to be dealt with when, if ever, they arise in practice, by applying the principles of law to the circumstances of the particular case."

In the case of R. v. Dudley & Stephens it was held that a man, who, in order to escape death from hunger, kills another, for the purpose of eating his flesh, is guilty of murder, although, at the time of the act, he is in such circumstances that he believes and has reasonable grounds for believing that it affords the only chance of preserving his own life. It appeared, upon a special verdict rendered at the trial, that the prisoners Dudley and Stephens, two seamen, were, with a boy, of 17 or 18, cast away in a storm on the high seas, and compelled to put out in an open boat, that the boat was drifting on the ocean and was probably more than a thousand miles from land, that, on the eighteenth day, when they had been seven days without food and five days without water, Dudley proposed to Stephens that lots should be cast who should be put to death to save the rest, and that they afterwards thought it would be better to kill the boy so that their own lives should be saved, that, on the twentieth day, Dudley, with the assent of Stephens, killed the boy, and both prisoners fed on the flesh for four days, that, at the time of the act, there was no sail in sight nor any reasonable prospect of relief, that under these circumstances there appeared, to the prisoners, every prospect that, unless they, then or very soon, fed upon the boy or one of themselves, they would die of starvation.

Upon these facts, it was held that there was no proof of any such necessity as could justify the prisoners in killing the boy, and that they were guilty of murder; and Chief Justice Coleridge, in delivering the judgment of the Court said: "It is not correct to say that there is an absolute or unqualified necessity to preserve one's life, and, if Lord Bacon, in saying that if one or two shipwrecked persons holding on to a plank push the other off to save his own life, meant to lay down the broad proposition that a man may save his own life by killing, if necessary, an innocent and unoffending neighbour, it is certainly not law at the present day." (5)

21. Compulsion of wife.—No presumption shall be made that a married woman committing an offence does so under compulsion because she commits it in the presence of her husband. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 13.

(4) 1 Hale, 54, 55.
(5) R. v. Dudley and Stephens, 14 Q. B. D., 273, 285-287.

By the common law doctrine a wife who committed any crime, (other than treason or murder), in her husband's presence or company was prima facie presumed to act under his coercion. (6)

Blackstone says that in his day this rule was at least a thousand years old in England, and that among the northern nations of Europe the privilege extended to every woman transgressing in company with a man, the indemnity being similar to that accorded to every slave who committed a joint offence with a freeman. Its origin is thus clearly derivable from the old barbaric notions of the abject position of the wife in the matrimonial relation.

Under this old rule it was held in one case, where a wife went from house to house uttering base coin, her husband accompanying her but remaining outside, that her act must be presumed to have proceeded from his coercion. (7)

While, however, the common law protected a wife from punishment for any ordinary crime committed by her under the coercion of her husband, which coercion was presumed if she committed the offence in his presence or in his company (8), still, as the husband's presence merely raised a prima facie presumption that she acted under his coercion, if the evidence clearly rebutted such presumption and shewed that she was not drawn to the offence by her husband, or if she were the principal inciter of it, she was punishable as well as her husband. (9) And if she committed an offence voluntarily, or by the bare command of the husband without him being actually present at the time of the committing of the offence, she was punishable. (10) Thus, where a woman was tried for uttering a forged order, and her husband was tried for procuring her to commit the offence, and it appeared that, although her husband had ordered her to do it, he was not present when she did it, the judges, upon a case reserved, held that the presumption of coercion did not arise, as the husband was absent at the time of the uttering, and that the wife was properly convicted of the uttering and the husband of the procuring. (1)

This old presumption of the common law was a strained one. In many cases the wife commits a criminal act in spite of her husband; and the above section 21, by abrogating the common law rule, makes it a matter of evidence to be proved whether she acted under the compulsion of her husband or in spite of or independently of him.

By the terms of sections 20 and 21, one rule in regard to compulsion or coercion is laid down for all persons alike, whether married women or not.

So, that, where the evidence shews that the wife has acted under the coercion and control of the husband, it will be a good defence. (2)

22. Ignorance of the law.—The fact that an offender is ignorant of the law is not an excuse for any offence committed by him. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 14.

The doctrine embodied in this section is founded upon the general principle that every one is presumed to know the law. (3) If a man knowingly does an act which is unlawful according to law, he is presumed to know of its unlawfulness. His ignorance of the law will not excuse him. (4)

The presumption is so strong that it has been held to be no defence for a foreigner, charged with a crime committed in England, to shew that the act was no offence in his own country, and that he did not know he was doing wrong in doing it in England. (5) And a foreigner while on board a British ship, which he has entered voluntarily, is as amenable to English law as if he were on British land. (6)

Where a defendant was convicted of malicious shooting on the high seas upon an indictment laid under a special statute passed only a few weeks before the offence was committed and of which statute no notice could have reached the place where the shooting happened, the conviction was nevertheless considered perfectly legal; although the judges recommended a pardon. (7)

Although ignorance of the law on the part of an offender is no excuse for his offence, it may be relevant to the question whether an act (which would be a crime if accompanied by a certain intention or other state of mind, and not otherwise), was, in fact, accompanied by that intention or other state of mind. As was said by Coleridge, J.: "Ignorance of the law cannot excuse any person, but at the same time when the question is with what intent a person takes a thing, we cannot help looking into the then state of mind,—as if a person takes what he believes to be his own it is impossible to say he is guilty of a felony. (8)

Wires set for game, by a poacher, were taken by a gamekeeper, under the authority of an Act of Parliament, of the existence of which the poacher was ignorant. The poacher took the wires from the gamekeeper and was tried for robbery; and it was held that his ignorance of the existence of the statute was relevant to the question whether he took the wires under a claim of right. (9)

In section 29, post, there is an exception to the general rule that ignorance of the law shall be no excuse; for it is there enacted that "everyone, acting under a warrant or process which is bad in law on account of some defect in substance or in form apparent on the face of it, if he in good faith, and, without culpable ignorance and negligence, believes that the warrant or process is good in law, shall be protected from criminal responsibility to the same extent and subject to the same provisions as if the warrant or process were good in law; and ignorance of the law shall in such case be an excuse."

IGNORANCE OR MISTAKE OF FACT.—Although ignorance of the law is no excuse, it is otherwise with regard to ignorance or mistake in point of fact, which as a general rule will be a good and sufficient excuse; (10) for a mistake of fact may negative the existence of an evil intent, which is the essence of a crime; so that whenever any one, without fault or carelessness, is, while pursuing a lawful object, misled concerning facts, and acts upon them as he would be justified in doing were they what he believes them to be, he is legally as well as morally innocent. But the rule will not apply if the mistake be made in the course of doing any unlawful act, and therefore if some unintended or unforeseen consequence ensue from an act which in itself is wrongful and unlawful, the actor will be as criminally responsible as if the consequence were intended and foreseen; (1) nor will the rule apply if the mistake be due to any negligence or

Where a physician was indicted for malpractice, it was no defence that he was ignorant of facts with which it was his duty to become acquainted. (5)

When a statute makes an act indictable, irrespective of guilty knowledge of some fact connected with it, ignorance of the fact will be no defence. (6) Take the following illustration given by Sir James F. Stephen: "A abducts B, a girl of 15 years of age, from her father's house, believing in good faith and on reasonable grounds that B is 18 years of age. A commits an offence, although if B had been 18 years of age she would not have been within the statute." (7)

It has been held that, where a municipal by-law provided that no person should let, occupy or suffer to be occupied as a dwelling house or lodging any room not containing at least 384 cubic feet of space for each person occupying the same, it is necessary, in order to support a conviction for a contravention of such by-law, that there should be some evidence of guilty knowledge actual or constructive on the part of the person charged. In commenting upon the principle embodied in these sections, the Royal Commissioners make (at p. 11 of their Report), the following remarks:

"It is a principle of the common law that what the law requires it justifies.—Quando aliquid mandatur, mandatur et omne per quod pervenitur ad illud." (5 Rep., 115 b.)

See section 39 and sections 41-44, post, as to the right to use necessary force in making an arrest or to prevent an escape or rescue; and see section 66, post, as to EXCESS.

Upon an indictment for assaulting a County Court bailiff in the execution of his duty, the production of the County Court Judge's warrant was, upon a case reserved, held to be a sufficient justification of the bailiff's act in making the arrest of the accused, without proof of previous proceedings authorizing the warrant, although the judgment upon which the warrant was issued was one obtained in one county and the warrant issued thereon was sent for execution into another county.

It was contended, on behalf of the accused, that the proceedings authorizing the issue of the warrant should have been proved, so that it might be known whether or not the warrant was lawfully issued, that is, having a lawful basis, the judgment being a foreign one, that is, obtained in the County Court of one county—Cardiganshire—and ordered to be executed in another county—Carmarthenshire—and that, assuming that a good warrant to arrest would, in an action of trespass against the officer acting under it, be a justification, (9) yet he would be liable for executing a warrant which was objectionable.

Blackburn, J., said that, in Machalley's case, (10), it was held to be murder to kill an officer acting under a process that was erroneous; and, after quoting, from Foster's Crown Law, the following: "And in the case of arrests upon process, whether by writ or warrant, if the officer named in the process give notice of his authority and be resisted and killed, it will be murder, if such notification was true, and the process legal."—the Judge (Blackburn) continued as follows: "Foster, J., goes on to say that he could not be understood to mean more than 'provided the process be not defective in the frame of it and issue in the ordinary course of justice.' There may have been irregularity previous to the issuing of the warrant; but, if the sheriff or other minister of justice be killed in the execution of it, it will be murder; for the officer to whom it is directed must, at his peril, pay obedience to it; and it is sufficient, upon an indictment for this murder, to produce the writ or warrant without shewing the judgment or decree; (Roger's Case);" (1) And Pollock, C. B., following Judge Blackburn, added: "The process of the County Court was as much a justification to the officer as a writ of execution out of a Superior Court to the sheriff; and it is clear that the production of such a writ would be sufficient in a proceeding of this description for assaulting the sheriff or his bailiff, without proof of the judgment." 26. Execution of erroneous sentence or process.—If a sentence is passed or process issued by a court having jurisdiction under any circumstances to pass the sentence or issue such process, or if a warrant is issued by a court, justice or person having jurisdiction under any circumstances to issue the warrant, the sentence passed or process or warrant issued shall be sufficient to justify the officer or person thereby authorized, to execute the same, and every gaoler and person lawfully assisting in executing or carrying out such sentence, process or warrant, although the court passing the sentence or issuing the process had not in the particular case authority to pass the sentence or to issue the process, or although the court, justice or other person in the particular case had no jurisdiction to issue, or exceeded its or his jurisdiction in issuing, the warrant, or was, at the time when such sentence was passed or process or warrant issued, out of the district in or for which such court, justice or person was entitled to act. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 18. 6 & 7 Edw. VII., c. 8, s. 2.

In their comments upon sections of the English Draft Code of the same import as the foregoing, the Royal Commissioners (in a marginal note opposite to section 28 of the English Draft Code, said: "The result of the authorities justifies us in saying that wherever a ministerial officer, who is bound to obey the orders of a court or magistrate (as, for instance, in executing a sentence or effecting an arrest under warrant), and is punishable by indictment for disobedience, merely obeys the order which he has received, he is justified, if that order was within the jurisdiction of the person giving it. And we think that the authorities shew that a ministerial officer obeying an order of a court or the warrant of a magistrate, is justified if the order or warrant was one which the court or magistrate could under any circumstances lawfully issue, though the order or warrant was in fact obtained improperly, or though there was a defect of jurisdiction in the particular case which might make the magistrate issuing the warrant civilly responsible; on the plain principle that the ministerial officer is not bound to enquire what were the grounds on which the order or warrant was issued and is not to blame for acting on the supposition that the Court or magistrate had jurisdiction."

A warrant affords absolute justification to the officer executing it, if it has been issued by competent authority, and is valid on its face, although the warrant may in fact be bad and although it be set aside by reason of a failure to comply with legal requirements. (3)

Where a magistrate received a complaint in a matter over which he had a general jurisdiction and granted his warrant, upon which the person complained of was arrested, it was held, in an action of damages taken by the latter, that the complainant was not liable as a trespasser, although the particular case was one in which it turned out that the magistrate had no authority to act.

The facts were these. The plaintiff, a builder, was employed by the defendant to build some houses under a specific contract. In the course of the work a dispute arose, the plaintiff stopped his building operations, and the defendant laid before a magistrate the complaint in question, under the Master and Servants Act. On the warrant being issued, the defendant went with the constable to point out the plaintiff to him. On the complaint being heard it was dismissed, the subject matter thereof being found not to be one in which the relation of master and servant existed. Hence, the action of damages, which was non-suited, Lord Abinger, C. B., holding that the defendant's interference in the arrest, by pointing out to the constable the plaintiff as the person to be arrested, was too slight to make him a trespasser. On motion for a new trial, it was argued that, when a magistrate is put in motion by a complainant, in a matter over which the magistrate has no jurisdiction, he is a trespasser, and all who act under him are trespassers. Lord Abinger, C. B., said,—"Where a magistrate has a general jurisdiction over the subject matter, and a party comes before him and prefers a complaint, upon which the magistrate makes a mistake in thinking it a case within his authority, and grants a warrant which is not justified in point of law, the party complaining is not liable as a trespasser, but the only remedy against him is by an action upon the case, if he acted maliciously. A magistrate acting without any jurisdiction at all is liable as a trespasser, in many cases, but this liability does not extend to the constable who acts under a warrant." (4)

In a case tried in Manitoba before the coming into force of the Code, it had already been held that where a writ of fieri facias contained a statement merely erroneous as to date and which could have been amended, a person was not justified in resisting the sheriff's officer in executing it. The prisoner had been convicted under an indictment charging him with having unlawfully and wilfully obstructed a sheriff's officer in the execution of three writs of fieri facias. It was stated in each of the writs that the judgment upon which it was issued was entered up on the 25th of February, 1892, the real dates of the entering up of the judgments being the 3rd of February, 1887. On a case reserved by the trial Judge, the Court of Queen's Bench held that the writs being in proper form and regular on their face, apart from the error in the dates of the judgments, the sheriff was bound to execute them, that the error was merely an amendable irregularity, and that the prisoner was rightly convicted. (5)

Where, on the conviction of J. D., of an offence under the Indian Act, a warrant of commitment, issued by justices,—for non-payment of a fine and costs,—directed the constables of the county of B to take and deliver J. D. to the keeper of the common gaol of the county to be kept there for two months unless the fine and costs, including costs of conveyance to gaol, should be sooner paid, it was held that, as the justices had jurisdiction over the offence and as the warrant was valid on its face, it afforded a complete protection to the constable executing it and that the defendant was rightly convicted of assaulting the constable while attempting to execute the warrant, notwithstanding that the awarding of the punishment,—in directing imprisonment for non-payment of the fine and costs, including costs of conveyance to gaol,—may have been erroneous, as not being authorized by the Act. (6)

Where a person has been illegally taken into custody upon a criminal charge under a defective warrant, he may be legally arrested or detained upon that criminal charge on the defect being remedied, without being first set free from the illegal custody and placed at liberty. (7)

But a person in illegal custody on a criminal charge cannot, before being liberated therefrom, be legally taken into custody upon a civil process. (8)

27. Sentence or process without jurisdiction.—Every officer, gaoler or person executing any sentence, process or warrant, and every person lawfully assisting such officer, gaoler or person shall be protected from criminal responsibility if he acts in good faith under the belief that the sentence or process was that of a court having jurisdiction, or that the warrant was that of a court, justice or other person having authority to issue warrants, and if it be proved that the person passing the sentence or issuing the process acted as a court under color of having some appointment or commission lawfully authorizing him to so act, or that the person issuing the warrant acted as a court, justice or other person having such authority, although in fact such appointment or commission did not exist or had expired, or although in fact the court or the person passing the sentence or issuing the process was not the court or the person authorized by the commission to act, or the person issuing the warrant was not duly authorized so to act. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 19.

It will be seen that section 26 protects an officer who executes the sentence or warrant of a Court or person having jurisdiction generally speaking, but acting, in the particular case in hand, either without or in excess of such jurisdiction or outside of his or its district; and that section 27 protects an officer in executing in good faith a sentence or warrant which he believes has been passed or issued by a duly authorized Court or person, if it be proved that it was passed or issued by such Court or person under some color of lawful authority.

In commenting upon the latter clause, the English Commissioners said, "Though cases of this sort have already arisen in practice, we think we are justified by the opinion of Lord Hale (1 Hale, 498), in saying that the order of a Court, having a color of jurisdiction, though acting erroneously, is enough to justify the ministerial officer."

28. Arresting the wrong person.—Every one duly authorized to execute a warrant to arrest, who thereupon arrests a person, believing in good faith and on reasonable and probable grounds that he is the person named in the warrant, shall be protected from criminal responsibility to the same extent and subject to the same provisions as if the person arrested had been the person named in the warrant.

2. Every one called on to assist the person making such arrest, and believing that the person in whose arrest he is called on to assist is the person for whose arrest the warrant is issued, and every gaoler who is required to receive and detain such person, shall be protected to the same extent and subject to the same provisions as if the arrested person had been the person named in the warrant. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 20.

This section makes an important change. By the common law, if an officer having a warrant for one person, arrested another, the arrest was illegal and unjustifiable. For instance, in one case a magistrate issued a warrant upon a criminal charge against a man who was described in the warrant by the name of John H. Under this warrant the constable arrested Richard H.; and, although the man so arrested was in reality the person against whom the warrant was intended, and was pointed out, as such, to the constable, by the prosecutor who supposed the man's name to be John H., Mr. Justice Coltman directed the jury, and his ruling was afterwards upheld, that a person could not be lawfully taken under a warrant describing him by a name that did not belong to him, unless he had assumed or called himself by the wrong name. (9)

Of course, as a constable could always apprehend, without warrant, any one suspected on reasonable grounds of having committed a felony, he was able to justify an arrest, on that ground, although he had a warrant which happened to be illegal. (10)

The remarks of the English Commissioners in support of a similar clause in their Draft Code are as follows: "This is new. As an officer arresting for felony without warrant is by the common law justified even if he, by mistake, arrests the wrong person, we think that the one who arrests any person with a warrant for any offence shall at least be protected from criminal responsibility. The right of action is not affected by it."

And it has been held in Nova Scotia that, where a peace officer would be justified under section 30 of the Code in making an arrest without a warrant, the justification will extend to an arrest in respect of which he held a warrant which was insufficient because of the misnomer of the person intended to be charged. (1)

29. Irregular warrant or process.—Every one acting under a warrant or process which is bad in law on account of some defect in substance or in form apparent on the face of it, if he in good faith and without culpable ignorance and negligence believes that the warrant or process is good in law, shall be protected from criminal responsibility to the same extent and subject to the same provisions as if the warrant or process were good in law, and ignorance of the law shall in such case be an excuse. (2)

2. It shall be a question of law whether the facts of which there is evidence may or may not constitute culpable ignorance or negligence in the belief of such person that the warrant or process is good in law. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 21.

In reference to this clause in the English Draft Code, the Commissioners said, "It is at least doubtful on the existing authorities whether a person honestly acting under a bad warrant, defective on the face of it, has any defence, though doing only what would have been his duty if the warrant was good. The section as framed protects him. The proviso is new, but seems to be reasonable. It does not touch the question of civil responsibility."

A peace officer who executes a warrant of arrest which he believes to be good is exempt by this section from criminal responsibility therefor, although the warrant was bad on its face as following a conviction also bad on its face. (3) apprehend a bankrupt, the warrant being directed "to J. A. and W. S., our messengers and their assistants, etc." it was held that this warrant did not justify the bankrupt's apprehension by anyone who was not in the presence, actual or constructive, of J. A. and W. S., and that, therefore, B. an assistant of W. S., in his business of a sheriff's officer, was not justified in apprehending the bankrupt in the absence of W. S. and J. A., although B. had the warrant in his possession, that the term "assistants" would only extend to such persons as J. A. and W. S., or either of them, might take with them to aid them in making the arrest, and that where B., in attempting, in the absence of J. A. and W. S., to take the bankrupt, was struck down with a stone and, in an ensuing struggle, had his nose bitten off by the bankrupt, this, in case death had ensued to B., would have been a case of manslaughter only. (4)

Where a warrant of distress for sewer rates was issued under an Imperial statute, it was held that it could only be lawfully executed by the person to whom it was directed, that, if the warrant be handed over by such authorized person to any other person, the latter has no right to execute it, that, in executing it, such other person commits a trespass, and that, if in its execution, he commits an assault, he may be convicted thereof. In this case, Field, J., quoted the legal maxim.—Delegatus non potest delegare, and said that the person to whom the warrant was directed was the delegatus and had no power to delegate his authority. "It is a general principle," he continued, "that every person whose house is entered and whose property is seized is entitled to know the authority under which it is done and to be able to see whether that authority has been followed. It would be a shocking thing to say that an authorized man can give the warrant to any person he pleases and allow that person to commit a trespass." (5)

Arrest Without Warrant.

30. Arrest, by peace officer, without warrant, of suspected offender.—Every peace officer who, on reasonable and probable grounds, believes that an offence for which the offender may be arrested without warrant has been committed, whether it has been committed or not, and who, on reasonable and probable grounds, believes that any person has committed that offence, is justified in arresting such person without warrant, whether such person is guilty or not. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 22.

31. Persons assisting peace officer to arrest suspect.—Every one called upon to assist a peace officer in the arrest of a person suspected of having committed such offence is justified in assisting, if he knows that the person calling on him for assistance is a peace officer, and does not know that there is no reasonable grounds for the suspicion. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 23.

As the common law justified a constable in making an arrest without warrant, upon a reasonable ground of suspicion of a felony having been committed, although no felony had in fact been committed, (6) it was, in so far as felonies were concerned, identical with the law as now made applicable by the above section 30 to the particular offences (enumerated in sections 646-652, post), for which offenders may be arrested without warrant.

Of course, the grounds of belief upon which a peace officer acts under this provision of the law must, as shewn by all the authorities in point, be such as would lead any reasonable person, acting without bias or prejudice, to believe the arrested party guilty of the offence. (7).

Section 30 is intended to provide for the exoneration of an officer who has made an arrest in a case where it turns out that an offence has not been committed, — not for the case of arresting the wrong person. It is intended to apply to a class of cases in which an offence has been attempted but not completed. As, for example, the case of a man arrested for picking or attempting to pick a pocket, when it turns out there was nothing in the pocket. (8) Again, an officer may have reason to believe from what he hears and sees that a rape has been committed, but it may turn out that the offender has only been guilty of an indecent assault, or the offence of rape, although attempted, may not have been completed. Under this section the officer would be exonerated. Again, an officer going along a highway finds a homicide has been committed, and he makes an arrest. It may turn out that the homicide was excusable. In all these cases the officer has acted promptly on information that would satisfy any reasonable man, and he does so at the peril of justification which he can obtain when a judge decides that he has had reasonable and probable grounds on which to make the arrest.

A justice of the peace is liable in trespass where, without an information therefor being first duly sworn, he issues his warrant for the arrest of a person charged with a criminal offence for which, under section 30 ante, and secs. 646-652, post, an arrest may be made without warrant. Sections 30 and 31 are a codification of the common law with respect to the right of a peace officer whether a justice of the peace, or a constable, to personally arrest on view or on suspicion or by calling some person on the spot to assist him; but they do not authorize a justice, acting without an information laid before him, to direct a constable to make an arrest elsewhere without warrant. (9)

The arrest of a person charged with obtaining goods by false pretences with intent to defraud, upon a request by telegram from another province of Canada where the offence is alleged to have been committed, may be justified by a peace officer by shewing either that the accused actually committed such offence, or that he (the officer) believes on reasonable grounds that the accused committed the offence charged. (10)

Where, in a Manitoba case, an officer was tried for manslaughter in shooting a person fleeing from arrest, it was held that the question of reasonable and probable grounds was to be left to the jury with a direction to apply the law as stated by the trial judge. (1)

32. Arrest, by any person, without warrant, of any one found committing an offence.—Every one is justified in arresting without warrant any person whom he finds committing any offence for which the offender may be arrested without warrant, or may be arrested when found committing. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 24.

33. Arrest, by any person, of any one reasonably believed guilty of an offence actually committed.—If any offence, for which an offender may be arrested without warrant, has been committed, any one who, on reasonable and probable grounds, believes that any person is guilty of that offence is justified in arresting him without warrant, whether such person is guilty or not. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 25.

This section applies to a case in which an offence, for which an arrest may be made without warrant, has been actually committed by some one: while section 30, relating to the power of a peace officer, is, as already mentioned, for cases in which it turns out that the offence has not been committed at all, or in which the offence has been attempted or commenced but not completed.

OFFENCES FOR WHICH AN ARREST MAY BE MADE WITHOUT WARRANT.—The offences, for which an offender found committing any of them may be arrested, without warrant, by ANY ONE,—whether a peace officer or not, and for which an offender is not found committing or who has committed any of them may be arrested, without warrant, by a PEACE OFFICER,—are enumerated in sections 646-649, post.

See also sections 650-652, post, for other provisions as to the right to arrest without warrant.

34. Arrest, by any person, of any one reasonably believed to be committing an offence by night.—Every one is protected from criminal responsibility for arresting without warrant any person whom he, on reasonable grounds, believes he finds committing by night any offence for which the offender may be arrested without warrant. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 26.

35. Arrest by peace officer of person whom he finds committing offence.—Every peace officer is justified in arresting without warrant any person whom he finds committing any offence. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 27.

See sec. 648, post.

36. Arrest of person found committing any offence at night.—Every one is justified in arresting without warrant any person whom he finds by night committing ony offence.

2. Every peace officer is justified in arresting without warrant any person whom he finds lying or loitering in any highway, yard or other place by night, and whom he has good cause to suspect of having committed or being about to commit any offence for which an offender may be arrested without warrant. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 28 (2)

(2) See section 652, post, and paragraph (2) thereof, which provides that a person apprehended by night while lying or loitering in any highway, etc., must be brought before a justice of the peace by noon of the following day.

Under section 2[27], ante, night or night time is the interval between nine o'clock in the afternoon and six o'clock in the forenoon of the following day.

"FOUND COMMITTING" has been held to mean either seeing the party actually committing the offence or pursuing him immediately or continuously after he has been seen committing it; so that to justify the arrest, without warrant, of an offender on the ground of his being found committing an offence, he must be taken in the very act of committing it, or there must be such fresh and continuous pursuit of him from his being seen and surprised in the act until his actual capture that the finding him in the act and his subsequent pursuit and capture may be considered to constitute one transaction. (3) Immediately means immediately after the commission of the offence, and not immediately after the discovery of its commission. Pursuit after an interval of three hours would not be a fresh pursuit. (4) It seems that if the offender be seen in the commission of the offence by one person he may be apprehended by another who did not see him committing it. (5)

37. Arrest during flight.—Every one is protected from criminal responsibility for arresting without warrant any person whom he, on reasonable and probable grounds, believes to have committed an offence and to be escaping from and to be freshly pursued by those whom he, on reasonable and probable grounds, believes to have lawful authority to arrest that person for such offence. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 29.

This section is identical with section 39 of the English Draft Code, opposite to which the Royal Commissioners have the following note:—"This is believed to extend the common law, which applies only to the arrest of persons actually guilty. It does not affect the question of civil liability."

It will be noticed that in some of the foregoing sections the word "justified" is used, while in others the words used are "protected from criminal responsibility." The different meanings intended to be conveyed by these two expressions are explained in the following extract, bearing on the subject, taken from p. 11 of the report of the English Commissioners: "There is a difference in the language used in the sections in this part which probably requires explanation. Sometimes it is said that the person doing an act is 'justified' in so doing under particular circumstances. The effect of an enactment using that word would be not only to relieve him from punishment, but also to afford him a statutable defence against a civil action for what he had done. Sometimes it is said that the person doing an act is 'protected from criminal responsibility' under particular circumstances. The effect of an enactment using this language is to relieve him from punishment, but to leave his liability to an action for damages to be determined on other grounds, the enactment neither giving a defence to such an action where it does not exist, nor taking it away where it does. This difference is rendered necessary by the proposed abolition of the distinction between felony and misdemeanor. We think that in all cases where it is the duty of a peace officer to arrest, (as it is in cases of felony), it is proper that he should be protected, as he is now, from civil as well as from criminal responsibility. And as it is proposed to abolish the distinction between felony and misdemeanor on which most of the existing law as to arresting without a warrant depends, we think it is necessary to give a new protection from all liability (both civil and criminal) for arrest in those cases which by the scheme of the Draft Code are (so far as the power of arrest is concerned) substituted for felonies. In those cases therefore which are provided for in sections 32, 33, 34, 37, 38, (6), the word 'justified' is used. A private person is by the existing law protected from civil responsibility for arresting without warrant a person who is on reasonable grounds believed to have committed a felony, provided a felony has actually been committed, but not otherwise. In section 35, (7) providing an equivalent for this law, the word used is 'justified.' On the other hand where we suggest an enactment which extends the existing law for the purpose of protecting the person from criminal proceedings, we have not thought it right that it should deprive the person injured of his right to damages. And in cases in which it is doubtful whether the enactment extends the existing law or not, we have thought it better not to prejudice the decision of the civil courts by the language used. In cases therefore such as those dealt with by sections 29, 30, 31, 36, 39, 46, 47, (8), we have used the words 'protected from criminal responsibility.'"

POWERS OF ARREST BY PEACE OFFICER AND BY PRIVATE PERSON CONTRASTED.

With regard to a peace officer's powers, the effect of sections 30, 35, and 36 and of sections 646-648 and 652, post, seems to be that he will be justified (that is relieved from civil as well as criminal responsibility), in making an arrest without warrant in any of the following cases:

1. When he believes, on reasonable and probable grounds, that an offence for which an arrest without warrant may be made has been committed, and when he believes, on reasonable and probable grounds, that the person whom he arrests has committed it, whether it turns out that such offence has been actually committed or not, and whether the person so arrested be guilty or not.

2. When the person whom he arrests is found in the act of committing any criminal offence whatever.

3. When the person whom he arrests is found by the peace officer lying or loitering in any highway, yard or other place, by night, and such peace officer has good cause to suspect the person, so found by him, of having committed or being about to commit any offence for which an offender may be arrested without warrant.

4. When the person whom he arrests has committed or is by any one found committing any offence enumerated in section 652, post.

With regard to the powers of a private individual, the effect of sections 31, 32, 33 and 36 and of sections 646, 648 and 649, post, is that he will be justified, that is relieved from civil and criminal responsibility, in any of the following cases:

1. In assisting, — when called upon, — a peace officer in arresting any person suspected of having committed an offence for which an offender may be arrested without warrant, provided he knows that the person calling for his assistance is a peace officer, and provided also that he is not aware of there being no reasonable grounds for suspecting the person sought to be arrested.

(6) Sections 32, 33, 34, 37 and 38 of the English Draft Code are identical with sections 30, 31, 32, 35 and 36 of our Code.

(7) Section 35 of the English Draft Code is identical with section 33 of our Code.

(8) Sections 29, 30, 31, 36, 39, 46 and 47 of the English Draft Code are identical with sections 27, 28, 29, 34, 37, 44 and 45 of our Code.

2. In arresting, without warrant, any one whom he himself finds at any time (day or night) committing any offence for which an offender may be arrested without warrant, or may be arrested when found committing.

3. In making an arrest, without warrant, of any one whom on reasonable and probable grounds he believes guilty of any offence for which an offender may be arrested without warrant, whether such person is guilty or not; provided, however, that such offence has been actually committed by some one.

4. In arresting without warrant any one whom he himself actually finds, by night, committing any offence whatever.

Under sections 34 and 37 a private individual is protected from criminal responsibility, but not from civil liability in any of the following cases:

1. In making an arrest without warrant of any one whom, on reasonable and probable grounds, he believes he finds committing by night any offence for which an offender may be arrested without warrant.

2. In arresting, without warrant, any one whom, on reasonable and probable grounds, he believes to have committed an offence and to be escaping from and to be freshly pursued by those whom he, on reasonable and probable grounds, believes to be lawfully authorized to arrest that person for that offence.

It will be seen that, on the one hand, a peace officer arresting, without warrant, a person whom he reasonably suspects to have committed one of the offences enumerated in sections 646 and 647, post, will be justified not only if the person arrested be innocent, but even if the suspected offence has not been committed at all, (sec. 39); while, on the other hand, a private individual making an arrest, without warrant, of a person whom he has reasonable and probable grounds for believing to be guilty of an offence, must, in order to be justified, shew that the suspected offence has been actually committed by some one. (Sec. 33.) And while a peace officer will be justified in arresting any person whom he finds, at any time, (day or night), committing any offence whatever, (sec. 35, ante, and section 648, post), it is different with regard to a private individual; it is only when the private individual finds the offender committing an offence in the night time, (sec. 36, ante, and sec. 648, post), that he is justified in arresting him without warrant for any offence not enumerated in sec. 646, post. If it be in the day time, the offence in order to justify a private individual in making the arrest without warrant, (sec. 32), must be one of the offences enumerated or an offence which is being committed against property of which such private individual is the owner or of which the person under whose authority he acts is the owner. (See sec. 650, post).

38. Statutory power of arrest.—Nothing in this Act shall take away or diminish any authority given by any Act in force for the time being to arrest, detain or put any restraint on any person. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 30.

39. Force used in arrests, etc.—Every one executing any sentence, warrant or process, or in making any arrest, and every one lawfully assisting him, is justified, or protected from criminal responsibility, as the case may be, in using such force as may be necessary to overcome any force used in resisting such execution or arrest, unless the sentence, process or warrant can be executed or the arrest effected by reasonable means in a less violent manner 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 31.

This section is copied from section 41 of the English Draft Code, and is based upon the principle that, as in making an arrest or in executing any sentence, warrant, order, or process, a peace officer or other person legally authorized acts under legal command or compulsion he may, if resisted, repel force with force; and if, in using reasonable and necessary force to overcome resistance, the officer should happen, in the struggle, to kill the person resisting or any of his accomplices, he will be exonerated; while, on the other hand, if death should ensue to the officer or any one assisting him, the persons so resisting will be guilty of murder. (9)

40. Duty of persons arresting.—It is the duty of every one executing any process or warrant to have it with him, and to produce it, if required.

2. It is the duty of every one arresting another, whether with or without warrant, to give notice, where practicable, of the process or warrant under which he acts, or of the cause of the arrest.

3. A failure to fulfil either of the two duties last mentioned shall not of itself deprive the person executing the process or warrant, or his assistants, or the person arresting, of protection from criminal responsibility, but shall be relevant to the inquiry whether the process or warrant might not have been executed, or the arrest effected, by reasonable means in a less violent manner. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 32.

The third clause of this section is believed to alter the common law; but the first and second clauses are declaratory of the common law as held in several cases.

For instance, where a warrant was issued to apprehend a person for an offence in respect of which an arrest could not be made without warrant, it was held that the police officer who executed it must have the warrant with him when making the arrest, and that, otherwise, the arrest would be illegal and there could not be a conviction for assaulting the police officer in the execution of his duty. (10) In one of the cases (1), it was held not to be murder, but only manslaughter, where the arrest of a poacher was attempted by an officer who had seen the warrant but did not have it with him, at the time, and the poacher killed the officer. But Lindley, J., said, in another case, that, "cases may be imagined where the absence of a warrant might be no defence,—as where the murder was premeditated." (2)

41. Peace officer preventing escape by flight from arrest.—Every peace officer proceeding lawfully to arrest, with or without warrant, any person for any offence for which the offender may be arrested without warrant, and every one lawfully assisting in such arrest, is justified, if the person to be arrested takes to flight to avoid arrest, in using such force as may be necessary to prevent his escape by such flight, unless such escape can be prevented by reasonable means in a less violent manner. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 33.

Only in the last extremity should a peace officer resort to such a dangerous weapon as a revolver in order to prevent the escape of an accused person attempting to escape by flight. (3)

42. Private person preventing escape.—Every private person proceeding lawfully to arrest without warrant any person for any offence for which the offender may be arrested without warrant, is justified, if the person to be arrested takes to flight to avoid arrest, in using such force as may be necessary to prevent his escape by flight, unless such escape can be prevented by reasonable means in a less violent manner, if such force is neither intended nor likely to cause death or grievous bodily harm. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 34.

See sec. 167, post, as to neglect to aid peace officers when required.

43. Preventing escape in other cases.—Every one proceeding lawfully to arrest any person for any cause other than an offence in the last section mentioned is justified, if the person to be arrested takes to flight to avoid arrest, in using such force as may be necessary to prevent his escape by flight, unless such escape can be prevented by reasonable means in a less violent manner, if such force is neither intended nor likely to cause death or grievous bodily harm. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 35.

44. Preventing escape or rescue after arrest.—Every one who has lawfully arrested any person for any offence for which the offender may be arrested without warrant is protected from criminal responsibility in using such force in order to prevent the rescue or escape of the person arrested, as he believes, on reasonable grounds, to be necessary for that purpose. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 36.

This seems to extend the common law so far as regards private persons. (4)

45. Every one who has lawfully arrested any person for any cause other than an offence for which the offender may be arrested without warrant is protected from criminal responsibility in using such force in order to prevent his escape or rescue as he believes, on reasonable grounds, to be necessary for that purpose, if such force is neither intended nor likely to cause death or grievous bodily harm. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 37.

such does not constitute a voluntary abandonment of the arrest, and a re-arrest upon the same warrant is justified. (5)

46. Preventing breach of the peace.—Every one who witnesses a breach of the peace is justified in interfering to prevent its continuance or renewal and may detain any person committing or about to join in or renew such breach of the peace, in order to give him into the custody of a peace officer, if the person interfering uses no more force than is reasonably necessary for preventing the continuance or renewal of such breach of the peace, or than is reasonably proportioned to the danger to be apprehended from the continuance or renewal of such breach of the peace. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 38.

47. Peace officer preventing breach of the peace.—Every peace officer who witnesses a breach of the peace, and every person lawfully assisting him, is justified in arresting any one whom he finds committing such breach of the peace, or whom he, on reasonable and probable grounds, believes to be about to join in or renew such breach of the peace.

2. Every peace officer is justified in receiving into custody any person given into his charge as having been a party to a breach of the peace by one who has, or whom such peace officer, upon reasonable and probable grounds, believes to have, witnessed such breach of the peace. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 39.

It appears to have always been competent for a peace officer and even for a private individual to suppress or prevent the continuance of a breach of the peace, committed in his presence, as well as to arrest the persons committing it. (5a) "The Common law right and duty of conservators of the peace and of all persons (according to their power) to keep the peace and to disperse, and, if necessary, to arrest those who break it, is obvious and well settled." (6) In the case of an affray, peace officers have even been justified in breaking doors open, in order to suppress it, or in order to apprehend the affrayers, and either to carry them before a justice, or by their own authority, imprison them for a convenient time, until the heat was over. (7)

But, what is a breach of the peace? It is said, in regard to the criminal law of England, that, "the foundation of the whole system of criminal procedure was the prerogative of keeping the peace, which is as old as the monarchy itself, and which was, as it still is, embodied in the expression, 'The King's Peace,' the legal name of the normal state of society." (8) It may, therefore, be safely asserted that, as all crimes, being public wrongs, tend more or less to affect or disturb, directly or indirectly, the good order and tranquillity so essential to the general welfare of a community, the commission of an offence will nearly always include or involve a breach of the peace. But there are some offences which are directed more particularly against the public peace; or in which the breach of the peace is the prominent feature, such, for example, as an affray, an unlawful assembly, a riot, and the like, (9) An affray (from affraier, to terrify), was by the common law the act of two or more persons fighting in some public place to the alarm of the public. If the fight were in private, it was no affray, but an assault; (10) and mere quarrelsome or threatening words would not amount to an affray; although a person, even when he uses no actual force himself, may nevertheless be guilty of an affray, by, for example, assisting at a prize fight. (1) An unlawful assembly was the meeting together,—in a manner likely to endanger the peace,—of three or more persons for the carrying out of some common purpose of a private nature, there being no aggressive act actually done. (2) When the persons thus unlawfully assembled proceeded or moved forward to the execution of their purpose, but did not get to the point of actually executing it, it was called a rout; (3) and if they went on to the actual execution of their purpose, in a violent and alarming manner, it was a riot (4).

These differences are illustrated thus:

A hundred men armed with sticks meet together at night to consult as to destroying a fence erected by their landlord. Thus far, they are an unlawful assembly.

After thus meeting and consulting together, they march in a body in the direction of the fence. Up to this point there is a rout.

Subsequently, they arrive at the fence, and, amid great confusion and tumult, they violently pull it down. There is now a riot.

The gist of these offences has always been, not the lawfulness or the unlawfulness of the object in view, but the unlawful manner of proceeding, that is, with circumstances of force or violence calculated to inspire terror. And therefore it appears that, assembling for an unlawful object and actually executing it would not be a riot, if done peaceably. (5)

Under chapter 147 R. S. C. 1886 (repealed by the old Code), these offences were defined as follows:

"Three or more persons who, having assembled, continue together with intent unlawfully to execute any common purpose, with force and violence, or in a manner calculated to create terror and alarm, are guilty of an unlawful assembly."

"Three or more persons, who, having assembled, continue together with intent unlawfully to execute any common purpose, with force and violence, or in any manner calculated to create terror and alarm, and who endeavor to execute such purpose, are although such purpose is not executed, guilty of a rout."

"Three or more persons who, having assembled, continue together with intent unlawfully to execute any common purpose, with force and violence, and who wholly or in part execute such purpose in a manner calculated to create terror and alarm, are guilty of a riot."

"Two or more persons who fight together in a public place in a manner calculated to create terror and alarm, are guilty of an affray."

The present definitions of riots, unlawful assemblies, affrays and other similar offences against the public peace, are to be found in sections 79 to 98, post.

Suppression of Riot.

48. Suppression of riots by magistrates, etc.—Every sheriff, deputy sheriff, mayor or other head officer or acting head officer of any county, city, town or district, and every magistrate and justice of the peace, is justified in using, and ordering to be used, and every peace officer is justified in using, such force as he, in good faith, and on reasonable and probable grounds, believes to be necessary to suppress a riot, and as is not disproportioned to the danger which he, on reasonable and probable grounds, believes to be apprehended from the continuance of the riot. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 40.

It was held, before the Code, that where a magistrate, charged with the preservation of the peace in a city, caused the military to fire upon a person who was thereby wounded, the magistrate was not liable to an action of damages at the suit of the party injured, it being made to appear that, although there was no real necessity for firing, the circumstances were such that a person might have been reasonably mistaken in his judgment as to the necessity for such firing. (6)

By section 94, post, sheriffs, magistrates and other peace officers are punishable for omitting to do their duty in suppressing a riot, when they have notice that there is one in progress within their jurisdiction.

49. Suppression of riots by persons acting under lawful orders.—Every one, whether subject to military law or not, acting in good faith in obedience to orders given by any sheriff, deputy sheriff, mayor or other head officer or acting head officer of any county, city, town or district or by any magistrate or justice, for the suppression of a riot, is justified in obeying the orders so given unless such orders are manifestly unlawful, and is protected from criminal responsibility in using such force as he, on reasonable and probable grounds, believes to be necessary for carrying into effect such orders.

2. It shall be a question of law whether any particular order is manifestly unlawful or not. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 41.

Opposite to a section identical with this one, the English Commissioners make in their draft code the following marginal note:

"The protection given by this and the following sections to persons obeying the orders of magistrates and military officers is perhaps carried to an extent not yet expressly decided; but see the language of Tyndall, C.J., in R. v. Pinney, (7) and Willes, J., in Keighley v. Bell. (8) And at p. 18, of their report upon the Draft Code the Commissioners have the following general remarks in reference to the suppression of riots: "We would direct special attention to the sections relating to the suppression of riots, particularly to their suppression by the use of military force. We do not think that these sections differ from what would probably be held to be the law if cases should ever occur to raise the questions which they determine, but we cannot say that every proposition has been expressly held to be the law. We must observe in regard to all these provisions that the law upon the different matters to which they relate has never before, so far as we know, been reduced to an explicit or systematic form."

In the case of R. v. Pinney, it was held that the general rules of law require of magistrates, at the time of a riot, that they should keep the peace and restrain the rioters and pursue and arrest them; that, to enable magistrates to do this, they have the right to call upon all subjects to assist them; that all subjects are bound, upon reasonable warning, to render assistance, and that a magistrate would be justified in giving fire-arms to those who thus come to assist him, although it might not always be prudent for him to do so. It was also held that mere good feeling and upright intention in a magistrate is no defence, if he has been guilty of a neglect of his duty, and that the fact of his having acted under the advice of others is no defence, if in reality he acted contrary to law, but that the real question is whether he did all that he knew was in his power and all that could be expected from a man of ordinary prudence, firmness and activity to suppress the riot, and, further, that, on trial of a magistrate for neglect of duty, he ought not to be found guilty unless all the jury are satisfied that he was guilty of the same act of neglect, and that if, for instance, four of the jurors think him guilty of one act of neglect and eight of them think him guilty of some other act of neglect, this is not sufficient.

The case of Keighley v. Bell was one in which the plaintiff, a captain in the 49th Madras Native Infantry, sued his commander, — Major-General Bell,—for false imprisonment, malicious prosecution, and libel; and it was there held that a military man cannot maintain, against his commander, an action for acts done by such commander under orders from his (the commander's) superiors,—(which orders such superiors have a right to give and which such commander would be bound, by military law, to obey,) —unless the commander himself procure the giving of such orders by means of malicious representations or from some sinister or improper motive and without reasonable and probable cause. Willes, J., in the course of his remarks, saying:—"The question is whether the acts done by the defendant were acts done not in the ordinary discharge of his military duties, but acts done without any reasonable or probable cause and merely for the purpose of injuring the plaintiff: and, in my opinion, there is no evidence of the affirmative of that question. If it were a question merely on the weight or effect of the evidence, I should have left it to the jury; but I think there is NO evidence upon which a conclusion could be drawn that there was such an absence of probable cause or such sinister motive and abuse of the office and power of the defendant as could sustain the action. This opinion of mine is formed upon a careful review of the undisputed facts of the case."

In this case, Mr. Justice Willes, evidently following the principle laid down in the second paragraph of the above section 49, decided, as a matter of law, that the superior military orders under which the defendant, Bell, had done the acts complained of by the plaintiff were not manifestly unlawful, because they were orders which the defendant, Bell, was bound, in the ordinary discharge of his military duty, to obey.

50. Suppression of riot by persons without orders.—Every one, whether subject to military law or not, who in good faith and on reasonable and probable grounds, believes that serious mischief will arise from a riot before there is time to procure the intervention of any of the authorities aforesaid, is justified in using such force as he, in good faith and on reasonable and probable grounds, believes to be necessary for the suppression of such riot, and as is not disproportioned to the danger which he, on reasonable grounds, believes to be apprehended from the continuance of the riot. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 42.

Under this section any person,—acting in good faith and having reasonable grounds to believe that there is not time to wait for the intervention of the authorities,—may use such force as he reasonably believes to be necessary for the suppression of a riot which has actually commenced at the time of his interference. The section means that acts of violence thus done by him in endeavouring to suppress a riot are justified, if such acts do not exceed the danger to be apprehended from a continuance of the riot.

It has been argued that such a provision as this may be abused; but the same argument may be used against other provisions of the law. For instance, with regard to the principle of law which justifies a man who commits homicide in defence of his own life, it may be said that all a person has to do in order to take another's life is to imagine that his own is in danger, whether it is or not. But the man's imagination alone is not the test. The test lies with the Court, and depends upon the facts established by the proof; and, in case of a riot, it is for the Court, after a proper examination of the facts proved in evidence, to decide whether or not the force used in aiding or endeavouring to suppress a riot was greater than was necessary.

The section appears to be a fair statement of the common law on the subject (9), with the addition of the limitation which provides that the force used must not be disproportioned to the danger to be apprehended from a continuance of the riot.

Lord Chief Justice Tyndall, in his charge to the Grand Jury on the occasion of the Special Commission for trial of the Bristol rioters, said: "The law of England hath, in proportion to the danger which it attaches to riotous and disorderly meetings, made ample provision for preventing such offences and for the prompt and effectual suppression of them whenever they arise. * *

"* By the common law, every private person may lawfully endeavor, of his own authority, and without any warrant or sanction of the magistrate, to suppress a riot by every means in his power. He may disperse or assist in dispersing those who are assembled; he may stay those who are engaged in it from executing their purpose; he may stop and prevent others whom he shall see coming up from joining the rest; and not only has he the authority, but it is his bounden duty, as a good subject, to perform this to the utmost of his ability. If the riot be general and dangerous, he may, in order to keep the peace, arm himself against the evil doers; * * * * although it would be more discreet for every one in such a case to attend and be assistant to the justices, sheriffs or other ministers in doing this; for the presence and authority of the magistrate would restrain proceedings to such extremities until the danger was sufficiently immediate or until some felony was either committed or could not be prevented without recourse to arms; and at all events the assistance given by men who act in subordination and concert with the civil magistrate will be more effectual to attain the object proposed than any efforts, however well intended, of separate and disunited individuals. But if the occasion demands immediate action and no opportunity is given for procuring the advice or sanction of the magistrate, it is the duty of every subject to act for himself and upon his own responsibility in suppressing a riotous and tumultuous assembly; and whatever is honestly done by him in the execution of that object will be supported and justified by the common law. * The law acknowledges no distinction in this respect between the soldier and the private individual. The soldier is still a citizen lying under the same obligation and invested with the same authority to preserve the peace as any other subject. * Where the danger is pressing and immediate, where a felony has been committed or cannot otherwise be prevented, and from the circumstances of the case, no opportunity is offered of obtaining a requisition from the proper authorities, military subjects, like civil subjects, not only may but are bound to do their utmost of their own authority to prevent the perpetration of outrage, to put down riot and tumult, and to preserve the lives and property of the people." (10)

51. Protection of persons obeying military superiors.—Every one who is bound by military law to obey the lawful command of his superior officer is justified in obeying any command given him by his superior officer for the suppression of a riot, unless such order is manifestly unlawful.

2. It shall be a question of law whether any particular order is manifestly unlawful or not. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 43.

See sections 91, 92, 93, post, and comments there made, as to the reading of the Riot Act and the dispersion of rioters; and see, also, sections 94 and 95, post, as to the punishment of magistrates and others for neglecting to suppress or to aid in the suppression of a riot.

52. Preventing commission of certain offences by force. — Every one is justified in using such force as may be reasonably necessary in order,—

(a) to prevent the commission of any offence for which, if committed, the offender might be arrested without warrant, (1) and the commission of which would be likely to cause immediate and serious injury to the person or property of any one; or,

(b) to prevent any act being done which he, on reasonable grounds, believes would, if committed, amount to any such offence. 55-56 V., c 29, s. 44.

It was always lawful for any one to use necessary force to prevent the commission of serious crimes; and resistance to the commission of an attempted felony accompanied with force or violence, might be carried to the extent of killing the would-be felon, if his purpose could not be otherwise frustrated. (2) So, that, where under circumstances which may have induced the belief that a man was cutting the throat of his wife, their son shot and killed his father, it was held, on the trial of the son for murder, that if the accused had reasonable grounds for believing and honestly believed that his aid was necessary for the defence of his mother, the homicide was justifiable. (3)

(3) R. v. Rose, 15 Cox, 540.

Where A. to prevent B. from fighting with his brother, laid hold of him and held him down but struck no blow, upon which B. stabbed A., it was held that if A. had done nothing more than was necessary to prevent B. from beating his brother, and if he had died of the stab, the offence of B. would have been murder; but that if A. did more than was necessary to prevent the beating of his brother it would have been manslaughter. (3a)

By the above section, 52, the general rule allowing the use of necessary force in the case of the preservation of the peace and the prevention of crime are very closely connected with each other; and the prevention of crime is also closely connected with self-defence. For example, if a highway robber attack a peaceable citizen with murderous violence, the person so attacked has three different grounds upon which he may be justified in making resistance, even with deadly weapons; namely, First,—Self-defence; Second,—the right of preventing an offence for which an arrest may be made without warrant; and, Third,—the right to arrest the offender in the act of committing such offence and on the ground that it is also an offence against the public peace. (4)

When homicide is committed in the prevention of a criminal act accompanied with violence, the ground upon which it is justifiable is that of necessity; and therefore the necessity must continue to the time of the killing, or it will not justify it. For, although the person upon whom a criminal attack with violence is made need not retreat, but may at once resist and even pursue his antagonist until he finds himself out of danger, still, the killing of the offender after he is properly secured and after the apprehension of danger has ceased would not be justifiable, but would be murder, unless the blood were still hot from the contest or pursuit, and then on account of the high provocation it might be held to be only manslaughter. (5)

53. Self defence against unprovoked assaults.—Every one unlawfully assaulted, not having provoked such assault, is justified in repelling force by force, if the force he uses is not meant to cause death or grievous bodily harm, and is no more than is necessary for the purpose of self-defence.

2. Every one so assaulted is justified, though he causes death or grievous bodily harm, if he causes it under reasonable apprehension of death or grievous bodily harm from the violence with which the assault was originally made or with which the assailant pursues his purpose, and if he believes, on reasonable grounds, that he cannot otherwise preserve himself from death or grievous bodily harm. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 45.

54. Self defence against provoked assaults.—Every one who has without justification assaulted another, or has provoked an assault from that other, may nevertheless justify force subsequent to such assault, if he uses such force under reasonable apprehension of death or grievous bodily harm from the violence of the person first assaulted or provoked, and in the belief, on reasonable grounds, that it is necessary for his own preservation from death or grievous bodily harm, if he did not commence the assault with intent to kill or do grievous bodily harm, and did not endeavour at any time before the necessity for preserving himself arose, to kill or do grievous bodily harm, and if before such necessity arose, he declined further conflict, and quitted or retreated from it as far as was practicable.

2. Provocation, within the meaning of this and the last preceding section, may be given by blows, words or gestures. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 46.

ILLUSTRATIONS.

A strikes B, who defends himself against A's attack, and tries to avoid further conflict; but A continues his attack with such violence that B, in reasonable fear of being seriously injured or killed, injures or slays A, in order to save himself. B is justified.

A calls B a liar or a thief, or slaps his face, or provokes him by gestures such as by distorting his mouth or laughing at him. B thereupon strikes at A with a heavy walking stick; A repels the attack, struggles with him and wrests the stick from B's grasp, and, after throwing it on the ground, A turns to go away; but B, picking up the stick rushes at A, and tries to kill him with it; when A, to save himself from being injured or killed by B's blows with the stick, strikes B with his fist and thus causes his death. A is justified.

A, with the object of obtaining a show of excuse for beating and seriously injuring B, uses towards the latter some very insulting language and gestures, which provoke B to strike A, who thereupon knocks B down, jumps upon him, and having heavy boots on, kicks him to death. A is not justified, but is guilty of murder.

The force used by way of self-defence should be proportioned to and should not exceed what is necessary to avoid the attack which is being defended; and in order to justify the use of a weapon in self-defence, a person must, if he thereby kill or seriously injure his antagonist, shew conclusively that that mode of defending himself was really necessary to preserve his own life or avoid serious bodily harm, and that, before using it, he retreated as far as he could and had no other means left of successfully resisting or escaping. (6) In fact all force used by way of self-defence must in order to be justified or excused, as such, proceed from necessity; that is to say, it can only be justified when it is necessary for the avoidance or prevention of an offered injury; (7) and in no case can the force used be justified if the circumstances shew that the offered injury could be avoided without it, or if the force used be not for actual self-defence, but by way of retaliation, no matter what the provocation for such retaliation may be. For no provocation will, for example, render homicide justifiable or excusable. The most that any provocation can do is to reduce homicide to manslaughter. If one man kill another suddenly, without any or indeed without considerable provocation, the law implies malice, and the homicide is murder. Thus if A in passing B's shop distort his mouth and laugh at B, and B kill him, it is murder. (8) Or, if A be passing along the street, and B, meeting him, (there being a convenient space between A and the wall), take the wall of him, and thereupon A upon this slight provocation, kill B, this is murder. (9) But if there be provocation such as tends to greatly excite a person's passion, the killing in the heat of such passion will be manslaughter only. (10) For instance, during a street row, a soldier ran hastily towards the combatants, when a woman cried out: "You will not murder the man, will you?" The soldier replied: "What is that to you, you bitch?" Upon this the woman struck the soldier with an iron patten in the face, inflicting a severe wound and drawing much blood; and as she ran away the soldier pursuing her, stabbed her in the back and killed her. This was held to be only manslaughter, the smart of the man's wound and the effusion of blood being considered likely to keep his indignation boiling to the moment of the stabbing. (1) And, if a man find another in the act of adultery with his wife, and kill him or her, on the spot, this is only manslaughter, on account of a provocation so great that the law reasonably concludes it to be unbearable in the first transport of passion. (2) So, if a father see another in the act of committing an unnatural offence with his son, and smarting under this provocation instantly kill him, it is but manslaughter. (3)

There are authorities to the effect that mere words or gestures,—no matter how insulting or how expressive of contempt or reproach,—will not, without an actual assault, be sufficient to reduce homicide to manslaughter. (4) But Mr. Justice Blackburn, in referring to this doctrine, treated it as a general rule, which, under special circumstances, may have exceptions, as shewn by the following extract from his remarks in Rothwell's case:—"As a general rule of law no provocation of words will reduce the crime of murder to that of manslaughter; but under special circumstances there may be such a provocation of words as will have that effect; for instance, if the husband suddenly hearing from his wife that she had committed adultery, and, he having no idea of such a thing before, were thereupon to kill her, it might be manslaughter." (5) And in commenting on this, Russell expressly agrees with Mr. Justice Blackburn's view of the law as here stated. (6) There seems to be no doubt that, where the words which provoked a killing were threats to do serious bodily harm and were accompanied by some act shewing an evident intention of immediately following them up by actual physical force and violence, they were, under the common law, such a provocation as would reduce the killing to manslaughter. (7)

Whether a person acting under provocation and killing the provoker of his wrath, will be guilty of murder or manslaughter, will depend of course not only upon the nature of the provocation, but upon the nature and violence of the retaliation, and the weapon, if any, used.

For although an assault with violence may reduce the offence of killing to manslaughter, when the party assailed, immediately and in the heat of blood, resents the assault by killing his assailant, (8), and although an assault too slight in itself to be a sufficient provocation to reduce murder to manslaughter may become sufficient for that purpose when coupled with words of great insult, (9) it is not to be understood that the offence will be extenuated by every trifling provocation which, in point of law, may amount to an assault, nor even by an actual blow, in all cases; (10) nor that the retaliation may consist of violent acts of resentment bearing no proportion to the provocation or insult given and proceeding rather from brutal malignity than from human frailty. All such acts of retaliation are simply barbarous; and barbarity will often make malice. (1)

For instance, A and B quarrelled about some money that A had won from B, and which B wanted back. A would not give up the money; so B struck him, and A knocked B down; B got up, and A knocked him down again, and kicked him. A then put a rope round B's neck and after strangling him dragged his dead body into a ditch. A's acts amounted to murder and were so wilful and deliberate that nothing could justify them. (2) And where a wife scolded and chided her husband till he struck her with a pestle, so that she died, the husband was held guilty of murder, the pestle being a weapon likely to endanger life and the chiding being no provocation to extenuate the act of manslaughter. (3)

In order to reduce a homicide upon provocation from murder to manslaughter it is essential in all cases that the killing should appear to have been done immediately upon the provocation being given, for if there be sufficient cooling time for passion to subside and reason to interpose before the killing, it will be deliberate revenge, not heat of blood, and will amount to murder; (4) it being presumed, in that case, that the offender meant (in the terms of section 259, post) to cause death, and was actuated by what, under the old law, was known as express malice. (5)

55. Prevention of assault with insult.—Every one is justified in using force in defence of his own person, or that of any one under his protection, from an assault accompanied with insult: if he uses no more force than is necessary to prevent such assault, or the repetition of it.

2. This section shall not justify the wilful infliction of any hurt or mischief disproportionate to the insult which the force used was intended to prevent. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 47.

56. Defence of moveable property against trespasser. — Every one who is in peaceable possession of any moveable property or thing, and every one lawfully assisting him, is justified in resisting the taking of such thing by any trespasser, or in retaking it from such trespasser, if in either case he does not strike or do bodily harm to such trespasser.

2. If, after any one, being in peaceable possession as aforesaid, has laid hands upon any such thing, such trespasser persists in attempting to keep it or to take it from the possessor, or from any one lawfully assisting him, the trespasser shall be deemed to commit an assault without justification or provocation. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 48.

(5) R. v. Mason, Fost., 132; R. v. Kirkham, 8 C. & P., 115; Arch. Cr. Pl. & Ev., 23rd Ed., 795.

Under this section the fact of a trespasser persisting in attempting to take or keep the thing after the possessor has laid hands upon it, places the latter in position of a person acting in self-defence as contemplated by section 53.

57. Defence of moveable property with claim of right.—Every one who is in peaceable possession of any moveable property or thing under a claim of right, and every one acting under his authority, is protected from criminal responsibility for defending such possession, even against a person entitled by law to the possession of such property or thing, if he uses no more force than is necessary. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 49.

58. Defence without claim of right.—Every one who is in peaceable possession of any moveable property or thing, but neither claims right thereto nor acts under the authority of a person claiming right thereto, is neither justified nor protected from criminal responsibility for defending his possession against a person entitled by law to the possession of such property or thing. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 50.

59. Defence of dwelling-house.—Every one who is in peaceable possession of a dwelling-house, and every one lawfully assisting him or acting by his authority, is justified in using such force as is necessary to prevent the forcible breaking and entering of such dwelling-house, either by night or day, by any person with the intent to commit any indictable offence therein. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 51.

This section provides that, in order to justify the use of necessary force to prevent the breaking and entering of a dwelling-house, there must be an intent on the part of the person breaking and entering to commit an indictable offence. This proviso will, for instance, protect an officer who breaks and enters a house for the purpose of saving life or of making an arrest.

60. Defence of dwelling-house at night.—Every one who is in peaceable possession of a dwelling-house, and every one lawfully assisting him or acting by his authority, is justified in using such force as is necessary to prevent the forcible breaking and entering of such dwelling-house by night by any person, if he believes, on reasonable and probable grounds, that such breaking and entering is attempted with the intent to commit any indictable offence therein. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 52.

The distinctions made by sections 59 and 60 appear to be that where there is an actual intent to commit an indictable offence, necessary force to prevent the breaking and entering may be used whether it is attempted by night or by day; but if there be merely a reasonable belief that the breaking and entering is attempted with intent to commit an indictable offence, the attempted breaking and entering must occur in the night time, to justify the use of force to prevent it.

Breaking means to break any part of a building, or to open, by any means, any door, window, shutter, cellar-flap, or other thing intended to cover openings to the building or to give passage from one part of it to another and an entrance is made as soon as any part of the body of the person entering or any part of any instrument used by him is within the building. (6)

Where, in an action of damages for shooting at and wounding the plaintiff, the defendant pleaded that the plaintiff and thirty others threatened to break into his dwelling-house and to assault, tar and feather him and ride him on a rail, and that they were armed in front of his house and apparently in the act of breaking into it to accomplish their threats whereupon he, believing, on good grounds, that they were breaking into the house, opposed such entrance, and, in doing so, committed the alleged trespass, it was held, on demurrer, that the plea did not shew a sufficient defence, but that it was necessary for the defendant, before firing, to have warned the plaintiff and his associates to desist and depart, or that he would fire, and it was also held that such request to desist and depart would not, perhaps, have been necessary, if the persons had been actually advancing upon the defendant in the attitude of assaulting him, and still less if any of them had actually struck him, but that firing upon another could not be justified upon the ground merely of threats of personal violence or by the fact of the defendant believing and having reason to believe that they would execute their threats or by their being apparently in the act of breaking into the house; in other words, if a man sees another, as he supposes, breaking into his house, and if, without notice, he fires at him and wounds him, it will not be a legal justification for him to allege that the man was apparently breaking into his house. (7)

61. Defence of real property—Every one who is in peaceable possession of any house or land, or other real property, and every one lawfully assisting him or acting by his authority, is justified in using force to prevent any person from trespassing on such property, or to remove him therefrom, if he uses no more force than is necessary.

2. If such trespasser resists such attempt to prevent his entry or to remove him such trespasser shall be deemed to commit an assault without justification or provocation. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 53.

Here, again, the fact of a trespasser resisting the possessor's lawful efforts to prevent his entry or to effect his removal from the property places the possessor in the position of a person acting in self-defence as contemplated by section 53, ante.

While sections 59 and 60, ante, have reference to a breaking and entering with intent to commit an indictable offence, this section, 61, deals with the case of a mere trespasser.

Although, when a person refuses to leave the house of another, the latter may take hold of and use reasonable and necessary force for the purpose of removing him from the house, he has no right to beat him for some other purpose,—for the purpose, for instance, of punishing him for not going.

(6) See section 335 (c), post.
(7) Spires v. Barrick, 14 U. C. Q. B., 420-425.

The force used must be with a view to make the person leave the house, and not for a different purpose. (8)

A trespasser upon land of which another is in peaceable possession is not guilty of an assault under the above section 61, merely because he refuses to leave upon the order or demand of the other. Nor does the latter part of the section apply unless there is an overt act on the part of the person in possession towards prevention or removal and an overt act of resistance on the part of the trespasser. (9)

ILLUSTRATIONS.

A, a trespasser, enters B's house, and refuses to leave it. B is entitled to use all necessary force to remove A, but not to strike him. If, on B applying such necessary force, A resists, which is equivalent to an unprovoked assault, or if he otherwise actually assault B, B may defend himself, overcome A's resistance, and persist in using the necessary force to remove A from the house. (10)

A, on entering his own house, found B there and desired him to withdraw, but B refused to go. Upon this, words ensued between them, and A becoming excited proceeded to use force, and, by a kick which he gave B, caused his death. A was not justified in turning B out of the house by means of a kick, and was held guilty of manslaughter. (1)

A and his servant B insisted on placing corn in C's barn, which she refused to allow. A and B insisted and used force; a scuffle ensued, in which C received a blow on the breast, upon which she threw at A a stone which killed him. It was held that, as A received the blow in an attempt to invade C's barn against her will, and as C had a right, in defending her barn, to employ such force as was reasonably necessary for that purpose, she was not responsible for the unforeseen occurrence which happened in so doing. (2)

62. Asserting right to house or land.—Every one is justified in peaceably entering in the day-time to take possession of any house or land to the possession of which he, or some person under whose authority he acts, is lawfully entitled.

2. If any person, not having or acting under the authority of one having peaceable possession of any such house or land with a claim of right, assaults any one peaceably entering as aforesaid, for the purpose of making him desist from such entry, such assault shall be deemed to be without justification or provocation.

3. If any person having peaceable possession of such house or land with a claim of right, or any person acting by his authority, assaults any one entering as aforesaid, for the purpose of making him desist from such entry, such assault shall be deemed to be provoked by the person entering. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 54.

63. Discipline of minors.—It is lawful for every parent, or person in the place of a parent, schoolmaster or master, to use force by way of correction towards any child, pupil or apprentice under his care, provided that such force is reasonable under the circumstances. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 55.

The doctrine embodied in this section is that a parent, guardian, schoolmaster or master may inflict upon a minor child, ward, pupil, or apprentice, under his care, such force by way of correction as amounts to moderate chastisement. But he must not go beyond this; if he does, he will be liable to be indicted for assault and battery, or,—if his excessive chastisement causes the child's death,—for culpable homicide. (3)

Where a father, for some childish fault, gave an infant of two and a half years a dozen strokes with a strap, from the effects of which the child died, he was held guilty of manslaughter. Martin, B., saying:—"The law as to correction has reference only to a child capable of appreciating correction and not to a child two and a half years old. Although a slight slap may be lawfully given to an infant by its mother, more violent treatment of an infant so young by its father would not be justifiable." (4)

The right of a teacher to chastise his pupil cannot be greater than that of the parent over the child. And, so, where a schoolmaster beat a scholar for two hours and a half, with a stick, until he died, it was held that the beating was unlawful, excessive and unreasonable, and that the schoolmaster was guilty of manslaughter. (5)

Nor can the teacher of a mere day scholar, living with his parents, usurp the parental function of chastising for faults committed at home. (6)

A school teacher, who inflicts unreasonably severe chastisement upon a pupil, is criminally responsible, under this section and under section 66, post, for the excess of force used, although the punishment occasioned no permanent injury and was inflicted without malice. (6a)

Where, in an action of trespass for assault and tearing the plaintiff's clothes, the defendant by his plea justified as for moderate correction of the plaintiff as the defendant's servant, it was held, on demurrer, that the plea was bad as affording no answer to the wounding of the plaintiff and the tearing of his clothes, these not being within the scope of moderate correction, and, further, that a master has no right to use force in the correction of any servant except an apprentice. (7)

In the province of Quebec, it has been held that although schoolmasters have a right of moderate chastisement of disobedient and refractory scholars, this right can only be exercised where necessary for the maintenance of school discipline and to a degree proportioned to the scholar's offence, and that any chastisement which exceeds this limit and which springs from motives of caprice, anger or bad temper is wrongful. (8)

In England, the headmaster of a school,—having inflicted corporal punishment on a scholar for an offence committed by the latter while on the way to school,—was summarily convicted of an assault upon the scholar in respect of the corporal punishment so inflicted; but, upon a case stated by the convicting magistrate, it was held, in appeal, that besides the reasonable authority of a parent or guardian which is delegated to a schoolmaster, the appellant had power to inflict upon a scholar corporal punishment for misconduct of which he was guilty on the way to or from the school and out of school hours, it appearing that, by a Code of regulations issued by the Education Department under the Elementary Education Act, 1870, a grant was given to the school in question, provided that the teachers and managers satisfy the inspectors that all reasonable care was taken in the ordinary management of the school to bring up the scholars in habits of punctuality, of good manners, and language, etc., and also to impress upon the scholars the importance of cheerful obedience to duty, of consideration and respect for others, etc. (9)

64. Discipline on ships.—It is lawful for the master or officer in command of a ship on a voyage, to use force for the purpose of maintaining good order and discipline on board of his ship, provided that he believes, on reasonable grounds, that such force is necessary, and provided also that the force used is reasonable in degree. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 56.

65. Surgical operations.—Every one is protected from criminal responsibility for performing with reasonable care and skill any surgical operation upon any person for his benefit, provided that performing the operation was reasonable, having regard to the patient's state at the time, and to all the circumstances of the case. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 57.

If any person, whether he be a regular or licensed medical man or not, professes to deal with the life or health of His Majesty's subjects, he is bound to have competent skill to perform the task he holds himself out to perform, and he is bound to treat his patients with care, attention and assiduity. (10)

See section 246, post.

66. Excess.—Every one authorized by law to use force is criminally responsible for any excess, according to the nature and quality of the act which constitutes the excess. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 58.

"It is a principle of the common law that all powers the exercise of which may do harm to others must be exercised in a reasonable manner, and that, if there is excess, the person guilty of such excess is liable for it, according to the nature and quality of his act.

"It may also be said to be a principle of the common law that where a person is under a legal duty, on notice of certain facts, to take certain action, he will be protected in acting on the honest belief formed without negligence and on reasonable grounds, that those facts did exist, though that belief was mistaken." (Royal Commissioners' Remarks.)

Under certain prison rules (made in pursuance of section 6 of the Revised Statutes of Ontario, c. 217), it was provided that any officer or employee knowingly bringing tobacco to any prisoner should be dismissed and criminally prosecuted, and that employees of contractors must strictly conform to the prison rules; and sec. 27 of the Act subjected to a penalty any person giving or conveying tobacco to a convict. A contractor's workman employed in the prison was detected conveying tobacco to a convict, whereupon a constable, under instructions from a warden, arrested him, and, though under no apprehension of his attempting to escape, handcuffed him and led him through the public streets to the police station. The workman was indicted upon the charge preferred against him; and, in an action of damages afterwards taken by him, it was held that under section 25 of the R. S. C., c. 173, he was subject to indictment for disobedience of prison rules made in pursuance of sec. 6 of the R. S. O., c. 217, the remedy for infraction of the prison rules not being limited to that of the Provincial Act, and that therefore the arrest was legal, but that, under the circumstances, the handcuffing was not justifiable, and that the constable was liable therefor, in trespass, but that no liability attached to the warden, as the evidence failed to shew that he was a party to the handcuffing. (1)

67. Consent to death.—No one has a right to consent to the infliction of death upon himself.

2. If such consent is given, it shall have no effect upon the criminal responsibility of any person by whom such death may be caused. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 59.

ILLUSTRATIONS.

If A and B agree to fight a duel together, with deadly weapons, and either is killed in the duel, his consent will make no difference to the criminal responsibility of the other.

If A be suffering from a tumor or other serious malady, he has a right to allow B, a surgeon, to perform a surgical operation considered reasonable and necessary for the purpose of relieving or curing him; and if he happens to die under or in consequence of the operation, B will (under this section, 59), be free from criminal responsibility, if he has used in the operation reasonable knowledge, care and skill, as required by section 246, post.

It was formerly the law, that a person who encouraged another to commit suicide and was present aiding and abetting him while he did so, was guilty of murder as a principal, and that if two persons agreed to commit suicide together and only one of them actually died, the survivor was guilty of the murder of the other. (2)

But, now, under section 269, post, the act of one who counsels or procures another to commit suicide and who aids and abets him is made an indictable offence punishable with imprisonment for life, and under section 270, post, an attempt to commit suicide is an indictable offence punishable with two years imprisonment.

68. Obedience to "de facto" law.—Every one is protected from criminal responsibility for any act done in obedience to the laws for the time being, made and enforced by those in possession de facto of the sovereign power in and over the place where the act is done. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 60.

PARTIES TO OFFENCES.

Principals.

69. Every one is a party to and guilty of an offence who,—

(a) actually commits it; or

(b) does or omits an act for the purpose of aiding any person to commit the offence; or

(c) abets any person in commission of the offence; or

(d) counsels or procures any person to commit the offence.

2. If several persons form a common intention to prosecute any unlawful purpose, and to assist each other therein, each of them is a party to every offence committed by any one of them in the prosecution of such common purpose, the commission of which offence was, or ought to have been known to be a probable consequence of the prosecution of such common purpose. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 61.

70. Every one who counsels or procures another person to be a party to an offence of which that person is afterwards guilty, is a party to that offence, although it may be committed in a way different from that which was counselled or suggested.

2. Every one who counsels or procures another to be a party to an offence is a party to every offence which that other commits in consequence of such counselling or procuring, and which the person counselling or procuring knew, or ought to have known, to be likely to be committed in consequence of such counselling or procuring. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 62.

Parties to the commission of a criminal offence were formerly divided into three classes, namely:—

1. PRINCIPALS.—who were subdivided into (a) principals in the first degree, that is, persons who actually committed the offence with their own hands, and (b) principals in the second degree, that is, persons who were present aiding and abetting at the commission of the offence:—

2. ACCESSORIES BEFORE THE FACT, that is, persons who procured, counselled, advised or commanded the commission of the offence, and

3. ACCESSORIES AFTER THE FACT, that is, persons who, knowing of the commission of an offence by another, received, relieved, comforted or assisted the offender in order to hinder his apprehension or his trial or punishment. (1)

(1) 1 Russ. Cr., 6th Ed., 176-7.

It will be seen that these distinctions have been entirely dropped, and that there are only two classes of persons to be considered,—in regard to the degree of their guilt,—as parties to or implicated in a criminal offence, namely, PRINCIPALS and ACCESSORIES AFTER THE FACT.

PRINCIPALS.

A principal may be the actual perpetrator of the act, that is, the one who, with his own hands or through an innocent agent, does the act itself; he may be one who, before the act is done, does or omits something for the purpose of aiding some one to commit it; he may be one who is present aiding and abetting another in the doing of it; or he may be one who counsels or procures the doing of it, or who does it through the medium of a guilty agent.

ACTUAL PERPETRATOR WITH HIS OWN HANDS.—To be the actual perpetrator of the act with his own hands, the offender may or may not be present when it is consummated.

A and B were hired to unload sacks of oats from a ship and convey them to C's warehouse, A bringing out the sacks of oats from the ship and putting them on B's cart, and B drawing the loads from the ship's side to the warehouse. B, when starting with one of his loads, called out, "It's all right," to A, who shortly afterwards,—while B was away with the load with which he had started,—went to another cart near the vessel, emptied into a nosebag some oats from two sacks on the cart, and then placed the nosebag under the cart. When B returned to the vessel a few minutes later with the empty cart he took the nosebag from under the other cart where A had placed it, put it on his cart, and drove off with it. A then being on the vessel and within a few yards of B. Held, that as these circumstances shewed one transaction in which A and B both concurred and in which both were present at some part, though not at every part of it, both were properly convicted as principals and actual perpetrators of the theft. (2)

A purposely lays poison for B, who takes it, and dies from it. A, although absent when the poison is taken, is the actual perpretrator of the deed. (3)

ACTUAL PERPETRATOR THROUGH AN INNOCENT AGENT.—To be the actual perpetrator by means of an innocent agent is, for instance, where an offender, who may be absent when the act is done, uses, as an instrument to effect his purpose, a child under years of discretion, a madman or other person of defective mental capacity, or any one excused from responsibility by ignorance of fact or other cause. A tells B to put into C's tea something which B supposed to be powdered sugar but which is really arsenic. This is an attempt by A to murder C, but it is not an inciting B to commit murder. (6a)

When the person employed as an instrument is aware of the nature and consequences of his act, he is guilty of the offence as a principal, and so is the person who employs him. (7) But, if a person employed as an instrument,—though aware of the nature of the act,—merely concurs in it for the purpose of detecting and punishing the person employing him, he is, in that case, also considered and treated as an innocent agent. (8)

Where the prisoners had applied to an artist to engrave plate containing a copy of the coupons of the Netherlands Bank, and the artist, suspecting that there was an intention to defraud, communicated with the Dutch consul, and, under the latter's direction, employed persons to engrave the plate, it was held that the artist was the innocent agent of the prisoners. (9)

DOING OR OMITTING SOMETHING FOR THE PURPOSE OF AIDING AN OFFENDER.—A person who, before the commission of an offence, does something for the purpose of aiding any person to commit it is also a principal; and he is necessarily absent when the offence is actually committed or completed. Under the old law such a person, like one who procures or counsels the commission of an offence, was called an accessory before the fact. (10)

It has been held, at Montreal, upon a reserved case stated by the Recorder, that a person who leases a house to another for purposes of prostitution renders himself a party to and guilty of the offence committed by his lessee,—subsequently to the leasing of the house,—of keeping a disorderly house, although he was not himself the keeper, and that he can be prosecuted, tried, convicted and punished for such offence in the same manner as the actual keeper. A person may be considered as a principal present aiding and abetting in the commission of an offence without his presence being such a strict, actual, immediate presence as would make him an eye or ear witness of what is passing; it may be a constructive presence. (3) So that if a number of persons set out together or in small parties upon one common design, be it murder or any other offence, or for any other purpose of an unlawful nature in itself, and each takes the part assigned to him, some to commit the act, others to watch at proper distances to prevent a surprise or to favor, if need be, the escape of those more immediately engaged, they are all, provided the act be committed, present at it, in the eye of the law; for the part taken by each man in his particular station tended to give countenance, encouragement and protection to the whole gang and to ensure the success of their common enterprise. (4) If, however, the original intention or purpose of persons assembling and setting out together be a lawful one and if their common purpose be prosecuted by lawful means, and opposition to them be made by others, and one of the opposing party is killed in the struggle, in that case the person actually killing may be guilty of murder or manslaughter, as circumstances may vary the case, but the persons who are with him will not be involved in the guilt, unless they actually aided and abetted him in the fact. (5)

Where a person was prosecuted for driving a motor car at an unlawful speed and was convicted upon evidence shewing that he was the owner of the car and was sitting with a lady who was driving it at the dangerous rate of fifty miles an hour, it was held, on appeal to the Divisional Court in England, that he was guilty of aiding and abetting the offence and was properly convicted as himself doing the unlawful act complained of. (5a)

The mere fact of being a stake holder for a prize-fight, in which one of the combatants happens to be killed, does not render such stake holder, not present at the fight, responsible as a party to the manslaughter. (6)

Aid rendered to the principal offender after the crime has been completely committed is not sufficient of itself to make the person rendering such aid guilty as a principal in the commission of the offence. (7) It has, however, been held that as, for instance, the offence of stealing, by taking and carrying away, may be incomplete until the carrying away has been concluded, a person, who,—though not present at the actual taking of the thing stolen,—knowingly assists the thief while the latter is in the act of carrying it away, thereby becomes an aider at the commission of the theft, and is thus responsible, under section 69, as a principal party to the theft. (8)

Where a person is charged in an indictment as a principal, he cannot under such indictment be convicted on evidence which fails to establish the charge thus laid, but shews that he was an accessory after the fact to the offence charged. (9) But there is nothing to prevent a count charging a person as a principal being joined with a count charging the same person with being accessory after the fact to the same offence, and the accused may be found guilty of both. In other words, a man may be guilty as accessory both before and after the fact; as where he has incited another to commit theft, and, then, after the crime has been accomplished, he assists the actual thief in secreting the stolen property. (10) who does it through the medium of a guilty agent was called, under the common law, an accessory before the fact. He is necessarily absent when the offence is actually committed; if present, he would be guilty not only of having counselled, procured or commanded the commission of the offence but also of doing or aiding at the very act itself.

It seems to be in the very nature of things that there should be no distinction between the guilt of one who procures a crime to be committed and that of the agent who does it for him; or at least the distinction, if any, should not be in favor of the procurer. It is only right that the procurer or any one who commits an offence by the agency of another should be treated as a principal, whether his agent be an innocent or a guilty one; for qui facit per alium facit per se.—what one causes to be done by another is regarded as done by himself. (1)

The procurement may be personal, that is, personal between the procurer and the doer, or it may be through the intervention of a third party; and it will be sufficient even though the employer merely direct his agent to procure some other person without naming him. (2) In other words, it is not essential that there should be any direct communication between the procurer and the person procured to do the act. It is enough if he direct an intermediate agent to procure some other person to commit the offence, even if he do not name to the intermediate agent the person to be procured but merely direct the agent to employ some one. So that if A bid his servant to hire somebody, no matter whom, to murder B, and furnish money for the purpose, and the servant procure C, a person whom A never saw nor heard of, to do it, A, who is manifestly the first mover or contriver of the murder, is a principal, he being what was known, under the common law, as an accessory before the fact. (3)

The procurement may be direct.—by hire, counsel or command, or by conspiracy; or it may be indirect.—by expressly evincing, (that is, evincing by some words or actions), a liking for, approbation of, or assent to another's criminal design of committing an offence. (4) But a mere silent acquiescence would not be sufficient. Nor would words that amount to a bare permission. As if A said he would kill J. S., and B then said to A, "You may do as you please;" this would not amount to a procurement. (5)

If a person order counsel or advise one crime and the person ordered, counselled or advised intentionally commit another, as, for instance, if he be ordered to burn a house and instead of that he commit a theft, or if his instructions are to commit a crime against A, and, instead of doing so, he purposely commit the crime against B, the person so ordering will not be answerable. (6) In other words, if the person ordered, counselled or advised totally and substantially varies from the terms of the instigation, if, being solicited to commit an offence of one kind, he wilfully and knowingly commit an offence of another kind, he will stand single in that offence and the person soliciting will not be involved in the guilt. (7) Thus, if A command B. to burn C's house, and B, in so doing, commits a robbery, A, though a party to the offence of burning, is not guilty of the robbery, for that is a thing of a distinct and inconsequential nature. (8) And if A counsels B to steal goods of C, on the road, and B breaks into C's house and steals the goods there, A is not guilty as a party to the offence of breaking into the house, because that (the breaking in) is an offence of another kind. (9) But he is guilty as a party to the offence of stealing. (10)

If, however, the person counselled, ordered or advised complies in substance with the instigation of the party who has counselled, ordered or advised him, varying only in circumstances of time or place or in the manner of execution, the person who has counselled, ordered or advised him will be involved in his guilt. As if A command B to murder C by poison, and B commits the murder by means of a sword or other weapon or by any other means, A is answerable for the crime; for the murder of C was the object principally in contemplation, and that has been effected. (1) And if the person employed to commit a crime goes beyond the terms of the solicitation, yet, if, in the event, the offence committed was a probable consequence of what was ordered or advised, the person giving such order or advice will be answerable for that offence. As, if A advise B to rob C, and, in robbing him, B kills him, either upon resistance made, or in order to conceal the fact, or upon any other motive operating at the time of the robbery; or if A solicit B to burn the house of C, and B does it accordingly, and the flames taking hold of the house of D, that also is burned, A is answerable both in the one case for the murder of C, and in the other case for the burning of D's house. The advice, solicitation or orders were pursued in substance, and were extremely flagitious on the part of A; and the events though possibly happening beyond A's original intention were, in the ordinary course of things, the probable consequence of what B did under the influence and at the instigation of A. (2)

A more difficult question arises where the person counselled or ordered commits, by mistake, a different crime from that which he was solicited to commit. It has been said that if A orders B to kill C, and B, by mistake, kills D, or, aiming a blow at C, misses him and kills D, A will not be a party to the murder, because it differs in the person: (3) and in support of this position, Saunders' case is cited.

Saunders, with the intention of destroying his wife, by the advice of one Archer, mixed poison in a roasted apple, and gave it to her to eat; and the wife, having eaten a small part of it and having given the remainder to their child, Saunders, (making only a faint effort to save the child whom he loved and would not have destroyed), stood by and saw it eat the poison, of which it soon afterwards died. It was held that, though Saunders was clearly guilty of the murder of the child, Archer was not guilty as a party to that murder. (4) But Foster, J., says that this case does not support the position to the full extent; and he proposes the following case as worthy of consideration: "B is an utter stranger to the person of C; A, therefore, takes upon him to describe C by his stature, dress, age, complexion, etc., and acquaints B when and where he may probably be met with. B is punctual at the time and place, and D, another person, unhappily comes by and is murdered, upon the strong belief, on the part of B, that this is the man marked out for destruction. Here is a lamentable mistake; but who is answerable for it? B undoubtedly is. The malice egreditur personam. And may not the same be said of A? The pit which A, with murderous intent, dug for C, D, through A's guilt, fell into and perished. For B, not knowing the person of C, had no other guide to lead him to his prey than the description A gave of him, and B, in following this guide, fell into a mistake which it is great odds any man in his circumstances might have fallen into. I, therefore, conceive that A was answerable for the consequence of the flagitious orders he gave, since that consequence appears in the ordinary course of things to have been highly probable." (5)

So that where a person,—who is ordered, counselled or advised to commit a crime against A,—commits it against B, instead of A, the person ordering, counselling or advising the crime is answerable for the crime committed against B, if A has done this merely by mistake. (6)

By the above section, 70, of our Code, it is clearly laid down that he who counsels or procures the commission of any offence is a party to it, although the offence itself be committed in a way different from that which was counselled, and that he is a party to every offence which is committed in consequence of such counselling, and which he knew or ought to have known to be likely to be committed in consequence of such counselling; and, therefore, both by this section and by the common law, he is liable for everything that ensues upon the execution of the unlawful act counselled or commanded.

Foster, J., proposes the following criteria as explaining the grounds upon which the several cases falling under this head will be found to turn: "Did the principal (that is the person employed) commit the felony he stands charged with under the influence of the flagitious advice? Or, did he, following the suggestions of his own wicked heart, wilfully and knowingly commit a felony of another kind, or upon a different subject.(7)

The procurement must be continuing; for if the procurer repent, and, before the offence is committed, actually countermand his order, and the person ordered, counselled or procured persists in committing the offence in spite of the countermand, it seems that the original contriver will not be held responsible as a party to the offence. (8) But, by having counselled the commission of the crime, he would surely be guilty, under section 72, post, of an attempt to commit it, notwithstanding his subsequent repentance and countermand; for the act of counselling constitutes the attempt to commit an offence which is not actually committed in pursuance of the counselling. COUNSELLING SUICIDE.—It was formerly the law that a person, who encouraged another to commit suicide and was present aiding and abetting him while he did so, was guilty of murder as a principal, and that if two persons agreed to commit suicide together and only one of them actually died, the survivor was guilty of the murder of the other. SOLICITING AS AN ATTEMPT.—When a person with criminal intent solicits or advises another to commit an offence which the other does not commit at all, the soliciting or advising in that case will constitute, on the part of the would-be procurer, an attempt to commit the offence solicited or advised by him. EXECUTION OF DIFFERENT PARTS OF A CRIMINAL ACT BY DIFFERENT PERSONS.—If several combine to commit forgery, for instance, and each separately execute a distinct part of the forgery, they are all guilty as principals, although they may not be together when the forged instrument is completed. (8)

Thus, if A counsel B to procure the paper and C to engrave the plate and D to fill up the names of a forged note, and each of them does these respective acts without knowing that the others are employed for those purposes, B, C, and D, as well as A, may all be indicted for the forgery, as principals. FURTHER COMMENTS.—It has been held in England that a person who, without authority, induces a servant of the Postmaster General to hand over to him and so receives letters addressed to parties other than himself and coming into possession of such postal servant in the course of their transmission through the post, is guilty of stealing the letters either at common law as a principal or, under the 24, 25 Vic., c. 94, sec. 1, as an accessory before the fact. (10)

A person who purchases intoxicating liquors sold in violation of the Canada Temperance Act is not liable to conviction as a party to the offence, in having, by purchasing the liquors, aided, abetted, counselled or procured the sale. (1)

Of course, such an offence may be created by express legislation, as is the case under section 126 of the Quebec License Law, 1900, which provides that a purchaser of intoxicating liquor in contravention of that Act is liable to a fine and to imprisonment in default of payment of the fine. (2)

The circumstance that an accused has counselled and procured the commission of a theft,—thus rendering him liable, under section 70, to be convicted as a principal offender,—does not prevent his conviction for the substantive offence of having, after the commission of the theft, received the stolen property from the thief knowing it to have been stolen. (3) And, as we have already seen, (at p. 71, ante), there is nothing to prevent a person being charged in two separate counts with being an accessory both before and after the fact,—as where he has incited another to commit theft, and, after the theft has been committed, has assisted the actual thief in secreting the stolen property. (4)

71. Accessory after the fact.—An accessory after the fact to an offence is one who receives, comforts or assists any one who has been a party to such offence in order to enable him to escape, knowing him to have been a party thereto.

2. No married person whose husband or wife has been a party to an offence shall become an accessory after the fact thereto by receiving, comforting or assisting the other of them, and no married woman whose husband has been a party to an offence shall become an accessory after the fact thereto, by receiving, comforting or assisting in his presence and by his authority any other person who has been a party to such offence in order to enable her husband or such other person to escape. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 63.

To assist an offender to escape, punishment is, in principle, an obstruction of public justice of the same nature as resisting a peace officer in making an arrest, or rescuing a prisoner under arrest, and other like offences.

To render a person guilty of being an accessory after the fact, three conditions must co-exist; first, there must have been a criminal offence completely committed by the person harbored or assisted; second, the alleged accessory after the fact must be aware that the person he harbors or assists has committed the offence; and third, he must harbor or assist the principal offender to conceal the crime or to prevent him being brought to justice.

With regard to the first of these conditions the rule is that until the offence has been consummated any aid or assistance rendered to a party for the purpose of enabling him to escape the consequences of his crime will not make the person affording such assistance guilty as an accessory after the fact. This is a rule recognized without exception by all the authorities. (5) Thus, where A was charged with the murder of B, and C was charged with being an accessory after the fact to the murder, and the evidence adduced on the trial shewed that the assistance given by C. to enable A to effect his escape was in point of fact given after the mortal blow was dealt but before the death of the party assailed, although the death occurred within a short time thereafter, it was held that until B died the crime of murder was not consummated, and that C was not an accessory after the fact to the murder. (6)

The second condition is that, in order to establish the guilt of the alleged accessory after the fact, the latter must be shewn to have had notice, express or implied, of the principal offender having committed a criminal offence. (7)

The third and most important condition is that a person in order to be an accessory after the fact must be shewn to have done some act to assist the principal offender personally, (8) either to conceal the crime or to evade the pursuit of justice; so that where, for instance, a person is charged with being an accessory after the fact to murder, the question for the jury is whether such person knowing the murder to have been committed was either assisting the murderer to conceal the death or in any way enabling him to escape being brought to justice. (9)

One does not become an accessory after the fact by merely neglecting to inform the authorities that a crime has been committed or by forbearing to arrest the offender. (10)

The test of an accessory after the fact seems to be that he renders, to one known by him to have committed a criminal offence, some active personal help to enable him to conceal his offence or to hinder his apprehension, trial or punishment, as by concealing him in the house or shutting the door against his pursuers until he should have an opportunity to escape, or by furnishing him with money or food to support him in hiding, or by supplying him with a horse to enable him to fly from his pursuers, or a house or other shelter to conceal him in, or by using open force or violence to protect him, or by taking money from him to allow him to escape, or by bribing his gaoler to let him escape, or by conveying instruments to the principal offender to enable him to break gaol. (1) Of course, when a person actually rescues an offender from prison or from lawful custody, the rescuer is not only guilty of being an accessory after the fact to the other's offence, if he has actually committed one, but also of the substantive offence of rescue; and he may be indicted either way at the election of the prosecution. But where the rescue is effected before the principal offender has been convicted, the prosecution would probably prefer to prosecute the rescuer on the substantive offence of rescue; for when a person is in prison or in lawful custody upon a criminal charge it is an offence to rescue him or to help him to break prison, whether the prisoner be guilty or not of the crime charged against him. (2)

It has been held that one who employed another person to harbor the principal offender may be convicted of being an accessory after the fact, although personally he did no act of relieving or harboring but only through the person employed by him. (3)

Under the extradition laws in force between the United States and Canada an accessory before the fact to an extraditable offence may be extradited; but it is otherwise in the case of an accessory after the fact. (4)

Upon an indictment against an accessory after the fact or against a receiver, a confession made by the thief is not admissible to prove the guilt of the accessory after the fact or of the receiver; but the thief may be called as a witness against the accessory after the fact or against the receiver. So that where a person was indicted for receiving 60 sovereigns, stolen by one Rich, and a confession by the latter stating various facts implicating the prisoner, was tendered in evidence, the Court refused to receive anything that was said in such confession by Rich respecting the prisoner but admitted what Rich said about herself; and the Court's decision was upheld in appeal. (5)

And where two persons were indicted together, one for stealing and the other for receiving, and the principal pleaded guilty, Wood, B., refused to allow the principal's plea of guilty for the purpose of establishing, as against the receiver, the fact of the stealing by the principal. (6)

CRIMINAL LIABILITY OF MASTERS FOR ACTS OF THEIR SERVANTS.

The general rule of law is that a master is not criminally responsible for the acts of his servants.

We have already seen, at p. 23, ante, that the essence of a criminal offence is, as a general principle, the evil or wrongful intent with which the act which constitutes the offence is done.

In accordance with this general principle, there must, as an essential ingredient in a criminal offence, be some blameworthy condition of the mind in the person who does the act,—such as wilful intent, negligence or guilty knowledge; and the condition of mind of the servant is not to be imputed to the master; so that, as a general rule of the common law, the master is not criminally responsible for the acts of his servants.

A prosecution for a public nuisance constitutes an exception to this general common law rule. Such a prosecution appears to be considered as more in the nature of a civil than a criminal proceeding; the only reason why, in the case of a public nuisance, the proceeding is by indictment and not civilly, being that it is a matter which affects the whole community and is, as such, a matter in which a civil action does not lie. (7) So, that, where the directors of a Gas Company with its superintendent and engineer were indicted for a nuisance in permitting the refuse of gas to be conveyed into a public river, and the evidence shewed that the directors left the management of the works to the superintendent,—the engineer being under the direction of the superintendent, and the engineer giving orders to the workmen,—the directors, superintendent and engineer were held liable for the nuisance, the jury being directed by the Court that it made no difference that the directors were ignorant of the things done by their employees and workmen. (8) And where works were carried on for the profit of an owner by his agents, such owner was held liable to an indictment for a public nuisance caused by the acts of his workmen in carrying on the works, although such acts were done without the owner's knowledge and against his general orders, the Court being of opinion that where a person maintains works by his capital and employs servants who so carry on the works as to cause a nuisance to a private right for which a civil suit would lie, then, if the same nuisance inflict an injury upon a public right, the remedy for which could only be by indictment, the evidence which would maintain the civil suit would also support the indictment. (9)

The general principle of the common law that,—except in the case of a prosecution for a public nuisance,—a master is not criminally responsible for the acts of his servants applies also to statutory offences, with this difference, that it is within the power of the Legislature, if it so pleases, to enact, and, in some cases it has enacted that a man may be convicted and punished for an act or omission, although there was no blameworthy condition of mind in him; but, inasmuch as to do so is to create a responsibility which is contrary to the general rule of law, it is for those who assert that the legislature has so enacted to make it out, convincingly, by the language of the statute; for we ought not lightly to presume that the legislature intended that one man should be punished for the fault of another. (10)

By section 13 of the English Licensing Act, 1872 (35-36 Vic., c. 94), a licensee who permits drunkenness or any violent, quarrelsome or riotous conduct to take place on his premises, or sells intoxicating liquor to any drunken person, is liable to a penalty; and with reference to the meaning of the section, Stephen, J., said: "I am of opinion that the words of this section amount to an absolute prohibition of the sale of liquor to a drunken person and that the existence of a bona fide mistake as to the condition of the person served is not an answer to the charge, but only matter of mitigation of the penalties that may be imposed. (1) And where, in a prosecution, under section 16 of the same Act, for supplying liquor to a constable on duty, it was proved that the liquor was sold, without the knowledge of the defendant,—a licensed innkeeper,—by his servant, in the ordinary course of business, the servant taking the chance and asking no questions as to whether the constable was on duty or not, the defendant was convicted, and the conviction was upheld, on the ground that the wilful ignorance of the servant made the master responsible. (2)

Section 17 of the English Licensing Act provides that the owner of licensed premises who "suffers" gaming or any unlawful game to be carried on therein shall be liable to a penalty. Under this section, a hotel keeper was charged with having suffered gaming in her hotel. It appeared, by the proof, that the gaming complained of had taken place after the hotel keeper had retired for the night, leaving her premises,—in which were several guests,—in charge of a hall porter, who, as the evidence shewed, was wilfully blind to the gaming done by the guests. Upon this evidence the hotel keeper was convicted, the justices being of opinion that she took pains not to know what her guests were doing; and the conviction was upheld on the ground that the connivance of the hall porter, in whose charge the hotel was left by the defendant, was sufficient to make her responsible as having "suffered" gaming, and that proof of her actual knowledge of the gaming was not necessary. (3)

In another case, upon the same section, against an innkeeper for having "suffered" gaming to be carried on upon his licensed premises, it was proved that, in a part of the premises placed by the innkeeper in charge of a manager, gaming had occurred with the knowledge of such manager, but without any knowledge or connivance on the part of the innkeeper. It appeared that, connected with the inn, by passages and doors, there was a skittle alley which was in charge of the manager, to whom the innkeeper had given general instructions not to permit gaming. It was in this skittle alley that the gaming complained of had taken place, the manager being present in charge of the alley when the gaming was going on. Upon this evidence the innkeeper was convicted; and upon a case reserved it was held, maintaining the conviction, that the innkeeper was responsible for the connivance of his employee whom he had left in charge of the part of the premises where the gaming took place, and was thus guilty of having "suffered" gaming in his premises. (4)

In another case, it was shewn that the landlord knew nothing of the gaming complained of and that the only person who was aware of the gaming going on was a man employed as a potman, who, however, was not in charge of the premises, to whom there was no delegation of authority and who knew of the gaming merely as a fact and not as part of his business as an employee; and it was held, under these circumstances, that the landlord was rightly acquitted. (5)

The president of an incorporated company who hired the clerks and had the entire management of the company's business may be convicted for selling liquor contrary to the provisions of the Canada Temperance Act, where the sale had been made by a clerk who was employed under general directions received by him from the president. Where a milk dealer's servant, employed to sell milk, adulterated it with water, the master was, under section 6 of the English Food and Drugs Act (38-39 Vic., c. 63), convicted as the seller of the adulterated milk, and the conviction was maintained: it being held that the section imposed a positive prohibition against the sale of adulterated milk, the enactment not being that "no person shall knowingly sell" but that "no person shall sell," and that the law applied not only to the actual physical seller of the milk but also to the person on whose behalf the actual physical seller made the sale and that the master was bound not only not to personally sell unadulterated milk, but to take care that other people employed by him to sell milk did not sell it for him in such a condition as to come within the section. (7)

A's clerk went into B's shop and asked for and was served with some lard; whereupon A took it and told the shop assistant that it was bought for the purpose of analysis. The shop assistant then noticed and told A that, by mistake, he had enclosed the lard in a "margarine" wrapper instead of a wrapper marked "lard compound." On the hearing of a summons under section 6 of the Imperial Food and Drugs Act, B had tendered and the justices had refused to receive evidence shewing that the lard was put in the wrong wrapper by mistake and in the hurry of business, and that this act was contrary to B's express instructions to his employees; but, on appeal, it was held that there was nothing in the Act making the master responsible for an employee's act not only unauthorized and unsanctioned by the master but done by mistake, that the tendered evidence was wrongly refused, inasmuch as it was admissible and material, seeing that section 8 of the Act provided that a person should not be guilty of an offence in respect of the sale of any article of food, etc., mixed with any matter not injurious to health and not intended fraudulently to increase its bulk weight or measure or conceal its inferior quality, if at the time of delivering it he supply a notice by a label on or with the article to the effect that it is mixed, and inasmuch as it appeared that the omission of B's shop assistant to furnish the correct wrapper was by mistake and contrary to the usual course of his duty. (8)

The Imperial Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, renders the master or principal criminally liable for the acts of his servants and agents in all cases within section 2, sub-sections 1 and 2, where the conduct constituting the offence is pursued by such servants or agents within the scope or in the course of their employment; and the master or principal can only be relieved from criminal responsibility where he can prove that he has acted in good faith and has done all that it was reasonably possible to do to prevent the commission by his servants or agents of offences against the Act. (9)

72. Attempts.—Every one who, having an intent to commit an offence, does or omits an act for the purpose of accomplishing his object is guilty of an attempt to commit the offence intended whether under the circumstances it was possible to commit such offence or not.

2. The question whether an act done or omitted with intent to commit an offence is or is not only preparation for the commission of that offence, and too remote to constitute an attempt to commit it, is a question of law. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 64.

An attempt is "an abortive or frustrated effort." (10)

A bare intention to commit a criminal offence is not of itself punishable; but, in order to be so, there must be some act or acts, amounting either to an actual or an attempted carrying out of the criminal intention. Thus, if A. resolves in his own mind to shoot B., and openly avows it, he thereby commits no criminal offence; (1) but when he does something in execution of his design, and, through being interrupted or through some unforeseen cause intervening, he falls short of the actual perpetration of the intended offence, he is guilty of an attempt. (2)

An attempt to commit a crime may be made by soliciting another to commit it. For, as, on the one hand, a person is guilty, as a principal offender, of an offence which he solicits, advises or incites another to commit, and which the other actually does, commit, (3) so, on the other hand, when a person solicits, advises or incites another to commit an offence which the other does not commit, the act of soliciting, advising or inciting amounts to an attempt to commit the offence in view. (4) In other words, one who unsuccessfully solicits or advises the commission of an offence is guilty of an attempt to commit it; while one whose solicitation is successful in procuring the actual commission of an offence is a party to its commission. Thus, where one wrote to a school boy to meet him for the purpose of sodomy, but the boy, without even reading the letter, passed it to the school authorities, it was held that the offence of attempt by solicitation was complete. (5) It has been said that an act to constitute an attempt must be such as directly approximates to or is closely connected with the actual commission of the intended offence. (6) In the application of this principle some nice questions have arisen as to what acts, on the one hand, are preparation too remote to be an attempt; and what, on the other hand, are close enough to the offence to be an attempt; it being in many cases very difficult, — some say, impossible, — to distinctly define the dividing line between mere preparation for an offence and an actual attempt to commit it. (7) As an illustration, the case is given of a man who, with intent to commit murder, walks to the place where he purposes to commit it. This act of walking to the place is not considered an act sufficient to constitute an attempt to murder. (8) But if besides walking, to the place, the man were, on arriving there, to meet and fire a pistol shot at his intended victim, and fail to kill him, either by missing his aim altogether, or through the shot, though taking effect, not being fatal, he would undoubtedly be guilty of an attempt to murder. The mere act of buying a box of matches with the intention of using them to set a corn stack on fire is too remote to constitute an attempt to set the fire. (9) But where the prisoner had knelt down before a corn stack, and had lighted a match with the intention of setting the stack on fire; and then he blew out the light on observing that he was watched; it was held that this was an attempt to burn the stack. The accused had called at the prosecutor's house, and, on first being refused work and on afterwards being refused a shilling which he asked for, he became violent and threatened to burn up the premises. He was then watched by the prosecutor and his servant and seen to go to a neighboring stack where he knelt down and struck a lucifer match, but discovering that he was watched he blew out the lighted match and went away. (10)

In another case, A was charged with attempting to set fire to a dwelling-house, and B with inciting and hiring him to commit the offence. Under

B's directions. A had arranged and placed pieces of blanket saturated with coal oil against the doors and sides of the house, had lighted a match, which he held in his fingers till it was burning well, and had then put the light down close to the saturated blanket with the intention of setting the house on fire; but just before the flame touched the blanket the light went out, and he threw the match away without making any further attempt. Held, that the attempt was complete. (1)

If a man were to load a gun and declare his intention to shoot his neighbor with it, this would merely be a preparation of necessary means to commit the offence; in order to render him guilty of an attempt to shoot there would have to be, beyond such preparation, some act or movement on the man's part, in the nature of an endeavor to use the weapon upon the person of his intended victim.

There have been some decisions which have gone a long way towards treating preparation to commit a crime as an attempt to commit it. For instance, the procuring of dies for coining bad money has been treated as an attempt to coin bad money. (2)

Section 556, post, makes it a substantive offence,—indictable and punishable with imprisonment for life,—to purchase or have possession of coining instruments.

There seems to be no doubt that, where a person does an act whose natural consequence,—if it ensued,—would be criminal, but which consequence happens to be prevented from ensuing by extraneous causes, he is, notwithstanding the consequence being prevented, to be taken to have intended that the natural consequence of his act should result, that is to say, he is to be considered as having intended and endeavored to commit the crime which would have resulted, had he not been prevented from completing his act. So, that, where, in support of a conviction for attempting to discharge a loaded firearm with intent to do grievous bodily harm, the evidence shewed that the prisoner drew from his pocket a revolver and pointed it towards his mother, but that his wrists were seized by bystanders just as he was raising the pistol, and, (after a struggle, during which his finger and thumb were seen fumbling about the revolver which cocked automatically on the trigger being pulled), it was taken from him, it was held that the question as to the intent with which the prisoner presented the revolver was for the jury to decide, that the jury might reasonably infer that the prisoner intended to do that which he was prevented from doing, and that there was therefore sufficient evidence to support the conviction of the prisoner of an attempt to discharge the revolver. (3)

It was formerly considered that an act done with intent to commit an offence was not an attempt, unless done under circumstances rendering it possible to accomplish the object in view; (4) and so, where in an English case, A put his hand into B's pocket with intent to steal what was in it, and the pocket happened to be empty, it was held that A could not be convicted of an attempt to steal. (5) But this decision was afterwards overruled by the English Court of Crown Cases Reserved, presided over by Lord Chief Justice Coleridge, who, in delivering judgment, said, in reference to the pickpocket case,—"This is a decision with which we are not satisfied. Reg. v. Dodd proceeded upon the same view, that a person could not be convicted of an attempt to commit an offence which he could not actually commit. We are of opinion that Reg. v. Dodd is no longer law.

It was decided on the authority of Reg. v. Collins" [the pickpocket case], "and that case in our opinion is no longer law." (6)

It will be seen that section 72, ante, (which is similar to section 74 of the English Draft Code), coincides with the above holding of the English Court of Crown Cases Reserved, and plainly declares that an intent to commit an offence combined with an act done or omitted for the purpose of accomplishing the object in view, will constitute an attempt, whether, under the circumstances, it was possible to commit the intended offence or not.

An assault with intent to commit a crime is an attempt to commit the crime intended. (7)

A defendant was indicted for a common assault upon a married woman. He had already been indicted and tried at a previous assizes on a charge of rape upon the same woman, but the jury on the first trial were not satisfied that the offence of rape had been completed although they were disposed to convict the defendant of an assault. The presiding Judge had told them, however, that they could not do this, unless it was an assault with intent to commit a rape, in other words, an attempt to commit rape, —and that they could not do this unless satisfied that the defendant intended to have carnal connection with the prosecutrix against her will in spite of any resistance. The jury were told in effect that the charge being one of rape they could not convict the prisoner of a common assault or of any assault not amounting to an attempt to commit the offence charged; and the result was a general verdict of not guilty; whereupon the presiding Judge had directed the defendant to be held over to answer the charge of common assault. At the trial of the latter charge, the prosecutrix was not allowed to go into any of the matters relating to the rape and was stopped when she had stated that the defendant had put his hands upon her and kissed her against her will. The learned Judge said this was an assault in law. Thereupon, the defendants' counsel submitted that the jury ought to be discharged from a verdict on the charge of assault as he had been acquitted of rape and of an attempt at rape, and if there was any assault it was the attempt; so that the defendant was being tried twice for the same matter. But the learned Judge told the jury that the defendant had never been tried upon the charge of committing a common assault, which was different to an assault with intent to commit a rape, which amounted to an attempt at rape; and the jury found the defendant guilty of assault. (8)

If a woman, with intent to procure abortion, takes a thing which she believes to be noxious but which as a matter of fact is harmless, she is guilty nevertheless of an attempt to procure abortion; and it seems that if a man, who believes a thing to be a noxious drug, and incites a woman to take it, he is guilty of attempting to procure abortion by incitement, although as a matter of fact the commission of the offence by the woman in the manner proposed is impossible; but, if he knows that the thing is not capable of procuring abortion, he is not guilty of inciting the woman to commit the offence of attempting abortion, although he knows that the woman will take it in the belief that it is noxious. (9)

As to the crime of abortion, see sections 303-5, post.

2. Every one who commits treason is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to suffer death. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 65; 57-58 V., c. 57, s. 1.

The duty of allegiance is based upon the relation which subsists between him who owes it and the Crown, and upon the privileges derived by the former from that relation. Allegiance is either natural or local. Natural allegiance is that which a natural born subject owes at all times and in all places to the Crown as head of that society of which he is a member. Local allegiance is founded upon the protection which a foreigner enjoys for his person, his family and effects during his residence here; and if such foreigner while so resident here commit an offence which in the case of a natural born subject would be treason, he is dealt with as a traitor; and this is so, whether his sovereign be at peace with us or not. (2)

The ingredients set forth in the above section, 74, as constituting the crime of treason are, in effect, the same as those which constitute high treason according to section 75 of the English Draft Code, as revised by the Royal Commissioners, whose remarks thereon are as follows:

"Our definition of High Treason exactly follows the existing law with one or two exceptions which we felt warranted in making. The existing law depends upon the old statute of 25 Edward III., St. 5, C. 2, and on the judicial construction put upon that act. It is well explained in the opinion delivered by the late Mr. Justice Willes in Mulcahy v. R., (L. R. 3 H. of L., 318). (3) It has been thought better to make the act of killing or wounding the Sovereign in itself an act of treason, instead of adopting the artificial construction by which cutting off the head of Charles the First was not treason in itself but was an overt act evidencing the compassing of his death, which was treason within the statute of Edward III. And we have also thought it right to make conspiring to levy war against the Sovereign in itself treason, instead of evidence of compassing the Sovereign's death. It would in the present day be absurd to re-enact the provisions which make it high treason to kill the Lord Chancellor or a Judge of the Superior Courts in the discharge of his duties. The ordinary law as to murder affords sufficient protection."

The principal heads of treason as contained in the statute of Edward III. are (a) imagining or compassing the King's death, (b) levying war against the King, and (c) adhering to the King's enemies; there being no express provision for any act of violence towards the King's person, which did not display an intention to kill him, and nothing about attempts to imprison or depose the King, conspiracies or attempts to levy war, or disturbances however violent which did not reach the point of levying war: although there was a proviso (afterwards repealed by 1 Hen. IV., C. 10), that Parliament in its judicial capacity might upon the conviction of any person for any political offence hold that it amounted to high treason, though not specified in the Act. (4)

After the statute of Edward III. many Acts were passed, from time to time for the purpose of adding new treasons; but nearly all these Acts were either temporary or have in one way or another long since expired; and they exercised little or no permanent influence on the law of treason, as contained in the old statute, with the wide constructions placed upon its provisions by learned judges and commentators, whose interpretations have received, in later legislation, (36 Geo. III., c. 6, and 11 and 12 Vic., c. 12), full statutory recognition and authority. (5)

The statute of Edward III., taken literally, was too narrow to afford complete protection to the King's person, power and authority; but the judges, in their decisions, and various writers, in their comments upon the subject, held "that to imagine the King's death means to intend anything whatever which under any circumstances may possibly have a tendency, however remote, to expose the King to personal danger or to the forcible deprivation of any part of the authority incidental to his office." (6)

The mere intention of compassing the King's death seems to have constituted the substantive offence or corpus delicti in this particular kind of treason; thus shewing an apparent exception to the general doctrine that a person's bare intention is not punishable. But, although an overt act was not essential to the abstract crime, it was always held essential to the offender's conviction. The compassing or imagining the death was considered as the treason, and the overt acts were looked upon as the means employed for executing the offender's traitorous purpose. In other words, it was the intention itself that was looked upon as the crime; but in order to warrant a conviction, it was necessary to make proof of the manifestation of the intention by some overt act tending towards the accomplishment of the criminal object. And so it was held that, where conspirators met and consulted together how to kill the King, it was an overt act of compassing his death, even although they did not then resolve upon any scheme for that purpose. And all means made use of, either by persuasion or command, to incite or encourage others to commit the fact or join in the attempt to commit it, were held to be be overt acts of compassing the King's death; and any person who but assented to any overtures for that purpose was involved in the same guilt. (7)

Mere words of themselves were not regarded as an overt act of treason; for in Pine's case it was held that his having spoken of Charles I. as unwise, and as not fit to be King, was not treason, although very wicked; and that, unless it were by some particular statute, no words alone, would be treason. (8) But words were sometimes relied on to shew the meaning of an act. As, where C, being abroad, said: "I will kill the King of England if I can come at him," and the indictment, after setting forth these words, charged that C went into England for the purpose indicated by the words, it was held that C might, on proof of these facts, be convicted of treason, for the traitorous intention evinced by the words uttered, converted an action innocent in itself into an overt act of treason. The deliberate act of writing treasonable words was also considered an overt act, if the writing were published; for scribere est agere. (9) But even in that case it was not the bare words themselves that were considered the treason and the preponderance of authority favored the rule that writings not published did not constitute an act of treason. (10)

The wide construction placed upon the language of the Statute of Treasons is shewn by the words of Coke, who, in referring to the cases of Lord Cobham and the Earl of Essex, says: "He that declareth by overt act to depose the King does a sufficient overt act to prove that he compasseth and imagineth the death of the King. And so it is to imprison the King or to take the King into his power and to manifest the same by some overt act. And if a subject conspire with a foreign prince to invade the realm by open hostility, and prepare for the same by some overt act, this is a sufficient overt act for the death of the King." (1) Hale coincides with Coke and adds that, "to levy war against the King directly is an overt act of compassing the King's death, and that a conspiracy to levy such a war is an overt act to prove it." (2) Foster following in the same strain, says: "The care the law hath taken for the personal safety of the King is extended to everything not fully and deliberately done or attempted whereby his life may be endangered; and therefore the entering into measures for deposing or imprisoning him or to get his person into the power of conspirators, are overt acts of treason within this branch of the statute; for experience hath shewn that between the prisons and the graves of princes the distance is very small. Offences which are not so personal as those already mentioned have been with great propriety brought within the same rule, as having a tendency, though not so immediate, to the same fatal end; and therefore the entering into measures in concert with foreigners and others in order to an invasion of the kingdom, or going into a foreign country, or even purposing to go thither to that end, and taking any steps in order thereto, are overt acts of compassing the King's death." (3) Foster adds that a "treasonable correspondence with the enemy" is an act of compassing the King's death; and in support of this he refers to Lord Preston's case, (4) in which it was held that taking a boat at Surrey Stairs in Middlesex to go on board a ship in Kent, for the purpose of conveying to Louis XIV. a number of papers informing him of the naval and military condition of England and to so help him to invade England and depose William and Mary, was an overt act of treason by compassing and imagining the death of William and Mary. (5) A wide construction was also put upon the expression "adhering to the King's enemies;" its meaning being held to include any assistance given to aliens in open hostility against the King,—as, by surrendering to them a castle of the King's for reward, or selling them arms, etc., or cruising in a ship with enemies to the intent to destroy the King's subjects. (6)

With regard to "levying war" Sir James F. Stephen says: "The difference between the commonest unlawful assembly and a civil war is one of degree, and no definite line can be drawn at which riot ends and war begins. There has been a double current of authority on this point from the date of the 25 Edw. III. to our own days. On the one hand the statute declares, and the commentators have been careful to insist on the declaration, that in order to be treason the war levied must be against the King. No amount of violence, however great, and with whatever circumstances of a warlike kind it may be attended, will make an attack by one subject on another high treason. On the other hand any amount of violence, however insignificant, directed against the King will be high treason, and as soon as violence has any political object it is impossible to say that it is not directed against the King, in the sense of being armed opposition to the lawful exercise of his power." (7)

A levying of war amounting to treason appears to consist of two elements,—(a), the intent existing in the mind of the offender either forcibly, to overthow the government or to compel it through fear to yield something to which it would not otherwise assent; and (b), some overt act in the nature of war or of preparation for or threatening it. (8)

It is not necessary that great numbers should assemble or that military arms or array should be displayed to constitute the levying of war. (8*a*) Enlisting and marching are sufficient without coming to battle. (8*b*) But there must be an insurrection and it must be for an object of a general nature, and there must be force accompanying insurrection. So that if an armed body of men enter a town with the object merely of making a demonstration of their strength to the magistracy in order to procure the liberation of prisoners convicted of some political offence or to have their punishment mitigated, this, although an offence of a serious nature, is not treason. (8*c*)

It may perhaps be safe to say that when open force and violence, however extensive or serious, is not such as directly or indirectly attacks the Sovereign or the government or their power and authority, or is not such as tends in some way to forcibly overthrow, coerce, or intimidate them or either of them, it will not be treason; and, although exceptional cases may arise in which the line of division between a riot and treason by levying war may not be distinct, it should not, as a general rule, be a difficult matter,—under the law as expressed in the present part,—to distinguish between circumstances amounting to levying war, under sections 74 and 77, and the riotous offences dealt with under sections 88 to 92.

Under the Imperial Treason-Felony Act (11-12 Vic., c. 12), sending or supplying arms to be used in aid of a treasonable confederacy, having for its object the overthrow by force of arms of the English Government in any part of the United Kingdom, is a sufficient overt act of a conspiracy to depose the Sovereign; and it is not the less so because the arms are sold for and the motive of the sale is pecuniary profit, provided it is known that they are to be used in aid of the insurrection; and the secret storing of arms and sending them under feigned addresses into districts where the confederacy exists, with various contrivances to conceal their ultimate destination, and with the knowledge of the confederacy, is evidence of the offence. (9)

Where the prisoners were charged, under the Treason-Felony Act, sec. 3, with being in possession of certain instruments and explosive materials with intent to use them for the purpose of carrying out the objects of certain treasonable combinations existing in the United Kingdom and abroad, it was held that to shew such intent, evidence might be given to the effect that the only known use hitherto made of such materials and explosives had been in causing destructive explosions to property and that the fact of some of these explosions having happened out of the jurisdiction of the Court did not affect the admissibility of the evidence, and further, that to shew a treasonable object on the part of the prisoners and to negative any private object on their part, evidence might be given of the existence, down to a period nearly approaching the date of the alleged acts, of a treasonable conspiracy in the country from which the explosives and instruments were brought, the object of which conspiracy was the alteration, by violent means, of the then present form of government, and this, although such evidence did not establish that the prisoners were members of or directly connected with such conspiracy. (10)

A British subject who,—after war has broken out between Great Britain and another country, commits an act of treason by becoming naturalized in the enemy's country,—is not thereby protected from the consequences of the commission of subsequent treasonable acts. (10*a*)

Where an alien resident within British territory assists invaders during the absence of the British forces, he is guilty and may properly be convicted of high treason, there being no law relieving an alien from his duty of allegiance because an enemy temporarily makes good his military occupation of the district in which the alien resides. (1)

Every prosecution for treason, (except treason by killing His Majesty, or where the overt act alleged is an attempt to injure the person of His Majesty), must be commenced within three years from the time of the commission of the offence; and no person is to be prosecuted under the provisions of section 74, or of section 78, for any overt act of treason expressed in or declared by open and advised speaking, unless information of such overt act and of the words by which the same was expressed or declared is given upon oath to a justice within six days after the words are spoken and a warrant for the offender's apprehension issued within ten days after such information is given. (2)

One witness is not sufficient unless corroborated. (Section 1002, post). See also special provisions, as to trial, in section 897, post.

75. Treasonable conspiracy—Overt act.—In every case in which it is treason to conspire with any person for any purpose, the act of so conspiring, and every overt act of any such conspiracy, is an overt act of treason. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 66.

76. Accessories after the fact to treason.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who—

(a) becomes an accessory after the fact to treason; or

(b) knowing that any person is about to commit treason does not with all reasonable despatch, give information thereof to a justice of the peace, or use other reasonable endeavors to prevent the commission of the same. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 67.

By sec. 78 of the English Draft Code, the punishment of an accessory after the fact to high treason is penal servitude for life.

77. Levying war. (3)—Every subject or citizen of any foreign state or country at peace with His Majesty, who—

(a) is or continues in arms against His Majesty within Canada; or

(b) commits any act of hostility therein; or

(c) enters Canada with intent to levy war against His Majesty, or to commit any indictable offence therein for which any person would, in Canada, be liable to suffer death; and

Every subject of His Majesty who—

(a) within Canada levies war against His Majesty in company with any of the subjects or citizens of any foreign state or country at peace with His Majesty; or

(b) enters Canada in company with any such subjects or citizens with intent to levy war against His Majesty, or to commit any such offence therein; or is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to suffer death. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 68.

Persons accused of offending against the provisions of this section may,—in pursuance of sections 580 and 583, post, and of sections 102, 103 of the Militia Act, R. S. (1906), c. 41,—be tried and punished either by any Superior Court of criminal jurisdiction or by Militia Court Martial.

(3) See comments under sec. 74, ante.

War levied against the King is of two kinds, namely, DIRECT,—such as open and armed rebellion against his person,— and CONSTRUCTIVE,— such as attempts to effect innovations of a public nature by force. Thus, where a mob assembled for the purpose of destroying all the Protestant dissenting meeting houses, and actually pulled down two of them, it was held to be treason, although there was no direct intention or design against the State or the person of the sovereign. (4) But where a person acted as the leader of an armed body who entered a town, not with the object of taking the town nor of attacking the military, but merely to make a demonstration to the magistracy of their strength either to procure the liberation of certain prisoners convicted of some political offence or to procure some mitigation of their punishment, it was held that this, though an aggravated misdemeanor, did not amount to high treason. (5)

At the Central Criminal Court in June, 1883, before Lord Coleridge, C.J., the Master of the Rolls, and Grove, J., a number of persons were indicted and tried, under the Treason-Felony Act, on three counts, namely, (a), for feloniously and unlawfully compassing, imagining and devising and intending to depose the Queen from the Imperial Crown of Great Britain and Ireland, and expressing the same by divers overt acts set out in the indictment, (b), for intending to levy war upon the Queen, in order by force and constraint, to compel her to change her measures and counsels, and, (c), for intending to levy war upon the Queen in order by force to intimidate and overawe the Houses of Parliament, and it appeared that secret clubs,—branches of a society called the Fenian Brotherhood,— were formed in America, with the object, it was said, of procuring "the freedom of Ireland by force alone," and that the prisoners, members of these Clubs, went to England provided with funds with the intention of destroying public buildings by nitro-glycerine and other explosives. One of the prisoners appeared to be the director of the movements of the others; another was detected in manufacturing in Birmingham large quantities of nitro-glycerine; and others were employed in removing it when manufactured to London under the superintendence of the director; and there was evidence that the House of Commons and other public buildings were pointed out as places to be destroyed. For the defence, it was submitted that there was no evidence to go to the jury to support the charges of levying war, it being contended that, in order to be a levying of war, there must be numbers arrayed for the purpose of opposing the forces of the Crown and a premeditated design of conflict with the Royal military forces. But Lord Chief Justice Coleridge said it was obvious that war might be levied in different ways and by very different means, in different ages of the world, and that if the prisoners or any of them had agreed among themselves to destroy the property of the Crown and to destroy or endanger the lives of the Queen's subjects by explosive materials, and had committed the acts alleged by the indictment, they were guilty of treason-felony; and the jury were accordingly directed as follows,—(a), that if they thought that one or more of the prisoners did compass, devise or intend to force the Queen to change her counsels and to overawe the Houses of Parliament by violent measures directed either against the property of the Queen, the public property, or the lives of the Queen's subjects, and not with the view of repaying any private spite or enmity against particular subjects of the Queen, it would be a levying of war against the Queen, and that it was not the less compassing, and intending the levying of war, because, by the progress of science, two or three men could now do what could not have been done years ago except by a large number of persons; that the question was, was there proof that the prisoners did what they did with the intention of deposing the Queen from the style of the Imperial Crown of the United Kingdom, or with the intention of separating Ireland from the Crown of England, and establishing an independent Republic; (b), that if what the prisoners did was done to compel Her Majesty or her ministers, by force, to change the Constitution and to alter the relations between England and Ireland, or even to set up a separate Parliament, it would be within the second count of the indictment; and, (c), that if what the prisoners did was done for the purpose of intimidating and overawing both or either Houses of Parliament so as to frighten them into doing what otherwise they would not have done, it would be within the third count. (6)

78. Treasonable offences. (7)—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for life who forms,—

(a) an intention to depose His Majesty from the style, honor and royal name of the Imperial Crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or of any other of His Majesty's dominions or countries; or,

(b) an intention to levy war against His Majesty within any part of the said United Kingdom, or of Canada, in order by force or constraint to compel him to change his measures or counsels, or in order to put any force or constraint upon or in order to intimidate or overawe both Houses or either House of Parliament of the United Kingdom or of Canada; or,

(c) an intention to move or stir any foreigner or stranger with force to invade the said United Kingdom, or Canada, or any other of His Majesty's dominions or countries under the authority of His Majesty; and manifests any such intention by conspiring with any person to carry it into effect, or by any other overt act, or by publishing any printing or writing. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 69.

If, after war has broken out between Great Britain and another country, a British subject commits an act of treason by becoming naturalized in the belligerent country, he is not thereby protected from the consequences of the commission of subsequent treasonable acts. (8)

Where an indictment for treason alleged that the prisoner adhered to the enemies of the late Queen without the realm, it was held good. (9)

79. Conspiracy to intimidate a legislature.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to fourteen years' imprisonment who confederates, combines or conspires with any person to do any act of violence in order to intimidate, or to put any force or constraint upon, any legislative council, legislative assembly or house of assembly. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 70.

(7) See section 1140, sub-sec. 2, post, which requires that, in prosecutions under sections 74 and 78, for any overt act of treason expressed in or declared by open and advised speaking, information of the words used shall be given on oath to a justice within six days after the words are spoken, and that a warrant for the offender's apprehension shall be issued within ten days after such information is given.

(8) R. v. Lynch, 72 L. J., K. B., 167; [1903] 1 K. B., 444.

(9) Ibid.

80. Assaults on the King.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to seven years' imprisonment, and to be whipped once, twice or thrice as the court directs, who,—

(a) wilfully produces, or has, near His Majesty, any arm or destructive or dangerous thing with intent to use the same to injure the person of, or to alarm His Majesty; or,

(b) wilfully and with intent to alarm or to injure His Majesty, or to break the public peace,

(i) points, aims or presents, or attempts to point, aim or present, at or near His Majesty, any firearm, loaded or not, or any other kind of arm,

(ii) discharges or attempts to discharge at or near His Majesty any loaded arm,

(iii) discharges or attempts to discharge any explosive material near His Majesty,

(iv) strikes, or strikes at, or attempts to strike, or strike at, His Majesty in any manner whatever.

(v) throws, or attempts to throw, anything at or upon His Majesty. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 71.

81. Inciting to mutiny.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for life, who for any traitorous or mutinous purpose, endeavors to seduce any person serving in His Majesty's forces by sea or land from his duty and allegiance to His Majesty, or to incite or stir up any such person to commit any traitorous or mutinous practice. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 72.

To render a person liable under this section for having endeavored to seduce a soldier or a sailor from his duty, the endeavor must be in pursuance of a traitorous or mutinous purpose; it must be for the purpose of forwarding some of the designs which are declared to be treasonable. If it were done for the purpose of weakening the authority of the Sovereign and of preventing and interfering with the nation's defence against enemies, it would be traitorous. But if it were done, for instance, by a relative or friend of the soldier or sailor,—as by persuading or advising him to leave the service, from a solicitude for the soldier's or sailor's health (the soldier or sailor being sick or wounded),—or if it were done by a person holding a religious opinion which made him conscientiously averse to war, he would not be acting from traitorous motives.

82. Inciting soldiers or sailors to desert.—Every one is guilty of an offence punishable on indictment, or on summary conviction before two justices, who, not being an enlisted soldier in His Majesty's service, or a seaman in His Majesty's naval service,—

(a) by words or with money, or by any other means whatsoever, directly or indirectly, persuades or procures, or goes about or endeavors to persuade, prevail on or procure, any such seaman or soldier to desert from or leave His Majesty's military or naval service; or,

(b) conceals, receives or assists any deserter from His Majesty's military or naval service, knowing him to be such deserter;

and is liable, on conviction under indictment, to fine and imprisonment in the discretion of the court, and on summary conviction before two justices, to a penalty not exceeding two hundred dollars, and not less than eighty dollars and costs, and in default of payment to imprisonment for any term not exceeding six months. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 73.

Under this section an offender may be prosecuted either by indictment or summarily, and the penalty to be incurred on a summary conviction is specified; but in the case of a conviction upon indictment, although the section enacts that the offender shall be liable to fine and imprisonment in the discretion of the Court, it does not specify the amount of the fine nor the length of the imprisonment. Section 1052, post, however, provides that a person convicted of an indictable offence for which no punishment is specially provided shall be liable to five years' imprisonment.

Section 1042, post, provides that one moiety of the amount of any penalty recovered under this section shall go to the prosecutor and the other moiety to the Crown.

The Merchants Shipping Act, which is in force in Canada, also makes it an offence to persuade or attempt to persuade a seaman or apprentice to desert from his ship; but this provision applies to desertion from British ships, and does not apply to persuading a seaman to desert from a foreign ship. (10)

Section 221 of the Imperial Merchants Shipping Act, 1894, provides for the punishment of desertion by forfeiture of wages and 12 weeks' imprisonment, and section 236 of which enacts that any person who wilfully harbors or secretes a seaman who has deserted from his ship knowing the seaman to have done so, shall for every seaman so harbored or secreted be liable to a fine of £20.

The Canadian Act relating to merchant ships is the Canada Shipping Act R. S. 1906, c. 113, sec. 287, of which provides for the punishment of desertion by a seaman by imprisonment with hard labor for a term not exceeding twelve weeks, besides forfeiture of the clothes and effects left by him on board and of the wages then earned by him, and sections 301 and 302 of which provide for the punishment,—by imprisonment with hard labor for 6 months for a first offence and for 12 months for any subsequent offence,—of any person who incites any seaman or apprentice to neglect or refuse to join or proceed to sea or to desert his ship or who wilfully harbors or secretes any such deserting seaman or apprentice knowing or having reason to believe him to be such.

Any one reasonably suspected of being a deserter from His Majesty's service may be arrested and brought before a justice of the peace and held till claimed by the military or naval authorities. Section 657, post.)

(10) Poll v. Dambe, 70 L. J., K. B., 721.

83. Resisting execution of warrant to search for deserters.—Every one who resists the execution of any warrant authorising the breaking open of any building to search for any deserter from His Majesty's military or naval service is guilty of an offence and liable, on summary conviction before two justices, to a penalty of eighty dollars. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 74.

No one is entitled to break open any building to search for a deserter without having obtained a warrant for that purpose from a justice of the peace. (Section 657, post.)

84. Enticing militiamen or mounted police to desert.—Every one is guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to six months' imprisonment, with or without hard labor, who,—

(a) persuades any man who has been enlisted to serve in any corps of militia, or who is a member of or has engaged to serve in the Royal Northwest Mounted Police Force, to desert, or attempts to procure or persuade any such man to desert; or,

(b) knowing that any such man is about to desert, aids or assists him in deserting; or,

(c) knowing that any such man is a deserter, conceals him or aids or assists in his rescue. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 75.

This section would not apply to the act of persuading a militiaman not to turn out upon parade.

The mere refusal or neglect of an officer or man to attend a parade or drill is punishable, under section 120 of the Militia Act (R. S. 1906, c. 41), by fine only.

Information Illegally Obtained or Communicated.

85. Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for one year, or to a fine not exceeding one hundred dollars, or to both imprisonment and fine, who,—

(a) for the purpose of wrongfully obtaining information,

(i) enters or is in any part of a fortress, arsenal, factory, dockyard, camp, ship, office or other like place in Canada belonging to His Majesty, in which part he is not entitled to be, or

(ii) when lawfully or unlawfully in any such place as aforesaid either obtains any document, sketch, plan, model or knowledge of anything which he is not entitled to obtain, or takes without lawful authority any sketch or plan; or

(iii) when outside any fortress, arsenal, factory, dockyard or camp in Canada, belonging to His Majesty, takes, or attempts to take, without authority given by or on behalf of His Majesty, any sketch or plan of that fortress, arsenal, factory, dock-yard or camp; or

(b) knowingly having possession of or control over any document, sketch, plan, model, or knowledge obtained or taken by means of any act which constitutes an offence against this and the next following section, at any time wilfully and without lawful authority communicates or attempts to communicate the same to any person to whom the same ought not, in the interests of the state, to be communicated at the time; or

(c) after having been entrusted in confidence by some officer under His Majesty with any document, sketch, plan, model or information relating to any such place as aforesaid, or to the naval or military affairs of His Majesty, wilfully, and in breach of such confidence, communicates the same when, in the interests of the state, it ought not to be communicated; or,

(d) having possession of any document relating to any fortress, arsenal, factory, dockyard, camp, ship, office or other like place belonging to His Majesty, or to the naval or military affairs of his Majesty, in whatever manner the same has been obtained or taken, at any time wilfully communicates the same to any person to whom he knows the same ought not, in the interests of the state, to be then communicated.

2. Every one who commits any such offence intending to communicate to a foreign state any information, document, sketch, plan, model or knowledge obtained or taken by him, or entrusted to him as aforesaid, or communicates the same to any agent of a foreign state, is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for life. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 77.

86. Every one who, by means of his holding or having held an office under His Majesty, has lawfully or unlawfully either obtained possession of or control over any document, sketch, plan or model, or acquired any information, and at any time corruptly, or contrary to his official duty, communicates or attempts to communicate such document, sketch, plan, model or information to any person to whom the same ought not, in the interests of the state, or otherwise in the public interest, to be then communicated, is guilty of an indictable offence and liable,—

(a) if the communication was made, or attempted to be made, to a foreign state, to imprisonment for life; and,

(b) in any other case, to imprisonment for one year, or to a fine not exceeding one hundred dollars, or to both imprisonment and fine.

2. This section shall apply to a person holding a contract with His Majesty, or with any department of the Government of the United Kingdom, or of the Government of Canada, or of any province, or with the holder of any office under His Majesty as such holder, where such contract involves an obligation of secrecy, and to any person employed by any person or body of persons holding such a contract who is under a like obligation of secrecy, as if the person holding the contract, and the person so employed, were respectively holders of an office under His Majesty. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 78.

No prosecution for the offence of unlawfully obtaining and communicating official information can be commenced without the consent of the Attorney-General or of the Attorney-General of Canada (see sec. 592, post).

The Imperial statute on the subject of these sections 85 and 86 is the "Official Secrets Act, 1889" (52-53 Vict., c. 52).

See sec. 847, post, as to requisites of indictments.

Unlawful Assemblies and Riots.

87. Unlawful assembly.—An unlawful assembly is an assembly of three or more persons who, with intent to carry out any common purpose, assemble in such a manner or so conduct themselves when assembled as to cause persons in the neighborhood of such assembly to fear, on reasonable grounds, that the persons so assembled will disturb the peace tumultuously, or will by such assembly needlessly and without any reasonable occasion provoke other persons to disturb the peace tumultuously.

2. Persons lawfully assembled may become an unlawful assembly if they conduct themselves with a common purpose in such a manner as would have made their assembling unlawful if they had assembled in that manner for that purpose.

3. An assembly of three or more persons for the purpose of protecting the house of any one of their number against persons threatening to break and enter such house in order to commit any indictable offence therein is not unlawful. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 79.

This section and section 88, infra, are in exactly the same words as sections 84 and 85 of the English Draft Code. The remarks of the Royal Commissioners upon their definition of an unlawful assembly are as follows: "The earliest definition of an unlawful assembly is in the Year Book 21 H. 7, 39. It would seem from it that the law was first adopted at a time when it was the practice for the gentry, who were on bad terms with each other, to go to market at the head of bands of armed retainers. It is obvious that no civilized government could permit this practice, the consequence of which was, at the time, that the assembled bands would probably fight, and certainly make peaceable people fear that they would fight. It was whilst the state of society was such as to render this a prevailing mischief that the earlier cases were decided; and consequently the duty of not provoking a breach of the peace has sometimes been so strongly laid down as almost to make it seem as if it was unlawful to take means to resist those who came to commit crimes. We have endeavored in section 84 to enunciate the principles of the common law, although in declaring that an assembly may be unlawful if it causes persons in the neighborhood to fear that it will needlessly and without reasonable occasion provoke others to disturb the peace tumultuously, we are declaring that which has not as yet been specifically decided in any particular case. The clause as to the defence of a man's house has been inserted because of a doubt expressed on the subject." (See p. 20 of the Report).

To constitute an unlawful assembly, it is not necessary that the purpose for which the persons assembled together was an unlawful purpose; an intention to do a lawful act in a turbulent and violent manner is as much a breach of the law as if the intended act were illegal. It is the manner in which it is to be done which constitutes the offence; and, therefore, if the jury find that the assembling together was under such circumstances as were likely to produce danger to the peace and tranquillity of the neighborhood, it is an unlawful assembly. (2)

Any meeting of three or more persons assembled under such circumstances as, according to the opinion of firm and rational men, are likely to produce danger to the tranquillity and peace of the neighborhood is an unlawful assembly; and, in viewing this question, the jury should take into their consideration the hour at which the meeting of the parties takes place and the language used by the assembled persons and by those who address them, and then consider whether firm and rational men, having their families and property there, would have reasonable ground to fear a breach of the peace; as the alarm must be not merely such as would frighten a foolish or timid person, but such as would frighten people of reasonable firmness and courage. (3)

It has been held that an assembly of persons to witness a prize-fight is an unlawful assembly and that every one present at and countenancing the fight is guilty of an offence. (4)

An assembly which is lawful in itself does not become unlawful merely because of the unlawful intentions of others against it. So, that, where some members of a religious association, calling themselves the "Salvation Army," assembled, and,—forming a procession headed by flags, banners, and music,—marched through the streets and were met by an organized and antagonistic band styled the "Skeleton Army," the result being a free fight and general disorder, it was contended for the Salvationists and held, upon an appeal from their conviction by the magistrates, that having assembled for a lawful purpose and with no intention of carrying it out in an unlawful manner, they could not be convicted of an unlawful assembly, notwithstanding that they may have been aware that from their action a breach of the peace by other persons would be likely to result. "What has happened here," said Judge Field, "is that an unlawful organization has assumed to itself the right to prevent the appellants from lawfully assembling together, and the finding of the justices, by their conviction of the appellants, amounts to this, that a man may be convicted for doing a lawful act if he knows that his doing it may cause another to do an unlawful act. There is no authority for such a proposition." (5)

In another case, where nine men, carrying with them musical instruments, marched upon a Sunday through the public streets of a town, in which Sunday processions accompanied with instrumental music, (other than processions of His Majesty's naval, military and volunteer forces), are prohibited, it was held that their so marching, although an illegal act, was no evidence of an unlawful assembly, if the men did not know that it was calculated to lead to a breach of the peace by others,—notwithstanding that as a matter of fact their so marching was calculated to and actually did excite others to the commission of a breach of the peace. (6)

But how can these decisions be held to apply to the law as enacted by the first paragraph of the above section 87, declaring that an assembly may be unlawful if it causes persons in the neighborhood to fear that it will needlessly and without reasonable occasion provoke others to disturb the peace tumultously?

A meeting convened lawfully may become unlawful, if seditious words are spoken of such a nature as to be likely to cause a breach of the peace. (7)

88. Riot.—A riot is an unlawful assembly which has begun to disturb the peace tumultuously. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 80.

The difference between an unlawful assembly and a riot is this. If the parties assemble in a tumultuous manner and actually execute their purpose with violence, it is a riot; but if they assemble tumultuously with the purpose of doing something which if executed would make them rioters, and, having done nothing, they separate omitting to carry out their purpose, it is an unlawful assembly. (8)

An unlawful assembly in which the parties had made some motion to execute the purpose, which if actually executed would have made them rioters, was formerly known as a "rout"; (7) but under the above section, 88, it would now be a "riot."

89. Punishment of unlawful assembly.—Every member of an unlawful assembly is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to one year's imprisonment. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 81.

90. Punishment of riot.—Every rioter is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment with hard labor. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 82.

91. Reading the Riot Act.—It is the duty of every sheriff, deputy sheriff, mayor or other head officer, and justice, of any county, city or town, who has notice that there are within his jurisdiction persons to the number of twelve or more unlawfully, riotously and tumultuously assembled together to the disturbance of the public peace, to resort to the place where such unlawful, riotous and tumultuous assembly is, and among the rioters, or as near to them as he can safely come, with a loud voice to command or cause to be commanded silence, and after that openly and with loud voice to make or cause to be made a proclamation in these words or to the like effect:—

'Our Sovereign Lord the King charges and commands all persons being assembled immediately to disperse and peaceably to depart to their habitations or to their lawful business, upon the pain of being guilty of an offence on conviction of which they may be sentenced to imprisonment for life.

'GOD SAVE THE KING.'

55-56 V., c. 29, s. 83.

92. Penalty.—All persons are guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for life who,—

(a) with force and arms wilfully oppose, hinder or hurt any person who begins or is about to make the said proclamation, whereby such proclamation is not made; or,

(b) continue together to the number of twelve or thirty minutes after such proclamation has been made, or if they know that its making was hindered as aforesaid, within thirty minutes after such hindrance. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 83.

At the time of a riot a magistrate may repel force by force before the reading of the proclamation from the Riot Act. (9)

No prosecution for any offence against the above section can be commenced after the expiration of one year from its commission. (Sec. 1140, post).

93. Duty and powers of officers.—If the persons so unlawfully, riotously and tumultuously assembled together, or twelve or more of them, continue together, and do not disperse themselves, for the space of thirty minutes after the proclamation is made or after such hindrance as aforesaid, it is the duty of every such sheriff, justice and other officer, and of all persons required by them to assist, to cause such persons to be apprehended and carried before a justice.

(9) R. v. Kennett, 5 C. & P., 282, 283.

2. If any of the persons so assembled are killed or hurt in the apprehension of such persons or in the endeavor to apprehend or disperse them, by reason of their resistance, every person ordering them to be apprehended or dispersed, and every person executing such orders, are indemnified against all proceedings of every kind in respect thereof.

3. Nothing in this section contained shall, in any way, limit or affect any duties or powers imposed or given by this Act as to the suppression of riots before or after the making of the said proclamation. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 84.

These two sections are the same in effect as sections 88 and 89 of the English Draft Code.

The duty of a magistrate in regard to the quelling of a riot is fully explained by Littledale, J., in Pinney's Case.

Pinney was the mayor of Bristol, and was prosecuted in 1832 on a charge of having neglected as chief magistrate of the city, to take proper measures for the suppression of some serious riots, which took place in Bristol in the previous year, in which riots many persons were killed and injured and many public buildings, including the gaol, the mansion house and the custom house, were destroyed b fore the mob were stopped by the military. Mr. Justice Littledale in the course of his charge to the jury said, in reference to the duties of magistrates: "A person whether a magistrate or a peace officer is in a difficult situation. If by his acts he causes death he is liable to be indicted for murder or manslaughter, and if he does not act he is liable to an indictment on an information for neglect. He is therefore bound to hit the precise line of duty; and how difficult it is to hit that precise line will be matter for your consideration; but that, difficult as it may be, he is bound to do. Whether a man has sought a public situation, as is often the case of mayors and magistrates, or whether as a peace officer he has been compelled to take the office that he holds, the same rule applies; and if persons were not compelled to act according to law there would be an end of society; but still you must be satisfied that the defendant has been clearly guilty of neglect before you return a verdict against him." (10)

For further notes and authorities on this subject, see comments under sections 47-50, ante.

94. Neglect of police officer to suppress riot.—Every sheriff, deputy sheriff, mayor or other head officer, justice, or other magistrate, or other peace officer, of any county, city, town or district, who has notice that there is a riot within his jurisdiction, who, without reasonable excuse, omits to do his duty in suppressing such riot, is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 140.

See comments under sections 47-50, ante.

If, on a riot taking place, a magistrate neither reads the proclamation from the Riot Act, nor restrains nor apprehends the rioters, nor gives any orders to fire on them, nor makes use of a military force under his command, this is prima facie evidence of a criminal neglect of duty in him; and it is no answer to the charge for him to say that he was afraid, unless his fear arose from such danger as would affect a firm man; and if, rather than apprehend the rioters, his sole care was for himself, this is also criminal neglect. (1)

(10) R. v. Pinney, 5 C. & P., 254-261; Broom's Com. L., 5 Ed., 891.

95. Neglect to aid peace officer in suppressing riot.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to one year's imprisonment who, having reasonable notice that he is required to assist any sheriff, deputy-sheriff, mayor, or other head officer, justice, magistrate, or peace officer in suppressing any riot, without reasonable excuse omits to do so. 55-56 V., s. 141.

To support an indictment against a person for refusing to aid a constable in the execution of his duty in quelling a riot, it is necessary to prove—(a) that the constable actually saw a breach of the peace being committed, (b) that there was a reasonable necessity for the constable calling on the defendant for his assistance, and (c) that, when duly called upon to assist the constable, the defendant, without any physical impossibility or lawful excuse, refused to do so; and, in such a case, it is no legal ground of defence that from the number of the rioters the single aid of the defendant would not have been of any use. (2)

Sections 80-90 of the Militia Act.—(R. S. 1906, c. 41)—provides that upon the written requisition of the proper civil authorities,—for instance, three justices of the peace, of whom the mayor or other head of the municipality or county may be one,—the senior military officer of any locality may call out the active militia or any necessary portion thereof for active service, with their arms and ammunition, in aid of the civil power to prevent or suppress any actual or anticipated riot, disturbance of the peace or other emergency requiring such service; and, by section 107 of the Act, every officer and man of the militia who, when his corps is so called out, refuses or neglects to go out with such corps or to obey any lawful order of his superior officer, incurs a penalty.

96. Riotous destruction of buildings, etc.—All persons are guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for life, who, being riotously and tumultuously assembled together to the disturbance of the public peace, unlawfully and with force demolish or pull down, or begin to demolish or pull down, any building, or any machinery, whether fixed or moveable, or any erection used in farming land, or in carrying on any trade or manufacture, or any erection or structure used in conducting the business of any mine, or any bridge, wagon-way or track for conveying minerals from any mine. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 85.

Upon an indictment under 7-8 Geo. IV., c. 30, s. 8, for feloniously beginning to demolish a house, it was held that the charge could not be supported unless the persons committing the outrage had an intention of destroying the house; and that therefore where considerable damage was done to a house by a mob who did it with the intention of seizing a person who had taken refuge in the house, their conduct was held not to be within the statute. In this case, Tyndall, C. J., said, "The persons committing the outrage must have the intention of destroying the house before they can be charged with a felonious beginning to demolish. In the present case, it is clear that they had no such intention and that they had another intention, not within the scope of the indictment, which was merely to get possession of a man who had taken refuge therein. (3)

97. Riotous injury or damage to buildings.—All persons are guilty of an indictable offence and liable to seven years' imprisonment who, being riotously and tumultuously assembled together to the disturbance of the public peace, unlawfully and with force injure or damage any of the things mentioned in the last preceding section.

2. It shall not be a defence to a charge of an offence against this or the last preceding section that the offender believed he had a right to act as he did, unless he actually had such a right. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 86.

It will be seen that, under the law as declared by this section, persons who riotously destroy or damage a building cannot now reduce their offence to a mere riot, on the plea that they acted in the assertion of a right which they believed they had, unless they really had such a right. The effect of the law as it now stands seems, therefore, to be that, if the offenders or any of them actually have a right to the building, they will only be guilty of the riot; but, if they have not such right although they believe they have, they will be guilty of the higher offence of riotous destruction or riotous damage, as the case may be.

The Royal Commissioners, in a note to a similar addition made in the English Draft Code, say that it "removes what is at least a doubt;" and they make a reference to the cases of Langford and Casey.

In Langford's Case, while it was held that it was a sufficient demolishing of a house if it were so far demolished that it was no longer a house, there being only a chimney left standing, and that if any one of Her Majesty's subjects were terrified it was a sufficient terror and alarm to substantiate that part of the charge of riot,—it was also held that if persons riotously assembled and demolished a house really believing that it is property of one of them, and acted bona fide in the assertion of a supposed right, it would not be a felonious demolition, although there would be a riot. (4)

In Casey's Case, the prisoners were charged with having unlawfully and riotously assembled and with force demolished and pulled down a house and scattered a hay rick contra pacem; and it was held that, upon the hypothesis that the prisoners had demolished the house not feloniously, but in the assertion of a supposed right, the indictment could be sustained as for a misdemeanor at common law, that is, for the riot with the statement of the demolition of the house as an aggravation. (5)

Unlawful Drilling.

98. Unlawful assemblies to drill.—The Governor in Council is authorized from time to time to prohibit assemblies without lawful authority of persons for the purpose of training or drilling themselves, or of being trained or drilled to the use of arms, or for the purpose of practising military exercises, movements or evolutions, and to prohibit persons when assembled for any other purpose from so training or drilling themselves or being trained or drilled.

2. Any such prohibition may be a general or may apply only to a particular place or district or to assemblies of a particular character, and shall come into operation from the publication in the Canada Gazette of a proclamation embodying the terms of such prohibition, and shall continue in force until the like publication of a proclamation issued by the authority of the Governor in Council revoking such prohibition.

3. Every person is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who, without lawful authority and in contravention of such prohibition or proclamation,—

(a) is present at or attends any such assembly for the purpose or training or drilling any other person to the use of arms or the practice of military exercises or evolutions; or,

(b) at any assembly trains or drills any other person to the use of arms or the practice of military exercises or evolutions. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 87.

99. Being unlawfully drilled.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who, without lawful authority, attends, or is present, at any such assembly as in the last preceding section mentioned, for the purpose of being, or who at any such assembly is, without lawful authority and in contravention of such prohibition or proclamation, trained or drilled to the use of arms or the practice of military exercises or evolutions. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 88.

No prosecution for any offence against either of these sections can be commenced after the expiration of six months from its commission. (Sec. 1140 d. post.)

Affrays and Duels.

100. Affray.—An affray is the act of fighting in any public street or highway, or fighting to the alarm of the public in any other place to which the public have access.

2. Every one who takes part in an affray is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to one year's imprisonment with hard labor. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 90.

The essence of the offence is its tendency to alarm people at or near the scene of the fight. It is not necessary that actual terror should exist: but it will be inferred by the law from the fact of the fighting taking place in a public street or highway, or in any other place accessible to the public.

Like an assault an affray may be aggravated in its circumstances and become an element in some higher crime, as by developing into a riot, or by serious bodily injuries being inflicted, or actual loss of life occasioned in the course of the fight.

The main difference between an affray and a riot is that two persons may be guilty of an affray; and it requires three or more to constitute a riot.

101. Challenging to fight a duel.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to three years' imprisonment who challenges or endeavors by any means to provoke any person to fight a duel, or endeavors to provoke any person to challenge any other person so to do 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 91.

A duel is where two persons fight with deadly weapons and by previous mutual agreement. If, in such a fight, one of the combatants kill the other, he will be guilty of murder; and the seconds of both combatants and all present giving countenance to the transaction (including even the surgeon) will also be equally guilty of that offence. (6)

Forcible Entry and Detainer.

102. Forcible entry is where a person, whether entitled or not, enters in a manner likely to cause a breach of the peace, or reasonable apprehension thereof, on land then in actual and peaceable possession of another.

2. Forcible detainer is where a person in actual possession of land, without color of right, detains it in a manner likely to cause a breach of the peace, or reasonable apprehension thereof, against a person entitled by law to the possession thereof.

3. What amounts to actual possession or color of right is a question of law. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 89.

In ancient times, violent acts were frequently committed in taking possession of property, sometimes by those who were really the owners and sometimes by those who were not. (7) To meet the mischief, special statutes were passed (in the reigns of Rich. II., Hen. VIII., Elizabeth and James I.), giving extraordinary powers to magistrates by authorizing any justice of the peace upon the happening of any forcible entry into or any forcible detainer of lands to take sufficient force of the county to the place where the offence was committed and there record it upon his own view, as in the case of a riot, and to thereupon commit the offender to gaol till he should "make fine and ransom to the king." The justice, moreover, was empowered to summon a jury to try the forcible entry or detainer complained of, and if the fact of the forcible entry or detainer were found, restitution of possession might be made without any enquiry into the merits of the right of ownership. The same object could likewise be effected by means of indictment at the assizes; in which case it was discretionary with the Judge of assize,—upon the finding of the bill by the grand jury,—to grant, upon grounds shewn by affidavit, a warrant of restitution. The proceedings under these statutes regarding forcible entry and detainer have thus been said to furnish "the only instance known to the law of England in which a party may be turned out of possession by ex parte steps taken." (8)

Some of the statutes in the later of these reigns provided also that a forcible entry or detainer should be an indictable offence; and it appears that, independently of such enactments, a forcible entry and a forcible detainer were always indictable at common law. (9)

So that the above section, 102, created no new offence; and, as it is in exactly the same terms as section 95 of the English Draft Code,—which the Royal Commissioners, in their Report, say is a correct statement of the existing law,—it made no change in our former law as to forcible entry and detainer.

The third paragraph of the section declares that what amounts to actual possession or what amounts to color of right is a question of law.

This does not refer to any disputed question of fact. For instance, with regard to actual possession, the fact may be that a person was physically absent from but that his servant or agent was in physical possession for him of a house or land. The fact of whether the servant or agent was or was not in possession of the house or land would be a question of fact to be found by the jury, but the effect of such servant's or agent's possession would under the above section, be a question of law.

For example, the owner of a house may be resident abroad, and, therefore, personally absent from it, but his servant or agent may be in possession of it for him. It is the province of the jury to find, according to the evidence, if as a matter of fact the servant or agent of the absent owner was in possession of the house, or if other given circumstances existed which are contended to be equivalent to actual possession by the absent owner; but after the fact of the servant or agent being in physical possession of the property or the fact of the existence of other given circumstances has been found by the jury, it is for the Judge to decide, as a question of law, whether the owner, although personally absent, was in actual possession of the property by reason of his servant or agent being in physical possession of it, or by reason of the existence of the other given circumstances.

Actual residence in the premises is not necessary to constitute actual possession, nor is continuous presence upon the premises either in person or by an agent. (10)

It has been held that a person has actual possession of a lot of land upon which he has a stable, which is fenced in. (1)

Generally any overt acts indicating dominion and a purpose to occupy and not to abandon the premises will satisfy the requirement as to possession. One claiming a vacant lot enclosed the lot by building a fence adjoining another fence and a brick wall sufficient to keep domestic animals, and notified all persons that the premises were appropriated. This was held to be a sufficient actual possession to maintain forcible entry, and detainer against persons breaking down and destroying the fence in a forcible manner under a claim of ownership. (1) Valencia v. Couch, 32 Cal., 340; 91 Am., 989.
(2) Allen v. Tobins, 77 Ill., 169.

A mere scrambling possession,—the possession of a momentary trespasser or intruder,—as distinguished from a complete possession which has ripened into a peaceable occupancy, is insufficient. So, that, one who in the morning entered upon a portion of a tract of land in the possession of another and enclosed it with a fence and put a house on it before sundown, did not acquire such a peaceable possession as to enable him to maintain forcible entry and detainer against the possessor who at sundown of the same day destroyed the house and fence and drove him away. (3)

In proceedings for forcible entry and detainer, the question of title is not involved. The gist of the offence is the taking away or invading—in a manner likely to cause a breach of the peace or reasonable apprehension thereof,—of another's actual peaceable possession of real property; and the reason is that if a party have a paramount title to the property in the actual peaceable possession of another who persists, without a valid right, in retaining that possession, he shall not do himself justice, by force, or in a manner likely to cause a breach of the peace, but he must apply to the Courts of justice provided for such purposes. (4)

It is sufficient, in proceedings for forcible entry and detainer, to allege the fact of the prosecutor being in the actual peaceable possession of the property at the time of the alleged forcible entry; and it is for the jury to say whether the prosecutor was in actual peaceable possession thereof, and, if so, did the defendant, forcibly, or in a manner likely to cause a breach of the peace, or reasonable apprehension thereof, deprive him of such possession. (5)

Where the prosecutor occupied with his family a house belonging to the defendant upon the latter's plantation, under a contract by which for his services as a laborer he was to have the house as a dwelling-place and a monthly allowance of food, with the privilege of cultivating a small strip of land for his own benefit, and the defendant, by threats and demonstrations of deadly weapons and an array of numbers against which resistance would have been useless, drove the prosecutor out of the house, it was held that the relation of lessor and lessee existed between the defendant and the prosecutor and that the possession of the latter was sufficient to support a prosecution against the defendant for forcible entry. (6)

The intention to take possession of the land and tenements entered upon is an essential element in the offence of forcible entry. And, therefore, where a defendant was indicted for having entered a house in another man's possession in a manner likely to cause a breach of the peace, and the evidence shewed that the defendant, with four men acting under his direction, went into the house,—with no intent to take possession of it nor to oust the man in possession thereof nor to interfere with the latter's occupation thereof,—but for the sole purpose of seizing and taking away from the house some articles of furniture which the defendant bona fide claimed and believed to be his own property and to the possession of which he believed himself entitled, it was held that the entry was a mere trespass and did not constitute a forcible entry; and the prisoner was acquitted, the Judge, however, reserving the question for the Court of Appeal, by which the Judge's ruling was confirmed. (7)

103. Every one who forcibly enters or forcibly detains land is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to one year's imprisonment. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 89.

Prize-Fights.

104. Challenge to fight a prize-fight.—Every one is guilty of an offence and liable, on summary conviction, to a penalty not exceeding one thousand dollars and not less than one hundred dollars, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months, with or without hard labor or to both, who sends or publishes, or causes to be sent or published, or otherwise made known, any challenge to fight a prize-fight, or accepts any such challenge, or causes the same to be accepted, or goes into training preparatory to such fight, or acts as trainer or second to any person who intends to engage in a prize-fight. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 93.

105. Principal in a prize-fight.—Every one is guilty of an offence and liable, on summary conviction, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding twelve months and not less than three months, with or without hard labor, who engages as a principal in a prize-fight. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 94.

106. Attending a prize-fight as an aid, etc.—Every one is guilty of an offence and liable, on summary conviction, to a penalty not exceeding five hundred dollars and not less than fifty dollars, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding twelve months, with or without hard labor, or to both, who is present at a prize-fight as an aid, second, surgeon, umpire, backer, assistant or reporter, or who advises, encourages or promotes such fight. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 95.

107. Leaving Canada to engage in a prize-fight.—Every inhabitant or resident of Canada is guilty of an offence and liable, on summary conviction, to a penalty not exceeding four hundred dollars and not less than fifty dollars, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months, with or without hard labor, or to both, who leaves Canada with intent to engage in a prize-fight without the limits thereof. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 96.

A sparring match with gloves given merely as an exhibition of skill is not illegal. (8) But, if parties meet together till one gives in from exhaustion or from injury received, it is a prize-fight, and it is illegal whether the combatants fight in gloves or not, (9), and all persons engaged in such a fight are punishable. (10)

A mere voluntary presence at a prize-fight does not of itself necessarily render persons so present guilty of aiding and abetting such fight; although a person's presence at a prize-fight, when such presence is unexplained, is some evidence for the jury of an aiding and abetting in such fight. (1) And, if it were shewn that the defendants took a walk in the direction of the scene of the intended fight for the purpose of seeing it and were afterwards present at it, or that they went there by train in company with a large party for the purpose of being present at the fight and were afterwards present at it accordingly, or that they were present at the fight by virtue of having paid entrance money or for tickets to admit them to the place set apart for the fight, there would undoubtedly be evidence of aiding and abetting or promoting the fight rendering them guilty of being parties to the offence.

As already mentioned, it has been held that an assembly of persons to witness a prize-fight is an unlawful assembly, and that every one present at and encouraging the fight is guilty of an offence. (2)

If one of the combatants in a prize-fight is killed, not only is his antagonist guilty of manslaughter, but also the seconds, promoters and everybody present and approving. (3)

A mere stakeholder not present at the fight is not a party to the manslaughter where one of the pugilists is killed in the course of the fight. (4)

By sections 627 and 628 post, a sheriff is empowered to arrest and bring before a magistrate any person within his jurisdiction believed to be about to engage in a prize-fight, and to also forcibly suppress and prevent a prize-fight about to take place within his jurisdiction, and to arrest and bring before a magistrate any persons coming into Canada, from outside, to attend such prize-fight.

Section 606, post, confers upon Superior Court Judges, County Court Judges, police magistrates and others, the powers of a justice of the peace with respect to offences against the provisions as to prize-fights.

108. Consequence if fight found not to be for a prize.—If, after hearing evidence of the circumstances connected with the origin of the fight or intended fight, the person before whom the complaint is made is satisfied that such fight or intended fight was bona fide the consequence or result of a quarrel or dispute between the principals engaged or intended to engage therein, and that the same was not an encounter or fight for a prize, or on the result of which the handing over or transfer of money or property depended, such person may, in his discretion, discharge the accused or impose upon him a penalty not exceeding fifty dollars. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 97.

Inciting Indians.

109. Inciting Indians to riotous acts.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who induces, incites or stirs up any three or more Indians, non-treaty Indians, or half-breeds, apparently acting in concert—

(a) to make any request or demand of any agent or servant of the Government in a riotous, routous, disorderly or threatening manner, or in a manner calculated to cause a breach of the peace; or,

(b) to do any act calculated to cause a breach of the peace. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 98.

110. Inciting to commission of indictable offence.—Every one who incites any Indian to commit any indictable offence is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding five years. R. S., c. 43, s. 112.

Explosive Substances.

111. Causing dangerous explosions.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for life who wilfully causes, by an explosive substance, an explosion of a nature likely to endanger life or to cause serious injury to property, whether any injury to person or property is actually caused or not. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 99.

112. Placing or throwing explosives with intent to damage or destroy anything.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to fourteen years' imprisonment who wilfully places or throws any explosive substance into or near any building or ship with intent to destroy or damage the same or any machinery, working tools, or chattels whatever, whether or not an explosion takes place. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 488.

For definition of "explosive substance," see section 2[24], ante.

Where a prisoner was indicted for throwing gunpowder against a house and the evidence was that the prisoner had thrown against a house a bottle containing gunpowder, and that there was a fuse in the neck of the bottle, Kelly, C. B., ruled that, unless the fuse was lighted at the time the bottle was thrown against the house, the offence was not made out. His Lordship said that "if anybody merely threw a bottle containing gunpowder, that would not be sufficient; for if the fuse was not lighted, it could not cause an explosion and it would be merely throwing a bottle against a house. (4a)

113. Doing any act or possessing explosives with intent to cause explosions.—Every one who wilfully—

(a) does any act with intent to cause by an explosive substance, or conspires to cause by an explosive substance, an explosion of a nature likely to endanger life, or to cause serious injury to property; or,

(4a) R. v. Sheppard, 11 Cox, 302.

(b) makes or has in his possession or under his control any explosive substance with intent by means thereof to endanger life or to cause serious injury to property, or to enable any other person by means thereof to endanger life or to cause serious injury to property;

is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to fourteen years' imprisonment, whether an explosion takes place or not, and whether any injury to person or property is actually caused or not. 55-56 V., c. 29, s 100.

114. Making or possessing explosives.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to seven years' imprisonment who makes, or knowingly has in his possession or under his control, any explosive substance under such circumstances as to give rise to a reasonable suspicion that he is not making it, or has it not in his possession or under his control for a lawful object, unless he can shew that he made it or had it in his possession or under his control for a lawful object. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 101.

Under the Imperial Act respecting explosive substances, which gives to the expression "explosive substance," the same meaning as our OWN Code, (see section 2, sub-section 14, ante), it has been held that ANY PART of a vessel which when filled with an explosive substance is adapted for causing an explosion (i.e., for causing it to explode so as to be dangerous to life, limb, or property), is an explosive substance within the Act; and it was also held in a prosecution under section 4 of the Imperial Act, which is similar in its terms to section 114 of our Code, that where several persons are connected in a common design to have articles amounting to an explosive substance made for an unlawful purpose, each member of the confederacy is responsible in respect of such articles as are in the possession of others connected in carrying out their common design. (5)

When any person is charged before a justice of the peace with the offence of making or having explosive substances no further proceeding is to be taken against him, without the consent of the Attorney-General, except such as the justice thinks necessary, by remand or otherwise, to secure the person's safe custody. (Sec. 594, post.)

Offensive Weapons.

115. Having offensive weapons for dangerous purposes. — Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to five years' imprisonment who has in his custody or possession, or carries, any offensive weapons for any purpose dangerous to the public peace. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 102.

No prosecution for any offence against this section can be commenced after the expiration of six months from its commission. (Sec. 1140*d post.*)

(5) R. v. Charles and others, 17 Cox, 499.

116. Openly carrying offensive weapons so as to cause alarm. —If two or more persons openly carry offensive weapons in a public place in such a manner and under such circumstances as are calculated to create terror and alarm, each of such persons is liable, on summary conviction before two justices, to a penalty not exceeding forty dollars and not less than ten dollars, and in default of payment to imprisonment for any term not exceeding thirty days. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 103.

No prosecution for any offence against this section or against sections 118 to 124 inclusive, can be commenced after the expiration of one month from its commission. (Sec. 1140*f post.*)

117. Smugglers carrying offensive weapons. — Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for ten years who, while carrying offensive weapons, is found with any goods liable to seizure or forfeiture under any law relating to inland revenue, the customs, trade or navigation, knowing such goods to be so liable. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 104.

THE CUSTOMS ACT AND THE INLAND REVENUE ACT.

The old Customs Act (R. S. C., 1886, c. 32), and the old Inland Revenue Act (R.S.C., 1886, c. 34),—certain sections of which, related to seizures and forfeitures,—have been repealed and are now replaced by the new Customs Act (R. S., 1906, c. 48); and the new Inland Revenue Act (R. S., 1906, c. 51); and the following are some of the sections thereof relating to punishments and forfeitures:

The Customs Act.

Forfeiture of Goods Unlawfully Imported.—Section 13 of the new Customs Act provides that no goods shall be unladen from any vessel arriving at any port or place in Canada from any place out of Canada, or be unladen from any vessel having dutiable goods on board brought coastwise, until the entry has been made of such goods and warrant granted for the unlading of the same; and, by sec. 189, it is provided that all goods unladen contrary to the Act shall be seized and forfeited.

Section 22 provides that no goods shall be imported into Canada in any vehicle otherwise than in a railway carriage nor on the person between sunset and sunrise on any day nor at any time on a Sunday or a statutory holiday, except under a written permit from a customs collector and under the supervision of a customs officer, and it is, by sections 192 and 193, declared that all goods imported contrary to the above section and the vehicle, etc., in or with which the same are imported, shall be seized and forfeited, and that any goods brought into Canada in the charge or custody of any person shall be forfeited, and may be seized and dealt with accordingly, if the person in charge thereof does not (among other things) come to the Custom House nearest to the point at which he crossed the frontier line or to the station of the officer nearest to such point, if such station is nearer thereto than any Custom House, and there makes a report in writing to the collector or proper officer of customs stating the contents of each and every package and parcel of such goods and the quantities and values of the same.

SEC. 206. SMUGGLING — PASSING FORGED INVOICES, ETC.—"If any person smuggles or clandestinely introduces into Canada, any goods subject to duty, or makes out or passes or attempts to pass through the Custom house any false, forged or fraudulent invoice, or in any way attempts to defraud the revenue by evading the payment of the duty, or of any part of the duty on any goods, such goods, if found, may be seized and forfeited; or if not found, but the value thereof has been ascertained, the person so offending shall forfeit the value thereof as so ascertained; and every such person, his aiders and abettors shall, in addition to any other penalty to which he and they are subject for such offence, forfeit a sum equal to the value of such goods,—which sum may be recovered in any court of competent jurisdiction,—and shall further be liable on summary conviction before two justices of the peace, or any other magistrate having the powers of two justices of the peace, to a penalty not exceeding two hundred dollars, and not less than fifty dollars, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year, and not less than one month, or to both fine and imprisonment."

SEC. 215. POSSESSING GOODS LIABLE TO FORFEITURE.—"If any two or more persons in company are found together and they or any of them have any goods liable to forfeiture under this Act, every such person having knowledge of the fact is guilty of an indictable offence and punishable accordingly."

SEC. 219. DEALING IN GOODS UNLAWFULLY IMPORTED.—"If any person knowingly harbors, conceals, keeps, purchases, sells or exchanges any goods unlawfully imported into Canada (whether such goods are dutiable or not), or whereon the duties lawfully payable have not been paid,—such goods, if found, shall be forfeited and may be seized. If such goods are not found, the person so offending shall forfeit the value thereof; and every such person shall, in addition to any other penalty, forfeit a sum equal to the value of such goods, which may be recovered in any court of competent jurisdiction, and shall further be liable, on summary conviction before two justices of the peace or any magistrate having the powers of two justices of the peace, to a penalty not exceeding two hundred dollars and not less than fifty dollars, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year and not less than one month, or to both fine and imprisonment."

The punishment imposed by this section of the Customs Act, applies not only to the case where the goods are not found in the possession and keeping of the offender, but also to the case where they are so found; it being apparent that the object of the enactment is to make the person liable to punishment who illegally imports goods without paying duty whether the goods are found or are not found in his possession or keeping. (1)

SEC. 227. GAINING ACCESS WITHOUT PERMISSION TO BONDED GOODS.—"Every person who, without the express permission of the proper officer of customs, by any contrivance, gains access to bonded goods in a railway car, or to goods in a railway car—upon which goods the customs duties have not been paid,—or delivers such bonded or other goods, shall, for every such offence, be liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year and not less than one month."

SEC. 254. FALSIFYING DOCUMENTS AND USING DOCUMENTS FALSIFIED.—"Every person who forges, counterfeits, falsifies, or uses when so forged, counterfeited or falsified, any paper or document required under this Act, or for any purpose therein mentioned, whether written, printed or otherwise, or by any false statement procures such document, knowing the same to be forged, counterfeited, or falsified, or forges, counterfeits or falsifies any certificate relating to any oath or declaration or affirmation by this Act required or authorized, is guilty of an indictable offence.

See sections 259 and 260 of the Customs Act for the respective penalties, punishments and FORFEITURES incurred by (a), any master or person in charge of any vessel and by every driver or person conducting or having charge of any vehicle who refuses to stop such vessel or vehicle when required by a Customs officer, or (b), by any person who offers for sale any goods under pretence of the same having been smuggled.

Although sections 215 and 254 (above quoted) of the Customs Act declare that the offences thereby prohibited are indictable offences, they provide no punishment. But section 1052 of the Criminal Code, post, provides that every person convicted of any indictable offence, for which no punishment is specially provided, shall be liable to imprisonment for five years.

The Inland Revenue Act.

The following are some of the clauses of the new Inland Revenue Act (R. S., 1906, c. 51), by which penalties and forfeitures are imposed:—

Sec. 58. No Removal of Excisable Goods Until Duty Paid. —"No goods subject to a duty of excise under this Act shall be removed from any distillery, malt-house, brewery, tobacco manufactory, cigar manufactory, bonded manufactory or other premises subject to excise, licensed as herein provided, or from any warehouse in which they have been bonded or stored, until the duty on such goods has been paid or secured by bond in the manner by law required. And sec. 116 provides that any goods removed from any distillery, malt-house, brewery, tobacco manufactory, cigar manufactory, bonded manufactory or other premises, subject to excise, licensed as by the Act provided, or from a warehouse, before the duty thereon has been paid or secured by bond in the manner by law required, shall be seized and detained by any officer of excise having a knowledge of the fact, and shall be and remain forfeited to the Crown."

Sec. 59. Removal of Dutiable Goods in the Night.—"Except under departmental authority in each case specially obtained, no goods subject to a duty of excise under this Act, shall be removed from any distillery, malt-house, brewery, tobacco manufactory, cigar manufactory, bonded manufactory, or from a bonding warehouse or other premises licensed as herein provided, between the hours of six o'clock in the afternoon and seven o'clock on the following forenoon; and section 117 provides that any goods removed in violation of section 59 shall be seized and detained by any officer of Inland Revenue having knowledge of the fact, and shall be and remain forfeited to the Crown.

Sec. 100. Forfeiture of Goods and Apparatus of an Unlicensed Distillery, etc.—(a) "All grain, malt, raw tobacco and all other material in stock;

(b) All engines, machinery, utensils, worms, stills, mash-tubs, fermenting-tuns, tobacco-presses or knives;

(c) All tools or materials suitable for the making of stills, worms, rectifying or similar apparatus; and which are at any time found in any distillery, malt-house, brewery, tobacco manufactory, cigar manufactory, bonded manufactory, or other premises or place where anything is being done or any working carried on which is subject to excise, and for which a license is required under this Act, but in respect of which no such license has been taken out, shall be liable to be seized by any officer of Inland Revenue having a knowledge thereof, and to be forfeited to the Crown, and may either be destroyed when and where found or removed to some place for safe-keeping, in the discretion of the seizing officer.

2. All horses, vehicles and other appliances which have been or are being used for the purpose of removing any spirits, malt, beer, tobacco, cigars, materials or apparatus used or to be used in the production of any article subject to excise, in violation of this Act, shall likewise be liable to be seized by any such officer and to be forfeited to the Crown, and may be dealt with in like manner.

SEC. 102. FORFEITURE OF ENGINES, ETC., IN CASE OF FRAUD.—Every steam-engine, boiler, mill, still, worm, rectifying apparatus, fermenting-tun, mash-tub, cistern, couch-frame, machine, vessel, tub, cask, pipe or cock, with the contents thereof, and all stores or stocks of grain, spirits, malt, beer, tobacco, cigars, drugs or other materials or commodities which are in any premises or place subject to excise, shall be forfeited to the Crown, and be dealt with accordingly, if any fraud against the revenue is committed in any such place or premises, or if the owner of any such place, premises, apparatus, goods or commodities, his agent or any person employed by him, or any person having lawful possession or control of such place, premises, apparatus, goods or commodities, is discovered in the act of committing or is convicted of committing any act in or about such place or premises which is declared by this Act to be an indictable offence.

SEC. 103. FORFEITURE OF GOODS FOR NON-PAYMENT OF DUTY. —"Every article or thing subject to duty under this Act, and on which the duty hereby imposed has not been paid at the proper time for paying the same, shall be seized by any officer of Inland Revenue and shall be forfeited to the Crown and be dealt with accordingly."

OFFENCES WITH RESPECT TO EXCISE STAMPS, ETC.—See sections 104, 105 and 106 of the Inland Revenue Act, for the respective penalties, punishments and FORFEITURES incurred by any person, (a) who unlawfully uses any stamped, marked or branded packages, barrels or casks, or (b) who, being a vendor of the contents of any labelled, branded, marked or sealed package, etc., fails, so soon as the contents have been removed, to obliterate such label, mark, brand or seal, or (c) who, except as permitted by the Act, brings into or has in his licensed premises any stamped packages, etc.

FORFEITURE OF STILLS, ETC.—See section 109, as to the FORFEITURE of all stills, worms, apparatus, etc., in respect of which any penalty is incurred.

UNAPPROVED WEIGHTS OR MEASURES.—See section 113 for the penalty and FORFEITURE incurred by any one using or permitting the use, except as by the Act otherwise provided, of any unapproved weights or measures.

BREAKING CROWN'S LOCK—ABSTRACTING BONDED GOODS, ETC.—See secs. 114 and 115 for the respective penalties, punishments and FORFEITURES incurred by any person (a) who opens or breaks the Crown's Lock attached to any apparatus, etc., or unlawfully abstracts goods in bond, or (b) who unlawfully removes bonded goods.

DISTILLING, BREWING, MALTING OR MANUFACTURING TOBACCO OR CIGARS, WITHOUT LICENSE.—Section 180, sections 204 to 207, sections 237 to 239 and section 338 make every person guilty of an indictable offence and subject to certain punishments and FORFEITURES, who, without license, distils or rectifies or assists in distilling or rectifying any spirits, etc., or sets up, possesses or conceals any still, etc., or brews any beer, etc., except for the use of himself or his family as by the Act provided, or makes any malt or steeps any grain, etc., for malting, or manufactures any tobacco or cigars, etc., except as permitted by the Act.

It is an offence under section 180 of the Act to have possession of a "still" without the notice or registration provided by the Act, even though such possession be that of a carrier only. The phrase "in any place" used in sub-section (e) of section 180 is equivalent to "anywhere"; and the context does not limit its meaning to distilleries or places used as distilleries. (2)

COMPOUNDING WITHOUT LICENSE.—Section 191 of the Act imposes a penalty on every person who without license carries on business as a compounder of wines, spirits, etc., and provides for the forfeiture of all goods compounded or in course of being compounded or on an unlicensed compounder's premises.

OPENING TOBACCO OR CIGAR PACKAGES, BOXES, ETC., WITHOUT BREAKING EXCISE STAMPS, ETC.—See sections 341, 342, 343, 346, and 347, for the respective penalties, punishments and FORFEITURES incurred by any person (a) who opens any package of tobacco or cigars without breaking the excise stamp thereon, or (b) who, except as permitted by the Act, puts up or has possession of tobacco or cigars in previously used packages, etc., or (c) who sells or offers for sale, except in a licensed tobacco or cigar manufactory, any loose or unpacked foreign raw leaf tobacco, or (d) who neglects or refuses to destroy the stamps on emptied cigar boxes, wrappers, etc., or buys or accepts from another any such empty stamped boxes, etc., or the stamps taken therefrom, or (e) who puts tobacco or cigars in any emptied or partially emptied packages, etc., or has possession of or sells any box, etc., stamped with any fraudulent stamp or any stamp previously used.

(2) R. v. Brennan & Kennedy, 6 Can. Cr. Cas., 29.

AFFIXING FORGED OR PREVIOUSLY USED STAMPS.—Section 348 makes every person guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a penalty not exceeding $500 and not less than $100 and to imprisonment for any term not exceeding five years and not less than six months, who affixes to any package of tobacco or cigars any forged stamp or any stamp previously used.

REMOVING TOBACCO OR CIGARS NOT PROPERLY PUT UP AND STAMPED, ETC.—PURCHASING SUCH.—See sections 349, 351, 352, 356, 357 and 358, for the respective penalties, punishments and FORFEITURES incurred by any person (a) who removes from any tobacco or cigar manufactory or uses, sells or possesses any tobacco or cigars without the same being put up in proper packages and stamped, or without the stamps being properly cancelled, or (b) who knowingly purchases or receives for sale any manufactured tobacco or cigars from any manufacturer not duly licensed, or (c) who purchases or receives for sale any manufactured tobacco or cigars not legally packed, branded or stamped, or (d) who sells or offers for sale or not being a licensed tobacco or cigar manufacturer, has in his possession any kind of manufactured tobacco or cigars not put up in packages and stamped according to the provisions of the Act, or (e) who sells or offers for sale any imported tobacco or cigars, or tobacco or cigars purporting to be imported, not put up in packages and stamped as provided by the Act, or (f) who sells or offers for sale any cigars in any other form than in new boxes as provided by the Act, or who packs in any box any cigars in excess of the number required by law to be put in each box, or affixes a stamp on any box denoting a less amount of duty than required by the Act, or (g) who removes cigars from any manufactory without being packed in boxes as required by the Act.

ACETIC ACID.—See sections as to licenses to carry on the business of manufacturing acetic acid.

In the case of a conviction under the Inland Revenue Act and of a money penalty being imposed and, in default of payment, imprisonment for a fixed term, unless the penalty and costs and charges of conveying the accused to gaol are sooner paid, it is necessary that the amount of the latter should be stated in the warrant of commitment, and, where not so stated, the prisoner is entitled to be discharged on habeas corpus. (3)

PART II. OF CRIMINAL CODE (resumed).

118. Carrying a pistol or air gun without justification.—Every one is guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding twenty-five dollars and not less than five dollars, or to imprisonment for one month, who not being a justice or a public officer, or a soldier, sailor or volunteer in His Majesty's service, on duty, or a constable or other peace officer, and not having a certificate of exemption from the operation of this section, as hereinafter provided for, and not having at the time reasonable cause to fear an assault or other injury to his person, family or property, has upon his person a pistol or air-gun elsewhere than in his own dwelling-house, shop, warehouse, or counting-house.

2. If sufficient cause be shown upon oath to the satisfaction of any justice, he may grant to any applicant therefor not under the age of sixteen years and as to whose discretion and good character he is satisfied by evidence upon oath, a certificate of exemption from the operation of this section, for such period, not exceeding twelve months, as he deems fit.

3. Such certificate, upon the trial of any offence, shall be primâ facie evidence of its contents and of the signature and official character of the person by whom it purports to be granted.

4. Whenever the Governor in Council deems it expedient in the public interest, he may by proclamation suspend the operation of the provisions of the first and second sub-sections of this section respecting certificates of exemption, or exempt from such operation any particular part of Canada, and in either case for such period, and with such exceptions as to the persons affected by this section as he deems fit. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 105.

119. Selling pistol or air gun to minor.—Every one is guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding fifty dollars, who sells or gives any pistol or air-gun, or any ammunition therefor, to a minor under the age of sixteen years, unless he establishes to the satisfaction of the justice before whom he is charged that he used reasonable diligence in endeavoring to ascertain the age of the minor before making such sale or gift, and that he had good reason to believe that such minor was not under the age of sixteen;

2. Every one is guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding twenty-five dollars who sells any pistol or air-gun without keeping a record of such sale, the date thereof, and the name of the purchaser and of the maker's name, or other mark by which such arm may be identified. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 106.

120. Having weapon when arrested.—Every one who when arrested, either on a warrant issued against him for an offence or while committing an offence, has upon his person a pistol or air-gun is guilty of an offence and liable, on summary conviction before two justices, to a penalty not exceeding fifty dollars and not less than twenty dollars, or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three months, with or without hard labor. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 107.

121. Having weapon with intent to injure any one.—Every one who has upon his person a pistol or air-gun, with intent therewith unlawfully to do injury to any other person, is guilty of an offence and liable, on summary conviction before two justices, to a penalty not exceeding two hundred dollars and not less than fifty dollars, or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding six months, with or without hard labor. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 108.

A defendant was charged, upon an information laid before justices, with the indictable offence of shooting with intent to murder. The justices, not finding sufficient evidence against him to warrant them in committing him for trial, took the following course. At the close of the case, they, of their own motion, summarily convicted the defendant for that he did procure a revolver with intent therewith unlawfully to do injury to one J. S. The evidence shewed that the revolver was bought and carried and used by the defendant. The return to a writ of habeas corpus shewed that the defendant's detention was under a warrant of commitment based on the above conviction; and, on motion for the defendant's discharge, the motion was granted, it being held that the detention was by the terms of the warrant for an offence unknown to the law, and that although the evidence itself shewed an offence against section 108 (old Code), the motion should not be enlarged to allow the justices to substitute a proper conviction, for it was unwarrantable to convict on a charge not formulated, as to which the evidence was not addressed, and upon which the defendant was not called upon for his defence. (4)

122. Pointing any fire-arm at anyone.—Every one who, without lawful excuse, points at another person any fire-arm or air-gun, whether loaded or unloaded, is guilty of an offence and liable, on summary conviction before two justices, to a penalty not exceeding one hundred dollars and not less than ten dollars, or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding thirty days, with or without hard labor. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 109.

This section is intended for the punishment of a person who, playfully and without wrongful intent, points any fire-arm or air-gun at another, whether the weapon be loaded or not.

123. Carrying offensive weapons.—Every one who carries about his person any bowie-knife, or any dagger, dirk, metal knuckles, skull cracker, slung shot, or other offensive weapon of a like character, or secretly carries about his person any instrument loaded at the end, or sells or exposes for sale, publicly or privately, any such weapon, or being masked or disguised carries or has in his possession any firearm or air-gun, is guilty of an offence and liable, on summary conviction before two justices, to a penalty not exceeding fifty dollars and not less than ten dollars, or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three months, with or without hard labor, or to both, and in default of payment of such penalty to a term or a further term of imprisonment not exceeding three months with or without hard labor. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 110. (As amended by 8 & 9 Ed. VII., c. 9, s. 2.)

124. Carrying sheath-knives.—Every one, not being thereto required by his lawful trade or calling, who is found in any town or city carrying about his person any sheath-knife, is liable, on summary conviction before two justices, to a penalty not exceeding fifty dollars and not less than ten dollars, or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three months, with or without hard labor, or to both, and in default of payment of such penalty to a term or further term of imprisonment not exceeding three months, with or without hard labor. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 111 (as amended by 8 & 9 Ed. VII., c. 9, s. 2.)

See section 622, post, as to the power of the Court or justice, before whom any person is convicted, to impound the weapon and cause it to be destroyed.

125. Exception as to soldiers, &c.—It is not an offence for any soldier, public officer, peace officer, sailor or volunteer in His Majesty's service, or constable or other policeman, to carry loaded pistols or other usual arms or offensive weapons in the discharge of his duty. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 112.

126. Refusing to deliver offensive weapon to a justice.—Every one attending any public meeting or being on his way to attend the same who, upon demand made by any justice within whose jurisdiction such public meeting is appointed to be held, declines or refuses to deliver up, peaceably and quietly, to such justice, any offensive weapon with which he is armed or which he has in his possession, is guilty of an indictable offence.

2. The justice may record the refusal and adjudge the offender to pay a penalty not exceeding eight dollars, or the offender may be proceeded against by indictment as in other cases of indictable offences. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 113.

See sections 619, 620 and 621, post, as to the power of a justice to disarm persons attending a public meeting.

127. Coming armed near public meeting.—Every one, except the sheriff, deputy sheriff and justices for the district or county, or the mayor, justices or other peace officer for the city or town respectively, in which any public meeting is held, and the constables and special constables employed by them, or any of them, for the preservation of the public peace at such meeting, is guilty of an indictable offence, and liable to a penalty not exceeding one hundred dollars, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months, or to both, who, during any part of the day upon which such meeting is appointed to be held, comes within one mile of the place appointed for such meeting armed with any offensive weapon. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 114.

128. Lying in wait for persons returning from public meeting.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a penalty not exceeding two hundred dollars, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months, or to both, who lies in wait for any person returning, or expected to return, from any such public meeting, with intent to commit an assault upon such person or with intent, by abusive language, opprobrious epithets or other offensive demeanor, directed to, at or against such person, to provoke such person, or those who accompany him, to a breach of the peace. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 115.

No prosecution for any offence against sections 126-128 can be commenced after the expiration of one year from its commission. (Section 1140*c*, post.)

Seditious Offences.

129. Unlawful oaths—Administering or taking.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to fourteen years' imprisonment who—

(a) administers, or is present at and consenting to the administration of, any oath or any engagement purporting to bind the person taking the same to commit any crime punishable by death or imprisonment for more than five years; or

(b) attempts to induce or compel any person to take any such oath or engagement; or

(c) takes any such oath or engagement. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 120.

130. Seditious oaths—Administering or taking.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to seven years' imprisonment who—

(a) administers or is present at and consenting to the administration of any oath or engagement purporting to bind the person taking the same:

(i) to engage in any mutinous or seditious purpose;

(ii) to disturb the public peace or commit or endeavor to commit any offence;

(iii) not to inform and give evidence against any associate, confederate or other person;

(iv) not to reveal or discover any unlawful combination or confederacy, or any illegal act done or to be done, or any illegal oath or obligation or engagement which may have been administered or tendered to or taken by any person, or the import of any such oath or obligation or engagement; or

(b) attempts to induce or compel any person to take any such oath or engagement; or

(c) takes any such oath or engagement. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 121.

131. Compulsion no excuse, unless declaration of it duly made.—Any one who, under such compulsion as would otherwise excuse him, offends against either of the last two preceding sections, shall not be excused thereby unless, within the period hereinafter mentioned, he declares the same and what he knows touching the same, and the persons by whom and in whose presence, and when and where, such oath or obligation or engagement was administered or taken, by information on oath before a justice for the district or city or county in which such oath or engagement was administered or taken.

2. Such declaration may be made by such person within fourteen days after the taking of the oath, unless he is hindered from making it by actual force or sickness, in which case it may be made within eight days of the cessation of such hindrance.

3. The declaration may be made on such person's trial if it happens before the expiration of either of the periods aforesaid. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 122.

SECRET SOCIETIES.—These three sections are taken from sections 1, 2, 3 and 4 of chapter 10 of the Consolidated Statutes of Lower Canada. With regard to the Province of Quebec there is no doubt that the remaining sections 5, 6, 7, 8 and 9 (unrepealed), of that Act are still in force, and the law as contained therein may probably also apply to British Columbia, Manitoba and the North-West Territories, seeing that the statute was simply a re-enactment of the English law on the subject as it stood, in 1837, under 52 Geo. III. c. 104, and 7 Wm. IV., and 1 Vict. c. 91.

Under the law as embodied in these unrepealed sections of chap. 10, C. S. L. C., it is an indictable offence punishable by seven years' imprisonment, for any one to become a member of or to correspond or hold intercourse with or in any way to aid or support any society or association thereby declared to be an unlawful combination or confederacy; and every society or association is thereby deemed to be an unlawful combination or confederacy:—

1. Whose members, according to the rules thereof, or to any provision or any agreement for that purpose, are (a) required to keep secret the acts or proceedings thereof, or (b) admitted to take any unlawful oath or engagement within the meaning of that Act, or any oath or engagement not required or authorized by law;

2. Whose members or any of them take or in any manner bind themselves by any such oath or engagement or in consequence of being members thereof;

3. Whose members or any of them take, subscribe or assent to any engagement of secrecy test or declaration not required by law;

4. The names of whose members, or any of them, are kept secret from the society at large;

5. Which has any committee or secret body so chosen or appointed that the members constituting the same are not known by the society at large to be members of such committee or select body;

6. Which has any president, treasurer, secretary, delegate or other officer so chosen or appointed that his election or appointment to such office is not known to the society at large;

7. Of which the names of all the persons and of the committee or select bodies of members and of all presidents, treasurers, secretaries, delegates and other officers are not entered in a book kept for that purpose and open for the inspection of all the members;

8. Which is composed of different divisions or branches or of different parts acting in any manner separately or distinct from each other, or of which any part has any separate or distinct president, secretary, treasurer, delegate or other officer elected or appointed by or for such part or to act as an officer for such part.

Before its incorporation, the Royal Orange Society was held, under the above law relating to secret societies, to be an illegal association and confederacy, the members thereof being bound by an oath to keep secret the proceedings of the association.

The Orange Lodges had assembled in their meeting rooms in Montreal for the purpose of walking in procession, according to their annual custom on the twelfth of July, when the Mayor with the assistance of a large band of special constables armed with sticks, forcibly prevented the procession, and arrested the chief officers; and, in an action of damages for false arrest taken by them against the Mayor, the latter was held to have acted legally, the Orange Order being an unlawful body, and there being a well grounded apprehension of a serious public disturbance taking place if the procession had been allowed to form and appear on the streets. (1)

In section 9 of chapter 10 of the Consolidated Statutes of Lower Canada, there is an exception in favor of certain masonic lodges, it being thereby enacted that the provisions of the Act shall not extend to the meetings of any society or lodge of freemasons constituted by or under the authority of warrants in that behalf granted by or derived from any GRAND MASTER or GRAND LODGE in the UNITED KINGDOM of GREAT BRITAIN and IRELAND; and, by an amending Act of the late Province of Canada passed in 1865, this exception was extended so as to include therein masonic lodges meeting under warrants from the Grand Lodge of Canada, an Ontario organization exercising no masonic authority in the province of Quebec.

At the time of the establishment of the Grand Lodge of Freemasons of Canada, there were, in the province of Quebec, some masonic lodges, constituted and working under warrants of the Grand Lodge of England; and there has since been established and now exists in the province of Quebec, a separate body of freemasons called the Grand Lodge of Quebec.

The English Lodges of freemasons in Montreal have always been within the above exception; and, with a view to give the same relief to freemasons and masonic lodges of the Grand Lodge of Quebec, it has been recently enacted by the Dominion Parliament, in the 58-59 Vic., c. 44, that the words "or Grand Master or Grand Lodge of Canada," added by chapter 46 of the statutes of 1865 of the late province of Canada, to section 9 of the Consolidated Statutes of Lower Canada, are amended by substituting the word "IN" for the word "OF"; so that the said words shall read "or Grand Master or Grand Lodge IN Canada." Therefore, section 9 of the C. S. L. C. now reads, by virtue of the two amendments above referred to, as follows:—

"And whereas certain societies have long been accustomed to be holden in this province under the denomination of lodges of freemasons, the meetings whereof have been in great measure directed to charitable purposes;—nothing in this Act shall extend to the meetings of any such society or lodge, holden under the said denomination and in conformity to the rules prevailing among the said societies of freemasons: Provided such society or lodge has been constituted by or under the authority of warrants in that behalf granted by or derived from any grand master or grand lodge in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland or Grand Master or Grand Lodge in Canada."

132. Seditious words, libels and conspiracies.—Seditious words are words expressive of a seditious intention.

2. A seditious libel is a libel expressive of a seditious intention.

3. A seditious conspiracy is an agreement between two or more persons to carry into execution a seditious intention. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 123.

133. Bona fide intentions not seditious. — No one shall be deemed to have a seditious intention only because he intends in good faith—

(a) to show that His Majesty has been misled or mistaken in his measures; or

(b) to point out errors or defects in the government or constitution of the United Kingdom, or of any part of it, or of Canada or any province thereof, or in either House of Parliament of the United Kingdom or of Canada, or in any legislature, or in the administration of justice; or to excite His Majesty's subjects to attempt to procure, by lawful means, the alteration of any matter in the state; or

(c) to point out, in order to their removal, matters which are producing or have a tendency to produce feelings of hatred and ill-will between different classes of His Majesty's subjects. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 123.

134. Punishment of sedition.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who speaks any seditious words or publishes any seditious libel or is a party to any seditious conspiracy. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 124.

It will be seen by the above section, 132, that there are three different ways in which a seditious offence may be committed, namely, by speaking words expressive of a seditious intention, by publishing a libel expressing a seditious intention, and by entering into a conspiracy to carry a seditious intention into execution. But there is no definition given shewing what a seditious intention is.

In section 102 of the English Draft Code there is, in addition to what is above contained in our section 133, a clause defining a seditious intention as,— "An intention—to bring into hatred or contempt or to excite disaffection against the person of Her Majesty, or the government and constitution of the United Kingdom or of any part of it as by law established, or either House of Parliament, or the administration of justice; or to excite Her Majesty's subjects to attempt to procure, otherwise than by lawful means, the alteration of any matter in church or state by law established; or to raise discontent or disaffection amongst Her Majesty's subjects; or to promote feelings of ill-will and hostility between different classes of such subjects."

In a note to this definition of a seditious intention, the Royal Commissioners say that it is as accurate a statement of the existing law as they can make. As references, they give 60 Geo. III., and 1 Geo. IV. c. 8, and the cases of O'Connell v. R., R. v. Lambert & Perry, R. v. Vincent, R. v. Winterbotham, and R. v. Binns; (2) and in the body of their Report, (at p. 20), they also say, with reference to sedition, "On this delicate subject we do not undertake to suggest any alteration of the law. It is not easy to find explicit authority, earlier than the case of R. v. Frost, (3) (tried before Lord Kenyon in 1793), for the proposition that to speak seditious words is an indictable offence. A passage in the 3rd Institute, (p. 14), certainly says, 'But words without an overt deed are to be punished in another degree as a high misprision.' This, however, is an incidental remark at the end of a passage the main point of which is that mere words are not, in general, an overt act of treason."

Our Criminal Code, as originally drawn, and introduced into Parliament, contained a clause defining a seditious intention in terms similar to those above quoted from section 102 of the English Draft Code; but the clause evoked a long discussion and a great deal of criticism during its consideration in the Parliamentary Committee; and it was ultimately decided to strike out the clause and leave the definition to common law.

In tracing, with his usual clearness and ability, the history of this most interesting branch of the law, the late Sir James F. Stephen says that there are "two different views of the relation between rulers and their subjects. If the ruler is regarded as the superior of the subject, as being by the nature of his position presumably wise and good,—the rightful ruler and guide of the whole population,—it must necessarily follow that it is wrong to censure him openly, that, if he is mistaken, his mistakes should be pointed out with the utmost respect, and, that whether mistaken or not, no censure should be cast upon him likely or designed to diminish his authority. If, on the other hand, the ruler is regarded as the agent or servant and the subject as the wise and good master who is obliged to delegate his power to the so-called ruler because, being a multitude, he cannot use it himself, it is obvious that this sentiment must be reversed. Every member of the public who censures the ruler for the time being exercises in his own person the right which belongs to the whole of which he forms part. He is finding fault with his servant. If others think differently they can take the other side of the dispute, and the utmost that can happen is that the servant will be dismissed and another put in his place, or perhaps that the arrangements of the household will be modified. To those who hold this view fully, and carry it out to all its consequences, there can be no such offence as sedition. There may indeed be breaches of the peace, which may destroy or endanger life, limb or property, and there may be incitements to such offences, but no imaginable censure of the government, short of censure which has an immediate tendency to produce such a breach of the peace, ought to be regarded as criminal." (4)

After stating that each of these extreme views has had a considerable share in moulding the law of England so as to practically produce a compromise such as is expressed in section 102 of the English Draft Code, (upon a part of which our section 133 is based), Sir James F. Stephen proceeds to trace the history of the legislation and of the legal controversies which, in conjunction with the development of broader popular views, have brought about this compromise. (5)

This history is of no small value in arriving at a proper appreciation of the present state of the law in regard to these offences; and I therefore take the liberty of giving here a short outline of it.

Under the old idea a libel was written blame, true or false, of any man public or private. For a long time the law was administered by the Star Chamber, the name given, during the Tudor period, to the king's privy council sitting as a Court,—composed of the lord chancellor, the lord treasurer, the keeper of the privy seal, a bishop, a lord of the council, and the two chief-justices,—and trying cases and adjudging, without the aid of any jury, matters of fact as well as matters of law.

During the sixteenth century, the Star Chamber took upon itself to make and enforce, with extreme rigor and severity, a number of decrees and ordinances regulating the manner of printing and the number of presses throughout the kingdom, and prohibiting all printing and publishing against the meaning of the statutes and laws of the realm.

At that time libels, as such, would not receive a great deal of attention, many offences being more severely dealt with as treasons, which at a later period would only be treated, at most, as seditious libels; for although, as already seen, mere words unconnected with any deed were not regarded as an overt act of treason, the publication of written words was regarded in that light, when they displayed a treasonable intention. (6)

After the abolition of the Star Chamber in 1641 by the Long Parliament, the latter introduced the system of licensing books, which system was continued by various Licensing Acts passed in the following reigns of Charles II., James II. and William & Mary, until it finally expired in 1794.

The licensing system and the special laws,—which, under the Commonwealth and under Charles II., exposed political libellers to prosecutions for treason,—made it very difficult and dangerous to publish any books or pamphlets objectionable to the government and cases involving a discussion of the law of libel would not during this period be very numerous. Many prosecutions were either for offences amounting to treasonable publications under the special laws referred to, or for publishing without a license or in violation of some of the provisions of the Licensing Acts. As Sir James F. Stephen remarks, until the right to publish without license is conceded, the question of the limits of the right does not become debateable. (7)

On the abolition of the Star Chamber, cases of libel,—whenever they did arise,—were tried in the Court of King's Bench; and the trials were by jury; but the Judges of that Court adopted and continued, for a long time, to follow, in regard to libel, the stringent doctrines of the Star Chamber, and held that,—as a libel was written blame, whether true or false, and as the law required the exact words of the matter complained of to be set out in order to judge by its tenor, of its libellous nature,—the question of whether it was or was not a libel was a question of law for the Court, and that the only questions of fact to be left to the jury were, "Did the defendant publish it? And were the innuendoes (if there were any) correct?"

This rule, confining the jury to the simple question of whether or not the defendant committed the act of publishing, prevented them,—as the presiding Judge invariably charged them,—from going into the intentions or motives of the author or the circumstances connected with the publication; for, the matter set out and complained of being in law libellous on its face, the act of publishing when found by the jury rendered the conviction complete.

After a time efforts were made by very distinguished advocates,—and especially towards the end of the eighteenth century by Erskine,—to bring about the adoption of a definition of libel different from that theretofore acted upon and more in accordance with changed popular sentiment. The controversy thus occasioned ultimately led to the passing of Fox's Libel Act in 1792.

It was during this controversy that the trial took place of the Dean of St. Asaph, who was prosecuted for a seditious libel said to be contained in certain extracts taken from a pamphlet called a dialogue between a gentleman and a farmer. (8) Mr. Justice Buller in his charge said that the only facts for the jury were the fact of publication and the meaning of the innuendoes; and they returned a verdict of guilty. On behalf of the defendant, Erskine then moved for a new trial; and, in his argument thereon before Lord Mansfield, he submitted that the criminal intent was a fact to be found, like any other, by the jury, and that the case of libel formed no legal exception to the general principles which govern the trial of all other crimes. (9) He supported his argument by the celebrated illustration first suggested by Algernon Sidney,—A is indicted for publishing a blasphemous libel in the words, "There is no God." Evidence is given that he sold a bible containing the words, "The fool hath said in his heart, there is no God." The matter complained of and set out in the indictment being the words, "There is no God," there is no need for any innuendo; and the jury would be bound, upon the old view of the law, to convict the defendant because, according to that old view, they had nothing to do with his intention, and on moving in arrest of judgment the defendant would be met with the answer that the indictment was good on its face, as the words were blasphemous in themselves, and the jury had found their publication.

As Erskine's argument proceeded, Lord Mansfield said, "To be sure, the jury may judge from the whole context"; to which Erskine replied, "And what is this, my lord, but determining the question of libel?"

Lord Mansfield: "They certainly may in all cases go into the whole context."

Mr. Erskine: "And why may they go into the context? Clearly, my lord, to enable them to form a correct judgment of the meaning of the part indicted; even though no particular meaning be submitted to them by averments in the indictment."

(7) 2 Steph. Hist. Cr. L., 310.
(8) 21 St. Tr., 953.
(9) 2 Steph. Hist. Cr. L., 338.

In commenting upon this portion of Erskine's argument Sir James F. Stephen says that, in his opinion, the jury might look at the whole to see whether the words "There is no God," mean "to deny the existence of God," but that it does not follow that they were at liberty to consider what object the author had in view, or by what motives he was actuated when he made the assertion, if he did make it. (10)

For my own part, I think that one among other good reasons for holding the jury entitled to look at the whole context would have been so that they could see if the author himself did in reality make the assertion "There is no God"; in other words, to see if the book itself by its whole tenor actually asserted (which it surely did not), that, "there is no God," or merely stated what a fool had in his heart foolishly asserted to that effect.

Erskine, in continuation of his argument, contended that as the writing in question in the Dean of St. Asaph's case neither contained nor was averred by the indictment to contain any slander of an individual, and as its criminality was charged to consist in its tendency to stir up general discontent, the trial of such a charge did not involve and could not in its obvious nature involve any abstract question of law for the judgment of a Court, but must wholly depend upon the judgment of the jury on the tendency of the writing to produce such consequences when connected with all the circumstances attending its publication. The question of seditious intention, he submitted, must in the nature of things be a question of fact dependent upon a variety of circumstances which could not appear on the record, to which the Court was confined; for words, which, in their literal meaning, were indifferent, temperate, or even conciliatory, might when spoken or written under special circumstances be seditious. He said, "Circumscribed by the record, your Lordship can form no judgment of the tendency of this dialogue to excite sedition by anything but the mere words. You must look at it as if it were an old M.S. dug out of the ruins of Herculaneum. You can collect nothing from the time when or the circumstances under which it was published, the person by whom and those amongst whom it was circulated; yet these may render a paper, at one time and under some circumstances, dangerously wicked and seditious, which at another time and under different circumstances might be innocent and highly meritorious." (1)

Lord Mansfield, however, upheld the doctrine that the jury had nothing to determine but the question of publishing and that of the innuendoes, and accordingly dismissed the motion for new trial. He traced the history down to that time of the development of the law of seditious libel; and in support of his judgment he cited, amongst other authorities, the cases of R. v. Clarke and R. v. Francklin (in the reign of George II.), of Miller, Almon and Woodfall (in 1770), and the later case of R. v. Stockdale.

Erskine afterwards moved, in the Dean of St. Asaph's case, in arrest of judgment, on the ground that the matter set forth and complained of was not libellous; and he succeeded.

This was in 1783; and nine years later Fox's Libel Act, (2) became law. By that Act it was enacted that in any trial of an indictment for libel, it should be competent for the jury to give their verdict on the whole matter in issue, and that they should not be required or directed by the Court or Judge to find the defendant guilty merely on proof of publication by the defendant of the paper charged as a libel and of the sense ascribed to it in such indictment; but it was provided that the Court should, according to its discretion, give its opinion and directions on the matters in issue in the same manner as in other criminal cases. Nearly thirty years later was passed the 60 Geo. III. & 1 Geo. IV., c. 8, which practically defines a seditious libel as one which tends to bring into hatred or contempt the person of the reigning sovereign, his heirs and successors, or the government or the constitution of the United Kingdom as by law established, or either House of Parliament, or to excite His Majesty's subjects to attempt the alteration of any matter in Church or State as by law established otherwise than by lawful means. Since the Reform Bill of 1832 there have been few instances of prosecutions for seditious libel; the more recent ones,—such as that of Most (3),—being, in reality, incitements to commit against reigning sovereigns, crimes of a similar kind to that of the assassination of the Emperor Alexander III. of Russia.

Most was indicted, tried and convicted under the 24-25 Vic., c. 100, s. 4, which enacts that any one who encourages or endeavors to persuade any person to murder any other person, whether a subject of the Queen or within the Queen's dominions or not, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. The encouragement and endeavor to persuade to murder proved at the trial was the publication and circulation by the defendant of an article written in German in a newspaper called "Freiheit," published in London, which article exulted in the then recent murder of the Emperor of Russia and commended it as an example to revolutionists throughout the world.

The law of seditious libel has been insensibly modified by the law of defamatory libels upon private persons, which has been the subject of a great many important decisions, the effect of which has been, "amongst other things, to give the right to every one to criticize fairly, that is, honestly, even if mistakenly, the public conduct of public men, and to comment honestly, even if mistakenly, upon the proceedings of parliament and the Courts of justice." (4)

In regard to the irrelevancy of the truth of the matter complained of in the case of a libel, considered as a criminal offence, the law according to the original theory of libel fell into two main classes, namely, 1, the class in which written blame was cast upon the institutions of the country and the general conduct of the government, and, 2, the class consisting of attacks upon individuals whether public men or not. As to the first of these classes the principle was that no one should be allowed to attempt to bring into discredit the institutions of his country, and that their defects should be matter for representation to parliament by means of petition; but this principle has been superseded by the exception that, when criticism of existing institutions is made in good faith with the view of bringing about improvements and of removing defects, it is lawful, even if mistaken. With regard to criticism of this kind it may still be said that, when it is the subject of a prosecution for seditious libel its truth is immaterial; because the question at issue is not the truth or falsity of the assertions made, but what was the writer's object. Was it to procure a remedy by peaceable and lawful means, or was it to promote disaffection and bring about riots?

With regard to attacks made, by a newspaper or a pamphlet or any other written or printed publication, upon an individual holding a public position, such attacks do not, in general, charge him with anything for which he could be made responsible criminally but only with misconduct for which public discussion is practically the only available remedy. If the truth of such charges were not allowed to be proved by way of justification for making them, much official misconduct and incapacity would be practically altogether unchecked. For cases of this kind provision has been made in two separate ways, namely,—1, by the establishment of the rule that it is lawful to make fair comment upon matters of public interest, —a rule established in a number of civil cases for libel but equally applicable to criminal prosecutions,—and 2, by the passing of Lord Campbell's Act, (5) duly re-enacted in Canada, (6) by which it was provided that it should be competent for a defendant on an indictment or information for defamatory libel to plead the truth of the matters charged and that it was for the public benefit that such matters should be published.

With regard to seditious words they have on some few occasions been made the subject of prosecution,—the charge however being that of unlawful assembly or of seditious conspiracy of which violent speeches were regarded as overt acts. In 1795, one Redhead Yorke was prosecuted and convicted on a charge of conspiracy to traduce and vilify the House of Commons and the Government and to excite disaffection and sedition; and as overt acts of conspiracy it was alleged that meetings were held to make and listen to seditious and inflammatory speeches. (7)

In 1820, Hunt was prosecuted for a conspiracy of which the holding of the meeting dispersed in 1819 at Manchester was the principal overt act; and in 1844 O'Connell and others were tried for seditious conspiracy, with intent to stir up hatred and strife between the Queen's English and Irish subjects, of which conspiracy the meetings held and the speeches made in connection with the agitation for repeal of the union between England and Ireland were overt acts.

That case shews how wide the legal notion of seditious conspiracy is. It seems to include every sort of attempt,—by violent language, either spoken or written, or by shew of force calculated to produce fear,—to affect any public object of an evil character; and no precise or complete definition has ever been given of objects which are to be regarded as evil.

At the present day, when the right of forming political organizations, of holding political meetings, and of giving,—through the press, or on the public platform,—free expression to our thoughts upon and criticism of public men and affairs, is so well recognized, a written or printed publication, a public speech, or an assembly, meeting, convention or combination would have to be of an extremely vicious, inflammatory and dangerous character to form the basis of a successful prosecution for a seditious libel, a seditious speech, or a seditious conspiracy.

Archbold gives a form of indictment for seditious libel based upon a case of over a hundred years ago. (8) The proceeding itself was an ex officio information, but Archbold gives it in the shape of an indictment. (9)

The truth of a seditious libel or of a blasphemous libel cannot be pleaded. (10)

135. Libels on foreign sovereigns.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to one year's imprisonment who, without lawful justification, publishes any libel tending to degrade, revile or expose to hatred and contempt in the estimation of the people of any foreign state, any prince or person exercising sovereign authority over such state. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 125.

This section gives the right to a foreign potentate to prosecute a person who publishes, here, a libel tending to degrade him in the estimation of the people of the foreign state; and it is for the jury, on the trial of such a charge, to say whether the words of the libel have that tendency or not.

In 1799, a defendant was found guilty in England of having published a libel on the Emperor of Russia by stating, in a newspaper article, that the Emperor was rendering himself obnoxious to his subjects by various acts of tyranny and that he was making himself ridiculous in the eyes of Europe. (1)

(1) R. v. Vint, 27 How. St. Tr., 627.

In 1781, Lord George Gordon was convicted of having published of the Queen of France a libel representing her as the leader of a faction. (2)

A French refugee in England wrote a poem suggesting that it would be a heroic deed to assassinate Napoleon Bonaparte, the first Consul of the French Republic; and, on being tried in England for libel, he was convicted, although the libel was purely political, affected no one in the British Isles, and attacked the man who at the time was England's greatest enemy. (3)

An indictment charging a person with encouraging persons unknown to murder the sovereigns and rulers of Europe was held good as a sufficiently well-defined class was referred to by the words "sovereigns of Europe." (3a)

136. Spreading false news.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to one year's imprisonment who wilfully and knowingly publishes any false news or tale whereby injury or mischief is or is likely to be occasioned to any public interest. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 126.

This is an old common law offence, prosecutions for which seem to have fallen out of practice. In 1778 there was a case of this kind in which the defendant was indicted for having unlawfully, wickedly and maliciously published false news,—whereby discord might grow between the king and his subjects or the great men of the realm,—by publishing and placarding a printed paper or notice falsely announcing that an order in council had been made by the king proclaiming war with France. (4)

It has been recently decided, in Canada, that the publication of a placard, stating that settlers from the United States are not wanted in Canada, is an injury to the public interest and that the person wilfully and knowingly publishing such false statement is guilty under the above section, 136, of spreading false news. (5)

137. Piracy by the law of nations.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence who does any act which amounts to piracy by the law of nations, and is liable.

(a) to the penalty of death, if in committing or attempting to commit such crime the offender murders, attempts to murder or wounds any person, or does any act by which the life of any person is likely to be endangered;

(b) to imprisonment for life in all other cases. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 127.

PIRACY AT COMMON LAW OR BY THE LAW OF NATIONS.—In reference to piracy the Royal Commissioners at p. 20 of their report on the English Draft Code say,—

"The Bill contained a definition of Piracy by the law of Nations. We have thought it better to leave this offence undefined, as no definition of it would be satisfactory which is not recognized as such by other nations; and after careful consideration of the subject we have not been able to discover a definition fulfiling such a condition. We may observe as to this that the subject has been much discussed in the Courts of the United States, and the result appears to justify the course we have adopted. We do not think it will lead to practical inconvenience."

Sir James F. Stephen says, in relation to this subject: "Piracy at common law or by the law of nations, is the only one of the offences mentioned" [piracy, slave trading, etc.], "which is not created by statute. There are singularities connected with the offence which I do not think it necessary to go into. The most authoritative definition of piracy in English law is 'robbery at sea,' but I think it is easy to shew that this is too wide in one direction and too narrow in another. If a foreign sailor on a foreign ship were to rob another sailor of the same nation on the same ship it would be absurd to call him a pirate, yet such an act would be robbery at sea; and if a piratical vessel were to attempt to capture a lawful ship and to be captured herself, it would be strange to describe her crew as anything but pirates, yet they would have committed, not what on shore would have been a robbery, but what would have been an assault with intent to rob." (1)

Robbery on the high seas, in order to constitute piracy, must be without authority from any prince or state. If a party making a capture at sea do so by the authority of any prince or state it cannot be considered piracy; for a nation can never be deemed pirates. Fixed domain, public revenue and a certain form of government exempt a people from that character. (2)

If the subjects of the same state, being in separate vessels, commit robbery upon each other upon the high sea, it is piracy. If the subjects of different states commit robbery upon each other upon the high sea, if their respective states be in amity, it is piracy; if at enmity it is not; for it is a general rule that enemies can never commit piracy upon each other, their depredations being deemed mere acts of hostility. (3)

PIRACY BY STATUTE.—The principal Imperial statutes relating to and making certain acts piracy are 28 Hen. VIII., c. 15; 11 Will. III., c. 7, s. 7; 8 Geo. I., c. 24, s. 1; 18 Geo. II., c. 30; 7 Will. IV. and 1 Vict., c 88, s. 2; 37 & 38 Vict., c. 35.

Slave trading is by the Imperial Act, 5 Geo. IV., c. 113, ss. 9 and 10, declared to be piracy; and the provisions thereof apply not only to acts done by British subjects in England and the British colonies in furtherance of the slave trade, but no acts done by them outside the British Dominions. (4)

Where certain pilots had, in collusion with the master of a vessel, cut away a cable for the purpose of defrauding the underwriters for the benefit of shipowners, they were held to be rightly convicted of piratically stealing the cable. (5)

138. Piratical acts.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for life who, within Canada, does piratical acts specified in this section, or who, having done any of such piratical acts, comes or is brought within Canada without having been tried therefor, that is to say:—

(a) Being a British subject, on the sea, or in any place within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England, under color of any commission from any foreign prince or state, whether such prince or state is at war with His Majesty or not, or under pretense of authority from any person whomsoever commits any act of hostility or robbery against other British subjects, or during any war is in any way adherent to or gives aid to His Majesty's enemies;

(b) Whether a British subject or not, on the sea or in any place within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England, enters into any British ship, and throws overboard, or destroys any part of the goods belonging to such ship, or laden on board the same;

(c) Being on board any British ship on the sea or in any place within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England,

(i) turns enemy or rebel, and piratically runs away with the ship, or any boat, ordnance, ammunition or goods,

(ii) yields up voluntarily any ship, boat, ordnance, ammunition or goods to any pirate,

(iii) brings any seducing message from any pirate, enemy or rebel,

(iv) counsels or procures any persons to yield up or run away with any ship, goods or merchandise, or to turn pirate or to go over to pirates,

(v) lays violent hands on the commander of any such ship, in order to prevent him from fighting in defence of his ship and goods,

(vi) confines the master or commander of any such ship;

(vii) makes or endeavors to make a revolt in the ship; or,

(d) Being a British subject in any part of the world, or whether a British subject or not, being in any part of His Majesty's dominions or on board a British ship, knowingly

(i) furnishes any pirate with any ammunition or stores of any kind,

(ii) fits out any ship or vessel with a design to trade with or supply or correspond with any pirate,

(iii) conspires or corresponds with any pirate. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 128.

It has been held in Nova Scotia that a charge against a seaman not a British subject on a British ship of inciting a revolt upon the ship on the high seas cannot, if taken under the above section only, be made without the consent of the Governor-General (under section 591, post), obtained prior to the laying of the information.—Mr. Justice Ritchie holding further that if the proceedings for such an offence are taken under the Imperial Merchants Shipping Act, 1894, section 686, section 591, post, would not apply and the consent of the Governor-General would not be necessary; but Mr. Justice Weatherbe held that section 591, post, applies to the procedure in Canadian Courts in respect of offences committed within the Admiralty jurisdiction, whether the proceedings are taken undr the Criminal Code or under the Imperial Merchants Shipping Act or the Imperial Admiralty Offence Act, 1849. (6)

139. Piratical acts with violence endangering life.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to suffer death who, in committing or attempting to commit any piratical act, assaults with intent to murder, or wounds, any person, or does any act likely to endanger the life of any person. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 129.

140. Not fighting pirates.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to six months' imprisonment, and to forfeit to the owner of the ship all wages then due to him, who, being a master, officer or seaman of any merchant ship which carries guns and arms, does not, when attacked by any pirate, fight and endeavor to defend himself and his vessel from being taken by such pirate, or who discourages others from defending the ship, if by reason thereof the ship falls into the hands of such pirate. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 130.

Conveying Liquor on Board His Majesty's Ships.

141. Taking or attempting to take liquor on board.—Every one is guilty of an offence and liable, on summary conviction before two justices, to a fine not exceeding fifty dollars for each offence, and in default of payment to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one month, with or without hard labor, who, without the previous consent of the officer commanding the ship or vessel,—

(a) conveys any intoxicating liquor on board any of His Majesty's ships or vessels; or,

(b) approaches or hovers about any of His Majesty's ships or vessels for the purpose of conveying any such liquor on board thereof; or,

(c) gives or sells to any man in His Majesty's service, on board any such ship or vessel, any intoxicating liquor. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 119.

R. S., c. 151, s. 1.

Proclamation.

2. The governor in council may, in like manner, from time to time, declare this Part, or any section or sections thereof, to be no longer in force in any such place, and may, again, from time to time, declare this Part, or any section or sections thereof, to be in force therein.

3. No such proclamation shall have effect within the limits of any city.

4. All Courts, magistrates and justices shall take judicial notice of every such proclamation. R. S., c. 151, s. 2.

See the Governor-General's proclamation published in the Canada Gazette of the 22nd of June, 1907, bringing into force,—in certain parts of the provinces of Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec on and adjacent to the National Transcontinental Railway,—the provisions of the present Part III., except sections 144 to 159 thereof.

Weapons.

144. Delivery of arms.—On or before the day named in such proclamation every person employed on or about the public work to which the same relates, shall bring and deliver up, to some commissioner or officer appointed for the purposes of this Part, every weapon in his possession, and shall obtain from such commissioner or officer a receipt for the same. R. S., c. 151, s. 3.

145. Seizure of arms not delivered.—Every weapon found in the possession of any person employed, as aforesaid, after the day named in any proclamation and within the limits designated in such proclamation, may be seized by any justice, commissioner, constable or other peace officer, and shall be forfeited to the use of His Majesty. R. S., c. 151, s. 4.

146. Possessing weapons near public works.—Every one employed upon or about any public work, within any place in which this Part is in force, who, upon or after the day named in such proclamation, keeps or has in his possession or under his care or control within any such place, any weapon, is liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding four dollars and not less than two dollars for every such weapon found in his possession or under his care or control. R. S., c. 151, s. 5; 55-56 V., s. 29, s. 117.

147. Receiving or concealing arms, with intent.—Every one who, for the purpose of defeating the enforcement of this Part, receives or conceals, or aids in receiving or concealing, or procures to be received or concealed, within any place in which this Part is in force, any weapon belonging to or in the custody of any person employed on or about any public work, is liable, on summary conviction, to a penalty not exceeding one hundred dollars and not less than forty dollars; and a moiety of such penalty shall belong to the informer and the other moiety to His Majesty, for the public uses of Canada. R. S., c. 151, s. 6; 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 117.

148. Employees carrying weapons.—Every person employed on any public work found carrying any weapon within any place in which this Part is at the time in force, for purposes dangerous to the public peace, is guilty of an indictable offence. R. S., c. 151, s. 7.

149. Return of weapons when this Part ceases to be in force.—Whenever this Part ceases to be in force within the place where any weapon has been delivered and detained in pursuance thereof, or whenever the owner or person lawfully entitled to any such weapon satisfies the commissioner that he is about to remove immediately from the limits within which this Part is at the time in force, the commissioner may deliver up to the owner or person authorized to receive the same, any such weapon, on production of the receipt given for it. R. S., c. 151, s. 11.

See sections 609 to 612, post, as to arrest of persons carrying weapons in proclaimed district, and as to warrants to search for and seize weapons.

Intoxicating Liquor.

150. Retail sale of liquor prohibited.—Upon and after the day named in such proclamation and during such period as the proclamation remains in force, no person shall at any place within the limits specified in the proclamation, sell, barter, or, directly or indirectly for any matter, thing, profit or reward, exchange, supply or dispose of or shall give to any other person, any intoxicating liquor, or shall expose, keep or have in his possession any intoxicating liquor intended to be dealt with in any such way.

2. The provisions of this section shall not extend to any person selling intoxicating liquor by wholesale, and not retailing it, if the said person is a licensed distiller or brewer, nor shall they apply where liquor is supplied for bona fide medicinal purposes upon the prescription of a duly qualified medical practitioner. R. S., c. 151, s. 14; 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 118. (As amended by the 6 and 7 Ed. VII., c. 9, s. 2).

151. Penalty.—Every one who, by himself, his clerk, servant, agent or other person, violates any of the provisions of the last preceding section, is guilty of an offence against this Part and liable on summary conviction to a penalty of fifty dollars and costs, and, in default of payment, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months; and, upon any subsequent conviction, to a penalty of one hundred dollars and costs, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months, or to both, and, in default of payment of such penalty, to imprisonment or to further imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months, and imprisonment in each case shall be either with or without hard labor. R. S., c. 151, s. 14; 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 118. (As amended by 6-7 Ed. VII., c. 9, s. 3).

152. Agent's liability.—Every clerk, servant, agent or other person who, being in the employment of or on the premises of another person, violates or assists in violating any of the said provisions for the person in whose employment or on whose premises he is, shall be equally guilty with such person, and shall be liable to the punishment mentioned in the last preceding section. R. S., c. 151, s. 15; 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 118.

153. Recovery of money, etc., paid for liquor.—Any payment or compensation, whether in money or securities for money, labor or property of any kind, for intoxicating liquor sold, bartered, exchanged, supplied or disposed of, contrary to the provisions aforesaid, shall be held to have been criminally received without consideration, and against law, equity and good conscience, and the amount or value thereof may be recovered from the receiver by the person making, paying or furnishing such payment or compensation. R. S., c. 151, s. 18.

154. Transfers for liquor void.—All sales, transfers, conveyances, liens and securities of every kind, which either in whole or in part have been made or given for or on account of intoxicating liquors sold, bartered, exchanged, supplied or disposed of contrary to such provisions shall be void against all persons, and no right shall be acquired thereby.

2. No action of any kind shall be maintained, either in whole or in part, for or on account of intoxicating liquor sold, bartered, exchanged, supplied or disposed of, contrary to the said provisions. R. S., c. 151, s. 18.

See sections 613 and 614, post, as to warrants to search for and seize liquor in proclaimed district, and as to the forfeiture and destruction of liquor so seized.

PART IV.

OFFENCES AGAINST THE ADMINISTRATION OF LAW AND JUSTICE.

Interpretation.

155. Definitions.—In this part unless the context otherwise requires:—

(a) 'the government' includes the government of Canada, and the government of any province of Canada, as well as His Majesty in the right of Canada or of any province thereof, and the Commissioners of the Transcontinental Railway;

(b) 'official or person in the employment of the government and 'official or employee of the government,' extend to and include the Commissioners of the Transcontinental Railway and the persons holding office as such commissioners, and the engineers, officials, officers, employees and servants of the said commissioners;

(c) 'office' includes every office in the gift of the Crown or of any officer appointed by the Crown, and all commissions, civil, naval and military, and all places or employments in any public department or office whatever, and all deputations to any such office and every participation in the profits of any office or deputation. 55-56 V., c. 29, ss. 133 and 137; 6 E. VII., c. 7, s. 1.

Corruption and Disobedience.

156. Judicial corruption.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to fourteen years' imprisonment who,—

(a) holding any judicial office, or being a member of Parliament or of a legislature, corruptly accepts or obtains, or agrees to accept, or attempts to obtain for himself or any other person, any money or valuable consideration, office, place, or employment on account of anything already done or omitted, or to be afterwards done or omitted, by him in his judicial capacity, or in his capacity as such member; or,

(b) corruptly gives or offers to any such person or to any other person, any such bribe as aforesaid on account of any such act or omission. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 131.

No prosecution for any offence under this section can be instituted without the leave of the Attorney-General of Canada. (Sec. 593, post).

In reference to the offences dealt with under this present title the Royal Commissioners, in their report on the English Draft Code, say, "Title III. deals with offences affecting the administration of justice, by way of corrupting judicial or ministerial officers, by disobeying lawful orders, by deceiving courts, by perjury and other means of the same kind, or by escaping or rescuing others from lawful custody. In a general code of the criminal law we have thought it right to include the offence of judicial corruption, and to subject it to severe and infamous punishment. As no case of the kind has occurred (if we except the prosecutions of Lord Bacon and Lord Macclesfield), it is not surprising that the law on the subject should be somewhat vague. We have thought it right in order to protect persons holding judicial positions from malicious prosecutions to provide that no prosecution for this offence shall be instituted except by leave of the Attorney-General. * * * We have also provided for the punishment of corruption in ministerial officers connected with the administration of justice. Recent experience has shewn that the punishment awarded for such offences by the common law is not sufficiently severe." (See pp. 20-21 of the Commissioners' Report).

157. Corruption of officers employed in prosecuting offenders.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to fourteen years' imprisonment who,—

(a) being a justice, peace officer, or public officer, employed in any capacity for the prosecution or detention or punishment of offenders, corruptly accepts or obtains, or agrees to accept or attempt to obtain for himself, or for any other person, any money or valuable consideration, office, place or employment, with the intent to interfere corruptly with the due administration of justice, or to procure or facilitate the commission of any crime, or to protect from detection or punishment any person having committed or intending to commit any crime, or

(b) corruptly gives or offers to any officer aforesaid any such bribe as aforesaid with any such intent. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 132.

Under section 2 [28], "PEACE OFFICER" includes a mayor, warden, reeve, sheriff, deputy sheriff, sheriff's officer, and justice of the peace, and also the warden, keeper or guard of a penitentiary, and the gaoler or keeper of any prison, and any police officer, police constable, bailiff, constable, or other person employed for the preservation and maintenance of the public peace, or for the service or execution of civil process."

Under section 2 [29], "PUBLIC OFFICER," includes any inland revenue or Customs officer, officer of the army, navy, marine, militia, North-West mounted police or other officer engaged in enforcing the laws relating to the revenue, customs, trade or navigation of Canada."

It has been held, by the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, that evidence of corrupt motive must be adduced in order to obtain leave to exhibit a criminal information against a justice of the peace for malfeasance of office. (1)

(1) R. v. Currie, 11 Can. Cr. Cas., 343.

158. Frauds upon the Government.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a fine of not less than one hundred dollars, and not exceeding one thousand dollars, and to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year and not less than one month, and in default of payment of such fine to imprisonment for a further time not exceeding six months who—

(a) makes any offer, proposal, gift, loan, or promise, or gives or offers any compensation or consideration, directly or indirectly, to any official or person in the employment of the Government, or to any member of his family, or to any person under his control or for his benefit, with intent to obtain the assistance or influence of such official or person to promote either the procuring of any contract with the Government, for the performance of any work, the doing of any thing, or the furnishing of any goods, effects, food or materials, the execution of any such contract, or the payment of the price, or consideration stipulated therein, or any part thereof, or of any aid or subsidy, payable in respect thereof; or

(b) being an official or person in the employment of the Government, directly or indirectly, accepts or agrees to accept or allows to be accepted by any person under his control, or for his benefit, any such offer, proposal, gift, loan, promise, compensation or consideration; or

(c) in the case of tenders being called for by or on behalf of the Government, for the performance of any work, the doing of any thing, or the furnishing of any goods, effects, food or materials, directly or indirectly, by himself or by the agency of any other person on his behalf, with intent to obtain the contract therefor, either for himself or for any other person, offers to make, or makes, any gift, loan, offer or promise, or offers or gives any consideration or compensation whatsoever to any person tendering for such work or other service, or to any member of his family, or other person for his benefit, to induce such person to withdraw his tender for such work or other service, or to compensate or reward him for having withdrawn such tender; or

(d) in case of tendering for the performance of any work, the doing of anything, or the furnishing of any goods, effects, food or materials, for the Government when tenders are called for by or on behalf of the Government, accepts or receives, directly or indirectly, or permits or allows to be accepted or received by any member of his family, or by any other person under his control, or for his benefit, any such gift, loan, offer, promise, consideration or compensation, as a consideration or reward for withdrawing or for having withdrawn such tender; or,

(e) being an official or employee of the Government, receives, directly or indirectly, whether personally or by or through any member of his family or person under his control or for his benefit, any gift, loan, promise, compensation or consideration whatsoever, either in money or otherwise, from any person whomsoever, for assisting or favoring any individual in the transaction of any business whatsoever with the Government, or who gives or offers any such gift, loan, promise, compensation or consideration; or,

(f) by reason of, or under the pretense of, possessing influence with the Government, or with any minister or official thereof, demands, exacts or receives from any person, any compensation, fee or reward, for procuring from the Government the payment of any claim, or of any portion thereof, or for procuring or furthering the appointment of himself or of any other person, to any office, place or employment, or for procuring or furthering the obtaining for himself or any other person, of any grant, lease or other benefit from the Government; or offers, promises or pays to such person, under the circumstances and for the causes aforesaid, or any of them, any such compensation, fee or reward; or,

(g) having dealings of any kind with the Government through any department thereof, pays to any employee or official of the Government, or to any member of the family of such employee or official, or to any person under his control or for his benefit, any commission or reward; or within one year before or after such dealings, without the express permission in writing of the head of the department with which such dealings have been had, the proof of which permission shall lie upon him, makes any gift, loan, or promise of any money, matter or thing, to any such employee or other person aforesaid; or,

(h) being an employee or official of the Government, demands, exacts or receives from such person, directly or indirectly, by himself, or by or through any other person for his benefit, or permits or allows any member of his family, or any person under his control, to accept or receive

(i) any such commission or reward, or

(ii) within the said period of one year, without the express permission in writing of the head of the department with which such dealings have been had, the proof of which permission shall lie upon him, accepts or receives any such gift, loan or promise; or,

(i) having any contract with the Government for the performance of any work, the doing of anything, or the furnishing of any goods, effects, food or materials, and having or expecting to have any claim or demand against the Government by reason of such contract, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any person on his behalf, subscribes, furnishes or gives, or promises to subscribe, furnish or give, any money or other valuable consideration for the purpose of promoting the election of any candidate, or of any number, class or party of candidates to a legislature or to Parliament, or with the intent in any way of influencing or affecting the result of a provincial or Dominion election.

2. If the value of the amount or thing paid, offered, given, loaned, promised, received or subscribed, as the case may be, exceeds one thousand dollars, the offender under this section is liable to any fine not exceeding such value. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 133; 56 V., c. 32, s. 1.

No prosecution for any offence under this section can be commenced after the expiration of two years from its commission. (Sec. 1140b, post).

159. Other consequences.—Every person convicted of an offence under the last preceding section shall be incapable of contracting with the Government, or of holding any contract or office with, from, or under it, or of receiving any benefit under any such contract. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 134.

160. Breach of trust by public officer.—Every public officer is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to five years' imprisonment who, in the discharge of the duties of his office, commits any fraud or breach of trust affecting the public, whether such fraud or breach of trust would have been criminal or not if committed against a private person. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 135.

161. Municipal corruption.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars and not less than one hundred dollars, and to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years and not less than one month, and in default of payment of such fine to imprisonment for a further term not exceeding six months, who directly or indirectly,—

(a) makes any offer, proposal, gift, loan, promise or agreement to pay or give any money or other material compensation or consideration to any member of a municipal council, whether the same is to enure to his own advantage or to the advantage of any other person, for the purpose of inducing such member either to vote or to abstain from voting at any meeting of the council of which he is a member or at any meeting of a committee of such council, in favor of or against any measure, motion, resolution or question submitted to such council or committee; or,

(b) makes any offer, proposal, gift, loan, promise or agreement to pay or give any money or other material compensation or consideration to any member or to any officer of a municipal council for the purpose of inducing him to aid in procuring or preventing the passing of any vote or the granting of any contract or advantage in favor of any person; or,

(c) makes any offer, proposal, gift, loan, promise or agreement to pay or give any money or other material compensation or consideration to any officer of a municipal council for the purpose of inducing him to perform or abstain from performing, or to aid in procuring or preventing the performance of, any official act; or,

(d) being a member or officer of a municipal council, accepts, or consents to accept any such offer, proposal, gift, loan, promise, agreement, compensation or consideration in this section mentioned; or in consideration thereof votes or abstains from voting in favor of or against any measure, motion, resolution or question, or performs or abstains from performing any official act; or,

(e) attempts by any threat, deceit, suppression of the truth or other unlawful means to influence any member of a municipal council in giving or withholding his vote in favor of or against any measure, motion, resolution or question, or in not attending any meeting of the municipal council of which he is a member, or of any committee thereof; or,

(f) attempts by any such means as in the last preceding paragraph mentioned to influence any member or any officer of a municipal council to aid in procuring or preventing the passing of any vote or the granting of any contract or advantage in favor of any person, or to perform or abstain from performing or to aid in procuring or preventing the performance of, any official act. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 136.

No prosecution for any offence under this section can be commenced after the expiration of two years from its commission. (Sec. 1140*b*, post).

162. Selling or purchasing office.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence who, directly or indirectly,—

(a) sells or agrees to sell any appointment to or resignation of any office, or any consent to any such appointment or resignation, or receives, or agrees to receive, any reward or profit from the sale thereof; or,

(b) purchase or gives any reward or profit for the purchase of any such appointment, resignation or consent, or agrees or promises to do so;

and in addition to any other penalty incurred, forfeits any right which he may have in the office and is disabled for life from holding the same. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 137.

163. Corrupt negotiations about offices.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence who, directly or indirectly,—

(a) receives or agrees to receive any reward or profit for any interest, request or negotiation about any office, or under pretense of using any such interest, making any such request or being concerned in any such negotiation; or,

(b) gives or procures to be given any profit or reward, or makes or procures to be made any agreement for the giving of any profit or reward, for any such interest, request or negotiation as aforesaid; or,

(c) solicits, recommends or negotiates in any manner as to any appointment to or resignation of any office in expectation of any reward or profit; or,

(d) keeps any office or place for transacting or negotiating any business relating to vacancies in, or the sale or purchase of, or appointment to or resignation of offices. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 137.

A person convicted of an offence under this section is liable to five years' imprisonment. (Sec. 1052, post).

Illicit or Secret Commissions.

The Secret Commissions Act, 1909, contains the following provisions against the payment or acceptance of illicit or secret commissions and other like practices:—

SEC. 2.—In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires,— (a) "consideration" includes valuable consideration of any kind;

(b) "agent" means any person employed by or acting for another, and includes a person serving under the Crown or under any municipal or other corporation;

(c) "principal" includes an employer.

SEC. 3.—Everyone is guilty of an offence and liable, upon conviction on indictment, to two years' imprisonment, or to a fine not exceeding two thousand five hundred dollars, or to both, and, upon summary conviction, to imprisonment for six months, with or without hard labor, or to a fine not exceeding one hundred dollars, or to both, who.—

(a) being an agent, corruptly accepts or obtains, or agrees to accept or attempts to obtain, from any person, for himself or for any other person, any gift or consideration as an inducement or reward for doing or forbearing to do, or for having after the passing of this Act done or forborne to do, any act relating to his principal's affairs or business, or for showing or forbearing to show favor or disfavor to any person with relation to his principal's affairs or business; or,

(b) corruptly gives or agrees to give or offers any gift or consideration to any agent as an inducement or reward or consideration to such agent for doing or forbearing to do, or for having after the passing of this Act done or forborne to do, any act relating to his principal's affairs or business, or for showing or forbearing to show favor or disfavor to any person with relation to his principal's affairs or business; or,

(c) knowingly gives to any agent, or, being an agent, knowingly uses with intent to deceive his principal, any receipt, account, or other document in respect of which the principal is interested, and which contains any statement which is false or erroneous or defective in any material particular, and which, to his knowledge, is intended to mislead the principal;

(d) every person who is a party or knowingly privy to any offence under this Act shall be guilty of such offence and shall be liable upon conviction to the punishment hereinbefore provided for by this section.

SEC. 4.—This Act shall be read as if its provisions formed part of The Criminal Code.

CRIMINAL CODE (resumed).

164. Disobeying a statute.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to one year's imprisonment who, without lawful excuse, disobeys any Act of Parliament of Canada or of any legislature in Canada, by wilfully doing any act which it forbids, or omitting to do any act which it requires to be done, unless some penalty or other mode of punishment is expressly provided by law. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 138.

The disobedience must be shewn to be wilful. (2)

A person who, without lawful excuse, wilfully and corruptly votes more than once at a municipal election for city aldermen by general vote under the Ontario Municipal Act, is guilty of the indictable offence of disobeying a statute. (3)

The manager of a corporation is not criminally liable as for wilful disobedience of a statute in respect of the corporation's neglect, not due to any active participation, on his part, to perform a statutory duty imposed upon it. (4)

165. Disobedience of orders of court.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to one year's imprisonment who, without lawful excuse, disobeys any lawful order other than for the payment of money made by any court of justice, or by any person or body of persons authorized by any statute to make or give such order, unless some penalty is imposed, or other mode or proceeding is expressly provided, by law. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 139.

(3) R. v. Meehan, (No. 2), 5 Can. Cr. Cas., 312.
(4) R. v. Hays, 12 Can. Cr. Cas., 423.

166. Misconduct of officers in executing writs.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a fine and imprisonment who, being a sheriff, deputy-sheriff, coroner, elisor, bailiff, constable or other officer entrusted with the execution of any writ, warrant or process, wilfully misconducts himself in the execution of the same, or wilfully, and without the consent of the person in whose favor the writ, warrant or process was issued, makes any false return thereto. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 143.

Under the terms of section 1052, post, the length of imprisonment to which an offender against this section is liable is 5 years; and, under section 1029, post, the amount of the fine is in the discretion of the Court or person passing sentence.

Peace Officers.

167. Neglect to aid peace officer in arresting offenders.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to six months' imprisonment who, having reasonable notice that he is required to assist any sheriff, deputy-sheriff, mayor or other head officer, justice, magistrate, or peace officer, in the execution of his duty in arresting any person, or in preserving the peace, without reasonable excuse omits to do so. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 142.

An indictment for refusing to aid a constable charged that B was in the custody of C, a constable, upon a criminal charge, and that the said B committed an assault upon the said constable and a breach of the peace with intent to resist lawful apprehension, that the constable called upon A, the defendant, for assistance in order to prevent the said assault and breach of the peace and that the defendant did unlawfully and knowingly refuse to aid and assist the said constable in the execution of his duty or to prevent an assault and breach of the peace. Held, that the indictment was sufficient to sustain a conviction, without stating how the apprehension became lawful. (5)

To support an indictment against an accused for refusing to aid and assist a constable in the execution of his duty in quelling a riot, it is necessary to prove,—1, that the constable saw a breach of the peace being committed; 2, that there was reasonable necessity for calling upon the accused for his assistance; 3, that, when duly called upon to assist the constable, the accused, without any physical impossibility or lawful excuse, refused to do so; and, in such a case, it is no ground of defence that from the number of the rioters the single aid of the accused would not have been of any use. (6).

168. Obstructing public officer in execution of his duty.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to ten years' imprisonment who resists or wilfully obstructs any public officer in the execution of his duty or any person acting in aid of such officer. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 144.

(6) R. v. Brown, C. & M., 314; Warb. L. Cas., 4th Ed., 97.

169. Obstructing peace officer.—Every one who resists or wilfully obstructs,—

(a) any peace officer in the execution of his duty or any person acting in aid of such officer;

(b) any person in the lawful execution of any process against any lands or goods, or in making any lawful distress or seizure, is guilty of an offence punishable on indictment or on summary conviction, and liable if convicted on indictment to two years' imprisonment, and, on summary conviction before two justices to six months' imprisonment with hard labor, or to a fine of one hundred dollars. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 144.

For the distinction between "public officer" and "peace officer," see section 2, sub-sections 26 and 29, pp. 6, 7, ante.

On the trial of an indictment for the obstruction of a bailiff in the lawful execution of a writ of replevin, it appeared that the bailiff had, under the writ of replevin in question, obtained possession of the goods from the defendant in the action, but had, at the defendants' suggestion, left them in the possession of a third party, the prisoner taking from the latter an agreement to deliver back the goods to the bailiff when called upon: and it appeared that when the bailiff returned and demanded the goods and attempted to get them, he was prevented by the prisoner who refused his getting them. Held, that the bailiff was acting under the agreement, and was not a person acting in the lawful execution of any process against goods under the above section. (7)

It has been held that, in order to support a charge of assault on a constable in the execution of his duty, it is not necessary that the accused should know that he was a constable then in the execution of his duty; it is sufficient that the constable should have been actually in the execution of his duty and was then assaulted. (8)

In the province of Manitoba, it was held that the offence of resisting or obstructing a peace officer punishable under the above section 169 (section 144, sub-section 2 of the old Code), could only be tried by a magistrate having the powers of two justices as set forth in section 771*a* (section 782*a* of the old Code), by following the procedure of Part XVI. (old Code, Part LV.), as to summary trials of indictable offences, and that where the charge was brought before an official empowered to proceed on a summary trial only upon the consent of the accused, the "summary convictions" clauses of the Code, Part LVIII. of the old Code (new Code, Part XV.), did not enable such official to proceed summarily as a justice of the peace. (9)

This decision was followed in a Nova Scotia case. (10)

But it is opposed to some British Columbia decisions to the effect that the offence of obstructing a peace officer in the performance of his duty—where an assault upon the officer is not also charged,—may be summarily tried by two justices of the peace or a police magistrate under the summary convictions part of the Code, by virtue of section 144 of the old Code (new Code, section 169), and that this section is not controlled by the provisions of section 783 of the old Code, (new Code section 773), and section 788 of the old Code (new Code, section 781), as to the summary trial of the like offence. (1)

It should, however, be observed that, in British Columbia and in Prince Edward Island, Saskatchewan and Alberta, and in the North-West Territories, and the Yukon Territory, the jurisdiction of the magistrate is,—by section 776 post, (old Code, section 784, sub-section 3),—made absolute, without the consent of the accused, except in certain cases there mentioned.

It is necessary for the prosecution to prove that rent was due and in arrear before a conviction can be made under section 144 (now section 169) of the Code for the offence of wilfully obstructing a lawful distress. (2)

On such a charge evidence is admissible for the defence in proof that no rent was due. (3)

The retaking of possession by a vendor of goods, under a contract for the conditional sale of them, is not within the term "lawful distress or seizure" as used in clause (b) of section 169 and an obstruction of the vendor's bailiff in regaining such possession is not an offence under the section. (4)

Where the process of an inferior court is void by reason of its containing a direction to a peace officer to seize certain goods at a place outside of the territorial jurisdiction of the court, such process is sufficient, upon which to base a conviction for resisting the officer in its execution. (5)

Where a bystander states, to other bystanders, in the hearing of a peace officer making an arrest for drunkenness, that the person being arrested is not drunk, such statement does not constitute the offence of obstructing a peace officer, if the statement was made bona fide and in the belief of its truth. If, in an unwarranted attempt of the police to arrest a bystander, the latter strikes the policeman, he is not guilty of an assault upon a peace officer in the execution of his duty; for the policeman has no duty to arrest him. (6)

A person who obstructs or impedes an officer of a railway company in the execution of his duty upon any of the premises of the company is liable to fine or imprisonment under the Railway Act, and it is an obstruction of the railway officer for a cabman, having no right on the railway cab-stand, to refuse to move away from the same with his cab on the demand of the officer whose duty it was to enforce the company's regulations as to the station property. (7)

Misleading Justice.

170. Perjury defined.—Perjury is an assertion as to a matter of fact, opinion, belief or knowledge, made by a witness in a judicial proceeding as part of his evidence, upon oath or affirmation, whether such evidence is given in open court, or by affidavit or otherwise, and whether such evidence is material or not, such assertion being known to such witness to be false, and being intended by him to mislead the court, jury or person holding the proceeding.

2. SUBORNATION OF PERJURY DEFINED.—Subornation of perjury is counselling or procuring a person to commit any perjury which is actually committed.

3. EVIDENCE DEFINED.—Evidence in this section includes evidence given on the voir dire and evidence given before a grand jury. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 145.

171. Witness defined.—Every person is a witness within the meaning of the last preceding section who actually gives his evidence, whether he was competent to be a witness or not, and whether his evidence was admissible or not.

2. JUDICIAL PROCEEDING.—Every proceeding is judicial within the meaning of the last preceding section which is held in or under the authority of any court of justice, or before a grand jury, or before either the Senate or House of Commons of Canada, or any committee of either the Senate or House of Commons, or before any legislative council, legislative assembly or house of assembly or any committee thereof, empowered by law to administer an oath, or before any justice, or any arbitrator or umpire, or any person or body of persons authorized by law or by any statute in force for the time being to make an inquiry and take evidence therein upon oath, or before any legal tribunal by which any legal right or liability can be established, or before any person acting as a court, justice or tribunal, having power to hold such judicial proceeding, whether duly constituted or not, and whether the proceeding was duly instituted or not before such court or person so as to authorize it or him to hold the proceeding, and although such proceeding was held in a wrong place or was otherwise invalid. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 145.

The effect of these sections seems to be to make it perjury to swear or affirm in any judicial proceeding (valid or invalid), to any verbal or written statement of a matter of fact, opinion, belief or knowledge, whether material or admissible or not, and which the deponent or affirmant knows to be false, and is intended by him to mislead justice.

The false statement to constitute perjury must be sworn or affirmed in some judicial proceeding. False oaths, affirmations and solemn declarations, taken or made in other matters than judicial proceedings, are dealt with under sections 175 and 176, post. See also the special provisions of section 172, post.

It is perjury to give false testimony before a justice of the peace holding a judicial proceeding under a provincial law, although the justice was by the terms of that law disqualified from hearing the charge by reason of not being a resident of the county in which the alleged offence took place. (1)

(1) R. v. Drew (No. 1), 6 Can. Cr. Cas., 241. Affirmed in appeal (Sup. Ct. of Can.), R. v. Drew (No. 2) 6 Can. Cr. Cas., 424; 33 S. C. R., 228.

Where an accused, on his trial before a magistrate, raises no objection to the want of an information or the regularity of his arrest, his evidence given on the hearing of the charge is evidence in a "judicial proceeding," notwithstanding the lack of an information and the irregularity of his arrest. (2)

It has been held, in England, that an arbitration before a County Court Judge under the Imperial Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, is a judicial proceeding. (3)

Where an order was made under the Guardians Appointment Act of British Columbia for the cross-examination on an affidavit, it was held that the judicial proceeding ended when the Registrar, after swearing the witness, left the room in which the cross-examination was being held, the official shorthand writer being left to take the cross-examination in shorthand; and a false statement under oath so made in the absence of the Registrar cannot be made the foundation of a charge of perjury. (4)

Counselling a person to commit perjury is not subornation of perjury, unless the perjury counselled is actually committed, but it is punishable as an incitement to give false evidence, which is an offence at common law. (5)

Perjury may be assigned in respect of an examination for discovery in a civil action; an examination for discovery being a judicial proceeding. (6)

The Royal Commissioners say that, in framing the section of their draft code relating to perjury, they proceeded on the principle that the guilt and danger of perjury consist in attempting by falsehood to mislead a tribunal de facto exercising judicial functions and that it seemed to them "not desirable that a person who has done this should escape from punishment, if he can shew some defect in the constitution of the tribunal which he sought to mislead, or some error in the proceedings themselves." (See p. 21 of the Commissioners' Report).

The words "and whether such evidence is material or not," forming part of the first paragraph of the above section do not appear in the corresponding section of the English Draft Code; and our law is thus made in positive terms, altogether different, on this point, from the law of England, under which the false swearing, to constitute perjury, must not only be in a judicial proceeding before a competent tribunal, but the evidence, or that part of it which is charged as false, must have been material to the matter which at the time of the swearing was in issue in such judicial proceeding. (7)

The offence of perjury cannot be founded on a mere oath of office. Hawkins says, "The notion of perjury is confined to such public oaths only as affirm or deny some matter of fact contrary to the knowledge of the party, and therefore it doth not extend to any promissory oaths whatsoever. From which it clearly follows that no officer, public or private, who neglects to execute his office in pursuance of his oath, or acts contrary to the purport of it, is indictable for perjury in respect of such oath; yet it is certain that his offence is highly aggravated by being contrary to his oath, and therefore that he is liable to the severer fine on that account." (8)

Oaths and Affirmations.—"An oath has been defined to be a person's solemn asseveration, uttered in an appeal to the Supreme Being under the sanction of his religion, that a thing stated or to be stated by him is true, made to a civil officer authorized to receive it; and an affirmation is a modern statutory device whereby those whose consciences are offended by such an appeal to God place themselves without it in the like civil position with those who have taken the oath. It is similar to the oath but omits the appeal to the Deity, and substitutes the word 'affirm' for the word 'swear.'" (9)

Under the Canada Evidence Act, (10) a witness who objects, on grounds of conscientious scruples, to take an oath may, instead of being sworn, solemnly affirm to tell the truth; and his evidence is to have the same effect and render him liable to the same punishment for perjury as if he were sworn.

With regard to false evidence in judicial proceedings the following are some instances of those who have been held guilty or not guilty of perjury in that respect:—

ILLUSTRATIONS.

It has been held that one commits perjury.—

(a) who makes, in any civil or criminal case, a false affidavit upon oath or affirmation in support of a plea; or in support of a motion for new trial; or in aid of a petition for a writ of habeas corpus; or in support of an information or complaint charging a criminal offence against another to procure his arrest; (1)

(b) who being offered as bail or other surety swears or affirms falsely so as to qualify himself; (2)

(c) who, as a juror, swears falsely as to his competency. (3)

A proceeding before a local marine board sitting under the Merchants Shipping Act, 1854, and having power to suspend or cancel the certificates of the masters and mates of ships has been held to be a judicial proceeding. (4)

The administering of an oath by a returning officer to a voter at a civic election has been held not to be a judicial proceeding. (5)

But see section 172, post, which makes it perjury to take a false oath in relation to other matters than a judicial proceeding; and see the case of R. v. Chamberlain cited at page 159, post, as to false swearing at an election.

A charge of perjury cannot be sustained against a boy under fourteen without proof of guilty knowledge of wrong doing. (6)

INDICTMENT.—For an example of the manner of charging the offence of perjury in an indictment, see Form 64, paragraph e, of Part XXV., post.

An indictment or charge for perjury in which it is alleged that the accused committed perjury by falsely, wilfully and with intent to mislead the magistrate, swearing to a certain statement, involves a charge that the accused knew such statement to be false, and will not be quashed for failure to more specifically charge such knowledge. (1*a*)

An indictment for perjury is not bad by reason of the omission to allege therein that the perjury was committed with intent to deceive or mislead. (2*a*)

It is not essential that an information for perjury should set out the exact words of the false statement in testimony taken viva voce; the charge may be properly stated by summarizing what was in effect the false evidence specifying the tribunal and the time and place at which the same was given, and charging that thereby the accused "unlawfully committed perjury. (3)

A charge of perjury is defective as not disclosing a crime, if it does not allege that the statement was sworn to knowing the same to be false. (4)

INTENT.—An intent to mislead the tribunal is an essential ingredient of the offence; but a charge which does not specifically allege such intent may be sufficient, if it give the accused notice that he is charged with having falsely, wilfully and corruptly sworn to, or solemnly declared a statement to the effect and in the words set forth. (5)

If a man swears to a thing of which consciously he knows nothing, he commits perjury; for the declaration of a witness is that he knows the truth of what he says,—that is, that it is to his knowledge that what he says is true,—and if he is really conscious that he does not know it he means to swear falsely. (6)

Where professional advice is honestly acted upon, it may negative the intent to testify falsely. Thus, where a lawyer reduces a man's oral statement to writing and the latter having confidence in the former swears to the writing under the impression that it does not differ in meaning from the oral words, there is no perjury, though in fact it does differ and is wrong. (7) And if through a mistake of one who draws up an affidavit or through a misreading of it to the deponent, or from any other cause the latter in good faith believes its contents to be what they are not, he does not become a perjurer by swearing to a falsehood therein, while understanding it to be something else which is true. (8)

PROOF.—On a charge of perjury committed at the trial of an indictment, such trial and the indictment, verdict and judgment therein must be proved as matters of record. Such proof may be given either by the production of the original record or of an exemplification thereof, or by a certificate under section 979 (old Code, section 691), of the substance and effect of the indictment and trial. (9)

The viva voce testimony of the clerk of assize and of the official stenographer, with the production of the official book of entry in which the clerk recorded his memoranda of the proceedings and of the stenographer's notes of the evidence, are insufficient as legal proof of the fact of the former trial. (10)

Where perjury is charged as having been committed on a summary trial for an indictable offence, the formal record of such summary trial must be proved in the perjury case, although the latter is tried summarily by the same magistrate; (1) and, on a charge of perjury committed in summary proceedings before a police magistrate, the fact of the trial at which the perjury was alleged to have been committed and the proceedings had thereon may, if no formal record was made up, be proved by the oral testimony of the magistrate and the production of the notes of the evidence. (2)

Upon a charge of perjury in respect of evidence taken by a magistrate on requiring sureties to keep the peace, the false statement may be proved by oral testimony, although not recorded in the minutes of evidence then made by the magistrate. (3*a*)

(3*a*) R. v. Doyle, 12 Can. Cr. Cas. 69.

The averment in an indictment for perjury must be proved precisely. So that where an indictment charged the prisoner with having sworn that he saw W. "about 15 minutes past 11 in the forenoon" on a particular day, and the proof was that he had sworn that he saw W. about a quarter past 11 on the day in question, but had not sworn whether it was in the forenoon or in the afternoon, it was held that the evidence being ambiguous, the averment in the indictment was not proved. (4)

A person charged with perjury committed in a civil action is entitled to have put in evidence those parts of his testimony in the civil action which may explain or qualify the statements in respect of which the perjury is charged. (5)

It is not essential to the offence of perjury that the notary or other official should have uttered the words of obligation in administering the oath; such words used by the deponent, and accompanied by a request that the affidavit already signed by the deponent should be certified as sworn, will be sufficient. (6)

To sustain a conviction for perjury in an affidavit, it is not necessary that the jurat should contain the place at which the affidavit is sworn, for the perjury is committed by the taking of the oath, and the jurat so far as that is concerned is not material. (7)

A witness present at the trial when the alleged perjury was committed, may be called to state from recollection the evidence given by the accused. (8)

Statements made by the Judge presiding when the alleged perjury was committed, are not admissible. (9)

The Judge's notes are not admissible except to refresh the memory of the Judge if called as a witness. (10)

The Judges of the Superior Courts ought not to be called to produce their notes, but the same objection is not applicable to the Judges of inferior Courts, especially where the Judge is willing to appear. (1)

The finding in the case in which the false evidence was given is not evidence on the perjury trial. (2)

CONFICTING STATEMENTS.—If in two causes, or, in one cause, at different examinations, or at one examination, a witness swears to two opposite and irreconcilable things he commits perjury by that one of the two statements which is false, but not by that one which is true. And though what he said when he told the truth may be shewn in evidence against him on an indictment for the false statement, still there must be testimony over and above his own contradictory statements as to which of them is false. (3)

It is not a necessary consequence that a person has committed perjury when he has sworn, on two different occasions, to conflicting statements, for there are cases in which a person might honestly swear to a particular fact from the best of his recollection and belief, and at a subsequent time, from other circumstances, be convinced that he was wrong and swear to the reverse. (4*a*) So that the mere fact of a person swearing one thing at one time, and another at another, is not sufficient to convict him of perjury where there is no other evidence adduced to shew which is true and which is false. (5)

CORROBORATION.—The proof necessary to convict a person accused of having committed perjury must necessarily be something more than the evidence of a single witness; or it would be simply one oath against another, and therefore where there is only one witness to swear to the falsity of the statement charged as perjury, the evidence of that one witness must be confirmed by proof of circumstances strongly corroborating it, as for instance, by the production and proof of a letter written by the accused contradicting his sworn testimony in question. Section 1002, post, provides that the evidence of one witness shall not be sufficient to convict "unless such witness is corroborated in some material particular by evidence implicating the accused."

The material particular in which corroboration is necessary is the falsity of the statement alleged as the perjury. The other facts such as the judicial proceeding in which the statement in question was sworn to or affirmed, the administering and taking of the oath or affirmation, and the making of the statement under oath or affirmation, may be proved in the same manner and by the same evidence as in any ordinary case.

172. Other acts of perjury.—Every one is guilty of perjury who,—

(a) having taken or made any oath, affirmation, solemn declaration or affidavit where, by any Act or law in force in Canada, or in any province of Canada, it is required or permitted that facts, matters or things be verified, or otherwise assured or ascertained by or upon the oath, affirmation, declaration or affidavit of any person, wilfully and corruptly, upon such oath, affirmation, declaration or affidavit, deposes, swears to or makes any false statement as to any such fact, matter or thing; or,

(b) knowingly, wilfully and corruptly, upon oath, affirmation or solemn declaration, affirms, declares or deposes to the truth of any statement for so verifying, assuring or ascertaining any such fact, matter or thing, or purporting so to do, or knowingly, wilfully and corruptly takes, makes, signs or subscribes any such affirmation, declaration or affidavit as to any such fact, matter or thing, if such statement, affidavit, affirmation or declaration is untrue in whole or in part. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 148.

173. False oath made out of a province but within Canada.—Every person who wilfully and corruptly makes any false affidavit, affirmation or solemn declaration, out of the province in which it is to be used, but within Canada, before any person authorized to take the same, for the purpose of being used in any province of Canada, is guilty of perjury in like manner as if such false affidavit, affirmation or declaration were made before a competent authority in the province in which it is used or intended to be used. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 149.

174. Punishment of perjury or subornation of perjury.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to fourteen years' imprisonment who commits perjury or subornation of perjury.

2. If the crime is committed in order to procure the conviction of a person for any crime punishable by death, or imprisonment for seven years or more, the punishment may be imprisonment for life. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 146.

See section 253, post, as to procuring death by false evidence.

A magistrate holding a summary trial for perjury alleged to have been committed in a prior trial before himself, must not import into the perjury trial his recollection of the demeanor of the accused and other witnesses at the former trial; he must be guided solely by the evidence at the perjury trial considered in view of the demeanor of the witnesses thereat. (6)

Perjury being an offence punishable with imprisonment for more than five years, there is no jurisdiction to impose, as the punishment therefor, a fine in lieu of imprisonment, (sec. 1035, post), but both imprisonment and fine may be awarded. (7)

175. False oaths in extra-judicial matters.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to seven years' imprisonment who, being required or authorized by law to make any statement on oath, affirmation or solemn declaration, thereupon makes a statement which would amount to perjury if made in a judicial proceeding. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 147.

Where a defendant was arraigned for having in a certain solemn declaration voluntarily made before a Justice of the Peace, falsely, wilfully and corruptly declared to a certain effect therein set forth, and the defendant applied to quash the indictment,—because it did not allege that the statement declared to was one authorized or required to be made on solemn declaration, and because it was not alleged that the statement in question was declared with intent to mislead,—the Crown counsel applied to amend the indictment if necessary, by adding, "he the said defendant being then duly authorized by law to make statements on solemn declaration."—The trial Judge, in refusing the motion to quash, held that the forms of indictment "FF.," post, are intended to illustrate the provisions of section 852, post, and that their effect is not confined to the offences stated in them, and that as an allegation of intent to mislead in the present indictment would not have given the defendant any better notice of the offence than he had without it, it was not necessary (the statement on this subject contained in Taschereau's Criminal Code, p. 675, being dissented from). A prisoner had, on a Dominion Election day, presented himself at a polling station and applied for a ballot paper stating that he was Mathew Leggatt, an elector on the list of voters for the district. Being required to be sworn the prisoner took the oath and falsely swore that he was Mathew Leggatt and that he was an elector on the list of voters. The prisoner was convicted; but as it did not appear that he was an elector, the questions were raised and reserved as to whether the deputy returning officer was authorized only to administer the oath to an elector, whether as the prisoner was not an elector the deputy returning officer had authority to administer the oath to the prisoner, and whether therefore the prisoner, although he swore falsely that he was an elector, could be convicted. Held that the prisoner was properly convicted and the conviction was affirmed; the word "elector" being held to apply to any person acting or representing himself as an elector. (9)

The offence (under section 175) of making a false statement in a solemn declaration, which declared that there was no lawful hindrance to the declarant's proposed marriage, is not proved by shewing that the declarant knew that the girl he was marrying was under 21, and that her parents' consent had not been obtained, as required by the provincial law, if the marriage was valid, notwithstanding the absence of such consent. (10)

Section 1002, post, which requires corroboration in certain cases, and specially includes the offence of perjury under section 174, ante, does not apply to the offence of making a false declaration under section 175. (1)

176. False statements in extra-judicial matters.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who, upon any occasion on which he is permitted by law to make any statement or declaration before any officer authorized by law to permit it to be made before him, or before any notary public to be certified by him as such notary, makes a statement which would amount to perjury if made on oath in a judicial proceeding. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 150

In reference to this provision, the English Commissioners say:

"It may be doubtful whether this is at present even a common law misdemeanor; but we feel no doubt that it ought to be made indictable."

177. Fabricating evidence.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to seven years' imprisonment who, with intent to mislead any court of justice or person holding any such judicial proceeding, fabricates evidence by any means other than perjury or subornation of perjury. 55 V., c. 29, s. 151.

"Fabricating evidence is an offence which is not so common as perjury, but which does occur and is sometimes detected. An instance occurred a few years ago on a trial for shooting at a man with intent to murder him, when the defence was that though the accused did fire off a pistol, it was not loaded with ball, and the only intent was to frighten. Evidence was given that a pistol ball was found lodged in the trunk of a tree nearly in the line from where the accused fired to where the prosecutor stood. It was afterwards discovered that the ball had been placed in the tree by those concerned in the prosecution, in order to supply the missing link in the evidence. Such an offence is as wicked and as dangerous an offence as perjury, but the punishment as a common law offence (if, irrespective of conspiracy, it be an offence), is only fine and imprisonment. [Royal Commissioners' Report, p. 21.]

An attempt, by the manufacture of false evidence, to mislead a judicial tribunal which might be called into existence is a criminal offence although it happens that such tribunal though contemplated was never actually called into existence, and the manufactured evidence was consequently not used. In other words, it is not necessary, in order to complete the offence of attempting to pervert the course of justice by the manufacture of false evidence, that such evidence should be made use of or that the tribunal for which it is intended should be called into actual existence. To tamper with evidence intended to be laid before arbitrators appointed by the parties to a contract for the determination of differences arising under such contract is to attempt to pervert the ends of justice by misleading a tribunal of a judicial nature, although in fact the arbitration happens not to take place. A defendant was indicted for having unlawfully, knowingly and designedly altered the character of the contents of certain sample bags of wheat which had become and were evidence to be used before arbitrators appointed in accordance with the terms of a contract to decide any question that might be in dispute between the buyers and the sellers of a cargo of wheat, with intent thereby to pass the same off as true and genuine samples of the bulk of such cargo, and thereby to injure and prejudice the buyers of the cargo and to pervert the due course of law and justice. By the contract of sale certain stipulations were made for settling by arbitration any disputes that might arise, and for the purpose of being used as evidence in any such arbitration, samples were taken by the defendant on behalf of the sellers and by another person on behalf of the buyers. Both sets of samples were sealed and taken to the defendant's house, and while there the defendant tampered with them by extracting the contents of the bags and substituting other wheat, without breaking the seals, thereby producing very much better samples. The samples so altered were forwarded by the defendant to the London Corn Trade Association, who by the terms of the contract were to appoint the arbitrators. Held that the indictment was good and alleged a criminal offence, although it did not shew that an arbitration took place or that the samples were actually used as evidence, that the offence committed by the defendant was not a mere private cheat, but was an attempt to mislead a tribunal of a judicial nature by the manufacture of false evidence. (2)

178. Conspiring to bring false accusations.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence who conspires to prosecute any person for any alleged offence, knowing such person to be innocent thereof, and shall be liable,—

(a) to imprisonment for fourteen years if such person might, upon conviction for the alleged offence, be sentenced to death or imprisonment for life;

(b) to imprisonment for ten years if such person might, upon conviction for the alleged offence, be sentenced to imprisonment for any term less than life. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 152.

179. Administering oaths without authority.—Every justice or other person who administers, or causes or allows to be administered, or receives, or causes or allows to be received, any oath or affirmation touching any matter or thing whereof such justice or other person has not jurisdiction or cognizance by some law in force at the time being, or not authorized or required by any such law, is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a fine not exceeding fifty dollars, or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three months.

2. Nothing in this section contained shall be construed to extend to any oath or affirmation before any justice in any matter or thing touching the preservation of the peace, or the prosecution, trial or punishment of any offence, or to any oath or affirmation required or authorized by any law of Canada, or by any law of the province wherein such oath or affirmation is received or administered, or is to be used, or to any oath or affirmation, which is required or authorized by the laws of any foreign country to give validity to an instrument in writing or to evidence designed or intended to be used in such foreign country. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 153.

For the present law relating to extra-judicial oaths, see the Canada Evidence Act, secs. 36 and 37, post.

180. Corrupting juries and witnesses.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who—

(a) dissuades or attempts to dissuade any person by threats, bribes, or other corrupt means from giving evidence in any cause or matter, civil or criminal; or,

(b) influences or attempts to influence, by threats or bribes or other corrupt means, any juryman in his conduct as such, whether such person has been sworn as a juryman or not; or,

(c) accepts any bribe or other corrupt consideration to abstain from giving evidence, or on account of his conduct as a juryman; or,

(d) wilfully attempts in any other way to obstruct, pervert or defeat the course of justice. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 154.

EMBRACERY. — Sub-section (b) covers a common law offence called embracery. Some of the old English statutes against embracery are the 5 Edward III. c. 10.—entitled "The punishment of a Juror that is ambidexter and taketh money;" the 34 Edward III. c. 8.—entitled, "The Penalty of a Juror taking reward to give his verdict;" the 38 Edward III. stat. 1, c. 12—entitled, "The punishment of a Juror taking reward to give verdict and of Embracers;" and the 32 Hen. VIII. c. 9.—entitled, "The Bill of Bracery and Buying of Titles." The preamble to this statute says "that there is nothing within this realm that conserveth the king's loving subjects in more quietness, rest, peace and good concord than the due and just ministration of his laws and the true and indifferent trials of such titles and issues as have to be tried according to the laws of the realm; which

His most Royal Majesty perceiveth to be greatly hindered by maintenance, embracery, champerty, subornation of witnesses, sinister labor, buying of titles and pretended rights of persons not being in possession; whereupon great perjury hath ensued, and much inquietness, oppression, vexation, troubles, wrongs and disinheritance." The statute then goes on to enact, among other things, "that from henceforth all statutes heretofore made concerning maintenance, champerty and embracery shall be put in due execution; and that no person do hereafter unlawfully retain, for maintenance of any suit or plea, any person or persons, or embrace any freeholders or jurors."

An old law dictionary contains the following description of the offence, "Embraceor. He that when a matter is in trial between party and party comes to the bar with one of the parties, having received some reward so to do and speaks in the case, or privately labors the jury, or stands in the court to survey or overlook them, whereby they are awed or influenced or put in fear or doubt of the matter. But lawyers, attorneys, etc., may speak in the case of their clients, and not be embraceors. (3) If the party himself instructs a juror or promises any reward for his appearance then the party is likewise an embraceor. And a juror may be guilty of embracery when he by indirect practices gets himself sworn on the tales to serve on one side."

Blackstone defines embracery as "an attempt to influence a jury corruptly to one side by promises, persuasions, entreaties, money, entertainments and the like." (4) And Hawkins says, "It seems clear that any attempt whatsoever to corrupt or influence or instruct a jury, or in any way to incline them to be more favorable to the one side than the other, by money, promises, letters, threats or persuasions, except only by the strength of the evidence and the arguments of counsel in open court at the trial of the cause, is a proper act of embracery; whether the jurors on whom such attempt is made give any verdict or not, or whether the verdict given be true or false." (5)

Where a defendant was convicted under the above section, 180 (old Code, section 154), of having attempted by corrupt means to dissuade a man from giving evidence in certain prosecutions under the Ontario Liquor License Act (R. S. O., c. 194), it was held that, notwithstanding section 164, ante (old Code, section 138), the conviction was right, and that section 84 of the Ontario Liquor License Act was ultra vires of the Ontario Legislature. (6)

Where a defendant was summarily convicted under the Canada Temperance Act of the offence of tampering with a witness subpœnaed to attend the trial of a charge of violating the second part of the Act by endeavoring to induce him to absent himself from the trial, it was held affirming the conviction and dismissing the appeal that the special provisions of the section of the Act under which the conviction was made was not repealed by section 154 (old Code), or by any other provision of the Criminal Code. (7)

It is an offence under the above section 180, clause a, to attempt to dissuade a witness by bribery or other corrupt means to give, in lieu of the witness' own belief, a version of the facts which the person making the corrupt offer believed to be the truth. (8)

181. Compounding penal actions.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a fine not exceeding the penalty compounded for, who, having brought, or under colour of bringing, an action against any person under any penal statute in order to obtain from him any penalty, compounds the said action without order or consent of the court, whether any offence has in fact been committed or not. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 155.

In reference to this offence, Blackstone says that the Statute of 18 Eliz., c. 5, provided "that if any person informing under pretense of any penal law, makes any composition without leave of the court or takes any money or promise from the defendant to excuse him (which demonstrates his intention of commencing the prosecution to be merely to serve his own ends, and not for the public good), he shall forfeit £10, shall stand two hours in the pillory, and shall be for ever disabled to sue on any popular or penal statute." (9)

Compounding Criminal Offences.—To compound a felony (which is an indictable offence at common law), is to enter into an agreement, for any valuable consideration,—(such as the taking back, by the owner, of goods stolen from him),—not to prosecute one who has committed a felony, or to forbear from or to stifle a prosecution therefor, or to withhold evidence of the commission thereof. (10)

The bare re-taking of one's goods which have been stolen, or the receiving back of embezzled funds, or the acceptance of security for their future repayment is not unlawful, unless there be some agreement, express or implied, to shield the thief; and the fact that the owner, after the return of the property or the taking of security, merely abstains, voluntarily, from prosecuting, while it may make him guilty of a misprision, cannot constitute a compounding. (1)

As the distinction between felonies and misdemeanors has been abolished by our Criminal Code (see section 14, ante), and as compounding a misdemeanor is not a criminal offence at common law, it is not easy to say where the line is now to be drawn between criminal offences, the compounding of which are crimes and the compounding of which are not crimes.

But, although the compounding of a misdemeanor is not a criminal offence at common law, it has always been considered illegal, and agreements made in respect thereof are ordinarily not enforceable. In cases, however, where the offence principally and more immediately affects the individual,—such, for instance, as an assault,—agreements of this kind are sometimes allowed, after conviction, with the sanction of the Court; and it is a common practice in England, when a person is convicted of such a misdemeanor, for the Court to permit the defendant to speak with the prosecutor, in private, before judgment is pronounced, and, if the prosecutor declares himself satisfied with the result of the interview, to inflict only a nominal sentence. Thus, in a case where a defendant was indicted for ill treating a parish apprentice, and, after conviction, a security was given by the defendant upon an understanding that the Court would abate the period of his imprisonment, the security was held good, upon the ground that it was given with the sanction of the Court and to be considered as part of the punishment suffered by the defendant in expiation of his offence, in addition to the imprisonment inflicted on him. (2)

In Archbold's Criminal Pleading and Evidence, 23rd Ed., 1088, et seq., the following authorities, among others, are cited as to compounding offences, namely:—R. v. Burgess, R. v. Gotley, R. v. Crisp, R. v. Best, Keir v. Leeman, and the Windhill Local Board of Health v. Vint. (3)

In the case of R. v. Burgess, the prisoner had been employed to levy a distress for rent upon the goods of a Mr. Bedford, and, upon the occasion of making the distress, Arthur Bagley, while in possession,—as the prisoner's assistant,—of the distrained premises, stole twenty-eight shillings belonging to Mr. Bedford from a drawer in the latter's room, and absconded. The prisoner was informed of this by Bedford, who was urged by the prisoner to put the matter in the hands of the police; but Bedford told the prisoner he would leave the matter in his (prisoner's) hands; and thereupon the prisoner gave information of the theft to the police. Subsequently the prisoner entered into some negotiations with Bagley's family, and finally he handed to Bagley's mother the following document:—"I, W. H. Burgess, undertake not to charge Arthur Bagley with any criminal case that I have now against him, on the money being provided to pay what he took from Peckham, while in possession, namely, 28s. (Signed) W. H. Burgess."

The money was paid to the prisoner, but Bagley was, nevertheless, on the evidence of Mr. Bedford, convicted summarily of the theft. The prisoner was then prosecuted for compounding a felony. The prisoner's counsel moved to quash the indictment on the ground that there being no allegation that the prisoner desisted from prosecuting the felon, no offence of compounding a felony was legally charged. For the prosecution, it was contended that the offence consisted in the corrupt agreement not to prosecute. The Recorder refused to quash the indictment, the trial went on, and, at the close of the case for the prosecution, the prisoner's counsel submitted that there was no case to go to the jury, on the ground that the owner of the property stolen or a person whose evidence would be necessary to convict the thief are the only persons who can compound a felony or a larceny, and that, in the present case, the defendant was not a necessary witness on the trial of Bagley, and that, therefore, the prisoner's undertaking not to charge Bagley with a criminal offence could not impede the course of justice. The objection was overruled and the prisoner was found guilty.

The questions reserved for the Court of Crown Cases Reserved were whether the indictment was bad as not disclosing any offence and whether there was evidence against the prisoner upon the indictment. The conviction was affirmed on both points, Lord Chief Justice Coleridge saying, in the course of his remarks in rendering the judgment of the Court, that the offence consisted in and was complete upon the making of the corrupt agreement, and that there was nothing in the second point reserved, but that, on the contrary, the offence of compounding a felony was one which could be committed not only by the owner of the stolen property but by other parties. (4)

In the case of the Windhill Local Board of Health v. Vint, the plaintiffs, a local board, had indicted the defendants for obstructing a highway. At the trial a compromise was made by the parties and sanctioned by the judges, and afterwards confirmed by deed. By this deed the defendants covenanted to restore the road within seven years, and the plaintiffs covenanted that when that had been done they would consent to a verdict of "not guilty" in the indictment. The defendants failed to restore the road, and the plaintiffs then brought an action on their covenant. It was held by the Court of Appeal affirming the judgment of Sterling, J., that as the indictment was for a public injury, the agreement to consent to a verdict of "not guilty" was illegal, and that the plaintiffs could not maintain an action on the defendants' covenant. (5)

This case and the other authorities above cited shew that when an offence,—even if it be not very serious,—is one of a public nature, the compromise of a prosecution based upon it will be illegal; but it appears that if the offence is of a light character and one which might be made the subject of a civil action, such as a common assault or a libel, an agreement to withdraw the prosecution will be legal; but where the public characteristic of the offence predominates, as for instance, in the case of an assault and riot combined, an agreement to compromise the prosecution would be illegal.

A contract between the accused and the complainant made in consideration of the withdrawal of a charge of obtaining money by false pretences in respect of which a preliminary enquiry was pending before a magistrate, is not enforceable, although the criminal proceedings were dropped in pursuance of the contract, and the magistrate's assent to the charge being withdrawn on being informed of the agreement of settlement does not validate the agreement. (6)

MISPRISION.—Somewhat analogous to the offence of compounding a felony, is that of misprision of felony, "which consists in concealing or procuring the concealment of felony, (7) whether such felony be at common law or by statute. Silently to observe the commission of a felony, without using any endeavor to apprehend the offender, is a misprision. If to knowledge of the committing of the offence there be added assent to its commission, the party assenting becomes an accessory. The punishment for the offence of misprision of felony is fine and imprisonment. (8) But prosecutions for it are practically obsolete at the present day. (9)

182. Corruptly taking reward for helping to recover stolen property, without bringing offender to trial.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to seven years' imprisonment who corruptly takes any money or reward, directly or indirectly, under pretense or upon account of helping any person to recover any chattel, money, valuable security or other property which by any indictable offence, has been stolen, taken, obtained, extorted, converted or disposed of, unless he has used all due diligence to cause the offender to be brought to trial for the same. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 156.

183. Advertising reward for return of stolen property.—Every one is liable to a penalty of two hundred and fifty dollars for each offence, recoverable with costs, by any person who sues for the same in any court of competent jurisdiction, who,—

(a) publicly advertises a reward for the return of any property which has been stolen or lost, and in such advertisement uses any words purporting that no questions will be asked; or,

(b) makes use of any words in any public advertisement purporting that a reward will be given or paid for any property which has been stolen or lost, without seizing or making any inquiry after the person producing such property; or,

(c) promises or offers in any such public advertisement to return to any pawnbroker or other person who advanced money by way of loan on, or has bought, any property stolen or lost, the money so advanced or paid, or any other sum of money for the return of such property; or,

(d) prints or publishes any such advertisement. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 157.

The time within which a prosecution for an offence under sub-section (d) may be commenced is limited to six months. (Sec. 1140 d, post.)

By section 50 of the Imperial statute 24-25 Vic., c. 96, it was made a misdemeanor, in England, for any person to advertise a reward for the return of stolen property, and to use words purporting that no question would be asked, and by section 151 of the same statute it is enacted that, whosoever shall corruptly take any money or reward directly or indirectly under pretense or on account of helping any person to any chattel, money, valuable security or other property whatsoever which shall by any felony or misdemeanor have been stolen, etc., shall, unless he shall have used all due diligence to cause the offender to be brought to trial for the same, be guilty of felony.

Upon an indictment under this latter section of the Imperial statute it has been held in England that it is not necessary to shew that the prisoner had any connection with the commission of the previous felony, but that it is sufficient to shew that the prisoner had some corrupt and improper design when he received the money, and did not bona fide intend to use such means as he could for the detection and punishment of the offender. (10)

Where A was charged with corruptly and feloniously receiving from B money under pretence of helping the latter to receive goods previously stolen from him, and with not causing the thief to be apprehended, three questions were left to the jury, as follows:—1. Did A mean to screen the guilty party, or to share the money with him? 2. Did A know the thief and intend to assist him in getting rid of the property by promising B to buy it? and 3. Did A know the thief and, as B's agent, assist B, at her request, in endeavoring to purchase the stolen property from the thief, not intending to bring the latter to justice. The jury answered the first two questions in the negative and the third in the affirmative; and it was held that the receipt of the money under such circumstances was a corrupt receiving of the money under the statute. (1)

The origin of the above Imperial statute was the 4 Geo. I., c. 11. The enactment is said by Mr. Blackstone to have been brought about in the following manner. Referring to the taking of rewards under pretence of helping an owner of goods stolen from him, Mr. Blackstone says, "This was a contrivance carried to a great length of villainy in the beginning of the reign of George the First, the confederates of the felons thus disposing of stolen goods at a cheap rate to the owners themselves and thereby stifling all further enquiry. The famous Jonathan Wild had under him a well disciplined corps of thieves, who brought in all their spoils to him; and he kept a sort of public office for restoring them to the owners at half price. To prevent which audacious practice, it was enacted by the 4 Geo. I., c. 11, that whoever shall take a reward under pretence of helping anyone to stolen goods shall suffer as the felons who stole them, unless he caused such principal felons to be apprehended and brought to trial and also gave evidence against them. Wild still continuing in his own practice was upon this statute at last convicted and executed." (2)

184. Signing false declaration of execution of judgment of death.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment, who knowingly and wilfully signs a false certificate or declaration when a certificate or declaration is required with respect to the execution of judgment of death on any prisoner. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 158.

Escapes and Rescues.

"In reference to the somewhat intricate subject of escape and rescue we have made distinctions, which are, we think, insufficiently recognized by the existing law, between the commission of such offences by peace officers and gaolers, and by other persons." [Royal Commissioners' Report, p. 21.]

185. Being at large while under sentence of imprisonment.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who, having been sentenced to imprisonment, is afterwards, and before the expiration of the term for which he was sentenced, at large within Canada without some lawful cause, the proof whereof shall lie on him. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 159.

186. Assisting prisoner of war to escape.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to five years' imprisonment who knowingly and wilfully—

(a) assists any alien enemy of His Majesty, being a prisoner of war in Canada, to escape from any place in which he may be detained; or,

(b) assists any such prisoner as aforesaid, suffered to be at large on his parole in Canada or in any part thereof, to escape from the place where he is at large on his parole. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 160.

187. Prison breach.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to seven years' imprisonment who, by force or violence, breaks any prison with intent to set at liberty himself or any person confined therein on any criminal charge. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 161.

188. Attempt to break prison.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who attempts to break prison, or who forcibly breaks out of his cell or makes any breach therein with intent to escape therefrom. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 162.

By section 2, sub-sec. 30, "prison" includes any penitentiary, common gaol, public or reformatory prison, lock-up, guard-room, or other place in which persons charged with the commission of offences are usually kept or detained in custody.

PRISON BREACH.—Under section 187, prison breach is forcibly or violently breaking a prison either by a prisoner confined therein, on a criminal charge, with intent to release himself, or by a third person with intent to release any such prisoner.

If a prisoner imprisoned on a criminal charge climbs over the prison wall, and so sets himself at liberty, this is not a prison breach under the terms of section 187; but it would be punishable as an escape, under section 189; and where, in getting over the wall, the escaping prisoner disturbed and threw down some loose bricks, it was held to be a prison-breaking. (1)

Under section 187, the forcible breaking with intent to escape seems to be sufficient to constitute the offence. It does not seem necessary that the prisoner should succeed in regaining his liberty.

To constitute a prison breach as distinguished from a mere escape the prison must be broken, or there must be real force or violence used, when the escape is made or attempted. Therefore, if, without any obstruction, a prisoner go out of the prison doors, they being opened by the consent or negligence of the gaoler, or if he otherwise escape, without using any kind of force or violence, he will not be guilty of anything more than an escape. (2) In Haswell's case the prisoner, who was convicted of horse stealing, made his escape from the house of correction by tying two ladders together and placing them against the wall of the yard, on the top of which wall was a range of bricks placed loose and without mortar, some of which were thrown down by the prisoner (it was supposed accidentally), in getting over the wall. Mr. Baron Wood doubted whether there was such force used as to constitute the crime of prison-breaking or whether it amounted to only an escape; and the point being reserved, the judges were unanimously of opinion that it was a prison-breaking. (3)

On a charge of prison breach by escaping from a town "lock up," and proof that the "lock up" in question was constantly used for detaining persons arrested on criminal charges and that the defendant was a prisoner therein, the regularity of all proceedings necessary to constitute the lock-up a regularly established lock-up or prison is to be presumed. (4)

189. Escape from custody after conviction or from prison whether convicted or not.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who—

(a) having been convicted of any offence, escapes from any lawful custody in which he may be under such conviction; or,

(b) whether convicted or not, escapes from any prison in which he is lawfully confined on any criminal charge. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 163.

190. Escape from custody.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who, being in lawful custody other than as aforesaid on any criminal charge, escapes from such custody. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 164.

191. Rescue or assisting escape of person under sentence of death or imprisonment for life.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to seven years' imprisonment who—

(a) rescues any person or assists any person in escaping, or attempting to escape, from lawful custody, whether in prison or not, under sentence of death or imprisonment for life, or after conviction of, and before sentence for, or while in such custody upon a charge of any crime punishable with death or imprisonment for life; or,

(b) being a peace officer and having any such person in his lawful custody, or being an officer of any prison in which any such person is lawfully confined, voluntarily and intentionally permits him to escape therefrom. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 165.

192. Rescuing or assisting escape in other cases.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to five years' imprisonment who,—

(a) rescues any person, or assists any person in escaping, or attempting to escape, from lawful custody, whether in prison or not, under a sentence of imprisonment for any term less than life, or after conviction of, and before sentence for, or while in such custody upon a charge of any crime punishable with imprisonment for a term less than life; or,

(b) being a peace officer having any such person in his lawful custody, or being an officer of any prison in which such person is lawfully confined, voluntarily and intentionally permits him to escape therefrom. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 166.

ESCAPES AND RESCUES.—In law, an escape has two separate meanings. The one is the going away by the prisoner himself from lawful custody or imprisonment, without any prison-breaking and without any force or violence; and the other is where the officer having lawful charge of a prisoner voluntarily allows him to leave and go free from his place of confinement. (See sub-section (b) of sections 191 and 192).

Under the terms of sub-section (a) of sections 191 and 192, a rescue is the deliverance of a prisoner from lawful custody by a third person, or assistance rendered by a third person to any prisoner in escaping or attempting to escape from lawful custody.

Where a prisoner was indicted for having concealed himself with intent to escape from prison, it was held that this was no offence. (5)

193. Escape by failure to perform legal duty.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to one year's imprisonment, who, by failing to perform any legal duty, permits a person in his lawful custody on a criminal charge to escape therefrom. 63-64 V., c. 46, s. 3.

This section is identical with section 140 of the English Draft Code.

194. Escape by conveying things into prison.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who with intent to facilitate the escape of any prisoner lawfully imprisoned conveys, or causes to be conveyed, any thing into any prison. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 167.

195. Causing discharge of prisoner under pretended authority.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who knowingly and unlawfully, under color of any pretended authority, directs or procures the discharge of any prisoner not entitled to be so discharged, and the person so discharged shall be held to have escaped. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 168.

196. Punishment of escaped prisoner.—Every one who escapes from custody shall, on being retaken, serve, in the prison to which he was sentenced, a term equivalent to the remainder of his term unexpired at the time of his escape, in addition to the punishment which is awarded for such escape.

2. Any imprisonment so awarded may be to the penitentiary or prison from which the escape was made. 55-66 V., c. 29, s. 169.

The Penitentiaries Act, (R. S., 1906, c. 147), and the Prisons and Reformatories Act (R. S., 1906, c. 148), contain some further provisions (set forth below), with reference to rescues and escapes.

Section 11 of the Penitentiaries Act is as follows:—

"11. Every street, highway or thoroughfare of any kind along or across which it is necessary or convenient that convicts should pass in going to or returning from their work, or upon which it may be deemed necessary or expedient that convicts should be employed, shall be considered, while so used, as a portion of the tract of land forming the penitentiary.

(5) R. v. Labourdette, 8 W. L. R. 402; 13 Can. Cr. Cas., 379.

"2. Every escape, or attempt at escape, and every rescue, or aid in rescue, which takes place on such street, highway or thoroughfare, while so used, or on or from any wharf, boat, scow or other vessel which a penitentiary is by this Act declared to include, shall have the same effect as if such escape, or attempt at escape, or such rescue, or aid in rescue, had taken place within the prison walls or penitentiary limits. 6 E. VII., c. 38, s. 11."

And sections 21 to 24 of the Prisons and Reformatories Act are as follows:—

"21. Every street, highway or public thoroughfare of any kind along or across which prisoners pass in going to or returning from their work, and every place where they are so employed, shall, while so used, be considered as a portion of the gaol or prison, and any escape or attempt at escape, and any rescue or attempt at rescue, made on such street, highway or thoroughfare, shall be held to have been made within or from such gaol or prison. R. S., c. 183, s. 12.

"22. Every one sentenced to imprisonment or to be detained in any reformatory prison, reformatory school, industrial refuge, industrial home or industrial school, who escapes or attempts to escape therefrom, may, at any time, be apprehended without warrant and brought before any magistrate, who, upon proof of his identity, and of the escape or attempt to escape, if the escape or attempt to escape be from a reformatory prison or a reformatory school, shall remand him thereto for the remainder of his original term of imprisonment or detention. 53 V., c. 37, s. 1.

"23. If the escape or attempt to escape be from an industrial refuge, industrial home or industrial school, the magistrate may remand the offender thereto for the remainder of his original term of imprisonment or detention; or if the officer in charge of such refuge, home or school certifies in writing that the removal of the offender to a place of safety or stricter imprisonment is desirable, and if the governing body of such refuge, home or school applies for such removal, and if sufficient cause therefor is shown to the satisfaction of such magistrate, the magistrate may order the offender to be removed to and to be kept imprisoned, for the remainder of his original term of imprisonment or detention, in any reformatory prison, or reformatory school, in which by law such offender might be imprisoned for an indictable offence, and when there is no such reformatory prison or reformatory school, the magistrate may order the offender to be removed to and to be so kept imprisoned in any other place of imprisonment to which the offender may be lawfully committed. 53 V., c. 37, s. 1.

"24. In the case of an escape or attempt to escape aforesaid, whether the term of imprisonment or detention has expired or not, the magistrate may sentence the offender to such additional term of imprisonment or detention, as the case may be, not exceeding one year, as to such magistrate seems a proper punishment for the escape or attempt to escape. 53 V., c. 37, s. 1."

CRIMINAL CODE (RESUMED).

PART V.

OFFENCES AGAINST RELIGION, MORALS AND PUBLIC CONVENIENCE

Interpretation.

197. Definitions.—In this part, unless the context otherwise requires,—

(a) 'theatre' includes any place open to the public, gratuitously or otherwise, where dramatic, musical, acrobatic or other entertainments or representations are presented or given;

(b) 'guardian' includes any person who has in law or in fact the custody or control of any girl or child referred to;

(c) 'public place' includes any open place to which the public have or are permitted to have access and any place of public resort. 57-58 V., c. 57, s. 1; 63-64 V., c. 46, s. 3; 3 E. VII., c. 13, s. 2.

Offences Against Religion.

198. Blasphemous libels.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to one year's imprisonment who publishes any blasphemous libel.

2. Whether any particular published matter is a blasphemous libel or not is a question of fact: Provided that no one is guilty of a blasphemous libel for expressing in good faith and in decent language, or attempting to establish by arguments used in good faith and conveyed in decent language, any opinion whatever upon any religious subject. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 170.

Among the old English common law and statutory offences against religion were,—1, All blasphemies (oral or written), against God,—as denying His being or providence,—and all contumelious reproaches of Jesus Christ; 2, all profane scoffing (oral or written), at the Holy Scriptures, or exposing any part thereof to contempt or ridicule; and 3, impostures in religion,—as falsely pretending to extraordinary commissions from God, and terrifying and abusing the people with false denunciations of judgment, etc. (1)

But modern statutes and decisions have greatly modified the old law: so that many things that were formerly indictable as blasphemy are not so now. At the present day, no prosecution could be sustained for, calmly and dispassionately and with decent language, discussing or even calling in question the truth of Christianity. The offence of blasphemy consists, now, in attacking Christianity in a vulgar, profane or indecent manner, and not in endeavoring, by legitimate argument, to prove its falsity.

A blasphemous libel consists in the publication of any profane words vilifying or ridiculing God, Jesus Christ, the Holy Ghost, the Old or New Testament or Christianity in general, with intent to shock and insult believers, or to pervert or mislead the ignorant and unwary; and if a publication be "full of scurrilous and opprobrious language,—if sacred subjects are treated with levity, if indiscriminate abuse is employed instead of argument,—then a design to wound the religious feelings of others may be readily inferred. But where the work is free from all offensive levity, abuse and sophistry, and, in fact, the honest and temperate expression of religious opinions conscientiously held and avowed, it is not a blasphemous libel." (2)

In one case, Mr. Justice Erskine said: "It is indeed still blasphemy scoffingly or irreverently to ridicule or impugn the doctrines of the Christian faith, yet any man may without subjecting himself to any penal consequences, soberly and reverently examine and question the truth of those doctrines which have been assumed as essential to it. (3)

The Royal Commissioners, in their report on the English Draft Code, say, in regard to blasphemous libel, that they deem it inexpedient to define it otherwise than by the use of that expression. They then go on to say, "As however we consider that the essence of the offence (regarded as a subject for criminal punishment) lies in the outrage it inflicts upon the religious feelings of the community, and not in the expression of erroneous opinions, we have added a proviso to the effect that no one shall be convicted of a blasphemous libel only for expressing in good faith and decent language any opinion whatever upon any religious subject. We are informed that the law was stated by Mr. Justice Coleridge to this effect in the case of R. v. Pooley, tried at Bodmin in 1857. We are not aware of any later authority on the subject." [See pp. 21 and 22 of the Report.]

The law, as laid down by Mr. Justice Coleridge in R. v. Pooley (4) and as since stated by Lord Chief Justice Coleridge in the case of R. v. Ramsay and Foote, is in effect that the publication of any matter, which has reference to God, Jesus Christ, the Bible or the Book of Common Prayer, intended and calculated to wound the feelings of mankind or to excite contempt and hatred against the church or religion or to promote immorality, is blasphemous; but that matters couched in decent and proper language and published and intended in good faith to advance religious opinions, which the publisher regards as true, are not blasphemous merely because their publication is likely to wound the feelings of those who have contrary opinions or because their general adoption might tend by lawful means to alterations in religion or in the constitution of the church. v. Ramsay and Foote, said, "If the decencies of controversy are observed, even the fundamentals of religion may be attacked, without a person being guilty of blasphemous libel."

The same principle was followed in the case of the Queen v. Bradlaugh, and others, where it was held that publications discussing with gravity and decency questions as to Christian doctrines or statements in the Hebrew Scriptures, and even questioning their truth, are not to be deemed blasphemous so as to be fit subjects for criminal prosecution, but that publications which, in an indecent and malicious spirit, assault and asperse the truth of Christianity or of the Scriptures, in language calculated and intended to shock the feelings and outrage the belief of mankind, are properly to be regarded as blasphemous so as to be fit subjects for criminal prosecution. (6)

By section 910, post, every one accused of publishing a defamatory libel may plead the truth of the matter published and that its publication was for the public benefit. But this does not apply to a blasphemous libel, the truth of which cannot be pleaded as a defence. (7)

199. Obstructing officiating clergyman.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who, by threats or force, unlawfully obstructs or prevents, or endeavors to obstruct or prevent any clergyman or other minister in or from celebrating divine service, or otherwise officiating in any church, chapel, meeting-house, school-house or other place for divine worship, or in or from the performance of his duty in the lawful burial of the dead in any churchyard or other burial place. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 171.

200. Violence to officiating clergyman.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who strikes or offers any violence to, or arrests upon any civil process or under the pretence of executing any civil process, any clergyman or other minister who is engaged in or, to the knowledge of the offender, is about to engage in, any of the rites or duties in the last preceding section mentioned, or who, to the knowledge of the offender, is going to perform the same, or returning from the performance thereof. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 172.

201. Disturbing religious or other special meetings.—Every one is guilty of an offence and liable, on summary conviction, to a penalty not exceeding fifty dollars and costs, and in default of payment to one month's imprisonment, who wilfully disturbs, interrupts or disquiets any assemblage of persons met for religious worship, or for any moral, social or benevolent purpose, by profane discourse, by rude or indecent behavior, or by making a noise, either within the place of such meeting or so near it as to disturb the order or solemnity of the meeting. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 173.

This section does not apply to a meeting of electors called by one of the candidates during a municipal election. (8)

See R. S. Q., Articles 2946 and 2964, as to the preservation of order at political meetings. And see sections 126-128, ante, and sections 619-621, post, as to the preservation of order at public meetings.

A person, who enters a hall, leased by a religious association or body while a meeting for religious worship is being held in it under the direction of officers of the association, and, addressing himself to the assemblage, says he is a Catholic and a French Canadian, as most of them are, that they should not stay where they are, and calls upon them to leave, is guilty of an offence of disturbing a religious meeting under the above section of the Code. (9)

The offence of unlawfully obstructing divine service under this section is not made out where the obstructed clergyman had no legal claim to the possession of or use of the church premises, and was in point of law a trespasser thereon himself. (10)

If a jury sent back to reconsider its verdict of guilty brings in the same verdict a second time contrary to the Judge's direction upon a point of law, such verdict must be recorded, and the accused left to his remedy by reserved case or appeal. (10).

Sunday Observance.

It has been held that cab driving on Sunday, by a cab driver, is not an offence under the Lord's Day Acts of Ontario (R. S. O., 1897, c. 246; R. S. O., 1887, c. 203), a cab driver not being one of the persons included in the classes mentioned in the Acts, and, in the case of a conviction on that charge, the conviction was held bad, moreover, for uncertainty, because it did not specify the act or acts which constituted the offence, it being merely alleged that, on a certain Sunday, the defendant did unlawfully exercise the worldly business of his ordinary calling as a cab driver, the Court being of opinion that it is not sufficient,—unless expressly declared by statute to be so,—to describe the offence merely in the words of the statute, without specifying the act or acts constituting the alleged offence. (1)

A farmer who builds fences on his farm on Sunday does not thereby infringe the Lord's Day Ordinance (N. W. T.), such employment not being ejusdem generis with that of a mechanic, workman or laborer. (2)

Where a municipal by-law, as to Sunday Observance, exceeded in its prohibition the terms of the provincial statute on which the by-law was based, by including classes of persons not included in such statute, it was held to be too wide in its scope and void for unreasonableness. (3)

Where a chemist and druggist was convicted of having, in his shop in Toronto, unlawfully sold and exposed and offered for sale, on the Lord's Day, certain goods, by selling two glasses of ice cream soda, thereby doing and exercising the worldly business and work of his ordinary calling, his counsel applied, in certiorari proceedings, for a rule nisi to quash the conviction on the ground that it was bad, because, although the magistrate had stated that the articles in question were sometimes sold as medicines, there was no evidence in the case to shew that on the occasion in question they were not sold as medicines,—the result being that there was no evidence to support the magistrate's finding that the sale was not a sale of drugs or medicines within the exception contained in the statute under which the conviction was rendered; but the Court held that it was well established that the finding of the magistrate upon a question of fact within his jurisdiction would not be reviewed upon certiorari, and that the defendant's remedy (if any) was by appeal; and the rule was refused. (4)

In another Ontario case, a defendant was convicted of having in his shop sold two glasses of ice cream, to two constables, on a Sunday. From the evidence adduced at the trial and upon appeal, it appeared that the defendant carried on business,—under the authority of a City license,—as an eating house and victualling house keeper, and that, among other things, he kept, for sale to his customers, soda water and ice cream, that his place was largely patronized by University and College students, many of whom boarded at his place by the week, including Sundays, that his place was kept open on Sundays, that, in addition to his ordinary bill of fare, he provided ice cream which, however, was not included in the price of a meal but was charged for, extra. It was established by medical testimony that ice cream is a food. The Court of Appeal, in rendering judgment, reviewed the statutes relative to the observance of the Lord's Day, on which the Ontario statute under which the proceedings were taken, was based, commencing with the English Act, 29 Car. 2, c. 7, which enacts, among other things, that no tradesmen, etc., shall do or exercise worldly labor, business or work of their ordinary calling upon the Lord's Day (selling drugs and medicines and other works of necessity excepted), and, after reviewing the facts at length and discussing the meaning of the statutory exception, and comparing the English enactments with the Ontario Act, it was held that, on the Sunday in question, the defendant was carrying on strictly and exclusively his business as a victualler or eating-house keeper, that the business he thus carried on was a work of necessity legally performed by him, in view of the express exception above referred to, and that, under all the circumstances of the case, the supplying of the two constables with the ice cream in question was the supplying of a refreshment in the nature of a light meal in the ordinary course of the defendant's business as an eating-house keeper or a victualling house keeper, and was not an offence. Conviction quashed. (5)

It has been held by the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia (McDonald, C.J., dissenting), that a Sunday Observance law of that province, passed before Confederation, was legislation dealing with public wrongs, and that, as by the British North America Act the criminal law is placed within the exclusive legislative authority of the Dominion Parliament, the law in question became, upon Confederation, a part, as to that province, of the criminal law of Canada, and that as such it is subject to repeal or amendment by a Dominion statute only, and not by an Act of the provincial legislature, although similar legislation as applied to various classes only and not to the public generally would be within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislature, as dealing with civil rights. (6)

The selling of cigars on Sunday may be prohibited, either directly by a provincial legislature or by municipal by-laws authorized by such legislature; and in either case such restriction is of a merely local nature, to be classed as a police or municipal regulation, and not as a matter essentially appertaining to the criminal law, and so within the sole competence of the parliament of Canada. (7)

It has been held in British Columbia that a conviction for "keeping a barber shop open" on Sunday contrary to a municipal by-law cannot be supported upon the mere admission of the accused when called upon to plead, that he had shaved customers in his shop on the day named; and it seems that a barber who exercises his trade at his shop with the doors barred cannot be said to be "keeping open." (8)

A city by-law,—permitting the sale, on Sunday, of "fruits, cigars, confectionery and temperance beverages," by all persons who sell all these things and are not engaged in trade,—is invalid, as arbitrary and unjust, because it does not authorize the sale of tobacco as well as cigars, and because it does not extend to all persons engaged in the same business. (9)

The sale of ice cream to the public on Sunday by a dealer who is not the keeper of a victualling or eating-house, is an offence, in Ontario, under the Lord's Day Act, C. S. U. C., c. 104; but the sale on Sunday of ice cream where supplied in the bona fide exercise of the business of keeper of an eating-house, is not an offence under the Ontario Lord's Day Act—to feed people on Sunday in a victualling house being held to be a necessity. (10)

It has been held by the Privy Council, on an appeal by the Attorney-General for Ontario from a judgment of the Court of Appeal for Ontario, that chapter 246 of the Revised Statutes of Ontario, intituled "An Act to prevent the profanation of the Lord's Day," treated as a whole, was beyond the competency of the Legislature of Ontario to enact the criminal law for the Dominion of Canada (except the constitution of courts of criminal jurisdiction), being, by section 91, sub-section 27 of the British North America Act, 1867, reserved for the exclusive legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada. (1)

The effect of this decision of the Privy Council is that the old Lord's Day Act, as contained in chapter 104 of the Consolidated Statutes of Upper Canada (1859), is still in force, except in so far as it has been varied by Dominion legislation.

A newsdealer is a "tradesman," within the meaning of the Ontario Lord's Day Act, C. S. U. C., c. 104, and is liable, for selling newspapers on Sunday, to a fine as for an infraction of that statute. (2)

The Quebec Sunday Observance Act, 7 Edw. VII., c. 42, is not in conflict with the Dominion Lord's Day Act, R. S., 1906, c. 153, and, being recognized, by the Dominion statute, as valid, the provincial statute is not subject to objection on the ground that it is ultra vires.

The prosecutor instituting proceedings under the Quebec Sunday Observance Act must, under the provincial law, be a British subject, but it is not necessary that there should be in the information any allegation to that effect, if the fact be proved at the trial. (3) with a human being or with any other living creature. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 174.

In the Appendix, post, the Dominion Lord's Day Act is set out in full, and a reference is there made to the Quebec Sunday Observance Act.

203. Attempt to commit it.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to ten years' imprisonment who attempts to commit the offence mentioned in the last preceding section. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 175.

In the common law,—which is not affected, on this subject, by the Criminal Code,—there is a conclusive presumption that a minor under fourteen is physically incapable of committing sodomy: (1) but he may be convicted, under section 293, post, of an indecent assault upon a person under fourteen or upon a person over fourteen, if, in the latter case, his act is against the will of the other party.

204. Incest.—Every parent and child, every brother and sister, and every grandparent and grandchild, who cohabit or have sexual intercourse with each other, shall each of them, if aware of their consanguinity, be deemed to have committed incest, and be guilty of an indictable offence and liable to fourteen years' imprisonment, and the male person shall also be liable to be whipped: Provided that, if the court or judge is of opinion that the female accused is a party to such intercourse only by reason of the restraint, fear or duress of the other party, the court or judge shall not be bound to impose any punishment on such person under this section. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 176.

Incest, adultery and fornication are not common law offences; but in England they are criminally cognizable under the ecclesiastical law, although, as Sir James F. Stephen points out, the only one which is prosecuted in these days is incest, an instance of which he mentions as having been prosecuted in recent times in the Bishop of Chichester Court. (2)

There being no competent Ecclesiastical Court in Canada, and the ecclesiastical law of England not being in force here, (3), none of these offences have heretofore been punishable in any part of Canada, except in the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, under special enactments passed by the legislatures of these provinces for the punishment of incest, (4) and also, as regards New Brunswick, for the punishment of adultery. (5)

See section 218, post, as to conspiracy to induce a woman to commit adultery or fornication.

The word "brother" used in the statutes of Vermont, punishing incest, has been held to include a brother of the half-blood. (6)

It has been held that it is not necessary to prove more than a single sexual act. (7) But although proof of one commission of the offence is sufficient for conviction, proof is admissible of the various times and circumstances of the repetition of the offence. (8)

Either party to the offence, or both of them, may be indicted. In a Nebraska case a party was indicted alone for the crime of incest, under the provisions of section 203 of the Criminal Code of that State. Held, that he was properly indicted, and that it was not necessary that the indictment should be against both parties to the incestuous intercourse. (9)

The relationship must not only exist but the accused parties must have been aware of it; and therefore ignorance on the part of either party of the consanguinity, would relieve such party from culpability.

Oral evidence is not admissible in the province of Quebec to prove relationship; but the relationship must be established by the production of extracts from the registers of civil status, as required by the provincial laws of evidence, which are made applicable to criminal proceedings by section 35 of the Canada Evidence Act, unless the absence of such registers is established. (10)

On a trial for incest, the evidence of the child, a girl of 11 years, that the accused was her father, and the evidence of another person that the accused lived together as father and daughter for some seven or eight months, is not sufficient proof of relationship to justify a conviction. (1)

The present Imperial Statute on this subject is the Punishment of Incest Act, 8 Edw. VII., c. 45.

205. Indecent acts.—Every one is guilty of an offence and liable, on summary conviction before two justices, to a fine of fifty dollars or to six months' imprisonment with or without hard labor, or to both fine and imprisonment, who wilfully,—

(a) in the presence of one or more persons does any indecent act in any place to which the public have or are permitted to have access; or,

(b) does any indecent act in any place intending thereby to insult or offend any person. 53 V., c. 37, s. 6; 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 177.

It has been held in England that the offence of indecent exposure of the person may be indictable if committed before several persons, even if the place be not public, (2), and that men who bathe,—without any screen or covering,—so near to a public footpath that exposure of their persons must necessarily occur, are guilty of an indictable nuisance. (3) Nor is it any defence that there has been, so long as living memory extends, a usage so to bathe at the place, and that there has been no exposure beyond what is necessarily incidental to such bathing. In a case in New York six women in a room in a bawdy house exposed their persons for hire to five men, the doors, windows and shutters being closed, and it was held that thereby they committed this offence; the place being deemed public. (5)

Where, upon a race course, a booth was kept for the purpose of an indecent exhibition, — the public having no right of admission thereto except by paying,—it was held, in England, that such booth was a public place so as to support an indictment for an indecent exhibition therein. (6)

An omnibus has also been held to be a sufficiently public place to sustain an indictment for an indecent exposure therein; (7) and so also has the roof of a house visible from the back windows of several other houses. (8)

The act of indecency must be wilful; and therefore one, in a place however public, having by careful looking satisfied himself that no person was in a position to see him, might innocently do what would constitute an exposure if people were present. So that, if under these circumstances he happened, in fact to be seen, he would not be subject to punishment. (9)

The word "wilfully" as applied to the offence declared by this section implies that the act was done with evil intent, and without justifiable excuse, while the word "unlawful" does not necessarily refer to criminal penalty or prohibition. (10)

A charge of 'unlawfully" committing an indecent act does not sufficiently charge that the act was "wilfully" done; and an accused person who, on his plea of guilty, is summarily convicted upon such a charge and who is sentenced to imprisonment, is entitled to be discharged on habeas corpus, as the commitment and conviction disclose no offence under the Criminal Code. (1)

A summary conviction for indecency under section 205 must find that the act was wilful, and the omission of such finding is a good ground for discharge upon habeas corpus. A statement in the conviction that the accused "unlawfully" committed an indecent act does not cure the defect of not stating that the act was done wilfully in terms of the enactment creating the offence. (1*a*)

The singer of a song containing indecent descriptions, and accompanying same with gestures contrary to propriety, is guilty of an offence under section 205, (old Code, sec. 177). (2)

A provincial legislature has jurisdiction to legislate concerning matters of police regulation of public morals, but in so far as the same subject is dealt with by the Dominion Parliament, the Dominion legislation will prevail. whipped who, in public or private, commits, or is a party to the commission of, or procures or attempts to procure the commission by any male person, of any act of gross indecency with another male person. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 178.

It has been held in England that it is not necessary, in order to convict a male person, under section 11 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, of an act of gross indecency with another male person, that such other male person should also be charged with and convicted of such act of indecency. It is an indictable offence, under the English Act above mentioned, for one male person to procure the commission by a second male person of an act of gross indecency with himself, the first mentioned or such persons. (1)

On the trial of any offence under sections 202-206, the public may be excluded from the Court room. (See sec. 645, post.)

207. Publishing obscene matter.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who knowingly, without lawful justification or excuse—

(a) makes, manufactures, or sells, or exposes for sale or to public view, or distributes or circulates, or causes to be distributed or circulated, or has in his possession for sale, distribution or circulation, or assists in such making, manufacture, sale, exposure, having in possession, distribution or circulation, any obscene book, or other printed, typewritten or otherwise written matter, or any picture, photograph, model or other object tending to corrupt morals, or any plate for the reproduction of any such picture or photograph; or,

(b) publicly exhibits any disgusting object or any indecent show; or,

(c) offers to sell, advertise, publishes an advertisement of, or has for sale or disposal, any medicine, drug, or article intended or represented as a means of preventing conception or of causing abortion or miscarriage.

2. No one shall be convicted of any offence in this section mentioned if he proves that the public good was served by the acts alleged to have been done, and that there was no excess in the acts alleged beyond what the public good required.

3. It shall be a question for the court or judge whether the occasion of the manufacture, sale, exposing for sale, publishing, or exhibition is such as might be for the public good, and whether there is evidence of excess beyond what the public good required in the manner, extent or circumstances in, to or under which the manufacture, sale, exposing for sale, publishing or exhibition is made; but it shall be a question for the jury whether there is or is not such excess.

(1) R. v. Jones and another, 18 Cox, 207.

4. The motives of the manufacturer, seller, exposer, publisher or exhibitor shall in all cases be irrelevant. 63-64 V., c. 46, s. 3. (As amended by the 8-9 Edw. VII. c. 9, s. 2).

The Royal Commissioners in their Report say that the section of the English Draft Code as to obscene publications expresses the existing law, but that it puts it in a much more definite form than before. They add: "We do not, however, think it desirable to attempt any definition of obscene libel other than that conveyed by the expression itself."

Where a defendant was indicted for offering for sale a medicine called a "Female Regulator," contained in a box on which was printed,—"Caution. —Ladies are warned against using these tablets during pregnancy," and no evidence was offered as to the ingredients of the tablets, the Crown simply contending that the caution in reality counselled the use of the medicine to avoid pregnancy, the Judge held that the words must be taken in their natural sense, and directed the jury to acquit, reserving at the Crown's request, a case. (2); and it was afterwards held, by the Court of Appeal, that the trial judge may withdraw such a case from the jury if the advertisement is incapable of such a meaning as was imputed to it, but that if it be held to be capable of such a meaning it should be left to the jury to decide whether or not it actually had such meaning, having regard to the context of certain objectionable words. (3)

To constitute a book or printed matter "obscene," within the meaning of the above section, it must express unchaste or lustful ideas, and tend to corrupt those whose minds are open to such immoral influences and into whose hands the publication may fall. It is obligatory on the prosecution to prove knowledge, on the part of the accused, of the contents of the obscene publication. (4)

Where a defendant had been summarily convicted of having, without lawful excuse or justification, exposed to public view an obscene book tending to corrupt morals,—the evidence shewing that the book in question was one describing certain diseases and that it was distributed gratis by the defendant with the object of assisting the sale by him of certain medicines,—and the defendant's counsel, on a motion to make absolute a rule nisi to quash the conviction, contended that the conviction was bad on its face for not disclosing the offence alleged to have been committed by setting out the alleged obscene portions of it, and in simply following the language of section 179, and that it should not be amended because an offence was not shewn to have been committed of the nature specified in the conviction, the book in question not being one tending to corrupt public morals, — it was held that the conviction was bad on its face and could not be amended by setting out such parts of the book as might be deemed obscene or tending to corrupt public morals: and the rule was made absolute. (5)

This case appears to have been decided on the strength of (among other authorities), the decision of the English Court of Appeal in the case of Charles Bradlaugh and Annie Besant, who were charged with and convicted of having published an obscene book called "Fruits of Philosophy," professedly a work on medical science and political economy, and whose conviction was, in appeal, set aside on the ground that the indictment was bad, after verdict, because it did not set out the alleged obscene portions of the work, it being held that, as the words of a libel constituting the crime, the rule of the common law, — when the common law is unaltered by any statutory provision to the contrary, — is that the words of the alleged libel (whether defamatory, blasphemous, seditious or obscene), must be set out in the indictment, and that their omission therefrom is a defect which could be attacked either by demurrer, by motion in arrest of judgment or by appeal (writ of error). (6)

But, in England, since the Bradlaugh case, the law has been altered by the Law of Libel Amendment Act, 1888, section 7 of which renders it unnecessary to set out in the indictment the obscene passages in full, by providing that it is "sufficient to deposit the book, newspaper or other document containing the alleged libel with the indictment or other judicial proceeding, together with particulars shewing, precisely, by reference to pages, columns and lines, in what part of the book, newspaper or other document the alleged libel is to be found, and such particulars shall be deemed to form part of the record."

See section 855, post, of our Code, which, by sub-section e thereof, declares that no count shall be objectionable or insufficient for the reason only that it does not set out the words used where words are the subject of the charge; and see also section 861, post, which expressly declares that no count for publishing a blasphemous, seditious, obscene or defamatory libel, or for selling or exhibiting an obscene book, etc., shall be deemed insufficient for not setting out the words thereof.

An accused had inserted in a newspaper, of which he was the editor, advertisements which, though not obscene in themselves, related, as he knew, to the sale of obscene books and photographs. A police officer wrote to the addresses given in the advertisements, and received in return from the advertisers, who were foreigners residing abroad, obscene books and photographs. At the trial of the accused, upon an indictment charging him with causing and procuring obscene books and photographs to be sold and published and to be sent by post contrary to the Imperial Post Office (Protection) Act, 1884, he was convicted and the conviction was affirmed by the Court of Crown Cases Reserved. (7)

208. Immoral theatrical performance.—Every person who, being the lessee, agent or person in charge or manager of a theatre, presents or gives or allows to be presented or given therein any immoral, indecent or obscene play, opera, concert, acrobatic, variety, or vaudeville performance, or other entertainment or representation, is guilty of an offence punishable on indictment or on summary conviction, and liable, if convicted upon indictment, to one year's imprisonment with or without hard labor, or to a fine of five hundred dollars, or to both, and, on summary conviction, to six months' imprisonment, or to a fine of fifty dollars, or to both.

2. Every person who takes part or appears as an actor, performer, or assistant in any capacity, in any such immoral, indecent or obscene play, opera, concert, performance, or other entertainment or representation, is guilty of an offence and liable, on summary conviction, to three months' imprisonment, or to a fine not exceeding twenty dollars, or to both.

3. Every person who so takes part or appears in an indecent costume is guilty of an offence and liable, on summary conviction, to six months' imprisonment, or to a fine of fifty dollars, or to both. 3 E. VII., c. 13, s. 2.

Ordinary ballet-dancing in the customary costume is not an immoral or indecent play or performance within the meaning of this section.

The word "indecent" has no fixed legal meaning, and it devolves upon the prosecution in a charge of presenting an indecent theatrical performance to affirmatively prove that the performance in question was of a depraving tendency. (8)

A provincial legislature has jurisdiction to legislate concerning matters of police regulation of public morals; but, in so far as the same subject is dealt with by the Dominion Parliament, the Dominion legislation will prevail. (9)

209. Posting obscene publications.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who posts for transmission or delivery by or through the post,—

(a) any obscene or immoral book, pamphlet, newspaper, picture, print, engraving, lithograph, photograph or any publication, matter or thing of an indecent, immoral, or scurrilous character; or,

(b) any letter upon the outside or envelope of which, or any post card or post band or wrapper upon which there are words, devices, matters or things of the character aforesaid; or,

(c) any letter or circular concerning schemes devised or intended to deceive and defraud the public, or for the purpose of obtaining money under false pretences. 63-64 V., c. 46, s. 3.

Seduction.

210. Burden of proof in seduction.—The burden of proof of previous unchastity on the part of the girl or woman under the three next succeeding sections shall be upon the accused. 63-64 V., c. 46, s. 3.

(8) R. v. McAuliffe, 8 Can. Cr. Cas., 21.
(9) Ex. p. Ashley, 8 Can. Cr. Cas., 328.

211. Seduction of girls between fourteen and sixteen.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who seduces or has illicit connection with any girl of previously chaste character, of or above the age of fourteen years and under the age of sixteen years. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 181; 56 V., c. 32, s. 1.

Where the girl is under the age of fourteen, the charge should be made under section 301, post, for carnally knowing her.

PREVIOUS CHASTITY.—The above section, 211, provides that the girl seduced or with whom the illicit intercourse is had shall be of previously chaste character; and, in some American cases, it has been held that, although the law presumes that every woman is chaste and of good repute, it also presumes every one to be innocent of crime till proven guilty, and, that, therefore, in cases of seduction, the burden is upon the prosecution to prove, in the first instance, that the girl is of good repute. (1) But it will be seen that, by section 210, ante, of our Code, it is expressly provided that the burden of proof of the previous unchastity of the girl or woman under sections 211, 212 and 213 shall be upon the accused.

The term "previously chaste character" is not equivalent to previously chaste reputation, but refers to the actual moral status of the woman. Under certain circumstances, it seems that a woman who has been guilty of unchaste conduct may subsequently become chaste in legal contemplation and be seduced a second time. (2)

On an indictment for seduction of a virtuous unmarried female, it was held, in an American case, that the want of chastity may be considered on the question of whether the girl, though a virgin, was really seduced or whether she shared the intercourse for the gratification of lascivious propensities and without being influenced by the acts or importunity of the accused; (3) and, in another American case, it was held that an act of carnal intercourse induced simply by mutual desire of the parties to gratify the sexual passion is not seduction. (4)

It should, however, be further observed, that the above section, 211, of our Code provides that every one is guilty of an indictable offence who "seduces OR has illicit connection," etc.; so that, while seduction, if proved, is punishable, it seems, also, that the mere act of illicit connection with a previously chaste girl between fourteen and sixteen years of age is sufficient of itself to constitute an offence under this section.

PROOF OF AGE.—With regard to proof of the child's age, see the English case of R. v. Weaver, in which the defendant was indicted for and found guilty of carnally knowing a girl under twelve and over ten, and in which it was held that an extract from a register of births, purporting to be signed and certified by a deputy superintendent registrar as the person in whose custody the register was, was admissible in evidence on its mere production, and that,—in the testimony of the child's grandmother, who testified that she believed the prosecutrix to be the child named in the extract,—there was sufficient evidence of the identity of the prosecutrix with the child mentioned in the extract. (5)

Where the mother of the child stated its age, in the first instance, but in cross-examination appeared neither to know the year nor the month of its birth, it was held that there was evidence to go to the jury of the child's age. (6)

By section 984, post, of our Code, it is provided that in order to prove the age of a girl, for the purposes of sections 211, etc. the following shall be sufficient prima facie evidence, namely, "(a) any entry or record by an incorporated society or its officers having had the control or care of the girl at or about the time of her being brought to Canada, if such entry or record has been made before the alleged offence was committed;" and that "(b) in the absence of other evidence, or by way of corroboration of other evidence, the judge or the jury before whom an indictment is tried, or the justice before whom a preliminary enquiry thereinto is held, may infer the age from the girl's appearance."

CORROBORATION.—The corroboration made necessary by section 1002, post, in cases under sections 211 to 220, may consist of the accused's admission, made after the girl attained the age of sixteen, that he had had connection with her; and an admission, made by the accused before being charged with the offence, that he had been advised that if he could get the girl to marry him he would escape punishment, is corroborative evidence implicating him and is proper to be considered by a jury or by a judge exercising the functions of a jury. (7)

Evidence that the accused charged with seduction of a girl between fourteen and sixteen, had previously told a witness, other than the girl, of his desire to have sexual intercourse with her, and of subsequent admissions of the accused from which it might be inferred that he had afterwards taken advantage of an opportunity when he was left in charge of the house where the girl lived is corroborative evidence. (8)

The corroboration need not be as to every fact in issue. It is sufficient if it confirms the belief that the prosecutrix is speaking the truth. (9)

Mere proof of opportunity to have sexual intercourse is not sufficient corroboration. (10)

Evidence of the girl's pregnancy and of her having been employed in domestic service at the defendant's residence and of facts shewing merely a strong probability of there having been no opportunity at which any other man could have been responsible for her condition does not constitute corroborative evidence implicating the accused and which is required by section 1002 in order to sustain a conviction. (1)

EVIDENCE OF A HIGHER CRIME THAN SEDUCTION.—Where a prisoner was indicted and convicted, under section 3, clause a of the R. S. C., 1886, c. 157, of having seduced a girl under sixteen, it was held that he was properly convicted of the offence, although the evidence adduced would,—if believed in toto,—have supported a conviction for rape,—(an indictment for which had been previously ignored by the Grand Jury),—the Court, in confirming the conviction, remarking that the jury (as they were perfectly competent to do), had evidently given credit to the girl's evidence as to seduction but had not accepted her statement with reference to violence. (2)

This was the principle acted upon in an American case in which it was held that, in a case of seduction, it was proper to instruct the jury that before acquitting on the ground of there being evidence of the commission of a higher offence,—for instance, rape,—they must believe that such evidence would, on a trial for the higher offence, have been sufficient to justify a conviction, but that if they believed that, although the defendant had made use of force, the prosecutrix had yielded her consent, however reluctantly, before the carnal act was accomplished, the defendant would not be guilty of the higher crime. There is an important difference between section 211 of our Code and section 3, clause a of the R. S. C., 1886, c. 157, the latter making it a criminal offence to seduce AND have illicit connection with a girl of previously chaste character between the ages of fourteen and sixteen while, as already above observed, section 211 of the Code makes it a criminal offence either to seduce OR have illicit connection with such a girl.

212. Seduction under promise of marriage.—Every one, above the age of twenty-one years, is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who, under promise of marriage, seduces and has illicit connection with any unmarried female of previously chaste character and under twenty-one years of age. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 182.

The word "seduce," though a general term having a variety of meanings according to the subject to which it is applied, has, when it is used with reference to the conduct of a man towards a woman, a precise and determinate signification, and is universally understood to mean an enticement of her on his part to surrender her chastity, by means of some art, influence, promise or deception calculated to accomplish that object, and to include the yielding of her person to him as much as if it was expressly stated. (4)

The offence consists in enticing a woman from the path of virtue and obtaining her consent to illicit intercourse by means of promises made at the time. The promise and yielding her virtue in consequence thereof is the gist of the offence. If she resists but finally assents or yields, induced thereto by or in reliance upon the promise made, the offence is committed. (5)

To establish a charge of seduction it must be made to appear that the intercourse was accomplished by some artifice or deception and that there was something more than a mere appeal to the lust or passion of the woman. (6)

Where the law, as in the above section, 212, expressly provides that the seduction must be accomplished by means of a promise to marry, the offence is committed if the man has had carnal intercourse to which the woman assented by reason of a promise of marriage made by the man at the time and to which without the promise she would not have yielded. (7)

It has been held by the New York Court of Appeal that, where a defendant had induced a woman to have sexual intercourse with him by promising to marry her in case of her becoming pregnant, he was not guilty of seduction under promise of marriage, the Court remarking that the statute, making seduction under promise of marriage a crime, was passed to protect a confiding and chaste woman in yielding to the solicitation of the man who promised to marry her and not for the purpose of protecting a woman who was willing to consent to the act and who only asked for a promise to marry her in case of her lapse from chastity being discovered by reason of her becoming pregnant as a result of the intercourse. (8)

It has been held by the Supreme Court of the North-West Territories that to constitute the offence of seduction "under promise of marriage" under the above section 212 (old Code, section 182), it must be shewn that the seduction was accomplished by means of the promise of marriage. (9) And by a recent decision of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia it has been held that the seduction and illicit connection with a girl under 21 is "under promise of marriage," whether it follows immediately after the promise, or afterwards during the engagement,—if the facts shew that the subsistence of the promise of marriage induced the girl's consent to carnal intercourse. (10)

CORROBORATION.—With regard to the necessity of corroboration required by section 1002 post, it has been held in an American case that where the woman or girl is the only witness, evidence otherwise of such circumstances as usually accompany a marriage engagement is sufficient to satisfy that provision of the law which requires that the evidence of the woman in a trial for seduction under promise of marriage must, as to the promise of marriage, be corroborated to the same extent as that of the principal witness in a case of perjury; (1) and, again, where the law makes it an offence to seduce an "innocent and virtuous" woman under promise of marriage, and provides "that the unsupported testimony of the woman shall not be sufficient to convict," the additional evidence required must be not only as to the act of sexual intercourse but also as to its inducement by a promise of marriage. (2)

213. Seduction of ward or of female employee.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment,—

(a) who, being a guardian, seduces or has illicit connection with his ward; or,

(b) who seduces or has illicit connection with any woman or girl previously chaste and under the age of twenty-one years who is in his employment in a factory, mill, workshop, shop or store, or who, being in a common, but not necessarily similar, employment with him in such factory, mill, workshop, shop or store, is, in respect of her employment or work in such factory, mill, workshop, shop or store, under or in any way subject to his control or direction, or receives her wages or salary directly or indirectly from him. 63-64 V., c. 46, s. 3.

According to the terms of this section, the mere fact of illicit connection by a guardian with his ward constitutes of itself,—independently of and in addition to seduction—an offence; and the same observation applies to that part of the section which refers to an employer of or one in common employment with and having illicit connection with a woman or girl employed in a factory, mill, workshop, shop or store.

It has been held in an American case, that an indictment of a guardian for carnally knowing his ward is insufficient when it fails to allege that the act was committed while the female remained in his care or custody. (3) But see section 197*b*, ante, as to the meaning of the term "guardian;" and see sub-section 3 of section 852, post, which provides that a count of an indictment may be in the words of the enactment describing the offence or in any words sufficient to give the accused notice of the offence with which he is charged.

214. Seduction of female passengers on vessels.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a fine of four hundred dollars, or to one year's imprisonment, who, being the master or other officer or a seaman or other person employed on board of any vessel, while such vessel is in any water within the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada, under promise of marriage, or by threats, or by the exercise of his authority, or by solicitation, or the making of gifts or presents, seduces and has illicit connection with any female passenger.

2. The subsequent intermarriage of the seducer and the seduced is, if pleaded, a good defence to any indictment for any offence against this or either of the two last preceding sections, except in the case of a guardian seducing his ward. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 184.

Sub-section 2 of this section makes the subsequent marriage of the parties if pleaded a good defence.

Where in an American case of seduction the accused stated in open Court on the case being called for trial that he was willing to marry the prosecutrix it was held that the charge should be dismissed. (4) It is doubtful, however, if this would hold good here, seeing that it is not a mere offer of marriage but an actual marriage subsequent to the seduction that is declared by sub-section 2 of section 214 to be a good defence.

LIMITATION.—No prosecution for any offence under sections 211, 212 and 213, can be commenced after the expiration of one year from its commission. (Section 1140*c*, post.)

Where a seduction under a promise of marriage has taken place and the illicit intercourse between the parties is continued, upon renewals of promise, for more than a year before the commencement of the prosecution, a prosecution for the original seduction is barred (under section 1140 (c), post), and a conviction is not warranted as for a subsequent seduction within the year, as the girl is not then of "previously chaste character." (5)

215. Parent or guardian procuring defilement of girl or woman.—Every one who, being the parent or guardian of any girl or woman,—

(a) procures such girl or woman to have carnal connection with any man other than the procurer; or,

(b) orders, is party to, permits or knowingly receives the avails of, the defilement, seduction or prostitution of such girl or woman; is guilty of an indictable offence, and liable to fourteen years' imprisonment, if such girl or woman is under the age of fourteen years, and if such girl or woman is of or above the age of fourteen years, to five years' imprisonment. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 186.

216. Procuring defilement of women or girls.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to five years' imprisonment with hard labour, who,—

(a) procures, or attempts to procure, any girl or woman under twenty-one years of age, not being a common prostitute or of immoral character, to have unlawful carnal connection, either within or without Canada, with any other person or persons; or,

(b) inveigles or entices any such woman or girl to a house of ill-fame or assignation for the purpose of illicit intercourse or prostitution, or knowingly conceals in such house any such woman or girl so inveigled or enticed; or,

(c) procures or attempts to procure, any woman or girl to become, either within or without Canada, a common prostitute; or,

(d) procures, or attempts to procure, any woman or girl to leave Canada with intent that she may become an inmate of a brothel elsewhere; or,

(e) procures any woman or girl to come to Canada from abroad with intent that she may become an inmate of a brothel in Canada; or,

(f) procures, or attempts to procure, any woman or girl to leave her usual place of abode in Canada, such place not being a brothel, with intent that she may become an inmate of a brothel, within or without Canada; or,

(g) by threats or intimidation procures, or attempts to procure, any woman or girl to have any unlawful carnal connection, either within or without Canada; or,

(h) by false pretences or false representations procures any woman or girl, not being a common prostitute or of known immoral character, to have any unlawful carnal connection, either within or without Canada; or,

(i) applies, administers to, or causes to be taken by any woman or girl any drug, intoxicating liquor, matter, or thing with intent to stupefy or overpower so as thereby to enable any person to have unlawful connection with such woman or girl. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 185. (As amended by the 8 and 9 Edw. VII., c 9, s. 2).

SEARCH WARRANTS.—Section 640, post, provides that,—"Whenever there is reason to believe that any woman or girl, mentioned in section 216, has been inveigled or enticed to a house of ill-fame or assignation, then upon complaint thereof being made under oath by the parent, husband, master or guardian of such woman or girl, or in the event of such woman or girl having no known parent, husband, master or guardian in the place in which the offence is alleged to have been committed, by any other person, to any justice or to a judge of any court authorized to issue warrants in cases of alleged offences against the criminal law, such justice or judge may issue a warrant to enter by day or night, such house of ill-fame or assignation, and if necessary use force for the purpose of effecting such entry whether by breaking open doors or otherwise, and to search for such woman or girl, and bring her and the person or persons in whose keeping and possession she is, before such justice or judge, who may, on examination, order her to be delivered to her parent, husband, master or guardian, or to be discharged, as law and justice require."

Upon a charge of procuring a girl to come to Canada from abroad with intent that she may become an inmate of a brothel in Canada, the acts of inducement must be shewn to have been committed in Canada, in order to give jurisdiction to a Canadian court, unless the accused is a British subject. (6)

217. Householders permitting defilement of girls on their premises.—Every one who, being the owner or occupier of any premises, or having, or acting or assisting in, the management or control thereof, induces or knowingly suffers any girl under the age of eighteen years to resort to or be in or upon such premises for the purpose of being unlawfully and carnally known by any man, whether such carnal knowledge is intended to be with any particular man, or generally, is guilty of an indictable offence, and is liable,—

(a) to ten years' imprisonment if such girl is under the age of fourteen years;

(b) to two years' imprisonment if such girl is of or above the age of fourteen years. 63-64 V., c. 46, s. 3.

A father who knowingly suffers his daughter (under sixteen), who lives in his house, to act as a prostitute therein, has been convicted, under sections, similar to the above, of the English Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885. (7) But a mother who, in order to obtain conclusive evidence against the seducer of her daughter, permitted him to come to her home and repeat the immoral intercourse, was held to be not guilty of a criminal offence. So, that, where,—on the hearing of a charge, under section 5 of the English Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (making it a criminal offence to carnally know or attempt to carnally know a girl between 13 and 16 years of age),—it came out, in evidence, that, when the girl told her mother she was enceinte by the accused, she was told by her mother to bring him to the house of her parents, which she did, and the immoral intercourse was there repeated, the mother admitting that she had, by arrangement with her daughter, found the accused in the act, in order that she might obtain evidence upon which to prosecute, an application was,—after the accused was committed for trial,—made to the justices for a summons against the mother charging her, under section 6 of the Act, with being the occupier of premises and with having induced or suffered her daughter, a girl between 13 and 16, to be in such premises for the purpose of being unlawfully and carnally known, and, the justices having refused the application, it was held, upon an application for a mandamus to compel the justices to grant the summons, that the mother's conduct was not an offence under section 6 of the Act, and the mandamus was refused. (8)

On a charge of allowing a girl under 18 to be upon premises for immoral purposes, the evidence of the girl proving that she shared with the proprietor the money she obtained by prostitution there carried on, is sufficiently corroborated, under section 1002, post, by the evidence of another witness tending to shew that the place was a bawdy house. (9)

LIMITATION.—No prosecution for any offence under sections 215, 216 and 217 can be commenced after the expiration of one year from its commission. (See section 1140c, post.)

218. Conspiracy to defile.—Everyone is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who conspires with any other person by false pretenses, or false representations or other fraudulent means, to induce any woman to commit adultery or fornication. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 188.

See comments under section 204, ante,—on incest, adultery and fornication.

It has been held, by the Supreme Court of Illinois, that a count charging a conspiracy to induce a female to commit fornication, (which, under the statutes of Illinois, is a misdemeanor), may be joined in the same indictment with counts charging defendants with abduction of the same female for the purpose of prostitution, and with unlawfully detaining her in a house of ill-fame, although, under the laws of Illinois, these latter charges are felonies; and that upon trial on such an indictment, a verdict finding the defendants "guilty as charged in the indictment," and fixing a punishment that might be inflicted under any one of the counts, is sufficient. (10)

219. Carnally knowing idiots, &c.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to four years' imprisonment who unlawfully and carnally knows, or attempts to have unlawful carnal knowledge of, any female idiot or imbecile, insane or deaf and dumb woman or girl, under circumstances which do not amount to rape, but where the offender knew or had good reason to believe, at the time of the offence, that the woman or girl was an idiot, or imbecile, or insane or deaf and dumb. 63-64 V., c. 46, s. 3.

220. Prostitution of Indian Women.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a penalty not exceeding one hundred dollars and not less than ten dollars, or six months' imprisonment,—

(a) who, being the keeper of any house, tent or wigwam, allows or suffers an unenfranchised Indian woman to be or remain in such house, tent or wigwam, knowing or having probable cause for believing that such Indian woman is in or remains in such house, tent or wigwam with the intention of prostituting herself therein; or,

(b) who, being an Indian woman, prostitutes herself therein; or,

(c) who, being an unenfranchised Indian woman, keeps, frequents or is found in a disorderly house, tent or wigwam used for any such purpose.

2. Every person who appears, acts or behaves as master or mistress, or as the person who has the care or management, of any house, tent or wigwam in which any such Indian woman is or remains for the purpose of prostituting herself therein, is deemed to be the keeper thereof, notwithstanding he or she is not in fact the real keeper thereof. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 190.

Nuisances.

221. Common nuisance defined.—A common nuisance is an unlawful act or omission to discharge a legal duty, which act or omission endangers the lives, safety, health, property or comfort of the public, or by which the public are obstructed in the exercise or enjoyment of any right common to all His Majesty's subjects. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 191.

This section is in the exact words of the corresponding section of the English Draft Code; and the following are the remarks thereon of the Royal Commissioners:—

"With regard to nuisances, * * * we have,—in sections 151 and 152—(1), drawn a line between such nuisances as are and such as are not to be regarded as criminal offences. It seems to us anomalous and objectionable upon all grounds that the law should in any way countenance the proposition that it is a criminal offence not to repair a highway when the liability to do so is disputed in perfect good faith. Nuisances which endanger the life, safety or health of the public stand on a different footing.

(1) Sections 151 and 152 of the English Draft Code are similar to our sections 222 and 223, post.

"By the present law, when a civil right such as the right of way is claimed by one private person and denied by another, the mode to try the question is by an action. But when the right is claimed by the public, who are not competent to bring an action, the only mode of trying the question is by an indictment or information, which is in form the same as an indictment or information for a crime. But it was very early determined that though it was in form a prosecution for a crime, yet that as it involved a remedy for a civil right, the Crown's pardon could not be pleaded in bar. See 3 Inst., 237. And the legislature, so recently as in the statute 40 and 41 Vict., c. 14, again recognized the distinction. The existing remedy in such cases is not convenient, but it is not within our province to suggest any amendment. The other sections are mostly re-enactments of statutes; but sections 153 and 158 (2) are declaratory of the common law, though we have suggested the addition of hard labor to the punishment."

PUBLIC AND PRIVATE NUISANCES.—The term "nuisance" is derived from the French word nuire, to do hurt or to annoy.

A common or public nuisance, under the common law, is such as in its nature or its consequences is "an injury or damage to all persons who come within the sphere of its operation, though it may be so in greater degree to some than to others." (3) According to Blackstone it is an offence "against the public order and economical regimen of the State, being either the doing of a thing to the annoyance of the King's subjects or the neglecting to do a thing which the common good requires." (4) For example, if, in the operation of a manufactory,—such as a dye-works, a tallow furnace, a smelting house, a tanning factory, or a lime-pit for cleaning skins, — volumes of noxious smoke or poisonous effluvia are emitted, to persons who are within reach of these operations and whose health may be thereby endangered, a nuisance, in the popular sense of the term, is committed. So, also, an obstruction in a highway is, to all who have occasion to travel upon it, a nuisance. It may be a greater nuisance to those who have to travel over it daily than it is to a person using it only once a year; but it is more or less a nuisance to every one who has occasion to use it, and it is therefore a common or public nuisance, (5) although not of so serious a character as a nuisance endangering life or health.

Alterations authorized by statute to be made upon highways must be made with reasonable care so as to cause no unnecessary danger to the travelling public, or the parties doing the work may be indicted. (5*a*)

Where, however, the thing complained of is such as to be limited to one or only a few individuals, it is a private nuisance. For instance, if a man by building up a wall darkens the ancient windows of one or of several different dwelling houses, this is only an injury or a nuisance to the particular persons who live in them. It does not affect the public generally and he is not, in thus acting, necessarily guilty of a common nuisance. (6)

Of course, it is needless to remark that a private nuisance cannot be the subject of a criminal prosecution. A nuisance is not a criminal offence unless it is a common nuisance; and, as will be seen by sections 222 and 223, even a common nuisance is not always and under all circumstances a criminal offence. Section 221 defines what common nuisances are; and section 222 specifies which of them are indictable as criminal offences, by enacting that a common nuisance is so indictable which endangers the lives, safety or health of the public or which (though not dangerous to life, etc.), occasions injury to the person of any individual. (7)

It has been said that in judging of a public nuisance, the public good it does might, in some cases, where the public health was not concerned, be taken in consideration, in order to see if the public annoyance was outweighed by the public benefit derived; (8) but this doctrine was overruled in Ward's case, where it was held to be no answer to an indictment for a nuisance in a harbor, by erecting an embankment, that, although the work was in some degree a hindrance to navigation, it was advantageous in a greater degree to the other uses of the port. (9)

No length of time will legalize a nuisance. (10)

222. Criminal common nuisances.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to one year's imprisonment or a fine who commits any common nuisance which endangers the lives, safety or health of the public, or which occasions injury to the person of any individual. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 192.

Under the general definition contained in section 221, there must,—in order to constitute a common nuisance,—be an unlawful act done or a legal duty omitted, which unlawful act or unlawful omission either endangers public life, safety, health, property or comfort, or obstructs the public in the exercise or enjoyment of a common right.

When we take sections 221, 222 and 223, and read them together, we find that common nuisances, as therein dealt with, divide themselves into two classes, namely, 1, those which are dangerous to the lives, safety or health of the public, and, 2, those which are not dangerous to the lives, safety, or health of the public,—although they may interfere with or even endanger public comfort or property, or obstruct the public in exercising or enjoying a common right.

With regard to the first of these two classes,—a common nuisance of a nature to endanger the lives, safety, or health of the public,—it is criminal in itself, and is so treated in section 222, which makes it an indictable offence; but, with regard to the second class,—those which are not of a nature to endanger the lives, etc., of the public,—it seems that none of them is to be treated as a criminal offence, except when occasioning actual injury to the person of some individual; and, then being,—(under the general definition in section 221),—a common nuisance, (though not criminal, in itself, because not in its nature dangerous to public life, safety or health), it becomes an indictable offence by the terms of section 222, which makes every common nuisance (not, in itself, dangerous to public life, safety or health), a criminal offence if it occasions injury to the person of any individual. In other words, all common nuisances, which are in themselves dangerous to public life, safety or health, are indictable offences, and all other common nuisances become indictable and punishable when they occasion actual injury to the person of any individual.

Section 222 must not be taken to mean that an act which occasions injury to the person of any individual is thereby constituted a common nuisance. As any one who makes but a cursory examination of it, will readily see, the section does not say so. On the contrary, it deals, disjunctively, but distinctly, with two different classes of common nuisance; and if we were to take out from the section the words,—"which endangers the lives, safety or health of the public, or,"—the section would still be complete and would read as follows:

"Every one is guilty of an indictable offence, and liable to one year's imprisonment or a fine, who commits any common nuisance which occasions injury to the person of any individual."

If, on the other hand, we were to take out from the section the words "or which occasion injury to the person of any individual," the section would, in that case also, be complete and would read as follows:—

"Every one is guilty of an indictable offence, and liable to one year's imprisonment or a fine, who commits any common nuisance which endangers the lives, safety or health of the public."

There are, thus, two separate and distinct offences dealt with by this section, 222. In each there is a common nuisance, and each must conform to and fulfil the essential elements of a common nuisance as defined, in a general way, by section 221; but one is and must be a common nuisance which in its nature endangers public life, safety or health; while the other is and must be a common nuisance which (not being in itself dangerous to public life, safety or health), has occasioned injury to some individual.

The omission of an electric railway company, operating their cars upon a highway, to use reasonable precautions to avoid endangering the lives of the public using the highway in common with the company, is a breach of a legal duty constituting a common nuisance under the above sections 221 and 222, for which an indictment will lie against such company. (1)

A street railway commits a common nuisance by systematically moving electric cars reversely on a public street without fenders and gongs or other signalling appliances being placed at the rear of the cars, while being so operated, and thereby endangering the lives and safety of the public. An indictable nuisance, under the above sections, may consist in the mode of using or controlling anything, and it is not essential to the offence that there should be anything dangerous in the thing itself. (2)

An indictment for a nuisance in obstructing a public highway is insufficient to charge a criminal offence under the above sections, if it does not allege injury to the person of some one; and personal injury is not to be inferred from a count which states that "actual" injury has been occasioned to an individual named. (3)

An indictment at common law for a nuisance in obstructing a highway must contain the words "to the common nuisance of all His Majesty's subjects passing, etc., along such highway," and must particularize the highway and the nature of the obstruction. (4)

A prosecution of a municipal corporation for a nuisance in not keeping a public street in repair can only be by indictment under the provisions of section 873, post. (Old Code, sec. 641). (5)

(5) R. v. City of London, 21 C. L. T., 71.

The keeping of a house or private hospital for the treatment of consumptive patients is not a business ejusdem generis with bone boiling, soap boiling, oil refining, gas manufacturing or the storing of hides, so as to constitute an "other noxious or offensive trade or business" made an offence under the Public Health Act, (Ont.), where done without the consent of the municipality. (6)

Certain counts of an indictment charged the accused with having "unlawfully and wilfully neglected to bury or cause to be buried dead bodies whereby and by reason of the decomposition of the dead bodies, whilst in her care and whilst remaining unburied in her dwelling house," divers injurious and unwholesome smells arose and issued from the said dead bodies, and thereby the air was greatly infected and corrupted and became for several days offensive, unwholesome, injurious and dangerous to health to the great damage and common nuisance of such of the liege subjects of our Lord the King as inhabited the said house, etc. Held, that these counts were bad, as they did not allege a nuisance to the public but only a nuisance to certain persons dwelling in a private dwelling house. (7)

The defendant was indicted for a nuisance by placing and keeping a coffee-stall upon a public carriage-way and so obstructing the same. The coffee-stall was placed as a permanent structure in a space between a public convenience and a fountain, nearly in the middle of one of the main streets of a certain town. The jury found that "the coffee-stall" was an obstruction, but that it did not appreciably interfere with the traffic in the street. The Judge directed a verdict of guilty to be entered. Held, that the conviction must be quashed, as the finding of the jury, in the absence of a finding that the coffee-stall was a nuisance, was insufficient to support a verdict of "guilty." (8)

223. Non-criminal common nuisances.—Any one convicted upon any indictment or information for any common nuisance other than those mentioned in the last preceding section, shall not be deemed to have committed a criminal offence; but all such proceedings or judgments may be taken and had as heretofore to abate or remedy the mischief done by such nuisance to the public right. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 193.

If a municipality found guilty of maintaining a nuisance by not repairing a highway, makes default under the judgment ordering abatement thereof, but repairs the highway pending a motion for a writ of de novo cumvendo, the Court may in its discretion order the costs of the motion to be paid by the defendant. (9)

224. Knowingly selling articles unfit for human food.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to one year's imprisonment who knowingly and wilfully exposes for sale, or has in his possession with intent to sell, for human food, articles which he knows to be unfit for human food.

2. Every one who is convicted of this offence after a previous conviction for the same crime shall be liable to two years' imprisonment. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 194.

Section 117 of the English Public Health Acts, 1875 and 1890, (38-39 Vict., c. 55, and 53-54 Vict., c. 59), is similar in effect, though not in wording to the above section, 224, of our Code, except that there is a difference in the punishment inflicted.

Where, under the English Act, a butcher was charged with having in his possession a diseased carcase for the purpose of preparation for sale and intended for the food of man, and the proof shewed that the defendant had purchased a cow which he knew to be unfit for human food, had slaughtered the beast, and was about to dress it for human food, when it was seized by a nuisance inspector, the justices on this proof dismissed the charge on the ground that the defendant had not exposed the meat for sale; but, in appeal, it was held that the justices were wrong, and that a person who has unsound meat in his possession with the intention of selling the same for food of man is guilty of an offence under the Act; although he may not have actually exposed it for sale. (10)

It is immaterial that the disease could only be detected on killing the animal and that the carcase was seized immediately on slaughter. (1)

Foreign walnuts were sold by a fruit broker to a retail dealer upon condition that the latter "destroy the unsound portion before offering them to the public." The retail dealer having, after making the purchase, found that the bulk of the nuts were bad, did not offer them for sale but handed them over to a sanitary inspector, who procured their condemnation as unfit for the food of man. The fruit broker was then indicted and convicted; but the Court of Crown Cases Reserved quashed the conviction on the grounds that there had been no sale nor exposure for sale by the retail dealer and that it had not been shewn that the nuts had been purchased from the defendant by the retail dealer for the food of man. (2)

The day after a purchaser had purchased some meat he had it inspected by a medical officer, and it was condemned; and in proceedings then taken, under the Public Health Act (London), 1891, the seller of the meat was convicted; but the conviction was quashed on the ground that the statute authorized a conviction for selling meat when at once found upon examination to be unsound, but not, as in this case, when only found to be bad on the day after it was sold and in hot weather in the month of July. (3)

Adulteration.

The new Adulteration Act is chapter 133 of the R. S. (1906), as amended by the 6-7 Edw. VII., c. 4; and its principal provisions are the following:—

Sec. 2. Definitions.—In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires,—

(a) 'Minister' means the Minister of Inland Revenue;

(3) Billing v. Prebble, 45 W. R., 101.

(b) 'food' includes every article used for food or drink by man or cattle, and every ingredient intended for mixing with the food or drink of man or cattle for any purpose whatsoever;

(c) 'drug' includes all medicines for internal or external use for man or for cattle;

(d) 'agricultural fertilizer' means and includes every substance imported, manufactured, prepared or disposed of for fertilizing or manuring purposes, which is sold at more than ten dollars per ton and which contains phosphoric acid, nitrogen, ammonia or nitric acid;

(e) 'officer' means any officer of Inland Revenue or any person authorized under this Act or the Fertilizers Act to procure samples of food, drugs, agricultural fertilizers or other articles and to submit them for analysis;

(f) 'analyst' means public analyst and includes any member of the examining board appointed under the authority of this Act, and also the chief analyst and the assistant chief analyst. 53 V., c. 26, s. 1. (As amended by 6-7 Edw. VII., c. 4, s. 1).

SEC. 3. ADULTERATED FOOD.—Food shall be deemed to be adulterated within the meaning of this Act,—

(a) if any substance has been mixed with it so as to reduce or lower or injuriously affect its quality or strength;

(b) if any inferior or cheaper substance has been substituted wholly or in part for the article;

(c) if any valuable constituent of the article has been wholly or in part abstracted;

(d) if it is an imitation of or is sold under the name of another article;

(e) if it consists wholly or in part of a diseased or decomposed or putrid or rotten animal or vegetable substance, whether manufactured or not;

(f) if it contains any added poisonous ingredient or any ingredient which may render such an article injurious to the health of persons or cattle consuming it;

(g) if its strength or purity falls below the standard, or its constituents are present in quantity not within the limits of variability fixed by the Governor in Council as hereinafter provided;

(h) if it is so colored or coated or polished or powdered that damage is concealed, or if it is made to appear better or of greater value than it really is;

(i) in the case of milk or butter, if it is the produce of a diseased animal or of an animal fed upon unwholesome food. 53 V., c. 26, s. 1; 61 V., c. 24, s. 1.

It has been held in England that where a purchaser asks only for "milk," no offence is committed by selling skimmed milk. (1) But see section 23, post, of our Act, which provides that cans in which skimmed milk is sold must bear on their exterior the word Skimmed in letters of not less than two inches in length and be served in measures similarly marked.

The physical condition of the milk supplied is the test, irrespective of the intent. (2)

SEC. 4. ARTICLES ADULTERATED SO AS TO BE INJURIOUS TO HEALTH.—The following articles sold, offered or exposed for sale shall be deemed to have been adulterated in a manner injurious to health:

(a) milk, after any valuable constituent of the article has been abstracted therefrom, or water added thereto, or when it is the product of a diseased animal, or of an animal fed upon unwholesome food;

(b) vinegar, if any mineral acid or any soluble salt having copper or lead as its base has been added thereto, either during the process of manufacture or subsequently;

(c) alcoholic, fermented or other potable liquors containing any of the articles mentioned in the first schedule to this Act, or any article hereafter added thereto by the Governor in Council. R. S., c. 107, ss. 15, 16 and 17; 53 V., c. 26, s. 6.

ADULTERATION OF MILK.—SKIMMED MILK.—Although sub-section (a) of this section enacts that milk shall be deemed to have been adulterated after any valuable constituent has been abstracted therefrom, section 23, post, makes an exception as to skim milk when sold as such.

Where milk, which was purchased at the defendant's shop, was found on analysis to be deficient in cream to the extent of 33 per cent., and it appeared that the milk, after being received pure and good from the country, had been placed in a large vessel from which it was served out in small quantities as occasion required, it was urged on the part of the defendant that it was the natural tendency of the fatty matter to rise to the surface, that consequently the quality of the milk necessarily diminished as the upper portion containing more than its due proportion of cream was removed in serving it out to customers and that therefore the defendant was not responsible. The magistrate accepted this excuse and refused to convict; but, in appeal, it was held that an offence under section 9 of the English Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, had been committed; and that it was sufficient to prove that an article of food has been altered by the abstraction of some part of it and sold in its altered state, the intention of the abstractor being immaterial, and his ignorance of the abstraction affording no excuse. (3)

(1) Lane v. Collins, 54 L. J., M. C., 76.
(2) R. v. McIntosh, 33 C. L. J., 246.

Where a milk dealer's servant, employed by his master to sell milk out of cans, adulterated the milk with water, the master was convicted as the seller; and in appeal it was held that the conviction was right, the master being liable for his servant's act in selling adulterated milk, whether the master did or did not connive at the offence, although proof of the entire absence of connivance on his part might, in the discretion of the convicting magistrate, be properly admitted with a view to mitigate any penalty he might otherwise think fit to impose. (4)

A milk dealer, being asked for a pint of new milk, sold to a food inspector a pint of skimmed milk and charged for it one penny, the usual price for skimmed milk. At the trial of a charge under the English Food and Drugs Acts, the justices differed, one being of opinion that, as only a penny a pint had been charged, the purchaser must have been aware that it was skimmed milk he was buying; but it was held that the knowledge of the purchaser was immaterial, and the case was remitted to the justices to convict. (5)

SEC. 5. ADULTERATION OF HONEY.—Feeding bees with sugar, except for the purpose of being consumed by them as food, or with glucose or any sweet substance other than such bees gather from natural sources, with the intent that the same shall be used by the bees in the making of honey, or, excepting as aforesaid, the exposing of any such substance with such intent, shall be deemed a wilful adulteration of honey within the meaning of this Act. 59 V., c. 12, s. 1.

SEC. 6. ADULTERATED AGRICULTURAL FERTILIZER.—Every agricultural fertilizer sold, offered or exposed for sale shall be deemed to be adulterated within the meaning of this Act,—

(a) if the chemical analysis thereof shows a deficiency of more than one per centum of any of the chemical substances the percentages whereof are to be specified in the certificate required by the Fertilizers Act to be produced to the inspector

(3) Dyke v. Gower, 17 Cox, 421; [1892] 1 Q. B., 220; 61 L. J. M. C., 70; Pain v. Broughtwood, 16 Cox, 747, 24 Q. B. D., 353, approved. But, see Wolfenden v. McCulloch, 92 L. T., 857.

if the argricultural fertilizer is in bulk, or, if not in bulk, required to be affixed to each barrel, box, sack or package containing any such fertilizer; or,

(b) if it contains less than the minimum percentage of such substances required by the said Act to be contained in such fertilizer. 53 V., c. 26, s. 2.

The new Fertilizers Act is the 8-9 Ed. VII., c. 16, post.

SEC. 7. ADULTERATED DRUGS.—Every drug shall be deemed to be adulterated within the meaning of this Act if its strength, quality or purity falls below the professed standard under which it is sold, or, if when offered or exposed for sale under or by a name,—

(a) recognized in the edition of 1898 of the British Pharmacopœia; or,

(b) recognized in any foreign pharmacopœia, such as Le Codex Medicamentarius in France, or the Pharmacopœia of the United States, with the name of such pharmacopœia plainly labelled upon it; or,

(c) which is not recognized in any pharmacopœia, but is found in some generally recognized standard work on materia medica or chemistry;

it differs from the standard of strength, quality or purity laid down therein. 62-63 V., c. 26, s. 1.

Analysis.

APPOINTMENT OF ANALYSTS, EXAMINERS AND INSPECTORS.—Section 8 (as amended by 6-7 Edw. VII., c. 4), and section 9 contain provisions for the appointment by the Governor in Council of public analysts to analyse food, drugs, agricultural fertilizers, etc., and for the appointment of a chief analyst and an assistant chief analyst;—and the Governor in Council may assign a public analyst to a particular district and may fix the territorial limits of such district: and the chief analyst, the assistant chief analyst and such other public analysts as the Governor in Council directs, shall be attached to the staff of the Department of Inland Revenue at Ottawa; and section 10 provides for the appointment, by the Governor in Council,—on the nomination of the council of any city, town, county, township or other municipality,—of food examiners to examine such articles of food as are determined by the Governor in Council.

Inspectors.

SEC. 13.—The council of any city, town, county or village may appoint one or more inspectors of food, drugs and agricultural fertilizers and of the articles mentioned in the fourth and fifth schedules to this Act; and such inspectors shall, for the purposes of this Act, have all the powers by this Act vested in officers of Inland Revenue; and any such inspector may require any public analyst to analyse any samples of food, drugs, agricultural fertilizers or other articles collected by him, if such samples have been collected in accordance with the requirements of this Act.

2. Such analyst shall, upon tender of the fees fixed for the analysis of such class of articles by the Governor in Council, forthwith analyse the same and give the inspector a certificate of such analysis.

3. Such inspector may prosecute any person manufacturing, selling or offering or exposing for sale within the city, county, town or village for which he is appointed inspector, any article of food, drug, agricultural fertilizer or other article which has been certified by any public analyst to have been adulterated or falsely marked within the meaning of this Act.

4. Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act in respect of the disposition of penalties, all penalties imposed and recovered at the suit of any such inspector shall be paid into the revenue of the city, county, town or village by the council of which such inspector was appointed, and may be distributed in such manner as the council of such city, county, town or village by by-law directs. R. S., c. 107, s. 6; 57-58 V., c. 37, s. 5.

It has been held, in proceedings under the English Food and Drugs Acts, that inspectors and analysts cannot act for the purpose of taking or analysing samples or otherwise putting the Acts into operation, for any district other than the district for which they have been appointed. (6) But see the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899, which contains, in section 20, subsection 6, clause (g), a modification of the old law on this point.

Procuring and Analysing Samples of Food, etc.

SEC. 12. The officers of Inland Revenue, the inspectors and assistant inspectors of weights and measures, and the inspectors and deputy inspectors acting under the Inspection and Sale Act, or any of them, shall, when required so to do by any regulation made in that behalf by the Minister, procure and submit samples of food, drugs or agricultural fertilizers suspected to be adulterated, or of the articles mentioned in the fourth and fifth schedules to this Act, suspected to be falsely marked, to be analysed by the analysts appointed under this Act, and nothing contained in the Civil Service Act shall be deemed to prevent officers rendering service under this section from receiving extra salary or additional remuneration for such services. R. S., c. 107, s. 5; 51 V., c. 24, s. 2; 57-58 V., s. 37, s. 5.

SEC. 14. Any officer may procure samples of food, drugs or agricultural fertilizers which have not been declared exempt from the provisions of this Act, or samples of the articles mentioned in the fourth and fifth schedules to this Act, from any person who has such articles in his possession for the purpose of sale, or who sells or exposes the same for sale; and he may procure such samples either by purchasing the same or by requiring the person in whose possession they are to show him and allow him to inspect all such articles in his possession and the place or places in which such articles are stored and to give him samples of such articles on payment or tender of the value of such samples. R. S., c. 107, s. 7; 57-58 V., c. 37, s. 5.

SEC. 15. DIVISION OF SAMPLES.—The officer purchasing any article with the intention of submitting it to be analysed, shall, after the purchase has been completed, forthwith notify the seller or his agent selling the article, of his intention to have it analysed by a public analyst, and shall, except in specific cases, respecting which special provision may be made by the Governor in Council, divide the article into three parts, to be then and there separated, and each part to be marked and sealed up or fastened up, as its nature permits.

2. Such officer shall deliver one of such parts to the seller or his agent if required by him so to do; he shall transmit another of such parts to the Minister for submission to the chief analyst or the assistant chief analyst in case of appeal; and he shall submit the remaining part to such public analyst as the Minister or the Deputy Minister or any person duly authorized in that behalf directs. R. S., c. 107, s. 9; 51 V., c. 24, s. 3. (As amended by 6-7 Edw. VII., c. 4, s. 3.)

SEC. 16. PROTECTION OF SAMPLES.—The person from whom any sample is obtained under this Act may require the officer obtaining it to annex to the vessel or package containing the part of the sample which he is hereby required to transmit to the Minister, the name and address of such person, and to secure with a seal or seals, belonging to him, the vessel or package containing such part of the sample, and the address annexed thereto, in such manner that the vessel or package cannot be opened, or the name and address taken off without breaking such seals; and the certificate of the chief analyst or of the assistant chief analyst shall state the name and address of the person from whom the said sample was obtained, that the vessel or package was not open, and that the seals, securing to the vessel or package the name and address of such person, were not broken until such time as he opened the vessel or package for the purpose of making his analysis; and in such case no certificate shall be receivable in evidence unless there is contained therein such statement as above or a statement to the like effect. R. S., c. 107, s. 10; 51 V., c. 24, s. 4. (As amended by 6-7 Edw. VII., c. 4, s. 4).

Sec. 17. Analysis and Certificate of Analysis.—When the officer has, by either of the means aforesaid, procured samples of the articles to be analysed, he shall cause the same to be analysed by one of the analysts appointed under this Act, and if it appears to the analyst that the sample is adulterated or falsely marked within the meaning of this Act, he shall certify such fact, stating in such certificate, in the case of an article of food or a drug, whether such adulteration is of a nature injurious to the health of the person consuming the same; and the certificate so given shall be received as evidence in any proceedings taken against any person in pursuance of this Act, subject to the right of such person to require the attendance of the analyst, for the purpose of cross-examination.

2. Should any sample on examination be found by the analyst to be adulterated or falsely marked within the meaning of this Act, and be so reported to the Minister, the said Minister may, at his discretion, cause the result of the analysis to be communicated to the vendor, and require him to pay, at the rate specified in the second schedule to this Act, the cost of procuring and analysing the said sample; and should the said vendor refuse or neglect so to do, the Minister may then cause legal proceedings to be taken against him, as hereinafter provided. R. S., c. 107, s. 11; 53 V., c. 26, s. 3; 57-58 V., c. 37, s. 5.

Sec. 18. Appeal to Chief Analyst.—If the vendor of the article respecting which the certificate referred to in the last preceding section is given, deems himself aggrieved thereby, he may, within forty-eight hours of the receipt of the first notification of the intention of the officer or other purchaser to take proceedings against him (whether such notification is given by the purchaser or by the ordinary process of law), notify the said officer or purchaser in writing that he intends to appeal from the decision of the analyst to the judgment of the Chief Analyst; and in such case the officer or purchaser shall transmit such notification to the Chief Analyst, and the Chief Analyst shall, with all convenient speed, analyse the part of the sample transmitted to the Minister for that purpose, and shall report thereon to the said Minister; and the decision of the Chief Analyst shall be final, and his certificate thereof shall have the same effect as the certificate of the analyst mentioned in the last preceding section. 53 V., c. 26, s. 4.

SEC. 19. ANALYSTS TO REPORT TO THE MINISTER.—Every analyst appointed under this Act shall report quarterly to the Minister the number of articles of food, drugs and agricultural fertilizers and other articles analysed by him under this Act during the preceding quarter, and shall specify the nature and kind of adulterations detected in such articles; and all such reports, or a synopsis of them, and the names of the vendors or persons from whom obtained, and of the manufacturers when known, shall be printed and published for the information of the public at such times and in such manner as the said Minister directs, and shall also be laid before Parliament as an appendix to the annual report of the said Minister. 53 V., c. 26, s. 5; 57-58 V., c. 37, s. 5.

ESSENTIALS AND EFFECT OF THE CERTIFICATE OF ANALYSIS.—Where the offence charged is that of having abstracted some constituent part of the article, it seems that it is not necessary for the analyst to set out in his certificate of analysis the constituent parts of the sample analysed, and that it is sufficient for the certificate to shew what has been abstracted without giving all the constituent parts of the sample; but, where it is a case of adulteration by adding something which is one of the constituent parts of the articles analysed, the certificate should give particulars of its constituent parts and of the substance added; (7) or disclose the grounds upon which the analyst has arrived at the conclusion that some foreign ingredient has been added. (8)

So, that, where, in a prosecution under the English Food and Drugs Acts, for selling milk containing added water, the analyst's certificate stated that the analyst was of opinion that "the sample analysed contained the percentage of foreign ingredient as under,—5 per cent. of added water," it was held that the certificate was bad as evidence of adulteration, because water is one of the constituent parts of all milk and it was not sufficient for the analyst to merely certify that a certain percentage of water had been added, but that he should have given in his certificate information of the total percentage of water found in the analysed sample, and because the analyst's certificate of analysis was merely a statement of his own conclusion without shewing what standard he had adopted in arriving at his conclusion, it being further held that if the substance added had been found to be something that could not exist in milk as a constituent,—such, for instance, as pepper or sand,—it would have been sufficient to have stated in the certificate that the sample analysed contained so much per cent. of such added foreign ingredient, but that when the thing said to be added is one of the constituents of the article analysed, then, the analyst must sufficiently certify the facts on which he bases his opinion to enable the magistrates themselves to come to a conclusion. (9)

On the same principle, it was held that a certificate, which stated that a sample of rum contained "thirteen per cent. of water in excess of the quantity allowed by statute," was too vague, and did not warrant a conviction, but that it should have specified the total quantities of pure spirit and of added water contained in the sample,—it being for the justices and not for the analyst, in such a case, to determine conclusions of law and of fact. (10)

Where the certificate of a public analyst stated that a sample submitted to him contained 94 per cent. of milk and 6 per cent. of added water and went on to say, "This opinion is based on the fact that the sample contained only 7.97 per cent. of solids not fat, whereas genuine milk contains not less than 8.5 per cent. of solids not fat," it was held that the certificate was good, because it gave the grounds upon which the analyst had based his opinion, although it did not set out all the ingredients found in the sample analysed. (1)

The purchase by an inspector of six small bottles of camphorated oil in one lot for the purpose of having them analysed and their division by him into three parts of two bottles each, one part (consisting of two of the bottles), being sent to the public analyst, is not a compliance with the Act, because each bottle, however small, is itself an article and ought to be divided into three parts. (2)

The separation must be made from an undivided sample.

An inspector purchased four penny packets of cream of tartar, all of which four packets bore similar labels, and, having mixed the contents together divided them into three parts. One of these he delivered to the seller, another he retained, and the third he sent to the county analyst for analysis:—Held, that there had been a sufficient compliance with the requirements of section 14 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, and that it was not necessary that any single packet should have been divided into three parts. (3)

Where an article is purchased for analysis, each of the three parts into which it is to be divided must be sufficient in quantity to afford reasonable facilities for analysis. (4)

In proceedings under the English Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, it has been held that,—notwithstanding section 21 of that Act which is somewhat similar to the latter part of the first clause of section 17 of our Adulteration Act, to the effect that the analyst's certificate shall be received as evidence, subject to the defendant's right to have the analyst called as a witness,—the effect of this provision is not that the certificate shall,—in case of the analyst not being called as a witness,—be conclusive evidence but merely evidence on which the justices may regard the facts therein stated as proved unless there is other evidence, including the testimony of the defendant given as a witness on his own behalf, to shew that such facts are erroneous; the meaning of the provision being (in the language of Lindley, L.J.), that the justices may act upon the certificate, that they must weigh it as evidence, but that they are also bound to weigh any evidence offered on the other side, and to come to a conclusion upon the whole of the evidence given on both sides. (5)

Where an accused was charged with unlawfully selling new milk adulterated with 14.4 per cent. of water, and the analyst's certificate, which was put in, stated that the milk shewed a deficiency of non-fatty solids corresponding to an addition of 14.4 per cent. of water, and no evidence was called for the accused, the justices found that the adulteration of the milk by the addition of 14.4 per cent. of water had not been established, and they dismissed the charge:—Held, that the justices were wrong, as the certificate of the analyst was evidence of the adulteration until displaced by evidence to the contrary. (6)

SEC. 20. GENERAL PROHIBITION AGAINST ADULTERATION.—Except as hereinafter provided, no person shall manufacture, sell, expose or offer for sale any food, drug or agricultural fertilizer which is adulterated within the meaning of this Act. R. S., c. 107, s. 14.

SEC. 21. FALSE MARKING.—No person shall mark, brand or label any article or any package containing any article mentioned in the first column of the fourth schedule to this Act, with the word Pure, Genuine, or any word equivalent thereto, or sell, or offer or expose for sale, any such article or package so marked, branded, stamped or labelled, unless such article or the contents of such package are pure within the meaning of the second column of the said schedule. 57-58 V., c. 37, s. 1.

SEC. 22. ILLEGAL SALE.—No person shall sell, or offer or expose for sale, any article or any substance for domestic use under the name or designation contained in the first column of the fifth schedule to this Act, unless such article or substance is free from adulteration or admixture of foreign matter and unless it possesses the composition and distinguishing characteristics stated in the second column of the said schedule. 57-58 V., c. 37, s. 2.

SEC. 23. SKIM MILK.—Milk from which the cream has been removed by skimming, or by a separator or creamer, may be sold as skim milk, if contained in cans bearing upon the exterior the word Skimmed in letters of not less than two inches in length and served in measures also similarly marked: Provided that any person supplying such skim milk, unless such quality of milk has been asked for by the purchaser, shall not be protected by this section from any prosecution on account of any violation of this Act. R. S., c. 107, s. 15.

SEC. 24. EXCEPTIONS, WITH REGARD TO ADDITIONS OF UNINJURIOUS INGREDIENTS TO FOOD OR DRUGS, AS TO MIXTURES, PATENT MEDICINES, ETC.—Notwithstanding anything in this Act contained, no food or drug shall be deemed to be adulterated in the following cases:—

(a) Where any matter or ingredient not injurious to health has been added to the food or drug, in case such matter or ingredient is required for the production or preparation thereof as an article of commerce in a state fit for carriage or consumption, if the same has not been fraudulently added to such food or drug for the purpose of increasing the bulk, weight or measure thereof, or to conceal its inferior quality, and each package, roll, parcel or vessel containing every such article of food or drug manufactured, sold or exposed for sale, is distinctly labelled as a mixture in conspicuous characters forming an inseparable part of a general label thereon bearing the name and address of the manufacturer;

(b) Where the food or drug is a proprietary medicine or is the subject of a patent in force, and is supplied in the state required by the specification of the patent;

(c) Where the food or drug is unavoidably mixed with some extraneous matter in the process of collection or preparation;

(d) Where any articles of food not injurious to the health are mixed together as a compound, and sold or offered for sale as such, with each package, roll, parcel or vessel containing such articles distinctly labelled as a mixture in conspicuous characters forming an inseparable part of a general label bearing the name and address of the manufacturer. 53 V., c. 26, s. 1; 61 V., c. 24, ss. 2 and 3.

SEC. 25. EXEMPTIONS.—The Governor in Council may, from time to time, declare certain articles or preparations exempt in whole or in part from the provisions of this Act, and may add to the first schedule to this Act any article or ingredient, the addition of which is by him deemed necessary in the public interest; and every order in council in that behalf shall be published in the Canada Gazette, and shall take effect at the expiration of thirty days from the date of such publication. R. S., c. 107, s. 18; 53 V., c. 26, s. 7.

SEC. 26. STANDARDS OF QUALITY.—The Governor in Council shall, from time to time, cause to be prepared and published, lists of the articles, mixtures or compounds declared exempt from the provisions of this Act, in accordance with the last preceding section, and shall also, from time to time, establish a standard of quality for, and fix the limits of variability permissible in any article of food or drug or compound, the standard of which is not established by any such pharmacopœia or standard work as is hereinbefore mentioned; and the orders in council fixing the same shall be published in the Canada Gazette, and shall take effect at the expiration of thirty days after the publication thereof. 53 V., c. 26, s. 8.

It has been held, in a British Columbia case, that, when the duty of fixing the standard rests upon the Governor in Council, it cannot be undertaken by or under the authority of provincial legislation, that section 20 of the regulations of British Columbia was therefore ultra vires, and that a conviction based solely upon that section must be quashed. (6*a*)

SEC. 27. POWER TO ADD TO AND REMOVE FROM THE FOURTH AND FIFTH SCHEDULES TO THE ACT.—The Governor in Council may add any articles to the fourth and fifth schedules to this Act, and determine the standard of purity therefor, and may remove any articles from the said schedules; and the order in council in that behalf shall be published in four successive issues of the Canada Gazette, after which it shall have like effect as if such articles had been included in the said original schedules.

2. Any order in council made under the provisions of this section shall have effect only until the end of the next succeeding session of Parliament. 57-58 V., c. 37, s. 4.

SEC. 28. SEIZURE.—Whenever any article of food, any drug, or any agricultural fertilizer is reported by any analyst as being adulterated within the meaning of this Act, the Minister may, if he thinks fit, order such article, and all other articles of the same kind and quality which were in the same place at the time the article analysed was obtained, to be seized by any officer of Customs or Inland Revenue, and detained by him until an analysis of samples of the whole is made by the Chief Analyst. R. S., c. 107, s. 20.

SEC. 29. If the Chief Analyst reports to the Minister that the whole or any part of such articles are adulterated, the Minister may declare such article, or so much thereof as the Chief Analyst reports as being adulterated, to be forfeited to the Crown; and such articles shall thereupon be disposed of as the Minister directs. R.S., c. 107, s. 21.

SEC. 30. HONEY.—Except for the exclusive purpose of consumption as food, no person shall feed with or expose with intent that bees shall feed on the same, any sugar, glucose or any other sweet substance other than such as bees gather from natural sources; and no honey made by bees in whole or in part from any of such substances, and no imitation of honey or sugar honey so called, or other substitute for honey, shall be manufactured or produced for sale or sold or offered for sale in Canada. 59 V., c. 12, s. 1.

Offences and Penalties.

SEC. 31. PUNISHMENT FOR WILFUL ADULTERATION.—Every person who wilfully adulterates any article of food or any drug, or orders any other person so to do, shall,—

(a) if such adulteration is, within the meaning of this Act, deemed to be injurious to health, for the first offence incur a penalty not exceeding five hundred dollars and costs, or six months' imprisonment, or both, and not less than fifty dollars and costs, and for each subsequent offence a penalty not exceeding one thousand dollars and costs, or one year's imprisonment, or both, and not less than one hundred dollars and costs;

(b) if such adulteration is, within the meaning of this Act, deemed not to be injurious to health, incur a penalty not exceeding two hundred dollars and costs, or three months' imprisonment, and for each subsequent offence a penalty not exceeding five hundred dollars and costs, or six months' imprisonment, or both, and not less than one hundred dollars and costs. 61 V., c. 24, s. 4.

SEC. 32. PUNISHMENT FOR SELLING ADULTERATED ARTICLES.—Every person who, by himself or his agent, sells, offers for sale, or exposes for sale, any article of food or any drug, which is adulterated within the meaning of this Act, shall,—

(a) if such adulteration is, within the meaning of this Act, deemed to be injurious to health, for a first offence incur a penalty not exceeding two hundred dollars and costs, or three months' imprisonment, or both, and for each subsequent offence a penalty not exceeding five hundred dollars and costs or six months' imprisonment, or both, and not less than fifty dollars and costs;

(b) if such adulteration is, within the meaning of this Act, deemed not to be injurious to health, incur for each such offence a penalty not exceeding one hundred dollars and costs, and not less than five dollars and costs. 61 V., c. 24, s. 5.

To justify a conviction under section 3 of the English Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, in respect of the sale of an article of food with which a foreign ingredient has been mixed, it must be found that the article of food has been rendered injurious to health by the admixture of the ingredient; a finding that the added ingredient is, in itself, injurius to health is insufficient. It is not, however, necessary that the analyst's certificate, on which the proceedings are founded, should state that the article is injurious to health. (7)

SEC. 33. WANT OF KNOWLEDGE, ON PART OF SELLER, OF THE ADULTERATION.—If the person accused proves to the court before which any prosecution is brought for selling, offering or exposing for sale any article of food or drug that has been adulterated, that he purchased the article in question for and as an article of the same nature, substance and quality as that demanded of him by the purchaser or inspector, with a warranty to that effect according to the form in the third schedule to this Act, and produces the said warranty at the trial had on such prosecution, and also proves that he sold it in the same state as when he purchased it, and that he could not, with reasonable diligence, have obtained knowledge of its adulteration, he shall be discharged from such prosecution, but shall be liable to pay the costs incurred by the prosecutor, unless he has given due notice to him that he will rely on the above defence and has called the party from whom he purchased the said article into the case as provided for in this Act, in which case the Minister may, as hereinbefore authorized, declare such article, or so much thereof as the Chief Analyst reports as being adulterated, to be forfeited to the Crown. 61 V., c. 24, s. 5.

Where a company was convicted of having sold milk from which twenty per cent. of its original fat had been abstracted, and it appeared by the evidence that the defendants had purchased the milk under a written contract by which the producers of the milk had agreed to supply the company defendant daily with a certain quantity of "genuine good new milk of the best quality with all its cream on," and by which each and every supply of milk was warranted to be pure, genuine new milk unadulterated and with all its cream on, and that attached to each churn containing the milk, of which the milk in question was a part, was a label having on it the words "warranted genuine new milk with all its cream on," it was held, in appeal, that the contract and the label together constituted a sufficient warranty to entitle the Company defendant to the protection of section 25 of the English Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, and that the conviction must be quashed. (8)

A local foreman of a Company sold on their behalf milk which was found upon analysis to contain 12 per cent. of added water. The milk had been consigned to one Thompson, by rail, in cans, each bearing a label with the words "Warranted genuine good milk with all its cream on." There was also a written agreement between Thompson and the Company, whereby Thompson agreed to supply the Company with genuine good milk of the best quality with all its cream on. In proceedings against the foreman, the latter stated that the milk in question was served by him in the same state as he got it from the cans, but he admitted that he had not tested it, though the milk had travelled a distance of ninety miles, and although a lactometer had been supplied to him for the purpose of testing the milk. Upon these facts he was convicted; and, in appeal, it was held that the conviction was right, the defendant, though an employee of the Company, being the seller of the milk, and further that, even if the provision of law relating to warranty had any application, the defendant had not brought himself within its provisions. (9)

In another English case, it was held that if the document relied upon as a written warranty amounts to a warranty in law, it is sufficient as a defence and will entitle the defendant to be discharged, without the word "warrant" or the word "warranty" being expressly stated in the document. (10)

A defendant had purchased a cask of vinegar from "G. & Co., Lim." The cask had on it a printed label bearing the words "Vinegar warranted unadulterated—G. & Co., Lim., Cumberland Market, London," and the vinegar was invoiced to the defendant as "G. & Co.'s vinegar." The defendant having been convicted of selling adulterated vinegar, it was held, in appeal, that there was a sufficient written warranty to entitle the defendant to the protection afforded by section 25 of the English Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, which is the same in effect as the above section 33, of our Adulteration Act. (1)

It has been held that, to support a defence of warranty under section 25 of the English Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, a retailer of milk must shew that the producer's contract with him, — contracting that the milk should be pure new milk, — covers each consignment of milk delivered under it. (2)

It is not necessary that there should be a specific written warranty with each consignment of milk delivered under a contract. A general warranty in writing that future deliveries of milk shall be "new, unadulterated, and with all its cream on," protects the retail dealer. The connection between the milk delivered under such a warranty and that which may subsequently be the subject matter of an alleged offence may be established by evidence. (3)

A retailer of milk who, after he has received milk from the wholesale dealer under a contract containing a warranty, adds boric acid to it, cannot, upon proceedings taken against him for selling milk deficient in fat and containing added water, set up his vendor's warranty as a defence. Having added boric acid, he cannot be heard to say that the milk when he sold it was in the same condition as when he purchased it. (4)

A grocer, upon an application for two pots of cream, served the person applying with two pots of cream each bearing a label with the words, "Rich cream. This cream contains a small percentage of boron preservative to retard sourness. Perfectly delicious." The cream contained 0.313 per cent. of boracic acid as a preservative. No indication beyond the label was given to the purchaser as to the composition of the cream. The grocer was convicted of selling an article of food, namely, cream, mixed with boracic acid, rendering it injurious to health. The quarter sessions, in upholding the conviction, found that cream mixed with boracic acid to the extent above mentioned is, as regards grown men and women, uninjurious, but that it is injurious to the health of children and invalids:—Held, on a case stated by quarter sessions, that, on this finding, the conviction was right in the particular circumstances. (5)

A company, by a written contract, agreed to buy pure new milk with all its cream, each churn to bear a written warranty. To each churn was attached a label, "Warranted pure milk with all its cream delivered under contract." The company also agreed verbally to buy milk and that a written warranty should be given with each consignment. To a churn delivered under this agreement was attached a label, "Warranted pure milk with all its cream." Prosecutions for selling milk not of the nature, substance and quality demanded by the purchaser, having been instituted, under the English Act, notice was given, in accordance with the Act, and copies of the labels were enclosed. Held, that the requirements of the Act had been complied with, and the company was discharged from the prosecutions. (6)

Although it is not necessary for a defendant to prove that he received a written warranty with each article purchased by him, there must be some written evidence to connect a warranty intended to be continuing with the article. So, that, if before delivery of milk, a written warranty is given to the defendant that all milk supplied to him is perfectly pure and with all its cream as the cow gives it, and the warranty is intended to be continuing, but there is no written evidence connecting it with the milk subsequently delivered, the defendant will not be entitled to protection in a prosecution for selling to the prejudice of the purchaser milk which is not of the nature, substance and quality demanded by him. (7)

A dairy keeper at East Ham, having been summoned for selling milk deficient in fat, set up the defence that she had purchased the milk as the same as that demanded of her by the purchaser, and with a written warranty to that effect, and that she had sold it in the same state as when she purchased it. She had a written contract to purchase "sixteen gallons of pure new milk with all its cream, delivered daily, carriage paid, to Wanstead Park Station," and, while this contract was in force, a number of churns of milk arrived at Wanstead Park Station consigned to her from a station in Derbyshire, and were labelled, "Warranted pure new milk with all its cream, pursuant to contract." The churns remained on the platform at Wanstead Park Station for nearly an hour, when they were taken away by the dairy-keeper to her dairy. On the same morning, she sold part of the milk, and it was found to be deficient in fat. It was proved that the milk when sold by the dairy-keeper was in the same state as when she received it at Wanstead Park Station, but there was no evidence as to whether it was in the same state as when it was delivered by the seller at the station in Derbyshire from which it was sent:—Held, that the place of delivery of the milk to the dairy-keeper was at Wanstead Park Station, and not at the station from which it was sent, that the purchase took place when she received the milk in her van at Wanstead Park Station, and that, as she had proved that she sold the milk in the same state as when she received it at that station, she was thereby discharged from the prosecution. (8)

Under a contract, a milk dealer agreed to buy, from certain vendors, all the milk required for his dairy during twelve months. The contract contained a warranty that the milk was pure, with all its cream as received from the cow. On a prosecution for selling milk from which milk fat had been abstracted, it was proved that the particular consignment of milk, the subject of the prosecution, was received by the milk dealer from his vendors, accompanied by a delivery note which made no reference either to the contract or the warranty:—Held, that, without relying on the delivery note, there was, on the face of the contract, sufficient connection shewn between the warranty contained therein and the particular consignment of milk, so as to make the warranty a good defence. (9)

SEC. 34. CALLING IN A THIRD PARTY.—If the person presenting such defence shall, upon his sworn declaration that he purchased the article in good faith and as provided for in the last preceding section, obtain a summons to call such third party into the case, the court shall at the same time hear all the parties and decide upon the entire merits of the case, not only as regards the person originally accused, but also as regards the third party so brought into the case. 61 V., c. 24, s. 5.

SEC. 35. PENALTY FOR REFUSING ACCESS TO OFFICER.—If the person who has in his possession any food, drugs or agricultural fertilizers which have not been declared exempt from the provisions of this Act, or any of the articles mentioned in the fourth and fifth schedules to this Act, shall, when required so to do by any officer in pursuance of the provisions of this Act, refuse or omit to show the officer the place in which any such articles are stored, or shall refuse or fail to admit the officer into every such place, or shall refuse or omit to show such officer all or any of such articles in his possession, or to permit the officer to inspect the same, or to give any sample thereof, or to furnish such officer with any light or assistance he requires for any of such purposes, he shall be liable to the same penalty as if he knowingly sold or exposed for sale adulterated articles. R. S., c. 107, s. 8; 57-58 V., c. 37, s. 5.

SEC. 36. PENALTY FOR POSSESSING ADULTERATED LIQUORS.—Every compounder or dealer in, and every manufacturer of intoxicating liquors, who has in his possession or in any part of the premises occupied by him as such, any adulterated liquor, knowing it to be adulterated, or any deleterious ingredients specified in the first

R. S., c. 107, s. 24; 53 V., c. 26, s. 10.

SEC. 37. PENALTY FOR KNOWINGLY ATTACHING FALSE LABELS.—Every person who knowingly attaches to any article of food, or any drug, any label which falsely describes the article sold, or offered or exposed for sale, shall incur a penalty not exceeding one hundred dollars and not less than twenty dollars and costs. R. S., c. 107, s. 25.

SEC. 38. FALSE MARKING.—Every person who marks, brands or labels any article or any package containing any article mentioned in the first column of the fourth schedule to this Act with the word Pure, or Genuine, or any word equivalent thereto, or sells or offers or exposes for sale any such article or package so marked, branded, stamped or labelled, unless such article or the contents of such package are pure within the meaning of the second column of the said schedule, shall, for every violation, be liable to a penalty not exceeding one hundred dollars.

2. A moiety of such penalty shall belong to the prosecutor and the other moiety to the Crown. 57-58 V., c. 37, s.s. 1 and 3.

SEC. 39. ILLEGAL SALE.—Every person who sells, offers or exposes for sale any article or any substance for domestic use under the name or designation contained in the first column of the fifth schedule to this Act, unless such article or substance is free from adulteration or admixture of foreign matter and unless it possesses the composition and distinguishing characteristics stated in the second column of the said schedule, shall, for every violation, be liable to a penalty not exceeding one hundred dollars.

2. A moiety of such penalty shall belong to the prosecutor and the other moiety to the Crown. 57-58 V., c. 37, ss. 2 and 3.

SEC. 40. APPLICATION OF PENALTIES.—Every penalty imposed and recovered under this Act shall, except as herein otherwise provided and except in the case of any suit, action or prosecution brought or instituted under the provisions of the next following section, be paid over to the Minister of Finance and shall form part of the Consolidated Revenue Fund. R. S., c. 107, s. 26.

General.

SEC. 41. DUTY OF OFFICERS.—It shall be the duty of any officer entrusted with the enforcement of this Act, when he is required thereto by any person, to purchase from the vendor of any article sold or exposed for sale a sample thereof and submit it for analysis in accordance with the provisions of this Act, provided the person so requiring such purchase and analysis deposits with such officer at the time such a demand is made, a sum of money sufficient to pay for such sample and analysis.

2. If, upon analysis, such article is found to be adulterated within the meaning of this Act, the person at whose instance the analysis is made, may prosecute the vendor of the article, or may require such officer to prosecute the vendor upon making a deposit of twenty-five dollars with the collector of Inland Revenue, as security for the costs of such prosecution, and every person so prosecuting shall be entitled to a moiety of the penalty imposed, upon conviction of the person accused.

3. Nothing herein contained shall be held to preclude such officer, or the Department of Inland Revenue, from prosecuting the vendor of such article so adulterated: Provided that a second prosecution shall not be instituted for the same offence. 61 V., c. 24, s. 6.

SEC. 42. ANY PERSON MAY PROCEED FOR ADULTERATION.—Nothing herein contained shall be held to preclude any person from submitting any sample of food, drug, or agricultural fertilizer for analysis to any public analyst, or from prosecuting the vendor thereof, if it is found to be adulterated within the meaning of this Act. 61 V., c. 24, s. 7.

SEC. 43. DUTY OF PUBLIC ANALYST.—Any public analyst shall analyse such sample on payment of the fee prescribed with respect to such article or class of articles by the Governor in Council. 61 V., c. 24, s. 7.

SEC. 44. DIVISION OF ARTICLE BY PURCHASER FOR PURPOSE OF ANALYSIS.—The person purchasing any article with the intention of submitting it to analysis, shall after the purchase is completed forthwith notify to the seller or his agent selling the article his intention to have it analyzed by the public analyst, and shall offer to divide the article into three parts to be then and there separated, each part to be marked and sealed or fastened up in such manner as its nature will permit of, and shall, if required to do so, proceed accordingly, and he shall deliver one of the parts to the seller or his agent, retain one of the parts for future comparison, and submit the third part to the analyst, if he deems it right to have the article analysed. 61 V., c. 24, s. 7.

See sections 15 to 19, ante, and annotations thereunder, at pages 204 to 208, ante, as to division and analysis of samples.

SEC. 45. Opium.

The importation, manufacture and sale of opium, for other than medicinal purposes, is prohibited by the 7-8 Edw. VII., c. 50, consisting of two sections which are the following:—

SEC. 1. Every person is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for three years, or to a penalty not exceeding one thousand dollars and not less than fifty dollars, or to both, who imports for other than medicinal purposes, under regulations to be established by the Minister of Customs, any crude opium or powdered opium, or who manufactures, sells, or offers for sale, or has in his possession for sale, for other than medicinal purposes, any crude opium or powdered opium, or who imports, manufactures, sells, or offers for sale, or has in his possession for sale opium prepared for smoking.

SEC. 2. It shall not be an offence under section 1 of this Act to sell or offer for sale, or have in one's possession for sale for other than medicinal purposes, opium in any of the said forms within six months after this Act comes into force, provided such opium is deposited in a customs bonded warehouse for export under regulations to be established by the Minister of Customs.

(10) R. v. Stone, 23 O. R., 221.

SEC. 227a, post (added after section 227 of the Code by the 8-9 Edw. VII., c. 9), defines an opium joint; and, by an amendment made by the same statute to section 228, post, a keeper of an opium joint commits the indictable offence of keeping a disorderly house.

FEEDING STUFFS.

The Commercial Feeding Stuffs Act, 1909 (8-9 Edw. VII., c. 15), by section 2 thereof, defines "commercial feeding stuff," "feeding stuff," and "feed" to mean "any article offered for sale for the feeding of domestic animals, and feeds claimed to possess medicinal as well as nutritive properties, excepting only hay and straw, roots, the whole seeds or the mixed or unmixed meals made directly from the entire grains of wheat, rye, barley, oats, Indian corn, buckwheat or flax seed; wet brewers' grains; the bran or middlings from either wheat, rye, oats, peas or buckwheat sold separately and not mixed with other substances."

Section 4 of the Act provides that where the manufacturer of any commercial feeding stuff has his factory or principal place of business outside of Canada, the name of his agent or representative in Canada must be filed with the Minister of Inland Revenue; and section 5 provides that every brand of commercial feeding stuff offered for sale in Canada, shall bear a registration number to be granted by the Minister of Inland Revenue on application therefor as provided by section 6.

Section 9 prohibits the selling or offering for sale, by any manufacturer of commercial feeding stuff, or by his agent, of commercial feeding stuff, unless he has from the Minister of Inland Revenue a license authorising the sale thereof; and sections 11 and 12 provide that the officers of Inland Revenue, the officers of Customs, the inspectors and deputy inspectors of weights and measures and the inspectors and deputy inspectors of food, drugs and agricultural fertilizers, acting under the Adulteration Act, shall, when required so to do by any regulation made in that behalf by the Governor in Council or the Minister of Inland Revenue, act as inspectors of commercial feeding stuffs, and shall procure samples of feeding stuffs offered for sale in Canada, and, whenever instructed by the Minister of Inland Revenue so to do, shall transmit every sample so obtained to the Minister for submission to the chief analyst for analysis.

Penalties for non-compliance with the Act are provided for by section 15.

FERTILIZERS.

The Fertilizers Act, 1909, is the 8-9 Edw. VII., c. 16, by section 2 (b), whereof the term "fertilizer" is declared to include every natural or artificial manure containing phosphoric acid, or nitrogen or potash, except ordinary stable manure.

For the meaning given to the expression "agricultural fertilizer" by the Adulteration Act, see p. 199, ante.

Section 4 of the Fertilizers Act provides that where the manufacturer of any fertilizer has his factory or chief place of business elsewhere than in Canada, the name of his agent or representative in Canada must be filed with the Minister of Inland Revenue; and section 5 provides that every brand of fertilizer offered for sale in Canada shall bear a registration number to be granted by the Minister of Inland Revenue on application to be made to him under the provisions of section 6.

Section 9 prohibits the selling or offering for sale by any manufacturer of a fertilizer or by his agent, of any fertilizer, unless he has, from the Minister of Inland Revenue, a license authorizing the sale thereof; and sections 11 and 12 provide that the officers of Inland Revenue, the officers of Customs, the inspectors and deputy inspectors of weights and measures and the inspectors and deputy inspectors of food, drugs and agricultural fertilizers, acting under the Adulteration Act, shall, when required so to do by any regulation made in that behalf by the Governor in Council or the Minister of Inland Revenue, act as inspectors of fertilizers, and shall procure samples of fertilizers offered for sale in Canada, and, whenever instructed by the Minister of the Inland Revenue so to do, shall transmit every sample so obtained to the Minister for submission to the chief analyst for analysis.

Section 15 of the Act provides that every manufacturer or agent who sells or offers or exposes for sale any fertilizer in respect of which the provisions of the Act have not been complied with, or who sells or offers or exposes for sale any fertilizer which does not contain the percentage of constituents mentioned in the manufacturer's certificate accompanying such fertilizer, is liable, in each case, to a penalty not exceeding $50 for the first offence and for each subsequent offence to a penalty not exceeding $100, and, in default of payment of such penalty, to imprisonment for thirty days. And by section 16 of the Act it is provided that the forging or uttering or using, knowing it to be forged, of any manufacturer's certificate, registration number, or certificate of analysis registered under the Act, is punishable by two years' imprisonment, with or without hard labor.

Canned Goods.

The new Canned Goods Act is chapter 134 of the R. S., 1906.

INTERPRETATION OF THE WORD "PACKAGE."—Section 1 of the Act declares that the expression "Package" means every can, tin or package in which articles or goods are put up for sale and which are closed by being hermetically sealed.

STAMPING OF PACKAGES.—Section 3 of the Act is in the following terms:—

"Every package of canned goods sold or offered for sale in Canada, for consumption therein, shall have attached thereto or imprinted thereon a label or stamp, setting forth in legible characters the name and address of the person, firm or company by whom the same was packed, or of the dealer who sells the same or offers it for sale;

WORD "SOAKED" TO BE PRINTED.—This is required by section 4, which is as follows:—

"Every such package containing goods prepared from products which have been dried previously to being so prepared, shall, in addition, be labelled or stamped with the word soaked, which word shall be plainly printed diagonally across the face of the label in large, legible type at least half an inch in height and three-eighths of an inch in width."

PENALTY FOR SELLING GOODS NOT LABELLED.—Section 5 provides that,—

"Every person who sells or offers for sale any goods in violation of any provision of the preceding sections shall, for each package in respect of which any such provision has been violated, on summary conviction before a justice of the peace, for a first offence, incur a penalty of two dollars, and for a subsequent offence a penalty not exceeding twenty dollars and not less than four dollars."

MISREPRESENTATION OF CONTENTS OF PACKAGE.—Section 6 is as follows:—

"Every person who places on any package any label, brand or mark which falsely represents the quantity or weight of the contents of such package, shall on summary conviction before a justice of the peace, incur a penalty of two dollars for each package on which the quantity or weight is so falsely represented: Provided that a variation in the contents of any package from that indicated by the brand or mark thereon of less than three per centum, shall not be deemed a violation of the provisions of this section."

MISREPRESENTATION OF DATE OF PACKING.—Section 7 is as follows:—

"Every person who places on any package any label, brand or mark which falsely represents the date when the article or goods contained therein were packed, shall, on summary conviction before a justice of the peace, incur a penalty of two dollars for each package on which such date is falsely represented."

DAIRY PRODUCTS.

The provisions of law relating to dairy products, including the registration of cheese factories and creameries, the sale of Canadian butter and cheese, the sale of milk to cheese or butter or condensed milk makers, and the prohibition against the manufacture and sale of oleo-margarine and butterine, are now contained in Part VIII. (consisting of sections 279-318), of the Inspection and Sale Act (R. S., 1906, c. 85), as amended by 7-8 Edw. VII., c. 35.

The provisions of Part VIII. of the Inspection and Sale Act are intra vires of the Dominion Parliament. (1)

REGISTRATION OF CHEESE FACTORIES AND CREAMERIES.—It is provided by sections 281 and 282 of the Inspection and Sale Act, that any person engaged in cheese or butter making may register, in the Department of Agriculture at Ottawa, the cheese factory or creamery owned or duly represented by him, and that the person to whom a registration number has been allotted shall thereafter have the exclusive right to use it for the purpose of designating the dairy products manufactured by him or such cheese factory or creamery.

MARKING DAIRY PRODUCTS.

By section 282 of the Act, it is enacted that no person shall:—

(a) sell, offer, expose or have in his possession for sale any butter or cheese made in Canada and destined for export therefrom unless the word Canadian, Canadien, or Canada is printed, stamped or marked in a legible and indelible manner, in letters not less than three-eighths of an inch high and one quarter of an inch wide, upon the cheese itself before it is taken from the factory where it was made, and upon the box or package containing such butter or cheese;

(b) with intent to misrepresent, shall remove or in any way efface, obliterate or alter the word Canadian, Canadien, or Canada or the registration number on any cheese or on any box or package which contains cheese or butter;

(c) apply any brand, stamp or mark of the word Canadian, Canadien, or Canada, as a descriptive term, mark or brand upon any cheese or upon any box or package which contains cheese or butter, unless such cheese or butter has been produced in Canada;

(d) knowingly sell, offer, expose or have in his possession for sale any cheese or butter upon which or upon any box or package which contains the same, the word Canadian, Canadien, or Canada is applied as a descriptive term, mark or brand, unless such cheese or butter has been produced in Canada;

(e) sell, offer, expose or have in his possession for sale any cheese produced in any foreign country, unless the name of the country where such butter or cheese was produced is branded, stamped or marked in a legible manner upon the outside of every box or package which contains the same in letters not less than three-eighths of an inch high and one-quarter of an inch wide;

(f) knowingly sell, or offer, expose, or have in his possession for sale, any cheese or butter upon which or upon any box or package containing which is printed, stamped or marked any month other than the month in which such butter or cheese was made;

(g) knowingly and with intent to misrepresent, sell, or offer, expose or have in his possession for sale any cheese or butter represented in any manner as having been made in any month other than the month in which it was actually made;

(h) sell, offer, expose or have in his possession for sale any cheese manufactured from or by the use of skimmed milk, unless the words Skim-milk cheese are branded, marked or stamped in a legible manner upon the side of every cheese and also upon the outside of every box or package which contains the same, in letters not less than three-quarters of an inch high and three-quarters of an inch wide;

(i) with intent to misrepresent or to defraud, remove or in any way efface, obliterate or alter the words Skim-milk cheese on such cheese, or on any box or package which contains the same.

PENALTIES AND PUNISHMENTS.

The penalties and punishments to which persons, who contravene any of the provisions of this section 282, are liable, are contained in sections 306-308 of the Act.

IMITATION CHEESE.

By section 283, it is enacted that no person shall manufacture, or shall knowingly buy, sell, offer, expose or have in his possession for sale any cheese manufactured from or by the use of skimmed milk, to which there has been added any fat which is foreign to such milk.

By section 283a, (added to the Act by 7-8 Edw. VII., c. 35, sec. 4), it is enacted that no person shall, (a) incorporate in a new cheese, during the process of its manufacture, any inferior curd or cheese; (b) knowingly sell, expose, or have in his possession for sale, without giving due notice thereof, any cheese in which has been incorporated, during the process of its manufacture, any inferior curd or cheese; (c) place in a cheese during the process of its manufacture, any inferior substance.

MILK SUPPLIED TO FACTORIES.

By section 284, it is enacted that no person shall sell, supply or send to any cheese or butter or condensed milk manufactory, or to the owner or manager thereof, or to any maker of butter, milk diluted with water, or in any way adulterated, or milk from which any cream has been taken, or milk commonly known as skimmed milk.

By section 285, it is enacted that no person, who supplies, sends, sells or brings to any cheese or butter or condensed milk manufactory, or to the owner or manager thereof, or to the maker of cheese or butter or condensed milk, any milk to be manufactured into butter or cheese or condensed milk, shall keep back any portion of that part of the milk known as strippings.

By section 286, it is enacted that no person shall knowingly sell, supply, bring or send to a cheese or butter or condenesd milk manufactory, or to the owner or manager thereof, any milk that is tainted or partly sour.

And, by section 287, it is enacted that no person shall sell, send or bring to a cheese or butter or condensed milk manufactory, or to the owner or manager thereof, or to the maker of such butter or cheese or condensed milk, any milk taken or drawn from a cow that he knows to be diseased at the time the milk is so taken or drawn from her.

EXAMINATION OF PACKAGES.

It is enacted, by section 303, that any person charged with the enforcement of Part VIII. of the Act may enter the premises of any person suspected of violating the provisions of the said Part and make an examination of cheese or butter therein; and may enter any premises to make examination of stock or packages of butter or any substitute therefor and the marking thereof, whether such stock or packages are on the premises of the manufacturer or owner, or on other premises, or in the possession of a railway or steamship company.

PENALTIES AND PUNISHMENTS.

The penalties and punishments to which persons, who contravene any of the provisions of the above sections 283 and 283a are contained in section 304 of the Act, and the penalties and punishments for contraventions of the provisions of the above sections 284, 285, 286, 287 and 303 are contained in section 305 of the Act.

It is provided by subsection 2 of section 305 of the Act that any person accused of an offence under that section and the husband or wife of such person shall be competent and compellable to testify.

OLEOMARGARINE.

By section 298 of the Inspection and Sale Act, (R. S., 1906, c. 85), it is enacted that no person shall manufacture, import into Canada, or offer, sell or have in his possession for sale, any oleomargarine, butterine, or other substitute for butter, manufactured wholly or in part from any fat other than that of milk or cream.

A law,—similar in effect to the above,—enacted by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, has been held, by the United States Supreme Court, to be invalid, on the ground that oleomargarine has, for nearly a quarter of a century, been recognized, in Europe and in the United States, as an article of food and commerce and was recognized as such in an Act, chapter 840, passed by Congress in August, 1886, and on the ground that, being thus a lawful article of commerce, it could not be wholly excluded from importation into a State from another State where it was manufactured, although the State into which it was imported may so regulate its introduction as to insure its purity, without having the power to totally exclude it. (2)

In England, the sale of margarine or butterine is regulated by the Imperial Butter and Margarine Act, 1907.

ADMIXTURE WITH BUTTER.

Section 299 of the Inspection and Sale Act provides that no person shall mix with butter any acid, alkali, chemical or any substance whatever, which is introduced or used for the purpose or with the effect of causing the butter to absorb water or any part of milk or cream, and that no person shall manufacture or import into Canada, or offer, sell, expose or have in his possession for sale any such mixed butter, any renovated butter or process; and section 300 of the Act provides that no person shall manufacture or import into Canada, or offer, sell, or have in his possession for sale any butter containing over sixteen per centum of water.

CREAMERY BUTTER.

By sections 301 and 302 of the Act it is enacted that,—except as to butter in rolls, prints, or packages of less than twenty-five pounds in weight, not intended for export, and manufactured in a building equipped with the appliances used in creameries,—no person shall brand or mark the word Creamery, or any combination of words which includes the word Creamery, upon any box, package or wrapper containing butter, unless the butter contained in the box, package or wrapper, consists wholly of creamery butter manufactured at one place; and that no person shall sell or offer, expose or have in his possession for sale, any butter contained in any box, package or wrapper, upon which the word Creamery or any combination of words which includes the word Creamery, is branded or marked, unless the butter contained in the box, package or wrapper consists wholly of creamery butter manufactured at one place.

PENALTIES AND PUNISHMENTS.

The penalties and punishments for contraventions of the provisions of sections 298 to 302 are contained in sections 309 and 310 of the Act.

FRUIT AND FRUIT MARKS.

The provisions of the old statutes relating to this subject are now consolidated in Part IX. (consisting of sections 319-336) of the Inspection and Sale Act (R. S., 1906, c. 85), as amended by 7-8 Edw. VII., c. 35.

It is an offence against section 321 (c) of the Fruit Marks' Act, to have in possession, for sale, apples packed so that more than fifteen per cent. of the contents of the barrel is substantially inferior in grade to the faced surface, although the sale actually made was to a purchaser who inspected the bulk, and, consequently, was not defrauded,—it not being essential to the offence that there should be a fraudulent intent on the part of the accused; and the offence is complete, although the accused neither knew of the fraudulent packing nor was negligently ignorant of it. (3)

CRIMINAL CODE (RESUMED.)

225. Common bawdy house defined.—A common bawdy house is a house, room, set of rooms or place of any kind kept for purposes of prostitution or occupied or resorted to by one or more persons for such purposes. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 195. (As amended by 6-7 Edw. VII., c. 8, s. 2).

BAWDY-HOUSE.—Other definitions of a bawdy-house, different in words though not in effect from that contained in this section, are "any place whether of habitation or temporary sojourn, kept open to the public, either generally or under restrictions, for licentious commerce between the sexes;" (1) and "a house of ill-fame is one kept for the resort and convenience of lewd people of both sexes." (2) Coke says, "Although adultery and fornication be punishable only by the ecclesiastical law, yet the keeping of a house of bawdry, or stews, or a brothel-house being as it were a common nuisance is punishable by the common law, and is the cause of many mischiefs, not only to the overthrow of the bodies and wasting of their livelihoods, but to the endangering of their souls. (3*a*)

If a lodger let her apartment for the purpose of indiscriminate prostitution, it is as much a bawdy-house as if she held the whole house. (4)

It is not necessary that there should be evidence of any indecency or disorderly conduct perceptible from the outside of the house. Evidence shewing that men and women meet there for immoral purposes and that the defendants receive gain therefrom is sufficient. (5)

The gist of the offence appears to consist in the allurement which the place holds out to a miscellaneous and common bawdry corrupting to public morals. By way of comparison and illustration it has been said that as an inn is for all travellers, so a bawdy-house is for all persons lewdly inclined. Generally,—though not necessarily,—it supplies the girls, who may either dwell in the house, or visit it with or without the men accompanying, for the evil practice. (6)

Evidence of one act of fornication committed in a house, particularly if committed without the knowledge of the keeper of the house, will not be sufficient to prove that it is a bawdy-house or house of ill-fame. (7)

The keeper of a bawdy-house may be a man or a woman; and a married woman may be indicted for the offence either alone or with her husband. (8)

Upon a charge of keeping a bawdy-house, a conviction should not be made upon evidence of the general reputation of the house alone, but the prosecution should be required to produce proof of acts or conduct from which the character of the house may be inferred. (9)

It has been held, in England, that if a weekly tenant of a house use it as a brothel and the landlord receive no additional rent by reason of its immoral occupation, the latter cannot be convicted of keeping a brothel, merely because, having notice of the nature of the occupation, he does not give the tenant notice to quit. (10) And it has been held, further, that the landlord would not be liable to be so convicted even if, at the time he let the house, he knew it was to be used as a brothel, and, by reason of its occupation as such, has received an additional rent. (1)

It has, however, been held, by the Court of Queen's Bench at Montreal, upon a reserved case stated by the Recorder, that a person who leases a house to another for purposes of prostitution renders himself under the provisions of paragraph (b) of section 69, ante, a party to and guilty of the offence committed by his lessee, subsequently to the leasing of the house, of keeping a disorderly house, although he was not himself the keeper, and that he can be prosecuted, tried, convicted and punished for such offence in the same manner as the actual keeper. (2)

It has been held, in England, that a place where ONE woman receives men for the purpose of sexual intercourse is not a brothel. (2*a*) And before the amendment recently made to the above section, 225, of our Code, by adding, after " kept for purposes of prostitution," the words " or occupied or resorted to by one or more persons for such purposes," the case of Singleton v. Ellison was followed in several Canadian cases, in which it was held that the statutory definition of a common bawdy-house as contained in our Code, before its amendment in 1907 (6-7 Edw. VII., c. 8), was intended merely to define the nature of the premises within which a bawdy-house may be kept, and not as stating what acts constitute such keeping, and that under the section, as it stood before amendment, a woman reputed to be a prostitute, living by herself in a house and receiving men with herself alone, could not be convicted of keeping a bawdy-house, unless other women than herself resorted to it for the purpose of acts of prostitution. (2*b*)

By a recent decision of a Judge of the Yukon Territorial Court, it has been held that under section 225 of our Code, as amended in 1907, a room in a hotel habitually resorted to by only one prostitute and her paramour, for purposes of prostitution, is a common bawdy-house; and that the hotel keeper who, with knowledge of the facts, permits the continuance of such use of the room is properly convicted as a keeper, although the hotel-keeper received only the ordinary room rent, and, apart therefrom, made no direct gain from the use of the room for the purposes of prostitution; the learned Judge being of opinion that,—although the section, as amended, does not alter the law as to isolated acts not constituting prostitution,—it means that a house occupied by one person, who receives men, and prostitutes herself as a prostitute, is a bawdy-house, and that the resorting by one person to a house for the purposes of prostitution constitutes that house a bawdy-house, if the owner of it or the keeper of it is aware of what the resorting is for. (3)

There is no common law definition of the term " prostitution."

The submission of a woman to indiscriminate sexual intercourse,—which she invites or solicits, by word, or act or any device,—constitutes prostitution, whether done for gain or not. (4)

A prostitution against the keeper of a common bawdy-house may be brought either by indictment or under the Summary Trials procedure; or the keeper may be charged as a vagrant under the Summary Convictions procedure; and neither the provision for summary trial nor that for summary conviction abrogates the right of the Crown to bring an indictment. The different methods of procedure, with the varying penalties dependent upon the class of tribunal selected, are not inconsistent but are alternative. (5)

As to the liability of keepers, inmates and frequenters of bawdy-houses to be dealt with as vagrants, see section 238 (i) and (j), post.

226. Common gaming-house defined.—A common gaming-house is,—

(a) a house, room or place kept by any person for gain, to which persons resort for the purpose of playing at any game of chance, or at any mixed game of chance and skill; or,

(b) a house, room or place kept or used for playing therein at any game of chance, or any mixed game of chance and skill, in which

(i) a bank is kept by one or more of the players exclusively of the others; or,

(ii) any game is played the chances of which are not alike favorable to all the players, including among the players the banker or other person by whom the game is managed, or against whom the game is managed, or against whom the other players stake, play or bet.

2. Any such house, room or place shall be a common gaming-house, although part only of such game is played there and any other part thereof is played at some other place, either in Canada or elsewhere, and although the stake played for, or any money, valuables, or property depending on such game, is in some other place, either in Canada or elsewhere. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 196; 58-59 V., c. 40, s. 1.

Before the adding (by 58-59 Vict., c. 40), of sub-section 2 to the corresponding section of the old Code, it was held, in an Ontario case, that, without special statutory legislation to that effect, a person could not be convicted of keeping a common gaming-house by operating, in a house in Canada, certain implements for determining the winning or losing numbers in a "policy" game upon which the stakes were laid in the United States, where the paying of the money, if won, also took place. (6) R. v. Wettman, 25 O. R., 459; 1 Can. Cr. Cas., 287; 14 C. L. T., 447.

In order to obtain a conviction of a person for keeping a common gaming-house, as defined in paragraph (a) of the above section 226, it must be shewn, by satisfactory evidence, that the person charged is deriving some gain or profit from keeping the house, room or place and by allowing games of chance or mixed games of chance and skill to be played therein.

A room resorted to for the purpose of playing the game of poker has been held not to be shewn to be kept for gain, by the mere proof that the proprietor, who participated in the game with the others, was,—by the consent of the players and not as a matter of right nor as a condition on which the playing took place,—allowed to take small sums from the stakes, on several occasions, by way of reimbursement for refreshments provided by him to the players, such small sums not being shewn to exceed the cost or value of the refreshments. (7)

An hotel keeper who permits gambling in his hotel, for the purpose of advancing the sale of drinks to the players, for which purpose a rake-off is taken in the game, is properly convicted of keeping a common gaming house. (8)

Where the keeper of a cigar store allowed gaming upon his premises and received the "rake-off," a portion of the stakes, in consideration of his supplying refreshments and cigars to the players, the jury may be instructed that such facts are evidence of keeping the place "for gain" so as to constitute the same a common gaming house, although the amount so received was no more than a reasonable remuneration for the articles supplied.

The question in such a case is not whether the accused made an actual substantial profit by the gaming, but whether the receipts of his business were increased by sales to persons who resorted to the store for the purpose of gaming. (9)

Proof that a game with cards, dice and "chips" was being played by several people seated at tables, each player procuring the "chips" from the accused, the proprietor of the place, and handing over to him the money therefor, and that the accused said that the game was "fan tan," and that he was "doing well out of it," is evidence that the game was a game of chance and that the place was being kept by the accused for gain under the sections of the Code relating to common gaming houses. And proof that persons, other than those resident at or belonging to the house, room or place, at which the proprietor operates for gain a game of chance or a mixed game of chance and skill, were in attendance there and participated in such game, is evidence that such persons "resorted" to such place for the purpose of playing such game, and of the place being a common gaming house. (10)

It is not an offence under the English Licensing Act for a licensed person to suffer a game of skill and chance, not being an unlawful game in itself and not being played for stakes, to be played on the licensed premises. (1)

Euchre is a game of chance, and not a game of mere skill; and if, in contravention of a regulation of Ontario License Commissioners, games of chance are played on licensed premises, in the absence of the licensee, the latter is liable to conviction therefor, if his agent has failed to take due precautions for the enforcement of the regulation. (2)

The game called "black jack" is a game of chance; and a place kept or used for playing that game, although not kept for gain, is a common gaming house under the above section, 226, sub-section (b). The keeping of a house, room or place for playing the game of "black jack," or any other game of chance or mixed game of chance and skill, in which the chances of the game are in favor of the player, who is the dealer or banker therein for the time being, is an indictable offence under sections 226 and 228, if the position of the dealer or banker passes from one player to another by the chances of the game and not by rotation. (3)

The proprietor of a place in which the game known as "darts" or in which a cane and ring game is carried on, under conditions which make the chance of the proprietor much more favorable than that of the customers, is properly convicted of keeping a gaming house. (4)

Even if a provincial legislature has authority to authorize municipalities to pass by-laws "for suppressing gambling houses," a municipal by-law, assuming to prohibit a person from allowing a game of cards to be played for money in his house, by his friends, is invalid as being in excess of the power delegated. (5)

It has been held, in a Manitoba case, that the keeping of a common gaming house being an offence against the general criminal law, it can be dealt with only by the Dominion Parliament, and cannot be made an offence by a provincial statute nor by a municipal by-law passed under the authority of such a statute. (6)

It is a question of fact and not of law whether the use of a slot machine for selling cigars, whereby customers obtained, for the one price, a number of cigars varying according to the working of the machine, is or is not a game of chance, a mixed game of chance and skill, or a game of skill only. (7)

A person who keeps in his shop an automatic slot machine, for use by customers is,—when its operation involves a game of chance in which the chances are not alike favorable to all,—guilty of using his shop for unlawful gaming under the English Gaming House Act, 1854. (8)

It has been held, in a Montreal case, that a judge of the sessions of the peace has no jurisdiction (either with or without the consent of the accused) to summarily try a charge (laid under sections 226 and 228), of keeping a common gaming house; although under Part XVIII., post (relating to the speedy trials of indictable offences), such a charge may, after a preliminary enquiry and a committal for trial, be tried at the option of the accused before a Judge of Sessions instead of before the Court of King's Bench and a jury; it being further held that section 773 (f), post, (relating to the summary trials of certain indictable offences) does not apply to the offence of keeping a common gaming house,—the meaning of the words "disorderly house" in that clause and in section 774, post, being governed by the rule "noscitur a sociis,—under which rule it is immaterial whether the general term precedes or follows the specific terms used, the general word taking its meaning from and being presumed to embrace only things or persons of the kind designated in the specific words,—and being, therefore, restricted to houses of the nature and kind of a house of ill-fame or bawdy-house associated therewith in the said section 773 (f). This case is in conflict with a decision rendered in British Columbia, by a Judge of the Supreme Court of that province, to the effect that in the case of a charge of keeping a gaming-house, a police magistrate has, under sections 773 and 774, post, jurisdiction to hear and determine the charge summarily, without the consent of the accused, and that the exercise of the jurisdiction is in the discretion of the magistrate, so that he may, if he thinks proper, take the other course, and hold a preliminary examination and commit the accused for trial. 227. Common betting-house defined.—A common betting-house is a house, office, room or other place,—

(a) opened, kept or used for the purpose of betting between persons resorting thereto and

(i) the owner, occupier or keeper thereof,

(ii) any person using the same,

(iii) any person procured or employed by, or acting for or on behalf of any such person,

(iv) any person having the care or management, or in any manner conducting the business thereof; or,

(b) opened, kept or used for the purpose of any money or valuable thing being received by or on behalf of any such person as aforesaid, as or for the consideration

(i) for any assurance or undertaking, express or implied, to pay or give thereafter any money or valuable thing on any event or contingency of or relating to any horse race or other race, fight, game or sport, or

(ii) for securing the paying or giving by some other person of any money or valuable thing on any such event or contingency; or,

(c) opened, or kept for the purpose of recording or registering bets upon any contingency or event, horse race or other race, fight, game or sport, or for the purpose of receiving money or other things of value to be transmitted for the purpose of being wagered upon any such contingency or event, horse race or other race, fight, game or sport, whether any such bet is recorded or registered there, or any money or other thing of value is there received to be so transmitted or not; or,

(d) opened, kept, or used for the purpose of facilitating or encouraging or assisting in the making of bets upon any contingency or event, horse race or other race, fight, game or sport, by announcing the betting upon, or announcing or displaying the results of, horse races or other races, fights, games or sports, or in any other manner, whether such contingency or event, horse race or other race, fight, game or sport occurs or takes place in Canada or elsewhere. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 197; 58-59 V. c. 40, s. 1.

By section 1 of the English Betting Act, 1853 (16-17 Vict., c. 119), it is enacted that no house, office, room or place shall be opened, kept or used for the purpose of the owner, occupier or keeper thereof, or any person using the same, or any person procured or employed by or acting for or on behalf of such owner, occupier, or keeper, or person using the same, or of any person having the care or management or in any manner conducting the business thereof, betting with persons resorting thereto, or for the purpose of any money or valuable thing being received by or on behalf of such owner, etc., as or for the consideration for any assurance, undertaking, promise or agreement, express or implied, to pay or give thereafter any money or valuable thing on any event or contingency of or relating to any horse race, fight, game, sport or exercise, or as or for the consideration for securing the payment or giving by some other person of any money or valuable thing on any such event or contingency; and that every house, office, room or other place opened, kept, or used for any of the said purposes is a common nuisance and contrary to law. By the second section of the Act, every such house, office, room or other place is declared to be a common gaming-house; and, by section 3, it is enacted that any person who, being the owner or occupier of any house, office, room or other place, or a person using the same,—shall open, keep or use the same for any of the above purposes, and any person who, being the owner or occupier of any house, office, room or other place, shall knowingly and wilfully permit the same to be opened, kept or used by any other person for any of the above purposes, and any person having the care or management of or in any way assisting in conducting the business of any house, office, room or place, opened, kept or used for any of the said purposes, shall on summary conviction be liable to a fine and costs and to imprisonment in default of payment.

While the law does not sanction betting, it does not declare it to be criminal. All it does is to condemn betting as carried on under certain specified conditions. (1) Nor is the business or avocation of a bookmaker necessarily illegal. (2)

Two separate and distinct offences are created by section 1 of the English Betting Act, first, opening, keeping or using a house or other place for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto, and, second, opening, keeping or using a house or other place for the purpose of receiving money, etc., as deposits on bets. (3)

It has been held, in England, that the resorting to a house for the purpose of betting must be actual and physical, and that sending letters and telegrams is not "resorting thereto" within section 1 of the English Betting Act. The English Court of Crown Cases Reserved quashed a conviction on a count for keeping and using a house for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto,—there being no evidence that any person had actually gone to the house for the purpose of betting; but it upheld a conviction upon a second count (the jury having given separate verdicts), the accused being, by such second count, charged with having used the house for the purpose of money being received by and on his behalf on an undertaking to pay money on a contingency, etc., and there being evidence of the defendant having used the house for receiving bets by letters. (4)

A person who habitually resorts to the bar of a public house with a view to meet persons coming there in the character of customers to bet with him upon the contingency of horse racing, may be convicted of using such place for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto, whether the money staked with him upon the results of such races is received by him inside the room or he merely goes outside to take the bets and then comes back into the room to be ready for more,—the evidence shewing that the usual practice was that a person desiring to bet after writing the name of the horse and wrapping up the stake would go outside the public house and there hand over the slip containing the name of the horse with the stake wrapped up in it, and then after thus receiving the stake outside the defendant would go back into the room. (5)

A bookmaker was charged with using the bar of a public house for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto. The evidence shewed that the bookmaker went to the public house on several days at the same hour, and persons, who had made bets with him elsewhere and had won, came to the public house to receive their winnings, and he paid them in the bar. On a case stated by the magistrate it was held that paying bets previously made elsewhere was not using the bar for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto, and that the defendant could not be convicted. (6)

It has been held that an archway in a street habitually resorted to by a bookmaker for the avowed purpose of betting with all comers upon certain events and contingencies of and relating to horse races is a "place" within the English Betting Act. (7)

In order to constitute a "place" within the meaning of the English Betting Act, there must be a definite localization of the business of betting. In each case it is a question of fact whether there is a user of a place analogous to that of an occupier occupying a place at which he is prepared to bet with persons who come there to bet with him.

Where a bookmaker uses a box or a stool with his name or other words upon it, not merely to indicate that he is a betting man prepared to bet, but in order to indicate that he is using the place for carrying on his business at which persons may find him, there is a definite localization of the business of betting, and he is thus using a "place" within the meaning of the Betting Act. (8)

In an action brought to restrain a racecourse company from opening or keeping an enclosure on their racecourse contrary to the provisions of the English Betting Act, by allowing it to be used by professional betting men or bookmakers in carrying on their operations therein, it was held by the English Court of Appeal that the owners of the racecourse were not guilty, and that the words "other place" must be construed to mean a definite place analogous in its character and use to a betting house, that there must be some exclusive right to the use of the place as against others,—that, in other words, to constitute such a place as the Act forbids there must be a business of betting conducted there, by an owner, occupier, manager, keeper or other person vested with the authority of an owner, etc.

The owners of the racecourse and enclosure in question had fenced off the enclosure from the racecourse, the enclosure being uncovered, except that on the side furthest from the course there were raised tiers of seats covered with a roof. To the enclosure, when race meetings were held, the public were admitted on payment of an entrance fee, the number of persons admitted on race days varying from 500 to 2,000, and among the frequenters were always a number of professional bookmakers,—100 to 200, —admitted on the same terms as the general public.

These bookmakers had no control over the enclosure or any part of it, nor had they any special rights in it. The greater number of the other members of the public who frequented the enclosure went there to back horses with the bookmakers, but there were some who did not bet at all. The bookmakers had their clerks assisting them, but they did not confine themselves to any fixed spot nor use any apparatus,—such as a desk, stool, umbrella or tent,—though any particular bookmaker was to be found usually in or near the same part of the enclosure. The bookmakers called out the odds to attract attention, and the businesses of the different bookmakers were rival and competing.

In rendering their judgment, some of the Judges in Appeal remarked that betting per se is not a criminal offence and is only made criminal if carried on in prohibited places, that it cannot be said that "place" or "other place" was intended to include all places, because, if so, it would amount to this, that the Act was passed to suppress betting, as no person can bet without occupying a place, if only the place where he stands when betting, that the doctrine of "noscitur a sociis" or "ejusdem generis" must be applied so as to limit the general words "other place" to places of the same kind as are referred to in the specific words "house, office, room," which precede the general words, and that it cannot be held that an open enclosure,—with no appropriation of any fixed spot, and to which the public are indiscriminately admitted,—is ejusdem generis with the house, office or room of an owner, an occupier, etc. (9)

It has recently been held, by the Supreme Court of Canada, that a moveable booth used on the racecourse of an incorporated racing association for the purpose of making bets is an "office" or "place" used for betting between persons resorting thereto and the keeper thereof, and that the bookmaker using it is properly convicted of keeping a common betting house, as defined in section 227. It was also held that sub-section 2 of section 235, post, which exempts,—from the provisions of the main section (dealing with recording or registering any bet, etc.),—bets made on the racecourse of an incorporated association, does not apply to the offence of keeping a common betting house. (10)

It has been since held, by the Ontario Court of Appeal, that bookmakers who conduct betting operations with the public, upon horse races, at the racecourse of an incorporated racing association, and who, in doing so, move around with the public and have no exclusive rights to any portion of the grounds, nor any booth, tent, stand, or other fixed place of business, are not thereby guilty of keeping a common betting house under sections 227 and 228 of the Code; there being a distinction drawn between this case and the case of R. v. Saunders, in which the bookmakers used a wooden box or booth, moved about on castors from one part of the grounds to another during the progress of the race meeting. (1)

Mere acquiescence by a director in prohibited acts of a corporation is not such a participation therein as will constitute him an aider or abettor, or make him criminally liable as a party for the illegal acts of the corporation. The lease by an incorporated jockey club of the betting privileges on the race tracks of the club with the knowledge and acquiescence of the club's president in the making of the lease and in the use of the covered betting enclosure by bookmakers exercising its privileges, but without the president taking part otherwise in the betting or in the management of the enclosure, does not involve the club's president in criminal liability as the keeper of a common betting-house under sections 197 and 198 (now sections 227 and 228), of the Code. (2)

It has been held that the English Betting Act does not apply to betting between the members of a bona fide club, not established for the purpose of betting, although betting is one of the main features of the institution, and members use the club premises for the purpose of betting with each other. (3)

In another English case, the defendants were charged with unlawfully using certain premises, occupied by a social club, for the purpose of betting therein with persons resorting thereto, and with keeping a common gaming-house,—the defendants being respectively the chairman and secretary of the club, and the betting being exclusively with other members of the club. It appeared that the various members were not betting with one another indiscriminately, but were divided into two classes, the defendants being the bookmakers and the others going there to bet with them. On many occasions the defendants occupied the same places, sat at the same table, and used the tape list. Held, that there was evidence to go to the jury in support of the charge. (4)

The organizer of a sweepstake on a horse race to be subscribed for and drawn at his house commits no offence against the English Betting Act, because the subscriptions he receives are not moneys payable on the contingency of a horse race, but on the contingency of the drawing of the sweepstake. (5)

But a sweepstake for money prizes in respect of winning horses in a steeplechase is,—where the person suffering it to be drawn makes a profit, —an unlawful lottery under the English Gaming Act, 1802. (6)

Where the proprietor of a sporting newspaper issued (in connection with his paper), at the price of one penny, a weekly handicap book, containing information as to horse races past and present, and also containing a coupon giving a selection of six races to come and offering money prizes to any purchaser who filled up and returned to the newspaper office, within a limited time, a coupon with the names of six, five or four winning horses, it was held, not to be an invitation to take a share in connection with a bet under the English Betting Act, nor a proposal for the sale of chances in a lottery. (7). And, in another English case, where the defendants had published and sold a newspaper,—containing 25 coupons to be filled up, by purchasers, with names of horses to be selected by them as likely to be placed,—a penny being charged for every coupon filled up after the first (which was free), and a money prize being promised for the placing of the first four horses correctly, it was held that the defendants could not be convicted of any offence either against the Betting Acts or the Lottery Acts. In a later case, the defendant,—who was the occupier of an office and the proprietress and part manager of a sporting newspaper published weekly at such office, was indicted and tried, under the English Betting Act, 1853, section 1 (which is similar in effect to section 227, subsections a and b of our Code, ante(e), on a charge of having unlawfully kept and used the said office for the purpose of money, etc., being received as and for the consideration for undertakings and promises to pay and give, thereafter, money and valuable things on events and contingencies of and relating to horse races; and, upon the following facts, she was convicted. For several weeks each number of the newspaper contained conditions of a coupon competition, the subject of which was a horse race. A prize usually of £1,000 was offered to those who succeeded in placing the names of the winning horses in some future specified horse race. The newspaper contained 40 coupons and an intended competitor might fill up with the names of the horses which he selected and send to the office one or more of these coupons. The first of the coupons was free of charge but a penny was charged upon each subsequent coupon. If more than one coupon was successful the prize was equally divided. A large number of persons took part in the competition. Large sums were received by the defendant at the office in respect of coupons; and the prizes were paid by her to the successful competitors. Held, that the defendant was rightly convicted, even if the transactions between her and the competitors did not amount to betting; and held, further (by some of the Judges), that the transactions did amount to betting; the cases of Caminada v. Hulton, and Stoddart v. Sager (above cited), and the case of R. v. Hobbs (cited at page 237, ante), being all distinguished; the principal ground upon which the case of Caminada v. Hulton was distinguished being that, in that case, the facts shewed that the competitors paid nothing extra (beyond the price of the book), for extra chances of winning the prize, the principal ground upon which the case of Stoddart v. Sagar was distinguished being that the trial Judge in that case did not draw the same conclusion of fact (although he might have done), as was drawn by the trial Judge in the present case, namely, that the money received from the competitors was paid in consideration of a promise to pay a prize on the event of a horse race, and the principal ground on which the case of R. v. Hobbs was distinguished being that, in that case, the person there charged was not shewn to have entered into any such promise as is made, by the statute, the essence of the offence, and that he made no promise except to distribute the money received by him as holder of the sweepstake. (9)

The proprietor of a newspaper issued, with each copy of the paper, a coupon, so that the purchaser might fill in the names of the probable winners of certain football matches, a prize of twenty pounds sterling being given for the most accurate forecast. No money was paid except the price of the newspaper and any competitor, desiring to send in more than one estimate, could do so by obtaining additional copies of the paper. By far the greater number of copies were sold to the public through agents and not at the newspaper office. The appellant purchased copies of the newspaper at the newspaper office and filled in and returned the coupons to the office. Held, that if the money was in fact received for the coupons and not merely for the newspaper, the proprietor had committed the offence under section 1 of the English Betting Act, 1853, of having opened, kept and used an office for the purpose of money being received in consideration of an undertaking to pay money on a contingency relating to a game. (10)

A sporting newspaper,—containing advertisements relating to coupon competitions, the subjects of which were horse races and football matches, and having a supplement containing coupons and conditions of the competitions,—was published at the office, in London, of the registered proprietor of the newspaper; prizes being offered to those correctly filling up a coupon with the result of some specified race or match, and a penny being charged for each coupon filled up; and the coupons and accompanying remittances were directed to be sent to the newspaper proprietor at an address in Holland. Many persons sent coupons and remittances, in postal orders, to the address in Holland; the newspaper proprietor cashed the postal orders in England, and he paid the prizes to the successful competitors:—Held, that,—as the issuing of the newspaper and coupons took place at the office in London, of the newspaper proprietor,—that office had been used for the purpose of money being received by him as the consideration for a promise to pay money on the event of a game, and that he was rightly convicted of an offence under the English Betting Acts. (1)

In a certain village in Ontario, the defendant occupied a tent open to and frequented by the public, in which tent there was a telegraph wire communicating with an incorporated race track in the United States, where horse racing and betting were legalized. In the defendant's tent there was a blackboard on which were marked the names of the horses and jockeys taking part in the races with the weights and the track quotations, and as a race was being run a telegraph operator called out the progress of the race, giving at the end of it the names of the winning horse and of the second and third horses, which were marked also on the blackboard. Duplicate tickets were furnished in the tent to each applicant, each of which tickets requested the defendant to telegraph one B. at the race track in the United States to place a certain amount of money at track quotations on a horse named by the applicant and, by the ticket, the applicant agreed to pay to the defendant for the transmission of his money the sum of ten cents and that all liability on the part of the defendant should cease. The aggregate amount of the moneys so received by the defendant from the applicants for duplicate tickets was notified by telegraph to B., and placed by him with bookmakers on the race track before the beginning of the race, B. paying the defendant a percentage on the moneys received. In another part of the village in Ontario, B. had an agent whom he furnished with money to pay any winnings. Held, that the defendant was properly convicted, under sections 197 and 198 (now sections 227 and 228), of keeping a common betting house, the place in question being opened and kept for the reception of money by the defendant on behalf of B. as the consideration for an undertaking to pay money thereafter to the depositor on the events of horse races. (2)

A bank, a telegraph office and another office were opened simultaneously in a certain town. Moneys were deposited in the bank by various persons who were given receipts therefor in the name of a person in the United States. These receipts were taken to the telegraph office where information as to horse races being run in the United States was furnished to the holders of the receipts, who telegraphed instructions to the person there on whose behalf the receipts were given to place and who placed, on horses running in the races, bets equivalent to the amounts deposited in the bank by the receipt holders, and on their winning, the amounts of their winnings were paid to the receipt holders at the third office, under telegraphic instructions from the person in the United States making the bets:—Held, upon evidence and admissions to the above effect, that the defendant who kept the telegraph office was properly convicted of keeping a common betting house, under sections 197 and 198 (now sections 227 and 228). (3)

The publication in a newspaper of an advertisement soliciting bets to be placed upon horse races and also giving the results from day to day of the races is illegal; and the newspaper proprietor is guilty, under section 197 (d),—now section 227 (d),— of the Code, of the indictable offence of using the newspaper office for the purpose of facilitating the making of bets upon horse races and of keeping a common betting-house. (4)

227a. Opium joint.—An opium joint is a house, room or place to which persons resort for the purpose of smoking or inhaling opium. (Added by 8-9 Edw. VII., c. 9, s. 2).

228. Keeping a disorderly house—Punishment.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to one year's imprisonment who keeps any disorderly house, that is to say, any common bawdy-house, common gaming-house, common betting-house or opium joint, as hereinbefore defined.

2. Any one who appears, acts or behaves as master or mistress, or as the person having the care, government or management, of any disorderly house, shall be deemed to be the keeper thereof, and shall be liable to be prosecuted and punished as such, although in fact he or she is not the real owner or keeper thereof. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 198. (Amended by 8-9 Edw. VII., c. 9, s. 2.)

See comments on bawdy-houses, gaming-houses and betting-houses at page 228, et seq., ante.

Section 641, post, provides for the searching of any house, room or place believed to be kept or used as a comcon gaming-house or betting-house or for the purpose of carrying on a lottery or for selling lottery tickets, and the provisions of sections 641 and 642, post, are now extended so as to apply to searches in opium joints and the seizure therein of devices, pipes or apparatus, etc. (See 642*a*, added by 8-9 Edw. VII., c. 91). And section 640 post, provides for the searching of a house of ill-fame for any woman or girl who has been inveigled or enticed thereto.

229. Playing or looking on in gaming-house.—Every one who plays or looks on while any other person is playing in a common gaming-house is guilty of an offence and liable, on summary conviction before two justices, to a penalty not exceeding one hundred dollars and not less than twenty dollars, and in default of payment to two months' imprisonment. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 199.

A notice of appeal purporting to be from a conviction for "looking on" while another person was playing in a common gaming-house, is not a good notice of appeal from a conviction for "playing" in a common gaming-house. (5)

As to prima facie evidence of a place being a common gaming-house, and that persons found therein were playing there, see sections 985 and 986, post.

two justices, to a penalty not exceeding one hundred dollars, and to six months' imprisonment, with or without hard labor, who,—

(a) wilfully prevents any constable or other officer duly authorized to enter any disorderly house, from entering the same or any part thereof; or,

(b) obstructs or delays any such constable or officer in so entering; or,

(c) by any bolt, chain or other contrivance secures any external or internal door of, or means of access to, any common gaming-house so authorized to be entered; or,

(d) uses any means or contrivance whatsoever for the purpose of preventing, obstructing or delaying the entry of any constable or officer, authorized as aforesaid, into any such disorderly house or any part thereof. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 200.

See section 641, post, as to the right to search gaming-houses and betting-houses.

231. Gaming in stocks or in merchandise.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to five years' imprisonment, and to a fine of five hundred dollars, who, with the intent to make gain or profit by the rise or fall in price of any stock of any incorporated or unincorporated company or undertaking, either in Canada or elsewhere, or of any goods, wares or merchandise,—

(a) without the bona fide intention of acquiring any such shares, goods, wares or merchandise, or of selling the same, as the case may be, makes or signs, or authorizes to be made or signed, any contract or agreement, oral or written, purporting to be for the sale or purchase of any shares of stock, goods, wares or merchandise; or,

(b) makes or signs, or authorizes to be made or signed, any contract or agreement, oral or written, purporting to be for the sale or purchase of any such shares of stock, goods, wares or merchandise in respect of which no delivery of the thing sold or purchased is made or received, and without the bona fide intention to make or receive such delivery.

2. It is not an offence under this section if the broker of the purchaser receives delivery, on his behalf, of the articles sold, notwithstanding that such broker retains or pledges the same as security for the advance of the purchase money or any part thereof. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 201.

By section 987, post, the onus of proving a bona fide intention is thrown upon the accused.

It has been held that a contract for the sale or purchase of stocks or shares, which, in effect, is a bargain for differences only, is a contract by way of gaming under the English Gaming Act, and that it is none the less so because there is superadded to it a proviso that the dealer will deliver the stock sold by him if the purchaser chooses to pay him an additional one-eighth or will accept the stock bought by him subject to a discount for cash, the other party not being bound either to take up or deliver the stock. So, that where a dealer in stocks and shares sent to a customer a contract note in this form, — "I beg to advise having sold to you," — there being here given the description and amount of the shares sold, the amount of "cover" and the price,—"plus one-eighth if stock is taken up—subject to the conditions at the back," the conditions being relative to the "cover," and to "contangoes," and "backwardations," and containing this clause: — "It is to be distinctly understood that I am prepared to deliver the stock and shares to which this contract refers, if demanded, but require cash on the first day of the account for securities I have to deliver customers," it was held by Lindley, M.R., and Rigby, L.J., that the contract on the face of it was a gaming transaction, because it was plain from its terms that the parties did not contemplate the stock being taken up and it was not a bargain for the purchase and sale of stock; and it was held by Vaughan Williams, L.J., that, although it might not on the face of it be a gaming contract, the inference he drew from the transaction was that the parties intended to treat it as one of differences only and that no stock was to be delivered or received. (6)

The test is whether there was an intention, on the defendant's part, to deliver the stock or whether it was a mere bargain for differences.

It has been held, in Montreal, that a broker who acts as such for two parties,—one a buyer and the other a seller,—without having any pecuniary interest in the transaction, beyond his fixed commission, and without any guilty knowledge on his part of the intention of the contracting parties to gamble in stocks or merchandise, is not liable to prosecution under section 201 (a) and (b) (now sections 231*a* and b) of the Criminal Code of Canada, nor as accessory under section 61 (now sec 69) of the Code. (7)

But it has since been held, in Ontario, that a person who acts as agent for another in managing a branch office for gambling transactions within this section (231 of the new Act), knowing that there was no intention of transferring any property or title to property, is liable to conviction as an accessory, although his sole interest in the transactions was in the commissions paid to him for effecting the same; and such agent is also liable under section 232 of the new Act, as the keeper of a common gaming-house; and, upon a speedy trial, is liable to imprisonment for five years, under section 1052 of the Code. (8)

It is open for the jury, or the judge trying the case without a jury, to find, notwithstanding the form of the papers passed between the parties, that there was a secret understanding between them that there should be no delivery of the stocks or property, but payment of differences only. (9)

232. Office for gaming in stocks.—Every office or place of business wherein is carried on the business of making or signing, or procuring to be made or signed, or negotiating or bargaining for the making or signing of contracts of sale or purchase prohibited by the last preceding section is a common gaming-house, and every one who as principal or agent occupies, uses, manages or maintains the same is the keeper of a common gaming-house. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 201.

These places are popularly called Bucket Shops.

233. Frequenting bucket shops—(places in which gaming in stocks is carried on).—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to one year's imprisonment who habitually frequents any office or place wherein the making or signing or procuring to be made or signed, or the negotiating or bargaining for the making or signing of such prohibited contracts of sale or purchase is carried on. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 202.

234. Gambling in public conveyances.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to one year's imprisonment who,—

(a) in any railway car or steamboat, used as a public conveyance for passengers, by means of any game of cards, dice or other instrument of gambling, or by any device of like character, obtains from any other person any money, chattel, valuable security or property; or,

(b) attempts to commit such offence by actually engaging any person in any such game with intent to obtain money or other valuable thing from him.

2. Every conductor, master or superior officer in charge of, and every clerk or employee when authorized by the conductor, master or superior officer in charge of, any railway train or steamboat, station or landing place in or at which any such offence, as aforesaid, is committed or attempted, shall, with or without warrant, arrest any person whom he has good reason to believe to have committed or attempted to commit any such offence, and take him before a justice, and make complaint of such offence on oath, in writing.

3. Every conductor, master or superior officer in charge of any such railway car or steamboat, who makes default in the discharge of any such duty, is liable, on summary conviction, to a penalty not exceeding one hundred dollars and not less than twenty dollars.

4. It shall be the duty of every person who owns or works any such railway car or steamboat to keep a copy of this section posted up in some conspicuous part of such railway car or steamboat.

5. Every person who makes default in the discharge of such duty is liable to a penalty not exceeding one hundred dollars and not less than twenty dollars. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 203.

235. Betting and pool-selling.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence, and liable to one year's imprisonment, and to a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, who—

(a) uses or knowingly allows any part of any premises under his control to be used for the purpose of recording or registering any bet or wager, or selling any pool; or,

(b) keeps, exhibits, or employs, or knowingly allows to be kept, exhibited or employed, in any part of any premises under his control, any device or apparatus for the purpose of recording any bet or wager or selling any pool; or,

(c) becomes the custodian or depository of any money, property or valuable thing staked, wagered or pledged; or,

(d) records or registers any bet or wager, or sells any pool, upon the result

(i) of any political or municipal election,

(ii) of any race,

(iii) of any contest or trial of skill or endurance of man or beast.

2. The provisions of this section shall not extend to any person by reason of his becoming the custodian or depository of any money, property or valuable thing staked, to be paid to the winner of any lawful race, sport, game or exercise, or to the owner of any horse engaged in any lawful race, or to bets between individuals or made on the race course of an incorporated association during the actual progress of a race meeting. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 204.

Sub-section 2 of this section, in exempting, from the provisions of the main section, bets made on the race-course of an incorporated association, does not apply to the offence of keeping a common betting-house. (10) To use a place for the purpose of recording or registering bets or wagers is something entirely different from using a place for the purpose of betting between persons resorting thereto and the owner or occupier thereof. (1)

236. Lotteries.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment and to a fine not exceeding two thousand dollars, who—

(a) makes, prints, advertises or publishes, or causes or procures to be made, printed, advertised or published, any proposal, scheme or plan for advancing, lending, giving, selling or in any way disposing of any property, by lots, cards, tickets, or any mode of chance whatsoever; or,

(b) sells, barters, exchanges or otherwise disposes of, or causes or procures, or aids or assists in, the sale, barter, exchange, or other disposal of, or offer for sale, barter or exchange, any lot, card, ticket or other means or device for advancing, lending, giving, selling or otherwise disposing of any property, by lots, tickets or any mode of chance whatsoever; or,

(c) conducts or manages any scheme, contrivance or operation of any kind for the purpose of determining who, or the holders of what lots, tickets, numbers or chances, are the winners of any property so proposed to be advanced, loaned, given, sold or disposed of.

2. Every one is guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a penalty of twenty dollars, who buys, takes or receives any such lot, ticket or other device as aforesaid.

3. Every sale, loan, gift, barter or exchange of any property, by any lottery, ticket, card or other mode of chance depending upon or to be determined by chance or lot, is void, and all property so sold, lent, given, bartered or exchanged, is liable to be forfeited to any person who sues for the same by action or information in any court of competent jurisdiction.

4. No such forfeiture shall affect any right or title to such property acquired by any bona fide purchaser for valuable consideration without notice.

5. This section includes the printing or publishing, or causing to be printed or published, of any advertisement, scheme, proposal or plan of any foreign lottery, and the sale or offer for sale of any ticket, chance or share, in any such lottery, or the advertisement for sale of such ticket, chance or share, and the conducting or managing of any such scheme, contrivance or operation for determining the winners in any such lottery.

6. This section does not apply to,—

(a) the division by lot or chance of any property by joint tenants or tenants in common, or persons having joint interests (droits indivis) in any such property; or,

(b) raffles for prizes of small value at any bazaar held for any charitable or religious object, if permission to hold the same has been obtained from the city or other municipal council, or from the mayor, reeve or other chief officer of the city, town or other municipality, wherein such bazaar is held, and the articles raffled for thereat have first been offered for sale and none of them are of a value exceeding fifty dollars;

Section 641, post, contains special provisions for searching gaming-houses, betting-houses and lottery-houses.

See section 2[32], ante, as to the meaning of the expression "property."

Provincial Legislatures have no power to authorize the running of lotteries. (1)

Article 2920 of the Revised Statutes of Quebec, and the 53 Vic. c. 36, (Que.), in amendment thereof, made provision for the holding of certain bazaars and lotteries in aid of certain religious and charitable establishments. But it was held that this legislation was ultra vires the Quebec Legislature and an unconstitutional encroachment upon the powers of the Dominion Parliament, which alone has the power to legislate on the subject of lotteries; and the Quebec statutes have since been repealed by the 59 Vic. (Que.), c. 26. (2)

A lottery is a giving or distributing of prizes by some mode or contrivance depending upon chance, without the use of skill; in other words there must, in order to constitute a lottery, be some contrivance or device for obtaining money by chance.

Where the competition is such that what the competing persons do depends upon mere chance, as, for instance, the filling in of missing words in the case of the missing word competition, the transaction is a lottery, the question really being whether a person who competes has to exercise any skill or is driven to take his chance. (3)

Where the proprietor of a newspaper by advertisement therein offered to the readers of the paper a money prize for a correct prediction of the number of male and female births and the number of deaths in London during a specified future week, it was held that the offer did not constitute a lottery. (4)

Where a defendant placed in his shop window a sealed glass jar full of buttons of different sizes, and offered to give to anyone who should guess the nearest to the number of buttons contained in the jar, a pony and cart, the successful guesser being required to purchase goods of the defendant to a certain amount, it was held that as the approximation of the number of buttons depended on the exercise of judgment, observation and mental effort, this was not a MODE OF CHANCE for disposing of property. (5)

A sweepstake for money prizes in respect of winning horses in a steeplechase is, where the person suffering it to be drawn makes a profit, an unlawful lottery. (6)

In a prosecution (prior to the passing of the Criminal Code), of an offence against the R. S. C., c. 159, section 2, respecting lotteries, etc., it was established that the defendant's mode of operation was as follows:—He held in an hotel a kind of concert, and proceeded to sell what he called "Parker's Pacific Pens." Prior to making a sale he placed in an empty box, 100 envelopes, each containing a one dollar bill, 10 envelopes, each containing a five dollar bill, 5 envelopes with a ten dollar bill in each, and one envelope with a fifty dollar bill in it, thus making $250 in 116 envelopes. He also placed in the box 116 other envelopes containing only blank sheets of paper. Every person paying one dollar for a box of pens was entitled to draw one envelope, and any person paying $5 for a box of pens could draw eight envelopes, but he would not take more than $5 from any one person. He said he did not sell the envelopes, but that he sold the pens, and that he distributed the money contained in the envelopes in order to advertise the pens. A box of the pens was worth not more than ten cents. The defendant was convicted; and an application to quash the conviction was dismissed, it being held that the defendant was offering for sale and selling a means or device for disposing of his pens by a mode of chance, or was selling his pens as a means or device for disposing of the money contained in the envelopes by a mode of chance, both parties to the transaction, — the defendant as seller and each purchaser who bought, — knowing that the $1 paid was not paid for the pens, — these being only the device, — but that the $1 was for the chance of getting one of the prizes contained in the envelopes. It was held, further, that the sale of lottery tickets or chances would be equally an offence whether a profit,—direct or indirect,—be intended, or no profit be sought or expected. (7)

Where tickets for a drawing by lot are sold as part of a scheme for the disposal of goods and the holder of the winning ticket, by the conditions of the drawing, must shoot a turkey at fifty yards in five shots in order to win the prize, such a condition does not necessarily take the case out of the lottery sections of the Criminal Code. It is a question for the jury whether such condition was imposed as a contest of skill, or as a mere pretence in evasion of the lottery law. (8)

A competition for a prize offered for the nearest estimates of the number of votes to be cast at a coming election and the sale of certificates of admission thereto in consideration of money paid or services performed is not a lottery under section 205 (now 236) of the Code. (9)

The advertising by a firm of shopkeepers in a newspaper of a prize to be awarded, free of cost, to the one of their customers who could make the nearest guess to the number of their cash sales on a given day is not a violation of the provisions of the Criminal Code prohibiting lotteries. (10)

The proprietor of a sporting newspaper issued, in connection with the paper, at the price of one penny, a weekly handicap book or racing record containing general information as to horse races past and to come. The last page of this weekly handicap book was a coupon in which six races to come were selected, and money prizes were offered to any purchaser of the book who filled up, and returned to the newspaper office within a limited time and under specified conditions, a coupon with the names of six, five or four winning horses:—Held, that this was not a proposal and scheme for the sale of chances in a lottery, under the English Lottery Act. (1)

In another case, the defendants had published and sold a newspaper containing 25 coupons to be filled up, by purchasers, with the names of the horses to be selected by them as likely to be placed in a race. For every coupon filled up after the first (which was free), a penny was charged, and a money prize of £100 was promised for the placing of the first four horses correctly:—Held, that this competition was not a lottery, that the selling of the newspapers containing the coupons did not constitute the selling of chances in a lottery, and that the defendants could not be convicted of any offence against the English Lottery Acts. (2)

In a more recent case, the defendant,—who was the occupier of an office and the proprietress and part manager of a sporting newspaper published weekly,—was tried under the English Betting Act, on a charge of having unlawfully kept and used her office for receiving money, etc., in consideration of promises to pay thereafter money on events of and relating to horse races, and on proof of the publication in her newspaper of a coupon competition offering prizes to those who succeeded in placing the names of the winning horses in some future specified horse race, she was convicted and the conviction was held good, even if the transactions between her and the competitors did not amount to betting, the trial judge having rightly held that the money received from the competitors with the coupons sent in by them was paid in consideration of a promise to pay a prize on the event of a horse race. (3)

It has been held in England that a sweepstake for money prizes in respect of a winning horse in a steeplechase is, where the person suffering it to be drawn makes a profit, an unlawful lottery within the meaning of the English Gaming Act. (4)

Newspaper proprietors distributed gratuitously thousands of metal discs, each bearing a distinctive number and the words, "keep this; it may be worth £100. See the Weekly Telegraph to-day." Periodically, numbers corresponding to those on some of the distributed discs, were published in the above paper, and it was announced that holders of these discs on forwarding them would receive a prize. No charge was made for the discs, and it was not necessary for the disc-holder either to purchase or produce a copy of the paper in order to have a chance of winning a prize. Information as to the winning numbers could be obtained gratuitously at the office of the paper. It was found that the scheme was formulated in order to induce people to buy the paper, and that as a consequence the circulation had increased 20 per cent.:—Held, that this was a lottery, on the ground that as, in fact, most of the recipients had to buy the paper, the chances of winning were paid for by them, and the prize-money was provided by them in the aggregate, and that therefore the discs were not distributed gratuitously. (5)

The owners of a journal offered therein a prize of £300 for the best line in a limerick competition and they announced that the last line of the unfinished limerick (which was printed on a coupon in the journal), must be filled in, the coupon then cut out and sent in to the editor by a certain date with a postal order for sixpence. The plaintiff was a competitor, and had sent in a line which was identical with the one announced to be the winning line, but the prize of £300 was awarded to another competitor. In an action by the plaintiff to recover either the £300, or one-half of it,—Held, that the competition was a lottery, and that the action was not maintainable. (6)

It has been held that the sale of bonds such as the French "Panama bons," which by their terms in addition to the obligation to pay a fixed sum at maturity, entitle the holder to participate in prize drawings to take place at frequent intervals during their currency, is illegal in Canada as being in substance a lottery within the above section 236 of our Code. The accused had made sales of securities called "Bon Panama" originally issued in Paris, France, by the Panama Canal Company under the authority of the laws of France. These bonds promised the repayment of 400 francs in 1988, and carried with them the chances of getting prizes varying in amount from 500,000 francs to 1,000, given to the holders of the lucky numbers by drawings to take place at frequent intervals during the life of the bonds. In canvassing purchasers of the bonds, the accused held out as an inducement the chance of winning one of these prizes, and the belief that there was such a chance influenced the purchasers in paying the price which they gave for the bonds:—Held, that the accused was rightly convicted of selling lottery tickets contrary to section 236 of the Code. (7)

See section 641, post, as to the right to search houses or places used for the purpose of carrying on a lottery or for the sale of lottery tickets, etc.

It has been held that the finding of lottery tickets and other paraphernalia of a lottery on premises entered under a search order for instruments of gaming does not in itself constitute a prima facie case nor shift the onus of proof to the defence, and that section 985, post,—(which declares that the finding of instruments of gaming upon an order of search under section 641, post, shall constitute prima facie evidence that the place is used as a common gaming-house and that play was going on),—has no application to a charge under section 236 for selling lottery tickets. (8)

237. Not burying the dead; offering indignity to human remains.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to five years' imprisonment who,—

(a) without lawful excuse, neglects to perform any duty either imposed upon him by law or undertaken by him with reference to the burial of any dead human body or human remains; or,

(b) improperly or indecently interferes with or offers any indignity to any dead human body or human remains, whether buried or not. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 206.

It is an offence at common law to dig up a dead body from a grave; and it is no defence to such a charge that the motives of the defendant were laudable. (1) And a person who without lawful authority disposes of a dead body for dissecting purposes and for gain and profit is indictable at common law. (2)

Taking up dead bodies, even though for the purpose of dissection, is an indictable offence. (3)

The neglect to decently bury a dead human body by a person who has undertaken to do so and has removed the body with that expressed intention, is an indictable offence under the above section, 237, although such person was, apart from such undertaking, under no legal obligation in respect of the burial. (4)

It has been held, in England, that a parent who has not the means of providing burial for the body of his deceased child is not liable to be indicted for not providing for its burial, even though a nuisance is occasioned by allowing the body to remain unburied. (5)

It has also been held, in England, that a person who burns a dead body, in order to prevent the coroner from holding an inquest, is guilty of a criminal offence. (6)

Exposing the naked dead body of a child in or near a highway is a common law nuisance. (7)

As to disinterring and removing human remains from an unconsecrated burial ground, see the case of Jacobson. (8)

Vagrancy.

238. Vagrancy defined.—Every one is a loose, idle or disorderly person or vagrant who,—

(a) not having any visible means of subsistence is found wandering abroad or lodging in any barn or outhouse, or in any deserted or unoccupied building, or in any cart or wagon, or in any railway carriage or freight car, or in any railway building, and not giving a good account of himself, or who, not having any visible means of maintaining himself, lives without employment;

(b) being able to work and thereby or by other means to maintain himself and family, wilfully refuses or neglects to do so;

(c) openly exposes or exhibits in any street, road, highway or public place, any indecent exhibition;

(d) without a certificate signed, within six months, by a priest, clergyman or minister of the Gospel, or two justices, residing in the municipality where the alms are being asked, that he or she is a deserving object of charity, wanders about and begs, or goes about from door to door, or places himself or herself in any street, highway, passage or public place to beg or receive alms;

(e) loiters on any street, road, highway or public place, and obstructs passengers by standing across the footpath, or by using insulting language, or in any other way;

(f) causes a disturbance in or near any street, road, highway or public place, by screaming, swearing or singing, or by being drunk, or by impeding or incommoding peaceable passengers;

(g) by discharging firearms, or by riotous or disorderly conduct in any street or highway, wantonly disturbs the peace and quiet of the inmates of any dwelling-house near such street or highway;

(h) tears down or defaces signs, breaks windows, or doors or door plates, or the walls of houses, roads or gardens, or destroys fences;

(i) being a common prostitute or night walker, wanders in the fields, public streets or highways, lanes or places of public meeting or gathering of people, and does not give a satisfactory account of herself;

(j) is a keeper or inmate of a disorderly house, bawdy-house or house of ill-fame, or house for the resort of prostitutes;

(k) is in the habit of frequenting such houses and does not give a satisfactory account of himself or herself; or,

(l) having no peaceable profession or calling to maintain himself by, for the most part supports himself by gaming or crime, or by the avails of prostitution. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 207; 63-64 V., c. 46, s. 3.

Under the common law of England, a vagrant, as such, was not indictable, but an idle and loose person could be apprehended and bound to his good behaviour; (9) and there are many early statutes authorizing summary proceedings against idlers, vagabonds and rogues, and against wandering mariners and soldiers, and against gypsies. (10)

The law as to vagrants does not warrant an arrest, much less a conviction, on mere suspicion of dishonest intentions or upon suspicion of vagrancy.

A provincial legislature has jurisdiction to legislate concerning matters of police regulation of public morals, but in so far as the same subject is dealt with by the Dominion Parliament, the Dominion legislation will prevail: and the power of enacting such police regulations may be delegated by the provincial legislature to municipal councils. (1)

A person who had registered at an hotel in Toronto was arrested on the same day at the Union Railway station, he having been pointed out, by some of the railway officials, as a suspicious character. Upon him were found $8 in cash, a railway mileage ticket (nearly used up) in favor of another person, and two cheques sworn to be such as confidence men use. He offered no explanation and gave no information about himself. Upon proof of these facts, it was held that the Act relative to vagrants did not warrant the defendant's arrest, much less his conviction under the provision of law rendering a person a vagrant who, having no visible means of maintaining himself, lives without employment (see the latter part of sub-section (a) of the above section, 238), but that, before a person can be convicted under such a provision of the law, he must have acquired in some degree a character which brings him within it. (2)

A summary conviction for being a loose idle person, or vagrant, without specifying in what the vagrancy consisted, is void for uncertainty. (1*a*)

A summary conviction for being an idle person living without employment or means of support is bad, if the accused had on his person at the time of arrest sufficient money for his temporary living expenses. (2*a*)

Where a person is charged with being a vagrant in being able to work and maintain himself and family and in wilfully refusing or neglecting to do so, an obligation to maintain must be established against him. For instance, a man is not bound to support his wife who has left him and is living in adultery; (3) and where, on a similar charge, the magistrates found that the defendant refused to maintain his wife because of his bona fide belief that she had committed adultery,—he having offered under certain conditions to support his children, the charge was dismissed, the magistrates deciding that the defendant had not wilfully refused or neglected, the word wilfully importing a mens rea, which must be established on such a charge before the defendant can be convicted of being an idle and disorderly person; and it was held, in appeal, that the decision of the magistrates was right. (4) Nor can a person who has offered to take back his wife be convicted on such a charge. (5)

It has been held that a person who is able to work and to thereby or by other means maintain his wife and who is charged with vagrancy for wilfully refusing or neglecting to do so, cannot be convicted when it appears that his wife had left the matrimonial abode without his consent and without judicial authorization or other valid reason, and if he was willing and offered to receive her while she on her part refused to return and live with him. (6)

To constitute a wilful refusal or neglect by a husband to maintain his wife, there must be an absence of any reasonable ground for believing the refusal or neglect to be lawful. A husband, who had been adjudged by a civil Court, in an action brought by his wife for separation, to pay his wife an interim alimentary allowance, is relieved from that liability, in the province of Quebec, on proof that the wife is supporting herself by immorality; and a criminal prosecution against him for non-support will be dismissed on the like proof. It seems that in order to convict a person under the provisions of subsection (d) of the above section, 238, it must be shewn that it is the person's habit and mode of life to wander about and beg. So, that, where colliers on strike, who were householders in a colliery district and had wives and families, were prosecuted and convicted as vagrants, under a section of the English Vagrancy Act similar in effect to the above subsection (d), for having gone from house to house in the streets of a town four miles distant from their homes, with a wagon marked "Children's Bread Wagon," and begged for assistance in money and kind, it was held that the conviction was wrong, it not being the habit and mode of life of the defendants to wander abroad and beg, the law being aimed at persons who make it their habit and mode of life to wander abroad or place themselves in public places to gather alms, and that if persons,—not as a regular course of living, but for some object not in itself unlawful,—go from house to house and solicit subscriptions, they are not vagrants within the meaning of the Act. (8)

A licensed carter who, contrary to a city ordinance, loiters on the street near the entrance of an hotel and solicits passengers to hire his cab, but who does not obstruct passengers, is not within clause (e) of the above section. (9)

Being drunk in a public street is not an offence under clause (f) of the above section. The offence consists in causing a disturbance by being drunk. (10)

Where a body of students march upon a sidewalk in files of four with arms linked, any of them may be properly convicted of an offence against a municipal by-law prohibiting "walking or marching in a group or near to each other on the sidewalk so as to obstruct a free passage for foot passengers," although sufficient space remained for persons walking in single file to pass thereon. (1)

There is no legal right at common law for persons to assemble in any numbers upon a highway and to remain assembled there as long as they please to the detriment of others having equal rights of passage over the highway. And it has been held in Nova Scotia that an assembly of a religious character, for instance, the Salvation Army, is subject to this rule, and that members thereof who hold religious service on a town street and thereby collect a crowd which blocks the free passage of the street, are properly convicted under a statute prohibiting persons from standing in a group or near to each other on the street so as to obstruct a free passage for carriages, etc. (2)

It has been held, however, that the mere fact of holding a meeting in a street does not necessarily imply the impeding or incommoding of peaceable passengers, and proof of actual impeding or incommoding is essential to justify a conviction. The law of vagrancy does not apply to persons of general good character, but is intended to apply to loose, idle and disorderly persons only. (3)

Slandering a person in a restaurant, open to the public, is not an offence under the vagrancy clauses of the Code, either as an obstruction to passengers by using insulting language or as a disturbance incommoding peaceable passengers. (4)

A summary conviction for causing a disturbance in a public place and thereby being a vagrant, must specify one of the means of causing the disturbance which are specified in clause (f) of section 238, that is, screaming, swearing, or singing, or by being drunk, or by impeding or incommoding peaceable passengers. (5)

Where a summary conviction is in form for two separate offences,—namely, the offence, under clause (e) of section 238, of loitering on a street and obstructing passengers by using insulting language, and the offence, under clause (f), of causing a disturbance in a certain street, etc., thereby being a vagrant,—and shews that the penalty adjudged is for both, although within the legal limit for one, but one of the offences is defectively described, the conviction must be quashed on certiorari; it cannot be amended by striking out the offence defectively described, as the Court has no power to make a fresh adjudication by apportioning the penalty which was discretionary with the magistrate. (6)

A summary conviction for vagrancy is multifarious if it charges both obstructing passengers on the street, and causing a disturbance in the street, these being separate offences under section 238. (7)

A licensed saloon and billiard hall is a "public place," under sections 197 and 238 (f); and a person causing a disturbance therein by being drunk is liable as a vagrant. This was decided in a case in which two men were tried upon a charge of resisting and obstructing a peace officer while in the act of arresting one of them for screaming, swearing, being drunk and impeding and incommoding the customers present in an establishment known as a saloon where there was a billiard room and a place qualified as a theatre. (8)

It has been held in the province of Quebec that a provincial statute punishing habitual drunkards with a sentence of six months to one year, relates to a matter pertaining to the criminal law and is ultra vires of the provincial legislature. (8*a*)

Sub-section (i) of the above section, 238, does not mean that being a prostitute or a night walker makes such a person liable to punishment as such, but only those prostitutes who when found wandering about and when requested to give an account of themselves are unable to give a satisfactory account of themselves. So that where under a section of the Canadian Vagrancy Act (32-33 Vic., c. 28) similar in effect to sub-section (i) of section 238 of the Code, a woman was convicted of being a common prostitute and of wandering in the public streets and not giving a satisfactory account of herself, the conviction was held illegal, because it did not allege that the woman was asked, before being taken, or when she was being taken, to give an account of herself; and it was held further that an allegation "she giving no satisfactory account," does not shew that any prior demand was made upon her to give an account of herself. (9)

In a recent case in the Yukon Territorial Court, it was decided, by Craig, J., that a conviction for vagrancy against a prostitute for wandering in the public streets and not giving a satisfactory account of herself, is bad, if it omits to set out that the accused was asked, before the arrest, to give an account of herself, it being, by the learned Judge, held that it is an essential ingredient of the offence that a request for an explanation should have first been made, and that the onus is on the prosecution to prove both the request and the failure to give a satisfactory explanation. There may be a joint conviction against a husband and wife for keeping a house of ill-fame. The keeping has nothing to do with the ownership of the house but with the management of it. (1)

Where a prisoner was charged with keeping a bawdy-house for the resort of prostitutes, it was held, upon habeas corpus, that, although "keeping a bawdy-house" is in itself a substantive offence, and although "keeping a house for the resort of prostitutes" is also a substantive offence, still there was in this case only one offence charged and that the conviction and commitment thereon were good. (2)

Upon a charge of keeping or being an inmate of a bawdy-house, a conviction should not be made upon evidence of the house's general reputation alone, without proof of acts or conduct from which the character of the house may be inferred. (3)

Upon a conviction and fine for keeping a house of ill-fame, the powers of a magistrate for enforcing payment of the fine are limited by section 739 (b), post, to directing imprisonment for a period not exceeding three months, although he might, in the first instance, impose imprisonment for six months instead of or in addition to a fine. Section 239 only applies to authorize six months imprisonment when imposed as the substantive punishment for the offence and not as a means of enforcing payment of a fine. Semble, that section 781, post, only applies to authorize six months imprisonment in default of payment of a fine imposed when a fine and imprisonment are conjointly imposed in the first instance. (4)

The offence under sub-section (k) of the above section, 238, consists in a person being an habitual frequenter of a house of ill-fame and not giving a satisfactory account of himself; and a conviction on such a charge must shew that the accused is an habitual frequenter; or it will be void. (5)

A person arrested on the charge of being a frequenter of a bawdy-house, under clause (k) of section 238, should first be asked to give an account of his presence in the house, and a summary conviction is bad if that statutory requirement has not been complied with; and a police officer asking such explanation from a person in a bawdy-house should first disclose the fact that he is a police officer, if not then in official uniform. (6)

See section 797, post, giving a right of appeal,—(in the same manner as from a summary conviction under Part XV., post),—in the case of a conviction for an offence under section 238, clause (j).

A woman who is kept by a married man, and who surrenders herself to sexual intercourse with him alone, does not come within the provisions of the above section 238 (l), which declares that a person is a vagrant who, having no peaceable calling, etc., is, for the most part, supported by gaming or crime or by the avails of prostitution. (7)

Where a defendant was convicted of being a vagrant in having no peaceable profession or calling to support himself by and in supporting himself for the most part by crime, and the evidence shewed that he had no peaceable profession or calling and that he consorted with thieves or reputed thieves, but the witnesses did not say that he supported himself by crime, it was held that it was not to be inferred that he supported himself by crime, although from the evidence there was reason to suspect that he supported himself by some irregular course of life, and that to sustain a conviction there should have been evidence that he got his living by thieving or by aiding and acting with thieves or by such means as shewed that he was pursuing crime. (8)

Where a person was convicted before a police magistrate of being a vagrant in having no peaceable profession or calling to maintain himself by, but for the most part supported himself by gaming, it was held, on habeas corpus, that to support such a conviction there must be evidence of four distinct propositions, namely, (a) that the accused had no peaceable profession or calling to support himself by; (b) that he practised gaming; (c) that from this practice he derived some substantial profits, and (d) that these profits constituted the larger part of his means of support, and that inasmuch as there was no reasonable evidence to warrant a finding of either the third or fourth of these propositions it could not be assumed that, because the accused had no visible occupation and because he was greatly addicted to gambling, the gambling contributed mainly to his support, as it might be that he was possessed of means to enable him to live in affluence or that he was supported by others and that his means or the means supplied to him by others were to some extent dissipated by him in gambling. (9)

The evidence on a charge of vagrancy under section 238 (l), must shew that the gaming or crime took place during the time within or for which he is charged in the information with having been a vagrant; and, where a son has for a portion of the year lived with his parents at their request, they being willing and able to provide for his support, the fact of his living without employment does not constitute an offence, and although it may appear that the money by which the accused is supported while living with his parents had been previously, (that is prior to the time of the alleged vagrancy), acquired by him by gaming, etc., and that the accused while resident with his parents idled away his time in places of public resort, such does not justify a conviction for vagrancy. (10)

A conviction for vagrancy under section 238, clause (l), is not warranted where the accused had, at the time of his arrest, sufficient money for his immediate wants and had been regularly employed in another city until two months prior thereto, although he was shewn to have been an associate of pickpockets in the city from which he came. (1)

A summary conviction for vagrancy is bad, if made upon evidence not reduced to writing. (2)

It has been held that a recorder,—in condemning an accused to pay a fine and costs, for vagrancy and to imprisonment in case of non-payment,—has no right to impose, as a condition of the discharge of the accused, at the expiry of the fixed term of imprisonment, the payment of such costs and of expenses of conveyance to gaol, and such conviction will be quashed on certiorari. EXCLUDING PUBLIC FROM PLACE OF TRIAL.—At the trial of any person charged with an offence under clauses (i), (j) or (k) of section 238, the Court or Judge or justice may order the public to be excluded from the Court room during the trial. (Section 645, post).

PART VI.

OFFENCES AGAINST THE PERSON AND REPUTATION.

Interpretation.

240. Definitions.—In this Part, unless the context otherwise requires,—

(a) 'form of marriage' includes any form either recognized as a valid form by the law of the place where it is gone through, or which, though not so recognized, is such that a marriage celebrated there in that form is recognized as binding by the law of the place where the offender is tried;

(b) 'guardian' includes any person who has in law or in fact the custody or control of any child referred to;

(c) 'abandon' or 'expose' includes a wilful omission to take charge of any child referred to on the part of a person legally bound to take charge of such child, as well as any mode of dealing with it calculated to leave it exposed to risk without protection. 55-56 V., c. 29, ss. 216 and 275; 63-64 V., c. 46, s. 3.

Duties Tending to the Preservation of Life.

241. Duty of persons in charge of others to provide necessaries of life. Every one who has charge of any other person unable by reason either of detention, age, sickness, insanity or any other cause, to withdraw himself from such charge, and unable to provide himself with the necessaries of life, is, whether such charge is undertaken by him under any contract, or is imposed upon him by law, or by reason of his unlawful act, under a legal duty to supply that person with the necessaries of life, and is criminally responsible for omitting, without lawful excuse, to perform such duty if the death of such person is caused, or if his life is endangered, or his health has been or is likely to be permanently injured, by such omission. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 209.

Neglect by parents to call in medical aid to their sick child, in consequence of which neglect the child dies, amounts to manslaughter; and it is no defence to such a charge for the parents to say they have conscientious objections,—based upon certain religious views,—to call in medical aid. (1)

Where a woman who lived with her sick and helpless aunt neglected to give the latter necessary assistance to enable her to obtain food and medical aid, and where such negligence was found to have accelerated the aunt's death, the woman was held rightly convicted of manslaughter. The prisoner, who was of full age and without means of her own, lived with and was maintained by the deceased, her aunt, who was a woman of 73 years of age. No one else lived with them. For the last ten days of her life, the deceased suffered from a disease which prevented her moving or doing any thing to procure assistance. During this time the prisoner lived in the house and took in the food supplied by tradesmen, but gave none of it to the deceased and procured for her no medical nor nursing aid and informed no one of the deceased's condition, although she had abundant opportunity of doing so. No one but the prisoner had any knowledge of the condition of the deceased prior to her death, which was accelerated by want of food, nursing and medical attendance. Held, that a duty was imposed upon the prisoner to supply the deceased with sufficient food to maintain life, and that the deceased's death having been accelerated by the neglect of such duty, the prisoner was properly convicted of manslaughter. (2)

See section 244, post, for the punishment of neglect or refusal to perform any of the duties specified in the above section 241, and in sections 242 and 243, when the neglect or refusal causes an injury short of death. If the neglect or refusal causes death and amounts to culpable homicide, it would be punishable as such, under section 252, post.

Medical attendance and remedies are necessaries within the meaning of sections 241 and 242; and any one legally liable to provide such is criminally responsible for neglect to do so, as well under the common law as under the Criminal Code. Conscientious belief that it is against the teachings of the Bible and therefore wrong to have recourse to medical attendance and remedies is no excuse. (3)

A parent who omits to provide his child, under sixteen, with medicines and medical treatment when reasonably necessary and when the parent is able to provide the same, is thereby guilty of criminal neglect, amounting to manslaughter, if the death of the child is the result thereof; and a conscientious objection to medical treatment because of a belief in the doctrines of "Christian Scientists," is not a lawful excuse for the omission. (4)

When the husband's failure to support his wife causes no injury to the wife's health, she having been maintained by the charity of friends on the husband's default, such default does not give rise to criminal responsibility under sections 210 and 215 (now sections 242 and 244) of the Code. (5)

242. Duty of head of family to provide necessaries. Every one who as parent, guardian or head of a family is under a legal duty to provide necessaries for any child under the age of sixteen years is criminally responsible for omitting, without lawful excuse, to do so while such child remains a member of his or her household, whether such child is helpless or not, if the death of such child is caused, or if his life is endangered, or his health is or is likely to be permanently injured, by such omission.

2. Every one who is under a legal duty to provide necessaries for his wife, is criminally responsible for omitting, without lawful excuse so to do, if the death of his wife is caused, or if her life is endangered, or her health is or is likely to be permanently injured, by such omission. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 210.

As to proof of age of a child for the purpose of this section and of sections 243 and 245, see section 984, post.

On the trial of an indictment under sub-section 2 of this section, it was held that, in order to shew a lawful excuse, evidence is admissible on behalf of the prisoner of there having been at the time of the marriage an agreement made between him and his intended wife that after marriage they were to live at their respective homes and that she should be supported as before the marriage and not by the prisoner until he obtained a situation where he could earn sufficient for the maintenance of both. (6)

Where a defendant was convicted on a charge of neglecting to support his wife, and the evidence shewed that the parties were married in 1890 but that the wife was married previously to another man in 1886, although she had never lived with her first husband, and it appeared that, in 1888, she had received a letter stating that he was dying in the United States, and that about a year after her marriage to the defendant she heard that her first husband was dead. Held, that there was evidence to go to the jury of the death of the first husband before the second marriage and that the defendant was properly convicted. (7)

A defendant was tried and convicted by a County Court Judge of having omitted, without lawful excuse, to provide his wife with necessaries, in consequence of which her health was likely to be permanently injured. The evidence shewed that the defendant, who was in receipt of regular weekly wages, refused to make any provision for his wife at a time when she was pregnant and incapacitated for work. Held that there was evidence upon which the Judge could properly find against the defendant, that the words "likely to be permanently injured" have no technical meaning, and that it is purely a question of fact in such a case whether the acts proved are such that the health of the wife is likely by reason thereof to be permanently injured. (8)

In the case of a conviction on a charge of failing to supply necessaries to a wife whereby her health is likely to be permanently injured, the conviction ought to be affirmed, where there is some evidence from which it may be inferred that such permanent injury was likely to result from the non-supply of necessaries, this being the question depending upon the facts or the weight of evidence, and one which cannot properly be made the subject of a reserved case. (9)

Where the husband's failure to support his wife causes no injury to the wife's health,—she having been maintained by the charity of friends, on the husband's default, such default does not give rise to criminal responsibility under sections 242 and 244. (10)

The defendant may be convicted notwithstanding that his wife has, in consequence of the neglect to supply her with necessaries left him, taking with her a small sum of money belonging to him. (1)

The injury to the wife's health, which is essential to constitute the offence of failing to provide necessaries to a wife under section 242, must be due to deprivation of food, clothing, shelter or medical attendance; and an attack of nervous prostration suffered by the wife, through mental worry because her husband deserts her and allows her relatives to support her, is not sufficient. (2)

The refusal of a deserted wife to again live with her husband unless he puts up security in money not to again desert her, is a "lawful excuse" for his omission to support her subsequently to his offer to return and while such refusal continues, unless it is shewn that her return would be dangerous to her health. (3)

A conscientious objection to medical treatment, because of a belief that it is against certain religious doctrines, is no excuse for a parents' omission to provide necessary medicines and medical treatment. (4)

243. Duty of masters to provide necessaries. Every one who, as master or mistress, has contracted to provide necessary food, clothing or lodging for any servant or apprentice under the age of sixteen years, is under a legal duty to provide the same, and is criminally responsible for omitting, without lawful excuse, to perform such duty, if the death of such servant or apprentice is caused, if his life is endangered, or his health has been or is likely to be permanently injured, by such omission. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 211.

The Royal Commissioners, in referring to the provisions of sections of their draft code nearly identical with the three foregoing sections, say: "As homicide and the infliction of bodily injury may be effected as well by an omission to discharge a legal duty as by an illegal act, it is necessary to begin by defining the legal duties tending to the preservation of life, the neglect of which is criminal. This is the subject of Part XV of the Draft Code and of chapter 8 of the Bill. We believe that this part of the Draft Code will be found to state, in a clear and compendious form.

the unwritten law upon the subject to which it relates. Section 161 (5), is a re-enactment of 24 and 25 Vic., c. 100, s. 26, which was itself a re-enactment of 14 and 15 Vic., c. 11. That statute was passed in the excitement consequent on the case of R. v. Sloane, (6) and was framed so as to embrace all cases where there was a contract to supply a servant of whatever age with food, clothing, and lodging. It has been thought better to limit it to servants and apprentices under the age of sixteen, but it is right to point out that this is not the existing law. Section 160, (7) puts the head of a family under the same criminal responsibility towards members of his household under the age of sixteen as a master is to a servant of the same age."

A person who engages the services of a child under sixteen years of age, placed out with him by its legal guardian under a contract for the child's services for a fixed period, whereby the party with whom the child is placed engages to furnish the child with board, lodging, clothing and necessaries, is not as to such child "a guardian or head of family" so as to become criminally responsible as such under the above section, 242, for omitting to provide "necessaries" to such child while a member of his household. The relationship in such a case is that of master and servant and comes within the provisions of section 243, under which the master is criminally responsible only in respect of a failure to provide necessary food, clothing or lodging. (8)

244. Omitting duty to provide necessaries.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to three years' imprisonment who, being bound to perform any duty specified in the three last preceding sections, without lawful excuse neglects or refuses to do so, unless the offence amounts to culpable homicide. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 215; 56 V., c. 32, s. 1.

The punishment provided by this section is for cases in which the injury caused is an injury short of death. When the injury caused results in death, the offender will be guilty of culpable homicide, under section 252, post, and be punishable accordingly.

It will be readily seen that, in a prosecution under this section for neglecting or refusing to perform any of the duties specified in sections 241, 242 and 243, ante, it must be alleged in the indictment and established in evidence that the neglect or refusal was without lawful excuse and that thereby the life of the person neglected or omitted to be provided with necessaries is endangered or his or her health permanently injured or likely to be permanently injured.

Pargraph 2 of section 4 of the Canada Evidence Act, post, provides that, in cases under sections 244 and 245 of the Code, the wife shall be a competent and compellable witness for the prosecution without the consent of the accused.

245. Abandoning children under two years old.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to three years' imprisonment who unlawfully abandons or exposes any child under the age of two years, whereby its life is endangered or its health is permanently injured. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 216.

Section 27 of the Imperial Statute (24 and 25 Vic., c. 100) on this subject, is as follows:

"Whosoever shall unlawfully abandon or expose any child, being under the age of two years, whereby the life of such child shall be endangered, or the health of such child shall have been or is likely to be permanently injured, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable to be kept in penal servitude for the term of three years."

In an English case, the prisoners were charged by an indictment framed under this section with having abandoned and exposed a child under two years of age, whereby its life was endangered, and the following facts were established against them.

One of the defendants was the mother of a weakly, bastard child, which, —when it was about five weeks old,—both prisoners put in a hamper, at S., the child, when so put in the hamper, being wrapped up in a shawl and being then packed in the hamper with shavings and cotton wool. The mother then took the hamper containing the child from S., to the booking office of the railway station at M. (a distance of about four miles), and there left it, having paid the carriage of the hamper to G. The hamper was addressed to the lodging of the child's father at G., and he had told the mother, previous to the child's birth, that if she sent it to him he would keep it. The mother told the railway clerk to be careful of the hamper and to send it by the next train which was due to leave the station at M., in ten minutes from the time of her depositing it there. Upon the address were the words, "with care; to be delivered immediately." The hamper was duly sent by train and delivered at its address in G., in a little less than an hour from its being despatched from M. On the hamper being opened the child was alive, and lived for three weeks afterwards, when it died from causes not attributable to the conduct of either of the prisoners. Upon these facts it was held that there was an abandonment and exposure endangering the life of the child; and the prisoners were found guilty. On the point being reserved, the conviction was affirmed. (1)

In another case, a woman, who was living apart from her husband, and who had the custody of their child, brought it and left it outside the father's door, telling him she had done so. The father knowingly allowed the child to remain outside his door from 7 p.m., till 1 a.m., when it was found, cold and stiff, by a constable who removed it. It was held that, although the father had not the actual custody and possession of the child, yet as he was legally bound to provide for it, his allowing it to remain where he did was an abandonment and exposure by him whereby the child's life was endangered within the meaning of 24-25 Vic., c. 100, sec. 27. (2)

An indictment charging a woman with having unlawfully left in the highway a child a month old, of which she had the care, with intent to burden the parish with its maintenance, was held bad for not alleging any injury done to the child by her act. (3)

246. Duty of persons undertaking acts dangerous to life.—Every one who undertakes, except in cases of necessity, to administer surgical or medical treatment, or to do any other lawful act the doing of which is or may be dangerous to life, is under a legal duty to have and to use reasonable knowledge, skill and care in doing any such act, and is criminally responsible for omitting, without lawful excuse, to discharge that duty if death is caused by such omission. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 212.

Any person, whether a licensed medical practitioner or not, who deals with the life or health of an individual is bound to treat his or her patient with care, attention and assiduity; and, if the patient dies for want of either, the person is guilty of manslaughter. (4)

On an indictment against a medical man for manslaughter by administering poison by mistake for some other drug, the prosecution must shew not only that the accused supplied a mixture containing a large quantity of poison, but that this happened through gross negligence on his part. (5)

Where proper medical assistance can be had, a person totally ignorant of the science of medicine who takes upon himself to administer a dangerous remedy to one laboring under disease, is, if death ensue in consequence of the administering of that dangerous remedy, guilty of manslaughter. (6)

247. Duty of persons in charge of dangerous things.—Every one who has in his charge or under his control anything whatever, whether animate or inanimate, or who erects, makes or maintains anything whatever which, in the absence of precaution or care, may endanger human life, is under a legal duty to take reasonable precautions against, and use reasonable care to avoid, such danger, and is criminally responsible for the consequences of omitting, without lawful excuse, to perform such duty. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 213.

Three young men took a rifle which would have been deadly at a mile, and began practising firing with it at a target, which they erected in a field near to roads and houses, from a distance of about 100 yards. One of the shots thus fired (it was not proved by which man) killed a boy in a tree in a neighboring garden at a spot 393 yards from the firing point. It was held that all three were guilty of manslaughter, firing a rifle under the above circumstances being a very dangerous act and all three having united to fire at the spot in question, and all omitting to take any precautions to prevent danger to human life. (7)

A prisoner was indicted for manslaughter in causing the death of an infant child by negligently delivering laudanum for paregoric. The facts were these. The child being very ill, its mother sent her son to a neighboring chemist for a penny worth of paregoric. The prisoner, who was the chemist's apprentice, delivered a vial labelled "paregoric" but containing laudanum. The son (who was told by the prisoner that the number of drops to be given to a child of nine weeks old was ten), took the vial home to his mother, who, supposing it to be paregoric, gave her infant, who was only nine weeks old, six or seven drops of it in a little sugar and water; and the infant died, in consequence. The presiding judge told the jury that if a party is guilty of negligence, and death results therefrom, he commits manslaughter; and the jury found the prisoner guilty. (8)

Where a chemist, by mistake, put a poisonous liniment into a medicine bottle instead of a liniment bottle, in consequence of which the liniment was taken by his customer internally, with a fatal result, it was held, — without saying whether there might or might not be evidence of negligence to support a civil action,—that the mistake was not so gross as to be reckless, and, therefore, did not amount to such criminal negligence as would warrant a conviction for manslaughter, inasmuch as the mistake was made under circumstances which rather threw the prisoner off his guard. It appeared that the deceased had been accustomed to send to the prisoner for aconite, — a deadly poison, — as a liniment, and that the prisoner was in the habit of using bottles of a particular make and color to contain poison, but, on the occasion in question, had sent his own bottles. The deceased had been ordered to take thirty drops of henbane and also to use aconite as a liniment, and he had sent to the prisoner two bottles, one for the henbane and the other for the aconite; both being bottles of the ordinary kind. The bottle for the henbane had on it a label bearing that word. The prisoner himself filled the bottles, and, through some mistake, put the aconite into the henbane bottle. (9)

A corporation cannot be indicted upon a charge of any criminal offence the essence whereof is either personal criminal intent or such a degree of negligence as amounts to a wilful incurring of the risk of causing injury to others. (10)

But a corporation,—although it cannot be guilty of manslaughter,—may be indicted under section 284, post, for having caused grievous bodily injury by omitting to maintain in a safe condition a bridge which it was its duty to so maintain, and this notwithstanding that death ensued at once to the person sustaining the grievous bodily injury. (1)

Under the above section 247, a Corporation may be indicted for omitting, without lawful excuse, to perform the duty of avoiding danger to human life from anything in its charge or under its control, and the fact that the consequence of the omission to perform such duty might have justified an indictment for manslaughter in the case of an individual is not a ground for quashing the indictment. (2)

A fine is the punishment which must, under section 920, post, be substituted, in the case of a corporation, in lieu of the imprisonment mentioned in section 284, post, and the amount of the fine is in the discretion of the Court under section 1029, post. (3)

248. Duty to avoid omissions dangerous to life.—Every one who undertakes to do any act, the omission to do which is or may be dangerous to life, is under a legal duty to do that act, and is criminally responsible for the consequences of omitting, without lawful excuse, to perform that duty. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 214.

The captain and pilot of a steamboat were both indicted for the manslaughter of a person who was on board a small smack, by running down the smack, the running down being attributed by the prosecution to improper steering of the steamboat arising from there not being at the time of the accident, a man at the bow to keep a look out. It was proved that there was a man on the look out when the vessel started, about an hour previous to the accident. According to one witness the captain and pilot were both on the bridge between the paddle boxes, and according to another witness the pilot was alone on one paddle box. It was held that, under these circumstances, there was not such personal misconduct on the part of either of the prisoners as to make them guilty of manslaughter. (3*a*)

Section 284, post, makes it an indictable offence, punishable by two years' imprisonment, for any person to cause grievous bodily injury to any other person, by any unlawful act, or by doing negligently or omitting to do any act which it is his duty to do.

To warrant the conviction of a woman for manslaughter of her new-born child, whose death was caused by want of proper care at birth, it is enough to shew that she was criminally negligent by purposely arranging to be unattended at her confinement. She must be proved to have been further guilty of negligence towards the child after it was completely born. (4)

249. Causing bodily harm to apprentices or servants.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to three years' imprisonment who, being legally liable as master or mistress to provide for any apprentice or servant, unlawfully does, or causes to be done, any bodily harm to any such apprentice or servant so that the life of such apprentice or servant is endangered or the health of such apprentice or servant has been, or is likely to be, permanently injured. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 217.

The corresponding Imperial enactment on this subject is the 24 and 25 Vic., c. 100, sec. 26, which is as follows:

"Whosoever being legally liable either as master or mistress to provide for any apprentice or servant necessary food, clothing or lodging, shall wilfully and without lawful excuse refuse or neglect to provide the same or shall unlawfully and maliciously do or cause to be done any bodily harm to any such apprentice or servant, so that the life of such apprentice or servant shall be endangered, or the health of such apprentice or servant shall have been or shall be likely to be permanently injured, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof, shall be liable to be kept in penal servitude for the term of three years."

Upon this clause, Archbold makes the following remarks: "Whether it be necessary to prove that, by such refusal or neglect to provide, the prosecutor's life was endangered or his health was or was likely to be permanently injured, depends upon the construction which is to be put upon the statute. If the words 'so that the life of such person shall be endangered,' etc., apply to all the preceding matter, such proof will be necessary; if only to the branch of the section which relates to the actual doing of bodily harm to the apprentice or servant, such proof will be unnecessary. Until there has been some decision on the subject it will be safer to introduce, into the indictment, the allegation, 'so that the life of the said was thereby endangered,' and to be prepared with evidence to sustain it. It would seem indeed to be the better opinion that the words 'so that the life of such person shall be endangered, etc.,' override all the preceding matter, otherwise a mere single wilful refusal to provide a dinner would be within the clause. Upon an indictment for unlawfully and maliciously assaulting an apprentice or servant it is clear that such allegation and proof are necessary."

It will be observed that the uncertainty which Archbold seems to find in the English enactment arises from the fact of two offences, neglecting to provide necessaries and doing bodily harm to an apprentice or servant, being included in one section. In the present code this possible uncertainty has been avoided, by separating and dealing with the two offences in different sections, the offence or offences of a parent or a master neglecting the duties imposed upon them by sections 242 and 243 respectively being dealt with under section 244, ante, and the offence of a master doing bodily harm to an apprentice or servant being dealt with by the above section 248. So that, with us, whether the charge against the master be for neglecting to provide necessaries to his apprentice or for doing such apprentice or servant bodily harm, there can be no doubt that the indictment must allege and it must be proved that the life of the apprentice is endangered, or that his or her health has been, or is, or is likely to be prematurely injured.

Homicide.

250. Homicide defined.—Homicide is the killing of a human being by another, directly or indirectly, by any means whatsoever. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 218.

Upon this part of the law, as contained in the English Draft Code, the Royal Commissioners report as follows:

"The Draft Code deals next with murder, manslaughter, and some other offences to which we will refer specifically.

"Many of the doctrines of the common law bearing upon this subject relate equally to murder and manslaughter. Both the Draft Code and the Bill accordingly deal with homicide generically, and ascertain the cases in which it is culpable, before dealing specifically with murder and manslaughter. The Draft Code preserves the rule of the common law, that to render the homicide culpable, death must take place within a year and a day of the injury. It was thought desirable to fix some limit, and no sufficient reason occurred to us for departing from the ancient rule.

"Having defined culpable homicide, the Draft Code proceeds to the problem of defining murder and manslaughter.

"The common law definition of murder is 'unlawfully killing with malice aforethought;' and manslaughter may, in effect, be defined as 'unlawful killing without malice aforethought.' The objection to these definitions is that the expression 'malice aforethought' is misleading. This expression, taken in a popular sense, would be understood to mean that in order that homicide may be murder the act must be premeditated to a greater or less extent, the jury having in each case to determine whether such a degree of premeditation existed as deserved the name.

"This definition if so understood would be obviously too narrow, as, without what would commonly be called premeditation, homicide might be committed which would involve public danger and moral guilt in the highest possible degree. Of course it can be pointed out that every intentional act may be said to be done aforethought, for the intention must precede the action. But even with this explanation the expression is calculated to mislead any one but a trained lawyer.

"The inaccuracy of the definition is still more apparent when we find it laid down that a person may be guilty of murder who had no intention to kill or injure the deceased or any other person, but only to commit some other felony, and the injury to the individual was a pure accident. This conclusion was arrived at by the doctrine of constructive or implied malice. In this case, as in the case of other legal fictions, it is difficult to say how far the doctrine extended. We do not propose on the present occasion to enter upon a discussion of this subject. It was carefully considered before a committee of the House of Commons sitting on a Bill for the definition of homicide, introduced by the late Mr. Russell Gurney, in 1874. It was also considered by the Commission on Capital Punishments, which reported in 1866. Each of these bodies reported that the present condition of the law was unsatisfactory, though neither arrived at a definition which was considered satisfactory.

"The present law may, we think, be stated with sufficient exactness for our present purpose somewhat as follows:—Murder is culpable homicide by any act done with malice aforethought. Malice aforethought is a common name for all the following states of mind:—

"(a.) An intent,—preceding the act,—to kill or to do serious bodily injury to the person killed or to any other person;

"(b.) Knowledge that the act done is likely to produce such consequences, whether coupled with an intention to produce them or not;

"(c.) An intent to commit any felony;

"(d.) An intent to resist an officer of justice in the execution of his duty.

"Whether (c) is too broadly stated or not is a question open to doubt, but Sir Michael Foster, perhaps the highest authority on the subject, says (p. 258), 'A, shooteth at the poultry of B, and by accident killeth a man. If his intention was to steal the poultry, which must be collected from the circumstances, it will be a murder, by reason of that felonious intent; but if it was done wantonly and without that intention, it will be barely manslaughter.'

"It seems to us that the law upon this subject ought to be freed from the element of fiction introduced into it by the expression 'malice aforethought,' although the principle that murder may, under certain circumstances, be committed, in the absence of an actual intention to cause death, ought to be maintained. If a person intends to kill and does kill another, or if, without absolutely intending to kill, he voluntarily inflicts any bodily injury known to be likely to cause death, being reckless whether death ensues or not, he ought, in our opinion, to be considered a murderer, if death ensues.

"For practical purposes we can make no distinction between a man who shoots another through the head expressly meaning to kill him, a man who strikes another a violent blow with a sword, careless whether he dies of it or not, and a man who, intending for some object of his own, to stop the passage of a railway train, contrives an explosion of gunpowder or dynamite under the engine, hoping indeed that death may not be caused, but determined to effect his purpose whether it is so caused or not.

"This is the general object kept in view both in the Draft Code and in the Bill, but there is some difference in the extent to which they go. There is no difference as to the cases in which the death of the person killed or of some other person is intended. The Bill included in the definition of murder all cases in which the offender intended to cause, or knew that he probably would cause 'grievous bodily harm' to any person. The Draft Code includes all such cases, substituting the expression 'bodily injury known to the offender to be likely to cause death' for 'grievous bodily harm;' which to some extent narrows the definition given in the Bill. On the other hand the Draft Code includes all cases in which death is caused by the infliction of 'grievous bodily injury' for the purpose of facilitating the commission of certain heinous offences. All these cases would fall within the definition of murder given in the Bill, according to which it is murder to kill by the intentional infliction of grievous bodily harm irrespectively of the purpose for which it is used. Lastly, it is provided (by the Draft Code) that killing by the administration of stupefying things or by wilfully stopping the breath for the purpose, in either case, of committing any of the specified offences, (1) shall be murder whether the offender knows or not that death is likely to ensue. According to the provisions of the Bill these cases would amount to murder only if the offender knew their danger.

"The difference between the Draft Code and the Bill upon the whole comes to this. A, in order to facilitate robbery, pushes something into B's mouth to stop his breath and thus prevent him from crying out; the death of B. results. This is murder according to the Draft Code. Assording to the Bill it is murder if A knew that such an act would probably cause death; manslaughter if he did not.

"A few years ago a case occurred in the Western Circuit (2) which illustrates the principle on which this portion of the Draft Code is framed better than any hypothetical case. An innocent girl on her way to church had to pass over a stile into a narrow wooded lane and then go out of it by a stile on the other side. A ruffian who knew this lay in wait for her, muffled her head in a shawl to stifle her cries and proceeded to drag her down the lane towards a wood. She died before she reached it. He was executed for the murder. It is plain he did not mean to kill her; indeed his object was frustrated in consequence of her not reaching the wood alive, and he probably was not aware that stifling her breath for so short a time was dangerous to life; but as the law at the time was and now is, the death having been occasioned by violence used to facilitate the commission of rape, the offence was murder. And we believe there are few who would not think the law defective if such an offence was not murder.

"Again, A stabs B in the leg, not intending to kill him; B dies. According to the Bill this would be murder if the jury thought the act showed an intent to do grievous bodily harm, or if without such intent it was done with knowledge that it would probably cause death or grievous bodily harm. According to the Draft Code it would be murder if the jury thought the act was meant to cause B an injury known to A to be likely to cause death, he being reckless whether it caused death or not. It will thus be seen that the Bill and the Draft Code approach each other very closely." (3)

251. When a child becomes a human being.—A child becomes a human being within the meaning of this Act when it has completely proceeded, in a living state, from the body of its mother, whether it has breathed or not, whether it has an indepe..dent circulation or not, and whether the navel string is severed or not.

2. The killing of such child is homicide when it dies in consequence of injuries received before, during or after birth. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 219.

This seems to be a statement of the common law on the subject, (4) in accordance with which it has been held that a child within its mother's womb is not a being upon whom culpable homicide can be committed. It must be born. (5) That is to say, in order to be the subject of homicide it must, if an injury be inflicted upon it while in its mother's womb, have afterwards completely proceeded in a living state from its mother's body, and then if it afterwards die through the injury previously received, the injury so inflicted and the subsequent death would constitute homicide.

Coke says: "If a woman be quick with child, and by a potion or otherwise killeth it in her womb, or if a man beat her whereby the child dieth in her body and she is delivered of a dead child, this is a great misprision, and no murder; but if the child be born alive and dieth of the potion, battery, or other cause, this is murder." (6)

But section 306, post, provides for the offence of killing a child in the act of birth and before it is fully born.

252. Culpable and non-culpable homicide.—Homicide may be either culpable or not culpable.

2. Homicide is culpable when it consists in the killing of any person, either by an unlawful act or by an omission without lawful excuse, to perform or observe any legal duty, or by both combined, or by causing a person, by threats or fear of violence, or by deception, to do an act which causes that person's death, or by wilfully frightening a child or sick person.

3. Culpable homicide is either murder or manslaughter.

4. Homicide which is not culpable is not an offence. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 220.

To constitute culpable homicide under the terms of this section there must be:

1. An unlawful act done; or

2. An omission without lawful excuse, to perform or observe a legal duty; or

3. (a) A threatening of violence, (b) an arousing of fear of violence, or (c) the use of deception, causing the person, so threatened, or put in fear, or deceived, as the case may be, to do an act causing his or her death; or

4. A wilful frightening of a child or sick person.

In an English case tried before Denman, J., a man who had frightened a child to death was convicted of manslaughter. (7)

The following case (although the injury caused did not result in loss of life), is an illustration of the principle upon which is based that part of the above section which makes it culpable homicide in a person who either by threatening violence towards, or by creating fear of violence in another, causes that other to do an act resulting in his or her death.

A woman, in order to escape from the violence of her husband, who had used threats against her life, got out of a window, and in so doing fell to the ground and broke her leg. The husband was convicted of having wilfully and maliciously inflicted grievous bodily harm on his wife. Held, correct. Lord Coleridge, C.J., said: "I am of opinion that the conviction in this case is correct, and that the sentence should be affirmed. The principle seems to me to be laid down quite fully in Reg. v. Martin. (8) There, this Court held that a man who had either taken advantage of or had created a panic in a theatre, and had obstructed a passage, and had rendered it difficult to get out of the theatre, in consequence of which a number of people were crushed, was answerable for the consequences of what he had done. Here, the woman came by her mischief by getting out of the window—I use a vague word on purpose—and in her fall broke her leg. Now, that might have been caused by an act which was done accidentally or deliberately, in which case the prisoner would not have been guilty. It appears from the case however that the prisoner had threatened his wife more than once, and that on this occasion he came home drunk, and used words which amounted to a threat against her life, saying, 'I'll make you so that you can't go to bed;' that she, rushing to the window, got half out of the window, when she was restrained by her daughter. The prisoner threatened the daughter, who let go, and her mother fell. It is suggested to me, by my learned brother, that supposing the prisoner had struck his daughter's arm without hurting her, but sufficiently to cause her to let go, and she had let her mother fall, could any one doubt but that that would be the same thing as if he had pushed her out himself. If a man creates in another man's mind an immediate sense of danger which causes such person to try to escape, and in so doing he injures himself, the person who creates such a state of mind is responsible for the injuries which result. I think that in this case there was abundant evidence that there was a sense of immediate danger in the mind of the woman, caused by the acts of the prisoner, and that her injuries resulted from what that sense of danger caused her to do." The other judges concurred. (9)

Where,—on a trial for manslaughter,—the evidence shewed that the deceased was riding on horseback, that the prisoner struck him with a small stick, whereupon the deceased rode away and the prisoner rode after him, and that thereupon the deceased, from a well grounded apprehension of a further attack, which would have endangered his life, spurred his horse which became frightened and threw him giving him a mortal fracture, it was held that this evidence sufficiently supported the charge of manslaughter. (10)

A corporation cannot be guilty of manslaughter. (1) But it may be indicted, under section 284, post, for having caused grievous bodily injury by omitting to maintain in a safe condition a bridge or structure which it was its duty to so maintain, and this, notwithstanding that death ensued at once to the person sustaining the grievous bodily injury. (2)

NON-CULPABLE HOMICIDE.—Besides the above divisions of homicide into culpable and non-culpable, and of culpable homicide into murder and manslaughter, homicide which is not culpable may be divided into that which is (a) justifiable, and that which is (b) excusable. (3)

JUSTIFIABLE HOMICIDE.—Blackstone subdivides justifiable homicide into two classes, (4) namely:—

1. Homicide which is done under the necessity which arises in the exercise of an office, which makes it compulsory,—in executing public justice, under judicial command,—to put to death a malefactor who has forfeited his life by the laws and verdict of his country. (5) In this case, however, the law must require it; it must be done by authority of a judicial sentence, or it is not justifiable, and, therefore, wantonly to kill the greatest of malefactors deliberately, uncompelled and extra-judicially, is murder.

2. The other class of justifiable homicide is, according to Blackstone, that which occurs in the advancement of public justice, and in which the act, though not commanded, is permitted: as where the killing happens in preventing crime, (6) or in the arrest of persons guilty or accused of crimes, (7) or in preventing escapes or rescues from arrest or from custody, (8) or in suppressing riots, etc. (9)

As already remarked (10), the general rule allowing the use of necessary force to prevent the commission of a criminal offence is, by section 52, ante, made to include the prevention of any offence for which under the present Code an arrest may be made without warrant. As the ground or justification of homicide committed in preventing a criminal offence, accompanied with violence, is that of necessity, the necessity must continue to the time of the killing, or it will not justify it; and the killing of an offender, for instance, after being properly secured, and after all apprehension of danger has ceased, would not be justifiable but it would be murder, unless,—when it was done,—the blood was still hot from the contest or pursuit; and then, on that account, it might be held to be only manslaughter. (10*a*)

EXCUSABLE HOMICIDE.—Blackstone divides excusable homicide into, 1. Homicide per infortunium or misadventure; and 2, Homicide, in self-defence, or se defendendo.

Homicide per infortunium, or misadventure, is such as occurs where a man, in the doing of a lawful act, without any negligence and with no intention to injure, unfortunately kills another.

A is at work with a hatchet, the head of which flies off and kills B, a bystander. This is excusable homicide by misadventure. (1)

A, a person qualified to keep a gun, is shooting at a mark, and undesignedly kills B. A is excused.

A parent or a master who, in moderately correcting his child, or his apprentice or servant, happens to occasion his death, is excused, on the ground that the killing is only misadventure. For the act of correction is lawful; but if he exceeds the bounds of moderation, either in the manner, the instrument, or the quantity of punishment, and death ensues, it is manslaughter at least, and in some cases (according to the circumstances), murder; for the act of immoderate correction is unlawful. For instance, where an apprentice, on being chided by his master for neglecting some

SELF-DEFENCE.—Homicide in self-defence (sometimes also called chance medley), is such as occurs where a man being violently attacked, is obliged to kill his assailant in order to save his own life. The right of self-defence proceeds from and is limited by necessity. It begins where necessity begins, and ends where necessity ends; and therefore the defending party in order to be excused must exercise only such power and apply only such instruments as will simply prove effectual; nothing more. For instance, one, on whom another is making a mere assault with his fist, must not instantly stab him. Even where another is meditating the taking of one's life, this extreme defence cannot lawfully be resorted to until some overt act is done in pursuance of the meditation; in other words, till the danger becomes immediate. (4) Still, a person, assaulted by another who has threatened to kill him, is not, as a matter of course, required to run, and thus increase his danger by exposing himself to a repetition of his assailant's attempt when, with his back turned, he cannot so well resist or protect himself. And where an attack is made, with murderous intent, evinced by a sufficient overt act, the person attacked is under no duty to fly; but may stand his ground, and kill his adversary, if such killing becomes necessary in order to save himself. (5)

On this subject, the Royal Commissioners in their report make the following remarks:

"We take one great principle of the common law to be that, though it sanctions the defence of a man's person, liberty and property against illegal violence, and permits the use of force to prevent crimes, to preserve the public peace, and to bring offenders to justice, yet all this is subject to the restriction that the force used is necessary; that is, that the mischief sought to be prevented could not be prevented by less violent means; and that the mischief done by, or which might reasonably be anticipated from the force used, is not disproportioned to the injury or mischief which it is intended to prevent. This last principle will explain and justify many of our suggestions. It does not seem to have been universally admitted; and we have therefore thought it advisable to give our reasons for thinking that it not only ought to be recognized as the law in future, but that it is the law at present." (6)

In an elaborate note at the end of their Report, the Royal Commissioners have the following further remarks by way of argument on the subject:—

"The proposition that the force used in defence of person, liberty or property must be proportioned to the injury or mischief which it is intended to prevent, is, in our opinion, one of great importance, yet it seems not to have commended itself to the minds of highly respectable authorities. We think it right, first, to call attention to the mode in which the subject was dealt with in Lord St. Leonard's Bill. The first part of section 88 of that Bill was as follows: 'Homicide shall be justifiable where one, in lawful defence of his person, repels force by force, and, using no more violence than he has reasonable cause for believing to be necessary for the purpose of self-defence, kills the assailant.' Had this been passed, unaltered, into law, it would have justified every weak lad, whose hair was about to be pulled by a stronger one, in shooting the bully if he could not otherwise prevent the assault.

(5) Fost., 273; 3 Inst., 56; 1 East, P. C., 271.
(6) See p. 11 of the Report of the Royal Commissioners.

"Again, section 90 says, 'Homicide shall be justifiable' (not merely reduced from murder to manslaughter), 'where one in defence of moveable property in his lawful possession, repels force by force, and, using no more force than he has reasonable cause for believing to be necessary for the defence of such property against wrong, kills the wrong-doer.' If two roughs, who each claimed a game-cock, and insisted on taking it home, quarrelled, and the weaker stabbed the stronger to the heart, this would, if made law, have justified the slayer, if he turned out to be the rightful owner of the bird, and could not otherwise have prevented its being taken away.

"And section 91 says: 'Homicide shall be justifiable where one, in defence of house or land in his lawful possession, resisting a person endeavoring by force to enter into or upon such house or land, repels force by force, and using no more force than he has reasonable cause for believing to be necessary for the defence of his possession, kills the wrong-doer.' It is the more singular that this last clause should have been drawn as it is, because Lord Tenterden in a case which at the time attracted much attention laid down law directly opposed to it. It was the case of R. v. Moir, tried before Lord Tenterden at Chelmsford. (7) Mr. Moir, having ordered some fishermen not to trespass on his land, took a short cut, and found the deceased and others persisting in going across. He rode up to them and ordered them back. They refused to go, and there was evidence of angry words and some slight evidence that the deceased threatened to strike Mr. Moir with a pole. Mr. Moir shot him in the arm and the wound ultimately proved fatal. Before the man died, or indeed was supposed to be in danger, Mr Moir avowed and justified his act, and said that in similar circumstances he would do the same again. This land, he said, was his castle and as he could not without the use of fire-arms prevent the fishermen from persisting in their trespass, he did use them, and would use them again. Lord Tenterden took a very different view of the law. He told the jury that the prevention of such a trespass could not justify such an act, and he seems to have left to them as the only justification which on these facts could arise, the question whether the prisoner was in reasonable apprehension of danger to his life, from the threats of the deceased. Mr. Moir was found guilty of murder and executed.

"It seems to us strange that these startling provisions (in Lord St. Leonard's Bill) passed without observation through the Select Committee, and were unnoticed by any of the Judges, except Mr. Justice Coleridge, who, however, did not dwell on them, but merely made them the subject of a passing remark.

"It would, of course, follow that if homicide, under the circumstances mentioned in these three sections (of Lord St. Leonard's Bill), was justifiable, any less degree of violence, however great, would be justifiable also; and such appears to have been the view of the law taken by the Commissioners who framed the first draft of the Indian Code, and who, in an eloquent passage directed to another purpose, say: 'That a man who deliberately kills another in order to prevent that other from pulling his nose should be allowed to go absolutely unpunished, would be most dangerous. The law punishes and ought to punish such killing. But we cannot think that the law ought to punish such killing as murder.' In this, we agree: the provocation would be sufficient, generally, to reduce the crime to manslaughter. But they proceed: 'For the law itself has encouraged the slayer to inflict on the assailant any harm short of death which may be necessary for the purpose of repelling the outrage,—to give the assailant a cut with a knife across the fingers, which may render his right hand useless to him for life, or to hurl him down stairs with such force as to break his leg. And it seems difficult to conceive that circumstances, which would be a full justification of any violence short of homicide, should not be a mitigation of the guilt of homicide. That a man should be merely exercising a right by fracturing the skull and knocking out the eye of the assailant, and should be guilty of the highest crime in the Code if he kills the same assailant,—that there should be only a single step between perfect impunity and liability to capital punishment seems unreasonable. In a case in which the law itself empowers an individual to inflict any harm short of death, it ought hardly, we think, to visit him with the highest punishment if he inflicts death.'

"If we thought that the common law was such as is here supposed, we should without hesitation suggest that it should be altered. But we think that such is not and never was the law of England. The law discourages persons from taking the law into their own hands. Still the law does permit men to defend themselves. Vim vi repellere licet modo fiat moderamine inculpatæ tutelæ, non ad sumendam vindictam, sed ad propulsandam injuriam. (8) And when violence is used for the purpose of repelling a wrong, the degree of violence must not be disproportioned to the wrong to be prevented, or it is not justified.

"There is no case that we are aware of in which it has been held that homicide to prevent mere trespass is justifiable. The question raised has always been, whether it was murder, or reduced by the provocation to manslaughter. And when death has not ensued, the forms of pleading, which had the advantage of bringing the principles of law to a precise issue, shew what the principle was. In an appeal of Mayhem, the form of plea of son assault demesne was that 'the appellant made an assault upon the appellee and him then and there would have beaten, wounded and maimed unless he had forthwith defended himself, against the appellant, and so the ill which the appellant suffered was from his own proper assault and in defence of the appellee:' (9) Less than this was not a defence. (10) In Handcock v. Baker, (1) a plea justifying the breaking of the plaintiff's dwelling house, assaulting him therein, beating him and imprisoning him, on the ground that plaintiff was about to kill his wife, and that all that was done was for the purpose of and necessary to prevent his doing so, was held good after verdict. And we take it to be clear that, even killing the intruding criminal, if necessary to prevent a crime of this magnitude, would be justifiable; but not if it were to prevent a common assault.

"But the defence of possession either of goods or land against a mere trespass, not a crime, does not, strictly speaking, justify even a breach of the peace. The party in lawful possession may justify gently laying his hands on the trespasser and requesting him to depart. If the trespasser resists, and in doing so assault the party in possession, that party may repel the assault and for that purpose may use any force which he would be justified in using in defence of his person. As is accurately said in 1 Rolle's Abt. Trespass G., S. 'a justification of a battery in defence of possession, though it arose in the defence of the possession, yet in the end it is the defence of the person.'

"Some misapprehension may have arisen from the numerous cases decided, on the 9 Geo. IV., c. 31, s. 11, in which persons indicted for wounding with intent to do grievous bodily harm were held entitled to an acquittal, on its coming out in evidence that there was an illegality or informality in an arrest, or some other provocation disproportioned to the degree of violence used. (2) And it may have been supposed that these are authorities that the violence was absolutely justified. But this is from not observing that the effect of the enactment then in force, was that, if wounding was inflicted under such circumstances that, if death had ensued therefrom the offence would not have amounted to murder, the person indicted should be acquitted of felony. That provision was repealed in 1838, and since that time the course of practice has, we believe, been to leave it to the jury, with proper explanations and directions, to say whether the wounding was disproportionate to the injury which it was intended to prevent. The cases in which this doctrine has been acted on seem not to have been reported, with the exception of R. v. Hewlett, (3) in which the point only incidentally arose. We think that it is good sense, and that it is the law; and if it is not the law, we submit that it ought to be made so." (4)

The principle above contended for in relation to self-defence has been fully kept in view in sections 53 and 54 of the present Code. (5)

Where it was proved that the prisoner was attacked by the deceased who took off his coat and challenged the prisoner to fight and that at first the prisoner shewed reluctance but afterwards took off his coat, whereupon blows of the fists were exchanged, the result being that, after four or five rounds, the deceased received from the prisoner a blow which killed him, the presiding Judge in charging the jury told them that if they thought the death was caused in legitimate self-defence, as distinguished from a fighting, they should acquit the prisoner, but that if they found that he dealt the blow while engaged in fighting, as distinguished from mere self-defence, he was doing what was unlawful and guilty of manslaughter. (6)

Where several persons attack another intending only to frighten and beat him but not to do him any severe bodily harm, and where, from the nature of the attack and the surrounding circumstances, the person assailed has reasonable ground to believe that there is a design to kill him or to commit a felony on his person, and he shoots and kills one of the assailants, the homicide is excusable. (7)

On an application to quash a conviction for manslaughter, it was shewn that, at the trial, evidence was adduced on the part of the defence establishing that when the defendant shot and killed the deceased, the latter was one of a party who had invaded the defendant's house and were committing a wholly unprovoked assault upon the defendant, and destroying his goods, his wife and family being present, and that this feature of the case was not commented on by the judge in addressing the jury. It was held that there was evidence that the defendant might have had reasonable apprehension of immediate danger of bodily harm to his wife and family, and, that, as this question had not been left to the jury, the defendant was granted a new trial. (8)

253. Procuring death by false evidence.—Procuring by false evidence the conviction and death of any person by the sentence of the law shall not be deemed to be homicide. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 221.

Section 174[2] (see ante) punishes perjury with imprisonment for life, when it is committed in order to procure the conviction of a person for any crime punishable by death or imprisonment for life.

254. Death must be within a year and a day.—No one is criminally responsible for the killing of another unless the death takes place within a year and a day of the cause of death.

2. The period of a year and a day shall be reckoned inclusive of the day on which the last unlawful act contributing to the cause of death took place.

3. Where the cause of death is an omission to fulfil a legal duty the period shall be reckoned inclusive of the day on which such omission ceased.

4. When death is in part caused by an unlawful act and in part by an omission, the period shall be reckoned inclusive of the day on which the last unlawful act took place or the omission ceased, whichever happened last. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 222.

An accused was convicted of manslaughter. Injuries were inflicted by him on the deceased in November, 1906, and again in December, 1907, death occurring in March, 1908. The prosecution's case was that the latter injuries accelerated the death, for the accused it was contended that death was caused by the former injuries alone. The learned Judge directed the jury that if they thought the death was caused by the former injuries they might convict the accused. Held, a misdirection, as the accused could not be convicted if death occurred more than a year and a day after the injuries causing the death were inflicted, and that the appeal could not be dismissed on the ground that no substantial miscarriage of justice had occurred, and the conviction was quashed. (9)

255. Killing by influence on the mind.—No one is criminally responsible for the killing of another by any influence on the mind alone, nor for the killing of another by any disorder or disease arising from such influence, save in either case by wilfully frightening a child or sick person. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 223.

See section 252, ante.

256. Acceleration of death.—Every one who, by any act or omission, causes the death of another, kills that person, although the effect of the bodily injury caused to such other person be merely to accelerate his death while laboring under some disorder or disease arising from some other cause. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 224.

257. Death which might have been prevented.—Every one who, by an act of omission, causes the death of another, kills that person, although death from that cause might have been prevented by resorting to proper means. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 225.

258. Causing injury the treatment of which brings death.—Every one who causes a bodily injury, which is of itself of a dangerous nature to any person, from which death results, kills that person, although the immediate cause of death be treatment proper or improper applied in good faith. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 226.

These three sections, 256, 257 and 258, embody the principles of the common law on the subjects thereof.

Thus, where A struck B, who when so struck was already so ill that she could not have lived many weeks, if she had not been struck, but who through being struck dies earlier than she otherwise would have done, it was held that A, having, by striking B, accelerated her death, killed her. (10)

Again, where A injured B's finger and B, being advised by a surgeon to allow the finger to be amputated, refused to do so, and died of lockjaw resulting from the injury, it was held that, although B's death might have been prevented if he had allowed the finger to be amputated, A had killed him. (1)

And where A wounded B in a duel, and competent surgeons performed on B an operation which they in good faith considered necessary, but of which operation B died, the surgeons being mistaken as to the necessity of the operation, it was held that B was killed by A; one of the Judges, (Erle, J.), saying: "I am clearly of opinion, and so is my brother Rolfe, that where a wound is given, which, in the judgment of competent medical advisers, is dangerous, and the treatment which they bona fide adopt is the immediate cause of death, the party who inflicted the wound is criminally responsible." (2)

But if a man were wounded, and another applied sulphuric acid or something else of a dangerous character and which ought not to be applied and which led to fatal results, then the person who applied the sulphuric acid would be answerable and not the person who inflicted the wound, because a new cause had supervened. (3)

Murder and Manslaughter.

259. Murder defined.—Culpable homicide is murder,—

(a) if the offender means to cause the death of the person killed;

(b) if the offender means to cause to the person killed any bodily injury which is known to the offender to be likely to cause death, and is reckless whether death ensues or not;

(c) if the offender means to cause death, or, being so reckless as aforesaid, means to cause such bodily injury as aforesaid to one person, and by accident or mistake kills another person, though he does not mean to hurt the person killed;

(10) R. v. Fletcher, Burb. Dig. Cr. L., 213. And see R. v. Murton, 3 F. and F., 492.
(1) R. v. Holland, 2 M. & R., 351.
(2) R. v. Pym, 1 Cox, 339; R. v. McIntyre, 2 Cox, 379; R. v. Davis, 15 Cox, 174.
(3) R. v. Markus, 4 F. & F., 356.

(d) if the offender, for any unlawful object, does an act which he knows or ought to have known to be likely to cause death, and thereby kills any person, though he may have desired that his object should be effected without hurting any one. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 227.

260. Culpable homicide is also murder in certain special cases. —In case of treason and the other offences against the King's authority and person mentioned in Part II., piracy and offences deemed to be piracy, escape or rescue from prison or lawful custody, resisting lawful apprehension, murder, (4) rape, forcible abduction, robbery, burglary or arson, culpable homicide is also murder, whether the offender means or not death to ensue, or knows or not that death is likely to ensue,—

(a) if he means to inflict grievous bodily injury for the purpose of facilitating the commission of any of the offences in this section mentioned, or the flight of the offender upon the commission or attempted commission thereof, and death ensues from such injury; or,

(b) if he administers any stupefying or overpowering thing for either of the purposes aforesaid, and death ensues from the effects thereof; or,

(c) if he by any means wilfully stops the breath of any person for either of the purposes aforesaid, and death ensues from such stopping of the breath. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 228

See section 263, post, for the punishment for murder.

See the Report of the Royal Commissioners on the subject of homicide set out at p. 266, ante.

It will be seen, by section 940, post, that no one can be tried upon a coroner's inquisition. And see section 667, post, as to the course to be pursued by the coroner in case of any person being affected by the finding of the coroner's jury.

The coroner's inquest is practically restricted to an enquiry into the cause of death; although the duty is imposed upon the coroner by section 667, post, of causing the arrest of any persons affected by the finding of the inquisition and of bringing them before a magistrate for prosecution, when they are not already charged before one.

(4) In the English Draft Code the Royal Commissioners have opposite to this word, "murder" in a corresponding section to the above, a marginal note in which they say: "This offence is inserted here to cover the case when the grievous bodily harm is done to some person other than the person intended to be murdered, etc."

TWO CLASSES OF MURDER.—The effect of the above sections 259 and 260 is to divide murder into two classes. One class includes cases in which the offender means either to cause death or to cause bodily injury likely, to his knowledge, to result in death; and the other class includes cases in which, in order to facilitate the commission of any of the offences specified in section 260,—the offender,—(whether meaning or not meaning to cause death, and whether knowing or not knowing that death is likely to ensue), —inflicts (a) grievous bodily injury upon, (b) administers drugs to, or (c) stops by any means the breath of any one, and thereby causes death.

The principle upon which these sections are based is fully discussed by the Royal Commissioners whose remarks thereon are already set out at pages 266, 267, ante (which see).

ILLUSTRATIONS.

A, with a revolver, deliberately shoots B through the head, killing him, and meaning to kill him. A commits murder.

A meaning to maim or do bodily injury to B, but reckless whether he kills him or not, takes up an axe and chops off B's hand, knowing that such an injury is likely to cause death. B dies of the injury. A is guilty of murder.

A shoots at B, meaning to kill him, and kills C instead. A commits murder. (5)

A, meaning to do bodily injury to B and reckless whether he kills him or not, strikes at him with a sword-stick, meaning to wound his right arm, but B avoids the thrust, by slipping away, and the weapon enters the body of and kills C. A is guilty of murdering C. (6)

A commits arson by burning the house of B, but does not mean to hurt anyone, and does not know that there is any one in the house. C, who happens to be in the house, is burnt to death. A is guilty of murder; arson being a crime which A ought to have known to be likely to cause death either to someone in the house, or to the occupants of adjoining premises or to those engaged in the dangerous work of extinguishing fires. (7)

A, in order to rob B, does him some grievous bodily injury which results in his death. A commits murder, although he did not intend to kill B and although he was not aware that the injury inflicted was likely to cause death.

A, having committed a burglary, strikes at and inflicts grievous bodily injury on B, who intercepts his flight; B dies of the injury thus received. A is guilty of murder.

A, to facilitate the commission of rape upon B, administers to her a stupefying drug, which kills her. A commits murder, although he did not mean to cause death and did not know that the drug was likely to cause death.

A, in order to rob B, stops his breath by gagging him. B dies in consequence. A is guilty of murder, although he did not intend to kill B, and did not know that gagging was likely to cause death.

Any killing, to be homicide, must be the killing of one human being by another, either directly or indirectly and by any means whatsoever; that is, either by acts of omission, such as the neglect of the legal duties imposed by sections 241 to 249, ante, or by acts of commission, as by poisoning, stabbing, shooting, choking, striking, kicking, starving or drowning, or in any of the other numerous ways in which human life may be taken; but,—outside of the exceptions made by section 252, in reference to the wilful frightening of a child or sick person, and the causing a person by threats or fear of violence or by deception, to do something occasioning his own death,—no one (as stated by section 255), is criminally responsible for killing another by influence on the mind alone; as, where a man either by working upon the fancy of another or by unkindness, puts him in such grief that he suddenly dies or contracts some sickness which brings on his death. (8)

The following are some instances of killing indirectly. Where A carried B, his sick father against his will, in a severe season, from one town to another, by reason whereof he died, A was held guilty of murder, on the ground that he must be presumed to have known that the probable consequence of his actions would be his father's death. (9) Where a harlot being delivered of a child left it in an orchard covered only with leaves, in which condition it was killed by a kite, she was held guilty of murder. (10) If A lays a trap or pitfall for B, whereby B is killed, A is guilty of murder. (1)

DUELLING.—As to duelling we have already seen that the parties to a prearranged fight with deadly weapons will be guilty of murder, as also their seconds, etc. (2)

Where a package of revolvers was thrown into a carriage in which three prisoners conjointly charged with a crime were being conveyed under lawful arrest and the prisoners all struggled to obtain revolvers, two of them succeeding in doing so, whereupon all of them attempted to effect a forcible escape during which one of the peace officers was shot dead by one of the prisoners, but by which of them is unknown, proof that the defendant had one of the revolvers in the melee and had ordered another of the peace officers present to "give up" immediately after another of the prisoners had told the defendant to "give it to him" is, with such facts, sufficient evidence of a conspiracy by the three prisoners for an unlawful purpose, to wit, the escape, and of a common design to use for its accomplishment any amount of violence and force; and a conviction of the defendant for murder is, therefore, proper without proof that he fired the fatal shot.

It was proper for the trial Judge to instruct the jury that "where all the parties proceed with the intention to commit an unlawful act and with the resolution or determination to overcome all opposition by force, that if by reason of such resolution one of the party is guilty of homicide, his companions would be liable to the penalty which he has incurred."

The shooting of the constable by one of the conspirators, in the prosecution of such common purpose was an act which was or ought to have been known to be a probable consequence of prosecuting such purpose, and each of the conspirators become under Criminal Code, sec. 61,—now section 69,—a party to the homicide. (3)

Where two persons are jointly indicted for murder and one pleads "guilty" and the other "not guilty"; and the trial, upon the latter plea, results in an acquittal, leave should be given to the other accused to change his plea to one of "not guilty," if the circumstances are such that the verdict of acquittal already given in respect of the one would be inconsistent with the guilt of the other. (4)

Where the accused charged with murder goes into the witness box on his own behalf, and then and there for the first time makes known his claim that he was a mere eye-witness of the murder, and that the principal witness for the prosecution had committed the deed, the trial Judge may properly direct the jury that they may draw inferences from the prisoner's previous silence on the matter of such claim, and consider whether the facts in evidence shewed the motive for such silence to be founded on a consciousness of innocence, ex gr., that he would thereby the better establish his innocence, or to be a design founded on a knowledge of guilt to advance a false defence at the last moment, and to take the prosecution by surprise.

Even if the charge were erroneous in that respect, a new trial should not be granted if there was ample evidence of guilt apart from that question, and if, in the opinion of the Court of Appeal, no substantial wrong or miscarriage was occasioned by the error. (5)

On a trial for murder, if the fact of the death of a human being is established, by direct proof, and the remains of the dead man have been so destroyed by fire that direct identification is impossible, circumstantial evidence is admissible to prove the identity of the remains and also the identity of the person who caused the death. While the fact of death must always be established by direct proof, the fact of the killing by the defendant as alleged may be proved by circumstantial evidence supporting the charge beyond a reasonable doubt. (6)

Where two persons mutually agree to commit suicide, and only one of the two accomplishes that object, the survivor is guilty of murder, according to the law of England. (7) But this is not so in our law. See section 269, post, which makes aiding and abetting suicide a specific offence, punishable by imprisonment for life.

An indictment charged a person with encouraging persons unknown to murder the sovereigns and rulers of Europe. Held, that the indictment was good, as a sufficiently well-defined class was referred to by the words "sovereigns of Europe." (8)

Where, on a trial for murder, the evidence was that the deceased had been killed by a gun-shot wound inflicted through the discharge of a gun in the hands of the accused, and the defence was that the gun had been discharged accidentally, and no case of culpable homicide of less degree than murder was presented on the evidence, there could be no objection to a charge by the trial Judge to the jury that the offence could not be reduced by them from murder to manslaughter, but that their verdict should be either one of acquittal or one of guilty of murder. (9)

The fact that a person,—charged with murdering his wife and two stepdaughters,—was so mentally defective that he was seized with an uncontrollable impulse to do the criminal act,—although aware of its nature and quality and that it was wrong,—does not constitute a defence in law. (10)

Where on a trial for murder there is evidence that the accused was drunk at the time he committed the act, it has been held, in England, that the proper direction to the jury is that a man must be presumed to intend the natural consequences of his acts, but that the presumption may be rebutted by shewing that his mind was so affected by the drink he had taken that he was incapable of knowing that what he was doing was dangerous,—that is, likely to inflict serious injury. (10*a*)

261. Provocation.—Culpable homicide, which would otherwise be murder, may be reduced to manslaughter if the person who causes death does so in the heat of passion caused by sudden provocation.

2. Any wrongful act or insult, of such nature as to be sufficient to deprive an ordinary person of the power of self-control, may be provocation if the offender acts upon it on the sudden, and before there has been time for his passion to cool.

3. Whether or not any particular wrongful act or insult amounts to provocation, and whether or not the person provoked was actually deprived of the power of self-control by the provocation which he received, shall be questions of fact: Provided that no one shall be held to give provocation to another by doing that which he had a legal right to do, or by doing anything which the offender incited him to do in order to provide the offender with an excuse for killing or doing bodily harm to any person.

4. The illegality of an arrest shall not necessarily reduce an offence of culpable homicide from murder to manslaughter, but if the illegality was known to the offender it may be evidence of provocation. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 229.

The Royal Commissioners (at page 24 of their Report), say, in reference to section 176 of their Draft Code (which is the same as the above section 261), that it "introduces an alteration of considerable importance into the common law. By the existing law the infliction of a blow, or the sight by the husband of acultery, committed with his wife, may amount to provocation which would reduce murder to manslaughter. (10*b*) It is possible that some other insufferable outrages might be held to have the same effect. There is no definite authoritative rule on the subject, but the authorities for saying that words can never amount to a provocation are weighty. We are of opinion that cases may be imagined where language would give a provocation greater than any ordinary blow. The question whether any particular act falls or not within this line appears to us to be pre-eminently a matter of degree for the consideration of the jury."

We have seen that, although under the common law mere words, as a general rule, were not a sufficient provocation, it has been held that, in certain exceptional cases, the words used might be such as to amount to a provocation sufficient to reduce what would otherwise be murder to manslaughter; as in the case of a husband astounded by the sudden and unexpected announcement from his wife that she had committed adultery. (1) By the law, however, as it now stands, under the above section 261, and the provisions of sub-sections 2 and 3, ante, there can be no longer any doubt that words will be a sufficient provocation if it is found by the jury, (whose province it is to decide), that they are of so insulting a character as to deprive the person provoked of the power of self-control.

As already shewn, (2), the question of whether a provocation will reduce the killing from murder to manslaughter will depend upon the nature and extent of the provocation, the nature, extent and violence of the retaliation, and the weapon, if any, used, and also upon whether the killing has been done immediately upon the giving of the provocation, before there has been sufficient cooling time for passion to subside and for the party provoked to regain the power of self-control.

A prisoner was tried for murder, and it was not denied that he had killed the deceased, but it was urged that the offence was reduced to manslaughter as having been committed in the heat of passion caused by sudden provocation. There was evidence that just before the killing the prisoner had called at the deceased's house to see the deceased, who ordered him out and immediately laid hands on him and put him out, when the prisoner drew a revolver and shot him. At the trial the judge directed the jury that the deceased at the time he was killed was doing what he had a legal right to do and that there was therefore no provocation. This was held to be a misdirection, because, although by section 261, sub-section 3, no one shall be held to give provocation to another by doing that which he had a legal right to do, it is for the jury and not for the judge to determine any preliminary question of fact upon which the alleged legal right depends, and the question of whether the deceased was at the time he was shot, doing what he had a legal right to do depended upon whether,—if the jury accepted as true the defendant's statement given in evidence, as to the circumstances attending the shooting,—the deceased had before laying hands upon him ordered the defendant to leave the house, and whether, if he did so, the defendant had refused to leave, and whether, if violence was used by the deceased in putting him out, it was greater than was necessary, and the deceased was clearly not doing what he had a legal right to do if the facts were found by the jury in favor of the prisoner's version on these points; and, upon an appeal under section 1014, post, (old Code, sec. 744), a new trial was directed. (3)

Where a person had killed another with a deadly weapon even upon sudden provocation, it was held that the question of the sufficiency of the provocation to reduce the crime to manslaughter was not merely whether there was passion in point of fact, but whether there was such provocation as might naturally kindle ungovernable passion in the mind of any ordinary and reasonable man. (4)

262. Manslaughter.—Culpable homicide, not amounting to murder, is manslaughter. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 230.

See section 268, post, for the punishment of manslaughter.

In order that culpable homicide shall not amount to murder but be only manslaughter, the following conditions are necessary:

1. The slayer must not have meant to cause death:

2. If in the doing of the act which has occasioned death, the offender's intention was to cause any bodily injury to any one, the bodily injury intended must not be such as the offender knew to be likely to cause death:

3. If the act by which the killing has been caused was an act done for an unlawful object, it must not have been such an act as the offender knew or ought to have known to be likely to cause death:

4. If in the doing of the act which has occasioned death the offender meant to inflict grievous bodily injury, it must not have been an act done to facilitate the commission of any of the offences mentioned in section 260, nor to facilitate flight upon the commission or attempted commission of any such offence:

5. If the act which has caused death is an act of administering some stupefying or overpowering thing, it must not have been done to facilitate the commission of any of the said offences mentioned in section 260, nor to facilitate flight upon the commission or attempted commission of any of such offences; and

(3) R. v. Brennan, 16 C. L. T., 316; 27 O. R., 659; 4 Can. Cr. Cas., 41.
(4) R. v. Welsh, 11 Cox, 336.

6. If the act which has caused death is an act by which the offender has by any means stopped the breath of any person, it must not have been done to facilitate the commission of any of the said offences mentioned in section 260, nor to facilitate flight upon the commission or attempted commission of any of such offences.

As, by section 252, ante, homicide is made culpable in cases where the killing is either by an unlawful act, or by an omission, without lawful excuse to perform or observe a legal duty, any such unlawful act or any such omission will be murder or manslaughter according as it does or does not come within the terms of sections 259 and 260.

For instance, if, by an unlawful act or by an omission to perform some legal duty, one causes the death of another, meaning to cause death, it will be murder. If, however, in doing the unlawful act or in omitting to perform or observe the legal duty, one kills another, not meaning to kill any one, it will, in general, be manslaughter only. It may, however, even then,—notwithstanding the absence of intention to kill,—be murder, under some circumstances: as, where the offender's intention is to cause some bodily injury which he knows to be likely to cause death, and he is reckless whether death ensues or not. And so, if a person, without intending to hurt any one, proceed, for some unlawful object,—say, with the object of robbing a bank,—to do an act, (such as the blowing open, by explosives, of a safe or vault), whereby the watchman, who happens to be in an adjoining office, is killed, the question would arise whether the act of blowing open the safe or vault was an act which the accused knew or ought to have known to be likely to cause death. If, under the circumstances of the case, as proved, the answer to this question were in the affirmative, the offender would be guilty of murder; if in the negative, he would be guilty of manslaughter only. Or, if, in order to facilitate resistance to lawful apprehension, or to facilitate the commission of robbery, or burglary, or rape, or forcible abduction, or any of the other offences mentioned in section 260, a person were to cause death, meaning to inflict some grievous bodily injury, or were to administer to another some stupefying drug or other overpowering thing, or were to stop the other's breath, by gagging, or by any other means, and if death were to ensue to the person so drugged or so gagged, the offence would, in any of these cases, amount to murder, whether the offender meant death to ensue or not, and whether he knew or not that death was likely to ensue. But, if the bodily injury was inflicted or the drugging and stupefying or the gagging and stopping of breath were done to facilitate the commission of some offence other than any of those mentioned in section 260, and if the offender did not mean to cause death and did not know that death was likely to ensue, and, if, under the circumstances the act was not such or so done that he ought to have known it to be likely to cause death, he would be guilty of manslaughter only.

It will be seen, therefore, that, outside of those cases in which the plain test,—of killing, meaning to kill, or killing not meaning to kill,—can be applied, the dividing line between murder and manslaughter is uncertain and very much dependent upon and liable to be varied by circumstances.

ILLUSTRATIONS.

For example, in each of the following illustrations, the act,—that of striking with a stick,—is the same; but the striker's guilt is varied, in degree, by the different circumstances.

1. A strikes B with a stick, and, meaning to cause his death, thereby kills him. A is guilty of murder.

2. A, not meaning to cause death, strikes B, with a stick, and kills him. A is guilty of manslaughter; unless, of course, there are circumstances of justification or excuse.

3. A strikes and kills B, with a stick, meaning to cause B some bodily injury, which he, A, knows to be likely to cause death, A being reckless whether death ensues or not. A is guilty of murder.

4. A strikes B with a stick, and thereby kills him, A's intention being to cause B some bodily injury which is not known to A to be likely to cause death. A is guilty of manslaughter.

Persons in charge of dangerous things, animate or inanimate, and persons engaged in erecting or making anything which, in the absence of due precaution or care, may endanger human life, are under a legal duty to guard against danger, (5) and are criminally responsible for the consequences of omitting their duty without lawful excuse.

For instance, if a workman were to throw stones or other materials from a house in course of being erected or repaired, and to thereby kill a person passing underneath, on the street, it is murder, manslaughter, or homicide by misadventure, according to whether there is an entire absence of care, or according to the degree of the precautions taken and of the necessity of any such precautions. If the workman threw the stones, etc., without giving any previous warning to persons passing beneath, and at a time when it was likely for persons to be passing, it would be murder; (6) if it were done at a time when it was not likely that any persons would be passing, it would be manslaughter; (7) and if done in a retired place, where no persons are in the habit of passing or likely to pass, it would be misadventure merely. (8) Or, if the workman previously gave warning to persons beneath,—then, if it happened in a country village, where few persons pass, it would in that case also be misadventure only; (9) but if it were in some large and populous city or town and at a time when the streets were full, it would be manslaughter, even if he gave previous warning. (10)

A boy of 14 rushed at and without legal provocation struck a playmate, who then caught him by the shoulder and fell backwards, the fall dislocating the spinal column at the base of the skull and causing death:—Held, manslaughter, and no defence that the result was not anticipated and would not ordinarily follow from such a blow. (10*a*)

If a man breaking an unruly or vicious horse, ride him into a crowd of people, and the horse kick and kill one of the persons in the crowd, this would be murder, if the rider, in bringing the horse into the crowd, meant to do mischief, or even if he meant to divert himself by frightening the crowd; (1) for, by reason of his intention to do mischief, or to frighten people, he would be doing an unlawful act, which he knew or ought to have known to be likely to cause some one's death. If his riding into the crowd were done, not intentionally, but carelessly and incautiously only, he would be guilty of manslaughter. (2)

If a man driving a cart or other vehicle drive it over another man and kill him, it would be murder, if he saw or had timely notice of the probable mischief, and yet drove on. (3)

Upon an indictment for manslaughter, it appeared that the deceased was walking in the road, and was in a drunken condition, when the prisoner, who was in a cart and driving two horses, without reins, and going at a furious pace, ran over him and killed him. It appeared that the prisoner had called out twice to the deceased, who, from his drunken condition, and the pace of the horses could not get out of the road. This was held to be manslaughter. (4)

In another case, the prisoner drove the deceased (a friend of his) in a trap to the races. At the races the prisoner became intoxicated; and the deceased, who noticed this, before commencing the homeward journey, proposed to drive; but the prisoner declined, and insisted upon doing the driving himself. They then started off, the prisoner standing up and flogging the horse, and driving at a furious rate, until finally the trap was upset, and the deceased was thrown out and killed. Lush, J., directed the jury to find the prisoner guilty of manslaughter, if they thought the carriage was overturned by the prisoner's culpably negligent driving and that that caused the death of the deceased. (5)

If a man have a beast, which he knows to be accustomed to do mischief, and he, through want of due care, allows it to go abroad, and it kills some one, this is manslaughter in the owner who thus allows it to get abroad. If he turned it loose purposely, though merely to frighten people, and to make what is called sport, it would then be as much murder as if he incited a bear or a vicious dog to worry people. (6)

A, B and C went into a field in proximity to certain roads and houses, taking with them a rifle, which would be deadly at a mile. They all three practised firing, with the rifle, at a target, which they erected in the field, at a distance of about one hundred yards; and they took no precautions of any kind to prevent danger from the firing. One of the shots killed a boy in a tree, in a garden, at a spot 393 yards distant from the firing-point. It was held that, although there was no proof as to which of the three fired the fatal shot, A, B and C were all guilty of a breach of duty in firing at the place in question, without taking proper precautions to prevent injury to others, and they were found guilty of manslaughter. (7)

A cannon, which had burst and had been returned to an iron founder, was sent back by him in so imperfect a state that on being fired it burst again and killed a person; and it was held to be manslaughter. (8)

A, having the right to the possession of a gun which was in the hands of B and which he, A, knew to be loaded, attempted to take it by force. In the struggle which ensued, the gun accidentally went off and caused the death of B. A was held guilty of manslaughter, inasmuch as the discharge of the gun was the result of his unlawful act in attempting to retake the gun by force. (9)

This last case approaches very closely to the idea of murder, as defined in section 259 (d), which makes it murder if the offender, for any unlawful object, does an act which he knows or ought to have known to be likely to cause death, and thereby kills any person. A distinction, however, may be drawn from the fact that in the above case the object of the accused,—that of obtaining possession of the gun which was his own property,—was not an unlawful object, although the means used, attempting to regain possession of it by force, were unlawful; and, besides, in order to bring the case within the terms of section 259 (d), the circumstances established in evidence would have to be such as to shew that the accused was doing an act which he knew or ought to have known was likely to cause death.

CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE OF DECEASED NO DEFENCE.—If the drivers of two carriages race with each other and urge their horses to so rapid a pace that they cannot control them, it is manslaughter in both drivers, if, in consequence, one of the carriages upsets and a passenger is killed. (1)

In Swindall's case it was held to be no defence to shew that the death of the deceased was due in part to the contributory negligence of the deceased. In summing up, Pollock, C. B., said, "It matters not whether he (the deceased) was deaf, or drunk, or negligent, or in part contributed to his own death; for in this consists a great distinction between civil and criminal proceedings. If two coaches run against each other, and the drivers of both are to blame, neither of them has any remedy for damages against the other. But, in the case of loss of life, the law takes a totally different view; for, there, each party is responsible for any blame that may ensue, however large the share may be; and so highly does the law value human life that it admits of no justification wherever life has been lost, and the carelessness or negligence of any one person has contributed to the death of another person."

The same rule, that contributory negligence on the part of the deceased is no defence to an indictment for manslaughter, was laid down by Byles, J., in Hutchison's case, (2) and in Kew's case; (3) by Lush, J., in Jones' case, already cited supra, and by Mellor, J., in Dant's case. (4). In the latter case, the prisoner, having a right of common, had turned out upon a common, across which there were public footpaths, a horse which he knew to be vicious, and the horse had kicked and killed a child. The prisoner was held liable to be convicted of manslaughter, even though the child had strayed on to the common a little off the path.

IMMODERATE CORRECTION.—Where a parent is moderately correcting his child, a teacher his scholar, or a master his servant, and death happens to ensue, it is only a misadventure; but, if the bounds of moderation be exceeded, either in the manner, the instrument, or the quality of punishment, and death ensue, it is either manslaughter or murder, according to the circumstances (5) And so, where, in a case already referred to, supra, (6) a master corrected his servant by striking him with an iron bar, and where, in another case, a schoolmaster stamped on his scholar's belly, so that in each case the sufferer died, these were both held to be murders; because the correction, being excessive and such as must have proceeded from a bad heart, it was equivalent to a deliberate act of killing. (7) And in all cases where the correction is inflicted with a deadly weapon, and the party dies of it, it will be murder; if with an instrument which is not likely to kill, though not proper for the purpose of correction, it will, then, be manslaughter. (8)

Where a master struck his servant with one of his clogs because he had not cleaned them, and death unfortunately ensued, it was held to be manslaughter only, because the clog, although an improper instrument to use for the purpose of correction, was very unlikely to cause death, and there-

When a mother, being angry with one of her children, took up a poker, and, as the child ran to the door which was open, threw it after him, and struck and killed another child who happened at the time to be coming in at the open doorway, it was held that although she did not intend to hit the child at whom she threw the poker, but merely meant to frighten him, it was manslaughter. (10)

In another case, where the father of the child, two and a half years old, chastised it for some childish fault, by beating it with a strap on the lower part of its back and on its thighs, and the death of the child was thereby accelerated, he was held guilty of manslaughter. For the defence it was contended that, as the father had a right to correct his child, there was no case to go to the jury; but Martin, B., after consulting with Willes, J., ruled that the law of correction had no reference to an infant of two and a half years old, but only to those capable of appreciating correction, and that, although a slight slap might be lawfully given to an infant by its mother, more violent treatment, of an infant, so young, by her father, would not be justifiable. (1)

Where there has been a summary conviction for assault, and the person assaulted subsequently dies of injuries caused by the acts constituting the assault, a plea of autre fois convict is no defence by the person so summarily convicted, to an indictment for the manslaughter of the person assaulted. Where a peace officer pursuing a fugitive, whom he had a right to arrest without warrant, found that the fugitive was, in his opinion, likely to escape for the time being, owing to superior speed, it is a question for the jury, on the trial of the officer for manslaughter, whether, under all the circumstances, the officer was justified under section 261, ante, of the Code, in shooting in order to prevent the escape of the fugitive, or whether such escape could not have been prevented by reasonable means in a less violent manner. 263. Punishment for murder.—Every one who commits murder is guilty of an indictable offence and shall, on conviction thereof, be sentenced to death. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 231.

INDICTMENTS IN MURDER AND MANSLAUGHTER CASES.—In an indictment for murder no other count can be joined with the one charging the murder. This is provided for by section 856, post.

Sub-section 2 of section 909, post, provides that a previous conviction or acquittal shall be a bar to any second indictment for the same homicide whether the first indictment is for murder and the second for manslaughter or vice versa.

It is also provided,—by section 951,—that if on a charge of murder the evidence is not sufficient to establish murder but only manslaughter, a verdict of manslaughter may be found.

By section 952, post, it is further provided that upon an indictment for child murder, the conviction may, if the jury finds that the evidence warrants it, be for concealment of birth instead of murder.

It was contended that he could not be subsequently tried on a charge of unlawfully inflicting grievous bodily harm on S.:—Held, upon the construction of section 951 of the Code, that the accused could not, on the original charge of manslaughter, have been convicted of the lesser offence, and that, therefore, the acquittal was not a bar to a prosecution for the lesser offence. (4)

CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

In murder cases,—more so than in any other,—the evidence is, very often, circumstantial, the crime being usually committed in secret.

Circumstantial evidence, though always admissible, should be received and acted on, especially in murder cases, with the greatest caution; for it is well known that on many occasions persons have been convicted and executed for crimes of which they have been afterwards found to have been innocent; and there are some instances of conviction and punishment for the murder of persons who afterwards turned out to be still alive, though they have been missing under circumstances of strong suspicion against the accused. Sir Mathew Hale gives two instances of this kind; and it was on this account that he laid down the rule, never to convict any person of murder or manslaughter, till at least the body be found. (4a)

Although this rule has been and should be generally acted upon, it is not altogether inflexible; as, when the direct evidence brought before the jury is sufficiently strong to satisfy them that murder has really been committed.

For instance, in the Hindmarsh Case, the accused, the mate of a vessel, was indicted for the murder of his captain at sea, and a witness stated that the accused had proposed to kill the captain, and that the witness, being afterwards alarmed in the night by a violent noise, went up on deck and there saw the accused take up the captain and throw him overboard into the sea, and that he had not been seen or heard of afterwards; and that near the place on the deck where the captain was seen, a billet of wood was found, and that the deck and part of the accused's clothes were stained with blood. The Court, though admitting the general rule of law, left it to the jury to say whether the deceased was killed before his body was cast into the sea, and the jury, being of that opinion, the accused was convicted, and the conviction sustained. (5)

Where, on a charge of murder, the death of a human being is once established, the identity of the deceased and the fact that his death was caused by the prisoner, may be established by circumstantial evidence, which should, however, be cogent and convincing. (6)

Common observation shows that certain circumstances give rise to certain presumptions; and it is upon the common observation of what is natural and what is usually happening and being done in the ordinary affairs of life that the principal rules of evidence, and especially of presumptive evidence, are based. Certain acts are seen and known to lead to certain results; and the fact of the existence of certain circumstances leads to the conclusion that certain other circumstances, which generally accompany the former, also exist.

We thus take it for granted that, as a matter of nature, a mother has a strong affection for her child, that people in general are influenced by their interest, and that youth is susceptible of the passion of love. Therefore, the fact that A is the mother of B, leads to the presumption that A has a strong affection for B. And so it was that, of the two women who contended for their right to a child which each claimed as her offspring, that one was declared to be the mother who would not consent to its being cut in two and divided between them.

The principles of evidence being based upon the common observation of what is seen and believed to be passing around us, they depend to a considerable extent upon the place where and the manners and habits of the times in which we live. For instance, when the King of Siam was told by a European ambassador that the rivers and seas of northern Europe were occasionally made so hard by the cold that people could walk on them, he positively refused to credit the truth of such a story, as being a description of something entirely repugnant to everything which he had ever seen or heard of.

On a similar principle we readily give our belief to acts of common occurrence; but we are slow to give credence to those which are new and unlooked for.

Presumptions are of two kinds; one being the presumption or conclusion which the law attaches to certain kinds of guilt; as, where one kills another, the law draws the conclusion that he meant to kill. This is a presumption of law. The other kind of presumption is the presumption or conclusion of fact drawn by the judge, juror, or trier from the circumstances, as proved. For instance, how far the fact of a man being found, with a sword in his hand, by the prostrate body of a man just slain, leads to the conclusion that the man thus found with the sword is the man who dealt the fatal blow, is a presumption for the jury to make.

No presumption can be made except upon some facts already known and ascertained. Thus if stains of blood on the coat of one tried for murder are to be presumed as evidence of guilt, the fact that the stains are actually stains of blood,—and not stains which may have been occasioned by something else than blood,—must be first distinctly ascertained.

Presumptions of fact are usually divided into three kinds or degrees, namely: violent presumptions, which are such as arise when the facts and circumstances proved necessarily attend the fact presumed; probable presumptions, which are such as arise when the facts and circumstances proved usually attend the fact presumed; and light or rash presumptions, which in reality have no weight at all. (7)

The facts in the case already alluded to, of the man found with a drawn sword, standing over the body of another man just killed, would be sufficient to give rise to that kind of presumption of his guilt, called a violent presumption.

If upon an indictment for stealing in a dwelling house, the stolen goods were found in the defendant's lodging some little time after being stolen, and if the defendant refused to account for his possession of them, this, with proof of the goods being actually stolen, would amount to a probable presumption that he had stolen them.

If, however, the goods were not found recently after the loss, as for instance, not until sixteen months after, it would be but a light or rash presumption, entitled to no weight. (8)

If a man, in a sober condition, and without means of getting drunk, go into the London Docks, and come afterwards in a drunken state, out of one of the cellars wherein are a million gallons of wine, it would be reasonable evidence that he had stolen some of the wine in that cellar, though you could not prove that any wine was stolen or missed. (9)

In contending for the certainty of circumstantial evidence, it has been argued that, in cases of crimes committed for the most part in secret, strong circumstantial evidence is perhaps the most satisfactory of any from which to draw the conclusion of guilt, that men may be seduced to perjury by many base motives to which the secret nature of the offence may sometimes afford a temptation, but that it can scarcely happen that a number of circumstances should unfortunately concur to fix the presumption of guilt upon an individual and yet such a conclusion be erroneous. (10)

It has been said, moreover, that circumstances cannot lie. This may perhaps in general be true; but witnesses can lie. And it is from the witnesses that the circumstances must be obtained. You are, therefore, liable to two forms of error, or, it may be deception: first, in the story told by the witnesses, in giving the circumstances; and, secondly, in the application to be made of the circumstances, when so obtained. Where the fact itself is one positively sworn to, as having been seen by the witnesses, the conclusion to be drawn is generally obvious; but where the actual fact forming the offence charged has not been seen, but has to be inferred or presumed from a train of circumstances, the drawing of the conclusion depends, for its correctness, not only upon whether the witnesses, who give the circumstances, have told the truth, and have forgotten nothing, and are free from mistake in every essential particular, but also upon whether the conclusion is reached by proper reasoning upon the circumstances as proved; for as all men do not understand alike, very opposite conclusions may be drawn from the same circumstances and the same shades of probability.

Mascardus, an eminent writer on the general theory of proof, says: "Proof by evidence of the thing is superior to every other; and of all different kinds none is so great as that which is made by witnesses deposing to what they have seen;" and in another place he says: "Proof by presumption and conjectures cannot be called a true and proper proof."

Menochius, a writer whose work is entirely devoted to presumptions, or circumstantial evidence, says, at the very beginning of his work, that: "the proof or credence which arises from the testimony of witnesses is superior to any other."

One of the cases given by Lord Hale illustrates the fallacy of such a doctrine as that which asserts that circumstantial evidence is the best and most convincing kind of proof. The case is as follows: "An uncle who had the bringing up of his niece, to whom he was heir at law, had corrected her for some offence, and she was heard to say, 'Good uncle, do not kill me;' after which time she could not be found; whereupon the uncle was committed upon suspicion of murder, and admonished, by the justices of the assize, to find out the child by the next assizes; against which time he could not find her, but brought another child, as like her in years and person as he could find, and apparelled her like the true child; but on examination she was found not to be the true child. Upon these presumptions (which were considered to be as strong as facts that appear in the broad face of day), he was found guilty and executed; but the truth was, the child, being beaten, ran away, and was received by a stranger; and, afterwards, when she came of age to have her land, came and demanded it, and was directly proved to be the true child." (10*a*)

Suspicion is to be distinguished from proof. In common language the term suspicion is the imagining of something wrong, without proof that it is wrong; and therefore it can never be a proper ground for conviction.

(9) Per Maule, J., in R. v. Burton, Dears., 282. See, also, R. v. Mockford, 11 Cox C. C., 16.
(10) 1 East P. C., c. 5, s. 9, p. 223.
(10*a*) 2 Hale, P. C., 290.

A suspicion is merely an impression upon a person's mind; but an inference is based upon and drawn from some fact.

"The wisdom and goodness of our law appears in nothing, more remarkably, than in the perspicuity, certainty, and clearness of the evidence it requires to fix a crime upon any man, whereby his life, his liberty, or his property can be concerned; herein we glory and pride ourselves, and are justly the envy of all our neighbor nations. Our law, in such cases, requires evidence so clear and convincing, that every bystander, the instant he hears it, must be fully satisfied of the truth and certainty of it. It admits of no surmises, innuendoes, forced consequences, or harsh constructions, nor any thing else to be offered as evidence, but what is real and substantial, according to the rules of natural justice and equity." (10b)

Circumstantial evidence is in its very nature merely supplemental. It is only resorted to for the want of original and direct proof; and, surely, it can never be said that what is secondary is equal to that which is original, or that the thing which is substituted is equal to that which it is meant to supply. As Lord Chief Baron Gilbert, in his work upon evidence says:

"When the fact itself cannot be proved, that which comes nearest to the proof of the fact, is the proof of the circumstances that necessarily and usually attend such fact, and called presumptions; and not proof, for they stand instead of the proofs of the fact, till the contrary be proved." (1)

Philips, in his Work on Circumstantial Evidence says: "A regard to the peace and good order of society certainly requires that crimes shall be liable to be proved by circumstantial evidence. But a regard to the well being of society likewise demands that the mode of proof should be regulated by some fixed rules."

He then goes on to give the following as the chief of such rules:—

"1. The actual commission of the crime itself (the corpus delicti) shall be clearly established.

"2. Each circumstance shall be distinctly proved.

"3. The circumstance relied on shall be such as is necessarily or usually incidental to the fact charged.

"4. When the number of circumstances depends on the testimony of one witness, that number shall not increase the strength of the proof. For, as the whole depends on the veracity of the witness, when that fails the whole fails.

"5. Direct evidence shall not be held refuted from being opposed to circumstances incongruous with that evidence. Because a certain degree of incongruity is incident to every man's conduct.

"6. The Judge, in summing up, shall assume no fact or circumstance as proved; but shall state the whole hypothetically and conditionally; leaving it entirely to the jury, to determine how far the case is made out to their satisfaction.

"7. The difficulty of proving the negative shall in all cases be allowed due weight. But the silence of the prisoner as to facts, which, if innocent, he might have explained, shall be held an argument against him. This, of course, proceeds upon the supposition that he stood fully apprized, before his trial, of all that was intended to be produced.

"8. The counsel for the prisoner shall be allowed to object freely to the production of any evidence, as not proper to go to the jury, or as not being of legal credence.

"9. The jury shall be as fully convinced of the guilt of the prisoner, from the combination of the circumstances, as if direct proof had been brought.

(10b) Lord Cowper's speech on the Bishop of Rochester's case.
(1) 1 Gilb. Ev., 142.

"10. Where the body of the act is distinctly sworn to, a variation in the circumstances does not destroy the proof.

The following rule is the converse of the preceding one:—

"11. Where the leading fact or crime is only to be collected from circumstances, a material variation in these will defeat the effect of the whole.

"12. There being no repugnance in the chain of circumstances is a proof that a thing may be; not that it is: though, there being a repugnance is a proof that it cannot be. Whatever does not involve a contradiction, is possible; whatever involves one, is impossible.

"13. The absence of the proof, naturally to be expected, is a strong argument against the existence of any fact alleged. This applies particularly to cases where violence is charged."

It is very important to consider whether the circumstances proved necessarily involve the prisoner's guilt, or only probably so,—whether these circumstances might not all exist and yet the accused be innocent.

We sometimes hear a Judge, in summing up, say, that the evidence is the best that the nature of the case can be supposed to afford; but this is, surely, no reason why the jury should be satisfied with it: for it is only by the evidence that the nature of the case can be known; and the case of an innocent man must always be of a nature to afford very little evidence.

In a criminal case, the impression on the mind of the jury,—in order to convict,—ought to be, not that the prisoner is probably guilty, but, that he really and absolutely is so:—where they doubt, it is their duty to acquit.

The jury,—in order to enable them to return a verdict of guilty,—must be satisfied, by the evidence beyond any reasonable doubt, of the prisoner's guilt, and this as a conviction created in their minds not merely as a probability: and if it is only an impression of probability their duty is to acquit. (2)

In a murder case supported by circumstantial evidence, and in which there was no fact which taken alone amounted to a presumption of guilt, the jury were told by Alderson, B. that, before they could find the prisoner guilty, they must be satisfied not only that the circumstances were consistent with his having committed the act but that they must also be satisfied that the facts were such as to be inconsistent with any other rational conclusion than that the prisoner was the guilty person: and he went on to point out to them the proneness of the human mind to look for and often slightly to distort the facts in order to establish such a proposition and its proneness to forget that a single circumstance which is inconsistent with such a conclusion is of more importance than all the rest, inasmuch as it destroys the hypothesis of guilt. (3)

On a trial for murder where the evidence is circumstantial, it is for the jury alone to pronounce on the question of the truth of the alleged circumstances deposed to, and also as to what inferences which the facts would warrant shall be drawn from the circumstantial evidence; and it is error and ground for a new trial for the trial Judge to instruct the jury that they cannot doubt that certain inferences are to be drawn on points material to the issue. (4)

While under the criminal law the accused person is not called upon to explain suspicious circumstances there may nevertheless come a time when circumstantial evidence having enveloped him in a strong network of inculpatory facts, he is bound to make some explanation or stand condemned. (5)

A woman was murdered,—according to the only eye-witness (a girl of eight),—by the accused, a dark man with a fat face, dressed in brown trousers, in the seat of which were two rents. He also had on a black shirt with white stripes, and a dark coat. He had been seen in the vicinity of the murder some 30 minutes previously. His dress corresponded with the shirt, and with the coat and trousers mentioned, in addition to which he wore a stiff black hat. A knife sworn to as having been in the accused's possession three days before was found on the afternoon of the murder, still wet with blood, a few feet from the murdered woman's body. Held, on an application (after conviction) for a new trial, that the jury was justified on the evidence in coupling the accused with the crime. (6)

264. Attempts to murder.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for life, who, with intent to commit murder,—

(a) administers any poison or other destructive thing to any person, or causes any poison or destructive thing to be so administered or taken, or attempts to administer it, or attempts to cause it to be so administered or taken; or,

(b) by any means whatever wounds or causes any grievous bodily harm to any person; or,

(c) shoots at any person, or, by drawing a trigger or in any other manner, attempts to discharge at any person any kind of loaded arms; or,

(d) attempts to drown, suffocate, or strangle any person; or,

(e) destroys or damages any building by the explosion of any explosive substance; or,

(f) sets fire to any ship or vessel or any part thereof, or any part of the tackle, apparel or furniture thereof, or to any goods or chattels being therein; or,

(g) casts away or destroys any vessel; or,

(h) by any other means attempts to commit murder. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 232.

As to wounding with intent to maim, disfigure or disable any person or to do some other grievous bodily harm, see section 273, post. As to wounding or inflicting any grievous bodily harm, see section 274, post. And as to administering poison, etc., so as to endanger the life of any person or to inflict upon such person any grievous bodily harm, or with intent to injure, aggrieve or annoy such person, see sections 277 and 278, post.

Section 951, post, provides that, when the commission of an offence charged in an indictment includes the commission of any other offence, the accused may, if the whole offence charged be not proved, be convicted of any other offence so included therein, if proved. Therefore, if upon the trial of an indictment for wounding or causing grievous bodily harm with intent to murder, the intent to murder be not proved, the jury may, according to the evidence, find the accused guilty of unlawfully wounding or of unlawfully inflicting grievous bodily harm or of a common assault, each of these offences being included in the higher offence of wounding with intent to murder.

Section 950, post, provides that, when, upon a charge of attempt, the evidence establishes the commission of the full offence, the accused may either be convicted of the attempt (for an attempt to commit a crime must necessarily precede and be included in the actual perpetration of a crime), or the Court may, instead of taking any verdict on the attempt, direct the accused to be indicted for the complete offence; but after being convicted of the attempt the accused cannot be tried for the offence which he was charged with attempting to commit.

It is also provided,—by section 949, post,—that, when the complete commission of the offence charged is not proved, but only an attempt to commit the offence, the accused may be convicted of the attempt.

ADMINISTERING POISON.—Where a female servant put arsenic into coffee which she prepared in a coffee pot for breakfast, and afterwards told her mistress that she had prepared the coffee for her, whereupon the mistress took up the coffee pot and poured out and drank the coffee, it was held by Parke, J., that this was an administering of the poison by the servant. (7)

Where A, knowingly, gave poison to B to administer as a medicine to C, but, B, neglecting to do so, it was accidentally given to C, by a child, this was held to be an administering by A, just as much as if she had given it with her own hands to C. (8)

A, having mixed corrosive sublimate with sugar, put it in a parcel, directing it to Mrs. Daws, at Townhope, and left it on the counter of B, a tradesman, who sent it to Mrs. Davis, who used some of the poisoned sugar. Gurney, B., held this to be an administering by A; for, although the parcel was intended for Mrs. Daws, yet, as it found its way to Mrs. Davis, it was the same in its effect as if it had been intended for Mrs. Davis. (9) In another case, however, Parke, B., after consulting with Alderson, B., expressed the opinion that an indictment for causing poison to be taken by A. with intent to murder A, could not be sustained by evidence shewing that the poison, though taken by A, was intended for another person, and he doubted the propriety of the decision of Gurney, B., in the above case of R. v. Lewis. He accordingly directed a fresh indictment to be preferred charging the intent to be generally "to commit murder"; upon which the defendant was again tried, convicted and sentenced. (10) But see R. v. Smith, post, p. 296.

A administered to B, a child, two coculus indicus berries entire in the pod, with intent to murder. The kernel of this berry is poison, but the pod is not, and will not dissolve in the stomach. The two berries thus administered were, therefore, as it happened, quite harmless. It was, nevertheless, held that there was an administering of poison with intent to murder. (1)

Evidence of administering at different times may be given to shew the intent. (2)

WOUNDING OR CAUSING GRIEVOUS BODILY HARM WITH INTENT TO MURDER.—It will be seen that the above section 264 (b) is aimed at wounding or causing grievous bodily harm by any means; and therefore, upon the trial of an indictment for wounding with intent to murder, the instrument or means by which the wound was inflicted need not be stated. (3)

It was formerly considered that, to constitute a wound, the continuity of the skin must be broken, that there must be an injury which divided the true skin; (4) in other words, that the outer covering of the body, (that is, the whole skin, not the mere cuticle, or upper skin), (5) must be divided; (6) a division of the internal skin,—for instance, within the cheek or lip,—being held sufficient to constitute a wound. (7)

But this limited meaning would leave out of the category injuries with such weapons as would not cut or divide the skin, and which nevertheless would cause death.

The following remarks, on the meaning of the word "wound," are taken from Woodman & Tidy's Forensic Medicine:—

"Richard Wiseman, who lived in the reigns of Kings Charles I., and Charles II., and was Sergeant-Surgeon to the latter, defines a Wound as 'a solution of continuity in any part of the body suddenly made by anything that cuts or tears, with a division of the skin.' He goes on to say that by skin he understands 'not only the external cutis, but also the inward membranes of the gullet, ventricle, guts, bladder, urethra, and womb, all of which are capable of wounds from sharp instruments, either swallowed or thrust into them' (8)

"In other words, the solution of continuity may affect either the skin and subjacent parts or mucous membranes, and the parts lined by them. But this definition excludes so many mechanical injuries, that it has been proposed to use the word lesion for the general term. Beck states that 'the term wound in legal medicine comprehends all lesions of the body, and in this differs from the meaning of the word when used in surgery. The latter only refers to a solution of continuity, while the former comprises not only these, but also every other kind of accident, such as bruises, contusions, fractures, dislocations,' etc.

"Lord Lyndhurst, Chief Baron, said:—'The definition of a wound in criminal cases, is an injury to the person, by which the skin is broken. If the skin is broken, and there was a bleeding, that is a wound.' (9)

"On this, Beck properly remarks, that a man may have a bone fractured from a blow, without any breaking of the skin. (10)

"Dr. Taylor remarks, that Wiseman's definition would include ruptures of internal organs, such as the liver and spleen, and burns and scalds, as well as simple fractures and dislocations. On applying to three eminent surgeons, he obtained the three following definitions:—

'A wound is—

'1. A solution of continuity, from violence, of any naturally continuous parts;

'2. An external breach of continuity directly occasioned by violence;

'3. An injury to the organic textures by mechanical or other violence.'

"The want of a legal definition formerly allowed the collar bone to be broken by a hammer or otherwise, provided the skin were not broken, and similar injuries to be inflicted, and yet the prisoner to escape, because this was not considered a wound. (10*a*)

"Now, however, these lesions would be included in the second clause of the sentence, 'shall, by any means whatever, wound, or cause any grievous bodily harm to any person, and by any means other than those specified,' etc., etc., 'with or without a weapon or instrument.' [See the Acts 1 Vict., c. 85; 14 and 15 Vict., c. 100; and ss. 11, 15 and 20 of 24 and 25 Vict., c. 100]. . . . As Dr. Taylor remarks, it may be reasonably supposed that ruptures of internal organs, as well as simple fractures and dislocations, will be considered as wounds." (10*b*)

The word "wound" includes incised wounds, punctured wounds, lacerated wounds, contused wounds and gunshot wounds: (10*c*) and, in short, every kind of wound no matter how or by what produced. The nature of the instrument by which it was effected is immaterial. It makes no difference whether it was done with a kick from a shoe, (1) or with a hammer thrown at and striking a person, (2) or by striking a man's hat violently with an air-gun and thereby causing the hat to wound the man. (3)

For the meanings of incised wounds, punctured wounds, lacerated wounds, contused wounds and gunshot wounds, see comments under section 273, post.

It is not necessary, under the foregoing section 264 (b), that the wound should be in a vital part: for the real question is not what is the wound actually given but what was the wound intended to be given. (4)

To constitute GRIEVOUS BODILY HARM it is not necessary that the injury should be either permanent or dangerous. If it be such as seriously to interfere with health or comfort, it is sufficient. (5)

Upon a charge of attempt to murder by causing grievous bodily harm to a child (below the age of sixteen) under the care of the defendants, (namely, the daughter of the male defendant and the step-daughter of the female defendant), the Crown, after making proof of acts of cruelty by the defendants towards the child in question, sought to fortify the case by adducing evidence of the defendants having committed acts of cruelty to another child,—a son of the male defendant,—under their care. The Court ruled that the proposed evidence was inadmissible as irrelevant to the issue, and when, in the course of cross-examining the female defendant, the Crown Counsel questioned her as to her treatment of her step-son, the Court, in allowing the questions, notified the Crown Counsel that the female defendant's answers would be conclusive inasmuch as, the subject being foreign to the issue, her answers must be accepted as final. In answer to the questions put to her in cross-examination, the female defendant swore that she had never acted cruelly towards her step-son. In rebuttal, the Crown put the step-son in the box to contradict the female defendant, and the Court refused to allow his evidence. (6)

Where an indictment was multifarious in that it combined a charge (under sections 240 and 244), of failure to provide necessaries, with a charge (under section 264) of an attempt to murder the child, it was held that it was sufficient upon which to base a conviction for the latter offence

(attempt to murder) without any formal amendment of the indictment, the presiding Judge having withdrawn from the jury the portion of the charge based upon sections 240 and 244. (7)

SHOOTING WITH INTENT TO MURDER.—Where a defendant was charged with wounding T., with intent to murder him, and the evidence shewed that the defendant's intention was to murder M., and that he shot at and wounded T., supposing him to be M., and the jury found that he intended to murder the man at whom he shot, supposing that he was M., the Court held the conviction right. (8)

A person who fired a loaded pistol into a group of people, not aiming at any particular one, and who hit one of such group, was held guilty of shooting at the person he hit, with intent to do grievous bodily harm to that person. (9)

If A draw a loaded pistol from his pocket for the purpose of murdering S, but, before he can do anything further in pursuance of his purpose, some one snatches the pistol from his hand, it seems that he would be guilty of an attempt; (10) and, at all events, if he put his finger on the trigger, and tried to pull it, and was only prevented from doing so by forcible interference of bystanders he would be guilty of the attempt. (1)

Under section 2[9], ante, the expression "loaded arms" means and includes "any gun, pistol or other arm loaded with gunpowder, or other explosive substance, and ball, shot, slug or other destructive material, or charged with compressed air and ball, shot, slug or other destructive material."

For the definition of an attempt, see section 72, and comments thereon, at pp. 80 et seq., ante.

Sub-section (h) of section 264 (which is a provision similar to section 15 of the Imperial Act, 24-25 Vict., c. 100), embracing as it does all attempts, by any other means, to commit murder, will include all those cases where machinery used in lowering miners into mines is injured with intent that it shall break and precipitate the miners, who may be passing up or down, to the bottom of the pit; and also all cases where steam engines are injured for the purpose of killing any one, as well as the cases of sending or placing infernal machines with intent to murder. (2)

A defendant was charged before justices of the peace with the indictable offence of shooting with intent to murder, and the justices, not finding sufficient evidence to warrant a committal for trial, took, of their own motion, the following course, namely, that of summarily convicting the defendant for that he did "procure a revolver with intent therewith unlawfully to do injury to one J. S." It appeared from the evidence that the weapon was bought and carried and used by the defendant; and, by section 121, ante, it is an offence triable summarily for one to have in his possession a pistol with intent therewith unlawfully to do any injury to any other person. The return to a writ of habeas corpus shewed the detention of the defendant under a warrant of commitment based upon the above conviction; and, upon motion for the defendant's discharge, it was held that the detention was for an offence unknown to the law, and although the evidence shewed an offence against section 121, the magistrate ought not to be allowed to substitute a proper conviction of an offence under that section, inasmuch as it was unwarrantable to convict on a charge as to which no complaint was laid and which the defendant was not called upon to defend, and that, therefore, the defendant must be released. (3)

It is proper, on the trial of a person accused of attempt to murder by shooting, for the Judge, in charging the jury, to instruct them that they may draw an inference, as to the accused's intent to kill, from the circumstance of his being a stranger loitering in a street or park, between four and five o'clock in the morning, with a loaded revolver and burglar's tools in his possession. (4)

265. Letters threatening murder.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to ten years' imprisonment who sends, delivers or utters, or directly or indirectly causes to be received, knowing the contents thereof, any letter or writing threatening to kill or murder any person. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 233.

Under section 2 "writing" includes any mode in which, and any material on which, words or figures, whether at length, or abridged, are written, printed, or otherwise expressed, or any map or plan is inscribed.

See Threatening Letters, section 451, post.

266. Conspiracy to murder and counselling murder.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to fourteen years' imprisonment, who,—

(a) conspires or agrees with any person to murder or to cause to be murdered any other person, whether the person intended to be murdered is a subject of His Majesty or not, or is within His Majesty's dominions or not; or,

(b) counsels or attempts to procure any person to murder such other person anywhere, although such person is not murdered in consequence of such counselling or attempted procurement. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 234.

The second paragraph of this section is the same, in effect, as the Imperial statute, 24 and 25 Vict., c. 100, s. 4, under which it was held in Most's case that the publication and circulation of a newspaper article may be an encouragement or attempt to persuade to murder, although not addressed to any person in particular. The prisoner had published and circulated an article written in German in a newspaper published in that language in London, exulting in the recent assassination of the Czar of Russia, and commending the murder as an example to all revolutionists throughout the world; and at the trial the jury were directed that if they thought that by the publication of the article the prisoner intended to encourage and did encourage or endeavor to persuade any person to murder any other person, whether a subject of Her Majesty or not, and whether within the Queen's dominions or not, and that such encouragement and endeavoring to persuade was the natural and reasonable effect of the article, they should find him guilty. This direction was held correct. (5)

267. Accessory after the fact to murder.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for life, who is an accessory after the fact to murder. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 235.

See notes under section 71, ante, as to accessories after the fact.

268. Punishment for manslaughter.—Every one who commits manslaughter is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for life. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 236.

Sub-section 2 of section 909, post, provides that a previous conviction or acquittal shall be a bar to any second indictment for the same homicide whether the first indictment is for murder and the second for manslaughter, or vice versa.

An acquittal of an accused charged with the manslaughter of S. was held to be no bar to a subsequent prosecution for the lesser offence of unlawfully inflicting grievous bodily harm on S. (6)

Suicide.

269. Counselling or aiding or abetting the commission of suicide.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for life who counsels or procures any person to commit suicide, actually committed in consequence of such counselling or procurement, or who aids or abets any person in the commission of suicide. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 237.

In reference to this subject the English Commissioners (at page 25 of their Report), have the following remarks:—

"By the present law, suicide is murder: and a person who assists another to commit suicide is an accessory before the fact to murder and liable to capital punishment. It appears to us that the abetment of suicide and attempts to commit suicide ought to be made specific offences. We provide for this in sections 183 and 184." (Identical with our sections 269 and 270.)

Under the common law (which is altered by this section, 269), if two persons agreed to commit suicide together and only one of them died in the attempt to carry out their agreement, the survivor was guilty of the murder of the other. (7)

270. Attempt to commit suicide.—Every one who attempts to commit suicide is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 238.

Opposite to the section of the English Draft Code corresponding with this section, the Royal Commissioners have the following note:—

"This is the existing law. See Reg. v. Burgess, L. & C., 258." (8)

Neglect in Childbirth and Concealing Dead Body.

271. Neglect to obtain assistance in childbirth.—Every woman is guilty of an indictable offence who, with either of the intents in this section mentioned, being with child and being about to be delivered, neglects to provide reasonable assistance in her delivery, if the child is permanently injured thereby, or dies, either just before, or during, or shortly after birth, unless she proves that such death or permanent injury was not caused by such neglect, or by any wrongful act to which she was a party, and is liable,—

(a) if the intent of such neglect be that the child shall not live, to imprisonment for life;

(b) if the intent of such neglect be to conceal the fact of her having had a child, to imprisonment for seven years. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 239.

Opposite to sections 185 and 186 of the English Draft Code, which correspond with this section, 271, of our Code, the Royal Commissioners have the following note:—

"These are new. Women found guilty of concealment of birth, under the existing law, (9) have in most cases been really guilty of the acts made substantial offences by these sections. These sections would also often afford a means for punishing child murder, where there would be a practical difficulty in obtaining a conviction for that offence."

In their report (at p. 25) the Royal Commissioners say, further:—

"The subject of child murder is one as to which the existing law seems to require alteration. At present, no distinction is made between the murder of a new-born infant, by its mother, and the murder of an adult.

"Practically this severity defeats itself, and offences, which are really cases of child-murder, are often treated as cases of concealment of birth simply. The Bill proposed to meet this by an enactment which (as amended by the Attorney-General), would have enabled a jury to convict of manslaughter, instead of murder, a woman who caused her new-born child's death by an act done when her power of self-control was greatly weakened. On the whole, we have preferred to substitute for it the provisions contained in sections 185 and 186."

It has been held in England that, where a woman without intending the death of her child determined to be alone at the birth for the purpose of temporary concealment, and the child afterwards dies by reason of her wicked negligence, she is guilty of manslaughter. (10)

272. Concealing dead body of child.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment, who disposes of the dead body of any child in any manner, with intent to conceal the fact that its mother was delivered of it, whether the child died before, or during, or after birth. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 240.

(9) Meaning the law as now contained in section 272, post.
(10) R. v. Handley, 13 Cox, 79.

On a trial for child murder, the jury, if they acquit on the charge of murder, may, under section 952, post,—if the evidence warrants it,—convict the accused of concealment of birth.

It was held in one case that a fœtus not bigger than a man's finger, but having the shape of a child, was a child within the meaning of the English statute against concealment of birth. (1)

Where a woman was delivered of a child whose dead body was found in a bed amongst the feathers, but there was no evidence to shew who put it there and it appeared that the mother had sent for a surgeon when she was confined, and had prepared clothes for the child, the Judge directed an acquittal on the charge of endeavoring to conceal the birth. (2)

Where a woman put the dead body of her child over a wall which divided a yard from a field, she was convicted of concealing the birth of the child; and the conviction was confirmed. (3)

In another case, the mother caused the body of her child to be secretly buried with a view to conceal its birth, and although she had previously allowed the birth to be known to some persons, it was held that she might be convicted of the concealment. (4)

The mere denial of the birth is not sufficient to convict. There must be proof of some act of disposal of the body after the child's death. (5)

It was held by a majority of the Judges, that the putting of the child's dead body between a bed and the mattress, or under a bolster, on which the accused lay her head, was a sufficient disposal of it to constitute the offence. (6)

It was held that a mother who placed the dead body of her child in an open box in her bedroom, and afterwards, on enquiry from the doctor, told him where it was, could not be convicted of concealment. (7)

In order to convict a woman of attempting to conceal the birth of her child it has been held that a dead body must be found and identified as that of the child of which she was delivered. (8)

A placed the dead body of a child of which she had been delivered between a trunk and the wall of a room in which she lived alone. Being charged with having had a child she at first denied it, but being pressed she pointed out where the body was. Held, that she might be convicted of concealing the birth of the child. (9)

To constitute the offence of concealment of birth within section 60 of the Imperial Offences Against the Person Act, 1861, there must be a concealment of the fact of the birth, and that concealment must be carried out by the secret disposition of the body. The secret disposition must be of such a nature that anyone coming to the place where the body is would not be likely to see it. (10) who, with intent to maim, disfigure or disable any person, or to do some other grievous bodily harm to any person, or with intent to resist or prevent the lawful apprehension or detainer of any person, unlawfully by any means wounds or causes any grievous bodily harm to any person, or shoots at any person, or by drawing a trigger, or in any other manner, attempts to discharge any kind of loaded arms at any person. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 241.

It will be sufficient to warrant a conviction under this section if it be proved that the defendant wounded, or caused grievous bodily harm to, or shot at, etc., any person with intent to maim, disfigure, or disable any person, etc., so that if A struck at B. but, C interposing, received the blow, and was wounded, A could be convicted of wounding C with intent to do him grievous bodily harm. (1)

As to wounding or causing any grievous bodily harm with intent to murder, see section 264 (b), ante.

We have already noticed, under section 264, ante, the meaning of the word "wound," and that wounds may be incised, punctured, contused or lacerated wounds.

An incised wound is commonly called a "cut," and is generally produced by a weapon with a sharp edge, as a knife, a sword, a scythe, scissors, etc.; but some clean sharp cuts and ugly gaping wounds have been known to be produced with a square poker, or even with the fist or a blunt body, when it strikes a sharp, bony ridge, such as that of the eyebrow, the cheek bone, etc.

Punctured wounds are caused by the penetration of some pointed weapon, or anything with a sharp point, such as a dagger, a pen-knife, a pon-iard, a piece of broken glass, a tobacco pipe, scissor points, arrows, darts, sharp stones, etc. These wounds are sometimes dangerous and troublesome, from the fact that the external wound may heal over too soon, and keep the pus confined, or injury may be done to nerves and blood vessels in the deeper parts of the wound. An instance, given by medical writers, of the dangerous nature of a punctured wound, is that of a clock-maker who, while picking his ear with the wire stem of a clock pendulum, was struck on the elbow by a drunken man who thus caused the wire to pass through his ear into the brain, and occasioned his death.

A contused wound is one in which there is considerable bruising, with discoloration of the surrounding skin, caused by effusion of blood, from small ruptured vessels into the surrounding cellular membrane, or subcutaneous tissue. The change of color is produced by the oxidation of the effused blood; and when it takes place near the eye, it is popularly called a "black eye." After from eighteen to twenty-four hours from the commencement of the discoloration the black or dark-blue coloring begins to grow lighter, and changes gradually, from day to day, passing through different shades of green, yellow, lemon, etc., until it completely disappears. When the blood is effused in quantity, as for example by the blow of a cricket-ball, such a swelling is called hæmatoma, or blood tumor. The shape of a bruise may sometimes be an important item of evidence. Starkie states that, on one occasion, in a case of attempt to murder, the prosecutor had, in his own defence, struck his assailant with a house door-key, and the marks of contusion produced by the wards of this key became the chief means of the would-be murderer's identification and conviction..

In some cases of contused wounds it may take two or three days for the skin to appear discolored or bruised; and the time taken for the completion of these changes of color, as well as for the absorption of the blood, may vary from a few days to some weeks.

(1) R. v. Latimer, 16 Cox, 70; R. v. Stopford, 11 Cox, 643.

Lacerated wounds are torn and ragged ones, such as are produced by sawing movements of blunt or jagged instruments, as for example, stones, glass, earthenware, shots from fire-arms, etc. These wounds are generally dangerous, from often containing dirt and foreign bodies, such as fragments of wadding, powder, etc., and because they can only heal by granulation and suppuration, and not by primary union or adhesion.

Some wounds are of a mixed character. When a wound is produced with a knife, for instance, one part may be cleanly cut or incised, and another may be hacked or lacerated, and a different force or direction being given to the point of the knife may cause the wound to be at the one end a punctured or pointed one. (2)

Besides the above, there are what are known as gunshot wounds, which are wounds generally produced by missiles, chiefly lead, fired from some sort of pistol or gun, the propelling force being powder. The same character of wound may be made, however, by any projectile, no matter of what it is composed, and no matter what the propelling force. As, for example, a small stone or pebble, resembling a bullet in size, thrown by a blast or any sufficient force, will give what is technically known as a gunshot wound; and it is such a wound,—only not one caused by the use of fire-arms. (3)

Upon an indictment for wounding by shooting with intent to disable, under section 241 (now section 273) of the Code, the jury is properly instructed that, if such intent is negatived, the accused may still be convicted of the simple offence of wounding under section 242 (now section 274), if the jury find that he pointed a loaded gun, and fired it at another and either knew or ought to have known that the gun was loaded. A verdict of "guilty, without malicious intent," upon such an indictment, was held to be a verdict of guilty of such lesser offence. (4)

But this was reversed in appeal,—the Supreme Court of Canada holding that the verdict of "guilty without malicious intent" was equivalent to a verdict of acquittal of the charge laid in the indictment, namely, that of wounding with intent to disable. (5)

Upon a charge of shooting with intent to do grievous bodily harm, in which the plea is self-defence, it is a question for the jury whether the assault upon the accused, which had provoked the shooting, had ended or was still being pursued. It is a mis-direction to charge the jury that, to support a plea of self-defence to the infliction of grievous bodily harm, they must find that the accused could not otherwise have preserved himself from death or grievous bodily harm, it being sufficient justification if the accused had a reasonable apprehension of grievous bodily harm to himself from the violence of the assault upon him and if he believed on reasonable grounds that he could not preserve himself from grievous bodily harm otherwise than by inflicting grievous bodily harm upon his assailant. (6)

274. Wounding.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to three years' imprisonment who unlawfully wounds or inflicts any grievous bodily harm upon any other person, either with or without any weapon or instrument. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 242.

See section 951, post, which provides that a person accused of an offence may be convicted of any other offence included therein if such other offence be proved although the whole offence is not proved; and it is not necessary that the lesser offence should be expressly charged on the face of the indictment. It will be sufficient if the offence charged must of necessity include it. (7)

275. Shooting at the King's vessels.—Wounding public officer on duty.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to fourteen years' imprisonment who wilfully,—

(a) shoots at any vessel belonging to His Majesty or in the service of Canada; or,

(b) maims or wounds any public officer engaged in the execution of his duty or any person acting in aid of such officer. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 243.

To justify a sentence of more than three years imprisonment for assault and wounding a public officer, the charge must allege that the offence was committed while the officer was engaged in the execution of his duty.

A mere description of the assaulted party in the information as an acting detective does not justify a sentence of seven years on a plea of guilty, nor does it imply that the assault took place while the officer was engaged in the execution of his duty. (8)

"Public officer" is defined by section 2 [illegible] as including "any inland revenue or customs officer, officer of the army, navy, marine, militia, North-West Mounted Police, or other officer engaged in enforcing the laws relating to the revenue, customs, trade or navigation of Canada."

276. Disabling or drugging with intent to commit any indictable offence.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for life and to be whipped, who with intent thereby to enable himself or any other person to commit, or with intent thereby to assist any other person in committing any indictable offence,—

(a) by any means whatsoever, attempts to choke, suffocate or strangle any other person, or by any means calculated to choke, suffocate or strangle, attempts to render any other person insensible, unconscious or incapable of resistance; or,

(b) unlawfully applies or administers to, or causes to be taken by, or attempts to apply or administer to, or attempts or causes to be administered to or taken by, any person, any chloroform, laudanum, or other stupefying or overpowering drug, matter or thing. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 244.

As to attempting to drown, suffocate or strangle, with intent to murder, see section 264 (d), ante.

277. Administering poison, etc., so as to endanger life or inflict grievous bodily harm.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to fourteen years' imprisonment who unlawfully administers to, or causes to be administered to or taken by any other person, any poison or other destructive or noxious thing, so as thereby to endanger the life of such person, or so as thereby to inflict upon such person any grievous bodily harm. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 245.

278. Administering poison, etc., with intent to injure or annoy.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to three years' imprisonment who unlawfully administers to, or causes to be administered to or taken by any other person, any poison or other destructive or noxious thing, with intent to injure, aggrieve or annoy such person. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 246.

See comments, under section 264, ante, at p. 295, on ADMINISTERING POISON with intent to murder.

If the poison or destructive or noxious thing is administered merely with intent to injure, aggrieve or annoy, which in itself would be punishable under the above section, 278, yet if it does, in fact, endanger the life of or inflict grievous bodily harm upon the person to whom it is administered, it would amount to the higher offence covered by and punishable under section 277. (9)

To warrant a conviction under section 278, it must be proved that the defendant intended the administration of the poison, etc., to injure, aggrieve or annoy the prosecutor. (10)

Whether the thing is a noxious thing or not may depend upon the quantity administered, some drugs being innoxious in small and noxious in large quantities. Thus, where the prisoner was indicted under section 24 of 24 and 25 Vic., c. 100 (which corresponds with the above section 278), and the evidence was that he had administered cantharides (otherwise called Spanish fly), to the prosecutrix, that a large dose of cantharides is poisonous, but that the quantity which he administered was insufficient to produce any effect upon the human system, it was held, by Cockburn, C.J., and Hawkins, J., that the prisoner could not be convicted of administering a "destructive and noxious thing," notwithstanding that he administered it with intent to injure and annoy. (1)

In Wilkins' case, supra, the defendant had administered cantharides to a woman with intent to excite her sexual passion and desire, in order that he might obtain connection with her; and it was held that this was an administering with intent to "injure, aggrieve and annoy" her.

In another case, the prisoner was indicted for having caused to be taken a certain noxious thing, namely, half an ounce of oil of juniper, with intent to procure miscarriage, and the evidence was that oil of juniper in considerably less quantities than half an ounce might be taken without any ill effect, but that half an ounce produces ill effects, and to a pregnant woman is dangerous. Held, that the half ounce of juniper oil was a "noxious thing" (2)

279. Causing bodily injuries by explosives.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for life who unlawfully and by the explosion of an explosive substance burns, maims, disfigures, disables or does any grievous bodily harm to any person. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 247.

280. Attempt to cause bodily injuries by explosives.—Every one who unlawfully,—

(a) with intent to burn, maim, disfigure or disable any person, or to do some grievous bodily harm to any person, whether any bodily harm is effected or not,

(i) causes any explosive substance to explode,

(ii) sends or delivers to, or causes to be taken or received by, any person any explosive substance, or any other dangerous or noxious thing,

(iii) puts or lays at any place, or casts or throws at or upon, or otherwise applies to, any person any corrosive fluid, or any destructive or explosive substance; or,

(b) places or throws in, into, upon, against or near any building, ship or vessel an explosive substance, with intent to do any bodily injury to any person, whether or not any explosion takes place and whether or not any bodily injury is effected; is guilty of an indictable offence and liable, in cases within paragraph (a) of this section, to imprisonment for life, and in cases within paragraph (b) of this section to fourteen years' imprisonment. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 248.

Section 2[14], ante, defines explosive substance as including:—"any materials for making an explosive substance; also any apparatus, machine, implement, or materials used, or intended to be used, or adapted for causing, or aiding in causing, any explosion in or with any explosive substance; and also any part of any such apparatus, machine or implement."

281. Setting spring guns and man-traps.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to five years' imprisonment who sets or places, or causes to be set or placed, any spring-gun, man-trap, or other engine calculated to destroy human life or inflict grievous bodily harm, with the intent that the same or whereby the same may destroy, or inflict grievous bodily harm upon, any trespasser or other person coming in contact therewith.

2. Every one who knowingly and wilfully permits any such spring-gun, man-trap or other engine which has been set or placed by some other person, in any place which is in, or afterwards comes into, his possession or occupation, to continue so set or placed, shall be deemed to have set or placed such gun, trap or engine with such intent as aforesaid.

3. This section does not extend to any gin or trap usually set or placed with the intent of destroying vermin or noxious animals. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 249.

This section applies to instruments set with an intention to destroy human life or to inflict grievous bodily harm upon human beings, or whereby grievous bodily harm is actually done to a human being, and therefore it would not apply to dog-spears set by a man in his own land. (3)

If death is caused by unlawfully setting a spring gun, the person setting it is guilty of manslaughter. (4)

282. Intentionally endangering the safety of persons on railways.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for life who unlawfully,—

(a) with intent to injure or to endanger the safety of any person travelling or being upon any railway,

(i) puts or throws upon or across such railway any wood, stone, or other matter or thing,

(ii) takes up, removes or displaces any rail, railway switch, sleeper or other matter or thing belonging to such railway, or injures or destroys any track, bridge or fence of such railway, or any portion thereof,

(iii) turns, moves or diverts any point or other machinery belonging to such railway,

(iv) makes or shows, hides or removes any signal or light upon or near to such railway,

(v) does or causes to be done any other matter or thing with such intent; or,

(b) throws, or causes to fall or strike at, against, into or upon any engine, tender, carriage or truck used and in motion upon any railway, any wood, stone or other matter or thing, with intent to injure or endanger the safety of any person being in or upon such engine, tender, carriage or truck, or in or upon any other engine, tender, carriage or truck of any train of which such first mentioned engine, tender, carriage or truck forms part. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 250.

As to endangering property by mischief on railways, see section 517 et seq.

283. Negligently endangering the safety of persons on railways.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who, by any unlawful act, or by any wilful omission or neglect of duty, endangers or causes to be endangered the safety of any person conveyed or being in or upon a railway, or aids or assists therein. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 251.

A passenger railway line constructed and completed under the power conferred by an act of parliament, but not yet begun to be used for the conveyance of passengers, but only for the carriage of materials and workmen, was held to be within the English Act against mischief on railways. (5)

284. Negligently causing bodily injury to any person.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who, by any unlawful act, or by doing negligently or omitting to do any act which it is his duty to do, causes grievous bodily injury to any other person. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 252.

A corporation cannot be indicted for manslaughter, but it may be indicted under this section, 284, for having caused bodily injury by an omission to maintain in a safe condition a bridge which it was its duty to maintain, and this, notwithstanding that death ensued at once to the person injured. (6)

285. Injuring persons by furious driving.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who, having the charge of any carriage or vehicle, by wanton or furious driving, or racing or other wilful misconduct, or by wilful neglect, does or causes to be done any bodily harm to any person. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 253.

286. Impeding shipwrecked person.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to seven years' imprisonment,—

(a) who prevents or impedes, or endeavors to prevent or impede, any shipwrecked person in his endeavor to save his life; or,

(b) who without reasonable cause prevents or impedes, or endeavors to prevent or impede, any person in his endeavor to save the life of any shipwrecked person. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 254; 56 V., c. 32, s. 1.

Under section 2[25] the term "shipwrecked person" includes "any person belonging to, on board of or having quitted any vessel wrecked, stranded, or in distress at any place in Canada."

287. Unguarded holes in ice, and unguarded mines out of use.—Every one is guilty of an offence and liable, on summary conviction, to a fine or imprisonment with or without hard labor, or both, who,—

(a) cuts or makes, or causes to be cut or made, any hole, opening, aperture or place, of sufficient size or area to endanger human life, through the ice on any navigable or other water open to or frequented by the public, and leaves such hole, opening, aperture or place, while it is in a state dangerous to human life, whether the same is frozen over or not, uninclosed by bushes or trees or unguarded by a guard or fence, of sufficient height and strength to prevent any person from accidentally riding, driving, walking, skating or falling therein; or,

(b) being the owner, manager or superintendent of any abandoned or unused mine or quarry or property upon or in which there is any excavation of a sufficient area and depth to endanger human life, leaves the same unguarded and uninclosed by a guard or fence of sufficient height and strength to prevent any person from accidentally riding, driving, walking or falling therein; or,

(c) omits within five days after conviction of any such offence to so guard or inclose the same or to construct around or over such exposed opening or excavation a guard or fence of such height and strength.

2. Every one whose duty it is to guard such hole, opening, aperture or place is guilty of manslaughter if any person loses his life by accidentally falling therein while the same is so unguarded or uninclosed. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 255.

288. Sending unseaworthy ships to sea.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to five years' imprisonment who sends, or attempts to send, or is a party to sending, a ship registered in Canada to sea, or on a voyage on any of the inland waters of Canada, or on a voyage from any port or place on the inland waters of Canada to any port or place on the inland waters of the United States, or on a voyage from any port or place on the inland waters of the United States to any port or place on the inland waters of Canada in such an unseaworthy state, by reason of overloading or underloading or improper loading, or by reason of being insufficiently manned, or from any other cause, that the life of any person is likely to be endangered thereby, unless he proves that he used all reasonable means to ensure her being sent to sea or on such voyage in a seaworthy state, or that her going to sea or on such voyage in such unseaworthy state was, under the circumstances, reasonable and justifiable. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 256; 56 V., c. 32, s. 1.

No person can be prosecuted for any offence under this section without the consent of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. (Sec. 595, post).

289. Taking unseaworthy ships to sea.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to five years' imprisonment who, being the master of a ship registered in Canada, knowingly takes such ship to sea, or on a voyage on any of the inland waters of Canada, or on a voyage from any port or place on the inland waters of Canada to any port or place on the inland waters of the United States, or on a voyage from any port or place in the United States to any port or place on the inland waters of Canada, in such an unseaworthy state, by reason of overloading or underloading or improper loading, or by reason of being insufficiently manned, or from any other cause, that the life of any person is likely to be endangered thereby, unless he proves that her going to sea or on such voyage in such unseaworthy state was, under the circumstances, reasonable and justifiable. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 257.

The Imperial Merchants Shipping Act, 1894, (termed, in the Imperial Merchants Shipping Act, 1906, the "principal Act"), makes it, (by section 457 thereof), a misdemeanor to send or to take to sea a British ship in an unseaworthy state; and, by subsection 3, it is provided that, in the case of a prosecution under that section in a British possession, it can only be brought by or with the consent of the Governor thereof.

Assaults.

290. Assault defined.—An assault is the act of intentionally applying force to the person of another, directly or indirectly, or attempting or threatening, by any act or gesture, to apply force to the person of another, if the person making the threat has, or causes the other to believe, upon reasonable grounds, that he has present ability to effect his purpose, and in either case, without the consent of the other or with such consent, if it is obtained by fraud. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 258.

The following are given as examples of what amounts to an assault, namely; striking at another with a cane, stick or the fist, although the person striking misses his aim; (1) drawing a sword or bayonet, or throwing a bottle or glass with intent to strike; presenting a loaded gun at a man who is within the distance to which the gun will carry; (2) pointing a pitchfork at him when within reach of it. A person, who presents a firearm, which he knows to be unloaded, at another, who does not know that it is unloaded, and so near that it might produce injury, if it were loaded and went off, commits an assault. (3) (See section 122, ante, which makes this a substantive offence punishable by $100 fine).

It has been held that a magistrate has no right to order the medical examination of the person of a prisoner, and that, therefore, such an examination, pursuant to such an order, of the person of a female, in custody, charged with concealment of birth, and made against her consent, was an assault. (4)

If a medical man unnecessarily strip a female patient naked, under pretence that he cannot otherwise judge of her illness, it is an assault. (5)

If A advance, in a threatening attitude, towards B, to strike him, and he is stopped just before he is near enough for his blow to take effect, it is an assault. (6)

The following are also examples of what, under the above section, would be an assault, and what, under the common law, would amount to a battery, namely; any touching or laying hold (however trifling) of another's body or clothes, in an angry, revengeful, rude, insolent or hostile manner; (7) as for instance, thrusting or pushing him, in anger; holding him by the arm; spitting in his face; jostling him out of the way; pushing another man aginst him; (8) throwing a squib at him; striking a horse upon which he is riding, whereby he is thrown. (9)

A blow struck in anger or which is intended or likely to do corporal hurt is a criminal assault, notwithstanding the consent to fight of the person struck. (10)

By consenting to commit a breach of the peace, persons cannot take away the criminal nature of the act, as their consent can in no way affect the rights of the public, and an assault being a breach of the peace the consent of the person struck is immaterial. (10*a*)

It is a good defence to prove that the alleged assault happened by misadventure. Thus, if a horse run away with his rider and run against a man, it would be no assault and the rider would not be punishable, unless he were guilty of some culpable negligence. (10*b*)

It is a good defence to prove that the alleged assault happened whilst the defendant was engaged in an amicable contest, as, some sport or game which was not unlawful nor dangerous. (1)

It is likewise a good defence to prove that the alleged assault was merely the lawful and moderate correction of a child by its parent, or of a servant by his master, or of a scholar by his teacher. (2)

See ante, p. 272, et seq., as to self-defence, etc.

The defendant may justify an assault by proving that he committed it in defence of his possession, as, for instance, to restrain the prosecutor from taking his goods, or to remove the prosecutor out of the defendant's house, or to prevent him from entering it, provided the force used in any of these cases be no more than is necessary. (3)

In the case of a trespass, without actual force, the owner of the close, etc., or the occupier or possessor of a house, etc., must first request the trespasser to depart before he can justify laying his hand on him for the purpose of removing him; and even, after refusal, he can only justify such force as is necessary to effect his removal; but, if the trespasser use force, then the owner or possessor may oppose force to force. (4)

As to justification of peace officers using force in making arrests, serving process, etc., see sections 39 et seq. ante.

A conviction upon a charge of assault tried by a magistrate under section 732, post, and the payment of the fine thereby imposed, will constitute under section 734, post, a bar to a civil action for damages for such assault; and the damage to clothing or loss of property from the person, by reason of the assault, does not constitute a cause of action distinguishable from the civil action for assault, and any claim in respect of such injury or loss will likewise be barred where section 734, post, applies. (5)

Section 734, post, does not apply to bar a civil action for assault after conviction and payment of the fine, where such conviction is by a petit jury on a trial upon an indictment. (6)

Where an accused acted in the bonâ fide belief that he had been swindled and in the belief that he was entitled to retake the money, committed an assault for that purpose alone, and did retake the money, or a portion of it, in that sole and bonâ fide belief, the jury on consideration of the facts would be justified in acquitting on a charge of robbery, although it was open to them, on the same facts, to convict for assault. 291, infra), two months,—is not invalid, unless there is reasonable probability of the sixty days term being, in the particular case, more than two months; but it was held, on the contrary, by Russell, J., that, it being possible that the prisoner might be detained in gaol for a longer period than if the sentence had been for two months the conviction was bad and the prisoner was entitled to be discharged on habeas corpus. (8)

291. Common assaults—Punishment.—Every one who commits a common assault is guilty of an indictable offence and liable, if convicted upon an indictment, to one year's imprisonment, or to a fine not exceeding one hundred dollars, and on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding twenty dollars and costs, or to two months' imprisonment with or without hard labor. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 265

See comments under section 290, ante.

Under the provisions of Part XVI., post, (sections 771-799), magistrates are empowered, under certain circumstances, and under certain conditions, to try, summarily, persons charged with certain indictable offences,—the consent of the accused being required in some cases, and, in some cases, not. Amongst the indictable offences thus subject, under Part XVI., to summary trial, are included cases of aggravated assault, indecent assault, etc., as will be seen by section 773, post.

By sections 790-792, post, it is provided, in reference to these summary trials of indictable offences, that, "whenever the magistrate finds the offence not proved, he shall dismiss the charge, and make out and deliver to the person charged a certificate under his hand stating the fact of such dismissal;" that "every conviction under this part shall have the same effect as a conviction upon indictment for the same offence;" and that "every person who obtains a certificate of dismissal or is convicted under the provisions of this part, shall be released from all further or other criminal proceedings for the same cause." (8*a*)

Provisions similar to these are contained in the Imperial Statute, 42-43 Vic., c. 49. (The Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879).

Section 709, post, enacts that no justice shall hear and determine any case of assault and battery in which any title to or interest in lands or real property arises.

Provision is now made by section 732, post, that, whenever any person is charged with common assault, the justice may summarily hear and determine the charge, or may, if he thinks fit, deal with it as an indictable offence.

By sections 733 and 734, post, (which are similar, in effect, to sections 44 and 45 of the English Statute, 24-25 Vic., c. 100), it is enacted that: "If the justice, upon the hearing of any case of assault or battery upon the merits where the complaint is preferred by or on behalf of the person aggrieved, under the next preceding section, deems the offence not to be proved, or finds the assault or battery to have been justified, or so trifling as not to merit any punishment, and accordingly dismisses the complaint, he shall forthwith make out a certificate under his hand stating the fact of such dismissal, and shall deliver such certificate to the person against whom the complaint was preferred;" and that "If the person against whom any such complaint has been preferred, by or on behalf of the person aggrieved, obtains such certificate, or, having been convicted, pays the whole amount adjudged to be paid, or suffers the imprisonment, or imprisonment with hard labor, awarded, he shall be released from all further or other proceedings, civil or criminal, for the same cause."

(8) R. v. Brindley, 12 Can. Cr. Cas., 170.
(8*a*) See Clarke v. Rutherford, 5 Can. Cr. Cas., 13.

The certificate of dismissal can only be granted when there has been a full hearing upon the merits. If the certificate is granted on a withdrawal of the charge, before hearing, it will be no bar to subsequent proceedings for the same assault. (9)

The effect of the certificate of dismissal, when granted, on an acquittal, or, of payment of the penalty or suffering the punishment imposed, on a conviction, as the case may be, is to release the defendant from all other proceedings for the same cause.

It has been held, in England, that the meaning and intent of the enactments above mentioned, in connection with summary trials, is that when a case so summarily dealt with has been dismissed by the magistrate or justice, on its merits, the defendant has the right, ex debito justitiæ, to receive from the magistrate or justice, the certificate of dismissal, and that the clause which refers to the making out of the certificate, and which contains the word forthwith, means that such certificate is to be made out forthwith on the defendant making application for it. (10)

A summary conviction for assault has, accordingly, been held to be a bar to a subsequent indictment for a felonious stabbing based on the same transaction: (1) and it has been held a bar to an indictment for unlawful wounding and an assault occasioning actual bodily harm, arising out of the same circumstances. (2)

A summary conviction for assault has, however, been held not to be a bar to a subsequent indictment for manslaughter, in a case where the man, who was assaulted, afterwards died in consequence of the assault. (3)

It appears that the production of the certificate of dismissal is of itself sufficient evidence of such dismissal, without proof of the signature of the magistrate or justice: (4) and if the defendant appeared before the magistrate or justice, the recital, in the certificate, of the fact of a complaint having been made and of a summons having been issued, is sufficient evidence of these facts without producing the complaint or summons. (5)

As already seen, the consent of the accused is required in order to give a magistrate jurisdiction to summarily dispose of some of the indictable offences mentoned in section 773. But with regard to some others of such offences,—e.g., charges against persons for being keepers or inmates or habitual frequenters of disorderly houses,—the magistrate's summary jurisdiction is, by section 774, post, made absolute and independent of the consent of the accused.

Section 785 also makes the magistrate's summary jurisdiction absolute and independent of any consent, in regard to all the offences mentioned in section 773, in cases in which "any person who being a seafaring person and only transiently in Canada, and having no permanent domicile therein, is charged, either within the city of Quebec as limited for the purpose of police ordinance, or within the City of Montreal as so limited, or in any other seaport city or town in Canada where there is such magistrate, with the commission therein of any of the offences hereinbefore mentioned, (6) and also in the case of any other person charged with any such offence on the complaint of any such seafaring person whose testimony is essential to the proof of the offence."

(6) The offences, here referred to, include,—as already shewn, ante, p. 314,—aggravated assaults, indecent assaults, etc. But see full list of these offences in section 773, itself, post.

Section 776, moreover, provides that "the jurisdiction of the magistrate in the provinces of British Columbia, Prince Edward Island, Saskatchewan and Alberta, and in the Northwest Territories and Yukon Territory under this Part, is absolute without the consent of the party charged except in cases coming within the provisions of section 777 and except in cases under sections 782 and 783, where the person charged is not a person who under section 775 can be tried summarily without his consent.

292. Indecent assault on female.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment, and to be whipped, who,—

(a) indecently assaults any female; or

(b) does anything to any female by her consent which but for such consent would be an indecent assault, if such consent is obtained by false and fraudulent representations as to the nature and quality of the act. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 259.

(c) assaults and beats his wife or any other female and thereby occasions her actual bodily harm. (Added by the Criminal Code Amendment Act, 1909, 8-9 Ed. VII., c. 9, s. 2).

If, on an indictment for an indecent assault, it appears that the woman consented to the assault, under circumstances shewing that the consent was obtained by fraud, such consent will constitute no defence; such a case being expresly provided for by sub-section (b) of the above section. (7)

In the case of R. v. Case, the facts were these. Case, a medical man, had connection with a girl fourteen years of age under the pretence that he was thereby treating her medically for the complaint for which he was attending her, she making no resistance solely from the bonâ fide belief that such was the case.

It was held that this was certainly an indecent assault, and probably a rape.

It is well settled that in a criminal charge arising out of a rape, or an attempt at rape, or an indecent assault, evidence of the prosecutrix's general reputation for chastity is admissible as bearing upon the question of consent, but that evidence of specific acts of lewdness and unchastity with other men than the accused is not admissible. If she be asked as to them she cannot be compelled to answer, and, if she does answer and denies them, her answer will be conclusive. She cannot be contradicted. So that where on the trial of an indictment for an indecent assault, the prosecutrix denied, on cross-examination, having had intercourse with a third person named to her, it was held that such third person could not be called to contradict her upon the answer. (8) If, however, on cross-examination, the prosecutrix denies having had previous intercourse with the accused, evidence may, in that case, be given to contradict her. (9) in the case of any charge under sections 301 or 302, of carnally knowing or attempting to carnally know a girl under fourteen; and see section 16 of the Canada Evidence Act, 1906, post, which extends the power of receiving the evidence of a child of tender years, without oath, to all other legal proceedings.

Although section 292 prescribes, as the punishment for indecent assault, both imprisonment and whipping, the Court has the right, in the exercise of its discretion, under section 1028, post, to impose only the imprisonment without the whipping. (10)

It is not essential, in all cases of indecent assault, that complaint should have been made at the earliest opportunity after the offence, and, under special circumstances, evidence may be received of such complaint made after the lapse of several days. Thus, the fact of the girl being only seven years of age, that the act was committed without violence and that the girl did not realize the serious nature of the act, are circumstances which make a complaint made ten days afterwards admissible in evidence. (1)

293. Indecent assaults on males.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to ten years' imprisonment and to be whipped, who assaults any person with intent to commit sodomy, or who, being a male, indecently assaults any other male person. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 260; 56 V., c. 32, s. 1.

294. Consent of child under fourteen no defence.—It is no defence to a charge or indictment for any indecent assault on a young person under the age of fourteen years to prove that he or she consented to the act of indecency. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 261.

This section applies to all offences, which include an indecent assault, committed either upon male or female children.

295. Assaults occasioning bodily harm.—Every one who commits any assault which occasions actual bodily harm is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to three years' imprisonment. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 262.

A defendant was convicted under sections 20 and 47, respectively, of the English Statute, 24-25 Vict., c. 100, upon an indictment charging him, in one count, with "unlawfully and maliciously inflicting grievous bodily harm" upon his wife, and, in the other count, with "an assault" upon her "occasioning actual bodily harm." It appeared that, at a time when the defendant knew, but his wife did not know, that he was suffering from venereal disease, he had connection with her, that, as a result, the disease was communicated to her, and that, had she been aware of his condition, she would not have submitted to the intercourse. The case was tried in the Central Criminal Court; the trial Judge being the Recorder of London, who directed the jury that, if the facts were proved to their satisfaction, they might find the defendant guilty on either count, notwithstanding that the prosecutrix was his wife. After the conviction, a case was stated and reserved for the consideration of all the Judges, before thirteen of whom it was fully argued on the question of whether the prisoner could be legally found guilty on either or both of the counts,—the result being that the conviction was quashed, nine of the Judges,—namely, Lord Coleridge, C.J., Pollock and Huddleston, B.B., Stephen, Manisty, Mathew, A. L. Smith, Wills and Grantham, JJ. — holding (on the ground, apparently, of the prosecutrix being the defendant's wife), that the conduct of the defendant did not constitute an offence under either of the above sections of the English Statute (Field, Hawkins, Day and Charles, JJ., dissenting). (2)

It is not clear whether the decision in this Clarence case overruled the cases of R. v. Bennett and R. v. Sinclair,—in the former of which an uncle was indicted for an indecent assault upon his niece, he being diseased and she being ignorant thereof, and in which it was held, by Willes, J., that an assault is within the rule that fraud vitiates consent, and that, therefore, the prisoner, knowing that he had a foul disease, having induced his niece, (who was ignorant of his condition), to sleep with him, and having infected her, any consent given by her was vitiated by his concealment of his condition, and that he was guilty of an indecent assault,—(3) and, in the latter of which cases, the prisoner, being diseased, had connection with a girl who was ignorant of his being diseased, and having communicated the disease to her, he also was convicted of an indecent assault. (4) But the remarks of some of the Judges in the Clarence case seem to shew that they doubted the soundness of the principle upon which these two cases of R. v. Bennett and R. v. Sinclair, were decided.

On a charge of assault occasioning actual bodily harm the defence was self-defence. In his evidence the accused said: "I told the prosecutor to mind his own business. He offered to fight me and aimed at me a blow which missed, but my blow felled him to the ground." The Judge in summing up to the jury said: "If a person in defending himself comes into contact with the other person and causes him an injury he is not responsible, but no one has a right to return blow for blow. The accused was convicted and appealed. Held, that the proper direction would have been that if the jury believed that the prosecutor aimed a blow at the accused and missed him, the accused was not limited to warding off the blow but might be justified in striking the prosecutor, if it was reasonably necessary for self-defence, and that, as the jury were wrongly directed, the conviction must be quashed. (5)

296. Aggravated assaults.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who—

(a) assaults any person with intent to commit any indictable offence; or,

(b) assaults any public or peace officer engaged in the execution of his duty, or any person acting in aid of such officer; or,

(c) assaults any person with intent to resist or prevent the lawful apprehension or detainer of himself, or of any other person, for any offence; or,

(d) assaults any person in the lawful execution of any process against any lands or goods, or in making any lawful distress or seizure, or with intent to rescue any goods taken under such process, distress or seizure; or,

(c) on any day whereon any poll for an election, parliamentary or municipal, is being proceeded with, within the distance of two miles from the place where such poll is taken or held, assaults or beats any person. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 263; 57-58 V., c. 57, s. 1.

In the case of an assault upon a public or peace officer, the fact that the accused did not know that the person assaulted was a peace officer, or that such officer was acting in the execution of his duty, will be no defence. (5*a*)

As to resisting or wilfully obstructing a public officer in the execution of his duty, see section 168, ante; and, as to resisting or wilfully obstructing any peace officer in the execution of his duty, or any person in the lawful execution of any process against any lands or goods or in making any lawful distress or seizure, see section 169, ante, and authorities there cited.

For the distinction between "public officer" and "peace officer" see section 2, sub-sections 26 and 29, ante.

297. Kidnapping.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to twenty-five years' imprisonment who, without lawful authority,—

(a) kidnaps any other person with intent

(i) to cause such other person to be secretly confined or imprisoned in Canada against his will, or

(ii) to cause such other person to be unlawfully sent or transported out of Canada against his will, or

(iii) to cause such other person to be sold or captured as a slave, or in any way held to service against his will; or,

(b) forcibly seize or confines or imprisons any other person within Canada.

2. Upon the trial of any offence under this section the non-resistance of a person so unlawfully kidnapped or confined shall not be a defence unless it appears that it was not caused by threats, duress or force, or exhibition of force. 63-64 V., c. 46, s. 3. (As amended by the Criminal Code Amendment Act, 1909, 8-9 Ed. VII., c. 9, s. 2).

Under this section there are two separate and distinct offences, namely, (a), the offence of kidnapping, and (b), the offence of unlawful and forcible seizure and imprisonment.

(5*a*) R. v. Forbes, 10 Cox, 362; R. v. Maxwell, 73 J. P., 176.

The terms kidnapping and criminal false imprisonment do not differ greatly in signification; yet they are not so far identical as to justify the treating of the two offences as one. (6)

FALSE IMPRISONMENT is any unlawful restraint of one's liberty effected either by physical force actually applied or so threatened or exhibited as to overpower the will. There need be no manual touch; but force of some sort must be used, and there must be a detention against the will; and it is indispensable that these two circumstances should unite. (7) The offence was a misdemeanor at common law. (8)

KIDNAPPING is a false imprisonment aggravated by either secretly confining or intending to secretly confine the victim, or conveying or intending to convey the victim to some other place.

Blackstone defines kidnapping to be "the forcible abduction or stealing away of a man, woman or child from their own country and sending them into another." (9) But it has been held that transportation to a foreign country is not a necessary part of the defence. (10)

The difference between a criminal false imprisonment and kidnapping appears to be this, that the latter is not only an unlawful and forcible detention of a person against his will, but a removal of him or an intention to remove him beyond the reach of his country's laws, by secretly confining him within his own country or by sending him away into foreign parts.

The expression "kidnapper" seems to have been derived from "kid,"—the slang name for a child,—and "nappee," (Danish), signifying to snatch at: and originally meant, one who snatches at children, or "kids." (1)

At common law, kidnapping, or the stealing and carrying away or secreting of any person was an offence formerly punishable by fine, imprisonment, and the pillory. (2)

By the Roman law plagium (manstealing or kidnapping), was the abduction or stealing of a free person, or of the slave of another. By the Lex Fabia the penalty was a pecuniary one; but, after the crime of kidnapping became common, the punishment was increased to banishment, and, in some cases, was capital. (3)

Under the old Jewish law, manstealing was punishable with death. (4)

The question sometimes arises, in connection with the law of extradition, as to the right to kidnap, and the effect of kidnapping, in a foreign state, a person who has taken flight after committing a crime in his own country, and of forcibly bringing him back to the country from whose justice he has escaped.

A case of this kind came up in the Supreme Court of the United States upon an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Illinois confirming a conviction upon an indictment for larceny.

After the commission of the offence in Illinois the prisoner, Frederick M. Ker, fled to and was subsequently kidnapped in Peru and forcibly brought back against his will into Illinois and there tried and convicted of the offence with which he was charged, the Supreme Court of Illinois holding that it could give him no relief in respect of the kidnapping, that the treaties of extradition made by the United States do not guarantee a fugitive from one country an asylum in another but merely make provision that for certain crimes he shall be surrendered to justice in the modes prescribed by the treaties, and that the remedy for a trespass committed by a kidnapper unauthorized by and not professing to act under any authority from either government would be either by an action of damages at the instance of the injured party or by a proceeding against such kidnapper by the government whose law he had violated, which, in this case, would be the government of Peru, who could have the kidnapper extradited to Peru and tried there for a violation of its laws; and the decision of the Illinois Supreme Court was confirmed by the United States Supreme Court. Unlawful Carnal Knowledge.

298. Rape defined.—Rape is the act of a man having carnal knowledge of a woman who is not his wife without her consent, or with consent which has been extorted by threats or fear of bodily harm, or obtained by personating the woman's husband, or by false and fraudulent representations as to the nature and quality of the act.

2. No one under the age of fourteen years can commit this offence. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 266.

Carnal knowledge is complete upon penetration to any, even the slightest degree, and even without the emission of seed. (Section 7, ante.)

299. Punishment for rape.—Every one who commits rape is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to suffer death or to imprisonment for life. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 267.

With reference to rape committed by personating a woman's husband, section 4 of the English Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (48-49 Vict., c. 69), is as follows:—

"Whereas doubts have been entertained whether a man who induces a married woman to permit him to have connection with her by personating her husband is or is not guilty of rape, it is hereby enacted and declared that every such offender shall be deemed to be guilty of rape."

It seems to have always been the law, as stated now in sub-section 2 of the above section 298 of our Code, that no one under the age of fourteen years can commit a rape. The law presumes a boy under the age of fourteen years of age to be incapable of committing a rape; (1) and no evidence can be admitted against him to shew that he has, in fact, attained the full state of puberty and was capable of committing the crime. (2)

A husband, too, is legally incapable of committing a rape upon his wife; (3) but a husband may be punished for aiding in the commission of rape upon his wife by another man; (4) and so may a boy under fourteen be punished, as a principal, for aiding another in the commission of the offence, (5), or for having aided and assisted another to commit the offence of carnally knowing a girl under fourteen, or to commit an assault with intent to commit a rape, or he may be convicted of having committed a common assault, (6), or an indecent assault. (7)

The act of carnal connection must, in order to be rape, have been done without the woman's consent, unless her consent thereto was obtained by threats or fear of bodily harm or by the false personation or fraud mentioned in the above section, 298.

It has been held, therefore, that if the connection took place when the woman was in a state of insensibility from liquor with which she was made drunk by the accused (though the liquor was given only to excite her), it was rape. (8)

Ether or chloroform administered to a woman and overcoming her mental and physical nature, will have the same effect in law as administering intoxicating liquor. In an Ohio case, Lawrence, J., laid it down that where a woman has chloroform given her by a man, for the purpose of obtaining with her carnal intercourse to which she would not otherwise consent, then if she "had the capacity to hear, feel and remember, and a capacity to speak and forcibly resist, but the inclination to do so was lost, the will overcome by the action of chloroform, either operating upon the will faculty, or the judgment and reflective faculties (or sexual emotions), so that the mind was thereby incapable of fairly comprehending the nature and consequence of sexual intercourse, and the defendant, knowing these facts, had unlawful carnal knowledge of her, forcibly, that would be rape. And it would, in such a case, be wholly immaterial whether the entire mind was disordered and overthrown, or only such faculties thereof as are rendered incapable of having just conceptions, and drawing therefrom correct conclusions in relation to the alleged rape." (9)

It has also been held that, where a man got into bed to a woman while she was asleep, and, he knowing she was asleep, had connection with her while in that state, he was guilty of rape. (10)

Where a medical man, by pretending to be treating, medically, a young girl under fourteen, had connection with her, she being led to believe that it was part of the treatment, the prisoner was held to be guilty of an indecent assault. (1) It would now be a rape under section 298 of our Code, and it was so held to be, in a case (decided in England after the case of R. v Case), in which the prosecutrix, a girl of nineteen, had consulted the prisoner, a quack doctor, as to her illness, and he, under pretence of performing a surgical operation, had connection with her, she submitting under the belief that he was merely performing the surgical operation, and that belief being wilfully and fraudulently induced by the prisoner. (2) But later on, it has been held, in England, that the effect of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, is to set aside the decision in R. v. Flattery, and that it is a good defence, there, to an indictment for rape that the carnal knowledge alleged was had with the woman's consent, even though such consent was obtained by fraud; but that under such circumstances the prisoner may be convicted of indecent assault. (3)

The following are some of the older definitions of rape:—

EAST.—"Rape is the unlawful carnal knowledge of a woman by force and against her will." (4)

COKE.—In the second Institute, gives the following, from the Mirror: "Rape is when a man hath carnal knowledge of a woman by force and against her will." (5)

HALE.—"Rape is the carnal knowledge of any woman above the age of ten years against her will, and of a woman-child under the age of ten years with or against her will." (6)

HAWKINS.—"It seems that rape is an offence in having unlawful and carnal knowledege of a woman by force and againse her will." (7)

BLACKSTONE.—Rape is "the carnal knowledge of a woman forcibly and against her will." (8)

RUSSELL.—"Rape has been defined to be the having unlawful and carnal knowledge of a woman by force and against her will." (9)

These definitions and some of the judicial constructions placed upon the words, "forcibly" and "against her will," have helped to produce the common notion that, to constitute a rape, there must have been desperate resistance on the part of the woman and the employment of overpowering force on the part of the man.

The present definition as contained in the above section, 298, namely "the act of carnally knowing a woman, without her consent," is much better calculated to meet the ends of justice than the old definitions. Bishop argues the matter out, as follows:—

"While, thus, [during sleep], there may be rape of a woman who does not resist, one in the normal condition, awake, mentally competent, and not in fear, will oppose with a vehemence and by measures varying with her special nature and the particular circumstances, this greatest of all outrages, unless she mentally consent. So that, though in words she objects, if she makes no outcry and no resistance, she, by her conduct, consents, and there is no rape. (10) In just principle, it is believed that the extent and form of the resistance should in each case be shewn to the jury, who, weighing this evidence with the rest, will find as of fact whether or not the woman consented. But the question seems commonly to be treated by the Courts as a question of law, and they often lay it down that the resistance must be to the extent of the woman's ability. (1) Some of the cases, both old and modern, are quite too favorable to the ravishers of female virtue. Thus, where a man locked his servant girl of fourteen in a barn and had connection with her, a verdict for rape was set aside because the Judge at the trial refused to direct the jury that to convict they must be satisfied she 'resisted the defendant to the extent of her ability,' though he did tell them that 'the act must have been done by force and against her will and resistance.' Said the learned Judge in the Court of Appeals: 'The resistance must be up to the point of being overpowered by actual force, or of inability from loss of strength, longer to resist, or, from the number of persons attacking, resistance must be dangerous or absolutely useless, or there must be dread or fear of death.' (2) Various other cases state that the woman's will must oppose the act, and that any inclination favoring it is fatal to the prosecution. The latter terms are not under the ordinary facts repugnant to good doctrine. And the stronger ones just quoted might not be very objectionable in a barbarous age; but, in our age, to compel a frail woman, or girl of fourteen, to abandon her reason, and measure all her strength with a robust man, knowing the effect will be to make her present deplorable condition the more wretched, yet not to preserve her virtue,—on pain of being otherwise deemed a prostitute instead of the victim of an outrage,—is asking too much of virtue and giving too much to vice. The text of the law, we have seen, and, it is believed, the better judicial doctrine, requires only that the case shall be one in which the woman did not consent. Her resistance must not be a 'mere pretence, but in good faith." (3)

As penetration to the slightest degree is sufficient to constitute carnal knowledge, a penetration of such depth as not to injure the hymen was held sufficient to constitute a rape. (4)

When actual penetration is not proved the defendant may, nevertheless, on an indictment for rape be found guilty,—by virtue of section 949, post, —of an attempt to commit a rape, or he may be convicted of an indecent assault, or of a common assault. (See section 951, post.)

An indictment charged A with rape, and B as an abettor. The jury found A guilty of an attempt at rape and B of aiding A in the attempt; and the conviction was affirmed. (5)

It is no excuse that the woman consented at first, if the offence was afterwards actually committed by force or against her will. (6) Even that the woman was a common strumpet, or the mistress of the ravisher, is no excuse; (7) although such circumstances as these should, certainly, operate strongly with the jury as to the probability or improbability of the fact that connection was had against the woman's consent.

Although the party who complains of being ravished is a competent witness upon every part of the case, the credibility of her evidence is a matter for the jury to appreciate according to the circumstances. If she be of good reputation and if she make known the offence and seek out the offender without delay, or if the accused take flight, all such circumstances as these will help the probability of her evidence. If on the other hand her reputation is bad, and her evidence be uncorroborated by the testimony of other witnesses; if the place where the alleged outrage took place was one where she might have made herself heard, and she made no outcry; these will have a tendency to throw doubt on her evidence; especially if she be flatly contradicted by the accused, who is, under the Canada Evidence Act, a competent witness.

The defendant may adduce evidence to shew that the woman is of notoriously bad character, unchaste, and of indecent habits, or that she is a common prostitute; or to shew that she has previously had carnal connection with the defendant of her own free will; (8) but he cannot adduce evidence, of other particular acts with other persons, so as to impeach her chastity. If asked on cross-examination whether, outside of the prisoner, she has had carnal connection with other men, named to her in the questions, and if she deny having had any such intercourse with them, her answer will be conclusive and those men cannot be called to contradict her. (10)

Although section 211, ante, makes it an indictable offence merely to have carnal connection with a girl between the ages of fourteen and sixteen years, even with her consent, an indictment for the graver offence of rape will lie against one who ravishes such a girl, or has carnal connection with her, without her consent. (1)

The words "man" and "woman" used in section 298, are to be taken in a general or generic sense, as indicating all males and all females of the human race, and not in a limited sense as opposed to boys and girls; and it has been held that an indictment for rape lies against one who has ravished a female under fourteen against her will, notwithstanding the provisions of section 301, post, which enacts that every man is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for life and to be whipped who carnally knows (that is to say, with her consent), any girl under the age of fourteen years not being his wife. (2)

A woman may be indicted for rape, as a principal, when she has aided and abetted a man in the commission of the offence. A man and his wife were indicted jointly for a rape committed upon a girl under the age of thirteen. The girl, who was the domestic servant of the two prisoners, was sent out by them for a quantity of whiskey. All three partook of the whiskey, the girl being forced by the female prisoner to drink. The male prisoner then went upstairs to bed. Shortly afterwards the female prisoner forcibly took the girl up to the man's bedroom and the man had forcible connection with the girl. Held, that both prisoners were guilty of rape. (3)

A prosecution for rape is a prosecution in fact for any of the offences of which the accused on an indictment for rape may be found guilty. So that, although it is, by section 5 of the English Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, provided that a prosecution for the offence of having or attempting to have carnal knowledge of a girl above thirteen and under sixteen shall not be commenced more than three months after the commission of the offence, it has been held that a prisoner who was, within three months, accused of rape and committed for trial on that charge, may be indicted for and tried and convicted of carnally knowing the prosecutrix, a girl above thirteen and under sixteen, although when the indictment went before the Grand Jury more than three months had elapsed since the commission of the offence. (4)

Where a defendant was charged in the first count of an indictment with carnally knowing a girl between thirteen and sixteen, and, in the second count, with an indecent assault upon the girl, it was held that the defendant could be convicted of a common assault. (5)

In ordinary cases of rape, when a prosecutrix describes the outrage in her sworn testimony as a witness, evidence of her complaints made soon after the occurrence of the outrage is properly admissible to shew her credit and the accuracy of her recollection. (6)

Where the complainant has made a statement to a third party, not in the presence of the accused, such statement may be given in evidence, provided it is shewn to have been made at the first opportunity which reasonably offered itself after the commission of the offence, and has not been elicited by questions of a leading and inducing or intimidating nature. (6*a*)

A prosecutrix gave evidence that the prisoner came to a room in an inn where she was barmaid, when she was alone, committed a rape upon her, and then left the house, and that, an hour and a half afterwards, a customer came in, and that to this customer she made a complaint mentioning the prisoner's name in connection with it; and Baron Bramwell allowed her to give evidence of the particulars of what she told the customer and also allowed the customer to give evidence in detail of the prosecutrix's complaint to such customer. (7)

Upon the trial of an indictment for rape or other kindred offences against women or girls, the fact that a complaint was made by the prosecutrix shortly after the alleged outrage and the particulars of such complaint may so far as they relate to the charge be given in evidence, on the part of the prosecution, not as being evidence of the truth of the charge against the defendant, but as being evidence of the consistency of the prosecutrix's conduct with the story told by her in the witness box and as negativing consent on her part; and therefore the whole of her complaint ought to be given in evidence. (8)

The prosecutrix's complaint should, in order to be admissible in evidence, be a complaint made as soon as possible after the occurrence. The first person met by the prosecutrix after the occurrence would seem to be the proper person to whom such complaint should be made. (9)

Evidence of a complaint made by the woman on a charge of rape as corroborative of non-consent will be rejected if her complaint was made only in answer to questions suggesting the guilt of the accused. (10)

Where, on a charge of rape, it was sought to give in evidence statements made by the prosecutrix to a police officer on the day following the alleged outrage, the police officer having called upon her with reference to the matter, it was held that the evidence was inadmissible, it being considered that the statements of the woman to the police officer were not made as the unstudied outcome of the woman's feelings nor as speedily after the occurrence as could be reasonably expected, it appearing that she had made no complaint of the actual rape, but merely of an assault, to two women who had happened to come to the scene of the occurrence just after it had happened, and she having moreover made no complaint to her own husband before the police officer called upon her. (10*a*)

In an English case of recent date, a similar lapse of time,—namely, one day,—was held to be a sufficient reason for excluding the details of a complaint, the Court remarking that the lapse of time between the commission of the offence and the making of the complaint was very important in these cases. (1)

But it has since been held in a case of rape tried at Montreal that, while the injured person should make her complaint as soon as possible after the commission of the offence, yet no specified time is fixed therefor, by law, and that the fact that the prosecutrix made a complaint to her mother seven days after the alleged offence and the details of such complaint were admissible as evidence for the prosecution to confirm the prosecutrix's testimony and disprove consent on her part, and that, among the particulars of the complaint, the name of the person accused by her of the offence could be stated; the Court considering that there is no settled rule as to how recent the complaint must be made, and that in the present case it was sufficiently recent in view of the fact that the prosecutrix, a girl of eighteen, had given,—as a very natural reason,—her bashfulness, for not complaining sooner, and that under the circumstances it was for the jury to weigh the time which elapsed before the complaint was made, when considering the probability of its truth. (2)

In an English case of still more recent date, it has been held that, where the girl upon whom the offence has been committed is of tender years, the complaint made by her may be admissible, although not made at the earliest opportunity. (3)

On the trial of an indictment for an attempt to commit rape, statements of the person assaulted and of her companion present at the beginning of the assault, made to the police officers some four hours after the assault, that they had given a description of the assailant, but not stating what the description was and evidence of the officers that in consequence of such description they had looked for the assailant,—were properly received, although statements of a like character had previously been made to other persons. (3*a*)

Hale tells us that, in his time, rape was a felony by statute and that it "was anciently punished by loss of life. In process of time, that punishment seemed too hard; but the truth is, a severe punishment succeeded in place thereof, namely, castration and the loss of the eyes, as appears by Bracton (who wrote in the time of Henry III.), lib. 3, c. 28. But, then, though the offender was convict at the King's suit, the woman that was ravished, if single, might, if she pleased, redeem him from the execution, if she elected him for her husband, and the offender consented thereto." (4)

Under the Roman law rape,—raptus mulierum,—was punished with death and confiscation of goods. It is said to be the general opinion of civilians that under the Roman law the offence might be committed, not only by forcible connection with a woman against her will, but by carrying off her person from her friends with a view to debauch her. (5)

As Lord Hale has said, rape is a most detestable crime and should be severely punished: but it is a crime of such a nature that an accusation can be easily made and is hard to prove, but it is still harder to be defended by a person accused of it, though he be never so innocent. (6)

Where the depositions on which the indictment for rape is founded shew that the prosecutrix's statements, relied upon by the Crown to shew that a complaint was made, were not spontaneous, but made in answer to questions by the police officer, evidence of her answers so made is inadmissible against the accused. (7)

On a charge of rape, evidence is inadmissible for the defence of the general bad reputation of the prosecutrix for unchastity. (8)

On a charge of aiding and abetting another to commit rape, if it appears that a man called as a witness for the prosecution had immediately prior to the offence been in the company of the prosecutrix under circumstances making it probable that he had had illicit connection with her, and that the man accused of the rape had taken the prosecutrix away from the witness, the witness may be cross-examined as to his relations with the prosecutrix for the purpose of shewing prejudice against the accused, and for this purpose is bound to answer whether he had had connection with the prosecutrix on that occasion. (9)

If the trial Judge allows the indictment to go generally to the jury it is not competent for him to withdraw from this consideration a verdict for any lesser offence which may be included in the indictment; and upon an indictment for rape where the charge was calculated to lead the jury to believe that if they failed to find a verdict of guilty of rape they would fall short of their plain duty and a verdict of "guilty of rape" was returned, a new trial was directed. (9*a*)

300. Attempt to commit rape—Punishment.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to seven years' imprisonment who attempts to commit rape. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 268.

An accused was committed for trial upon a charge of "unlawful assault with intent to carnally know." On the accused wishing to make election for speedy trial, the Crown contended that the charge was not one in which a speedy trial could be had, as it not only amounted, by its description in the warrant of commitment, to the charge of "attempt to commit rape," but it was the Crown's intention to indict the accused for this offence. Held, that though the charge as worded in the commitment might be either that of "assault with intent to commit an indictable offence," punishable under section 263 (now section 296), and, as such, capable of speedy trial, or that of "attempt to commit rape," punishable under section 268 (now section 300), and, as such, not capable of speedy trial, the Court refused to receive the accused's election of speedy trial and left the responsibility with the Crown of preferring an indictment for the more serious charge. (10)

Upon the trial of a charge of rape or attempt to commit rape or other kindred offences against females, the fact that a complaint was made by the complainant shortly after the alleged outrage and the particulars of such complaint may so far as they relate to the charge be given in evidence for the prosecution, not as being evidence of the truth of the charge, but as being evidence of the consistency of the complainant's conduct with the story told by her in the witness box, and as negativing consent on her part; and therefore the whole of her complaint ought to be given in evidence. (10*a*)

301. Carnally knowing girl under fourteen.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for life, and to be whipped, who carnally knows any girl under the age of fourteen years, not being his wife, whether he believes her to be of or above that age or not. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 269.

The evidence in a case under this section is the same as in a case of rape, except that the consent or non-consent of the girl is immaterial. (1)

302. Attempt to carnally know girl under fourteen.—Every one who attempts to have unlawful carnal knowledge of any girl under the age of fourteen years is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment, and to be whipped. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 270.

These two sections, 301 and 302, protect, against defilement and attempted defilement (with or without their consent), all girls under fourteen, whether of previously chaste character or not; while section 211, ante, protects against defilement (with or without their consent), all girls between the ages of fourteen and sixteen, where unchastity is not established by the accused as provided by section 210 ante.

If the defendant be indicted under section 301, he may, under section 949, post, be convicted of an attempt to commit the offence, if the evidence warrants it.

Upon a trial for either of the offences mentioned in sections 301 and 302, the jury may, under section 951, post, if the evidence points to that conclusion, return a verdict of guilty of an indecent assault or common assault, (2) even if the girl assented. (See section 294, ante.)

See section 1003, post, and the Canada Evidence Act, section 16, post, as to the evidence, without oath, of children of tender years.

The expression "not being his wife" used in section 301 is an exception, and if required to be stated in the indictment, and negatived, the omission thereof would be a defect which could be remedied by the Judge by an amendment under section 889; so that, where no objection is taken by the defendant before pleading, the omission of the words will not invalidate a conviction upon such an indictment. The objection thereto should be taken, by the defendant's counsel, before plea, by demurrer or by a motion to quash; and then the Court could have amended the indictment, and, not having done so, it was not open to him to take it subsequently. (3)

Section 4 of the Imperial Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, makes it a criminal offence to carnally know a girl under the age of thirteen years, and section 5 of the same Act relates to the punishment of any person who carnally knows, or attempts to carnally know any girl between the ages of thirteen and sixteen. And where a girl between the ages of thirteen and sixteen was convicted upon an indictment charging her with having unlawfully aided and abetted the commission upon herself, by a man, of the latter offence and with having solicited and incited its commission, it was held that the conviction was bad, as the Act was passed for the purpose of protecting young girls against being defiled with or without their consent and contained no provisions as to aiding and abetting or soliciting and inciting by girls; and the conviction was set aside. (4)

Where a boy under fourteen was indicted, under section 4 of the English Criminal Law Amendment Act, for carnally knowing a girl under the age of thirteen, it was held that, although he could not, (being under the age of fourteen), be convicted of that offence, he might nevertheless be found guilty of an indecent assault punishable under section 9 of that Act. (5)

It has been held, in England, that a prisoner may be indicted for the misdemeanor of having carnal knowledge or attempting to have carnal knowledge of a girl between the ages of thirteen and sixteen, notwithstanding that his committal for trial was on a charge of rape and notwithstanding that the misdemeanor for which he was indicted, tried and convicted was committed more than three months, (the time limited by the statute for the prosecution of the offence), before the bill of indictment was laid and found by the Grand Jury, it being further held that a prosecution for rape is a prosecution for any of the offences of which the accused on an indictment for rape may be found guilty. (6)

Notwithstanding the provisions of section 301, which protects a girl under fourteen against defilement even with her own consent, an indictment will still lie for the offence of rape upon a girl under fourteen. (7)

On the hearing of a charge under section 5 of the English Criminal Law Amendment Act, it came out in the course of the evidence that the girl (who was fifteen years of age), lived with her parents, and had informed her mother that she was enceinte by the prisoner: that thereupon the mother told her daughter to "bring him there," namely, to her parent's house, which she did, and the immoral intercourse was there repeated, the mother admitting that she had, by arrangement with her daughter, found the prisoner in the act, in order that she might obtain evidence on which to prosecute him. The Justices having adjudicated upon the case and committed the prisoner for trial, an application was then made to them for a summons against the mother, charging her, under section 6 of the Act, with being the occupier of premises and with having induced or suffered her daughter, a girl between thirteen and sixteen, to be in such premises for the purpose of being unlawfully and carnally known; and the Justices having refused the application, it was held, upon an application for a mandamus to compel the Justices to grant the summons, that the mother's conduct was not an offence under section 6 of the Act, and a mandamus was refused. (8)

On a charge of attempt to carnally know a girl under fourteen, who is too young to understand the nature of an oath, a conviction for that offence is not warranted, unless her evidence not under oath is (as required by section 1003, post), corroborated by some other material evidence implicating the accused; but the accused may be convicted of common assault upon the charge so laid, if there be,—as required by section 16 of the Canada Evidence Act,—corroboration, merely, by some other material evidence; the words "implicating the accused" not being in section 16 of the Canada Evidence Act. (9)

The refusal of the accused,—charged with attempting to carnally know a girl under the age of thirteen,—to be examined by a doctor, was held in England not to be evidence corroborative of the child's testimony within the meaning of sec. 4 of the Imperial Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885. (10)

Abortion.

303. Using means to procure abortion.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for life who, with intent to procure the miscarriage of any woman, whether she is or is not with child, unlawfully administers to her or causes to be taken by her any drug or other noxious thing, or unlawfully uses on her any instrument or other means whatsoever with the like intent. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 272.

(10) R. v. Gray (No. 2), 68 J. P., 327.

304. Woman using means to procure abortion on herself.—Every woman is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to seven years' imprisonment who, whether with child or not, unlawfully administers to herself or permits to be administered to her any drug or other noxious thing, or unlawfully uses on herself or permits to be used on her any instrument or other means whatsoever with intent to procure miscarriage. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 273.

305. Supplying means to procure abortion.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who unlawfully supplies or procures any drug or other noxious thing, or any instrument or thing whatsoever, knowing that the same is intended to be unlawfully used or employed with intent to procure the miscarriage of any woman, whether she is or is not with child. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 274.

Where the prisoner gave a woman a drug for the purpose of procuring an abortion, and she took it for that purpose, in the prisoner's absence, this was held to be a causing of it to be taken. (1)

The drug or other thing administered must be, either in its nature, or by reason of the quantity, noxious; and it would not be sufficient if, not being actually noxious, in itself, it was merely imagined by the defendant that it would have the effect intended. (2) But, if the drug administered actually produces miscarriage,—and there be no other evidence of its nature,—this, in itself, is sufficient evidence of its being noxious. (3)

Where the drug is not noxious in itself and quite innoxious and even useful when administered in small quantities, yet if the quantity administered by the defendant is noxious, that makes the drug so administered a noxious thing. (4)

On the other hand, if the drug is such that when administered in large quantities it is noxious, yet if in the quantity administered by the defendant, it is innoxious, he will not be guilty of administering a noxious thing. (5)

In a case where the instrument alleged to have been used to procure an abortion was a quill, which, by its nature, might have been used for an innocent purpose, evidence was allowed to be adduced, in order to prove the intent, showing that the prisoner had, at other times, caused miscarriages by similar means. (6)

To constitute the offence of supplying a noxious thing, knowing that it was intended to be used to procure abortion, the thing supplied must be of a noxious character, in itself, or be noxious by virtue of the quantity in which it was supplied. (7)

It has been held that, if the drug supplied by the defendant be noxious, and be supplied with the intention of its being used to procure abortion, the offence is complete, although the woman may not have intended to use the drug, and although no one but the defendant may have intended that it should be used to procure a miscarriage; (8) and even although the woman was not, and never had been pregnant. (9)

The terms miscarriage and abortion are used, by medical men, to signify the expulsion of the ovum or child before it is viable; and the term premature labor is used by them to signify the expulsion of the child after it is viable.

Ovum is generally used to signify an early stage of infant life, before what is popularly called quickening. It is also called, embryo. Fœtus is a word used to signify the fruit of the womb from the period of quickening until his birth; but, in the later stages, during the seventh, eighth, and ninth months, it is more usual to speak of it as the child.

An embryo of three months is usually from two to two and a half inches in length, and about an ounce and a half in weight.

A fœtus of four months is from five to six inches in length, and about three ounces in weight.

A fœtus of five months is from six to seven inches in length, and from five to seven ounces in weight.

At six months a fœtus is from nine to ten inches in length, and about a pound in weight; at seven months it is from thirteen to fifteen inches long, and weighs from three to four pounds; at eight months it reaches from fourteen to sixteen inches in length, and weighs from two to five pounds; and at nine months, or at the end of the full term of gestation, the child is from seventeen to twenty one inches long, and varies from five to nine pounds in weight.

For a child to be viable, in other words, to be capable of living after his birth, it must have attained a certain degree of development and growth. Seven months' children and those born at eight months are sufficiently common; but there are records of some remarkable cases, (not necessary to be particularized here), of infants born at much earlier stages of gestation.

The practical conclusions, arrived at by medical scientists, as to a child's viability, are as follows:

1. Children born at seven months, eight months, and intermediate periods up to term, not only may live, but constantly do so;

2. Life is also possible, though less probable, when the birth takes place at six to seven months. A few survive;

3. Children have been born alive as early as four to five months. At the latter age, or a few days more, one or two have survived;

4. Although, from the first moment of impregnation, the ovum is alive, yet, previous to the fifth month there is no possibility (so far as we know), of their being reared, and before six or seven months, it is very improbable.

The Scotch law allows six lunar months, or 168 days, for a child to be both viable and legitimate. The Parliament of Paris, in the case of Cardinal Richelieu, decided "that the fœtus at five months possessed that capability of living to the ordinary period of human existence which the law of France required for establishing its title to inheritance." The Code Napoleon mentions 180 days, or six calendar months. (10)

As, from a medical point of view, the average period at which a fœtus becomes viable is six months, the term abortion is, medically, usually limited to procuring the expulsion of the contents of the womb, before the sixth month of gestation. But the law makes no such distinction of time.

If, in the attempt to procure abortion, or after and in consequence of the abortion being effected, the woman dies, the crime is usually considered as murder, although the accused may not have meant to destroy life. He would now come within the definition of murder contained in section 259*d. ante.*

Thus, where a man had procured an abortion on a woman, and the woman died as a result of his act, it was held in a recent English case that the man committed murder, unless when he committed the act he could not as a reasonable man have contemplated that it could result in death; in which case the crime would be reduced to manslaughter. (1)

Where, upon an indictment for procuring an abortion, two prisoners were convicted of an attempt to commit abortion, it was contended on their behalf upon an application for leave to appeal, under section 1018, post, that although evidence was adduced at the trial to support a conviction for procuring abortion, there was no evidence adduced in support of the conviction for an attempt, and that therefore the prisoners should be discharged or given a new trial. Held that, as there was evidence to shew the commission of the greater offence, the jury might believe a portion of it and properly convict of the lesser offence; and the application was refused. (2)

On a charge of procuring abortion, the only evidence against the accused was that of the woman who deposed that she went and asked the accused to perform the operation, she herself being a consenting party to it. The trial Judge directed the jury that they should not convict upon the uncorroborative evidence of the woman who was particeps criminis. The jury's verdict being one of guilty the judge on the accused's application reserved a case for the opinion of the Court en banc. Held, that the evidence of an accomplice, even though uncorroborated, is legal evidence and sufficient to support a conviction, but that the trial judge should advise the jury not to convict upon such evidence. (2*a*)

In a trial for murder by committing an abortion resulting in the girl's death, it appeared that the post mortem examination was insufficient and that so far as the medical evidence was concerned, it was possible that death might have been occasioned by some undiscovered disease which a post mortem examination of other organs than those examined might have disclosed, and none of the medical men would swear positively to the cause of death; but there was other evidence tending to shew that death was caused by a criminal operation and connecting the prisoners therewith. Held, that there is no rule that the cause of death must be proved by post mortem examination and that the latter evidence was properly submitted to the jury. (3)

MEANS OF PROCURING ABORTION.—Women have been known to employ some of the most extraordinary means to procure abortion: such as violently rolling down hill, throwing themselves downstairs, or out of window, submitting themselves to be laced with extreme tightness, or even to be trampled on and kicked on the abdomen. Tardieu mentions the following case:—

In the Assize Court of the Loire-Inférieure, it was proved that a peasant, who had seduced his servant, and wished to make her abort, mounted on a strong horse, and put the girl on the same horse, then galloped wildly hither and thither, throwing her down on the ground whilst in full gallop, and this repeatedly. Having tried this twice without success he conceived the horrible idea of applying to her stomach bread just taken from a very hot oven. This means failed like the former, and the poor victim gave birth to a living and well-formed child at term. (4)

Amongst the drugs generally used to procure abortion might be included almost every known purgative, and almost every drug or herb which has medicinal properties.

The following commonly used substances,—squills, sarsaparilla, guaiacum, aloes, balm, horehound, camomile, wormwood, saffron, borax, mugwort and juniper, are considered by many authorities to be perfectly harmless in this respect; although some have considered that aloes, wormwood, borax, and mugwort possess properties which may be indirectly effective in procuring abortion.

It seems that such poisons as arsenic, mercury, sulphate of copper, and cantharides have no special action on the uterus, and that to produce any effect for purposes of abortion they would have to be given in doses almost necessarily fatal.

There is some medical evidence that iodide of potassium, yew, pennyroyal and oil of rue will cause abortion, and the evidence is still stronger in regard to the efficacy of savine and ergot of rye.

Amongst the mechanical instruments and contrivances which have been used in procuring abortion may be mentioned pointed sticks and wooden skewers, syringes, catheters, guarded stilettos, forceps, long knitting needles, and steel claws, the latter being worn on the fingers, for the purpose, as it seems, of penetrating the membranes or tearing the embyro. (5)

PROOF.—It was held in an American abortion case that, any declarations or acts of the defendant tending to shew his intention and purpose to produce the abortion are admissible, whether such acts and declarations were prior or subsequent to the particular act charged in the indictment; that the defendant made a subsequent attempt to accomplish the same purpose by different means is admissible to shew with what purpose and intent he made the attempt charged in the indictment as well as to corroborate the evidence of the first attempt; and that a letter written by the defendant, containing ambiguous language, may be received in evidence against him, and its language explained by parol, when it relates to the question at issue.

The defendant in this case had been convicted in the Circuit Court of Baltimore county, upon an indictment charging him with furnishing Rachael Taylor, a pregnant woman, with certain drugs and medicines and with advising and soliciting her to take them for the purpose of producing an abortion.

After the State had proved, by the woman Taylor, that the defendant had furnished her with some pills and drops and advised her to take them, saying that they would destroy the child of which she was pregnant, the witness was asked if the defendant had proposed to her any other means of producing the abortion; and she answered that he had taken her to a doctor in Baltimore and told her to go through an operation to destroy the unborn child, but that she refused to submit to such operation. To this question and answer the defendant objected, and, on the Court allowing them, the defendant excepted.

The State then put in evidence a letter from the prisoner to the woman Taylor, in which he said, "I made you a fair proposition, which if you had not spurned we would have been the same as ever," etc., and asked her what was the proposition referred to, upon which she answered that it was a proposition by the defendant that she should be operated upon. The defendant also objected to this question and answer, and, on same being allowed, he excepted.

Upon these two exceptions the case came before the Maryland Court of Appeals; and, in rendering judgment in that Court, Stone, J., said, as to the first exception:—

"The gravamen of the offence charged against the accused was his purpose and intention to produce an abortion upon the body of Rachael A. Taylor, and he is charged with endeavoring to effect that purpose by furnishing her with drugs, and advising her to take them. Any declarations or acts of the defendant tending to shew his intention and purpose to produce such abortion are admissible, whether made prior or subsequent to the particular act charged in the indictment. That he made a subsequent attempt to accomplish the same purpose by different means, is admissible to shew with what purpose and intent he made the attempt charged in the indictment, as well as to corroborate the evidence of the first attempt. In the case of King v. Ellis, (6), the prisoner, a shopman, was indicted for robbing his employer's money-drawer of a particular sum of money on a particular day. At the trial, evidence was admitted that the prisoner had robbed the drawer at other times. Upon review, the Court, Bayley, J., delivering the opinion, said: 'Generally speaking, it is not competent to a prosecutor to prove a man guilty of one felony by proving him guilty of another unconnected felony; but where several felonies are connected together and form part of one entire transaction, then the one is evidence of the character of the other.' Holroyd said in the same case: 'Upon an indictment for robbing the prosecutor of a coat, the robbery having been committed by the prisoner threatening to charge the prosecutor with an unnatural crime, I received evidence of a second ineffectual attempt to obtain a one pound note from the prosecutor by similar threats, but reserved the point for the Judges, and they were of opinion that the evidence was admissible to shew that the prisoner was guilty of the former transaction.' The proof of a second attempt to accomplish the same purpose is, therefore, we think, clearly admissible to prove the purpose in the former attempt, and the ruling of the Court on the first exception must be affirmed."

In reference to the second exception the learned Judge said:—

"Declarations of the accused, as to the crime with which he is charged, if voluntary, are always admissible against him. This letter is nothing but a declaration made by the prisoner. It refers to a proposition, but does not say what it was; and it was entirely competent to shew by parol, what the proposition was, if it applied to the case. The ruling on this second exception, also, must therefore be affirmed." (7)

In an Iowa case, where the testimony of the woman upon whom the abortion was attempted was to the effect that she was with child by the accused, and that, upon telling him of her condition, he gave her two bottles of "Dr. Lyon's Spanish Drops," which he said "would be sure to bring her all right," and which, when she took it, made her "dizzy" and sick, and where the accused, when testifying in his own behalf, admitted having had illicit intercourse with the woman, who was a servant in his family, and the giving of the medicine, but claimed that he did not know that she was pregnant, that he gave it to her only to restore regular menstruation, —it was held that the evidence was sufficient to support a conviction. (8)

In the State of Wisconsin (whose laws make it manslaughter, in case of the death of either child or mother), to administer to a pregnant woman any drug or other substance, or to employ any instrument or other means, with intent thereby to destroy the child, unless the operation is necessary to preserve the life of the mother, or has been advised by two physicians to be necessary for that purpose, it was held, that the fact that one of the defendants, who was a physician, thought that the operation was necessary to save the life of the mother, was no defence where the evidence shewed that it was in fact unnecessary; that, as the evidence shewed that defendant operated with a knife on the womb of a healthy woman nineteen years old, so that she was delivered of a partly grown child, and was then attacked with peritonitis, of which she died, an inference that the operation was not necessary to save her life was warranted; that the fact that the woman had threatened to commit suicide unless she could be relieved of the child with which she was pregnant, did not shew such a necessity to perform the operation in order to save her life as was contemplated by the statute; that an instruction, that defendants must shew beyond a reasonable doubt that they had the advice of two physicians that the operation was necessary to save the life of the mother, is harmless error, where defendants have introduced no evidence whatever that they had such advice, this being a fact peculiarly within their knowledge, whose non-existence it is practically impossible for the State to shew; and that, the defendants being husband and wife, evidence that the wife, in the absence of the husband, offered to produce the abortion for the deceased, and stated that she had helped other women out of similar trouble, is admissible to shew that she acted without the coercion of her husband.

The facts as established in evidence were, briefly stated, as follows: that Minnie Beardsley, being pregnant, applied to Dr. Hatchard to procure an abortion upon her; that he administered medicine to her, and operated upon her womb three times with a long sharp instrument for that purpose; that she was a healthy woman, nineteen years of age; that Mrs. Hatchard had previously offered to perform the operation, and voluntarily assisted her husband in doing so each time; that a few days after the last operation Minnie was delivered of a partly grown female child; that she was immediately attacked with inflammation of the bowels or peritonitis, and died thereof the day after her delivery, and that her disease was caused by such operations upon her person. (9)

A woman who, believing herself to be with child, but not being with child, conspires with other persons to administer drugs to herself or to use instruments on herself, with intent to procure abortion, may be convicted of conspiracy to procure abortion. (10)

A qualified surgeon, not in regular practice, was indicted under section 58 of the Imperial Offences Against the Person Act, 1861, for feloniously using instruments upon a woman (who was his servant and had become pregnant by him), with intent to procure her miscarriage. The defence was that the accused had used the instruments for a lawful purpose in order to examine the girl who it was suggested was suffering from leucorrhœa. To rebut this evidence and to prove intent, the prosecution tendered the evidence of another woman, who, nine months before, had also become pregnant by the accused and upon whom the accused had also used instruments saying that he would put her all right and that the instrument would fetch the child away. She also deposed that the accused had told her that he had put dozens of girls right. Held, that the evidence was admissible as tending to prove a systematic course of conduct on the part of the prisoner and as tending to prove the intent with which he used the instruments. (1)

Where an accused is charged, in separate counts, firstly, with using an instrument to procure an abortion, and, secondly, with operating for that purpose, a conviction on the second count will be set aside if the jury acquitted on the first and there was no reasonable evidence to be left to the jury that the accused had illegally used other means than the instrument. (2)

COUNSELLING ABORTION.—Counselling a woman in Canada to submit, in a foreign jurisdiction, to an operation to procure her miscarriage the submission to which, if performed in Canada, would be a crime, is not in itself an offence against the criminal law of Canada, if the operation is performed in a foreign country. (3)

AIDING AND ABETTING.—Where, in an English case, an indictment agains a woman, for aiding and abetting another person in unlawfully using an instrument upon her, did not aver that she was with child, it was held that she could be convicted of aiding and abetting the felony. (4)

306. Killing unborn child.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for life who causes the death of any child which has not become a human being, in such a manner that he would have been guilty of murder if such child had been born.

2. No one is guilty of any offence who, by means which he in good faith considers necessary for the preservation of the life of the mother of the child, causes the death of any such child before or during its birth. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 271.

This section will meet the case of any wilful and unlawful killing of a child which, in consequence of the injuries inflicted upon it, becomes extinct either while it is still in the womb or while it is proceeding but has not yet completely proceeded from its mother's body.

By section 251, ante, a child only becomes a human being when it has completely proceeded in a living state from the body of its mother; and it is not homicide to kill a child which becomes extinct before it has so become a human being.

Sub-section 2 of the above section, 306, is meant for the protection of medical men who, acting in good faith, in the course of their professional practice, find it necessary either to induce premature labor so as to save both mother and child, or, in extreme cases, to kill, during or before labor, the unborn child, in order to save the life of the mother. For instance, there are cases, in which, on account of certain deformities, such as what is termed, in medical parlance, an extreme narrowing of the pelvic brim, it may be impossible or very dangerous, even with the aid of forceps, to effect delivery at the end of the full term of gestation, and in which a skilful and careful medical practitioner may, by inducing premature birth, at seven months, bring forth the child, sometimes alive, with perfect safety to the mother. Medical statistics appear to show that a very small proportion of women die under the operations necessary to induce these premature births, and that many of the children thus prematurely born, live. One M. Figuera is mentioned as having collected 280 cases, in which only six proved fatal to the mothers; and Dr. Hoffman is said to have collected 524 cases, in thirty-four of which the operations had been repeated three, four or more times; and in 373 of these cases, 250 children were born alive and 123 dead. Offences against Conjugal Rights.

307. Bigamy defined.—Bigamy is,—

(a) the act of a person who, being married, goes through a form of marriage with any other person in any part of the world; or,

(b) the act of a person who goes through a form of marriage in any part of the world with any person whom he or she knows to be married; or,

(5) Wood. & T. For. Med., 745.

(c) the act of a person who goes through a form of marriage with more than one person simultaneously, or on the same day.

2. The fact that the parties would, if unmarried, have been incompetent to contract marriage shall be no defence upon a prosecution for bigamy.

3. No one commits bigamy by going through a form of marriage,—

(a) if he or she in good faith and on reasonable grounds believes his wife or her husband to be dead; or,

(b) if his wife or her husband has been continually absent for seven years then last past and he or she is not proved to have known that his wife or her husband was alive at any time during those seven years; or,

(c) if he or she has been divorced from the bond of the first marriage; or,

(d) if the former marriage has been declared void by a court of competent jurisdiction.

4. No person shall be liable to be convicted of bigamy in respect of having gone through a form of marriage in a place not in Canada, unless such person, being a British subject resident in Canada, leaves Canada with intent to go through such form of marriage.

5. Every form of marriage shall for the purpose of this section be valid, notwithstanding any act or default of the person charged with bigamy, if it is otherwise a valid form. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 275.

308. Punishment of bigamy.—Every one who commits bigamy is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to seven years' imprisonment.

2. Every one who commits this offence after a previous conviction for a like offence shall be liable to fourteen years' imprisonment. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 276.

PROOF OF THE FIRST MARRIAGE.—Proof must be made of the two marriages, and that, at the time of the second marriage, the first husband or first wife, as the case may be, was living. It is immaterial whether the first marriage was celebrated here or abroad. (1) If celebrated abroad it may be proved by any person present at it; and circumstances should be proved from which the jury may presume that it was a valid marriage according to the laws of the country in which it was celebrated, and, now, under section 4 of the Canada Evidence Act, 1906, post, the first wife or the first husband is a competent though not a compellable witness.

Proof that the first marriage was celebrated by a person appearing and officiating as a priest, and that it was understood by the parties to be the marriage ceremony, according to the rites and customs of the foreign country, would be sufficient presumptive evidence of it, so as to throw upon the defendant the onus of impugning its validity. (2)

It was, however, held by Lush, J., that, in an indictment for bigamy, every thing must be proved most strictly, and that, therefore, evidence of the first marriage in Scotland, by a Roman Catholic priest who had many times previously performed similar ceremonies there, would not suffice, without proof of the law of Scotland, as to such marriage. (3) And in another case it was held that a valid marriage in Scotland could not be proved except by the evidence of a person having a knowledge of the law of Scotland as to marriages. (4)

If the first marriage was celebrated in this country, it may be proved by the production of the register of the marriage from the proper custody, that is from the Church itself or from the custody of the priest, clergyman or other officiating minister; or by a duly certified copy thereof or extract therefrom, together with some proof, either direct or presumptive, of the identity of the parties. (5)

Proof by the production of a certified copy of or extract from a marriage register is provided for by sections 25 and 26 of the Canada Evidence Act, 1906, post; but a copy or extract cannot be received in evidence, — according to section 28 of the Canada Evidence Act, — unless the party intending to produce the same has before the trial, given at least ten days' notice to the party against whom it is intended to be produced.

Proof that the marriage took place in a dissenting chapel, in the presence of the registrar, that the entry in the registrar's book was signed by a person who proved the fact of the marriage, as a witness to the marriage, and that the parties afterwards cohabited for some years, was held sufficient prima facie proof that the chapel was duly registered as a place in which marriages might be lawfully solemnized; (6) and where the marriage was solemnized in a dissenting chapel by a dissenting minister in the presence of the registrar of the district and two witnesses, and the certificate was produced, it was held to be unnecessary to prove that the chapel was registered. (7) In another case, it was proved that the marriage was solemnized in a building a few yards from the parish church, while the church was under repair and it was further proved that divine service had several times been performed in this building. It was, therefore, held that the building must be presumed to have been licensed, and that therefore the marriage might be properly solemnized there. (8)

Under the old English Marriage License Laws, it was at one time held, that, if the marriage were by license, and if either of the parties were a minor at the time, it was necessary to prove that the marriage was solemnized with the consent of the parents or guardian of the minor; although subsequent countenance from the parents or guardian, or other similar circumstances, afforded ground for presuming the necessary consent. (9) Later legislation, however, had the effect of rendering it unnecessary, in bigamy cases, to prove the consent of the parents or the guardian to the first marriage of a minor (10)

It was originally the intention of the English Marriage Act that the banns should be published in the true names of the parties, and, if the banns were published in names totally different from those which the parties used or by which they were known, it used to have the effect of invalidating the marriage, whether the misdescription was by accident or from design and whether it was fraudulent or not; but, now, under the English Marriage Laws, in order to invalidate a marriage for want of due publication of banns the misdescription in the banns must be with the knowledge of both parties. (1)

By the Imperial Statute 6 and 7 W. IV., c. 85, section 42, it was enacted "that if any persons shall knowingly and wilfully intermarry under the provisions of this Act, without due notice to the superintendent-registrar, the marriage of such persons shall be null and void;" and it was held that, to render a marriage invalid under that Act, it must be with a knowledge by both parties, that no due notice had been given; and therefore where one of the parties,—in disregard of a clause of the Act, which requires the name and surname of each of the parties intending marriage to be stated in the notice,—gave a notice stating therein a false Christian name, but it did not appear that that was done with the knowledge of the other party, the marriage was held valid. (2)

Where the parties were married in Ireland with the ceremonies necessary to make a marriage of Roman Catholics valid, the man and the woman both declaring themselves to be Roman Catholics, it was held that the man could not, on an indictment for bigamy, set up his alleged protestantism to defeat such marriage. (3)

Although, in bigamy cases, a first valid marriage must be proved, it appears that it is not essential, in order to establish it, that proof should be made of the license, or of the publication of the banns, etc.; but that the fact of the marriage having been validly solemnized may be proved by some person who was actually present, and saw the ceremony performed. (4) Or, the prisoner's own admission of a prior marriage may be relied on as good evidence to show that it was lawfully solemnized. (5)

A written contract between the parties is essential, however, to the validity of a marriage between Jews, which contract is afterwards solemnly ratified in the synagogue; and it has been held in England that in order to prove such a marriage, it is not sufficient to prove the religious ceremony by the parol testimony of some person who was present, but that the contract must also be produced and proved. (6)

Proof of a first marriage which is merely voidable but which has not been voided, is sufficient, in a prosecution for bigamy. (7) Thus, a marriage contracted in Ireland by a minor, without consent,—such a marriage being, by the Irish Marriage Act, voidable only within a year,—will support a conviction for bigamy, if such first marriage has not been vacated. (8)

But it is otherwise if the first marriage be not merely voidable but actually void. As, for instance, if a woman marry A. and in A's lifetime, marry B. and then, after A's death, and whilst B is alive, she also marry

C, she cannot be indicted for bigamy, in marrying C, because her marriage with B was a mere nullity. (9)

So, if a man marry A, and, in the lifetime of A, he marry B, and, afterwards, in the lifetime of both A and B, he marry C, he cannot be prosecuted for bigamy, on an indictment charging him with that offence in marrying C during the lifetime of his wife B; because the marriage with B was void. (10) The indictment, to be good, would have to charge him with committing bigamy in marrying C during the lifetime of A.

If a boy under fourteen or a girl under twelve contract matrimony, it is void, unless both parties to such marriage consent to and confirm it after the one who was under the age of consent arrives at the age of consent. (1)

On an indictment for bigamy a witness was called to prove the first marriage, and swore that it was solemnized by a justice of the peace in the State of New York who had power to marry; but the witness was not a lawyer nor an inhabitant of the United States and did not say how the authority of the justice of the peace was derived. Held, that the proof was insufficient. (2)

PROOF OF THE SECOND MARRIAGE.—Although the first marriage must be proved to have been a valid one, this is not necessary with regard to the second or bigamous marriage. The above section, 307, makes it bigamy for any person, being married, to go through a form of marriage with any other person; and sub-section 2 declares that "every form of marriage shall, for the purpose of this section, be valid, notwithstanding any act or default of the person charged with bigamy, if it be otherwise a valid form." So, that, after proving the defendant's first marriage, it will be sufficient to make proof of his having gone through a second marriage ceremony with another woman, and it will be no defence to an indictment for bigamy to show that the second marriage was not legal but was void, by reason, for instance, of the parties to it being relations within the prohibited degrees of consanguinity or affinity. (3)

Where, therefore, in the second marriage, the defendant assumed a fictitious name, the offence was, nevertheless, held complete. (4)

Upon an indictment for bigamy in marrying Anna T., the defendant's first wife being alive, it appeared that the second wife's name was not Anna but Susanna, but the defendant himself had written her name as Anna in the note for publication of banns, and he had signed the register in which she was so called; and it was held that, although the woman's name might not be Anna, the defendant could not defend himself on the ground that he did not marry Anna T. but Susanna. (5)

Where the second wife was married by the name of Eliza Thick, which name she had purposely assumed, when the banns were published, so that she should not be known to be the person intended, (her name being Eliza Brown), Gurney B. held this to be no answer to the charge of bigamy. (6)

A man who, being married, married another woman, and gave a false name, in his notice to the registrar,—without it appearing that the woman knew of it,—was found guilty of bigamy. (7)

The English Court of Crown Cases Reserved has, in a case reserved for the consideration of all the judges, laid down the following general rule, namely: that where a person already bound by an existing marriage, goes through a form of marriage known to and recognized by the law as capable of producing a valid marriage, for the purpose of a pretended and fictitious marriage, the case is none the less within the statute relating to bigamy, by reason of any special circumstances, which, independently of the bigamous character of the marriage, may constitute a legal disability in the particular parties or make the form of marriage resorted to specially inapplicable to their individual case, so that, where A, a married man, whose wife was living, went through the marriage ceremony with another woman related to him within the prohibited degrees of affinity, so that the second marriage, even if not bigamous, would have been void, he was held guilty of bigamy. (8)

The case of R. v. Fanning, (9)—in which the Irish Court of Criminal Appeal held that, to constitute the offence of bigamy, the second marriage must have been one which, but for the existence of the previous marriage, would have been a valid marriage,—was fully considered by the English Court of Criminal Appeal, in the case of R. v. Allen, supra, and disapproved.

It will be noticed that sub-section 2 of section 307 of our Code now expressly provides that, "the fact that the parties would, if unmarried, have been incompetent to contract marriage shall be no defence upon a prosecution for bigamy.

PROOF OF FIRST WIFE OR HUSBAND BEING ALIVE.—The prosecution must prove that the first husband or first wife, as the case may be, was living when the second marriage was solemnized. This may be done by some person acquainted with the first husband or first wife and who saw him or her at the time of the second marriage or afterwards. The fact that the first wife was living at a period antecedent to the time of the second marriage may or may not afford a reasonable inference. If it were proved that she was living and in good health on the day preceding the second marriage, the inference would be very strong that she was still living on the day of the second marriage; and the jury would probably find that she was so. If, on the other hand, it were proved that the first wife was in a dying condition on the day preceding the second marriage, and nothing further were proved, the jury would probably decline to draw the inference that she was still living on the day of the second marriage.

The question, therefore, is one entirely for the jury; and the law makes no presumption either way. (10) Therefore, where, on a trial of a woman for bigamy, it was proved that the second marriage took place in 1847, but that the first husband had been last seen alive in 1843, and the Judge directed the jury that there being no circumstances leading to any reasonable inference that he had died, he must be presumed to have been alive at the time of the second marriage, this direction was held to be erroneous, and the conviction was quashed. (1)

PRINCIPAL DEFENCES.—The principal defences available to the defendant in a prosecution for bigamy are: 1. Belief, on reasonable grounds, that the first husband or the first wife, as the case may be, is dead; 2. Continual absence of the first wife or husband for seven years; 3. Divorce from the bond of the first marriage, and 4. That the first marriage has been declared void by a court of competent jurisdiction.

On the subject of bigamy, there is a difference, in at least one important point, between our Code and the English Draft Code and between our Code and the Imperial Statute.

Our section, 307, (par. 3), expressly declares that, "No one commits bigamy by going through a form of marriage, (a), if he or she, in good faith and on reasonable grounds, believes his wife or her husband to be dead, or (b), if his wife or her husband has been continually absent for seven years then last past, and he or she is not proved to have known that his wife or her husband was alive at any time during those seven years. By a proviso contained in section 216 of the English Draft Code, it is provided that "No one shall be deemed to commit bigamy by going through such" form of marriage as aforesaid if he or she has been continually absent from his wife or her husband for seven years then last past and is not proved to have known that his wife or her husband was alive at any time during these seven years; but, unless there be such absence as aforesaid, a BELIEF on any grounds whatever that a wife or husband is dead shall be no defence to a charge of bigamy, if such wife or husband was in fact alive when the form of marriage was gone through." And section 57 of the Imperial Act, (24-25 Vic., c. 100), contains the following provision, "Provided that nothing in this section contained shall extend * * * to any person marrying a second time, whose husband or wife shall have been continually absent from such person for the space of seven years then last past, and shall not have been known by such person to be living within that time."

"The existing statute as to bigamy is so worded as to have given rise to a difference of judicial opinion as to whether it does or does not, from motives of policy, make it a crime to marry again during the life of the husband or wife, though in the bona fide and reasonable belief that the first husband or wife was dead, unless seven years had elapsed since he or she was last heard of. We have thought it important that the law should be certain, and have accordingly framed the clause so as to leave no doubt what the law would be. In doing so we have adopted the construction which has been more generally put on the existing statute.

"No doubt, the conviction of a man marrying again within the seven years, under the honest belief that his wife was dead, may be regarded as a hard case; but the hardship may, at present, be mitigated by the infliction of a nominal punishment, and will be capable of still further mitigation if the Draft Code becomes law. On the other hand, care must be taken not to give encouragement to bigamous marriages by relaxing the rule that a man marrying within the prescribed seven years does so at his peril.

"Among the suggestions furnished to us was one that clause 216 might subject a Hindoo coming to England to a prosecution for having a plurality of wives in his own country. So far as this point is concerned, the clause is taken from the Act of 1861, which re-enacted in terms the Act of 1828. We have merely altered the wording so as to make it harmonize with the other sections of the Draft Code by changing 'elsewhere than in England or Ireland,' into 'any part of the world.' During the half century which has elapsed, since the first of these statutes was passed, no attempt has ever been made to apply them to such a case as the one suggested, for the reason, we presume, that 'marriage,' in these statutes, means the union, for life, of one man with one woman, to the exclusion of all others, as is well expressed by Lord Penzance in Hyde v. Hyde. (2) Whatever may be the ceremony by which a polygamist adopts a woman, as one of his wives, the relation which it creates is essentially different from that which our criminal legislation contemplated by the word 'marriage.'"

It will be seen that the main difference between our law, as it now stands, and the law of England, is that the Imperial Statute does not contain the clause contained in the above section, 307, declaring that, no one commits bigamy by going through a form of marriage, "if he or she, in good faith and on reasonable grounds, believes his wife or her husband to be dead."

There is also some difference between the wording of the two enactments, in regard to the seven years' absence. The English Statute has the words, "and shall not have been known by such person to be living within that time," while the wording of the clause in our law is, "and he or she is not proved to have known that his wife or her husband was alive at any time during those seven years."

This, however, is merely a verbal difference. The effect of the two seems to be the same; for in England, as well as in Canada, under the law as expressed in the 161 R. S. C., s. 4, (which was to the same effect as our present law), and previous Canadian statutes, worded like the Imperial Statute, it has been held that, when, on a trial for bigamy, absence for seven years is proved, it is, then, for the prosecution to show that the prisoner knew his wife to be alive at some time during the seven years, and that, on the prosecution failing to do so, the prisoner is entitled to an acquittal. (3)

In another case, where it was proved that the accused's first husband had been absent from her for more than seven years, the jury found that they had no evidence that, at the time of her second marriage, she knew him to be alive, although she had the means of acquiring knowledge of that fact had she chosen to make use of such means; and it was held that, upon this finding, the conviction could not be supported. (4)

Where the defendant's first wife had left him sixteen years, and it was proved by the second wife that she had known him for nine years living as a single man, and had never heard of the first wife, who it appeared had been living seventeen miles from where the defendant, (a poor laboring man), resided, he was held entitled to an acquittal. (5)

With regard to the seven years' absence clause, there were for a time a number of conflicting decisions rendered in England, it being held in a few cases, by some of the judges, (including Baron Martin and Baron Cleasby), that, although seven years had not passed since the first marriage, yet, if the prisoner reasonably believed that his first wife was dead, he was entitled to an acquittal; (6) while others held that, under the terms of the 24-25 Vic., c. 100, s. 57, already quoted, unless seven years had elapsed between the first and second marriages, it was no defence for the prisoner to show that he had reasonable grounds for believing that his first wife was dead. This was the holding in a number of cases, (7) and, in their Report on the English Draft Code, the Royal Commissioners, in their remarks upon bigamy (see extract set out at p. 343, ante), not only take this view of the law, but emphasize the necessity of framing the clause on this subject in such a manner as to make the law certain in this respect, in order, as they say that,—although it may be a hardship to convict a man of bigamy for marrying again under the honest belief that his wife was dead,—encouragement may not be given to bigamous marriages by relaxing the rule that a man marrying within the prescribed limit of seven years does so at his peril.

But the whole subject has since, (in 1889), been thoroughly considered and finally settled by the English Court of Criminal Appeal in Tolson's case, in which, on account of the conflicting views of individual judges, the point had been reserved by Stephen, J.; and it was decided by that Court, composed of Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Hawkins, Stephen, Cave, Day, Smith, Wills, Grantham, and Charles, JJ., (Denman, Field, and Manisty, JJ., and Pollock and Huddlestone, BB., dissenting), that a bona fide belief on reasonable grounds in the death of the husband at the time of the second marriage afforded a good defence to the indictment, although the second marriage took place within seven years of the time when the defendant last knew of her husband being alive. (8)

Our own law, as expressed in clause (a) of sub-section 3 of section 307, coincides with the holding of the English Court of Criminal Appeal in the Tolson case.

In a recent case in Nova Scotia it was held that, (a) a guilty mind is an essential ingredient of the offence of bigamy, and that if a woman after obtaining information that the man, with whom she has gone through a form of marriage, was already married, leaves him and marries another man, her honest and reasonable belief that the man she left had a wife living when she went through the form of marriage with him, is a good defence to a charge of bigamy laid against her, and (b) that the fact of such honest and reasonable belief may be formed from the circumstances of the case without strict proof of the man's former marriage. (8*a*)

With regard to the other two grounds of defence to a prosecution for bigamy, namely, that before the second marriage the party indicted was divorced from the bond of the first marriage, or that the first marriage had been declared void by a Court of competent jurisdiction, it was formerly considered that no sentence or act of a foreign country or state could dissolve, a vinculo matrimonii, an English marriage for grounds on which it was not liable to be so dissolved in England. This rule seems to have been adopted in the case of R. v. Lolley, in which a Scotch divorce a vinculo matrimonii, for the husband's adultery, the marriage having been solemnized in England, was held to be invalid in England, the husband's adultery alone, unaccompanied with cruelty or desertion, not being, under English law, a sufficient ground for a divorce a vinculo matrimonii; but there was in this case an additional question of domicile involved; for not only was the marriage solemnized in England, but the parties were, at the time of the granting of the divorce, domiciled there; and this alone, would have been a good ground for holding the divorce, granted by a Scotch Court, invalid, in England, independently of and without reference to the rule above alluded to. (9) In fact, that rule has by the English Court of Appeal, been since denied to be law, in a later case, in which the marriage was also solemnized in England, the parties being a Scotchman and an English woman. In this case, also, the decree of divorce a vinculo, was granted by a Scotch Court and the ground of divorce was one for which a divorce is not obtainable in England, but there was this difference, that the husband's domicile was in Scotland; and the Scotch divorce, in this case, was held to be valid in England, on the ground that although the marriage had been solemnized in England, the question of divorce was not an incident of the marriage contract to be governed by the lex loci contractus, but an incident of status to be disposed of by the law of the domicile of the parties,—that is to say, the domicile of the husband; and in its judgment the English Court of Appeal specially pointed out that the Scotch divorce a vinculo which, in R. v. Lolley, was held to be invalid in England, was that of persons whose marriage had been solemnized in England, and whose domicile at the time of the divorce was also English. (10)

A decree of divorce obtained in a foreign court may be impeached by extrinsic evidence showing that such court had no jurisdiction or that such decree was obtained by fraud. (1)

A domiciled Englishman was married in London to a woman domiciled in the United States. After three months' cohabitation she left him, on perfectly friendly terms, to go on a visit to the United States. She refused to return to him, and sent an agent to England to try to persuade him to consent to a collusive divorce, which he refused to do. A year later, the wife commenced proceedings in Philadelphia for a divorce on the ground of her husband's cruelty, it being alleged, among other things, that, by virtue of a certain Act of the Pennsylvanian Legislature, she had recovered her American domicile by residing twelve months within that State. The husband took no notice of the American proceedings, and the Philadelphia Court pronounced a decree for divorce as prayed; upon which the wife married in America and cohabited with her second husband. The first husband then commenced proceedings in England for dissolution of his marriage on the ground of his wife's bigamy and adultery; and it was held that the proceedings in the American suit had been rightly disregarded, that no decree dissolving the marriage pronounced in the Courts of a country in which the first husband had neither been resident nor domiciled could be binding on him in England, and that the first husband was entitled to the relief prayed by him. (2)

A woman, married in Canada to a man, who was then and always remained a domiciled Canadian, went afterwards to the State of Michigan intending to separate from her husband and to make her home there, and she later on obtained, in Michigan, a divorce, her husband, however, not being served with any notice of the divorce proceedings nor taking any part therein. Held, that the divorce was of no validity or force in Ontario. Shortly afterwards, the husband having obtained a copy of the divorce decree and legal advice that it was valid, went through a form of marriage with another woman in Detroit. Held, that he was guilty of bigamy under our Criminal Code. (2*a*)

Where both parties to a marriage which took place in Canada are of Canadian domicile but afterwards become bonâ fide domiciled in a foreign country, a decree of divorce obtained in the foreign country while they were domiciled there will be valid in Canada as a defence to a prosecution of either for bigamy in having re-married; but a decree of divorce granted by a Court foreign to the domicile of both parties, pronounced by consent or collusion of the parties, both temporarily resident within its jurisdiction and which recited due proof of grounds sufficient under the foreign Court for dissolving a marriage, is invalid in Canada, if it be proved that such recital is incorrect and that in fact no evidence was given. (2*b*)

BIGAMY COMMITTED OUT OF CANADA.—Although, in the first part of section 307, bigamy is defined to be the act of a person who, being married, marries another person, in any part of the world, the latter part of this clause is modified by sub-section 4, which declares that:—

"No person shall be liable to be convicted of bigamy in respect of having gone through a form of marriage in a place not in Canada, unless such person, being a British subject resident in Canada, leaves Canada with intent to go through such form of marriage."

This proviso is based upon the principle that, Canada being a colony, our parliament has power only to legislate for offences committed within Canada, and the clause meant to restrict to our own jurisdiction the early words of the section speaking of marriages in any part of the world, by making it an offence for a British subject resident in Canada to leave Canada with intent to commit bigamy in some other part of the world, and to carry out such intent; that being the full extent of the power of the Canadian Parliament, as a colonial legislature, according to a decision in that respect rendered in regard to the jurisdiction of an Australian parliament, by which decision it was held that, although the words used in the Australian Statute extended to marriages solemnized beyond the territorial jurisdiction of the Australian parliament, that parliament had no authority in that behalf, and that its legislation must be confined to its territorial jurisdiction and be interpreted accordingly. The Australian case was decided on an appeal to the English Privy Council, which reversed a judgment of the Supreme Court of New South Wales, the latter Court having rejected an appeal from a conviction by the Court of Quarter Sessions at Sydney. The appellant, a British subject, had been married to his first wife in Sydney. Some years afterwards, he obtained from a District Court of the United States a decree of divorce from his first wife, and, later on, he married another woman in the State of Missouri, his first wife being still alive; but it was found that the decree of divorce was one obtained without any notice having been given to the first wife of the divorce proceedings. The Privy Council held, that, the maxim extra territorium jus dicenti impune non paretur, was applicable to such a case, and that the alleged offence, being one which, upon the face of the record, was charged to have been committed in the United States of America, and which, if committed at all, was committed in another country beyond the jurisdiction of the colony of New South Wales, the conviction must be set aside. (3)

In an American case, a somewhat similar decision was rendered, under the following circumstances. The Code of the State of North Carolina provides that "if any person, being married, shall marry any other person during the life of the former husband or wife, whether the second marriage shall have taken place in the State of North Carolina or elsewhere, every such offender shall be guilty of a felony, and every such offence shall be punished in the county where the offender shall be apprehended as if actually committed there;" and the Supreme Court of North Carolina considered such a provision repugnant to the constitution, and held that an indictment would not lie against the defendant for having contracted a bigamous marriage in South Carolina and afterwards come into the State of North Carolina to cohabit with the person so married. But the Court added:—

"We do not, however, wish to be understood as questioning the power of the State to punish one of its citizens who goes out of the State with intent to evade its laws by celebrating a bigamous marriage beyond its jurisdiction, and returning to live within its borders." (5)

In sub-section 2, clause (a) of section 4 of the R. S. C., chapter 161, there was a clause somewhat similar, in effect, to the above sub-section 4 of section 307 of the Criminal Code; and, both before and since the coming into force of the Code, there have been several conflicting decisions as to the constitutionality of this provision. For instance, in a case in which the second marriage was contracted outside of Canada, but the parties,—who were British subjects and residents of Canada,—had, with intent to be married, gone out of Canada and got married accordingly, it was held that the above provision was intra vires, and that the parties were guilty of bigamy: (6) while, in a later case, in which the question of the validity of a conviction for bigamy committed under similar circumstances was considered, it was held that the provision was ultra vires.—Armour, C.J., saying, that, in view of the decision in the case of McLeod v. Attorney-General of New South Wales, the Dominion Parliament, being a subordinate legislature, has no power to enact that it should be a crime for a British subject already married to marry again abroad, the second marriage being the offence and the Dominion Parliament having no power to legislate about such an offence committed abroad. (7)

Since the decision in the last mentioned case, a special case,—under the provisions of the Supreme and Exchequer Courts Act, as amended by 54-55 Vic., c. 25,—has been referred by the Governor-General in Council, to the Supreme Court of Canada on the question of whether the Dominion Parliament had authority to enact sections, such as sections 307 and 308, of the Criminal Code, and what portions of them are ultra vires, if they or either of them are ultra vires in part only: and, after full consideration of this special case, the opinion arrived at by the Supreme Court, (Sir Henry Strong, C.J., dissenting), was that the sections are intra vires of the Parliament of Canada, a distinction being drawn as to the case of McLeod v. Attorney-General of New South Wales, principally on the ground that the Australian Act contained no such provision as that contained in sub-section 4 of our section 307, rendering a person,—who, being a British subject resident in Canada, leaves Canada with intent to go through a form of marriage, —liable to be convicted of bigamy in respect of having gone through such form of marriage in a place out of Canada. (8)

A person may be tried, in England, for bigamy committed abroad, it being provided by the Imperial Statute the Offences Against the Person Act, 1861, section 57, that "Whosoever being married shall marry any other person during the life of the former husband or wife, whether marriage shall have taken place in England or Ireland or elsewhere, shall be guilty of felony" (9)

An indictment for bigamy under section 57 of the Imperial Offences Against the Person Act, 1861,—which by a proviso, enacts that nothing contained in that section shall extend to any second marriage contracted elsewhere than in England and Ireland by any other than a subject of Her Majesty,—need not, where the second marriage was contracted abroad, contain an averment that the accused is a British subject. (10)

309. Feigned marriage.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to seven years' imprisonment who procures a feigned or pretended marriage between himself and any woman, or who knowingly aids and assists in procuring such feigned or pretended marriage. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 277.

Under section 1002, post, no person can be convicted of an offence against section 309 upon the evidence of one witness, unless such witness is corroborated in some material particular by evidence implicating the accused.

310. Polygamy.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for five years, and to a fine of five hundred dollars,—

(a) who practises, or, by the rites, ceremonies, forms, rules, or customs of any denomination, sect or society, religious or secular, or by any form of contract, or by mere mutual consent, or by any other method whatsoever, and whether in a manner recognized by law as a binding form of marriage, or not, agrees or consents to practise or enter into

(e) procures, enforces, enables, is a party to, or assists in the execution of, any form of contract which so purports, or the giving of any consent which so purports. 63-64 V., c. 46, s. 3.

Shortly after the passing of the 53 Vic., c. 37, s. 11,—from which this section, 310, of the Code was taken,—it was held that mere cohabitation was not sufficient to sustain a conviction under it. The point came up before the Court of Appeal of the province of Quebec, at Montreal, in March, 1891, in a case in which one Labrie, a married man, was tried for living and cohabiting, in conjugal union, with Rosa Ada Martin, the wife of Joseph B. Martin. Proof was made of the fact of cohabitation and of each of the parties being married to other persons. It was claimed, however, by the defendant's counsel, Mr. St. Pierre, that there was no offence upon which a conviction could be legally sustained, that the clause "who lives, cohabits, or agrees or consents to live or cohabit, in any kind of conjugal union with a person who is married to another, or with a person who lives or cohabits with another or others in any kind of conjugal union" was aimed at the repression of Mormonism, and was taken from the Edmund's Act in the United States; that it was not intended to prevent mere immorality but only applied to Mormons and the like, who, before cohabiting together, go through a marriage of some sort,—a "conjugal union," —supposed to be binding upon them. For the Crown it was contended that the law applied to any one who, being married, cohabited or agreed or consented to cohabit with another married person. The defendant being found guilty, Mr. Justice Baby reserved the point raised by the defence. The late Chief Justice Dorion, in delivering the judgment of the Court, quashing the conviction, said, that it was apparent from the Act that there must be some form of contract between the parties which they might suppose to be binding on them, but which the law was intended to prohibit, and that in this case, therefore, there was no offence shewn within the meaning of the law. (8)

An Indian, who, according to the marriage contract of his tribe, takes two women at the same time as his wives and cohabits with them, is guilty of polygamy under the above section, 310. (9)

Proof of polygamy.—Section 948, post, provides that, "in the case of any indictment under section 310 (b), (c), and (d), no averment or proof of the method in which the sexual relationship charged was entered into, agreed to, or consented to, shall be necessary in any such indictment, or upon the trial of the person thereby charged; nor shall it be necessary upon such trial to prove carnal connection had or intended to be had between the persons implicated."

Where, in a prosecution for polygamy, the proof of the polygamous marriage consisted of the confessions of the accused, and circumstances tending to corroborate the confessions, the evidence, on conviction, was held sufficient to support the verdict. (10)

It has been held, by a district magistrate in the province of Quebec, that a man who, after going through the form of marriage with a woman known to him to be the wife of another man, cohabits with her in open continuous adultery in Canada, claiming to be her second husband and falsely pretending that she had obtained a divorce, is properly convicted of unlawful cohabiting in conjugal union by an illegal form of contract and by mutual consent, contrary to the provisions of the Code prohibiting polygamy. (1)

The accused, in this case, may have been guilty of bigamy, if his pretension that the woman had obtained a divorce from her first husband were shewn to be false to his (the accused's) knowledge; but, in view of several previous decisions to the effect that section 278 (now section 310) of the Code was intended to apply to Mormons, the district magistrate's holding does not seem to be correct. Unlawful Solemnization of Marriage.

311. Solemnization of marriage without lawful authority.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a fine, or to two years' imprisonment, or to both, who,—

(a) without lawful authority, the proof of which shall lie on him, solemnizes or pretends to solemnize any marriage; or,

(b) procures any person to solemnize any marriage knowing that such person is not lawfully authorized to solemnize such marriage, or knowingly aids or abets such person in performing such ceremony. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 279.

A person acting as the pastor of an independent church which is not affiliated with any religious denomination and which has no rites or ceremonies for the appointment or ordination of a minister, is not authorized to perform a marriage ceremony in Ontario under R. S. O. c. 162, sec. 2; and, for doing so is liable under the above section, 311, for the indictable offence of solemnizing a marriage without lawful authority. (3)

312. Solemnization of marriage contrary to law.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a fine, or to one year's imprisonment, who, being lawfully authorized, knowingly and wilfully solemnizes any marriage in violation of the laws of the province in which the marriage is solemnized. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 280.

Abduction.

313. Abduction of a woman of any age.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to ten years' imprisonment who, against her will, takes away or detains any woman of any age, and whether married or not, with intent to marry or carnally know such woman, or to cause her to be married or carnally known by any other person. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 281. (As amended by 8-9 Ed., VII., c. 9, s. 2).

This section applies to every woman,—whether over or under age, whether married or single, and whatever her position in life may be,—so as to protect her from any interference, (either by her abduction or by her detention against her will, with intent to marry or carnally know her or to cause her to be married or carnally known), by rendering any one, who thus interferes with her, liable to ten years' imprisonment.

If the woman be taken away, in the first instance, with her own consent, but afterwards refuse to continue with the offender, and if, he still detain her, against her will, he is punishable, under section 313, for such detention. (1)

If, after having been, in the first instance, forcibly taken away, the woman be afterwards married or defiled, by or at the instance of her abductor, with her own consent, the offence will still be committed within the terms of the above enactment: for the offender is not to escape from liability to punishment, by having prevailed over the weakness of a woman whom he originally got into his power by such base means. (2) Even if she be taken away and married with her own consent, yet, it seems, that, if this be effected by means of fraud, it would still be within the law; for, she cannot, whilst under the influence of fraud, be considered a free agent. (3)

It was held, even before the coming into force of the Canada Evidence Act, 1893, that the woman, though married by her abductor, was a competent witness against him, on the ground that though she was his wife de facto, she was not so, de jure (4); but there can be no doubt upon this point now, under section 4 of the Canada Evidence Act, post, by which every accused's wife or husband is rendered competent as a witness.

314. Abduction of an heiress of any age from motives of lucre; and allurement and taking or detaining of such a woman under twenty-one against the will of her parents.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to fourteen years' imprisonment who, with intent to marry or carnally know any woman, or with intent to cause any woman to be married or carnally known by any other person, such woman having any interest, legal or equitable, present or future, absolute, conditional or contingent, in any real or personal estate, or being a presumptive heiress or co-heiress, or presumptive next of kin, to any one having such an interest,—

(a) from motives of lucre takes away or detains such woman, against her will, whatever the age of such woman;

(b) fraudulently allures, takes away or detains such woman out of the possession and against the will of her father or mother, or other person having the lawful care or charge of her, such woman being under the age of twenty-one years.

2. Every one convicted of an offence defined in this section is incapable of taking any estate or interest, legal or equitable, in any real or personal property of such woman, or in which she has any interest, or which comes to her as such heiress, co-heiress or next of kin; and if any such marriage takes place such property shall, upon such conviction, be settled in such manner as any court of competent jurisdiction, upon any information at the instance of the Attorney-General, appoints. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 282. (As Amended by 8-9 Ed. VII., c. 9, s. 2).

Clause (a) of this section has reference to the taking away or detaining of any heiress of any age against her will, such taking or such detention being from motives of lucre, and with intent to marry or carnally know her or cause her to be married or carnally known. As this clause relates to and punishes, with fourteen years' imprisonment, the abduction or detention, from motives of lucre, of a woman of any age,—having an interest in some property, — with intent, etc., and as section 313 relates to and punishes, by ten years' imprisonment, the abduction or detention of a woman of any age,—whether rich or poor, heiress or no heiress,—with intent, etc., and without regard, as a matter of course, to any motives of lucre, it would seem that, if the prosecution should be unable, in the case of an heiress, to make proof, either, of the defendant's mercenary motives, or of the facts which constitute the woman an heiress, so as to bring the case within the terms of clause (a) of section 314, the defendant could be convicted under section 313 without the necessity of making any such proof.

Clause (b) of section 314 protects an heiress under the age of twenty-one, against being either fraudulently allured from or taken away or detained,—with or without her own consent,—out of the possession and against the will of her parents or guardian, with intent to marry or carnally know her or cause her to be married or carnally known.

In order to constitute the offence, it is not necessary, under either of the above sections, 313 or 314, that there should be an actual marriage or defilement. The intent to marry or defile is sufficient.

The taking away or detaining, against the woman's will, or, in the case of a girl under twenty-one, the fraudulent allurement or the taking or detaining against the will of the parents or guardian, coupled in either case with the intent to marry or carnally know the woman, or have her married or carnally known, constitute the offence.

Evidence must be given on a prosecution under the above section 314, (as amended by the Code Amendment Act of 1909), to prove that a girl under twenty-one, alleged to have been fraudulently detained against her parents' will with intent to marry her, is an heiress or is entitled to real or personal property, within the terms of the statute; and such property interest must be alleged in an indictment or charge. (5)

The intent may be proved by the acts and declaration of the defendant, or may be inferred from the circumstances of the case. (6)

Upon an indictment under any of the clauses of the above sections, 313 and 314, a verdict may, in pursuance of section 949, post, be rendered finding the accused guilty of an attempt, if the evidence warrants it, or ,in pursuance of section 951, post, he may be convicted of a common assault.

315. Abduction of girl under sixteen.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to five years' imprisonment who unlawfully takes or causes to be taken any unmarried girl, who is under the age of sixteen years, out of the possession and against the will of her father or mother, or of any other person having the lawful care or charge of her.

2. It is immaterial whether the girl is taken with her own consent or at her own suggestion or not.

3. It is immaterial whether or not the offender believed the girl to be of or above the age of sixteen. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 283.

The first clause of this section is to the same effect as the Imperial Statute on the subject, (24-25 Vic., c. 100, s. 55).

Where there is no abduction by force, there must be persuasion by the accused by blandishment or otherwise, to constitute an offence of constructive abduction under this section; and if, without such persuasion, the girl suggests going away with him, and he thereupon takes the merely passive part of yielding to the suggestion, it is not an offence under the section. (7)

It has been held that, if the girl,—without any persuasion, inducement or blandishment on the part of the defendant,—leaves her father, so that she has got fairly away from and entirely left home, and then subsequently, goes to the defendant, although, morally, it may be his duty to send her back to her father's possession, his not doing so is no infringement of this enactment; for it does not say that he shall restore her, but only that he shall not take her away. (8)

But, if the girl, while living at home with her father, leaves the house for a mere temporary purpose, intending to return home again, she is, in that case, still in her father's possession, within the meaning of the law, and if, while she is so out of her father's house, temporarily, the defendant induces her to run away with him, he is guilty of the above offence. (9)

Where the defendant met a girl in the street, and, after taking her with him to a neighboring town and there seducing her, returned with her and left her where he had met her, she going home to her father's house, where she lived, it was held that the defendant, who had made no enquiry and did not know who the girl was nor whether she had a father living or not, could not be convicted of an offence, against section 55 of 24-25 Vic., c. 100.

although he had no reason to believe and did not believe her to be a girl of the town. (10)

But such a case would come within the provisions of section 211, ante, so as to render the man guilty of having illicit connection with a girl under the age of sixteen.

It is an offence, under section 315, to take away a natural or illegitimate daughter under sixteen from the possession of her putative father. (1)

It has been held to be an abduction, under this law, to induce the parents, by false and fraudulent representations, to allow the defendant to take the girl away. (2)

Where a girl was encouraged by her mother in a loose course of life, by permitting her to go out alone at night and dance at public-houses, from one of which places she went away with the defendant, it was held that the girl could not be said to be taken away against the mother's will within the meaning of this law. (3)

It should be proved that the girl was under sixteen and unmarried.

It has been held to be no defence, (4) and it is, by the third clause of the above section, expressly declared that it is immaterial, that the offender believed the girl to be of or above the age of sixteen.

It has been held, and it is so declared by the second clause of the above section, that the consent of the girl is immaterial. The gist of the offence is the taking of the girl out of the possession of her parents or of any one having legal care or charge of her, against their will, independently of the taker's motive or intent. So, that the taking need not be by force, active or constructive, and it is no legal excuse or any answer to the charge that there is an absence of any corrupt motive, or that the defendant made use of no other means than the common blandishments of a lover, to induce the girl to elope with and marry him. (5) And so, where the defendant went in the night to the girl's father's house and placed a ladder against her window, and held it for her to descend, which she did, and eloped with him, this was held to be a "taking out of the possession of her father," although the girl herself had proposed the plan to the defendant. (6)

Where, in another case the girl was persuaded by the defendant to go away with him from her father's house, without her father's consent, and she accordingly left home by a pre-arrangement between them and went and met the prisoner at an appointed place, without any intention of going back to her father, this was held to be a taking of the girl out of her father's possession, since up to the time of her meeting with the defendant as appointed, she had not yet absolutely renounced her father's protection, and was still in his constructive possession. (7)

The defendant, by arrangement with the girl, met her and stayed with her away from her father's house for several nights, sleeping with her: the jury found that the father did not consent to this, and that the defendant knew he did not: and they also found that he took the girl away with him in order to gratify his passions and with the intention of then letting her go home, and not with any intention of keeping her from her home permanently; and the conviction, under these circumstances, was held right. (8)

The defendant, by promises, induced a girl to leave her father's house and live with him; and it was held, that he could be convicted, under this law, although not actually present or assisting the girl when she left her father's roof. (9)

A girl who is employed as a barmaid at a distance from her father's house is under the lawful charge of her employer and not in the possession of her father, and, therefore, an indictment will not lie for taking her out of her father's possession. (10)

A, a girl under sixteen, who, with her father's consent, was under the care of B, her uncle, was allowed, by B, to dine at the house of C, the husband of B's sister. C took A for a drive and stayed over night with her, at an hotel, where he debauched her. The next day he left her at B's. Held, that B had the lawful care of A, and that she was unlawfully taken out of his possession by C. (1)

A, having come to Victoria, British Columbia, from a town in the United States, wrote to a girl under sixteen, living with her parents in said town, urging her to come and join him, and, on receiving her reply consenting to come, he sent her money to pay her expenses; and she came to Victoria where A met her and took her to a boarding house where they passed the night together. Upon an indictment against A for abduction under section 283, (now sec. 315), it was held (Davie, C.J., and Crease, J., dissenting), that, inasmuch as, when the girl met A at Victoria, she had abandoned her father's possession and control, A was not guilty of committing, in Canada, the offence of taking her out of her father's control, and, further, that as the reception by the girl of the prisoner's letters was the motive cause of her leaving her father's control, the offence took place out of the jurisdiction of Canadian Courts. (2)

316. Abduction of children under fourteen.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to seven years' imprisonment who, with intent to deprive any parent or guardian of any child under the age of fourteen years, of the possession of such child, or with intent to steal any article about or on the person of such child, unlawfully,—

(a) takes or entices away or detains any child; or

(b) receives or harbors any such child, knowing it to have been unlawfully taken, enticed away or detained with intent aforesaid.

2. Nothing in this section shall extend to any one who gets possession of any child, claiming in good faith a right to the possession of the child. 63-64 V., c. 46, s. 3.

The English Statute (24-25 Vic., c. 100, s. 56), has the words, "by force or fraud," and provides that a person shall be guilty of the offence who.

by force or fraud leads or takes away, or decoys or entices away any child, etc., so that in order to support a conviction in England for feloniously and unlawfully, by fraud, taking away a child under fourteen, with intent thereby to deprive its father of its possession, it is necessary to make proof of the use of some fraud, although it is not necessary to prove that the fraud by means of which the possession of the child was obtained was practised upon the child itself. Where, therefore, a prisoner was convicted upon an indictment charging such an offence,—it having been proved that possession of the child, which was eleven weeks old, had been obtained by means of a fraud practised upon the child' smother, it was held that the prisoner was rightly convicted. (3)

In an English case, a woman was held rightly convicted, upon evidence that the child, having been placed by its mother in the prisoner's service, was afterwards missing, and could not be discovered, and that the woman had given different accounts of what had become of the child, but implying that she had given her up to some third party, although there was no evidence that she still had possession of the child, nor indeed any evidence of where it was. (4)

In an American case it was held that, where a wife separates from and leaves her husband, taking her two-year-old child and is assisted, in leaving her husband, by another person, and the child, after such separation, continues to be in the custody and under the control of the wife,—the person so assisting her to leave her husband is not guilty of unlawfully taking and carrying away the infant child, which the mother continues to retain in her care and possession. (5)

In another American case, it was held, by the Pennsylvania Supreme Court, that under a law of that State, inflicting a penalty for taking or decoying a child under ten years of age, with intent to deprive its parents or guardian of its possession or with intent to steal any article of value about its person, an indictment, omitting these essential ingredients of the offence, was fatally defective; and that an agreement between a father and other persons to get peaceable possession of his child is not a criminal conspiracy where unlawful means are agreed on or used to accomplish their purpose. The defendants in that case, Ira Myers and his mother, were charged with having, with others, conspired to kidnap, decoy and carry away a child under the control and authority of Jessie Myers, and for having, in pursuance of such conspiracy, taken the child from her possession. The defects which the Court found in the indictment were, among others, that it did not allege that the child was under ten years of age, nor that the accused intended to deprive its parents or other persons in lawful charge of the child of the possession, nor to steal any article about its person; but in turning from the defects of the indictment to the proof offered in support of the charge, the Court found the accused Ira Myers to be the father of the child, and that the other persons assisted him in obtaining, without violence or a breach of the peace, the possession of it; but it was contended for the prosecution that the agreement to assist in taking possession of the child constituted a conspiracy. The Court, however, held that, as the father could lawfully take peaceable possession of his own child, it was no offence to agree to aid him in doing so, there being no unlawful means agreed upon or used to accomplish their purpose. (6)

The child's own father may be guilty of child stealing within the above section, 316, of the Code, if, after a divorce by a Court of competent jurisdiction and the award thereon of the custody of the child to the mother, the father wilfully removes the child from her custody. (7)

Defamatory Libel.

317. Defamatory libel defined.—A defamatory libel is matter published, without legal justification or excuse, likely to injure the reputation of any person by exposing him to hatred, contempt or ridicule, or designed to insult the person of or concerning whom it is published.

2. Such matter may be expressed either in words legibly marked upon any substance whatever, or by any object signifying such matter otherwise than by words, and may be expressed either directly or by insinuation or irony. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 285; 63-64 V., c. 46, s. 3.

318. Publishing defined.—Publishing a libel is exhibiting it in public, or causing it to be read or seen, or showing or delivering it, or causing it to be shown or delivered, with a view to its being read or seen by the person defamed or by any other person. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 286.

The above section, 317, contains the same definition of defamatory libel as that contained in section 227 of the English Draft Code, the only difference being that the latter has the word "calculated" in place of the word "likely" appearing above in italics; and with the exception of a few variations, mostly verbal, all the sections of our Code, from and inclusive of 317 to 334 (except section 323), are identical with the corresponding sections of the English Draft Code.

With regard to their definition of libel, the Royal Commissioners say, in a marginal note, that it is "the existing law, the criminality of libel depending upon its tendency to produce a breach of the peace;" and, in another note, they say, in reference to privileged communications, that "sections 229 to 237, inclusive (corresponding with our sections 319, 320, 321, 322, 324, 325, 326, 327 and 328), are believed to declare the existing common law as to what constitutes a privileged communication;" but that "there has been a diversity of judicial opinion upon this subject."

It will be seen, by the second clause of section 317, that the libellous matter may be either by words legibly marked, that is, written or printed, etc., on any substance, such as, for instance, paper, parchment, linen, wood, copper, glass, stone, etc.; or by any object signifying any such matter in some other way than by words, as, for instance, by a statue, (1) a wax model, (2) or an effigy, (3) etc., or by a picture, a drawing, a sketch, a painting, (4) an engraving, a photograph, etc., or by fixing up a gallows against a man's door. (5)

A chalk mark on a wall may be a libel; and, as the wall cannot be conveniently brought into Court, secondary evidence may be given of the mark. (6)

The delivery at the post office of a sealed letter enclosing a libel is a publication of the libel at the place of posting. (7)

When an indictment for defamatory libel consisting of words inoffensive in themselves but capable, by irony, of being construed into an imputation of dishonorable conduct, contains, in addition to the offensive words, an allegation of the sense in which they would be understood, the Crown may prove extrinsic circumstances which would cause such sense to be attached to the words. It is not necessary that these circumstances should be set forth in the indictment, and the accused is sufficiently protected from surprise by the right given to him to ask for particulars of the charge. In default of a demand on his behalf for particulars, he cannot object to such evidence, and there would be no ground for a reserved case as to the legality of the admission. (7a)

319. Publishing on invitation or challenge.—No one commits an offence by publishing defamatory matter on the invitation or challenge of the person defamed thereby, nor if it is necessary to publish such defamatory matter in order to refute some other defamatory statement published by that person concerning the alleged offender, if such defamatory matter is believed to be true, and is relevant to the invitation, challenge or required refutation, and the publishing does not in manner or extent exceed what is reasonably sufficient for the occasion. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 287.

This section provides that a defamatory publication shall be no offence, —1, when it is published by invitation or challenge from the person defamed, or, 2, when it is a necessary refutation of a previously published defamatory statement; provided, in either case, it be relevant and be believed to be true.

INVITED OR CHALLENGED PUBLICATIONS.—It would hardly be proper to punish communications procured by the complainant's own contrivance and request. If the only publication that can be proved is one made by the defendant in response to an application from the complainant or one of his agents or some one acting on his behalf, demanding an explanation, it seems only right that the answer, if fair and relevant, should be privileged. But this rule does not apply when there has been a previous unprivileged publication, by the defendant, of the same libel which causes or leads to inquiry by the party defamed; for, in that case, it is the defendant himself who has brought on the inquiry.

If there are rumors afloat prejudicial to a man's character and he endeavors to trace them to their source, all statements made bona fide to him or any agent of his, in the course of such an investigation, are rightly protected. (8) But it makes a great difference if the rumors originated with the defendant, so that what he has, himself, previously circulated produces the inquiry; and if, on being applied to, he acknowledges having originated the rumors and persists in and repeats the libellous or defamatory matter, or asserts his belief in it, the repetition will not be privileged, although thus elicited by the person defamed. A, a servant knowing the character which B, his master, would give him, procured C to write a letter to B, in order to obtain from the latter an answer upon which to ground proceedings for libel. Held, that such proceedings could not be maintained. (10)

A witness (an agent of the plaintiff), hearing that the defendant had a copy of a libellous print, went to defendant's house, and asked to see it; the defendant thereupon produced it, and pointed out the figure of the plaintiff, and the other persons caricatured. Lord Ellenborough non-suited the plaintiff, as there was no other publication proved. (1)

A discharged B, his servant, and when applied to, by another gentleman, gave him a bad character. B's brother-in-law, C, thereupon repeatedly called on A, to inquire why he had dismissed B; and at last A wrote to C, stating his reasons specifically. B sued out a writ the same day the letter was written. Held, by Lord Mansfield, C.J., and Butler, J., that no action lay on such letter, as A was evidently entrapped into writing it. (2)

A friend of plaintiff's asked defendant to act as arbitrator between plaintiff and A, in a dispute about a horse. Defendant declined. The friend wrote again strongly urging defendant to use his influence with A, not to bring the case into Court. Defendant again declined, and stated his reasons; and, on this letter, plaintiff brought an action. Subsequently another friend of the plaintiff's, with his knowledge and consent, wrote to defendant that she was confident he was misinformed about the plaintiff. Defendant replied that he believed A, and his servant, and not the plaintiff. On this plaintiff brought a second action of libel. Held, that both letters were privileged. (3)

The plaintiff was a builder, and contracted to build certain school-rooms at Bermondsey. The defendant started a false report, that in the building the plaintiff had used inferior timber; the report reached the plaintiff, who thereupon suspended the work, and demanded an inquiry; and the committee of the school employed defendant to survey the work and report. He reported falsely that inferior timber was used. Lord Lyndhurst directed the jury, that if they believed that the reports which produced the inquiry originated with the defendant, the defendant's report to the committee was not privileged. Verdict for the plaintiff. (4)

PROVOKED PUBLICATION.—If a person is attacked in a newspaper, he may write back to rebut the charges made against him and may retort upon his assailant, when such retort is a necessary part of his defence, or fairly arises out of the charges made against him. (5) The privilege, however, extends only to such retorts as are a fair answer to the assailant's attacks.

wrote a charge to his clergy refuting these insinuations, and sent it to the newspapers for publication. Held, that under the circumstances, the bishop was justified in sending the charge to the newspapers, for an attack made in public required a public answer. (6)

The defendant was a candidate for the county of Waterford. Shortly before the election, the Kilkenny Tenant Farmers' Association published in Freeman's Journal an address to the constituency, describing the defendant as "a true type of a bad Irish landlord—the scourge of the country," and charging him with tyranny and oppression towards his tenants, and especially towards the plaintiff, one of his former tenants. The defendant thereupon published, also in Freeman's Journal, an address to the constituency, answering these charges, and, in so doing, necessarily libelled the plaintiff. Held, that such an address, being an answer to an attack, was primâ facie privileged. (7)

The plaintiff, a policy-holder in an insurance company, published a pamphlet accusing the directors of fraud. The directors published a pamphlet in reply, declaring the charges contained in the plaintiff's pamphlet to be false and calumnious, and also asserting that in a suit instituted by the plaintiff, the latter had sworn, in support of these charges, the opposite of his own handwriting. Cockburn, C.J., held the directors' pamphlet primâ facie privileged, and directed the jury as follows: "If you are of opinion that it was published bonâ fide in defence of the company, and to prevent these charges from operating to their prejudice, and to vindicate the character of the directors, and not with a view to injure or lower the character of the plaintiff, and think that the publication did not go beyond the occasion, you ought to find for the defendants on the general issue." Verdict for defendants. (8)

A, the manager of a private lunatic asylum, unsuccessfully attempted to seize and carry off B, a lady, whom he bonâ fide believed to be insane. He did so at the request of her husband, proper certificates having been obtained and all the requirements of the Lunacy Act complied with. B, who was perfectly sane, constantly afterwards attacked A in the newspapers, challenging him to justify his conduct. A, at last, wrote a letter in answer to these attacks and sent it to the British Medical Journal. Huddleston, B, held this letter privileged. (9)

At a vestry meeting called to elect fresh overseers, A accused B, one of the outgoing overseers, of neglecting the interests of the vestry, and not collecting the rates; B retorted that A had been bribed by a railway company. Held, that the retort was a mere tu quoque, in no way connected with the charge made against B by A, and was therefore not privileged; for it was not made in self-defence, but in counter-attack. 320. Publishing proceedings of courts of justice.—No one commits an offence by publishing any defamatory matter, in any proceeding held before or under the authority of any court exercising judicial authority, or in any inquiry made under the authority of any statute or by order of His Majesty, or of any of the departments of government, Dominion or provincial. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 288.

321. Publishing parliamentary papers.—No one commits an offence by publishing to either the Senate, or House of Commons, or to any Legislative Council, Legislative Assembly or House of Assembly, defamatory matter contained in a petition to the Senate, or House of Commons, or to any such Council or Assembly, or by publishing by order or under the authority of the Senate, or House of Commons, or of any such Council or Assembly, any paper containing defamatory matter or by publishing, in good faith and without ill-will to the person defamed, any extract from or abstract of any such paper. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 289.

With regard to the publication of proceedings of a legislative body, by order or under the authority of such body, see sections 912 and 913, post; and with regard to the publication of any extract from any paper containing defamatory matter which has been published by order or under the authority of parliament or of a legislature, see section 947, post.

322. Fair reports of proceedings of parliament.—No one commits an offence by publishing in good faith, for the information of the public, a fair report of the proceedings of the Senate or House of Commons, or any committee thereof, or of any Council or Assembly aforesaid, or any committee thereof, or of the public proceedings, preliminary or final, heard before any court exercising judicial authority, nor by publishing, in good faith, any fair comment upon any such proceedings. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 290.

The rule embodied in this section applies to all Courts of justice, superior or inferior, of record or not of record. (1) It is immaterial whether the proceeding be ex parte or not; and recent decisions in England,—where the law on the subject is not so wide as ours as expressed in the above section,—shew that it is also immaterial whether the matter be one over which the Court has jurisdiction or not, and whether it disposes of the case finally or sends it for trial to a higher tribunal. (2)

Formerly, the law was not construed so as to privilege reports of proceedings (especially when ex parte) before police magistrates or justices of the peace; and many Judges, by their dicta, denied any privilege to fair and accurate reports of ex parte proceedings, even in the superior Courts; (3) but a different view was afterwards taken by such Judges as Cockburn, C.J., (4) and Lawrence, J., (5) who saw a good reason for such a privilege in the fact that "the general advantage to the country of having the proceedings of all Courts of Justice made public more than counterbalances the inconvenience to private persons, whose conduct may be the subject of such proceedings."

In the course of his remarks in the case of Wason v. Walter, Cockburn, C.J., said: "The true criterion of the privilege is not whether the report was or was not of a proceeding ex parte, but whether it was a fair and honest report of what had taken place, published simply with a view to the information of the public, and innocent of all intention to do injury to the reputation of the party affected."

It was not until 1878 that the law became settled, in England, by the decision in Usill's case, in which it was held that the privilege extended to all bonâ fide and correct reports of all proceedings in a magistrate's Court, whether ex parte or otherwise.

Usill's case arose out of an item, which appeared in three London newspapers, in the following words:—

"Three gentlemen, civil engineers, were among the applicants to the magistrate yesterday, and they applied for criminal process against Mr. Usill, a civil engineer of Great Queen Street, Westminster. The spokesman stated that they had been engaged in the survey of an Irish railway by Mr. Usill, and had not been paid what they had earned in their various capacities, although from time to time they had received small sums on account; and, as the person complained of had been paid, they considered that he had been guilty of a criminal offence in withholding their money. Mr. Woolrych said it was a matter of contract between the parties: and although on the face of the application they had been badly treated, he must refer them to the County Court."

Mr. Usill sued the proprietor of each of three newspapers, and the three actions were tried together before Lord Coleridge. The learned Judge told the jury that the only question for their consideration was whether or not the publication complained of was a fair and impartial report of what took place before the magistrate; and that, if they found that it was so, the publication was privileged. The jury found that it was a fair report of what occurred, and accordingly returned a verdict for the defendant in each case. Held, that the report was privileged, although the proceedings were ex parte, and although the magistrate decided that he had no jurisdiction over the matter. (6)

The same principle was followed in a still more recent English case, in which a fair and accurate report of an ex parte application made to justices in open Court for the issue of a summons for perjury was held privileged, although, in that case, the justices granted the summons, and the matter was not finally disposed of on that day but came on for hearing a week later, and was then dismissed. The Court of Appeal held that it was enough if there was a final decision "at one stage or other of the proceedings," and that the reporters might report the proceedings at each stage. (7) In other words, a newspaper reporter may report everything that occurs publicly in open Court without fear of any action, provided only that his reports are fair and accurate. (8)

So, that although, in the English Statutory Law relating to the subject, there is no provision,—such as that contained in our law,—expressly including both preliminary and final proceedings, the rule privileging fair and accurate reports of proceedings before a public Court of Justice, is held in England, to extend to preliminary as well as to final proceedings.

There are two cases, however, in which reports of judicial proceedings, although fair and accurate, are not privileged. The first is where the Court has itself prohibited the publication, as it has the power to do pending litigation, (9) although nowadays such a prohibition is very rare; (10) and the second is where the subject matter of the trial is an obscene or blasphemous libel or where for any other reason the proceedings are unfit for publication. It is not justifiable to publish even a fair and accurate report of such proceedings: and such a report is indictable as a criminal libel. (1)

The Court has power summarily to commit for constructive contempt, notwithstanding sections 322, 324 and 325 of the Code, as to fair reports of Court proceedings and fair comment upon public affairs: but the Court will not exercise the power where the offence is of a trifling nature, but only when necessary to prevent interference with the course of justice.

A statement in a newspaper editorial to the effect that one of the parties to a pending suit will lose the case, is a contempt of Court.

A statement to the effect that a Judge of the Court having taken an active part in a general election, would have to devote his spare moments to schooling himself into forgetfulness of his political career, is not a contempt.

A statement to the effect that the spectacle of such Judge trying election cases is not edifying and that it does not produce a good impression in the public mind, is not a contempt.

A party to a suit has a status to move to commit a stranger to the suit for constructive contempt, although no affidavit is filed by him or on his behalf to the effect that the alleged contempt is calculated to prejudice him in his suit.

Any person may bring to the notice of the Court any alleged contempt; but, unless the offence is of so serious a nature as to make it necessary to inflict summary punishment in order to prevent interference with the course of justice, there should be no commitment. (2)

Where a jury disagreed upon the trial of an indictment and a new jury was ordered for another sitting the case is in the meantime still a pending one; and improper and partial newspaper comments thereon passed by one of the accused will constitute a contempt of Court by him. The Court in imposing sentence upon a newspaper proprietor for a contempt of Court contained in a newspaper comment may, in addition to the infliction of a fine and imprisonment, require the accused to find sureties to keep the peace and to refrain from publishing further articles reflecting on the pending case and may order imprisonment for six months or until security is sooner given or until the pending cause is sooner ended. (3)

It has been held, in England, that the High Court of Justice there has jurisdiction to grant a writ of attachment against a person who publishes improper comments with reference to the defendant in a case, pending before justices, which may possibly, though not necessarily, come before the High Court. (4)

A reception order having been made under the Imperial Lunacy Act, 1890, proceedings were taken under section 49 of the Act for the examination of the patient by two medical practitioners appointed by the Commissioners in Lunacy with a view to his discharge. Reports were made by two medical practitioners under the section, but the Commissioners refused to order the discharge of the patient. A newspaper subsequently published the two reports in an article commenting on the detention of the patient. A day before the publication of the reports an application was made under section 116 of the Act for the appointment of a receiver of the patient's property during his detention, and the reports of the two doctors were made exhibits to an affidavit in these proceedings. Neither the publisher nor the editor of the newspaper knew of these proceedings under section 116, nor did the articles discuss such proceedings. Upon an application to commit for contempt of Court in publishing the reports of the doctors and the article, it was held that, as the proceedings under section 49 were concluded, it was not a contempt of Court to publish the reports and the article, and that, as to the pending proceedings under section 116, there was no evidence that the respondents knew of those proceedings, and they were therefore not guilty of contempt. (5)

Where a person having been charged before the petty sessions with an indictable offence, triable only at the assizes, matter is published in a newspaper tending to interfere with the fair trial of the charge, the High Court has jurisdiction to attach the publisher of such matter, for contempt of Court, notwithstanding that at the time of the publication the person had not yet been committed for trial. (6)

323. Fair reports of public meetings.—No one commits an offence by publishing in good faith, in a newspaper, a fair report of the proceedings of any public meeting if the meeting is lawfully convened for a lawful purpose and open to the public, and if such report is fair and accurate, and if the publication of the matter complained of is for the public benefit, and if the defendant does not refuse to insert in a conspicuous place in the newspaper in which the report appeared a reasonable letter or document of explanation or contradiction by or on behalf of the prosecutor. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 291.

The provision contained in this section is not contained in the English Draft Code.

REPORTS OF PUBLIC MEETINGS.—It will be seen by this section, 233, that, in order for the report of the proceedings of a public meeting to be privileged, not only must the meeting be one open to the public, but the matter reported and published, as an account of what has taken place at such public meeting, must be matter which is of public concern, and the publication of which is for the public benefit.

This is only right; for it would be a very serious matter to privilege the reproduction in public print of everything of a private nature, or anything not of public interest spoken, at a meeting, of and injurious to the reputation of individuals. A meeting may be thinly attended, or the audience may know the speaker who utters the slanderous words at such meeting to be unworthy of credit, and may not believe what he says. But it would be a terrible thing for the person defamed if such words could be printed and published to all the world, merely because they were uttered at a meeting. Charges recklessly made in the excitement of the moment might thus be diffused throughout the country, and would remain recorded in a permanent form against a perfectly innocent person. We cannot tell into whose hands a copy of that newspaper may come. Moreover, additional importance and weight is given to such a calumny by its publication in the columns of a respectable paper. Many people will believe it merely because it is in print. If the report is to be spread over the world by means of the press, the malignant falsehoods of the vilest of mankind, which would not receive the least credit where the author is known, would make an impression which it would require much time and trouble to erase, and which it might be difficult, if not impossible, ever completely to remove. (7)

Section 323 is to the same effect as was section 2, (now repealed), of the Imperial Statute 44 and 45 Vic., c. 60, (the Newspaper Libel and Registration Act, 1881). The present English Law on the subject is contained in the Law of Libel Amendment Act, 1888, section 4, which is as follows:—

"A fair and accurate report published in any newspaper of the proceedings of a public meeting, or, (except where neither the public or any newspaper reporter is admitted), of any meeting of a vestry, town council, school board, board of guardians, board or local authority formed or constituted under the provision of any Act of Parliament, or of any committee appointed by any of the above mentioned bodies, or of any meeting of any commissioners authorized to act by letters-patent, Act of Parliament, warrant under the Royal Sign Manual, or other lawful warrant or authority, select committees of either House of Parliament, justices of the peace in quarter sessions assembled for administrative or deliberative purposes, and the publication at the request of any government office or department, officer of state, commissioner of police, or chief constable, of any notice or report issued by them for the information of the public, shall be privileged unless it shall be proved that such report or publication was published or made maliciously: Provided that nothing in this section shall authorize the publication of any blasphemous or indecent matter: Provided, also, that the protection intended to be afforded by this section shall not be available as a defence in any proceedings if it shall be proved that the defendant has been requested to insert in the newspaper in which the report or other publication complained of appeared a reasonable letter or statement, by way of contradiction or explanation of such report or other publication, and has refused or neglected to insert the same: Provided, further, that nothing in this section contained shall be deemed or construed to limit or abridge any privilege now by law existing, or to protect the publication of any matter not of public concern and the publication of which is not for the public benefit.

"For the purposes of this section public meeting shall mean any meeting bonâ fide and lawfully held for a lawful purpose, and for the furtherance or discussion of any matter of public concern, whether the admission thereto be general or restricted."

324. Fair discussion — Public benefit.—No one commits an offence by publishing any defamatory matter which he, on reasonable grounds, believes to be true, and which is relevant to any subject of public interest, the public discussion of which is for the public benefit. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 292.

MATTERS OF PUBLIC INTEREST.—Among matters of public interest Odgers (8) mentions the following:—

1. Affairs of State; (including the policy, foreign or domestic, of the government, the conduct of public servants, all suggestions of reforms in existing laws, all bills before parliament, the adjustment and collection of taxes, etc.);

2. The administration of justice; (including the conduct of suitors and witnesses, the verdicts of juries, etc., but on these during the progress of a trial there should be nothing beyond simple reports, and no comments until after the trial is ended);

Condemnation of the foreign policy of the Government, however sweeping, is no libel.

The evidence before a Royal Commission is matter publici juris, and everyone has a perfect right to criticise it. (9)

So is evidence taken before a Parliamentary Committee on a local gas bill. (10)

A report of the Board of Admiralty upon the plans of a naval architect, submitted to the Lords of the Admiralty for their consideration, is a matter of national interest. (1)

All appointments by the Government to any office are matters of public concern. (2)

A newspaper is entitled to comment on the fact (if it be one) that corrupt practices extensively prevailed at a recent Parliamentary election so long as it does not make charges against individuals. (3)

A meeting assembled to hear a political address by a candidate at a Parliamentary election, and the conduct thereat of all persons who take any part in such meeting, are fair subjects for bonâ fide discussion by a writer in a public newspaper. (4)

The details of a long-protracted squabble between a professional singer and a great composer do not become matters of public interest, merely because the former ultimately applies to a police magistrate for a summons against the latter. (5)

"The management of the poor and the administration of the poor-law in each local district are matters of public interest." (6)

The official conduct of a way-warden may be freely criticised in the local press. (7)

The manner in which a coroner's officer treats a deceased's poor relatives when serving them with a summons for an inquest, and the behavior of such officer in court, are matters of public concern. (8)

The conduct of a trustee of a private corporation, as such trustee, is not a matter of public interest. (9)

The press may comment on the fact of the incumbent of a parish having, contrary to the wishes of the church-warden, allowed books to be sold in church during the service, and cooked a chop in the vestry after service. (10)

The court were equally divided on the question whether sermons preached in open church, but not printed and published, were matter for public comment. (10*a*)

Quære, would it not depend upon whether or not the sermon itself dealt with matters of public interest?

The articles which appear in a newspaper and its general tone and style may be the subject of adverse criticism, as well as any other literary production; but no attack should be made on the private character of a writer on its staff. (10*b*)

A comic picture of the author of a book, as author, bowing beneath the weight of his volume, is no libel; though a personal caricature of him as he appeared in private life would be. (10*c*)

Criticism, however trenchant, on any new poem or novel, or on any picture exhibited in a public gallery, is no libel. (10*d*)

But to maliciously pry into the private life of any poet, novelist, artist, or statesman, is indefensible.

A gentleman unconnected with the stage got up what he called "a Dramatic Ball." The company was disorderly and far from select. No actor or actress of any reputation was present at the ball, or took any share in the arrangements. The Era, the special organ of the theatrical profession, published an indignant article, commenting severely on the conduct of the prosecutor in starting such a ball for his own profit, and particularly in calling such an assembly "a Dramatic Ball." Criminal proceedings resulted in a verdict of "Not guilty." (10*e*)

A newspaper, commenting on a flower-show, denounced one exhibitor by name as "a beggarly soul," "famous in all sorts of dirty work," and spoke of "the tricks by which he and a few like him used to secure prizes" as being now "broken in upon by some judges more honest than usual." Such remarks are clearly not fair criticism on the flower-show. (10*f*)

Whoever seeks notoriety, or invites public attention, is said to challenge public criticism; and he cannot resort to the law courts if that criticism be less favorable than he anticipated. (1)

So that, if a complainant in a prosecution for defamatory libel, has himself called public attention to the subject matter of the alleged libel by obtaining the publication of newspaper articles commending his conduct, he thereby invites public criticism thereof and cannot object that the answer to his own articles is not a publication in the public interest. (2) composition or work of art or performance publicly exhibited, or on any other communication made to the public on any subject, if such comments are confined to criticism on such book or literary production, composition, work of art, performance or communication. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 293.

We have seen already, (3), that,—side by side with the gradual development and advance of broader popular views and sentiments,—corresponding changes and improvements, in the general law of libel, have been effected, partly by express legislation on that subject, (4) and partly by the tacit establishment and judicial recognition of the modern rule or right of fair comment; so that the old idea of libel, — written blame, true or false, of any man public or private,—which held firm possession of the judicial mind, a hundred years ago, has long since been relegated to a place among the things of the past, and has given way to the more modern, common sense doctrine which allows to every man, the right to give free and honest expression to his views on matters of public interest and general concern.

In the words of Cockburn, C. J.,—"Our law of libel has, in many respects, only gradually developed itself into anything like a satisfactory and settled form. The full liberty of public writers to comment on the conduct and motives of public men has only in very recent times been recognized. Comments on government, on ministers and officers of state, on members of both Houses of Parliament, on judges and other public functionaries, are now made every day, which half a century ago would have been the subject of actions or ex officio informations, and would have brought down fine and imprisonment on publishers and authors. Yet who can doubt that the public are gainers by the change, and that, though injustice may often be done, and though public men may often have to smart under the keen sense of wrong inflicted by hostile criticism, the nation profits by public opinion being thus freely brought to bear on the discharge of public duties." (5)

The real ground upon which the right of fair and honest comment and criticism rests is not, in a strictly legal sense, that of the matter being privileged by reason of the occasion, but that honest criticism is no libel: in other words, when anything defamatory is used in the course of any criticism, it is no longer criticism, so far as the defamatory part of it is concerned.

Odgers points out that true criticism differs from defamation in the following particulars:—

"1. Criticism deals only with such things as invite public attention, or call for public comment. It does not follow a public man into his private life, or pry into his domestic concerns;

"2. Criticism never attacks the individual, but only his work. Such work may be either the policy of a government, the action of a member of parliament, a public entertainment, a book published, or a picture exhibited. In every case the attack is on a man's acts, or on some thing and not upon the man himself. A true critic never indulges in personalities, but confines himself entirely to the merits of the subject matter before him;

"3. The critic never takes advantage of the occasion to gratify private malice, or to attain any other object beyond the fair discussion of matters of public interest, and the judicious guidance of the public taste. He will carefully examine the production before him, and then honestly and fearlessly state his true opinion of it." (6)

"Every one has a right to publish such fair and candid criticism, even although the author may suffer loss from it. Such a loss the law does not consider as an injury, because it is a loss which the party ought to sustain. It is, in short, the loss of fame and profits to which he was never entitled. * * * Reflection upon personal character is another thing. Show me an attack upon the moral character of the plaintiff, or any attack upon his character unconnected with his authorship, and I should be as ready as any judge who ever sat here to protect him. But, I cannot hear of malice on account of turning his works into ridicule." (7)

"Liberty of criticism must be allowed, or we should neither have purity of taste nor of morals. Fair discussion is essentially necessary to the truth of history and the advancement of science. That publication, therefore, I shall never consider as a libel, which has for its object, not to injure the reputation of any individual, but to correct misrepresentations of fact, to refute sophistical reasoning, to expose a vicious taste in literature, or to censure what is hostile to morality." (8)

"A critic must confine himself to criticism, and not make it the veil for personal censure, nor allow himself to run into reckless and unfair attacks merely from the love of exercising his power of denunciation." (9)

Comment on well-known facts, or facts which are admitted to exist, is a very different thing from asserting as a fact, something which is unsubstantiated, and then commenting upon the thing so asserted and unsubstantiated.

The very statement of the rule as to fair and bonâ fide comment on a matter of public interest assumes that the matters commented upon have been, somehow or other, ascertained to be actual facts. It does not mean that a man may invent something, and then proceed to comment upon it, in what would be a fair and bonâ fide manner, if the thing were actually a fact well known or admitted.

It is one thing to comment upon or criticise, even with severity, the acknowledged or proved acts of a public man, and quite another to make the bare assertion that he has been guilty of particular acts of misconduct.

Although the right to comment upon the public acts of public men is not the peculiar privilege of the press, but the right of citizens generally, and although, in strict law, newspaper writers stand in no better position than any other person, still they are usually allowed greater latitude by juries; for, in a great measure, the duty of watching narrowly the conduct of government officials and the working of all public institutions, and of commenting freely on all matters of general concern to the nation, and of fearlessly exposing abuses, is a duty which has come to be looked upon by the public at large, as one within the peculiar province of the press.

Odgers also points out that "Comment and criticism on matters of public interest stand on a very different footing from reports of judicial or Parliamentary proceedings. Such reports are privileged, so long as they are fair and accurate reports, and nothing more. But so soon as there is any attempt at comment, the privilege is lost. In short, report and comment are two distinct and separate things. A report is the mechanical reproduction, more or less condensed or abridged, of what actually took place:

comment is the judgment passed, on the circumstances reported, by one who has applied his mind to them. Fair reports are privileged publications; while fair comments, if on matters of public interest, are, as such, no libels at all." (10)

A newspaper is entitled to comment upon the hearing of a criminal charge and the evidence produced thereat, and discuss the conduct of the magistrates in dismissing the charge without hearing all the evidence; but not to disclose "evidence which might have been adduced" and argue therefrom that the accused was guilty of the felony. (1)

A and B owned the Natal Witness, in which they attacked the official conduct of C, the British Resident Commissioner in Zululand, asserting that he had violently assaulted a Zulu chief, that he had set on his native police to assault and abuse others, etc. They declared that though doubt had been thrown on these stories they would prove to be true on investigation. They then proceeded, on the assumption that the charges were true, to comment on C's conduct in offensive and injurious language. At the trial, it was proved that the charges were without foundation; and A and B made no attempt to support them by evidence. Verdict for £500. Motion for a new trial refused by Supreme Court of Natal. Held, on appeal to Privy Council that the distinction must be closely drawn between comment or criticism, and allegations of fact; and that the publication was in no way privileged. (2)

A newspaper reported that the mother of a lady, dead and buried, had applied to the coroner, on affidavits that the body might be exhumed, and proceeded to give a sensational narrative of shocking acts of cruelty to the deceased committed by her husband, imputing that he had caused her death. This narrative commenced:—"From inquiries made by our reporter it appears," etc. In reality the reporter had made no inquiries; he had merely read the affidavits, and accepted the ex parte statements contained in them as truth; they were in fact wholly false. He was convicted and fined £50. (3)

A Dublin newspaper asserted that plaintiff, the manager of the Queen's Printing Office in Ireland, had corruptly supplied Freeman's Journal with official information and surreptitious copies of official documents. A plea of fair comment, stating that Freeman's Journal did somehow get official information earlier than other papers, and that defendant bonâ fide believed that such information could only have been obtained from the Queen's Printing Office, was held bad on demurrer. (4)

It is not a fair comment on any legal proceedings to insinuate that a particular witness committed perjury in the course of them. (5)

A, in "A History of New Zealand," stated that B, a cavalry lieutenant, had charged at some women and children who were harmlessly hunting pigs, "and cut them down gleefully and with ease;" that he had dismissed a subordinate officer who protested against this cruelty, and that he was known among the Maoris as "Kohuru" (the murderer). A admitted that these facts did not appear in official reports, or in any other history of New Zealand; but he called a witness who had made a statement to the Governor of New Zealand on hearsay evidence, containing the same charge, a copy of which statement the Governor had forwarded to A. Held no defence. Verdict £5,000, damages. (6)

326. Publication seeking remedy for grievance.—No one commits an offence by publishing defamatory matter for the purpose, in good faith, of seeking remedy or redress for any private or public wrong or grievance from a person who has, or is reasonably believed by the person publishing to have, the right or to be under obligation to remedy or redress such wrong or grievance, if the defamatory matter is believed by the person publishing the same to be true, and is relevant to the remedy or redress sought, and such publishing does not in manner or extent exceed what is reasonably sufficient for the occasion. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 294.

In making an application for the purpose of obtaining redress for some injury received, care should be taken to make the application to some one having jurisdiction to entertain it, or having power to redress the grievance, or who is reasonably believed, by the applicant, to be under some obligation to afford a remedy; for if the applicant recklessly make statements to some one who is, as he ought to have known, altogether unconcerned with the matter, the privilege may be lost. (7)

A letter to the Secretary of War, with the intent to prevail on him to exert his authority to compel the plaintiff (an officer of the army), to pay a debt due from him to defendant, was held privileged, although the Secretary of War had no direct power or authority to order the plaintiff to pay his debt. "It was an application," says Best, J., "for the redress of a grievance, made to one of the King's ministers, who, as the defendant honestly thought, had authority to afford him redress." (8)

The inhabitants of a district prepared a memorial charging plaintiff, a teacher in a district school, with drunkenness and immorality, and sent it to the local superintendent of schools. It ought strictly to have been sent first, to the trustees of that particular school, who would, then, if they thought fit, in due course forward it to the local superintendent to take action upon it. Held, that the publication was still primâ facie privileged, although, by a mistake easily made, sent to the wrong quarter in the first instance. (9)

An elector of Frome petitioned the Home Secretary, stating that plaintiff, a magistrate of the borough, had made speeches inciting to a breach of the peace, and praying for an inquiry, and for plaintiff's removal from the commission of the peace. Such petition was held to be privileged, although it should more properly have been addressed to the Lord Chancellor. (10)

327. Answers to inquiries.—No one commits an offence by publishing, in answer to inquiries made of him, defamatory matter relating to some subject as to which the person by whom, or on whose behalf, the inquiry is made has, or on reasonable grounds is believed by the person publishing to have, an interest in knowing the truth, if such matter is published for the purpose, in good faith, of giving information in respect thereof to that person, and if such defamatory matter is believed to be true, and is relevant to the inquiries made, and also if such publishing does not in manner or extent exceed what is reasonably sufficient for the occasion. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 295.

The answer to an inquiry should not consist of irrelevant information gratuitously volunteered. For instance, if A asks B the name and address of C, B is not justified in launching out into some disparagement of C's credit or conduct.

If A is about to have dealings with B, but first comes to C and confidentially asks him his opinion of B, C's answer is privileged. (1)

If a friend tells me he wants a good lawyer to act for him and asks my opinion of Smith, I am justified in telling him all I know for or against Smith. But if a stranger asks me in the train, "Is not that gentleman a lawyer?" I should not be justified in replying, "Yes, but he ought to have been stripped of his gown long ago."

A met B, and addressing him said: "I hear that you say the bank of Bromage and Sneath at Monmouth has stopped. Is it true?" B answered, "Yes, I was told so. It was so reported at Cricklewell; nobody would take their bills, and I came to town in consequence of it myself." Held, that if B understood A to be asking for information by which to regulate his conduct, and spoke the words by way of honest advice, they were primâ facie privileged. (2)

A was asked to sign a memorial, to retain B as trustee of a charity from which office he was about to be removed. A refused to sign, and on being pressed for his reasons, stated them. Held, privileged. (3)

A had been a Major-General commanding irregular troops during the Crimean war. Complaint having been made of the insubordination of the troops, the corps commanded by A was placed under the superior command of General Vivian. A then resigned, and General Vivian directed General Shirley to inquire and report on the state of the corps, and referred him for information on the matter to B, General Vivian's private secretary and civil commissioner. All communications made by B to General Shirley touching the corps and A's management of it are privileged, if the jury find that B honestly believed that he was acting within the scope of his duty in making them. (4)

Where a father employed the defendant to make inquiries about the position and antecedents of his daughter's husband, a report by the defendant to the father of the result of his inquiries is privileged. (5)

Nash selected A to be his attorney in an action. B, apparently a total stranger, wrote to Nash to deprecate his so employing A. This was held to be clearly not a confidential communication. (6)

A husband asked a medical man to see his wife and ascertain her mental condition. He reported to the husband that she was insane. Held, a privileged communication (7)

I am not justified in standing at the door of a tradesman's shop and voluntarily defaming his character to his intending customers. But if an intending customer comes to me and inquires as to the respectability or credit of that tradesman, it is my duty to tell him all I know.

Horsford was about to deal with the plaintiff, when he met the defendant, who said at once, without his opinion being asked at all, "If you have anything to do with Storey, you will live to repent it; he is a most unprincipled man," etc. Lord Denman directed a verdict for the plaintiff, because the defendant began by making the statement, without waiting to be asked. (8)

328. Giving information.—No one commits an offence by publishing to another person defamatory matter for the purpose of giving information to that person with respect to some subject as to which he has, or is, on reasonable grounds, believed to have such an interest in knowing the truth as to make the conduct of the person giving the information reasonable under the circumstances, if such defamatory matter is relevant to such subject, and is either true, or is made without ill-will to the person defamed, and in the belief, on reasonable grounds, that it is true. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 296.

In a marginal note, upon the subject of this section, the Royal Commissioners cite, as an authority to be referred to, in connection with this class of privileged communications, the case of Coxhead v. Richards. (9)

In that case, the Judges of the English Court of Common Pleas stood equally divided, as to whether a man may inform the owner of a ship that his captain has been guilty of gross misconduct at sea. A, the defendant in the case, had received, from an old and intimate friend, B, the first mate of a merchant ship, a letter stating that he, B, was placed in a very awkward position owing to the drunken habits, etc., of C, the captain of the ship, of which B was the first mate, and saying,—"How shall I act? It is my duty to write to Mr. Ward [the owner of the ship], but my doing so would ruin the captain and his wife and family." A,—after much deliberation and consultation with other nautical friends,—thought it his duty to shew the letter to Ward, and did so; whereupon Ward dismissed C from his position as captain. A knew nothing of the facts mentioned in B's letter, except from the letter itself. Tindal, C.J., told the jury that the publication of the letter by A. in shewing it to Ward was primâ facie privileged; and they negatived malice. As the full Court was afterwards equally divided on the question of whether the shewing of the letter was privileged, the verdict rendered by the jury in favor of the defendant stood.

There are many authorities shewing that if a writing, although injurious to another's character, be published, without intent to injure his character, but bonâ fide for the purpose of investigating a fact in which the person making it is interested, or in which the person to whom it is made is interested, or in the performance of a legal, naval, military, moral or social duty, it is not punishable as a libel. A timekeeper employed on public works, on behalf of a public department, wrote a letter to the secretary of the department, imputing fraud to the contractor. Blackburn, J., directed the jury that if they thought the letter was written in good faith and in the discharge of the defendant's duty to his employers, it was privileged, although written to the wrong person. (5)

The defendant, a linendraper, dismissed his apprentice without sufficient legal excuse; he wrote a letter to her parents, informing them that the girl would be sent home, and giving his reasons for her dismissal. Cockburn, C.J., held this letter privileged, as there was clearly a confidential relationship between the girl's master and her parents. A, B, and C, are brother officers in the same regiment. A meets B and says, "I have learned that C has been guilty of an atrocious offence: I wish to consult you whether I should divulge it—whether I should speak of it to the commanding officer." 329. Newspaper proprietor presumed responsible for defamatory matter published in his newspaper.—Every proprietor of any newspaper is presumed to be criminally responsible for defamatory matter inserted and published therein, but such presumption may be rebutted by proof that the particular defamatory matter was inserted in such newspaper without such proprietor's cognizance, and without negligence on his part.

2. General authority given to the person actually inserting such defamatory matter to manage or conduct, as editor or otherwise, such newspaper, and to insert therein what he in his discretion thinks fit, shall not be negligence within this section unless it be proved that the proprietor, when originally giving such general authority, meant that it should extend to inserting and publishing defamatory matter, or continued such general authority knowing that it had been exercised by inserting defamatory matter in any number or part of such newspaper.

3. No one is guilty of an offence by selling any number or part of such a newspaper, unless he knew either that such number or part contained defamatory matter, or that defamatory matter was habitually contained in such newspaper. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 297.

For the meaning of the word "newspaper" see section 2, sub-section 22, ante.

The latter portion of the first paragraph of this section, 329.—is similar to a clause contained in section 7 of Lord Campbell's Act, 6 and 7 Vict., c. 96 (Imp.), under which it has been held that the proprietors of a newspaper, who have appointed a competent editor to conduct it, are not criminally responsible for the publication of a libel inserted in the newspaper by the editor, if it be proved that the publication was made without their actual authority, consent or knowledge, and that such publication did not arise from want of due care or caution on their part. (8)

Holbrook's case came up before the Court twice, each time upon a motion for a new trial, and on each occasion (although some of the Judges dissented), it was held that, upon a proper construction of the statute, general authority to an editor to conduct the business of a newspaper, in the absence of anything to give it a different character, must be taken to mean an authority to conduct it according to law, and, therefore, not to authorize the publication of a libel; (9) and that holding has evidently been kept in view in framing clause 2 of the above section, 329.

It must be proved upon an indictment against the proprietor of a newspaper that the defendant was the proprietor or publisher of the paper at the time of the publication therein of the alleged libel. (10)

Section 888, post, provides that every proprietor, publisher, editor or other person charged with the publication in a newspaper of any defamatory libel, shall be dealt with, indicted, tried and punished in the province in which he resides, or in which such newspaper is printed.

The Imperial Statute 51-52 Vict., c. 64, (The Law of Libel Amendment Act, 1888), provides, by section 8, that, no criminal prosecution shall be commenced against any proprietor, publisher, editor or any persons, responsible for the publication of a newspaper, for any libel published therein, without the order of a Judge at Chambers being first had and obtained; and that the application for such order shall be made on notice to the person accused, who shall have opportunity of being heard against such application.

In the case of a defamatory libel published in a newspaper, where the accused relies upon the plea, under the above section, 329, that the publication of the libel was without his knowledge, the Crown may make proof of the publication of former libels of the same kind by the same publisher, in order to fix upon the accused responsibility, in the terms of that section, for his persistency in continuing such publications in the conduct of the newspaper. (1)

330. Selling books containing defamatory matter.—No one commits an offence by selling any book, magazine, pamphlet or other thing, whether forming part of any periodical or not, although the same contains defamatory matter, if, at the time of such sale, he did not know that such defamatory matter was contained in such book, magazine, pamphlet or other thing.

2. The sale by a servant of any book, magazine, pamphlet or other thing, whether periodical or not, shall not make his employer criminally responsible in respect of defamatory matter contained therein unless it be proved that such employer authorized such sale knowing that such book, magazine, pamphlet or other thing contained defamatory matter, or, in case of a number or part of a periodical, that defamatory matter was habitually contained in such periodical. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 298.

331. When truth is a defence.—It shall be a defence to an indictment or information for a defamatory libel that the publishing of the defamatory matter in the manner in which it was published was for the public benefit at the time when it was published, and that the matter itself was true. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 299.

See comments under section 334, post.

332. Extortion by defamatory libel.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment, or to a fine not exceeding six hundred dollars, or to both, who publishes or threatens to publish, or offers to abstain from publishing, or offers to prevent the publishing of, a defamatory libel with intent to extort any money, or to induce any person to confer upon or procure for any person any appointment or office of profit or trust, or in consequence of any person having been refused any such money, appointment or office. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 300.

333. Punishment of defamatory libel known to be false.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment, or to a fine not exceeding four hundred dollars, or to both, who publishes any defamatory libel knowing the same to be false. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 301.

334. Punishment of defamatory libel.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to one year's imprisonment, or to a fine not exceeding two hundred dollars, or to both, who publishes any defamatory libel. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 302.

Section 318, ante, declares that publishing a libel is exhibiting it in public, or causing it to be read or seen, shewing or delivering it or causing it to be shewn or delivered with a view to its being read or seen by the person defamed or by any other person. So that it is a publication of a defamatory libel, not only to shew it or cause it to be shewn to others, but also to write and send it to the person defamed without publishing it to any one else.

A defendant was tried and convicted upon an indictment charging him with having unlawfully and maliciously written and published to a young woman of virtuous and modest character a defamatory letter of and concerning her and her character for virtue and modesty. It appears that having seen a newspaper advertisement inserted by the young woman for a situation, the defendant wrote, and sent to her at the address which she had given, the letter in question containing a proposal in plain terms that she should surrender her chastity to him for a sum of money. Held, that the conviction was right, because, under all the circumstances, the letter was a defamatory one which might reasonably tend to provoke a breach of the peace. As to Seditious Libels, see sections 132 and 134, ante; as to Libels on Foreign Sovereigns and Spreading False News of Public Interest, see sections 135 and 136, and as to Blasphemous Libels, see section 198, ante.

See, also, pp. 126-131, ante, for a brief history of the law of libel in general and of seditious libels in particular.

Section 331, ante, and section 910, post, giving a defendant accused of publishing a defamatory libel the right to plead the truth of the alleged libel, do not apply either to seditious libels or to blasphemous libels, the truth of which cannot be pleaded as a defence. (3)

Section 686, post, provides that in preliminary investigations of indictable offences, before police magistrates, the defendant may, after the examination of the witnesses for the prosecution, call and examine witnesses for the defence; but it does not seem that this gives a defendant in a libel case the right to prove at the preliminary examination the truth of the matter charged as a libel; for, although, in England, the right to call witnesses for the defence at a police court preliminary investigation existed long before the passing of the Newspaper Libel and Registration Act, 1881, it was there held, before that Act became law, that, although, where the charge was that of maliciously publishing a defamatory libel knowing it to be false, the magistrate had jurisdiction to receive evidence of the truth of the libel, so as to negative the allegation that the defendant knew it to be false, he had no such jurisdiction when the charge was simply that of maliciously publishing a defamatory libel. (4)

The English Newspaper Libel and Registration Act, 1881, however, made a very important change, there, on the subject, by enacting (in section 4) that "A Court of summary jurisdiction, upon the hearing of a charge against a proprietor, publisher or editor or any person responsible for the publication of a newspaper, or a libel published therein, may receive evidence as to the publication being for the public benefit, and as to the matters charged, in the libel being true, and as to the report being fair and accurate and published without malice, and as to any matter which, under this or any other act or otherwise, might be given in evidence, by way of defence, by the person charged, on his trial on indictment; and the Court, if of opinion after hearing such evidence that there is a strong presumption that the jury on the trial would acquit the person charged, may dismiss the case;" and under section 5, of the same Act, the Court, if it thinks that the libel, though proved, is of a trivial character, may, instead of sending the case before a jury, dispose of it summarily, provided the accused consents thereto, and may, in that case, adjudge him to pay a fine not exceeding £50.

In a case of criminal libel, in order to obtain a change of venue, it is not sufficient to allege that the prosecutor is interested in politics in the place where the alleged offence was committed and that in consequence the defendant cannot obtain a fair trial, there, and the fact that two abortive trials have taken place is not per se a reason for a change of venue. (5) And it is no ground to change the venue in a libel case that many of the defendant's witnesses reside at a distance and the defendant has no funds to bring them to that venue. (6)

Under section 861, post, an indictment for libel will not be insufficient for not setting out the words of it: but, if the words of the alleged libel are not set out, the Court may order the prosecutor to furnish the defendant with particulars.

Section 5 of the English Libel Act (6-7 Vict., c. 96), enacts that "If any person shall maliciously publish any defamatory libel, every such person being convicted thereof, shall be liable to fine or imprisonment or both as the Court may award, such imprisonment not to exceed one year." And, where an indictment under this section charged the defendant with unlawfully writing and publishing a defamatory libel but omitted to allege that the libel was published maliciously, it was held, by the English Court for Crown Cases Reserved, that as section 5 of the English Libel Act was not one which created the offence nor one purporting to define the offence but one merely enjoining what punishment was to follow upon a conviction for an offence existing at common law, it was an indictment for a common law offence, and that although it omitted to allege that the publication was done maliciously, it was nevertheless good, inasmuch as, upon proof of the publication of the libel, the common law infers that such publication was malicious, until the inference is rebutted by the defendant, and that, therefore, the allegation that the publication of the libel was malicious was not a necessary averment. (7)

It will be noticed that section 317, ante, of our Code expressly defines a defamatory libel as "matter published without legal justification or excuse, likely to injure the reputation of any person by exposing him to hatred, contempt or ridicule, or designed to insult the person of or concerning whom it was published." And, where in a recent case at Montreal, the indictment alleged that the defendant unlawfully wrote and published a certain false and defamatory libel of and concerning the prosecutor to the latter's great prejudice and injury, it was held that the indictment merely set up a civil wrong, that, as the indictment merely charged the publication of a defamatory libel without stating that the same was likely to injure the reputation of the libelled person by exposing him to hatred, contempt or ridicule or that it was designed to insult him, it was bad, by reason of the omission of an essential ingredient of the offence, and that it could not be amended but must be set aside and quashed, as the defect was a matter of substance. (8)

A plea of justification must be in writing and must allege not only that the matter published is true, but, that the publication of it was for the public benefit, and it must set forth the particular facts by reason of which it was for the public good.

These formalities are required by section 910, post.

By the second clause of section 911, it is provided that, along with the plea of justification, the defendant may plead not guilty, and, by the first clause of the same section, it is provided that if the accusation charges the defendant with publishing the libel knowing it to be false, he may under the plea of not guilty, alone, adduce evidence of the truth of the matter published so as to negative the allegation that he knew it to be false.

Although a plea of justification must allege that the matter published is true and that it was for the public benefit that the alleged libel was published and must then set forth the particular facts by reason of which the publication was for the public good, it must not contain the evidence by which it is proposed to prove such particular facts nor any statements merely of comment or argument; and, where a plea of justification embodied a number of letters proposed to be used as evidence and contained paragraphs of mere comment and argument it was held that the plea was irregular and illegal and that the illegal averments must be struck out or the plea itself rejected and the defendant in the latter case allowed to plead anew. (9)

As the falsity of defamatory matter is presumed, the prosecution need not produce evidence of its falsity. The onus is upon the defendant to prove that it is true, that it is matter of public interest, and that the publication of it was for the public benefit; and the whole of the libel must be proved true. The justification must be as broad as the charge. If a material part be not proved to be true, the Crown will be entitled to a verdict. (10)

If the gist of the libel consists of one specific charge which is proved to be true, and of public interest, it is not necessary, in that case, that the defendant should justify every expression used by him in commenting on the prosecutor's conduct in connection with such specific charge. If the substantial imputation be proved true, a slight error in some detail will not prevent the defendant succeeding, provided such error in no way alters the complexion of the affair and would not have, on the reader, any different effect from that which the literal truth would produce. (1) If epithets or terms of general abuse be used, which do not add to the sting of the charge, they need not be justified. (2) But if these additional terms of abuse insinuate some further charge, in addition to the main imputation, or implies some circumstances substantially aggravating the main imputation, they must be justified as well as the rest. (3) In such a case, it will be a question for the jury whether the substance of the libellous statement has been proved true to their satisfaction. (4) As was said by Lord Denman, "It would be extravagant to say that in cases of libel every comment upon the facts requires a justification. A comment may introduce independent facts, a justification of which is necessary, or it may be the mere shadow of the previous imputation." (5)

In order to justify a libel it will not be sufficient to say that the defendant merely repeated what was said by another person. For instance, if the libel complained of, be "A B said that C had been guilty of fraud," etc., it would be no justification, for publishing these words, to plead that A B did in fact make that statement; for each repetition is a fresh defamation and the defendant by repeating A B's words, has made them his own, and is legally as liable as if he had invented the story himself. The only plea of justification which will be an answer, in such a case, must not merely allege that A B did in fact say so, but it must go on to aver, with all necessary particularity, that every statement which A B is reported by the defendant to have made is true in substance and in fact. (6) This rule, requiring justification of every substantial part of the alleged libel, was considered to press too severely on newspaper proprietors and editors, and, on that account it was relaxed, in their favor, as we have already seen. (7) by special legislation, under which newspaper reports of public meetings are privileged when they are fair and accurate reports of matters of public interest, the publication of which is for the public benefit.

Libel complained of:—That A, a proctor, was three times suspended from practice for extortion. Proof that he had once been so suspended held insufficient. (9)

Libel complained of:—"A, B and C are a gang who live by card-sharping." Pleas: not guilty, and a justification giving several specific instances in which persons named had been cheated by the trio at cards. Held, by Cockburn, C.J., when two specific instances were proved, that the plea was proved in substance, and not necessary to prove other instances alleged. (10)

Libel complained of was headed:—"How Lawyer B treats his clients," followed by a report of a case in which one client of Lawyer B had been badly treated. That particular case was proved to be correctly reported. Held, insufficient to justify the heading, which implied that Lawyer B generally treated his clients badly. (1)

Libel complained of exposed the "homicidal tricks of those impudent and ignorant scamps who had the audacity to pretend to cure all diseases with one kind of pill:" it also asserted that "several of the rotgut rascals had been convicted of manslaughter, fined and imprisoned for killing people wth enormous doses of their universal vegetable boluses," and characterized the plaintiff's system as "one of wholesale poisoning." It was proved at the trial that plaintiff's pills, when taken in large doses, as recommended by plaintiffs, were highly dangerous, deadly and poisonous, that two persons had died in consequence of taking large quantities of them, and that the people who had administered these pills were tried, convicted, and imprisoned for the manslaughter of these two persons. Held, a sufficient justification, although the expressions "scamps," "rascals," and "wholesale poisoning" were not fully substantiated; the main charge and gist of the libel being amply sustained. (2)

It is libellous to publish a highly-colored account of judicial proceedings mixed with the reporter's observations and conclusions upon what passed in Court, containing an insinuation that plaintiff had committed perjury, and it is no justification to pick out such parts of the libel as contain an account of the trial, and to plead that such parts are true and accurate, leaving the extraneous matter unjustified. A rumor was current on the Stock Exchange that the Chairman of the S. E. R. Co. had failed; and the shares of the company consequently fell; thereupon the defendant said. defendant, when convicted of libel, to pay the costs and expenses of the prosecution, and as to the right of a defendant, acquitted on a charge of libel, to recover costs against a private prosecutor.

CRIMINAL INFORMATIONS.—We have already seen, that finding the indictment includes exhibiting an information, and that a Criminal Information in this sense means an accusation of crime made and tried, without the intervention of a grand jury, in cases of offences which tend to disturb the public peace, or to interfere with good government,—such as, seditious or blasphemous libels, or other libels in which the general public are interested, official corruption, etc. (5)

Criminal informations are of two kinds; one,—called an information ex officio,—being laid by the Attorney-General or Solicitor-General, and the other being made by the Master of the Crown Office, (6) at the instance of some private individual. (7)

Archbold describes an information, ex officio as a "formal written suggestion of an offence committed, filed by the Sovereign's Attorney-General (or, in the vacancy of that office, by the Solicitor-General), (8) in the Queen's Bench (now it will be the King's Bench) Division of the High Court of Justice, without the intervention of a grand jury."

Odgers says that informations ex officio are, as a rule, confined to libels of so dangerous a nature as to call for immediate suppression by the officers of the State; especially blasphemous, obscene, or seditious libels, or such as are likely to cause immediate outrage and public riot and disturbance; and which, therefore, render it expedient for the Attorney-General himself to take the initiative.

Archbold cites a case, in which informations ex officio were filed in 1858 against the directors of a banking company for a conspiracy to defraud the shareholders by false reports of the pecuniary condition of the bank. (9)

An information ex officio, (10) is filed in the Crown Office, without any leave previously obtained of the Court for that purpose. The defendant, after appearance upon application to the Court, is entitled to a copy of the information, free of expense. If the information be not brought to trial within twelve calendar months next after a plea of not guilty has been pleaded, the defendant may, after twelve days' notice to the Attorney-General or Solicitor-General, apply to the Court in which the prosecution is depending, and obtain its authorization to bring on the trial, and having obtained such authorization he may bring it on accordingly, unless a nolle prosequi be entered.

Archbold describes an information by the Master of the Crown Office as "a formal written suggestion of an offence committed, filed in the Queen's (now the King's) Bench Division of the High Court of Justice, at the instance of an individual, with the leave of the Court, by the Master of the Crown Office, without the intervention of a grand jury."

Criminal informations, therefore, which are not ex officio, and not filed as such, by the Attorney-General, cannot be filed without an express order of the Court, that is, an order (in England), of the Queen's Bench (now the King's Bench) Division, of the High Court of Justice or (in Canada), of a Superior Court of Criminal Jurisdiction, granted in open Court.

The practice is for counsel to move the Court upon proper affidavits for an order nisi calling upon the defendant to shew cause why an information should not be granted. The prosecutor must consent to waive his civil remedy by action, if need be, and be prepared to go through with the criminal proceedings to conviction. The affidavits should be carefully drawn up: for no second application can be made on amended or additional affidavits. (1) They should contain legal evidence to convince the Court that it would be sufficient to justify a grand jury in returning a true bill for the offence complained of. Where, for instance, the affidavits merely shewed that the annexed copy of the Newcastle Daily Chronicle, the newspaper containing the libel, had been purchased from a salesman, in the office of that paper, and that in a footnote at the end of that copy the defendant was stated to be the printer and publisher of the newspaper, and the relator believed him so to be; it was held that this was no legal evidence of publication; and the rule was discharged. (2) If the defendant keeps an office or shop at which copies of the paper can be purchased, then an affidavit by a person who purchased a copy of the libel at such office or shop will be the best evidence of a publication by the defendant, and also that most easily obtainable. That the purchase was made expressly for the purpose of enabling such affidavit to be sworn is no objection. (3)

The prosecutor must also swear to his innocence in all particulars of any specific charge made against him in the libel. (4) Unless he does this, the Court will not interpose, but will leave the prosecutor to proceed by way of indictment in the ordinary course. (5) In cases where the libel contains no specific charge there would of course be no necessity for such an affidavit. (6)

If a general charge be made and a specific instance alleged, the affidavit must expressly negative not only the general charge, but also the specific instance. (7)

The affidavits should be sworn with no heading or title; and should not contain irrelevant or improper matter. If the prosecutor abuses the alleged libeller or shews an animus against him, the Court will very probably reject the application. (8)

The order nisi, if granted, should be drawn up "Upon reading" the alleged libel and the affidavits and all other documents to which it is desired to refer on the argument.

When the rule nisi is drawn up, it should be served, personally, upon the defendant.

In shewing cause against the rule the defendant generally files affidavits in reply to those filed in support of the information; and it is open to him to maintain that the libel is true.

If the order be discharged on the merits the Court generally gives the defendant his costs; and no second application can be made, even on additional affidavits; (9) except under very peculiar circumstances, as where the only person who had made an affidavit on behalf of the defendant, against the rule, has been since convicted of perjury in respect of such affidavit. (10)

Although the prosecutor cannot make a second application for a criminal information, after the first application has been dismissed, he has still the right to proceed, in the ordinary way, before the police magistrates, in order to have the offender committed for trial by indictment. (1*a*)

If the rule is made absolute, the prosecutor is then required to enter into recognizances to effectually prosecute the information. The information must then be drawn up setting out the offence with the same precision as in an indictment; and, as soon as it is filed, a copy of it must be served on the defendant; who must appear within a time to be fixed; or, in default of his appearance, he may be apprehended under a Bench Warrant. The case is then brought to trial in due course, in the same way as any ordinary trial upon an indictment.

With regard to criminal informations of the class which are not ex officio, the offence in relation to which an application is made for one must be such an offence as calls for prompt and immediate interference before the Court will grant it. There must be some evidence that the ordinary remedies by action or indictment are insufficient in the particular case; and in cases, for instance, where, upon the filing of a criminal information for criminal libel, it appears that the prosecutor relator has himself libelled the party complained of, (2) or that he has, in any way, invited or provoked the publication of which he complains, (3) or that he has had an opportunity (of which he has not availed himself), of expressing his disapproval of its terms, (4) or that he has demanded and received explanations from the defendant, (5) or that he has been, himself, guilty of any misconduct in relation to the matter, a rule giving leave to prosecute the information will be refused, unless the public have, in the particular instance in hand, a direct and independent interest in the prompt suppression of the libels. (6)

The Court, in granting leave to prosecute a criminal information, formerly took into account the rank and dignity of the person libelled, and informations have been granted for imputing that the children of a marquis were bastards; (7) that a peer had married an actress; (8) that a naval captain was a coward, a bishop a bankrupt, a peer a perjurer, etc., etc. But, now, it is settled that rank and station confer no superior claim to the summary interference of the Court. A peer is no more entitled to a criminal information when his private character is attacked than the humblest subject of the King. (9) Odgers gives an instance in which a criminal information was obtained by a grocer, (10) and another in which it was granted to a housekeeper. (1)

The Courts, however, have, of late years, been very chary of granting criminal informations; and, as a rule, both in England and in Canada, they will only be granted, now, where the applicant holds some public office; or where the libel tends to obstruct the course of justice, or to prejudice the fair trial of any accused person. (2)

If there be general reflections on a body or class, no particular individual being specially attacked, and if the reflections are such as tend to cause outrage or lead to violence, an information will be granted; as, where the general body of clergymen in a particular diocese were libelled; (3) or, where the libel was on the Jews, and some Jews in consequence were ill-used by the mob. (4) In Osborn's case, the publication complained of, was a sensational account of a cruel murder by certain Jews said to have lately arrived from Portugal, and then living near Broad Street, London. They were said to have burnt a woman and a new-born baby, because the baby's father was a Christian. Certain Jews who had arrived from Portugal, and who then lived in Broad Street, were attacked by the mob, barbarously treated, and their lives endangered. A criminal information was granted, although it was objected that it did not appear precisely who were the persons accused of the murder.

The application for a criminal information must be made promptly; or the delay will be ground for refusing it.

A County Court Judge illegally refused to hear a barrister who appeared before him. The barrister memorialized the Lord Chancellor. Obtaining no redress, he applied to the Court of Queen's Bench for a criminal information. This would have been granted him, had he not previously applied to the Lord Chancellor. (5)

An Irish Q. C., in addressing the jury as counsel in a cause, made a fierce attack on the plaintiff, an attorney. This attack was pertinent to the issue and not malicious; but the observations were unusually harsh and irritating. The plaintiff won the action, and then wrote to the Q. C., calling on him to retract the charges. The Q. C. refused; thereupon plaintiff wrote the Q. C. a letter couched in the most offensive language, and obviously intended to provoke a duel. The Court made the rule for a criminal information absolute; but ordered that the information should not issue without further order. (6)

Lord George Gordon was tried in 1787 and convicted upon an information charging him with libelling Marie Antoinette, Queen of France, and "her tool" the French Ambassador in London. He was fined £500 and sentenced to two years' imprisonment, and at the expiration of that time to find sureties for his good behavior. This he could not do, so he remained in prison till he died on November 1st, 1793. (7)

The Courier published the following passage:—"The Emperor of Russia is rendering himself obnoxious to his subjects by various acts of tyranny, and ridiculous in the eyes of Europe by his inconsistency. He has now passed an edict prohibiting the exportation of timber, deals, and other naval stores. In consequence of this ill-timed law, upwards of 100 sail of vessels are likely to return to this country without freights." This was deemed a libel upon the Emperor, Paul I. An information was granted, and the proprietor of the Courier was fined £100, sentenced to six months' imprisonment, and to find sureties for good behavior for five years from the expiration of that term. The printer and publisher were also sentenced to one month's imprisonment. (Lord Kenyon, C.J.), (8)

A Queen's Counsel obtained a criminal information for libellous verses and for a caricature imputing to him professional misconduct in the conduct of a case. (9)

The solicitors to a railway company were refused a rule for a criminal information for a libel on them by the directors, imputing extortion and fraud. They were left to bring an action. (10)

He was held, upon a criminal information, amenable to the English Criminal Law, although the libel was purely political, affected no one in the British Isles, and attacked the man who was England's greatest enemy at the time. The jury found him guilty; but war broke out again between England and France soon afterwards, and no sentence was ever passed. (10*q*)

(l) 'false trade description' means a trade description which is false in a material respect as regards the goods to which it is applied, and includes every alteration of a trade description, whether by way of addition, effacement or otherwise, where that alteration makes the description false in a material respect; and the fact that a trade description is a trade mark, or part of a trade mark, shall not prevent such trade description being a false trade description within the meaning of this Part;

(n) 'name' includes any abbreviation of a name;

or which does not show upon its face the place of its delivery and the merchantable value thereof, or is not redeemable at any time;

(v) 'watch,' for the purposes of the next succeeding section, means all that portion of a watch which is not the watch case.

2. An offer, printed or marked by the manufacturer upon any wrapper, box or receptacle, in which goods are sold, of a premium or reward for the return of such wrapper, box or receptacle, is not a trading stamp within the meaning of this Part. 55-56 V., c. 29, ss. 383, 392, 407, 419, 420, 421, 433, 443, 444 and 519; 4-5 E. VII., c. 9, s. 1.

336. Words or marks on watch cases.—Where a watch case has thereon any words or marks which constitute, or are by common repute considered as constituting, a description of the country in which the watch was made, and the watch bears no such description, those words or marks shall prima facie be deemed to be a description of that country within the meaning of this Part, and the provisions of this Part with respect to goods to which a false description has been applied, and with respect to selling or exposing, or having in possession, for sale, or any purpose of trade or manufacture, goods with a false trade description, shall apply accordingly. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 444.

337. 'Trade description.'—The use of any figure, word or mark which according to the custom of the trade, is commonly taken to be an indication of any of the matters hereinbefore referred to in the interpretation of the expression 'trade description,' is a trade description within the meaning of this Part. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 443.

338. False document.—To constitute a false document it is not necessary that the fraudulent intention should appear on the face of the document, but it may be proved by external evidence. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 421.

"False document" as used in connection with forgery, has a meaning different from what is meant by a document which is an untrue statement of facts. Where a letter purports to be signed by A. B., but is, in fact, signed by C. D., in A. B.'s name, with the latter's authority, a third party to whom it is shewn is led to believe that it is A. B.'s letter, which, in fact, it is not; and in that sense it is a false document, whether its contents be true or false. If the letter, instead of being signed by C. D. in A. B.'s name, were really signed by A. B. himself and if its contents were false, then, although a false document in the sense of being an untrue statement of facts, it would be a true and genuine document in regard to the signature, and no forgery. A document whose contents are true may thus be a forged false document; and a document containing a false statement of facts may, nevertheless, be a genuine document in the sense of being no forgery; although it may amount to and be punishable as a false pretense.

339. Outbuilding.—A building occupied with, and within the same curtilage with, any dwelling-house shall be deemed to be part of the said dwelling-house if there is between such building and dwelling-house a communication, either immediate or by means of a covered and inclosed passage, leading from the one to the other, but not otherwise. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 407.

340. Entrance into a building.—An entrance into a building is made as soon as any part of the body of the person making the entrance, or any part of any instrument used by him, is within the building.

2. Every one who obtains entrance into any building by any threat or artifice used for that purpose, or by collusion with any person in the building, or who enters any chimney or other aperture of the building permanently left open for any necessary purpose, shall be deemed to have broken and entered that building. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 407.

Application of Part.

341. False trade description by means of figures, words or marks.—The provisions of this Part respecting the application of a false trade description to goods extend to the application to goods of any such figures, words or marks, or arrangement or combination thereof, whether including a trade mark or not, as are reasonably calculated to lead persons to believe that the goods are the manufacture or merchandise of some person other than the person whose manufacture or merchandise they really are.

2. False Trade Description by Means of False Name or Initials.—The provisions of this Part respecting the application of a false trade description to goods, or respecting goods to which a false trade description is applied, extend to the application to goods of any false name or initials of a person, and to goods with the false name or initials of a person applied, in like manner as if such name or initials were a trade description. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 443.

342. Trade description applied prior to 22nd May, 1888.—The provisions of this Part with respect to false trade descriptions do not apply to any trade description which, on the twenty-second day of May, in the year one thousand eight hundred and eighty-eight, was lawfully and generally applied to goods of a particular class, or manufactured by a particular method, to indicate the particular class or method of manufacture of such goods: Provided that where such trade description includes the name of a place or country, and is calculated to mislead as to the place or country where the goods to which it is applied were actually made or produced, and the goods are not actually made or produced in that place or country, such provisions shall apply unless there is added to the trade description, immediately before or after the name of that place or country, in an equally conspicuous manner with that name, the name of the place or country in which the goods were actually made or produced, with a statement that they were made or produced there. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 455.

343. Trading stamps.—The provision of this Part with respect to trading stamps shall not apply to any trading stamp issued by a manufacturer or vendor before the first day of November, one thousand nine hundred and five. 4-5 E. VII., c. 9, s. 2.

Royal Commissioners' Remarks.

Upon the subject of this Part (VI) of our Code the English Royal Commissioners have at pages 25 to 27 of their Report upon the English Draft Code, the following special remarks:—

"Offences against rights of property must be committed, either, by wrongfully taking property, by fraudulently deceiving the owners of property, or by mischievous destruction of property; in other words, by THEFT, by CHEATING, or, by MISCHIEF.

"Theft may be either simple or aggravated. Simple theft is so closely connected with certain kinds of fraud that the two subjects run into each other. Theft aggravated by violence is either robbery or extortion; and theft accompanied by wilful trespass on a dwelling-house is either burglary or house-breaking.

"The receiving of goods dishonestly obtained is usually associated with theft. We have, therefore, placed it next after theft.

"Mischief is a distinct subject, and follows fraud.

"The present title includes and re-enacts, in substance, the provisions of the Larceny Act, the Forgery Act, the Coinage Offences Act, and the Malicious Mischief Act, (24-25 Vict., cc. 96, 97, 98, 99). (1) It also includes some provisions, less comprehensive, which occur in other Acts,—in particular the provisions of two sections of the Post Office Act, (7 Will. IV., & 1 Vict., c. 36, ss. 28, 17), part of the Trade Marks Act, (25-26 Vict., c. 88), the Personation Act, (37-38 Vict. c. 36), and the provisions of the Fraudulent Debtors' Acts for England and Ireland, (32-33 Vict., c. 62, and 35-36 Vict., c. 57).

"The changes made by the present Title relate, principally, to the common law as to theft.

"The present statute law is substantially contained in the 24-25 Vict., c. 96: which recognizes and continues the old, (and, as it seems to us unreasonable), distinctions between stealing animals feræ naturæ, or things attached to or savoring of the realty, (which were not at common law the subject of larceny), and stealing other property.

"There is good reason for holding that capturing wild animals in the enjoyment of their natural liberty, though on another's land, should not be considered stealing; but, why should stealing one of the deer or valuable foreign birds in the Zoological Gardens be treated differently from stealing a sheep or a hen? And, why should it be a different offence to steal a log of timber from that which it is to cut down the tree and carry it away?

"Again, the old law as to stealing required that the property should be taken out of the possession of the owner. This rule gave rise to many complicated and highly artificial decisions; and some statutes have included, amongst thieves, bailees, servants and others who, having lawfully obtained possession of property, were not within the old definition, though they fraudulently appropriated to their own use the property entrusted to them; but many persons equally culpable are still beyond the reach of the criminal law. Even now, a person, who finds a purse and appropriates it, under circumstances involving all the moral guilt of theft, may, on technical grounds, escape all criminal liability.

"It is proposed to simplify the law by putting an end to all these distinctions, which are very subtle, and, many of them, arbitrary.

(1) The Canadian Acts corresponding to the Imperial Statutes concerning larceny, coinage offences and malicious mischief,—namely, R. S. C., 1886, cc. 164, 165, 167 and 168,—were repealed by our Criminal Code when first enacted.

"The things which, according to the common use of the word steal, are capable of being stolen, but which, at common law, are not the subjects of larceny, may be described as, first, certain animals; secondly, documents evidencing certain rights; and thirdly land and things fixed to or growing out of it.

"As to animals, one rule of the existing law is founded on the principle that to steal animals used for food or labor is a crime worthy of death, but that to steal animals kept for pleasure or curiosity is only a civil wrong. The principle has long since been abandoned; sheep stealing being no longer a capital offence; and dog stealing is a statutory offence. But the distinction (above referred to) still gives its form to the law, and occasionally produces results of a very undesirable kind. It was held, lately, for instance, that as a dog is not the subject of larceny, at common law, it was not a crime to obtain, by false pretences, two valuable pointers. (2)

"It seems to us that this rule is quite unreasonable, and that all animals which are the subject of property should also be the subject of larceny.

"This, however, suggests the question, what wild animals are the subject of property, and how long do they continue to be so?

"This question must be considered in reference to living animals, feræ naturæ, in the enjoyment of their natural liberty; living animals, feræ naturæ, escaped from captivity; and pigeons, which, singularly enough, form a class by themselves.

"The existing law, upon this subject, is that a living wild animal, in the enjoyment of its natural liberty, is not the subject of property; but that, when dead, it becomes the property of the person on whose land it dies, in such a sense that he is entitled to take it from a trespasser, but not in such a sense that the person who took it away on killing it, is guilty of theft. This is specially important in reference to game. This state of the law we do not propose to alter.

"As to the living animals, feræ naturæ, IN CAPTIVITY, we think they ought to be capable of being stolen. When such an animal escapes from captivity, it appears to us that there arises a distinction which deserves recognition. If the animal is one which is commonly found in a wild state in this country, it seems reasonable that on its escape it should cease to be property. A person seeing such an animal in a field may have no reasonable grounds for supposing that it had just escaped from captivity. If, however, a man were to fall in with an animal imported at great expense, as a curiosity, from the interior of Africa, he could hardly fail to know that it had escaped from some person to whom it would probably have a considerable money value. We think that not only a wild animal in actual captivity, but also a wild animal,—which has once been captured,—should, on escaping from confinement, be the subject of larceny, unless it be an animal commonly found, in a wild state, in this country.

"Pigeons, while in a dovecot, or farmyard, ought obviously to be as much capable of being stolen as poultry. But, suppose they are away from their home, and are not distinguishable from wild pigeons? The law upon this point is not quite clear. It appears, from section 23 of 24 and 25 Viet. c. 96, that a bird so situated is not the subject of larceny, as that Act imposes a penalty of forty shillings on persons killing pigeons 'under such circumstances as shall not amount to larceny at common law;' and no other circumstances can be imagined to which these words would apply. These distinctions will be found to be embodied in section 245. (3)

"The rules that documents evidencing certain rights, and that land and things savoring of the realty are not capable of being stolen, appear to us wholly indefensible.

"It is no doubt physically impossible to steal a legal right or to carry away a field, but this affords no ground at all for the rule that it shall be legally impossible to commit theft upon documents which afford evidence of legal rights, or upon things which, though fastened to, growing out of, or forming part of the soil, are capable of being detached from it and carried away.

"These rules have been qualified by statutory exceptions so wide and intricate that they are practically abolished, but they still give form to a considerable part of the law of theft, and occasionally produce failure of justice in cases in which the statutory exception is not quite co-extensive with the common law rule. These rules we propose to abolish absolutely.

LARCENY AT COMMON LAW.—The word "Larceny" is derived from "larcin" (Norm. Fr.) and "latrocinium" (Lat.); and simple larceny, that is, larceny at common law, or, as Blackstone (4) calls it, "plain theft, un-

(3) See section 345, post, which contains the same distinctions and provisions.

(4) 4 Bl. Com., 229.

accompanied with any other atrocious circumstance," is generally defined as the wrongful taking and carrying away of the personal property of another, with a felonious intent to convert it to the taker's own use, without the consent of the owner. (5)

On the subject of larceny at common law and on the subject of theft by conversion, and other fraudulent misappropriations, the Royal Commissioners have, at pages 27 and 28 of their Report on the English Draft Code, the following special observations:—

"It is essential to larceny at common law that there should be a felonious taking; which has been understood to mean a taking out of the possession of the owner. This rule has given rise to vast technicality.

"First, there is the question, what is the precise meaning of the word taking or carrying away, considered as a physical operation; and there are many cases, on this point, which run into very minute distinctions. On the whole it is thought desirable to require that, in order to constitute theft by taking, there should be at least an actual moving of the thing stolen. The existing law on that point is accordingly unaltered by the Draft Code. This is a matter of small importance as such questions arise very rarely.

"Technicalities of more importance connected with taking are those which have led to the distinction between theft and embezzlement.

"The immediate consequences of the doctrine that a wrongful taking is of the essence of theft, is, that, if a person obtains possession of a thing innocently, and afterwards fraudulently misappropriates it, he is guilty of no offence.

"This doctrine has been qualified by a number of statutory exceptions, each of which has been attended with difficulties of its own.

"The first of these exceptions is contained in the statute which provides that a clerk or servant, or person employed in the capacity of a clerk or servant, who embezzles property received on behalf of his master, shall be deemed to have stolen it. This enactment was interpreted as creating a new offence distinct from ordinary theft; and a great number of cases involving considerations technical and subtle to the last degree have been decided on various points connected with it; and it was found necessary for the legislature to interfere further in order to prevent many failures of justice.

(5) R. v. Thurborn, 1 Den. C. C., 388; R. v. Middleton, L. R., 2 C. C. R., 38; R. v. Macgrath, L. R., 1 C. C. R., 205; R. v. Jones, 2 C. & K., 236; R. v. Hamman, 2 Leach, 1089.

"Clerks and servants, however, formed only one class of persons who had opportunities of committing breaches of trust for which the common law provided no punishment. Bankers, merchants, brokers, solicitors, factors and other agents might and did commit similar offences; and another great exception in the rule of the common law was made to include such cases.

"These enactments are elaborate and intricate, and present special difficulties of their own. The existing law will be found in 24-25 V., c. 96, ss. 75 and following. The first Act on the subject was passed in the reign of George III.

"The case of bailees, singularly enough, remained unprovided for after the rest; and a carrier stealing a parcel entrusted to him for carriage committed no crime till the fraudulent conversion of chattels, money and valuable securities by bailees was made larceny, by 20-21 V., c. 54. (See now 24-25 V., c. 96, s. 3).

"The common law rule,—though thus nearly eaten up by exceptions,—still survives as to all persons who come innocently into possession of the property of others, otherwise than as clerks, servants, bankers, merchants, brokers, solicitors, factors, and other agents and bailees. The case of the finder of goods, already referred to, furnishes an instance.

"This state of the law is, obviously, most objectionable, not only on account of its extreme intricacy and technicality, but also because the numerous exceptions made to the common law rule are inconsistent with the principle on which that rule depends.

"We have, therefore, defined theft in such a manner as to put wrongful taking and all other means of fraudulent misappropriation on the same footing.

"The definition, properly expounded and qualified, will, we think, be found to embrace every act which, in common language, would be regarded as theft, and it will avoid all the technicalities referred to as arising out of the common law rules, as well as out of the intricate and somewhat arbitrary legislation, the course of which we have sketched above.

"The provisions of the Bill on this subject differed considerably,—in language,—from those of the Draft Code: but they were framed with the same objects, and would have effected the same objects in another way. The Bill treated theft, criminal breach of trust, and obtaining money by false pretences as three ways of committing one offence — termed 'fraudulent misappropriation.' These offences were so defined that they would have covered the same ground as theft, false pretences and criminal breach of trust as defined by the Draft Code; but many things, which, according to the Draft Code, are theft, would according to the Bill have been criminal breaches of trust.

"The Draft Code defines the offence of obtaining property by false pretences substantially in accordance with the present law, and 'criminal breach of trust' is retained as a distinct offence. The other cases of 'fraudulent misappropriation' are denominated 'theft.'

"The crimes of obtaining goods, money, or credit by false pretences, and of criminal breach of trust are, in point of mischief and moral guilt, much the same as theft, but from their nature they require separate clauses to define them.

"The crime of embezzlement, wherever the subject matter of it is a chattel or other thing which is to be handed over in specie, will come within the definition of theft; but where the subject matter is not to be handed over in specie, but may be accounted for by handing over an equivalent, it requires separate provisions, which will be found in sections 249, 250 and 251. (6)

"It is essential to all these offences that there should be the animus furandi.—that guilty intention which makes the difference between a trespass and a theft."

Theft.

344. Things capable of being stolen.—Every inanimate thing whatever which is the property of any person, and which either is or may be made movable, is capable of being stolen as soon as it becomes movable, although it is made movable in order to steal it: Provided that nothing growing out of the earth of a value not exceeding twenty-five cents shall, except in cases hereinafter provided, be deemed capable of being stolen. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 303.

This section is identical with section 244 of the English Draft Code, and, opposite to the proviso thereof, the Royal Commissioners have a marginal note in the following terms:—

"The existing law is shortly this: At common law nothing which grows out of or is fixed to the earth is the subject of larceny. But by 24-25 V., c. 96, s. 33, punishments are provided for stealing trees, saplings and shrubs, of the value of more than one shilling; by sec. 36, all plants whatever growing in gardens, etc., are protected; and by sec. 37, all plants cultivated for any of the purposes specified in the text of the section, wherever they may grow, are protected. These provisions appear substantially to make all vegetable productions the subject of larceny, except things worth less than one shilling growing elsewhere than in gardens, and not cultivated for the purposes mentioned." (1)

(6) The equivalents of these sections 249, 250 and 251 of the English Draft Code are sections 355, 356 and 357, post.

In theft, the value of the thing stolen is immaterial,—subject, of course, to the proviso above contained in section 344 with regard to things growing out of the earth. But, although, (apart from most things growing out of the earth), the value of the article stolen is immaterial, it must be of some value, and if it be of any value, however trifling, it will be sufficient. It is not necessary that it should be of the value of any coin known to the law. (2) Nor is it necessary that it should be of value to third persons, if valuable to the owner. (3) Thus, where A was violently attacked by robbers, who took from him a piece of paper containing a memorandum respecting some money that a person owed him, it was held to be robbery: Gurney, B., remarking,—"If anything, however insignificant its value, was taken away from the prosecutor by violence, that is sufficient to constitute robbery. In cases of robbery, the value is immaterial: and the prosecutor, by carrying this memorandum in his pocket, shewed that he considered that it was of some value to himself." (4)

Water supplied by a water company to a consumer, and standing in his pipes, may be the subject of larceny. (5)

345. Animals capable of being stolen.—All tame living creatures, whether tame by nature or wild by nature and tamed, shall be capable of being stolen: Provided that tame pigeons shall be capable of being stolen so long only as they are in a dovecot or on their owner's land.

2. All living creatures wild by nature, such as are not commonly found in a condition of natural liberty in Canada, shall, if kept in a state of confinement, be capable of being stolen, not only while they are so confined but after they have escaped from confinement.

3. All other living creatures wild by nature shall, if kept in a state of confinement, be capable of being stolen so long as they remain in confinement or are being actually pursued after escaping therefrom, but no longer.

4. A wild living creature shall be deemed to be in a state of confinement so long as it is in a den, cage or small inclosure, stye or tank, or is otherwise so situated that it cannot escape and that its owner can take possession of it at pleasure.

5. Wild creatures in the enjoyment of their natural liberty shall not be capable of being stolen, nor shall the taking of their dead bodies, by, or by the orders of, the person who killed them before they are reduced into actual possession by the owner of the land on which they died, be deemed to be theft.

6. Everything produced by or forming part of any living creature capable of being stolen, shall be capable of being stolen. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 304.

This section is to the same effect as section 245 of the English Draft Code.

Opposite to the clause corresponding with sub-section 4 of the above section, the Royal Commissioners have the following:—

"This is intentionally worded so as not to include deer in a large park."

It has been held, in England, that ferrets are "animals kept in a state of confinement," under sections 21 and 22 of the Imperial Larceny Act, 1861, and that, therefore, persons resisting apprehension by a police officer, who finds them in possession of a ferret which they knew to be stolen, are guilty of murder, if such resistance on their part results in the police officer's death. (5a)

346. Oysters capable of being stolen.—Oysters and oyster brood shall be capable of being stolen when in oyster beds, layings, or fisheries which are the property of any person, and sufficiently marked out or known as such property. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 304.

347. Theft defined.—Theft or stealing is the act of fraudulently and without color of right taking, or fraudulently and without color of right converting to the use of any person, anything capable of being stolen, with intent,—

(a) to deprive the owner, or any person having any special property or interest therein, temporarily, or absolutely, of such thing, or of such property or interest; or,

(b) to pledge the same or deposit it as security; or,

(c) to part with it under a condition as to its return which the person parting with it may be unable to perform; or,

(d) to deal with it in such a manner that it cannot be restored in the condition in which it was at the time of such taking and conversion.

2. Theft is committed when the offender moves the thing or causes it to move or to be moved, or begins to cause it to become movable, with intent to steal it.

(5a) R. v. Sheriff, 20 Cox, 334.

3. The taking or conversion may be fraudulent, although effected without secrecy or attempt at concealment.

4. It is immaterial whether the thing converted was taken for the purpose of conversion, or whether it was, at the time of the conversion, in the lawful possession of the person converting. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 305.

The title of a mortgagee under a chattel mortgage is not a "special property or interest" in the goods under the above section. The phrase "special property or interest" applies to rights of mere pledgees or bailees where the terms of the bailment do not pass the property in the goods to the bailee; and if the property or legal title passes to the mortgagee by the terms of the chattel mortgage the charge of fraudulent conversion against the mortgagor should not be limited to a special property or interest. (6)

The phrase "without color of right," forming part of the above definition of theft, seems to be intended to take the place of the word feloniously which in connection with the common law definition of larceny is usually said to mean "without color of right." (6a)

From the above definition itself and from explanations of the subject by the Royal Commissioners (quoted above at pp. 396, 397, ante), it will be seen that THEFT is not restricted to what, under the common law, constituted the offence of larceny,—the principal ingredient of which was, as we have seen, the physical asportation or taking and carrying away of an article of personal property out of the possession and against the will of the owner, for the purpose of converting it to the taker's own use, or of depriving the owner of it,—but that it is extended to and made to cover all other means of fraudulent conversion or misappropriation of another's personal property; so, that THEFT, as a general term, includes not only every thing and every act amounting to larceny under the common law, as ONE of the different ways in which the offence can be committed, but all other fraudulent conversions and misappropriations of any specific article of personal property as ANOTHER method of committing theft; the essential ingredient of larceny at common law,—namely, the taking and carrying away of the thing out of the owner's possession and against his will,—being no longer necessary, but any fraudulent conversion or misappropriation of any article or thing belonging to another being sufficient to constitute theft, whether, at the time of the fraudulent conversion or misappropriation thereof, the article or thing is in the lawful possession of the offender or not.

With regard to the fraudulent conversion or misappropriation of things which, when converted or misappropriated, are in the offender's lawful possession, a distinction is drawn between the case of a chattel or thing which the offender should hand over in specie but which, instead of so handing over, he fraudulently converts or misappropriates,—(this offence in this case being ordinary theft by conversion as defined in the above section, 347),—and the case of a chattel or thing which is not to be handed over in specie but may be accounted for by handing over an equivalent, and which the offender, instead of so handing over its equivalent, has fraudulently converted or misappropriated,—(this offence, in the latter case, being dealt with by the special provisions of sections 355, 356 and 357, post).

But whether the act of theft be by fraudulently taking a thing from the owner against his will for the purpose of converting it or depriving the owner of it, or it be by fraudulently converting or misappropriating it while in the lawful possession of the offender, the essence of the offence will still be the intent with which the act is done. In other words, the taking or the conversion, as the case may be, must be without color of right and with intent to deprive the owner of it, or to pledge it, etc.

For instance, if A were to place his horse and cart opposite to the door of B's premises, and B, not wishing to have them there, were to lay hold of the horse and lead it away, and leave it and the cart at a short distance from where it originally stood, there would be a taking by B of the horse and cart into his temporary possession, but no intent to deprive A of his property, B's intent being merely to remove the horse and cart from opposite to his own door, (where they were in A's possession), to another place away from B's door, where they are left in A's possession and ownership.

If the sheep of A stray into the flock of B, and B not knowing it, drive them home along with his own flock, and shear them, this is no theft; but it would be otherwise if B did any act for the purpose of concealing the sheep of A; for that would indicate that he drove them away to his own home knowing them to be the sheep of another. (7)

If, under color of having a claim for arrears of rent, A distrains the cattle of B, his tenant, this may amount to a civil wrong,—a trespass, for instance, under the common law of England as to civil matters,—but no theft. (8)

If A having done work upon an article, returns it to B the owner, and then, on a dispute arising between them as to the price to be paid for the work done on the article, A takes and carries off the article against B's will, honestly intending to hold it as security for the amount which is alleged to be due to him, this is no theft, although in fact it turn out that there was nothing due to him. (9) The facts in this case were these: A had been instructed by B's wife to repair an umbrella. After the repairs were finished, and the umbrella had been returned to B's wife, a dispute arose as to the bargain made. A thereupon carried away the umbrella as security for the amount claimed by him to be due for repairing it. Blackburn, J., left it to the jury to say whether the taking was an honest assertion of right, or only a colorable pretence to obtain possession of the umbrella. Verdict, not guilty.

A creditor who violently assaults his debtor, and so then and there forces him to pay him his debt, cannot be convicted of theft, there being no intent to steal. (10)

A and B took two horses out of C's stable at night without his leave, and, having ridden them a distance of about thirty miles, left them at an inn desiring care to be taken of them and saying that they should return in three hours. A and B were taken the same day at a distance of fourteen miles from the inn walking in a direction from it. The jury returned a verdict of guilty, but at the same time found specially that A and B meant merely to ride the horses the thirty miles, and to leave them there, without an intention to retain them or otherwise dispose of them. Ten of the Judges held that this was no larceny, as there was no intention in the prisoners to change the property or make it their own. (1) But see subsection (a) of the above section, 347, by which the taking of anything with intent to deprive its owner of his property therein temporarily, is rendered sufficient to constitute theft.

Where a person stole some goods and also took a horse to enable him to get off more readily with the goods but with no intent to steal it, it was held not to be a felonious stealing of the horse. (2)

Where the servant of a tanner took out of his master's warehouse dressed skins of leather with intent to bring them in and charge them as his own work (which they were not), and to get paid by the master for them, it was held no larceny. (3)

A was supplied by B, his master, with pig iron to put into a furnace to be melted, he, A, being paid according to the weight of the metal which ran out of the furnace into bars. A put in other iron belonging to B, whereby the weight of the melted iron being thus increased he gained a larger remuneration. Held, that, if A did this with the felonious intent of converting the iron to a purpose for his own profit, it was a larceny. (4)

A took away goods belonging to B, a young woman, for the mere purpose of inducing her to call upon him for them, so that he might have an opportunity of soliciting her to commit fornication with him. Held, not to be a felonious taking. (5)

A met B, whom A knew to be a poacher, and seized him; B, being rescued, seized A's gun and ran away with it, and was subsequently heard to say that he would sell it, and the gun was never afterwards heard of. Vaughan, B., upon an indictment for stealing the gun, told the jury that it would not be larceny if B took the gun under an impression then on his mind that it might be used by A so as to endanger his, B's, life, and not with an intention of disposing of it, although he might afterwards have determined to dispose of it. The jury found that B had no intention to dispose of the gun at the time he took it, and acquitted him. (6) This would now be theft,—by conversion subsequent to the rightful taking,—under the terms of the above section, 347, sub-section 4 of which declares that it is immaterial whether the thing converted was taken for the purpose of conversion or whether it was, at the time of the conversion, in the lawful possession of the person converting.

A, to screen B, an accomplice who was indicted for horse stealing, broke into C's stable where the horse was and took it away and backed it into a coal-pit and killed it. It was contended at the trial that this was not larceny, because the taking was not with an intention to convert the horse to the use of the taker, A, animo furandi et lucri causâ. A majority of seven judges held it to be larceny, and six of that majority were of opinion that to constitute larceny it was not essential that the property should be taken lucri causâ, if it be fraudulent and with intent to wholly deprive the owner of the property; but some of the majority even thought that the object A had in view,—namely, to screen his accomplice,—was a benefit, and that, therefore, the taking was lucri causâ. (7)

THEFT BY TAKING.—Under the terms of sub-section 4 of the above section, 344, theft by taking is committed as soon as the offender moves the thing, or causes it to move or to be moved, or begins to cause it to become movable, with intent to steal it.

This is somewhat similar, though perhaps a little wider, than the common law rule under which a bare removal of the thing was sufficient to make it larceny. (8) For instance, if a man were leading another's horse out of a field and were apprehended while doing so, or if a guest stealing goods in an inn had removed them from his chamber and carried them downstairs, it was, under the common law, a sufficient taking to constitute larceny. (9).

Where a thief, intending to steal some plate, took it out of a chest in which it was and laid it down upon the floor, but was surprised before he could make off with it, it was held a sufficient taking; (10) and where, with the intention of stealing a cask of wine, the thief removed it from the head to the tail of the wagon upon which it lay, it was also held sufficient. (1)

A drew a book from B's inside pocket, so that the book was about an inch from the top of the pocket, when B suddenly put up his hand, upon which, while the book was still about B's person, A let go his hold of the book and it fell back into B's pocket. Held, a sufficient asportation to constitute larceny. (2)

The transfer, by a letter-carrier, of a letter from his pouch to his pocket was held a sufficient asportation. (3)

Where the thief was unable to carry off the goods on account of them being attached by a string on the counter, (4) or to carry off a purse on account of some keys attached to the strings of it getting entangled in the owner's pocket, (5) it was held, in these cases, that there was not a sufficient carrying away to constitute larceny, but that to render the asportation complete, in such cases, there must be a severance.

It may be, however, that under sub-section 4 of the above section, 347, these cases would now be held to be covered so as to make them theft by taking; for that sub-section makes it a sufficient taking as soon as the offender moves the thing or causes it to move or begins to cause it to move.

Of course under the common law,—(and the same thing holds good yet),—whenever there was no actual asportation, the offender might be prosecuted for an attempt to steal, or he could, upon an indictment for the larceny, be convicted, under statutory law to that effect, of the attempt, if the evidence established an attempt; and the same thing can be done now, in the case of an indictment for theft. (See section 949, post.)

The following cases of larceny,—or what we should now call theft by taking,—seem to have been decided upon the principle that there was not only, at the time of the taking, an intent, on the part of the offender, to deprive the owner of his property, but, that, although there was, in some of the cases, what seemed to be a parting with the possession of the goods or money, there was no real and absolute parting with them, but, that, at the time of the offender taking them, the property and right of possession therein still remained, in reality, with the owner,—there being either some trick, artifice or device used by the offender to get hold of the money or goods and no intention on the part of the owner to relinquish his property and right of possession in them, or the parting with the money or goods to the offender being by some servant or employee of the owner without the owner's authority, or there being a larceny of the money or goods by the servant or employee, himself, while in care of them,—as a butler in charge of his master's plate, or a shepherd in charge of his master's sheep, and so on, the possession of the servant being deemed in law to be the possession of the master.

On a charge of stealing goods from a store, evidence of the finding, in the accused's house, of the goods and of the keys fitting the store doors, and of the fact that, at the time of the alleged theft the goods were in the store exposed for sale and had not been sold, is sufficient to put the onus upon the accused of accounting for his possession of the goods. (5*a*)

Where an accused was charged before the County Court Judges' Criminal Court with unlawfully stealing goods, but the charge did not allege that the offence was committed fraudulently and without color of right, it was held, affirming the decision appealed from, that the offence, of which the prisoner was accused was sufficiently stated in the charge. Where on a charge of theft the accused has, at the time the goods were found in his possession, given a reasonable account of how he became possessed of them, the presumption arising from his recent possession is rebutted, but, semble, the same result does not of necessity follow from a like statement by the accused when testifying on his own behalf at the trial. (5c)

TAKING BY MEANS OF A TRICK.—Where a person, having the animus furandi, obtains possession of goods by means of some trick, artifice or device, it is considered larceny under the common law, even though there is an actual delivery, if the owner had no intention to part with his entire right of property but only with the temporary possession of the goods.

A, at a race meeting, made a bet with B, who was given odds upon a certain horse,—the money for which B backed the horse being deposited by the latter with A. The horse won; but, during the race, A had fraudulently decamped with the money. Held, that, as it appeared that B parted with his money intending, in the event of the horse winning, that it should be returned to him, while A received it fraudulently, never intending to deliver it back in any event, there was no contract by which the property in the money could pass to A, and that, therefore, there was evidence of larceny by a trick. (6)

Where A obtained from B, a silversmith, two cream-ewers, in order that C, a customer of the silversmith, with whom A said he lived, might select one, and absconded with them, it was held to be larceny, because the temporary possession only and no right of property was parted with. (7)

A agreed to discount for B a bill which the latter gave, for that purpose, to A, who told B that if he then sent a person with him to his (A's) lodging, he would pay over the amount less discount and commission; a person was sent, accordingly, but upon reaching his lodgings, A left the messenger there and went out on pretence of getting the money, and never returned. The Judge left it to the jury to say whether A obtained possession of the bill with intent to steal it, and whether B meant to part with his property in the bill before he should have received the money for it. The jury found in the affirmative on the first proposition and in the negative on the second, and found A guilty. Conviction upheld. (8)

A offered to give B gold for bank notes, and, on B laying down some bank notes for the purpose of having them so changed into gold, A took them up and went away with them, promising to return with gold or the notes, but he never returned. Wood, B., said the property in the notes had never been parted with at all, and left it to the jury to say whether A had the animus furandi at the time when he took the notes, and said that if they were of that opinion there was a larceny. (9)

A went to B's shop and said C wanted some shawls to look at. B gave her, A, five shawls, which she converted to her own use. Held, that as the property in the shawls would continue in B until the selection would be made by C, it was larceny if C did not send for them; but there being no evidence that C did not send for them, A was acquitted, because it was assumed, in the absence of such evidence, that C did send for the shawls, that A, therefore, received the shawls properly, and only conceived the design of wrongfully converting them to her own use after she had rightfully obtained possession. (10) This would now be theft by conversion under the above section, 347, sub-section 3.

A prevailed on B, a tradesman, to take goods to a certain place, where he said the price would be paid for them, and afterwards induced him to leave the goods in the care of C, from whom A got them without paying the price. B swore that he did not intend to part with the goods until they were paid for; and the jury found that A ab initio intended to get the goods without paying for them. Held, to be larceny. (1)

A gypsy, who obtained and kept money or goods by a false pretence of witchcraft,—the person from whom she obtained them merely intending to part with the possession and expecting them to be returned,—was held guilty of larceny. (2)

A, in presence of B, picked up, in the street, a purse containing a receipt for £147, for a "rich brilliant diamond ring," and also the ring itself. It was then proposed by A that the ring should be given to B on the latter depositing his watch and some money, as a security that he would return the ring as soon as his proportion of the value should be paid to him by A. Accordingly B deposited his watch and money, which were taken away by A's confederates. The ring turned out to be worth only ten shillings and B's watch and money were never returned. It was left to the jury to say whether or not this was an artful and preconcocted scheme to get possession of B's watch and money; and the jury, finding that it was so, convicted A. (3)

In another case, on the defendant being convicted under the same circumstances as the above, the question was reserved for the opinion of the judges, nine of whom were of opinion that this practice of ring dropping amounted to larceny; because, although, in such cases, the possession of the thing obtained was parted with, the property in it was not. (4)

A, B and C decoyed D into a public house, and there introduced a card game called cutting, and one of them prevailed on D, who did not play on his own account, to cut the cards for him, and then under pretence that D had cut the cards for himself, as a player, and lost, another of them swept D's money off the table and went off with it. This was considered to be a case in which it should be left to the jury to determine quo animo the money was obtained, and that it would be larceny should they find that the money was obtained upon a preconcocted plan to steal it. (5)

A, at a fair, agreed to sell a horse to B for £23, of which £8 was to be paid to A, down, and the balance upon delivery. B handed £8 to A who signed for it a receipt stating that the balance was to be paid upon delivery. A never delivered the horse to B, but caused it to be removed from the fair under circumstances shewing that he never intended to deliver it. Held, that A was rightly convicted of larceny of the £8, by a trick, on the ground that B had no intention to part with his property in the £8 until A had fulfilled his part of the bargain, which he never intended to do. (6)

A induced B, by fraud, to buy from him a dress, at the price of 25 shillings, he having promised that if she (B) would do so, he would give her another dress worth twelve shillings, and he then took out of her hand a guinea, she being taken by surprise, and neither consenting nor resisting, and he gave her a dress worth much less than a guinea, and refused to give her the other dress which he had promised. It being found by the jury that this was part of A's scheme to obtain the money by means of a pretended sale, it was held to be a larceny. (7)

A went into a shop and asked for change for half a crown and the shopman gave him two shillings and six pence; A then held out the half crown and the shopman just took hold of it by the edge but never actually got it into his custody, and A ran away with the change and the half crown. Held, to be larceny of the change; but Parke, J., doubted whether an indictment would lie for stealing the half crown. A and B went into C's shop; A put down six pence in silver and six pence in copper, and asked C to give him, in exchange for the money, a one shilling piece, upon which C took, from her money drawer, a one shilling piece which she put on the counter beside A's money; A, while all the money lay there, then said to C that she might as well take the whole of the money thus lying on the counter and give him a two shilling piece for it. C thereupon took a two shilling piece from her drawer and put it on the counter, expecting to receive for it two shillings of A's money. A then picked up the two shilling piece and went away with it. C did not discover her mistake till she was putting the coins from the counter into the money till—B having distracted her attention by asking the price of some article. Held, that C never intended to part with her property in the two shilling piece till she should receive two shillings of A's money, and that the offence was larceny. (9)

In another ringing the changes case, A and B fraudulently induced C, a barmaid, to pay over to them money for her master without having received from them the proper change, and having no intention of or knowledge that she was so doing. Held, guilty of larceny. (10)

Where a hosier, by the defendant's desire, took a parcel of silk stockings to his lodgings and out of them the defendant picked six pairs which were laid on the back of a chair, and the defendant then sent the hosier back to his store for some articles, and while he was absent absconded with the stockings; the Judges held that to be larceny, the defendant having clearly obtained the goods animo furandi. (1)

Where A, in presence of B, picked up a purse containing a watch chain and two seals which A and a confederate represented to be gold and worth £18, and B purchased A's share for £7, intending to part with the property in the money as well as the possession of it, Coleridge, J., held that this was not larceny. (2)

Where A, by means of what is known as the purse trick, induced B to give him a shilling for a purse by showing B three shillings and then making it appear as if he, A, had dropped them into the purse, whereas in fact he had only dropped in three half pence, it was held that the prisoner had been guilty, if at all, of obtaining the shilling by means of a false pretence, and could not be convicted of larceny. (3)

A,—who had bargained for goods for which, by the custom of trade, the price should have been paid before they were taken away,—took them away without the consent of B, the owner, and, at the time he bargained for them, A did not intend to pay for them but meant to get them into his own possession and dispose of them for his own benefit. Held, to be larceny. (4)

Where A, intending ab initio to get goods by fraud, had them put into his cart upon the express condition that they should be paid for before being taken out of the cart, and then took them out of the cart without paying for them. Held, to be larceny. (5)

Where an automatic box, the property of a company, was placed in a public passage and was so constructed that, upon a penny being placed in it, through a slot, a cigarette was ejected from it; and where the prisoner, instead of putting in a penny, put into the box a metal disc of the size of a penny and so obtained a cigarette, he was held guilty of larceny. (6)

Where the prisoner went to an inn on a fair day, and desired the ostler to bring out his horse, and, upon the ostler saying he did not know which was his horse, went into the stable, and pointing to a mare, said it was his, and the ostler brought out the mare which the prisoner attempted to mount, but could not, the mare being frightened; upon which he desired the ostler to lead the mare out of the yard, which was done; but, before he could mount, the prisoner was detected and secured, Garrow, B., held this to be larceny. (7)

Where A hired a horse of B, he, A, stating that he did so for the purpose of taking a journey; and it turned out that, instead of going the journey, A sold the horse in Smithfield market on the same day, it was left to the jury to say whether he hired the horse for the purpose of stealing it or whether he hired it really for the purpose of taking the journey and afterwards changed his intention; and the jury, being of the former opinion, found him guilty. Seven of the judges were afterwards clearly of opinion that the offence was larceny. (8)

And the same thing was held where the defendant hired the horse in the name of another person. (9) And where the defendant hired a post-chaise, with intent to convert it to his own use, and never returned it; upon being indicted for it, twelve months afterwards, as for a larceny, it was held that it clearly amounted to that offence, although the vehicle was not hired for any definite time. (10)

It seems, however, that in order to constitute a larceny at common law by a party to whom goods had been delivered on hire, there must have been not only an original intention on the part of the hirer to convert them to his own use but also a subsequent actual conversion by him of the goods hired, and that a mere agreement by the hirer to accept a sum of money offered for the hired goods by a third party, who did not intend to accept the goods except on condition of his suspicions as to the honesty and right of the hirer to sell being removed,—was held not to amount to an actual conversion. (1)

TAKING FROM AN UNAUTHORIZED SERVANT OF THE OWNER.—Where a defendant obtained some mail bags from the post-master at a post office, by pretending that he was the mail guard, and then ran away with them, the jury, being of opinion that he obtained possession of them with intent to steal them, found him guilty; and the judges upheld the conviction. (2) In this case, the property in the mail bags did not pass, for the post-master had no property in them to part with. (3)

Where the defendant, animo furandi, obtained goods from the servant of a carrier, by falsely pretending to be the person to whom the goods were directed, it was holden to be larceny; because the servant had no authority to part with the goods to any but the right person. (4)

A carrier's servant left goods at the house of the defendant by mistake but without any inducement from the defendant, who afterwards knowing that they had been left there by mistake and did not belong to him, converted them to his own use. Held, to be larceny. (5)

Where A, intending to sell his horse, sent B, his servant, with it to a fair,—B, however, being a mere messenger to take the horse there and having no authority to sell or deal with it in any way, and C, by fraud, induced B to part with possession of the horse under color of an exchange for another, intending all the while to steal it, it was held to be larceny. (6)

A, having a deposit of eleven shillings in a post office savings bank, and, having obtained a warrant or order to withdraw ten shillings of it, went to the post office, where he presented the order, together with his deposit book, to B, a clerk of that department, who, by mistake, instead of looking at the letter of advice for ten shillings connected with A's order or warrant, referred to another letter of advice,—one for £8-16-10,—and, under this mistake, he placed on the counter this larger sum of money which A took up; and, after B had entered the amount, £8-16-10, in the deposit book as paid, A went away, taking the money with him. At the trial, the jury found that A had the animus furandi at the moment of taking up the money from the counter and returned a verdict of guilty. Held, by a majority of the judges, (eleven in number), that A was rightly convicted of larceny; and they supported this holding on various grounds: 1, that the postmaster-general, through B, the clerk, had by mistake, formed a mere intention to pass over the property in the money to A, but that this mistaken intention did not actually pass it, and that A was aware of the mistake and had the animus furandi at the time he took up the money; 2, that B, the clerk, having only a limited authority under the letter of advice to the extent of ten shillings, had no authority to part with the property in the larger amount to A; and, 3, that possession of the money was not completely parted with when it was placed on the counter and when A, animo furandi, took it up. It was, however, held, by a minority of the judges, (four in number), that the money was not taken invito domino, that the general authority of the clerk authorized the parting with the possession and property in the entire sum of money laid on the counter, and that there was no larceny. (7)

A and B ordered goods of C, who sent them to the house of A and B, by his (C's) servant, D, with strict injunctions not to part with them without receiving the price of them. On arriving with the goods at A and B's house, A and B gave to D a cheque which they knew to be worthless, upon which D left the goods. Held, to be larceny. (8)

If, in this case, C, the owner, had himself carried the goods and parted with them in the way in which his servant did, it would, no doubt, have been a case of obtaining the goods by false pretences and not larceny; or, if the servant had had a general authority to act, it would have been the same as if C himself had acted; but the servant had only a limited authority, which he exceeded. (9)

Where the manager of a branch store for the sale of goods supplied by the factory of his employers, arranged with the factory checker to load certain goods on a wagon, going to the branch store, without charging them or keeping the usual check on them which his employers' system required, and he had the goods delivered to a customer at the branch, without the customer being charged—the accused stating that, for his employers' benefit, he had merely postponed the charging of the goods so as to give the customer a longer credit than was customary and to retain the customer's trade, these facts constitute theft, if credence is not given to the accused's explanation. (9a)

STEALING BY A SERVANT OF HIS MASTER'S GOODS ENTRUSTED TO HIM.—Where a person, employed to drive cattle or to take them to a particular place for a special purpose and bring them back, sells them, this,—seeing that he had the custody merely and not the right to the possession or property which remained in the master,—is larceny at common law; (10) although the intention to convert them was not conceived until after they were delivered to him. (1)

If a man having purchased corn on board a vessel, send his clerk or lighterman with his barge for the purpose of landing it, and the clerk or lighterman appropriate a part of the corn, this is also larceny at common law. (2)

An unauthorized gift, by a servant, of goods entrusted to him by his master is as much larceny at common law as if he sold or pawned them. (3)

NO LARCENY WHERE THING FREELY PARTED WITH.—It is clear that, under the common law, not only is it no larceny if the owner himself, of his own freewill, part with his property in the goods taken; (4) but the same principle applies whenever the servant, from whom goods are obtained, has a general authority to act for his employer, and, while acting under such general authority, willingly parts with the goods, the person to whom they are thus delivered not being guilty of larceny.

For instance, where a person obtained money from the cashier of a bank by presenting, knowing it to be forged, a forged order purporting to be drawn by one of the bank's customers, it was held not to be larceny; because the cashier voluntarily parted with the money, and was acting within the scope of his general authority. (5)

Where the defendant bought goods and desired them to be sent with a bill and a receipt, and the shopman, who brought them, left them, upon the defendant handing him two bills, which turned out to be mere fabrications, the judges held this not to be larceny, because the prosecutor had parted with the property, as well as the possession, upon receiving what was deemed at the time by his servant to be payment. (6)

Where a pawn-broker's clerk, who had a general authority from his master to act in his business, delivered up a pledge upon receiving a parcel which he supposed to contain diamonds, and under that belief parted with the pledge entirely, but the parcel contained stones of no value, it was held to be no larceny. (7)

The question of whether,—when property was given by the owner to a person under a mistake of which the person receiving it was not aware at the time of its reception,—the person so receiving it was guilty of larceny by afterwards converting it to his own use, was fully argued before the Court of Crown Cases Reserved, whose decision shewed that the Judges were equally divided as to whether the prisoner was legally convicted or not; and the remarks of a few of the Judges seemed to indicate that there was an impression that even the innocent reception of the sovereign, coupled with its subsequent fraudulent appropriation, might amount to larceny; but this was not the real ground upon which the Court was divided, as will be seen below. The facts were these. The prisoner had asked the prosecutor for the loan of a shilling; and the prosecutor having given him a sovereign believing it to be a shilling, the prisoner was prosecuted and convicted of having,—by keeping the sovereign,—stolen it. On the one hand, it was considered by some of the Judges that the facts shewed that the prisoner, when he took the coin, was under the same mistaken belief as the prosecutor, namely, that it was a shilling; while, on the other hand, it was considered by the other Judges that the facts shewed that, at the very instant of receiving it, the prisoner was aware of the coin being a sovereign and of the owner being under the mistaken belief that it was a shilling. The Court were unanimous in holding that the prisoner was not guilty of larceny as a bailee, but were equally divided as to whether he was guilty of larceny at common law; and the conviction stood. Seven of the fourteen Judges were of opinion that the facts did not shew an innocent reception of the sovereign and that therefore the prisoner was rightly convicted of larceny; but the other seven Judges considered that the facts did shew an innocent reception of the sovereign and that such innocent reception, coupled with the subsequent fraudulent appropriation of the coin by the prisoner, did not constitute larceny. (8)

In some later cases the old rule of the common law, that the innocent receipt of a chattel coupled with its subsequent fraudulent appropriation does not amount to larceny, has been confirmed. (9)

Thus, where a man handed to the prisoner a £10 note in mistake for a £1 note, and the prisoner took in under the same mistake, and, afterwards, on discovering the error, kept it, it was held that he could not be indicted for larceny. (10)

But under section 347, of our Code, the subsequent fraudulent appropriation of the thing thus innocently received will amount to theft by conversion.

LARCENY OR THEFT OF LOST THINGS.—With regard to the larceny of lost things, the general rule under the common law seems to have been that if a person found goods which had been actually lost or reasonably supposed by him to have been lost, and appropriated them, with intent to take the entire dominion over them, really believing, when he took them, that the owner could not be found, it was not larceny; but if he took them with the like intent, though lost, or reasonably supposed to be lost, but reasonably believing that the owner could be found, it was larceny. (1) It was necessary that the prisoner, at the time of finding, should believe that the owner could be ascertained, and without this, an intention to appropriate, at the time of the finding, did not make the prisoner guilty of larceny, although he ascertained the name of the owner before converting to his own use. (2)

It will be seen that, now, under section 347, a finder of lost goods will render himself liable to prosecution for theft by conversion, if after finding the goods he discover the name of the owner and do not restore them, but converts them to his own use, although at the time of finding them he neither knew the owner nor believed nor had reasonable grounds for believing that the owner could be found.

The following are some of the cases decided under the old rule.

On an indictment for stealing a bank note, the jury found that the prosecutor had dropped the note in the defendant's shop, that the defendant had found it there, that, at the time he picked it up, the defendant did not know and had no reasonable means of knowing who the owner was, that he afterwards acquired knowledge who the owner was, and that, after having acquired this knowledge, he converted it to his own use; and they found further that the defendant intended, when he found the note, to take it to his own use, and deprive the owner of it whoever he was, and that he believed, when he found it, that the owner could be discovered. Held, that, upon these findings, the defendant was rightly convicted. (3)

A's child, having found six sovereigns in the street, brought them to A, who counted them and told some bystanders that the child had found a sovereign. A and her child then went down the street to the place where the child had picked up the money, and found a half-sovereign and a bag. About two hours afterwards, A was told that a woman had lost some money, upon which she told her informant to mind her own business, and gave her half a sovereign.

Held, by the majority of the Irish Court of Criminal Appeal, that this case could not be distinguished from R. v. Glyde, post; that there was nothing to shew that, at the time the child brought her the money, A knew that it had an owner, or, to show that she was under the impression that the owner could be found; and her conviction for larceny was quashed. (4)

A put 900 guineas in a secret drawer in a bureau, and died. B, her son and executor, lent the bureau to his brother, C, who, after keeping it several years, sold it to D, who gave it out to be repaired by E, who found the money. Held, to be such a taking, by E, out of the possession of A, as to constitute larceny. (5)

If a cabman converted to his own use a parcel left by a passenger in his cab, by mistake, it was larceny, by the common law, if he knew the owner, or if he took him or set him down at a particular place where he could have enquired for him. (6)

A found a sovereign on the highway, believing it had been accidentally lost, but, with a knowledge that he was doing wrong, he at once determined to appropriate it, notwithstanding that it should become known to him who the owner was. The owner was speedily made known to A, who, however, refused to deliver up the sovereign. There was no evidence that he believed, at the time of finding the sovereign that A could ascertain who the owner was, and he was therefore held not guilty of larceny. (7)

Under section 347, sub-section 3, this would now be theft by conversion.

In every case in which there is any mark upon the property by which the owner may be traced, and the finder, instead of restoring the property, convert it to his own use, such conversion amounted, at common law, to larceny. (8)

An unqualified instruction to the jury on a prosecution against the finder of goods that the pledge of the same by him constitutes theft, is a misdirection entitling the accused to a new trial. Whether or not the conversion by the finder is theft depends upon the attendant circumstances, such as the class of goods, the place of finding, the interval between the finding and the conversion, and the probability of being able to discover the owner. (8*a*)

LARCENY OR THEFT OF THINGS NOT LOST BUT MISLAID.—In every case where the property was not, properly speaking, lost, but only mislaid, under circumstances which would enable the owner to know where to look for and find it, the person finding and appropriating property so mislaid was held guilty of larceny under the common law.

A purchaser at the prisoner's stall, left his purse in it. A stranger pointed out the purse to the prisoner, supposing it to be the latter's, when the prisoner took up the purse and put it in her pocket, and afterwards concealed it. On the return of the owner, the prisoner denied all knowledge of it. Upon an indictment for larceny, the jury found that the prisoner took up the purse knowing that it was not her own and intending at the same time to appropriate it to her own use, but that she did not know, then, who was the owner of it. She was held properly convicted, and that the purse so left was not lost property but mislaid. (9)

A bought a bureau at an auction and afterwards discovered in a secret drawer of it a purse of money, which he appropriated to his own use. Held, that, if he had express notice that the bureau only, and not its contents, if any, were sold to him, or, if he had no reason to believe that anything more than the bureau itself was sold, the abstraction of the money was a felonious taking, and amounted to larceny, but that if he had reasonable ground for believing that he bought the bureau with its contents, if any, he had a colorable right to the property, and there was no larceny. (10)

A, a boy, found a lost cheque, which B, by some pretence, got from him, and kept in the hopes of obtaining a reward, but not being satisfied with the reward offered by the owner he refused to deliver it either to the owner or to A. Held, that B. could not be convicted of stealing the cheque either from the owner or from A. (1)

THEFT BY CONVERSION.—It is generally laid down that any act which is an interference with the dominion and right of property of another is a conversion. (2) A conversion does not mean a destruction of the goods nor does it necessarily import an acquisition of property by the defendant or a total or absolute loss of the goods to the owner, but it consists in any wrongful act by which the defendant deprives the owner of his goods either wholly or for a time. (3) To constitute a fraudulent conversion, the owner must be deprived of his property or money by an adverse using or holding. (4)

Under the terms of section 347, theft by conversion is committed whenever a person, already in possession of a specific article of personal property with the owner's consent, fraudulently and without color of right converts it to his own use or to the use of any other person than the owner of it, with intent to deprive the owner of it, either temporarily or absolutely, or with intent to deprive any person having any special property or interest therein, temporarily or absolutely, of such special property or interest, or with intent to pledge the same or to part with it under a condition, as to its return, which he may not be able to perform, or to so deal with it that it cannot be restored.

Where a person, who is a caretaker of land for another on an Indian reserve, fraudulently and without color of right, removes and converts to his own use, the hay grown thereon with intent to deprive of the same the party for whom he is caretaker, he is guilty of theft, although the party for whom he is caretaker had not a good title to the ownership of the hay, it being held that for the purposes of theft, the person entitled to possession of the goods is the owner as against the taker, and that the latter cannot set up jus tertii against such owner, unless the taking was effected either with the authority of the third person having the superior title or under the belief on the part of the taker that he had the authority of such third person. (4*a*)

As we have already seen, the doctrine of the common law is that a wrongful taking out of the possession of the owner is of the essence of theft, and that, if a person rightfully and innocently obtains possession of a thing and afterwards fraudulently misappropriates it, he is guilty of no criminal offence; and, as we have also seen, this doctrine was, from time to time, qualified by a number of statutory exceptions, the first of which was contained in the statutes which provided for the punishment of clerks, servants and other employees who embezzled property received by them on behalf of their employers; this exception to the general rule being followed by statutes passed for the punishment of bankers, merchants, brokers, solicitors, factors, and other agents, who committed similar offences, and for the punishment of bailees for fraudulently converting any chattel, money or valuable security entrusted to them.

The effect of section 347, is to put all persons whomsoever, — whether they are or are not clerks, servants, employees, bankers, merchants, brokers, solicitors, factors, agents or bailees,—upon the same footing, and to make every person whomsoever, — without any distinction, — guilty of theft by conversion, (or what may, perhaps, be more properly termed embezzlement), when, having become rightfully possessed of something belonging to another, he, instead of handing it over, in specie, or instead of doing with it what he was entrusted to do, fraudulently, and, without color of right, converts it to his own use or to the use of any other person than the owner. In other words, embezzlement by clerks, servants or other employees, fraudulent conversion by bankers, merchants, brokers, solicitors, factors or other agents, of property entrusted to them for safe custody, etc., and larceny by bailees, are three only of the various ways of committing the offence of theft by conversion, treated of by section 347. So, that, it may not be out of place to briefly review some of the authorities on these three subjects.

EMBEZZLEMENT. — Embezzlement, when defined in a general way, — without regard to its application to a particular class, such as clerks, servants or other employees, — is said to be the fraudulent appropriation or conversion of the property or goods of another by one who has the rightful possession of them or who is entrusted with their possession at the time of the conversion. (5)

The main distinction between larceny by a clerk, servant or other employee and embezzlement by a clerk, servant or other employee was that, to constitute embezzlement, the money or other property appropriated by the offender must, at the time of its appropriation, never have been, even constructively, in the possession of the master; for if, at the time of being taken and appropriated, it was already in the master's possession, either actually or constructively, the servant's offence amounted to larceny and not embezzlement. (6) For instance, if an employee opened his master's money drawer, or desk or safe, containing money belonging to his master and abstracted and appropriated any of such money, or if the master handed money to the servant to pay out for him, and the servant appropriated it, the servant in each of these cases committed larceny; but, if a debtor of the master paid a debt to the master's servant, and the latter kept the money and appropriated it to his own use, this was embezzlement. (7)

The usual presumptive evidence of a servant having embezzled money received by him for his master is that he never accounted to his master for it, or that he denied having received it.

If, instead of denying the appropriation of the money, the party in rendering his account admits it, alleging a right in himself, however unfounded, or setting up an excuse, however frivolous, he is not guilty of embezzlement; (8) even though he afterwards abscond and do not pay over the money. (9)

But where it is the servant's duty to account for and pay over at stated times the moneys received by him, his not doing so, wilfully, is embezzlement; although he do not actually deny the receipt of them. Thus, upon an indictment charging the prisoner with the embezzlement of £4-8-6 on November 4th, of £4-9-8 on November 28th, and of £1 on December 18th, it appeared that the prisoner was in the employ of the prosecutrix in her business of a baker and was authorized to receive moneys due for bread, and that, in payment for quantities of bread, he received the three sums in question on the three days above mentioned, and had never paid any of them over to the prosecutrix. The prisoner had never denied receiving the moneys, but it was his duty on the evening of every day to render to the prosecutrix a verbal account of all moneys received by him on her account in the course of that day and to immediately pay them over to her. It was submitted for the defence that there was no embezzlement, as there was no denial of the receipt of any of the monies, and that the mere omission to pay them over was not embezzlement; but Coleridge, J., held, that, as it was the prisoner's duty every evening to account for and pay over all moneys received by him in the course of the day, his wilful omission to pay them over was clearly quite equivalent to a denial of their receipt and constituted embezzlement. (10) And, even where no precise time can be fixed at which it was the servant's duty to pay the moneys over, his not accounting for them, if found by the jury to have been done fraudulently, is equally an embezzlement. (1)

Where, upon an indictment for embezzlement, the Crown Counsel, in opening the case, stated that the prosecutrix, and that it would be proved that there was a deficiency in the prisoner's accounts, Alderson, B., said, "It is not sufficient to prove at the trial a general deficiency in account. Some specific sum must be proved to be embezzled in like manner as in larceny, some particular article must be proved to have been stolen." (2)

Fish taken at sea are in the possession of the owner of the smack by which they are taken, as soon as they are taken and are consequently the subject of theft by taking.

A.—who was employed as a skipper of a smack used for trawling outside territorial waters.—during the course of a fishing voyage, put into port, sold the fish he had taken, and appropriated the proceeds to his own use. Held, properly convicted of theft. (2*a*)

The appropriation, for purposes of shipment, of a railway car intended by the railway company for another person who had a prior statutory right to be supplied with a car, is not a fraudulent taking or conversion of the car from such other person, if the latter had not received notice from the railway company that the car had been assigned to him. An applicant for a railway car under the Manitoba Grain Act (Can.), was held not to acquire a temporary "special property or interest" in the car within the above section 347 of the Code, until he is informed of its assignment to him. (3)

FRAUDULENT CONVERSION BY BANKERS, ETC.—Certain trust money, which had been invested on mortgage, was paid off, and was left in the hands of the defendant, the solicitor to the trust, who thereupon wrote to the person beneficially interested informing him of the money being paid and asking how he would like to have it invested,—whether in the funds or on mortgage. In answer, the beneficiary wrote to the defendant as follows,—"Will consult G. at once about the money, and let you know. I do not wish it placed in the funds." About the date of these letters, it was clear that the defendant fraudulently appropriated the money to his own use. Held, upon the prosecution of the defendant, under section 76 of the Imperial Act, 24-25 Vict. c. 96, for fraudulently converting property entrusted to him for safe keeping, that he was guilty of that offence. (3*a*)

But, where a solicitor was entrusted by a client with money to invest on mortgage on the client's behalf, and, instead of doing so, he fraudulently appropriated the money to his own use, it was held, on a prosecution under the same section, that the defendant was not entrusted with the money "for safe custody." (4)

Where, on a prosecution of a banker, etc., for the fraudulent conversion of money entrusted to him for a specific purpose, it was alleged that there was a specific direction to invest the money in the funds, it was held, that such an allegation was not supported by evidence of a direction to invest in the funds, in the event of any unexpected accident occurring. (5)

The prisoner was an agent employed to sell goods on commission for the prosecutors. During the employment, the prosecutors wrote to the prisoner,

"We will send H, B and P, their bills at the end of the month, and the same day that you receive the money from the customers you must remit it to us. We will attend to your order, as our arrangements were to remit us, as soon as you received it." After getting this letter, the prisoner received from three different customers,—not H, B or P,—three different sums of money, which he converted to his own use. Held, that the above letter was not a direction in writing as to the application of the three sums so converted, as the letter probably only referred to the accounts of H, B and P, and further that the prisoner had not (within the meaning of section 75 of the Imperial Act, 24-25 Vict., c. 96), been entrusted with the three sums mentioned in the indictment as they had never been actually or constructively in the possession of the prisoner and therefore they could not be said to have entrusted the prisoner with them. (6)

The prosecutor by letter instructed the prisoner, a stock broker, to buy for him on the following day certain stock at 90, to hold for a rise, the time to close to be left open, and he enclosed a cheque for £21, "the cover and commission." On the day following, the price of the stock was higher than the limit prescribed in the letter (namely 90), and the prisoner paid the cheque into his own bank, without purchasing stock, and he subsequently spent the money for his own use. Held, that the prisoner was rightly convicted on an indictment, under 24-25 Vict., c. 96, s. 75, charging him that having been entrusted, as a broker and agent, with a security for payment of money, with a direction in writing to apply it for a specific purpose, in violation of good faith and contrary to the terms of such direction, he converted to his own use. (7)

The defendant, a broker, who from time to time gratuitously made investments, on the Stock Exchange, as agent for the prosecutrix, wrote to her enclosing a contract note for three Japanese bonds at £112 each, saying he was fortunate in securing them for her and asked her to ratify what he had done. The contract-note was in the form of a sold-note from the defendant to the prosecutrix. The prosecutrix wrote him in reply, saying she had received the contract-note and she enclosed a cheque for £336 in payment. The cheque was payable to the defendant and endorsed and cashed by him, but he never paid for the bonds and applied the proceeds of the cheque to his own purposes. Held, that the letter from the prosecutrix saying that she "enclosed the cheque for £336 in payment," was a sufficient direction, under section 75 of the 24-25 Vict., c. 96, to apply the cheque or its proceeds to take up the Japanese bonds by paying the seller, if not already delivered to the defendant, and if already received by the defendant, by paying himself, and that the conviction of the defendant should be confirmed. (8)

An attorney, employed to raise money on mortgage of property, found a mortgagee, prepared the mortgage, got it executed, obtained the mortgage money and handed over the mortgage deed to the mortagee. He paid over to the mortgagor a portion only of the mortgage money and fraudulently converted the remainder to his own use. Held, that as the attorney was not entrusted with the mortgage deed or with the money for safe custody, and as there was no direction in writing to apply the proceeds of the mortgage deed, and as the mortgage could not be said to have been transferred by him in violation of good faith and contrary to the object or purpose for which he was entrusted with it, he did not come within the 75th or 76th sections of the Imperial Act, 24-25 Vict., c. 96. (9)

LARCENY AS A BAILEE.—Even before the passing of the statutes relating to larceny by bailees, it was held that, although goods were in the first instance obtained without a felonious intent, yet if the possession of them was obtained by means of a trespass, the subsequent fraudulent appropriation of them during the continuance of the same transaction, was larceny. As, where a man, driving a flock of sheep from a field, drove with them a sheep belonging to another person, without knowing at the time that he did so, but afterwards, on discovering the fact, sold that sheep and appropriated the proceeds of the sale to his own use, he was held to be rightly convicted of larceny. (10)

A man could not be convicted of larceny as a bailee unless the bailment was to re-deliver the very same chattel or money. (1)

The prosecutor placed a sum of money in the hands of the prisoner for the purpose of purchasing coals for the prosecutor from a colliery company.

The prisoner did not buy any coals, but fraudulently appropriated the money to his own use. On these facts he was held rightly convicted of larceny as a bailee. (2)

A carter was employed by the owner of a cargo of coals to load the coals in the carter's own cart from the vessel and deliver specified quantities thereof to persons whose names were on a list given to him. He sold two loads of the coals fraudulently to persons whose names were not on the list, and appropriated the money to his own use. Held, that he was guilty of larceny as bailee of the two loads. (3)

The prosecutor delivered to the prisoner two brooches to sell for him at £200 for one, and £150 for the other, and the prisoner was to have them for a period not exceeding ten days for that purpose. After the expiration of the ten days the prisoner sold the brooches with other jewellery for £250, but arranged with the buyer that he might redeem the brooches for £110 by a certain time. The prisoner was held to be guilty of larceny as a bailee of the brooches, it having been his duty, after the ten days had expired without his effecting a sale, to return the brooches in specie to the prosecutor. (4)

Where the prisoner, a commission agent, was entrusted by the prosecutors with silk for sale and it was his duty, at the end of six months, to send in an account for the entire six months, and to return the unsold silk, and before the end of the six months he appropriated the silk to his own use, he was held to be rightly convicted of larceny as a bailee. (5)

Where the prisoner was indicted for larceny as bailee of a coat, and the evidence was that the prosecutor had lent the coat to wear for a day and that some few days afterwards the prisoner left the town and was found wearing the coat on board a vessel bound for Australia, Martin, B., stopped the case on the ground that there was no evidence of a conversion sufficient to satisfy the statute. "The determination of the bailment," said His Lordship, "must be something analogous to larceny, and some act must be done inconsistent with the purposes of the bailment. (6)

The drawer of an accommodation bill for £30 received it from the acceptor upon an arrangement to get it cashed and pay over to the latter all the proceeds except £3, which the drawer was to retain for his trouble. Instead of carrying out this arrangement the drawer handed the bill to one of his creditors who was pressing him for payment of a debt of £10, in order that the creditor might discount the bill and retain out of it his debt of £10 and then hand over the balance to the drawer. The creditor, however, did not carry out this arrangement and detained the bill. On these facts it was held that, although the drawer was a bailee of the bill within the meaning of the statute, yet there was no conversion of it by him analogous to larceny, and that therefore an indictment against him for larceny as bailee of the bill could not be sustained. (7)

Whilst in treaty with a firm of solicitors for the transfer of a public house license, the prisoner was required by them to give security for the purchase money before they would assist him in procuring a transfer. To enable him to give the required security, the prosecutor accepted three bills of exchange drawn upon him by the prisoner, which it was agreed that the prisoner should deposit with the solicitors, by way of security, and that he should not negotiate or use them for any other purpose, and if the transfer was not effected that he should return them to the prosecutor. The prisoner who,—instead of depositing the bills with the solicitors,—applied two of them to other purposes for his own benefit, was held not to have been a bailee of the bills within section 3 of 24-25 Vict., c. 96. (8)

But a person who receives a bill of exchange for the purpose of getting it discounted and handing the proceeds over to another and instead of getting it discounted endorses it as his own to a creditor in payment of his account, intending to pay the property in the bill absolutely to the creditor, is a bailee of a valuable security and guilty of a fraudulent conversion of the same to his own use. (9)

Where a person has been entrusted by another with a valuable security with instructions to raise thereon a loan for such other person, and, after having effected the loan and received the proceeds in cash, misappropriates the latter to his own use, he may be convicted of larceny as a bailee of the money so received. (10)

348. Agent pledging goods entrusted to him for sale. — No factor or agent shall be guilty of theft by pledging or giving a lien on any goods or document of title to goods entrusted to him for the purpose of sale or otherwise, for any sum of money not greater than the amount due to him from his principal at the time of pledging or giving a lien on the same, together with the amount of any bill of exchange accepted by him for or on account of his principal.

2. Servant Feeding Horse Contrary to Master's Orders.— Any servant, contrary to the orders of his master, taking from his possession any food for the purpose of giving the same or having the same given to any horse or other animal belonging to or in the possession of his master, shall not, by reason thereof, be guilty of theft. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 305.

The prisoners, who were farm servants, opened a granary of their master by means of a false key, and took thereout two bushels of beans to give to their master's horses, in addition to the quantity usually allowed for the purpose. This was held by a majority of the Judges to be larceny: it was said by some of the Judges that the additional quantity of beans taken and given to the horses, would diminish the work of the men who had to look after the horses, and that, therefore, the lucri causâ, to give themselves ease, was an ingredient in the offence. (1) Cases of this kind are now expressly excepted: it being declared by sub-section 2 of the above section, 348, that, if any servant, against his master's orders, takes from the master's possession any food to give to any of the master's horses or other animals, such servant shall be guilty of no offence.

349. Theft of things under seizure.—Every one commits theft and steals the thing taken or carried away who, whether pretending to be the owner or not, secretly or openly, takes or carries away, or causes to be taken or carried away, without lawful authority, any property under lawful seizure and detention by any peace officer or public officer in his official capacity. 63-64 V., c. 46, s. 3.

This section has been repealed by the Criminal Code Amendment Act, 1909 (8-9 Edw. VII., c. 9), section 2.

In view of section 347 (a), ante, the repealed section was unnecessary.

350. Theft of animals.—Every one commits theft and steals the creature killed who kills any living creature capable of being stolen with intent to steal the carcass, skin, plumage or any part of such creature. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 307.

The stealing of cattle is punishable, under section 369, post, by fourteen years' imprisonment; and according to the above section, 350, the same punishment will be applicable to the offence of killing cattle with intent to steal the carcass, etc., thereof.

See section 392, post, as to the punishment of Cattle frauds.

The stealing of dogs, birds and domestic animals, etc., is punishable under section 370, post.

Section 510, clause (B), post, makes it an indictable offence, punishable by fourteen years' imprisonment, to wilfully destroy or damage any cattle, by killing, maiming, poisoning or wounding.

351. Theft of electricity.—Every one commits theft who maliciously or fraudulently abstracts, causes to be wasted or diverted, consumes or uses any electricity. 57-58 V., c. 29, s. 10.

352. Theft by owners, co-owners, partners, etc.—Theft may be committed by the owner of anything capable of being stolen against a person having a special property or interest therein, or by a person having a special property or interest therein against the owner thereof, or by a lessee against his reversioner, or by one or several joint owners, tenants in common, or partners of or in any such thing against the other persons interested therein, or by the directors, public officers or members of a public company, or body corporate, or of an unincorporated body or society associated together for any lawful purpose, against such public company or body corporate or unincorporated body or society. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 311.

See section 386, post, as to punishment.

A minor entrusted by his tutor or judicial guardian with chattel property, of which he is part owner, is,—by fraudulently converting it to his own use, with intent to deprive his tutor of it,—guilty of theft. (2)

353. Theft by defrauding partner in mining claim.—Every one commits theft who, with intent to defraud his co-partner, co-adventurer, joint tenant or tenant in common, in any mining claim, or in any share or interest in any such claim, secretly keeps back or conceals any gold or silver found in or upon or taken from such claim. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 312.

See section 397, post.

See section 637, post, which authorizes the issuing of search warrants to search for gold, etc., alleged to be concealed.

354. Husband and wife.—No husband shall be convicted of stealing during cohabitation, the property of his wife, and no wife shall be convicted of stealing, during cohabitation, the property of her husband; but while they are living apart from each other either shall be guilty of theft if he or she fraudulently takes or converts anything which is, by law, the property of the other in a manner which, in any other person, would amount to theft.

2. Every one commits theft who, while a husband and wife are living together, knowingly,—

(a) assists either of them in dealing with anything which is the property of the other in a manner which would amount to theft if they were not married; or,

(b) receives from either of them anything, the property of the other, obtained from that other by such dealing as aforesaid. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 313.

At page 28 of their Report, the English Commissioners have, on this subject, the following remarks:—

"By the present law, a husband or wife cannot steal from his wife or her husband, even if they are living apart, although by recent statutes the wife is capable of possessing separate property. So long as cohabitation continues this seems reasonable; but when married persons are separated, and have separate property, it seems to us to follow that the wrongful taking of it should be theft. This section is also framed so as to put an end to an unmeaning distinction by which it is a criminal offence in an adulterer to receive from his paramour the goods of her husband, but no offence in any one else to receive such goods from the wife."

The recent statutes above referred to by the English Commissioners, as having reference to the separate property of married women, are the Married Women's Property Act of 1870 and Amendments thereto made up to 1878, when the Royal Commissioners made their Report. Since that date an important change has been made, in England, in regard to married women, by the passing of the Married Women's Property Act of 1882 (45-46 Vict., c. 78), which almost abolished, as far as property is concerned, the legal distinction, which existed in England, between married and unmarried women, by giving to a married woman the fullest powers of acquiring, holding and disposing of property as her own separate property, and that, too, without the old formality of the intervention of a trustee by means of a deed of settlement, ante or post nuptial. The statute enacts, that, "Every woman whether married before or after this Act shall have in her own name, against all persons whomsoever, including her husband, the same civil remedies and also (subject as regards her husband to the proviso hereinafter contained), the same remedies and redress by way of criminal proceedings, for the protection of her own separate property, as if such property belonged to her as a feme sole: . . . provided that no criminal proceeding shall be taken by any wife against her husband by virtue of this Act, while they are living together, as to or concerning any property claimed by her," etc.

An indictment charging an accused with having received money stolen by a wife from her husband, he (the accused), knowing it to have been stolen, was held good,—the stealing by a wife of her husband's property being made a criminal offence by the Imperial Married Women's Property Act, 1882. (3)

355. Theft by an agent—Omission to account.—Every one commits theft who, having received any money or valuable security or other thing whatsoever, on terms requiring him to account for or pay the same, or the proceeds thereof, or any part of such proceeds, to any other person, though not requiring him to deliver over in specie the identical money, valuable security or other thing received, fraudulently converts the same to his own use, or fraudulently omits to account for or pay the same or any part thereof, or to account for or pay such proceeds or any part thereof, which he was required to account for or pay as aforesaid.

2. If it be part of the said terms that the money or other thing received, or the proceeds thereof, shall form an item in a debtor and creditor account between the person receiving the same and the person to whom he is to account for or pay the same, and that such last mentioned person shall rely only on the personal liability of the other as his debtor in respect thereof, the proper entry of such money or proceeds or any part thereof, in such account, shall be a sufficient accounting for the money or proceeds, or part thereof, so entered.

3. In such case no fraudulent conversion of the amount accounted for shall be deemed to have taken place. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 308.

For the meaning of the word "valuable security," see section 2[e], ante.

(3) R. v. Payne, [1906] 1 K. B., 97; 75 L. J. K. B., 114; 21 Cox, 121.

The offence of fraudulent conversion of the proceeds of a valuable security consists of a continuity of acts,—the reception of the valuable security, the collection of the proceeds, and the failure to account for the proceeds; and where the beginning of the operation is in one district and the continuation and completion are in another district, the accused may be arrested and proceeded against in either district. (4)

Where a prisoner was indicted and convicted under the above section, 355, on a charge of having received from one Snelgrove $338, the property of one Scott, on terms requiring him to account for and pay it to Scott, and of having, instead thereof, fraudulently converted it to his own use, it was contended for the prisoner that, as no terms were imposed by Snelgrove, from whom the prisoner received the money, there was no offence. Held, on a reserved case, that the section does not mean "terms imposed by the person paying the money," but terms on which the defendant, when he receives it, holds it. (5)

Offences against this section 355, and against sections 356 and 357, are punishable under section 358, post, by fourteen years' imprisonment: and section 387, post, provides that when, in cases of theft, the value of the article exceeds $200, two years shall be added to the term of imprisonment.

A railway conductor who takes from a passenger, for his transportation a sum much less than the authorized fare and issues no ticket or receipt therefor, is guilty of theft as an agent, if he fraudulently omits to account for and pay, to the railway company, the money so received. Money so taken for transportation is money received by the railway conductor "on terms requiring him to account for or pay the same" to the company. (6)

A broker who receives money from a customer to purchase stocks on margin for a firm of correspondents, holds them in his own name and allows them to be sold on his account, but subsequently re-arranges with his correspondents to resume business and carry the same stocks, receiving in the meantime remittances from his customer to maintain the margin, without informing him of what has taken place, and who afterwards severs anew his connection with his correspondents and receives at the same time from his customer instructions to sell the stocks, which would have resulted in a comparatively small loss, but instead of doing so, replaces them by purchase of a like quantity of the same kind from another firm whose subsequent failure causes their total loss,—is not guilty of theft by an agent under the Criminal Code. (7)

An indictment charging theft by a person required to account is valid, if the offence is stated as combining fraudulent conversion, fraudulent omission to account and fraudulent omission to pay over money, although the offence would be complete with one of these elements. (8)

An accused was convicted, in England, under section 1, subsection 1 (b) of the Imperial Larceny Act, 1901, for having received for and on account of the prosecutor, from a customer of the latter, certain sums of money and fraudulently converted them to his own use. It appeared that the accused was employed on the terms that he should collect for the prosecutor the debts, (owing by the latter's customers), set forth in a list, and that he should account, at the end of each week, for the moneys so collected, after deducting 5 per cent. for his own remuneration. The accused collected various sums, failed to pay them over to the prosecutor, and fraudulenty converted them to his own use. Held, that the conviction was right. (9) person, with any power of attorney for the sale, mortgage, pledge or other disposition of any property, real or personal, whether capable of being stolen or not, fraudulently sells, mortgages, pledges or otherwise disposes of the same or any part thereof, or fraudulently converts the proceeds of any sale, mortgage, pledge or other disposition of such property, or any part of such proceeds, to some purpose other than that for which he was entrusted with such power of attorney. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 309.

This section is somewhat similar to section 77 of the Imperial Statute, 24-25 Vic., c. 96, which is as follows:—"Whosoever, being intrusted, either solely or jointly with any other person, with any power of attorney for the sale or transfer of any property, shall fraudulently sell or transfer or otherwise convert the same or any part thereof to his own use or benefit or the use or benefit of any person other than the person by whom he was so entrusted, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to any of the punishments which the Court may award as hereinbefore last mentioned." (Penal servitude for any term not exceeding seven years and not less than three years).

An indictment, for stealing under power of attorney, charging that the money appropriated was the proceeds of a sale made by accused while acting under a power of attorney, will not be quashed for failure to allege that the power of attorney was one for the sale or disposition of property; but particulars will be ordered as to the date, nature and purport of the alleged power of attorney. (10)

357. Theft by misappropriating proceeds held under direction.—Every one commits theft who, having received, either solely or jointly with any other person, any money or valuable security or any power of attorney for the sale of any property, real or personal, with a direction that such money, or any part thereof, or the proceeds, or any part of the proceeds of such security, or such property, shall be applied to any purpose or paid to any person specified in such direction, in violation of good faith and contrary to such direction, fraudulently applies to any other purpose or pays to any other person such money or proceeds, or any part thereof.

2. When the person receiving such money, security or power of attorney, and the person from whom he receives it, deal with each other on such terms that all money paid to the former would, in the absence of any such direction, be properly treated as an item in a debtor and creditor account between them, this section shall not apply, unless such direction is in writing. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 310.

See section 2[32], ante, for the meaning of the word "property."

note stating that the proviso of this section diminishes the number of cases in which the direction to dispose of the money, etc., must be in writing, and in their marginal note they add a reference to the cases of R. v. Cooper and R. v. Tatlock, which are two out of a number of decisions shewing the necessity for the special wording of the provisions of this section 357.

In Cooper's Case, the defendant was indicted under sections 75 and 76 of the Imperial Statute, 24-25 Vic., c. 96. Section 75 of that Act provides that "whosoever having been intrusted (etc.) as a banker, merchant, broker, attorney, or other agent, with any money or security for the payment of money, with any direction in writing to apply, pay or deliver such money or security, or any part thereof respectively, or the proceeds or any part of the proceeds of such security, for any purpose, or to any person specified in such direction, shall,—in violation of good faith and contrary to the terms of such direction,—in anywise convert to his own use or benefit, or the use or benefit of any person other than the person by whom he shall have been so intrusted, such money, security or proceeds, or any part thereof respectively; and whosoever, having been intrusted, (etc.) as a banker, (etc.), with any chattel or valuable security, or any power of attorney for the sale or transfer of any share or interest in any public stock or fund, (without any authority to sell, negotiate, transfer or pledge) shall,—in violation of good faith, and contrary to the object or purpose for which such chattel, security or power of attorney shall have been intrusted to him,—sell, negotiate, transfer, pledge, or in any manner convert to his own use or benefit or the use or benefit of any person other than the person by whom he shall have been so intrusted, such chattel, (etc.), shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, etc.;" and section 76 enacts that, "whosoever being a banker, merchant, broker, attorney or agent, and being intrusted, either solely or jointly with any other person, with the property of any other person for safe custody, shall, with intent to defraud, sell, negotiate, transfer, pledge or in any manner convert or appropriate the same or any part thereof, to or for his own use or benefit, or the use or benefit of any person other than the person by whom he was so intrusted, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor." etc.

It appears that the defendant was an attorney, who was employed to raise money on security of property, and, having found a mortgagee willing to make the loan, he prepared the mortgage deed, got it executed by the mortgagor, obtained the money from, and handed over the deed to the mortgagee. He then paid over to the mortgagor, a portion only of the money, and fraudulently converted the rest of it to his own use. Held,—upon these facts,—that as the defendant was not intrusted with the deed or the money, for safe custody, and, as there was no direction in writing to apply the proceeds of the mortgage deed, and, as the deed could not be said to have been transferred in violation of good faith and contrary to the object or purpose for which it was intrusted to him, the defendant did not come within the 75 and 76 sections of 24-25 Vict., c. 96. (1)

In Tatlock's case, the defendant was indicted, under the second clause of section 75 of 24 and 25 Vict., c. 96, for that, being intrusted as a broker with valuable securities for a special purpose, without authority to sell, negotiate, transfer or pledge them, he unlawfully and contrary to the purpose for which the securities were entrusted, converted to his own use a portion of the proceeds.

It appears that the defendant was an insurance broker, and, as such, had effected, for the prosecutor, some insurances on a ship; that, the ship having been lost, the prosecutor sent the policies and other documents, necessary to recover from the insurers the amount of the loss, to the defendant, who subsequently, on two different days, received cheques for the amounts of two policies; that the cheques were payable to the defendant's order, and he paid them into his own bank, to his own credit. The defendant did not pay over to the prosecutor any of the money, so received by him, but gave various excuses for not doing so; and he afterwards filed a petition, for liquidation of his own affairs, in bankruptcy; his balance at his bankers, being then much less than the amount received by him on the policies. The defendant was convicted on these facts; but it was held that the conviction was wrong, on the following grounds:—by Cockburn, C.J., on the ground, that, even assuming that the defendant could have been properly convicted if there had been evidence that he received the moneys with the intention of embezzling them, he could not at any rate be convicted in the absence of such evidence and in the absence of any finding to that effect; by Kelly, C.B., and Pollock, B., on the ground that in the absence of evidence of the previous course of dealing between the parties and of what the duty of the prisoner was as to handing over or accounting for the money received, the conviction could not be upheld; and by Bramwell, Amphlett and Field, JJ., on the ground that the second branch of the 24 and 25 Vict., c. 96, s. 75, applied only to the case of an agent, who,—being entrusted with securities, without authority to obtain money upon them,—wrongfully appropriates the securities, or wrongfully obtains money upon them and appropriates the money. (2)

These sections 75 and 76 of the above mentioned Imperial Statute,—which are the same in effect as sections 60 and 61, R. S. C., c. 164 (now repealed),—relate expressly to bankers, merchants, brokers, attorneys, and agents; and to bring an offender within the provisions thereof it appears, according to the above cases, to have been necessary, that in connection with one of the clauses, there must have been a dealing with the entrusted money, etc., against the terms of some written direction, that in relation to another clause there must have been a selling, etc., without any authority to do so, and that in regard to the third clause the entrusted money must have been delivered to the banker, etc., for safe custody, in the absence of the essentials necessary to convict under the other clauses.

The law is now framed so as to apply not only to bankers, merchants, brokers, attorneys and agents, but to all persons whomsoever, and so that it shall not be essential (in connection with sections 355 and 357) that the direction, if any, must be in writing, nor that the conversion or other wrongful dealing must in order to be theft, be against some direction in writing; but that, if there is no direction in writing, it shall be sufficient to shew that the conversion or other wrongful dealing was against a verbal direction.

The prosecutors, being in need of additional capital, advertised that they required from £10,000 to £15,000. The prisoner replied to the advertisement, and, at a subsequent interview with the prosecutors, he represented himself to be a broker or money lender and bill discounter; whereupon the prosecutors agreed that he should draw upon them some bills for a certain amount and endeavor to get them discounted, it being stipulated in an agreement drawn up between them that the prosecutors were to receive 80 per cent. of the proceeds of the bills. The prosecutors handed to the prisoner two documents in the form of bills of exchange except that they had no drawer's name and signature thereto, but having the prosecutors' acceptance written across each of them. The prisoner procured the drawer's name thereto, and got the bills discounted, and converted the proceeds to his own use. Held, that the acceptances were, when the prisoner received them from the prosecutors, valuable securities for the payment of money and that the prisoner was rightly convicted under section 75 of the 24-25 Vict., c. 96. provisions of the three last preceding sections. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 320.

359. Clerks and servants.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to fourteen years' imprisonment who,—

(a) being a clerk or servant, or being employed for the purpose or in the capacity of a clerk or servant, steals anything belonging to or in the possession of his master or employer; or,

(b) being a cashier, assistant cashier, manager, officer, clerk, or servant of any bank, or savings bank, steals any bond, obligation, bill obligatory or of credit, or other bill or note, or security for money, or any money or effects of such bank, or lodged or deposited with any such bank; or,

(c) being employed in the service of His Majesty, or of the Government of Canada or the government of any province of Canada, or of any municipality, steals anything in his possession by virtue of his employment. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 319; 57-58 V., c. 57, s. 1.

For the definition of municipality, see section 2 [21], ante.

It is not necessary that the goods stolen should be the property of the master, in order to punish the offender under this clause. The words are "belonging to or in the possession of the master."

With reference to clause (b), the thing alleged to be stolen by a cashier or other officer or employee of a bank, may be either, anything belonging to the bank or anything lodged or deposited with such bank.

In the case of a government employee or of an employee of any municipality, the theft must be of something in his possession by virtue of his employment, in order to be punishable under section 359, clause (c).

The main distinction between theft, by a clerk or other employee, and embezzlement, by a clerk or other employee, seems to have been that, in order to be embezzled, the money, etc., in question, must not at the time of its misappropriation by the employee have reached the master's own possession: because if it had once reached the master's possession, either actually or constructively, the servant's offence would, at common law, have been larceny. (1)

For instance, where the defendant's duty was to place, every night, in his employer's safe, in an office where he conducted his employers' business, (though this office was in his own house), the monies received by him on their account and not used during the day, it was held, that, by placing the money there, the defendant determined his own exclusive possession of it, and that by afterwards taking some of it out of the safe, animo furandi, he was guilty of larceny. (2)

On the other hand, where the clerk and head manager of an Insurance Company, having, in the course of the Company's business, received from the managers of branch offices, several cheques payable to his own order, which it was his duty to endorse and hand over to the company's cashier, but which he endorsed and cashed, appropriating the proceeds to his own use, it was held to be embezzlement. (3)

This distinction was, for all practical purposes, rendered immaterial in prosecutions against clerks and servants, by the passing of special legislation enacting that a defendant, indicted for embezzlement, might, if the facts adduced in evidence, disclosed a larceny, be convicted of the latter offence and vice versâ. But, as we have already seen, the distinction is now swept away entirely; and embezzlement is simply treated as one of a number of ways of committing theft. If the defendant cannot be shewn to be the clerk or servant of the prosecutor, he may, instead of being convicted as such, under section 359, be convicted of the theft, without regard to any capacity in which he was acting when he committed it, and, according to the nature or description of the thing stolen, he may be punished under the particular section of the Code applicable thereto; or, if it be something for which no punishment is otherwise provided, he will be punishable under section 386, post.

It is provided, by section 857, post, that any number of distinct charges of theft, not exceeding three, alleged to have been committed within six months from the first to the last of such offences, may be tried at one and the same time.

Although the distinction between theft and embezzlement has been completely removed, questions may still arise, in prosecutions for theft, as they formerly did in cases of embezzlement, as to whether the defendant is a clerk or servant or other employee, within the terms of, and punishable under section 359. It has been held that the question of, whether the defendant is or is not a clerk or servant, is one of fact for the jury; (4) and there are, upon the question, many English cases, which will be in point, inasmuch as the English Statute, upon which these cases have arisen, is, although it relates to embezzlement, to the same effect, as, and almost in the very language of clause (a) of our section 359, in its reference to clerks and servants. The words of the English Act are "whosoever being a clerk or servant, or being employed for the purpose or in the capacity of a clerk or servant." (5)

A female servant is within the meaning of the enactment. (6) And so is an apprentice, although under age. (7)

A son who lives with his father and performs for him duties usually performed by a clerk, has been held to be "employed for the purpose or in the capacity of a clerk or servant," within the meaning of the law, although he received no salary, and although there was no contract binding him to go on doing these duties. (8)

A person who was employed as accountant and treasurer to overseers of the poor and whose duty it was to receive and pay out monies coming to and going out from such overseers, was held to be a clerk or servant, within the statute. (9)

A collector of poor and other rates, within the parish of St. Paul, Covent Garden, was held to be rightly described as servant to the committee of management of the affairs of the parish; although he was elected by the vestrymen of the parish; (10) and an assistant overseer elected by the parishioners who fix his duties and salary was held rightly described, as the servant of the inhabitants of the parish, in an indictment charging him with embezzling monies collected by him for the poor-rate. A clerk of a savings bank was held to be properly described as a clerk to the trustees, though elected by the managers. (2) Such a clerk is now covered, in common with all bank cashiers, managers, officers, clerks or servants, by the express terms of clause (b) of the above section 359.

The mode by which the defendant is paid or receives remuneration for his services is immaterial. If he is a clerk or servant or is employed for the purpose or in the capacity of a clerk or servant, he is within the law.

A,—who was employed as a master of a barge, to carry out and sell coals, and was allowed, as remuneration for his labor, a portion of the profits, after deducting the price of the coals at the colliery,—took a quantity of coals, sold them, received the price, and absconded with the money. Held, by a majority of the Judges, that he was a servant within the meaning of the English Statute. (3)

A was employed as a traveller by B, the prosecutor, to take orders and collect money; his remuneration being a percentage upon the orders he got; he paying his own expenses; he did this not only for B, but was employed by other persons also. Held, that he was a clerk to B, within the meaning of the Act. (4)

Where the cashier of a firm had, besides a salary, a percentage on the profits of the firm's business, but was not liable for the firm's losses, and had no control over the management of the business, it was held that he might be indicted, as a servant, for embezzling the firm's monies. (5)

The distinction to be drawn between a clerk or servant, and an agent, seems, according to the cases, to be this: for instance, a commercial traveller, whether paid by commission or salary, who is under orders to go here and there, or is bound to devote the whole or, at least, some portion of his time to the service of his employer, is a clerk or servant, or person employed for the purpose, or in the capacity of a clerk or servant; but a person who is not under orders to go here and there, and who is not bound to devote any portion of his time to the service of his principal, but who may get business for his principals in consideration of a commission, or abstain from getting business for them, as he chooses, is not such a clerk or servant. Thus where A was employed by B to solicit orders and collect moneys, for which work he was paid by commission, he being at liberty to get orders when and where he pleased, but to be exclusively in the employ of B and to give the whole of his time to B's service, he was held to be B's servant. (6) And A would still have been B's servant if he was a traveller under orders to go here and there, even although he might have been at liberty to obtain orders for other persons besides B, and so was not bound to devote all his time to B's service. (7) But where A was employed by B and C, as their agent for the sale of coals on commission, and to collect monies in connection with his orders, but was at liberty to dispose of his time as he thought best, and to get or abstain from getting orders as he might choose, he was held not to be a clerk or servant within the statute. (8)

The test whether a person is a clerk or servant of his alleged master is —Was he under the control of and bound to obey his alleged master? And where A was employed to solicit orders for B and was to be paid a commission on the sums received through his means, and he was at liberty to apply for orders whenever he thought most convenient, but was not to employ himself for any other persons than B, it was held that these facts did not shew him to be a clerk or servant. (9)

The distinction between this last case and R. v. Bailey (supra), is that in R. v. Bailey the prisoner was under the prosecutor's control, having to devote his whole time to the service, while, in R. v. Negus, although the prisoner was not to employ himself for any other persons than the prosecutor, he might go away to amuse himself whenever he liked. (10)

A and B employed C, who carried on an independent business as an accountant and debt collector, to collect certain debts for them at a commission on the amount received, the time and mode of collecting the debts being in C's discretion, and it being his duty to pay over the amounts received by him to A and B, as soon as he had received them. Held, that C was not employed in the capacity of a clerk or servant to A and B. (1) In view of the fact that C was bound to pay over the amounts collected as soon as he received them, it seems likely that if he failed to do so and converted them to his own use or omitted to properly account for them, he might, now, be held criminally liable, under section 355, ante, or under section 357, ante, if that part of the transaction, which made it his duty to pay over the collections as soon as received, were in the shape of a direction in writing.

The employment need not be permanent. A agreed to let B, (when he had nothing else to do), carry out parcels, for which work B was to be paid whatever A pleased. During the course of this employment, A gave B an order to receive £2, which B collected and converted to his own use. B was held to be a servant within the meaning of the Act: (2) and where a drover who was employed to drive two cows to a purchaser and receive the purchase price, embezzled it, he was held to be a servant. (3)

A, a member of and secretary to a society, fraudulently withheld money received by him from a member to be paid to the trustees of the society, and, when prosecuted for embezzlement, was held properly described as the clerk and servant of the trustees, although the money ought in the ordinary course to have been received by the steward, and although the articles of the society were not enrolled, and the society was not conducted strictly according to the act of parliament. (4) But a mere unpaid treasurer of a friendly society, not appointed by the trustees of the society is not a clerk or servant of the trustees, in whom the monies of the society are vested. (5) In Tyree's case, Borill, C.J., said, "The trustees have all the monies of the society vested in them, by statute, as well as by one of their rules, and the prisoner must account to them; but this does not make him their servant. The treasurer is an accountable officer, but not a servant." And previously to the 31 and 32 Vict., c. 116 (which made a co-partner or co-owner indictable for stealing partnership or joint property), the secretary (also a member), of a friendly society established under the 18 and 19 Vict., c. 63, for which no trustees had been appointed, could not be convicted on an indictment for embezzling the society's monies, the property in the monies being laid in A B (one of the members of the society), and others, (the rest of the members), and the prisoner being described as the servant of A B and the others; because the "others" would have comprised himself, and the indictment would thus have charged him, as his own servant, with embezzling his own money. It has been held that, in England, a person cannot be convicted as clerk or servant to a society which, by reason of administering an unlawful oath to its members, is an unlawful combination and confederacy. (7)

A society in the nature of a friendly society (although not enrolled or certified under the Friendly Societies Act), some of whose rules are in restraint of trade, and therefore void, is not an illegal society in the sense of being disabled from prosecuting a servant for stealing its funds. (8)

The prisoner,—who was one of the directors of a limited company carrying on the business of advertising contractors,—entered into an agreement with them by which he was to be employed as their manager at a weekly salary. His duties were to canvass for orders for advertising, to superintend the bill posting, to collect the moneys due to the company and to pay them over to the cashier as and when he collected them; and he was to be allowed a guinea a week for travelling expenses. The prisoner was convicted upon an indictment charging him with having embezzled money received by him for and on account of the company. Held, that the fact that he was a director was not inconsistent with his being also a clerk or servant of the company, and that he was properly convicted. (9)

The usual presumptive evidence of the misappropriation, by a clerk, of money, etc., received by him on his employer's account, is that he has never accounted to his master for the money, etc., so received by him, or that he denied having received it. Where it was the servant's duty to account for and pay over at stated times the money received by him, his not doing so wilfully was held to be an embezzlement: (10) and would now be theft. And even where no precise time could be fixed at which it was the defendant's duty to pay the moneys over, his not accounting for them, if found by the jury to have been done fraudulently, was held to be equally an embezzlement. (1)

"It is not sufficient to prove a general deficiency in account. Some specific sum must be proved to be embezzled, in like manner as, in larceny, some particular article must be proved to have been stolen." (2)

A defendant, who was employed by the City of Montreal as a Market Clerk was accused and convicted of stealing $810 belonging to the said City, the trial Judge, however, suspending sentence until the opinion of the Court of Appeal was obtained upon a reserved case, which shewed that when market stalls became vacant they were put up to auction, the amount bid being a "bonus" distinct from the rent; and a custom had arisen of exacting a payment of $25 to $50 when a stall changed hands before the expiration of its lease; and these amounts had been received by the defendant but not handed over to the City. Held, that the charge was not sustainable under section 359 (c), because it did not state that the moneys came into the defendant's possession "by virtue of his employment," and that the charges could not be sustained as one of theft, simply, under sec. tion 347 or section 359 (a) or any other provision of the Code, for then it would be necessary to prove that the moneys were the property of the City of Montreal,—a point which was immaterial under section 359 (c), and that the facts, as stated in the reserved case, shewed that the City had no right to the possession of the monies. Conviction quashed. (3)

With reference to prosecutions against government and municipality employees under sections 359 (c), and 391, the property in the thing in question may be laid in His Majesty or in the municipality, as the case may be. (See section 868, post.)

360. Tenants and lodgers.—Every one who steals any chattel or fixture let to be used by him in or with any house or lodging is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment, and, if the value of such chattel or fixture exceeds the sum of twenty-five dollars, to four years' imprisonment. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 322.

The indictment for an offence against this section may be in the same form as if the accused were not a tenant or lodger. (See section 848, post.)

As to wilful injuries to houses, etc., by tenants, etc., see section 529, post.

361. Testamentary instruments.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for life who, either during the life of the testator or after his death, steals the whole or any part of a testamentary instrument, whether the same relates to real or personal property, or to both. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 323.

A "testamentary instrument" includes will, codicil, or other testamentary writing or appointment, as well during the life of the testator whose testamentary disposition it purports to be as after his death, whether the same relates to real or personal property, or both. (See section 2 [37] (ante).

362. Documents of title to lands or goods.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to three years' imprisonment who steals the whole or any part of any document of title to lands or goods. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 324.

The expression "document of title to goods" includes any bill of lading, India warrant, dock warrant, warehouse keeper's certificate, warrant or order for the delivery or transfer of any goods or valuable thing, bought and sold note or any other document used in the ordinary course of business as proof of the possession or control of goods, authorizing or purporting to authorize, either by endorsement or by delivery, the possessor of such document to transfer or receive any goods thereby represented or therein mentioned or referred to. (Section 2 [15], ante).

The expression "document of title to lands" includes any deed, map, paper or parchment, written or printed, or partly written and partly printed, being or containing evidence of the title, or any part of the title, to any real property, or to any interest in any real property, or any notarial or registrar's copy thereof, or any duplicate instrument, memorial, certificate or document authorized or required by any law in force in any part of Canada respecting registration of titles and relating to such title. (Section 2 [12], ante).

The above definition of "document of title to goods" is exactly the same as is contained in the Imperial Statute, 24-25 Vict., c. 96, section 1.

363. Judicial or official documents, etc.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to three years' imprisonment who steals the whole or any part of any record, writ, return, affirmation, recognizance, cognovit actionem, bill, petition, answer, decree, panel, process, interrogatory deposition, affidavit, rule, order or warrant of attorney, or of any original document whatsoever of or belonging to any court of justice, or relating to any cause or matter begun, depending or terminating in any such court, or of any original document in any wise relating to the business of any office or employment under His Majesty, and being or remaining in any office appertaining to any court of justice, or in any government or public office. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 325.

See section 396, post, by which the same punishment is awarded, for fraudulently destroying, cancelling, concealing or obliterating any document of title or any valuable security, testamentary instrument or judicial, official, or other document, as for stealing any of them.

364. Post letter bags, etc.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for life, or for any term not less than three years, who steals,—

(a) a post letter bag; or,

(b) a post letter from a post letter bag or from any post office, or from any officer or person employed in any business of the post office of Canada, or from a mail; or,

(c) a post letter containing any chattel, money or valuable security; or,

(d) any chattel, money or valuable security from or out of a post letter. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 326.

365. Other postal letters, etc.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding seven years, and not less than three years, who steals,—

(a) any post letter, other than post letters referred to in the last preceding section;

(b) any parcel sent by parcel post, or any article contained in any such parcel; or,

(c) any key suited to any lock adopted for use by the Post Office Department, and in use on any Canada mail or mail bag. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 327.

366. Stealing other mailable matter.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to five years' imprisonment who steals any printed vote or proceeding, newspaper, printed paper or book, packet or package of patterns or samples of merchandise or goods, or of seeds, cuttings, bulbs, roots, scions or grafts, or any post card or other mailable matter, other than a post letter, sent by mail. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 328.

Section 6, ante, provides that when an offence dealt with by the Code relates to the subject treated of in any other Act, the words and expressions used in the Code in respect to such offence has the meaning assigned to them in such other Act.

The "Post Office Act," (R. S., 1906, c. 66, section 2), assigns to the following expressions the following meanings:—

"MAIL" includes every conveyance by which post letters are carried, whether it is by land or by water;

"POST LETTER" means any letter transmitted by the post or delivered through the post or deposited in any post office or in any letter box put up anywhere under the authority of the Postmaster General, whether such letter is addressed to a real or a fictitious person or not, and whether it is intended for transmission by the post or delivery through the post or not: and a letter shall be deemed a post letter from the time of its being so deposited to the time of its being delivered to the person to whom it is addressed, or so long as it remains in the post office or in any such letter box or is being carried through the post; and a delivery to any person authorized to receive letters for the post shall be deemed a delivery at the post office, and a delivery of any letter or other mailable matter at the house or office of the person to whom the letter is addressed, or to him, or to his servant or agent, or other person considered to be authorized to receive the letter or other mailable matter, according to the usual manner of delivering that person's letters, shall be a delivery to the person addressed;

"MAILABLE MATTER" includes any letter, packet, parcel, newspaper, book or other thing which by this Act, or by any regulation made in pursuance of it, may be sent by post;

"POST LETTER BAG" includes a mail bag, basket, box, packet, parcel, or other envelope or covering in which mailable matter is conveyed, whether it does or does not actually contain mailable matter;

"POST OFFICE" means any building, room, post office railway car, street letter box, receiving box or other receptacle or place where post letters or other mailable matter are received or delivered, sorted, made up or despatched.

An unsealed letter, delivered by the post-mistress at G. to the defendant, the letter carrier between that place and L, with directions to obtain, at the L post office, a money order for £1, and, after enclosing it in the letter, to post the letter at L, was held to be, while in the defendant's possession, a post letter. (4)

Where a servant, who was sent with a letter and a penny to pay the postage, finding the door of the receiving house shut, put the penny inside the letter, fastened it by means of a pin, and then put the letter in the unpaid letter box, it was held that a messenger in the post office who stole the letter with the penny in it might be convicted of stealing a post letter containing money, though the money was not put in for the purpose of being conveyed by post to the person to whom the letter was addressed. (5)

But where, the post office being at an inn, the person sent to put a letter, containing bank notes, into the post, took it to the inn, with money to pre-pay the postage, and laid the letter and the money in it upon a table in the lobby of the inn, in which the letter box was, and pointed out the letter to the female servant at the inn (not authorized to receive letters), who said "she would give it to them," and she stole the letter and its contents, it was held that this was not a post letter and that the servant who stole it could only be convicted of ordinary larceny and not of stealing a post letter. (6)

(4) R. v. Bickerstaff, 2 C. & K., 761.
(5) R. v. Mence, C. & Mar., 234.

Where the defendant, a person employed in the post office, having committed a mistake in the sorting of the letters, put some letters down a water closet, in order to avoid the supposed penalty attached to such a mistake, this was held to be not only a secreting but a theft of the letters. (7)

The taking away and destroying of a post letter in order to suppress inquiries, supposed by the defendant to be made, in it, about her character, was held to be a larceny of the letter. (8)

Taking the mail bags off the horse during the momentary absence of the person carrying them was held to be a taking from his possession. (9)

It was the duty of a letter carrier, on returning from his round, to bring to the post office any letters which he had failed to deliver. A letter containing money having been given to him with other letters to deliver, on his return from his round, he brought back to the office the pouch containing some which he had failed to deliver, but he said nothing about the money letter. Subsequently, on enquiry made of him, he produced the money letter from his pocket; and, upon these facts, it was held that he was rightly convicted of stealing it. (10)

Where the defendant obtained the mail bags from the post office, pretending that he was the mail guard and then ran away with them, the jury being of opinion that he got possession of them with intent to steal them, found him guilty and the Judges held the conviction to be right, the property in the mail bags not having passed to the defendnat when he obtained them from the postmaster, as the latter had no ownership therein to part with. (1)

A, with intent to deprive B,—to whom a letter is addressed,—of such letter, and to commit a fraud, induced C, a post office employee, to intercept and hand over such letter while in course of transmission by post. Held, that A and C were both guilty of stealing the letter. (2)

A decoy letter duly stamped and placed by post office officials amongst the letters at a post office for the purpose of testing the honesty of the letter carrier whose duty it was to deal with the same, is none the less a post letter, because of its being directed to a fictitious address. (3)

This is made very clear by the definition of "post letter" contained in the above quoted section 2 of the Post Office Act containing the clause "whether such letter is addressed to a real or fictitious person or not, and whether it is intended for transmission by the post or not.

Section 121 of the Post Office Act (R. S., 1906, c. 66), has the following provision against opening post letters, etc.:—

"Every one who unlawfully opens, or wilfully keeps, secretes, delays or detains, or procures, or suffers to be unlawfully opened, kept, secreted or detained, any post letter bag or any post letter, whether the same came into the possession of the offender by finding or otherwise howsoever, or after payment or tender of the postage thereon, if payable to the person having possession of the same, neglects or refuses to deliver up any post letter to the person to whom it is addressed or who is legally entitled to receive the same, is guilty of an indictable offence."

An offence against this section of the Post Office Act will be punishable under section 1052 of the Code, post, by five years' imprisonment.

367. Election documents.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a fine in the discretion of the court, or to seven years' imprisonment, or to both fine and imprisonment, who steals, or unlawfully takes from any person having the lawful custody thereof, or from its lawful place of deposit for the time being, any writ of election, or any return to a writ of election, or any indenture, poll-book, voters' list, certificate, affidavit or report, ballot, or any document or paper made, prepared or drawn out according to or for the requirements of any law in regard to Dominion, provincial, municipal or civic elections. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 329.

For the law as to personation of voters at parliamentary elections, etc., see comments under sections 408-411, post.

The punishment of persons wilfully destroying, injuring, obliterating or making erasures, etc., in election documents is provided for by section 528, post.

368. Tramway, railway or steamboat tickets.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who steals any tramway, railway or steamboat ticket, or any order or receipt for a passage on any railway or in any steamboat or other vessel. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 330.

In an American case, it was held (under a statute of the State of Minnesota, making it larceny to steal railroad passenger tickets), that a conductor may be indicted for appropriating tickets, sold and issued by a railroad company, and taken up by the conductor, such tickets, after being thus taken up being the property of the company. (4)

See section 412, post, as to the offence of obtaining or attempting to obtain a passage on any tramway or railway or in any steam or other vessel, by means of a false ticket or order. And see section 470 (m), post, as to the forgery of tramway, railway or steamboat tickets.

369. Cattle.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to fourteen years' imprisonment who steals any cattle. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 331.

For the meaning of the expression "Cattle," see section 2 [5] ante.

A person who kills a horse or any other cattle, with intent to steal its carcase or skin, etc., is by the terms of section 350, ante, guilty of stealing the animal, and is liable to the punishment of 14 years' imprisonment provided by section 369.

This section, 369, refers to live cattle. The stealing of dead cattle.—for instance, a dead cow,—or any part of it is punishable under section 386, post.

An indictment for stealing live animals need not state them to be alive, for the law will presume them to be so, unless the contrary be stated. If, when stolen the animal was dead, the fact should be stated: (5) unless it be an animal which has the same appellation whether it be alive or dead, in which case it need not to be stated to be dead. (6)

Where a defendant removed sheep from the fold into the open field, and there killed them and took away the skins, it was held that the removing of the sheep from the fold was sufficient to constitute theft. (7)

Wilfully destroying or damaging any cattle is dealt with, and punishable by 14 years' imprisonment, under section 510 (B), post; and attempts and written threats to kill or injure cattle are punishable, under sections 536 and 538, post, by two years' imprisonment.

A defendant was charged and tried before a Judge, in the North West Territories, with having stolen cattle,—namely, one steer,—not exceeding in value in the Judge's opinion, the sum of $200, and he was convicted. It was claimed, on behalf of the defendant, that, under section 67 of the old N. W. T. Act (as amended by the 54-55 Vict., c. 22, section 9), he had the right to be tried by a Judge with the intervention of a jury of six; and he desired to be so tried. After the defendant's conviction, a case was reserved upon the question of whether the defendant had the right to be so tried.

It appears that section 66 of the old (which is section 38 of the new) N. W. T. Act, (namely R. S., 1906, c. 62), provides that where the charge is (inter alia) one of having committed, in the Territories, the offence of theft, or attempt to steal or obtaining by false pretences, or receiving stolen property in any case in which the property stolen, etc., does not, in the opinion of the trial Judge, exceed $200, the charge shall be tried in a summary way and without the intervention of a jury; and by section 67 of the old Act (now section 39 of the new Act), it is provided that where the person is charged with any other criminal offence, the same shall be tried by the Judge with the intervention of a jury of six. Held, in the decision of the case (rendered before the new Revised Statutes of 1906), that the charge being one of theft simply, the nature of the offence and the value of the property stolen were the only matters to be considered in ascertaining whether the charge was within section 66 of the old Act (now section 38 of the new Act), and that there was no reason for holding that the case was not within the provisions of that section, although the punishment that may be awarded on a conviction for stealing cattle is greater than that which may be awarded on a conviction for stealing certain other classes of property. (8)

370. Dogs, birds, beasts and other domestic animals.—Every one who steals any dog, or any bird, beast or other animal ordinarily kept in a state of confinement or for any domestic purpose, or for any lawful purpose of profit or advantage, is, if the value of the property stolen exceeds twenty dollars, guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a penalty not exceeding fifty dollars over and above the value of the property stolen, or to two years' imprisonment, or to both, and if the value of the property stolen does not exceed twenty dollars, is guilty of an offence and liable upon summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding twenty dollars over and above such value, or to one month's imprisonment with hard labor.

2. Every one who, having been previously convicted of an offence under this section, is summarily convicted of another offence thereunder, is liable to three months' imprisonment with hard labor. 63-64 V., c. 46, s. 3.

(6) R. v. Puckering, 1 Moo. C. C., 242.

See section 537, post, as to the punishment for wilfully killing, maiming or injuring any such dog, bird, beast or other animal.

A person who kills any such dog, or any bird, etc., with intent to steal the carcase, skin, plumage or other part thereof, is, by the terms of section 350, ante, guilty of stealing it; and will therefore be punishable under the above section, 370.

371. Oysters—Theft of.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to seven years' imprisonment who steals oysters or oyster brood.

2. Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to three months' imprisonment who unlawfully and wilfully uses any dredge or net, instrument or engine whatsoever, for the purpose of taking oysters or oyster brood, within the limits of any oyster bed, laying or fishery the property of any other person, and sufficiently marked out or known as such, although none are actually taken, or unlawfully and wilfully with any net, instrument or engine, drags upon the ground of any such bed, laying or fishery.

3. Nothing in this section applies to any person fishing for or catching any swimming fish within the limits of any oyster fishery with any net, instrument or engine adapted for taking swimming fish only. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 334.

Section 864, (e), post, provides that for an offence under the above section it shall be sufficient if the indictment describes the oyster bed, etc., by name or otherwise, without stating it to be in any particular county or place.

372. Things fixed to buildings or in land.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to seven years' imprisonment who steals any glass or woodwork belonging to any building whatsoever, or any lead, iron, copper, brass or other metal, or any utensil or fixture, whether made of metal or other material, or of both, respectively, fixed in or to any building whatsoever, or any thing made of metal fixed in any land, being private property, for a fence to any dwelling-house, garden or area, or in any square or street, or in any place dedicated to public use or ornament, or in any burial ground. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 335.

An unfinished building intended as a cart shed, boarded up on all sides, and with a door with a lock on it, and the frame of a roof with loose gorse thrown upon it, it not being yet thatched, was held under the English Statute on this subject to be a building. (9)

(9) R. v. Worrall, 7 C. & P., 516.

An indictment for stealing lead fixed to a certain wharf was held to be sufficient, the wharf being proved to be in fact a building. (10)

It was held that a church yard was a place dedicated to public use, and that it was larceny to take away brass affixed to a tombstone in the church yard; although, at that time, the words "or in any burial ground" were not in the English Statute: (1) and it has been held that the stealing of a copper sun-dial fixed on the top of a wooden post in a church yard was within the statute. (2)

373. Trees, etc.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who steals the whole or any part of any tree, sapling or shrub, or any underwood, the thing stolen being of the value of twenty-five dollars, or of the value of five dollars if the thing stolen grows in any park, pleasure ground, garden, orchard or avenue, or in any ground adjoining or belonging to any dwelling-house. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 336.

The words "adjoining any dwelling-house" have been held to import actual contact; and that therefore ground separated from a house by a narrow walk and paling, wall, or gate, was not within their meaning. (3)

The injury must be the actual injury to the tree itself, and does not include consequential damage; and where the evidence that the actual injury done to certain trees by the defendant was less than the statutable amount but that the injury done would necessitate the stubbing up and replacing part of an old hedge at an expense greater than the statutable amount, it was nevertheless held insufficient. (4)

As to wilful destruction of or damage to trees, vegetables, plants, etc., see sections 533, 534, 535, post.

374. Every one who steals the whole or any part of any tree, sapling or shrub, or any underwood, the value of the article stolen, or the amount of the damage done, being twenty-five cents at the least, is guilty of an offence and liable, on summary conviction, to a penalty not exceeding twenty-five dollars over and above the value of the article stolen or the amount of the injury done.

2. Every one who, having been convicted of any such offence, afterwards commits any such offence, is liable on summary conviction, to three months' imprisonment with hard labor.

3. Every one who, having been twice convicted of any such offence, afterwards commits any such offence is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to five years' imprisonment. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 337.

375. Plants, etc., growing in a garden.—Every one who steals any plant, root, fruit or vegetable production growing in any garden, orchard, pleasure ground, nursery ground, hot-house, greenhouse or conservatory is guilty of an offence and liable, on summary conviction, to a penalty not exceeding twenty dollars over and above the value of the article so stolen or the amount of the injury done, or to one month's imprisonment with or without hard labor.

2. Every one who, having been convicted of any such offence, afterwards commits any such offence is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to three years' imprisonment. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 341.

376. Cultivated plants, etc., growing elsewhere.—Every one who steals any cultivated root or plant used for the food of man or beast, or for medicine, or for distilling or for dyeing, or for or in the course of any manufacture, and growing in any land, open or inclosed, not being a garden, orchard, pleasure ground or nursery ground, is guilty of an offence and liable, on summary conviction, to a penalty not exceeding five dollars over and above the value of the article so stolen or the amount of the injury done, or to one month's imprisonment with hard labor.

2. Every one who, having been convicted of any such offence, afterwards commits any such offence is liable to three months' imprisonment with hard labor. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 342.

377. Fences, stiles or gates.—Every one who steals any part of any live or dead fence, or any wooden post, pale, wire or rail set up or used as a fence, or any stile or gate, or any part thereof respectively, is guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction, to a penalty not exceeding twenty dollars over and above the value of the article so stolen or the amount of the injury done.

2. Every one who, having been convicted of any such offence, afterwards commits any such offence is liable, on summary conviction, to three months' imprisonment with hard labor. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 339.

378. Ores or minerals from mines.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who steals the ore of any metal, or any quartz, lapis calaminaris, manganese, or mundic, or any piece of gold, silver or other metal, or any wad, black cawk, or black lead, or any coal, or cannel coal, or any marble, stone or other mineral, from any mine, bed or vein thereof respectively.

2. It is not an offence to take, for the purposes of exploration or scientific investigation, any specimen or specimens of any ore or mineral from any pieces of ground uninclosed and not occupied or worked as a mine, quarry or digging. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 343.

Section 353, ante, has reference to fraudulently concealing from a partner in a mining claim any gold or silver taken from such claim; and section 397, provides the punishment for any such concealment.

See section 637, post, with reference to warrants to search for unlawfully deposited gold or silver which has been mined, etc.

379. Stealing from the person.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to fourteen years' imprisonment who steals any chattel, money or valuable security from the person of another. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 344.

To constitute this offence, the thing must be taken either from the person of the prosecutor, or in his presence. (5) The taking from the person distinguishes this offence from simple theft; and it differs from robbery in the fact that, although the taking is from the person, it is not accompanied with violence or so done as to put the owner or possessor of the thing in fear.

If the goods have not been completely severed from the person of the prosecutor or completely taken into the physical possession of the offender, it seems that it would not be sufficient to constitute this offence, although the moving of the thing may, under the terms of sub-section 2 of section 347, ante, be sufficient to constitute simple theft.

Where A drew a book from the inside of B's coat pocket about an inch above the top of the pocket, but, whilst the book was still about B's person, B suddenly put up his hand, when A let go his hold and the book dropped back into the pocket. Held, not to constitute stealing from the person, but it was held to be a simple larceny. (6)

A's watch (which he carried in his vest pocket), was fastened to a chain, the other end of which was passed through a button hole of the vest and kept there by a watch-key. B took the watch out of A's vest pocket and forcibly drew the attached chain and key out of the button hole, but the key, after passing clear of the button hole, caught upon a button on another part of the vest, and A's hand being, at that moment, seized, the watch and chain fell from his hand and remained there, suspended to the button on which it caught. Held, to be such a severance as amounted to stealing from the person: (7) and where the defendant snatched at a lady's ear ring, and succeeded in separating it from the ear and it was afterwards found among the curls of her hair, it was held to be a severance. (8)

Where a man went to bed with a prostitute, and she, while he was asleep, stole a watch, which he had left in his hat on the table, it was held to be a stealing in a dwelling house, and not a stealing from the person. (9)

380. Stealing in a dwelling-house.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to fourteen years' imprisonment who,—

(a) steals in any dwelling-house any chattel, money or valuable security to the value in the whole of twenty-five dollars or more; or,

(b) steals any chattel, money or valuable security in any dwelling-house, and by any menace or threat puts any one therein in bodily fear. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 345.

The things stolen must be under the protection of the house, and in order to bring the offence within the operation of clause (a) they must be of the value of $25; or, if they are of less than that value, they must be stolen by some menace or threat putting some one in the house in bodily fear, in which case it will come within clause (b).

Where a person, in his own dwelling house, stole from another person goods of the value of £5, it was held to constitute, under the English Statute, the offence of stealing in a dwelling house. (10)

A, a lodger, invited B an acquaintance to sleep at his lodgings (without the knowledge of C, the landlord of the house), and, during the night, A stole B's watch from the bed's head. Held, that A was properly convicted of stealing in the dwelling house. (1)

If, although the stealing take place in a house, the thing be under the protection of the person of the prosecutor at the time it is stolen, the offence will not, in that case, come within the meaning of the section; as, for instance, where the defendant procured money to be given to him for a particular purpose and then ran away with it; (2) or, where the prosecutor, by means of the ring dropping trick, was induced to lay down his money upon a table, in a house, and the defendant took up the money and went out of the house and carried it away. (3)

Goods left at a house, for a person supposed to reside there, will be under the protection of the house and the stealing of them will be within the above section, 380, if their value amounts to $25 or, if the goods, not being of that value, are taken by menacing or threatening and putting some one in the house in bodily fear.

Two boxes belonging to A, who resided at No. 38 Rupert Street, were delivered by a porter, (whether by mistake or design did not appear), at No. 33 in the same street; B, the occupier of the latter house, imagining that the boxes were for C, who lodged there, delivered them to him; C converted the contents of the boxes to his own use and absconded. Held, that the goods were within the protection of the house, and that C was rightly convicted of stealing in a dwelling house. (4)

If one, on going to bed, put his clothes and money by his bedside, they are under the protection of the dwelling house, and not of the person. It is a question for the court and not for the jury whether goods are under the protection of the dwelling-house or in the personal care of the owner. (5)

It seems clear that, under the express words of clause (b) of the above section, 380, there must be bodily fear created by an actual menace or threat, in order to bring the offence within that clause.

If the theft be proved, but not the circumstances necessary to bring the case within section 345, the defendant may be found guilty of the simple theft.

381. Stealing by picklocks, etc.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to fourteen years' imprisonment who, by means of any picklock, false key, or other instrument steals anything from any receptacle for property locked or otherwise secured. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 346.

382. Stealing goods from ships or wharves, etc.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to fourteen years' imprisonment who,

(a) steals any goods or merchandise in any vessel, barge or boat of any description whatsoever, in any haven or in any port of entry or discharge, or upon any navigable river or canal, or in any creek or basin belonging to or communicating with any such haven, port, river or canal; or,

(b) steals any goods or merchandise from any dock, wharf or quay adjacent to any such haven, port, river, canal, creek or basin. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 349.

This section is to the same effect as section 63 of 24-25 Vic., c. 96.

It appears that the "goods" or "merchandise" mentioned in this section mean such goods and merchandise as are usually lodged in vessels or on wharves or quays. (6) The luggage of a passenger going by steamboat is within the enactment. (7)

The words of clause (a) of the section are "in any vessel," etc.; and, therefore, in order to bring an offender within its terms, it will be immaterial whether or not the defendant has succeeded in getting the goods away from the ship, if there has been a sufficient asportation to constitute theft; but, in order to bring a case within clause (b) of the section, it will be necessary to prove more than a simple theft; for the words there are "from any dock," etc., to satisfy which there must be an actual removal of the thing from the dock, etc., in the same manner as in the case of an indictment for stealing from the person.

383. Stealing wreck.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to seven years' imprisonment who steals any wreck. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 350.

Section 2[w], ante, gives the definition of "wreck."

384. Stealing on railways.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to fourteen years' imprisonment who steals anything in or from any railway station or building, or from any engine, tender or vehicle of any kind on any railway. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 351.

If the whole offence be not proved, the jury may, if the evidence warrants it, bring in a verdict of guilty of an attempt. (See sec. 949, post).

A conviction for stealing "in or from" a building, charges only one offence, and is not, on account of the disjunctive, void for duplicity and uncertainty. (7*a*)

385. Stealing things deposited in Indian graves.—Every one who steals, or unlawfully injures or removes, any image, bones, article or thing deposited in or near any Indian grave is guilty of an offence and liable, on summary conviction, for a first offence, to a penalty not exceeding one hundred dollars or to three months' imprisonment, and for a subsequent offence to the same penalty and to six months' imprisonment with hard labor. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 352.

386. Stealing things not otherwise provided for.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to seven years' imprisonment who steals anything for the stealing of which no punishment is otherwise provided, or commits in respect thereof any offence for which he is liable to the same punishment as if he had stolen the same.

2. The offender is liable to ten years' imprisonment if he has been previously convicted of theft. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 356.

See section 851, post, as to the requirements in indictments charging a previous conviction, and section 963, post, as to procedure thereon.

When a previous conviction is not charged in the indictment or information neither the judge nor a magistrate has any right to ask a prisoner after conviction whether he has been previously convicted or not, either with the view of ascertaining whether the prisoner is liable to increased punishment in such case or with the view of determining what the proper sentence within the ordinary maximum provided by law in the particular case should be. (7*b*)

387. Additional punishment when value exceeds $200.—If the value of anything stolen, or in respect of which any offence is committed for which the offender is liable to the same punishment as if he had stolen it, exceeds the sum of two hundred dollars the offender is liable to two years' imprisonment, in addition to any punishment to which he is otherwise liable for such offence. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 357.

388. Stealing goods in process of manufacture.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to five years' imprisonment who steals, to the value of two dollars, any woollen, linen, hempen or cotton yarn, or any goods or articles of silk, woollen, linen, cotton, alpaca or mohair, or of any one or more of such materials mixed with each other or mixed with any other material, while laid, placed or exposed, during any stage, process or progress of manufacture, in any building, field or other place. 56-56 V., c. 29, s. 347.

Upon an indictment for stealing yarn in process of bleaching, it was proved that, some time before the stealing, the yarn had been spread out upon the ground, but had been afterwards taken up from where it was spread out, and thrown into heaps, in order to be carried into the house, and that it was while it was thus in heaps, that the prisoner stole it. Held, that the case did not come within the statute so as to make the defendant guilty of stealing the yarn while in the process of bleaching, as it appeared there was no occasion, as part of the process to leave the yarn on the ground in the state in which it was when taken by the defendant. (8)

It has been held that goods remain in a "stage, process, or progress of manufacture," though the texture be complete, if they be not yet brought into a condition for sale.

Offences Resembling Theft.

389. Fraudulently disposing of things entrusted for manufacture.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment, when the offence is not within the last preceding section, who, having been entrusted with, for the purpose of manufacture or for a special purpose connected with manufacture, or employed to make, any felt or hat, or to prepare or work up any woollen, linen, fustian, cotton, iron, leather, fur, hemp, flax or silk, or any such materials mixed with one another, or having been so entrusted, as aforesaid, with any other article, materials, fabric or thing, or with any tools or apparatus for manufacturing the same, fraudulently disposes of the same or any part thereof. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 348.

390. Criminal breach of trust.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to seven years' imprisonment who, being a trustee of any property for the use or benefit, either in whole or in part, of some other person, or for any public or charitable purpose, with intent to defraud, and in violation of his trust, converts anything of which he is trustee to any use not authorized by the trust. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 363.

See section 2[29], ante, for the meaning of the expression "Trustee."

(8) R. v. Hughill, 2 Russ., 225; R. v. Woodhead, 1 M. & Rob., 549.

Section 596, post, provides that no prosecution under the above section, 390, shall be commenced without the sanction of the Attorney-General.

391. Public servants refusing to deliver up property lawfully demanded.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to fourteen years' imprisonment who, being employed in the service of His Majesty or of the Government of Canada or the Government of any province of Canada, or of any municipality, and entrusted by virtue of such employment with the keeping, receipt, custody, management or control of any chattel, money, valuable security, book, paper, account or document, refuses or fails to deliver up the same to any one authorized to demand it. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 321.

See section 2[29], ante, for definition of "valuable security."

392. Fraudulently taking cattle, or fraudulently refusing to deliver up cattle, etc.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to three years' imprisonment who,—

(a) without the consent of the owner thereof fraudulently takes, holds, keeps in his possession, conceals, receives, appropriates, purchases or sells, or fraudulently causes or procures, or assists in the taking possession, concealing, appropriating, purchasing or selling of any cattle which are found astray; or,

(b) fraudulently refuses to deliver up any such cattle to the proper owner thereof, or to the person in charge thereof on behalf of such owner, or authorized by such owner to receive such cattle; or,

(c) without the consent of the owner, fraudulently, wholly or partially obliterates, or alters or defaces, or causes or procures to be obliterated, altered or defaced, any brand or mark on any cattle, or makes or causes or procures to be made any false or counterfeit brand or mark on any cattle. 1 E. VII., c. 42, s. 2.

See section 989, post, as to primâ facie evidence of ownership of cattle bearing brands or marks.

393. Pigeons—Unlawfully killing or injuring.—Every one who unlawfully and wilfully kills, wounds or takes any house-dove or pigeon, under such circumstances as do not amount to theft, is guilty of an offence and liable, upon complaint of the owner thereof, on summary conviction, to a penalty not exceeding ten dollars over and above the value of the bird. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 333.

See remarks of English Commissioners, at p. 395, ante.

See, also, the first clause of section 345, ante, under which tame pigeons, while in a dovecote, or on their owner's land are capable of being stolen. The punishment would be under section 370, ante.

Section 537, post, provides for the punishment of injuries to birds, etc.

394. Drift timber.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to three years' imprisonment who,—

(a) without the consent of the owner thereof,

(i) fraudulently takes, holds, keeps in his possession, collects, conceals, receives, appropriates, purchases, sells or causes or procures or assists to be taken possession of, collected, concealed, received, appropriated, purchased or sold, any timber, mast, spar, saw-log, or other description of lumber which is found adrift in, or cast ashore on the bank or beach of any river, stream or lake; or,

(ii)) wholly or partially defaces or adds or causes or procures to be defaced or added, any mark or number on any such timber, mast, spar, saw-log or other description of lumber, or makes or causes or procures to be made any false or counterfeit mark on any such timber, mast, spar, saw-log or other description of lumber; or,

(b) refuses to deliver up to the proper owner thereof, or to the person in charge thereof, on behalf of such owner, or authorized by such owner to receive the same, any such timber, mast, spar, saw-log or other description of lumber. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 338.

See section 990, post, as to evidence of ownership, etc.

395. Possessing trees, etc., without being able to satisfactorily account for same.—Every one who, having in his possession, or on his premises with his knowledge, the whole or any part of any tree, sapling or shrub, or any underwood, or any part of any live or dead fence, or any post, pale, wire, rail, stile or gate, or any part thereof of the value of twenty-five cents at the least, is taken or summoned before a justice of the peace, and does not satisfy such justice that he came lawfully by the same, is guilty of an offence and liable, on summary conviction, to a penalty not exceeding ten dollars over and above the value of the article so in his possession or on his premises. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 340.

396. Destroying documents of title.—Every one who destroys, cancels, conceals or obliterates any document of title to goods or lands, or any valuable security, testamentary instrument, or judicial, official or other document, for any fraudulent purpose, is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to the same punishment as if he had stolen such document, security or instrument. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 353.

See the tenth, eleventh, thirty-seventh and fortieth paragraphs of section 2, ante, for definitions of "document of title to goods," "document of title to lands," "testamentary instrument," and "valuable security."

The theft of testamentary instruments is punishable under section 361; of documents of title to lands or goods under section 362, and of judicial or official documents, etc., under section 363, ante.

397. Concealing anything capable of being stolen.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who, for any fraudulent purpose, takes, obtains, removes or conceals anything capable of being stolen. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 354.

A prisoner was tried upon an indictment containing three counts: two of them for setting fire to a building, and the third for having unlawfully concealed a large quantity of goods, his own property, for a fraudulent purpose, to wit, for the purpose of obtaining, from certain Insurance Companies, certain moneys upon the goods, as if such goods had been destroyed by fire, and of then keeping the goods for his own use. The prisoner was found "not guilty" on the first two counts, but was convicted on the third count. The goods were the defendant's absolute property, and were part of his stock and of the property insured by the Insurance Companies. The Judge found that the prisoner had concealed the goods with the intention of keeping them for his own use and of obtaining, from the Insurance Companies, the full amount of the insurance moneys, and that the purpose of the prisoner was a fraudulent purpose. It was argued for the prisoner that a man could not be legally convicted of concealing his own goods, and that the words "takes, obtains," in the above section 397, refer to the goods of another and that therefore the other words "removes, conceals," must also refer to the goods of another. Held, that the section was intended to cover every case,—the case of another's goods and the case of a person's own goods, —and the conviction was sustained. (9)

398. Bringing stolen property into Canada.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to seven years' imprisonment who, having obtained elsewhere than in Canada any property by any act which if done in Canada would have amounted to theft, brings such property into or has the same in Canada. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 355.

This section is to the same effect as section 269 of the English Draft Code.

For the definition of property see section 2[22], ante.

See section 399, post, as to receiving in Canada goods stolen or obtained by any indictable criminal offence wheresoever committed.

Receiving Stolen Goods.

399. Receiving property obtained by any indictable offence.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to fourteen years' imprisonment who receives or retains in his possession anything obtained by any offence punishable on indictment, or by any acts wheresoever committed, which, if committed in Canada, would have constituted an offence punishable upon indictment, knowing such thing to have been so obtained. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 314.

For the meaning of the phrase "having in one's possession," see section 5 (b), ante.

Section 849 provides that any accessory after the fact and any receiver of stolen property may be prosecuted whether the principal offender or thief has or has not been prosecuted or convicted, and that any number of receivers of different parts of property which has been stolen may be tried together.

Other provisions with regard to receivers are contained in sections 954, 993 and 994, post.

Provisions similar in effect to sections 954, 993 and 994 of our Code are contained in the Imperial Statutes, 24-25 Vic., c. 96, section 34, and 34-35 Vic., c. 112, (The Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871), section 19.

In a prosecution against a receiver of stolen goods, the thief is a competent witness to prove the stealing of the goods and indeed to prove the whole case. (1) but, where the only evidence against the alleged receiver is that of the theft, the presiding judge will advise the jury to acquit; (2) the mere fact that the stolen goods were found upon the alleged receiver's premises on the day of the theft is not sufficient to confirm the evidence of the thief so as to make it proper to convict. In this case, Chief Baron Pollock, said, "There is no evidence here either of the theft or of the guilty knowledge, except the evidence of the thief. He proves the theft, the possession and the guilty knowledge, but there is nothing to confirm him, except a fact which is quite consistent with his story being false; for he might have put the goods in the prisoner's premises without the prisoner's knowledge. The evidence is not therefore such as would make it safe or proper to convict, and the jury ought to acquit." (3)

The confession of the thief (unless made in the presence of and assented to by the alleged receiver) is not evidence against the person charged with the receiving. (4)

It is competent to a person charged with receiving stolen property to disprove the guilt of the alleged thief. (5)

Where an indictment charged that a certain evil disposed person feloniously stole certain goods, and that C. D. and E. F. feloniously received them, knowing them to be stolen, it was held good against the receivers as for a substantive felony. (6)

The goods stolen must be proved to have been received by the defendant; and though there be proof of a criminal intent to receive and a knowledge of the goods being stolen, if the exclusive possession of them still remains with the thief, the alleged receiver cannot be legally convicted of receiving.

(7) But a person having joint possession with the thief may be convicted as a receiver. (8)

In Robinson's case, in which the prisoner was indicted for stealing and receiving a mixture, it appeared that the thief had stolen two kinds of grain,—some oats and some peas,—and, after having mixed them so as to constitute a mixture, he had sold the mixture to the prisoner who was charged with receiving the mixture, knowing it to have been stolen. Held, that the prisoner could not be convicted of receiving a mixture knowing it to have been stolen, the evidence of the thief, if believed at all, being that he stole pure oats and pure peas, and not a mixture, the Judge remarking, moreover, that it would be perilous to convict a person as receiver upon the sole evidence of the thief. (9)

A person who assists in the stealing of a thing is a principal offender, and cannot, in respect of the assistance he renders, be treated as a receiver of the thing so stolen with his assistance. So, that, where A entered a bar where B was barman, and,—after exchanging with B. signs of recognition.—A took refreshments for which he put down, in payment, a two shilling piece, whereupon, in A's presence, B took, from his master's money, eighteen shillings and six pence which he handed, as change, to A, who went off with it,—it was held that these circumstances did not warrant A's conviction for receiving, but that the facts should have been left to the jury as evidence that A was a principal offender and an accomplice with B in the theft. (10)

In a case in which A was indicted for stealing pork and in which B was indicted for receiving it, it appeared that they both went together to the premises of A's employer, where the pork was kept, and that A took the pork from a tub and brought it outside and gave it to B; and Lord Campbell, C.J., said, "Assuming, as we are bound to do from the case submitted to us, that the prisoner, (referring to B), was a principal in the second degree, he could not take the property from himself." (1)

And in a case where a man had committed larceny in a room in a house where he lodged and had thrown, out of the window, to an accomplice waiting in the street to receive it, a bundle containing the stolen property, the Judges held that the accomplice was a principal and that the conviction of him as a receiver was wrong. (2)

Where a person has merely rendered some aid in carrying the goods off, just after being stolen, he is an accessory under the common law, and, as such, a principal, under our Code; as where A and B broke into a warehouse, and stole thereout a quantity of butter, which they carried along the street thirty yards, and then fetched C, who being apprised of the robbery, assisted in carrying the property away. (3)

Where A, knowing that goods had been stolen, directed B, his servant, to receive them into his premises, and B, in pursuance of that direction afterwards received them in A's absence, B also knowing that they had been stolen, they were held to be indictable jointly. (4)

Two or more persons may be indicted jointly for receiving stolen property, though each successively received at different times the whole of what was stolen; and it makes no difference whether the goods were received direct from the thief or from intermediate persons. (5)

The actual manual possession or touch of the goods is not necessary to the completion of the offence of receiving; it is sufficient if the goods are in the actual possession of a person over whom the defendant has a control, so that they would be forthcoming if the defendant ordered it. (6) [See section 402, post; and see also, the last clause of section 5 (b) at page 10, ante.] And there may be a conviction for receiving against a person who,—though he personally never had manual possession of the goods,—was present aiding and abetting another receiver who obtained actual possession of them. (7)

Where three persons were charged with larceny, and two others as accessories, in separately receiving portions of the stolen goods, and the indictment contained also two other counts, each charging one of the alleged receivers separately with a substantive felony, in separately receiving a portion of the stolen goods, it was held that though the principals were acquitted, the receivers might be convicted on the last two counts of the indictment. (8)

If a husband, knowing that his wife has stolen goods, receives them from her, he may be convicted of receiving. (9)

Husband and wife were indicted jointly for receiving, and the jury found them both guilty. The jury also found that the wife received the goods apart from and without the knowledge or control of the husband, although he afterwards became aware of the receipt of the goods by his wife. Held, that this finding did not warrant the conviction of the husband. (10)

The offence of receiving is not comprised in the offence of theft. So that where a defendant was tried under the provisions respecting the speedy trial of indictable offences upon a charge of house breaking accompanied by theft and the evidence did not prove this offence, but the prosecution contended that a case of receiving was made out, it was held that the power under section 951, post, to convict for an offence other than that charged, can only be exercised when the offence charged contains all the ingredients of the one proved, and, that according to that rule, the offence of receiving stolen goods was not comprised in that of house breaking accompanied by theft, the latter crime being that of carrying away the goods of another and the crime of receiving being that of receiving goods stolen by another person, (other than the receiver), with knowledge of them having been stolen. (1)

The fact that an accused has counselled and procured the commission of the theft,—thus rendering him liable, under section 70, ante, to be convicted as a principal offender in the commission of the theft,—does not prevent his conviction of the substantive offence of having after the commission of the theft, received the stolen property from the thief, knowing it to have been stolen. (2)

The fact of the defendant's knowledge of the goods being stolen or obtained by some indictable offence, when he received them, may be proved either directly, by the evidence of the principal offender, or it may be proved circumstantially by shewing, for instance, that the defendant bought them very much under their value, or denied that they were in his possession, or the like.

And to show guilty knowledge other instances of receiving goods belonging to the prosecutor, from the same person, may be proved; (3) even though they be the subject of other indictments and antecedent to the receiving in question. (4)

Evidence that, on former occasions, portions of the commodity stolen had been missed by the prosecutor and that the defendants, the alleged thief and receiver, had after such occasions been found selling such a commodity, and that which was sold on the last of these occasions being identified as part of that missed by the prosecutor, was held admissible in proof of the guilty knowledge. (5)

Upon a trial for stealing and receiving, it is legal, under section 993, to prove that there was found in the prisoner's possession other property stolen within the preceding period of twelve months, although such other property is the subject of another indictment against him to be tried at the same term or sitting of the court; (6) but it has been held in England, that, under the first paragraph of section 19 of the Prevention of Crimes Act, (which first paragraph is the same as our law as contained in section 993), it was not sufficient merely to prove that "other property stolen within the preceding twelve months" had at sometime, during the twelve months, been dealt with by the prisoner, but that it must be proved that such other property was found in the prisoner's possession at the time when he was found in possession of the property forming the subject matter of the indictment. (7) Therefore, where the prisoner was indicted for receiving stolen goods, and, to shew guilty knowledge, evidence was tendered to prove that, a short time previously, the prisoner had sold for half its value, and had otherwise disposed of, other property stolen within the preceding twelve months, Held, that the statute did not extend to such evidence, which, therefore, was inadmissible. (8)

A, a boy, stole from B, his master, an article, which, after being so stolen, was taken from A, in the presence of B; after this it was, with B's consent, delivered back to A, in order to leave him at liberty to sell it to C, to whom he, A, had been in the habit of selling similar articles stolen. A, upon thus receiving back the article, sold it accordingly, to C; who, being indicted for receiving it, of an evil-disposed person, knowing it to be stolen, was convicted, and, notwithstanding objection made, was sentenced (9) But it has been since held that this case is not law, and that a defendant is not liable to conviction, under such circumstances, inasmuch as the goods when received were not stolen goods. (10)

A, after stealing some goods sent them, by railway, in a parcel addressed to B. C, an officer of the railway company, from information received, examined the parcel at the railway station of the place of destination, and stopped it before its delivery to B. It was called for by A, the thief, on the day of its arrival at the railway station and refused to him. Next day, a porter of the Company, by C's direction, took the parcel to a house which A had designated; and it was there recevied by B. Held, that B could not be convicted of receiving, as the goods had ceased to be stolen goods at the time when he received delivery of them from the railway porter sent by C to deliver them. (1)

This is expressly declared to be the law, by section 403, post.

Although section 2[22], ante, includes in the definition of property not only the property originally in a person's possession or control but "also any property into or for which the same has been converted or exchanged, and any thing acquired by such conversion or exchange, whether immediately or otherwise," it will, in cases where the stolen goods have been altered, or converted into something else, between the time of the theft and the receiving, be as well to draw the indictment so as to correspond with the fact. For instance, A and B were indicted, the one for stealing, the other for receiving six notes of £100 each; A stole the notes, changed them into notes of £20, some of which £20 notes he gave to B: Held, that B could not be convicted; for he did not receive the £100 notes stolen, and alleged by the indictment to have been stolen; (2) therefore if the goods stolen have been altered between the time of the stealing and that of the receiving, so as to pass into a new denomination, etc., the indictment should correspond with the fact. Where A was indicted for sheep-stealing, and B was charged with receiving "twenty pounds of mutton, part of the goods," etc., it was held good. (3)

Recent possession of stolen property is evidence either that the person in possession stole it, or that he received it knowing it to be stolen, according to the circumstances of the particular case. Where a prisoner was found in recent possession of stolen property, of which he could give no satisfactory account, and where, from the circumstances, it might reasonably be inferred that he was not the thief, it was held that there was evidence for the jury that he received the property knowing it to have been stolen. (4) And where a woman was charged with stealing and also with receiving, and the evidence consisted of the fact of the stolen property having been found concealed on her person at ten o'clock in the morning after the night on which it was stolen, and of her having made two contradictory statements as to how she became in possession of it, and the jury acquitted her of larceny but convicted her of receiving, the evidence was held sufficient to sustain the conviction. (5)

A charge of theft does not impliedly include that of receiving stolen goods.

An accused acquitted of theft remains subject to the accusation of receiving, and cannot, by reason of his acquittal of theft, set up, to a charge of receiving, the defence of autre fois acquit. (6)

Upon a charge, against H. G., of receiving a sum of money stolen by J. S., the public prosecutor is not bound to establish the offence of theft thus designated. The mention of the name of J. S. in the indictment against H. G. for receiving is surplusage, and is no obstacle to the conviction of the receiver by the application of section 849, post. (7)

Where an accused, on his plea of guilty, was convicted of having received stolen property,—the words, "knowing the same to have been stolen," being omitted from the information,—he was released on habeas corpus, it being held that the information and the warrant of imprisonment disclosed no offence. (8)

On the trial of an accused for stealing and receiving lace, evidence was given that articles stolen from several places were found in the possession of the accused and that other portions of the stolen property were found in the possession of a friend and associate of the accused. On the accused and his friend being charged together, the accused's friend said: "Yes, it's quite right; I sold them for Horace (meaning the accused)." The accused made no reply. The statement so made by the accused's friend was taken down in writing, and was, then, after being taken down in writing, read over to the accused, who again made no reply. The accused had ample opportunity of denying his friend's statement or of making any explanation or observation he thought fit. Held, that such statement was properly admitted in evidence as dealing with the accused's conduct and demeanor. (9)

Possession of stolen goods by a servant may be the possession of the master: but, for this to be so, there must be evidence that the master was aware of the possession of the servant. (10)

Four prisoners were charged in two counts with larceny, at common law, of lead piping, and with receiving it well knowing it to have been stolen. The evidence shewed that the first prisoner stripped the lead piping from a house and the second and third prisoners carried it away to the fourth prisoner. The first prisoner was acquitted upon the ground that he was not guilty of larceny at common law, but only section 31 of the Imperial Larceny Act, 1861, for which offence he was not indicted. The jury found the second and third prisoners guilty of larceny and the fourth of receiving. Held, that the jury, upon the evidence, would, if their attention had been called to the particular point, have convicted the three prisoners of receiving; and therefore under section 4, sub-section 1, and section 5, sub-section 1, of the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, the appeal would be dismissed.—the prisoners being properly convicted of receiving. (1)

400. Receiving stolen property.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to five years' imprisonment who receives or retains in his possession any post letter or post letter bag, or any chattel, money or valuable security, parcel or other thing, the stealing whereof is hereby declared to be an indictable offence, knowing the same to have been stolen. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 315.

For the meanings of "post letter bag" and "post letter," see sections 364, 365 and 366, ante, relating to the theft of post letters, etc., and comments thereunder.

Section 869, post, provides that in the case of any offence in relation to a post letter bag or post letter or other mailable matter, etc., sent by post, the property thereof may, in the indictment, be laid in the Postmaster General.

See sections 849, 954, 993 and 994, post, and the comments thereon under section 399, ante.

401. Receiving property obtained by offence punishable summarily.—Every one who receives or retains in his possession anything, knowing the same to have been unlawfully obtained, the stealing of which is punishable on summary conviction, either for every offence, or for the first and second offence only, is guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction, for every first, second or subsequent offence of receiving, to the same punishment as if he were guilty of a first, second or subsequent offence of stealing the same. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 316.

402. When receiving is complete.—The act of receiving anything unlawfully obtained is complete as soon as the offender has, either exclusively or jointly with the thief or any other person, possession of or control over such thing, or aids in concealing or disposing of it. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 317.

Section 1048 provides that the Court may, for the loss of any property, which a person may have suffered through any offence, award him a money compensation, in the shape of a judgment debt against the offender. This applies to theft, receiving, and malicious injuries to property, etc.

Section 1049 provides, that, wherever a prisoner has been convicted either summarily or otherwise, of theft, or receiving, etc., a person who has innocently bought and paid the prisoner for the property may be reimbursed out of any money found upon and belonging to the prisoner; and section 1050, post, provides that property stolen or criminally obtained may, at the trial of the offender, be ordered to be restored to the owner.

403. Receiving after restoration to owner.—When the thing unlawfully obtained has been restored to the owner, or when a legal title to the thing so obtained has been acquired by any person, a subsequent receiving thereof shall not be an offence although the receiver may know that the thing had been previously unlawfully obtained. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 318.

This had already been held to be the law in several English cases. For instance, a parcel was entrusted by a consignor to a firm of common carriers for delivery to a consignee. Whilst at the carriers' depot, it was removed, by one of the carmen, from one platform to another, and there redirected by him to the prisoners. The attention of the superintendent of the carriers having been called to this circumstance the latter directed the parcel to be sent, with a special delivery sheet, in a van, accompanied by detectives, to the address placed upon the parcel by the carman; and the prisoners, having received it at that address, were prosecuted by the carriers. The indictment contained a count against the carman for larceny and another count against the prisoners for receiving. The carman pleaded guilty to the theft; but it was held that, the prosecutors having taken possession of the property after it was stolen by their carman but before being received by the prisoners, the latter could not be convicted of receiving it knowing it to have been stolen. False Pretences.

404. Definition.—A false pretence is a representation, either by words or otherwise, of a matter of fact either present or past, which representation is known to the person making it to be false, and which is made with a fraudulent intent to induce the person to whom it is made to act upon such representation.

2. Exaggerated commendation or depreciation of the quality of anything is not a false pretence, unless it is carried to such an extent as to amount to a fraudulent misrepresentation of fact.

(2) R. v. Villensky, [1892], 2 Q. B., 597. See, also, the cases of R. v. Dolan and R. v. Schmidt, cit. at p. , ante.

3. It is a question of fact whether such commendation or depreciation does or does not amount to a fraudulent misrepresentation of fact. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 358.

This section is in the exact words of section 270 of the English Draft Code.

405. Punishment for obtaining by false pretence.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to three years' imprisonment who, with intent to defraud, by any false pretence, either directly or through the medium of any contract obtained by such false pretence, obtains anything capable of being stolen, or procures anything capable of being stolen to be delivered to any other person than himself. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 359.

405a. Obtaining credit by false pretences.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to one year's imprisonment who, in incurring any debt or liability, obtains credit under false pretences, or by means of fraud. (Added by 7-8 Ed. VII., c. 18, sec. 6.)

As stated by the Royal Commissioners, in their remarks, set out at page 398, ante, it was necessary to assign separate provisions to this offence although, in point of mischief and moral guilt, it is much the same as theft.

DISTINCTION BETWEEN LARCENY AND FALSE PRETENCES.—The most intelligible distinction between the offence of theft and that of obtaining goods or money by false pretences seems to be this: In theft, the owner of the thing in question has no intention of parting with his property therein to the person taking it: while, in the case of an obtaining by false pretences, the owner does intend to part with his property therein, but his consent to part with his property therein is brought about by the false pretences made to him. (1) "If," said Parke, B., "a person, through the fraudulent representations of another, delivers to him a chattel intending to pass the property in it, the latter cannot be indicted for larceny, but only for obtaining the chattel under false pretences." (2)

But there have been some cases, held to be larceny or theft by taking, which closely resembled the offence of obtaining by false pretences. For instance, a defendant got possession at the India House of a request note by means of which he obtained a permit for a chest of tea belonging to the prosecutor (to whom he was a perfect stranger), and the chest of tea was, thereupon, delivered to him. This was held to be larceny, notwithstanding that the possession of the tea was obtained by means of a regular request-note and permit. (3) Again, a hosier in the Haymarket having sent his apprentice with a parcel of stockings to be taken to Cheapside, the defendant met the apprentice at Ludgate Hill and asked him where he was going. The apprentice answered that he was going to Mr. Heath's; whereupon the defendant replied that he was the person, and desired the boy to give him the parcel, he handing to the boy a small parcel in return to take home to his master. The boy gave him the stockings; and it was afterwards found that the small parcel, which he took home to his master, contained nothing but old rags of no value. And this also was held to be larceny. (4)

The cases already cited, under the head of theft (see pp. 404-409, ante), shew that if a servant, acting under a general authority co-equal with his master's, intentionally parts with his master's property, under a misconception fraudulently induced by false representations as to the real facts, such property is not said to be stolen, but obtained by false pretences; but, that, if the servant, having only a limited authority, and being precluded from parting with the property, is, nevertheless, tricked out of it, the offender thus obtaining it is guilty of theft: because the master has never consented to nor authorized the parting with it. (5)

ESSENTIALS OF THE OFFENCE OF OBTAINING BY FALSE PRETENCES. — To constitute the offence of obtaining by false pretences, four essentials are necessary, namely:—

1. There must be a false statement, which represents, as existing, something which does not exist, or which represents, as having happened or having existed, something which has not happened or has not existed.

2. The offender must have known, at the time of making the false statement or representation, that it was false;

3. The goods or money in question must have been parted with in consequence of and through the false representation; and

4. The false statement or representation must have been made with intent to defraud.

If a man represents as an existing fact that which is not an existing fact, and so gets the money or chattels of another, that is a false pretence: (6) it being for the jury to say whether or not the defendant, at the time he did the act, had a guilty knowledge of the quality of the act, (7) and whether or not the pretences used were the means of obtaining the property.

For instance, there is a false pretence where a person goes to a shop and falsely states that he is sent by some particular customer for such and such goods, which, upon the faith of what he says, are handed to him; or where the secretary of a benefit society obtains money from one of its members by representing that a certain amount, exceeding that actually due, is owing by such member to the society; (8) or where money is obtained by means of a begging letter setting forth false statements as to the name and circumstances of the accused; (9) or where A, the accused, falsely represents that he is connected with B, a person of known opulence, and, on the faith of such representation, obtains for himself property; (10) or where C, by fraudulently pretending that a genuine £1 Irish bank note is a £5 note, obtains, from D, the full value of a £5 note in change; (1) or where E, with intent to defraud, pays, by a cheque, for goods then handed to him, he stating that he wishes to pay ready money for them, but knowing at the time that he has only a nominal balance at the bank on which the cheque is drawn, that he has no power to overdraw his account, and not intending to pay money in to meet the cheque. (2)

The false statement must be a knowingly false statement of a supposed by-gone or of a supposed existing fact, made with intent to defraud; and there must be an obtaining of the money or goods by means of that false statement. (3) A mere representation as to some future fact or a false promise by the party charged that he will do or means to do a particular act will not suffice to constitute a false pretence; (4) unless it be conjoined with a false pretence of an existing or by-gone fact. (5)

Where a carrier obtained carriage money by falsely pretending that he had delivered the goods charged for and that he had lost the receipt for their delivery, it was held that this was a false pretence. (6)

Where a manufacturer's foreman, who was in the habit of receiving, from his master, money to pay the workmen, obtained from the manufacturer,—by means of false written accounts of the men's earnings,—more than the men had really earned and more than he had paid them, the Judges held this to be within the statute; they said that all cases where the false pretence creates the credit are within the Act; and here the defendant would not have obtained the excess over what was really due to the workmen, were it not for the false pretence made by the false account delivered by him to the master. (7)

It was A's duty to ascertain daily the amount of dock dues payable by B, his master, and to apply to C, his master's cashier, for the amount, and then pay it in discharge of the dues. On one occasion by falsely and knowingly representing to C that the amount was larger than it really was, A obtained from C this larger amount, and then paid the real amount due, appropriating the difference to his own use. Held, not larceny, but obtaining money by false pretences. (8)

A obtained goods by falsely stating that he wanted them for B who was a person whom he would trust with £1,000, and who went out to New Orleans twice a year to take goods to his sons. Held, a sufficient false pretence. (9)

Obtaining as a loan,—from the drawer of a bill accepted by the prisoner and negotiated by the drawer,—part of the amount, for the purpose of paying the bill under the false pretence that the prisoner was ready with the remainder of the amount, was held to be an offence within the statute, the prisoner being shewn not to be prepared with the remainder of the amount of the bill and not intending to so apply the money obtained from the drawer. (10)

Where A obtained goods from B by a false statement that a bill,—drawn on and accepted by himself, and purporting to be payable at the London and Westminster Bank, which bill he gave to B for the price of the goods—would be paid at the bank the next day, and that he had made arrangements for it, this was held to be a sufficient false pretence. (1)

A, the secretary of an Odd Fellows' Lodge, told B, a member, that he owed the lodge 13s. 6d., and thereby obtained that sum from him fraudulently, whereas B owed 2s. 2d. only. Held, rightly convicted of obtaining money by false pretences. (2)

A creditor who wilfully and fraudulently represents to a third person, who holds money of his debtor, that a larger sum is due to him from the debtor than is really the case, and thus obtains from such third person payment of the larger sum, was held guilty of a false pretence within the statute, and that, too, although he had obtained a judgment by default, not set aside, against his debtor for the larger amount. (3)

Where A obtained money from B, a woman, under the threat of an action for breach of promise of marriage, he, A, being, in fact, a married man, already, an indictment, charging that he had falsely pretended that he was entitled to maintain an action against B for the breach of promise was held, by Maule, J., to be good. (4)

An indictment, charging A with obtaining money from B, whose husband had run away, by falsely pretending to B, that she, A, had power to bring back B's husband, was held good. (5)

A pretended to be carrying on an extensive business as a surveyor and house agent, and thereby induced B to deposit with him £25 as a security for his, B's, fidelity as a clerk, whereas A was not carrying on any business as a surveyor or house agent. Held, to be a false pretence. (6)

A municipality having provided some wheat for the poor, A obtained an order for fifteen bushels, described as "three of Golden Drop, three of Fife, nine of milling wheat." Some days afterwards he went back, and represented that the order had been accidentally destroyed, when another was given to him. He then struck out of the first order "three of Golden Drop, three of Fife," and, presenting both orders, obtained, in all, twenty-four bushels. The indictment charged that A unlawfully, fraudulently, and knowingly, by false pretences, did obtain an order from B, one of the municipality of C, requiring the delivery of certain wheat, by and from one D, and, by presenting the said order to D, did fraudulently, knowingly, and by false pretences, procure a certain quantity of wheat, etc., from the said D of the goods and chattels of the said municipality, with intent to defraud. Held, that the indictment was sufficient, and not uncertain or double, but in effect charged that A obtained the order, and, by presenting it, obtained the wheat, by false pretences. (7)

An indictment containing several counts charged A with obtaining money under false pretences, and the evidence went to shew that he had, by fraudulent misrepresentations of the business he was doing in a trade, induced B to enter into a partnership agreement, and to advance £500 to the concern; but it did not appear that the trade was altogether a fiction, or that B had repudiated the partnership. The question being whether, upon such evidence, the jury were bound to convict, it was held that A was entitled to an acquittal, as it was consistent with the evidence that B, as a partner, was interested in the money obtained. (8)

A, who had been discharged from B's service, went to the store of C and D, and, representing himself as still in the employ of B, who was a customer of C and D, asked for goods in B's name, which were sent to B's house, where the prisoner preceded the goods, and, as soon as the clerk delivered the parcel, snatched it from him, saying, "This is for me; I am going in to see B;" but, instead of doing so, walked out of the house with the parcel. Held, that A was rightly convicted of obtaining the goods from C and D, by false pretences. (9)

A obtained a coat, by falsely pretending that a bill of a coat of the value of 14s. 6d., of which 4s. 6d. had been paid on account, was a bill of another coat of the value of 22s., which he had made to measure, and that 10s. only were due; it was proved that A's wife had selected the 14s. 6d. coat for him, at B's shop, subject to its fitting, on his calling to try it on, and had paid 4s. 6d. on account, for which she received a bill, in which credit was given for the 4s. 6d. so paid on account. On A calling at B's shop, afterwards, to try on the coat, it was found to be too small, and he was then measured for one, which he ordered to be made, to cost 22s. On the day named for trying on this second coat, A called, and the coat was fitted on by B, who had not been present on the former occasion; and the case stated that A, on the coat being given to him, handed 10s. and the bill of parcels for the 14s. 6d. coat, saying, "There is 10s. to pay," which bill B handed to his daughter, to examine, and, upon that, A put the coat under his arm, and, after the bill of parcels referred to had been handed to him with a receipt, went away. B stated that, believing the bill of parcels to be a genuine bill, and that it referred to the second coat which was taken away by A, he parted with that coat on payment of the 10s., which otherwise he should not have done. Held, that there was evidence to go to the jury, and that the conviction was right. (10)

A sold to B, a railway pass, representing it to be valid in the hands of B, who believed it to be transferable, but as a matter of fact it was not transferable but only good to carry a particular person, and could not be used by B, except by committing a fraud upon the railway company, and at the risk of being, at any moment, expelled from the train. A was held guilty of obtaining by false pretences the money paid to him, by B, for such pass. (1)

A was convicted of obtaining money from B, by falsely pretending that there was a person named A. Brient living at Holt, Trowbridge, who was a minister of religion, and had instituted a "bona fide competition for the production of the greatest number of words from the word Bernardo," and had made arrangements to present prizes, of the respective amounts of £2, £1, and 10s., to the successful competitors, and had further arranged to give the proceeds derived from the entrance fees of competition (after deducting the prizes) to Dr. Bernardo's Home for Destitute Children; and the evidence that A had so pretended was that he had inserted, in a newspaper, the following advertisement:—"Bernardo, £2, £1, 10s., for the most words from Bernardo. Proceeds to go to Dr. Bernardo's Home for Destitute Children. Alphabetical lists with 1s. 3d., to Revd. A. Brient, Holt, Trowbridge, Wilts." Held, affirming the conviction, that the words in the advertisement were reasonably capable of the construction put upon them in the indictment, and that it was a question for the jury whether A intended B to put that construction upon them. (2)

The false representation by a person that he is in a large way of business, whereby he induces another to give him goods, is a false pretence. (3) So also is the obtaining a loan upon the security of a piece of land, by falsely and fraudulently representing that a house is built upon it. (4) And threatening to sue on a note made in favor of the prisoner, and which he had negotiated but pretended he was still the holder of, thereby inducing the prosecutor to pay him, is a false pretence. (5)

A prisoner who had obtained money and goods by pretending that a paper which he produced was the bank note of an existing solvent bank, which he knew had stopped payment forty years before, was held guilty of obtaining by false pretences. (6)

Where A fraudulently misrepresented an Irish bank note of £1 to be one of £5, and thereby obtained from B, in change, a larger sum than its value, he was held guilty of obtaining money by false pretences, although B had the means of detection at hand, on the face of the note, but relied on A's representations, and although the note was a genuine one. Where A induced B to buy and pay for a cheese of inferior description by making the wilfully false statement that a tester of a different and superior cheese, which he produced as a sample, formed part of and had been taken out of the cheese which he so induced B to buy, it was held that he might be convicted of obtaining money by false pretences. (8)

A person who sold spurious blacking which he represented to be "Everetts Blacking" was held to be indictable for false pretences. (9)

On the 17th of June, 1895, H wrote to C in reference to a coal charter for the schooner "Chlorus," signing himself "J. B. H., owner." In the following October, after some intervening voyages, H obtained goods and supplies for the vessel, from C, and, at his request, C paid cash to third parties who supplied apples to the vessel as cargo, on receipts signed by H, as owner. On the 17th of June, 1895, and at the times when the goods in question were supplied, the vessel was registered under the Merchants Shipping Act, in the name of H's wife, it having been transferred to her by a third party to whom it was previously transferred by H. Held, that the evidence was not sufficient to convict H of obtaining the goods or the moneys by means of false pretences, and that the word "owner," as used, did not necessarily mean "registered owner." (10)

A clause of a deed by which the borrower of a sum of money falsely declares property well and truly to belong to him may constitute a false pretence. (1)

Section 404 expressly provides that the offence consists in obtaining by false pretences something capable of being stolen.

It has been held that obtaining credit on an account is not obtaining money by false pretences, (2) that obtaining credit in account from the party's own banker, by drawing a bill of exchange on a person on whom the party has no right to draw, and which has no chance of being paid, is not a false pretence, though the banker pays money for him in consequence to an extent that he would not otherwise have done; (3) and, that, upon an indictment for having obtained, by false pretences, something capable of being stolen, the prisoner could not be convicted on proof of his having obtained credit at a bank by means of a false statement of his financial affairs. (4)

But section 405 A, recently inserted (by the 7-8 Ed. VII., c. 18, s. 6), after sec. 405, ante, makes it an indictable offence punishable by one year's imprisonment for any person, in incurring any debt or liability, to obtain credit by false pretences or by means of any fraud.

Where a person, who had an interest in the profits of a ship, had repairs done to the ship, and in the settlement of accounts presented a receipt for a larger amount than he had paid, it was held that this was not obtaining money under false pretences but only a credit in account. (5)

It has been held that a person who orders and consumes a meal at a restaurant without being possessed of means to pay for it,—he having made no statement and being asked no questions, before consuming the meal, as to whether or not he had means to pay,—does not obtain goods by false pretences. (6)

In England, a person incurs a liability, under the Debtor's Act, 1869, by fraudulently obtaining credit and would be guilty of an offence under section 13 of that Act.

In some of the United States of America the obtaining of board and lodging in hotels or boarding houses, by false representations or tricks, is an offence. (7)

A pretence to a parish officer, as an excuse for not working, that the party had not clothes, when in reality he had,—although it had the effect of inducing the officer to give him clothes,—was held not to be obtaining goods by false pretences, inasmuch as the pretence was made as an excuse for not working and not for the purpose of obtaining the clothes. (8)

Where the prisoner had obtained money from the keeper of a post office, by assuming to be the person mentioned in a money order, which he presented for payment, though he did not make any false declaration or assertion in words in order to obtain the money, it was held to be a false pretence. (9)

A defendant, in the assumed character of a porter of an inn, delivered a parcel as from the country, with a printed ticket containing writing charging carriage and porterage, and he received the amount of money charged thereon. The parcel turned out to be a mock parcel, worth nothing. Part of the false pretences charged against him, on his being prosecuted, consisted of the contents of the printed ticket. It was objected that the defendant had not uttered these words; but Lord Ellenborough said, "I take the defendant to have uttered every word contained on the ticket which he brought with the parcel." (10)

FALSE PRETENCES BY CONDUCT.—It is not necessary that the pretence should be in words; the conduct and acts of the party may be sufficient to constitute a false pretence, without any verbal representation; thus, giving, in payment, for goods obtained, a cheque upon a banker with whom the defendant has, in fact, no account is a false pretence. (1) But if the defendant at the time of giving the cheque, believes, although he has no account at the bankers upon whom he draws the cheque, that the cheque will be paid at that bank at the time agreed upon,—between him and the person to whom he gives it,—for its presentation, he cannot be convicted of obtaining by a false pretence. Thus, where A bought a mare and paid for her on Thursday, by a cheque drawn on B, a banker, with whom he had no account, but told C, from whom he bought the mare, and to whom he gave the cheque, not to present it until Saturday, to which C assented, but C, nevertheless, presented it on the same day, Thursday, when it was dishonored, and it appeared, from the evidence, that A was, on Thursday, in daily expectation of having money paid to him which would have enabled him to place the banker in funds to meet the cheque on the Saturday, it was held that there was no false pretence. (2)

A man who makes and gives a cheque for the amount of goods purchased in a ready-money transaction, makes a representation that the cheque is a good and valid order for the amount inserted in it; and if the man has only a colorable account at the bank on which the cheque is drawn, without available assets to meet it, and has no authority to overdraw, and knows that the cheque will be dishonored on presentation, and intends to defraud, he may be convicted of obtaining the goods by false pretences. (3)

A falsely pretended that a post dated cheque, drawn by himself, was a good order for £25 and worth that amount, whereby he obtained from B. a watch and chain. It was proved that, before the completion of the sale and delivery of the watch to A, the latter represented that he had an account with the bankers on whom the cheque was drawn, that he had a right to draw the cheque, and that it would be paid on or after the day of its date. The jury found that these representations were false and that A had no funds to pay the cheque and had no reasonable grounds to believe that it would be paid. Held, rightly convicted. (4)

Fraudulently offering a "flash note" in payment, under the pretence that it is a bank note, is a false pretence. (5)

A charge of obtaining money or goods by false pretences may be supported by shewing a false pretence by the conduct of the accused; and such pretence need not be in words or writing. For instance, a debtor, who had made a judicial abandonment or assignment of his property for the benefit of his creditors whereby his property became vested in another, and who, knowing that he no longer had any right to receive the rents of the real property forming part of the assets assigned by him, afterwards presented himself as landlord to one of the tenants and received the rent in the same way as he was formerly accustomed to do, was held guilty of obtaining money under false pretences by his acts and conduct; and it was held by the Court of Appeal, in confirming the conviction, that the question of whether the facts disclosed in a case constitute the offence of obtaining by false pretences is not a question of law but one of fact within the province of the jury and cannot be made the subject of a reserved case. (6)

Where a person at Oxford, not being a member of the University, went, for the purpose of fraud wearing a University commoner's cap and gown, and, in this garb, obtained goods, it was a sufficient false pretence, although no representations passed in words. (7)

Where a person obtained goods by sending half bank notes and requesting goods to the value of the entire notes to be sent to her, and, at the time when she did so she had not the corresponding half notes in her possession,—she having previously sent them to other persons,—it was held that this was obtaining goods by false pretences: Morris, C.J., remarking that the request for the goods along with sending the two half notes was evidence from which the jury might infer that there was a sort of silent representation by the defendant that she had the corresponding half notes ready for the satisfaction of the prosecutor. (8)

EXAGGERATED COMMENDATION OR DEPRECIATION.—In defining false pretences, section 404, ante, expressly states, in the second paragraph thereof, that exaggerated commendation or depreciation of the quality of a thing is not a false pretence, unless it goes so far as to amount to a fraudulent misrepresentation of fact.

Thus, where A induced B to buy from him a chain by fraudulently representing that it was of 15-carat gold, whereas in fact it was of a quality little better than 6-carat gold—knowing at the time that he was falsely representing the quality of the chain, it was held that A could properly be convicted of obtaining money by false pretences—there being here a statement as to a specific fact within the actual knowledge of the prisoner, viz., the proportion of pure gold in the chain. (9)

A person who obtained from a pawnbroker, upon an article which he falsely represented to be silver, a greater advance than would otherwise have been made, was held guilty of a false pretence; although the pawnbroker had the opportunity of testing the article at the time. (10)

An accused was convicted of an attempt to obtain money by false pretences,—the pretence alleged being that he attempted to sell a ring as a gold ring whereas in fact it was brass. Held, that the conviction must be quashed, as there was no evidence to go to the jury that the accused knew that the ring was not a gold ring. (10a)

A false representation that a stamp on a watch is the hall-mark of the Goldsmiths' Company, and that the number 18, part thereof, indicates that it is made of eighteen carat gold, is a false pretence, and is not the less so, because accompanied by the representation that the watch is a gold one, and some gold is proved to have been contained in its composition. (1)

If the purchaser intends to buy a particular substance, and the seller passes off to him a counterfeit,—and money is thus obtained,—that is a false pretence within the statute. (2) And it may also be constituted by a fraudulent representation as to the quantity of goods sold. For instance, where A, having contracted to sell and deliver to B a load of coals at 7d. per cwt., delivered to her a load which he knew weighed only 14 cwt., but which he stated to her contained 18 cwt. and produced a ticket, to that effect, which he said he himself had made out, when the coals were weighed, and she thereupon paid him the price as for 18 cwt., which was 2s. 4d. more than was really due, it was held that A was indictable for obtaining the 2s. 4d. by false pretences. (3)

Inducing a person to buy some packages of tea representing the packages to contain good tea, when three-fourths of the contents were, to the defendant's knowledge, not tea at all but a mixture of substances unfit to drink, was held a false representation of an existing fact. (4)

It is sometimes difficult to distinguish between a mere breach of warranty and a false representation,—for instance, as to the profits of a business,—and the statutory offence of obtaining or attempting to obtain money by false pretences. It was held in the case of R. v. Byran that if goods of a certain kind be sold under a misrepresentation knowingly made as to their value,—though not of a definite fact,—the statutable offence of obtaining money by false pretences will not have been committed. "The legislature," observed Lord Campbell, C.J., could not have intended to make it an indictable offence for a seller to exaggerate the quality of the goods he is selling, any more than to make criminal the act of a purchaser who strives during the bargain to depreciate their quality, and so induces the seller to part with the goods at a lower price." (5) And Coleridge, J., expressed himself similarly. "It is," he said, "a safe rule, that where the false representation applies merely to the quality, and is in the nature of exaggeration on the one hand, or depreciation on the other, which may take place between parties even in tolerably honest transactions, the statute does not apply."

Where the defendant sold to the prosecutor a reversionary interest which he had previously sold to another, and the prosecutor took a regular assignment of it, with the usual covenants for title, Littledale, J., ruled that the defendant could not be convicted for obtaining money by false pretences; for if this were within the statute every breach of warranty or false assertion at the time of a bargain might be treated as such. (6) In R. v. Kenrick the above ruling of Littledale, J., was much questioned; and it was strongly intimated that the execution of a contract between the parties does not secure from punishment the obtaining of money under false pretences, in conformity with that contract. (7) And in R. v. Abbott, it

The jury may connect together representations made in several distinct conversations, (supposing them to be in their nature connectible), and convict the defendant for obtaining money by means of false pretences made in the several conversations. (9)

PROOF OF FALSITY OF PRETENCE.—With regard to proof of the falsity of the pretences made use of, it does not seem essential that they should all be proved. If so many of them as shew the falsity of the substance of the pretence be proved it would appear to be sufficient. Take, for instance, the following case: A goes and says to B, a jeweller: "I am the clerk of C. who has sent me to pick out and get from you, a gold chain, for about the price of $25, which he says he will call and pay you in a few days;" and by means of this representation A obtains from B a gold chain. Now, suppose, on the trial of A for obtaining the chain by false pretences, it should turn out that A was really the servant of C, and, that, therefore, there was nothing false about that part of his statement, still, if it were also to appear that he had received no instructions from C to get the chain, and, that, after obtaining it, he converted it to his own use, the evidence would be sufficient to warrant his conviction.

It appears, also, that it is not necessary that the falsity of the pretences should be shewn by direct evidence. Thus, where the pretences charged were that A had a carriage and pair, which he expected down in a few days, and that he had large property abroad; and there was no direct evidence to shew that he had no carriage and no property abroad, but there was evidence shewing that three days before he made the pretences he was in another place assuming to be a man of position and wealth, although really in a destitute condition, and unable to pay his hotel and other bills, it was held that there was evidence from which the jury might infer that the pretences were false. (10)

Where a person represented that a fraudulent cheque was good and that the drawer was responsible, it appeared that, after the cheque had been protested and returned by the bank on which it was drawn, the party defrauded said to the defendant,—"The bank writes that this party is a myth, —that you have been drawing fraudulently upon the bank,"—to which the defendant replied that he would make it good, but made no denial. This was held to be sufficient proof of the falsity of the pretence. (1)

On a charge of obtaining goods under pretence of sending them to Charleston, South Carolina, the evidence of a person usually employed to cart goods for the defendant to the effect that no goods had been carried by him for the defendant to any ship bound for that port was held admissible. (2)

Where a defendant falsely pretended to be indebted to the prosecutor and one other person only, his itemized account to a person not referred to as his creditor may be proved by such person, as tending to shew that the representation was false and fictitious. (3)

The defendant's knowledge of the falsity of the pretence may be shewn by his declarations or admissions made before or after the offence: (4) and under certain circumstances it will be presumed that the defendant had knowledge of the falsity of the pretence. Thus, where the postmaster at B. transferred, to the postmaster at T., post office orders payable which the defendant presented and got cashed, but the moneys for which had never been received by the postmaster at B., and the defendant was knowingly co-operating with him to carry his frauds into effect, he may be assumed to have known that the money for them had never been paid at B., and, therefore, that there was no honest right to draw it at T., in payment of such orders. (5)

THE PARTING WITH THE PROPERTY MUST BE INDUCED BY THE FALSE PRETENCE.—The parting with the money or goods must have been induced by the false pretence; and, therefore, where A made false representations to and thereby induced B, to sell him, A, some horses, but B, afterwards, on learning the falsity of the representations, entered into a new agreement in writing with the prisoner, it was held that the subsequent dealings repelled the idea that the prosecutor had parted with his property in consequence of the false pretence. (6)

A was charged with obtaining, from B, a filly, by falsely pretending to be a gentleman's servant and to have lived at Bream and by also pretending that he had bought horses at Bream fair. It appeared that A bought the filly of B at the price of £11, and that besides making the above false pretences, he told B that he would come down to the "Cross Keys" and pay him. B stated in the evidence that he parted with the filly, because he expected A would come to the "Cross Keys" and pay him, and not because he believed that A was a gentleman's servant, etc. Held, that A was entitled to an acquittal. (7)

Where A had fraudulently obtained from B some goods on approval, and had falsely represented to B that she, A, was the daughter of a Mrs. S. A., of C.; but there was no evidence to shew that B knew Mrs. S. A. of C., or that the goods had not been delivered to A, before she made the false representation, or that the goods were parted with by B, on the faith of the false representation, it was held that the conviction of A for obtaining the goods by false pretences could not be sustained. (8)

Where the defendant offered to pledge with a pawnbroker, a chain which he falsely represented to be silver, but the pawnbroker stated that he advanced money on it, not in consequence of defendant's statement but in reliance on its withstanding a test which he himself applied to it, it was held that the defendant could not be convicted of obtaining the money by means of the false pretence but that he was properly convicted of attempting to obtain money by false pretences. (9)

On an indictment for having, by means of false pretences, induced the prosecutor to enter into an agreement to take a field for the purpose of making bricks, in the belief that the soil of the field was fit for brickmaking, whereas it was not, — and the prosecutor himself being a brickmaker and having inspected the field, it was held that, nevertheless, if the prosecutor had been induced to take the field by false and fraudulent representations made by the defendant of specific matters of fact relating to the quality and character of the soil, as, for instance, that he, (defendant), had made goods bricks therefrom, the indictment would be sustained. Held, also, that it would be sufficient if the prosecutor was partly and materially, though not entirely influenced by the false pretences. (10)

Wherever the prosecutor himself knows the falsehood of the pretence but parts with his money or goods, notwithstanding, the defendant cannot be convicted of obtaining by false pretences; (1) but he may in such a case be convicted of attempting to obtain by false pretences, although the indictment charges him with obtaining. (See section 949, post.)

The mere fact of the prosecutor having the means at hand of acquiring knowledge of the falsity of the pretence will not of itself excuse the defendant so as to prevent him from being convicted of obtaining by false pretences. (2)

If the defendant has obtained money by a false pretence, knowing that it was false, it is no answer to shew that the party from whom he obtained it laid a plan to entrap him into the commission of the offence. (3) Quære. Would not this depend upon whether the party from whom the money was obtained knew of the falsity of the pretence? (See R. v. Mills, supra.)

A defendant had agreed to do a certain thing for seventy-five cents, and the prosecutor took out a two dollar bill to pay him, saying he would get it changed; whereupon the prisoner said, "I'll change it;" upon which, the money being handed to him, he kept it and gave back no change. There being no proof as to what induced the prosecutor to part with the money, it was held that a conviction for obtaining money by false pretences could not be sustained. (4)

A carrier having ordered a cask of ale, said, after he had possession of it: "This is for W." It was held that an indictment, for obtaining the cask of ale, under the false pretence of having been sent for it by another person,—namely, W.,—could not be sustained. (5)

REMOTENESS OF PRETENCE.—A person, by means of falsely pretending to be a naval officer, induced the prosecutrix to let him a lodging at ten shillings a week; and he thus became a lodger in her house. A few days afterwards he expressed a wish to become a boarder. He was then supplied with board as well as lodging at a guinea a week. He was afterwards indicted for obtaining goods (the board) by means of false pretences, and convicted. Held, that the conviction could not be supported, as the goods were supplied too remotely from the false pretence. (6)

Where an hotel keeper procured a guest to board at his hotel, and to pay money in advance for his board, by telling him that a certain person,—an acquaintance of such guest, whose society the latter greatly desired,—boarded at the hotel, it was held that this was not a false pretence for which the hotel keeper was criminally liable, the payment of the money for board being too remote a consequence of the false pretence, which was made to induce the party to become a guest and not directly made for the purpose of having the money advanced; it being considered that to get by a false pretence the custom or patronage of a guest is not to get property by false pretences, but to induce a condition of things or a relation of the parties out of which a contract to pay money for value may arise. (7)

Where goods were obtained by the false statement on the part of the buyer that he owned certain property, upon which property he gave to the seller a mortgage, thereby inducing him to part with the goods, it was held that the false pretence of being the owner of the property was the direct and not the remote means of obtaining the goods, even if they would not have been delivered but for the giving of the mortgage. (8)

A defendant falsely pretended that he had a lot of trucks of coal at a railway station on demurrage, that he required forty coal bags and that he was largely in business in the timber and coal line. He inspected some coal bags but objected to the price. On the following day, he called again, shewed the prosecutor some correspondence and again said that he had a lot of trucks of coal at the railway station on demurrage, and that he wanted some coal bags, immediately; whereupon a number of coal bags were given to him upon his agreement to pay for them in a week. Held, that the false pretences were not too remote. (9)

A prisoner was charged with obtaining, by false pretences, a prize in a swimming handicap. He had obtained his competitor's ticket for the race by falsely representing himself to be a member of a certain club and by producing a forged letter purporting to be from the secretary of that club. In this way the prisoner got 20 yards start, and, being an excellent swimmer won easily. It was held that, the false pretences were too remote, and that on that charge, at all events, the prisoner could not be convicted. (10) But this decision has been overruled in a later case, in which the prisoner was charged with and convicted of attempting to obtain by false pretences certain prizes in two foot races at an athletic meeting. It was proved that entry forms for the races were sent in, in the name of one Sims,—a moderately good runner,—correctly stating that Sims had never won a race. At the meeting, the prisoner ran in the name of Sims, and being a very superior runner who had been a winner, previously, and having,—by the statements in the entries, secured longer starts than he would have been allowed if his true name and performances had been known,—he won both races easily. After the first of the two races was run, he falsely stated, in reply to questions put to him by the handicapper, (whose suspicions were aroused), that he had never won a race previously, that he really was Sims, and that the statements in the entries were true statements as to his (prisoner's) performances. He did not apply to have the prizes handed over to him. At the trial, the jury were directed that if the prisoner ran without intending to obtain the prizes they ought to find him not guilty, but that if he made the false representations wilfully, intentionally and fraudulently, with intent to obtain the prizes, they ought to find him guilty. The jury found him guilty; and, upon a case reserved, it was held, that, the jury were properly directed and that the false pretences were not too remote; and the conviction was upheld. (1)

Where a prisoner had, by false pretences, induced a wheelwright to make him a spring van,—which was afterwards made and delivered to him,—it was held that, although at the time the pretence was made, the van was not yet in existence, the prisoner was rightly convicted of obtaining the van by false pretences, the pretences being held to be continuing pretences until the delivery of the van. (2)

The prisoner, who was foreman at a works, obtained from his master, by means of a false wage-sheet, a cheque for the amount stated in the sheet to pay men's wages. On account of the cheque being informally drawn, payment of it was refused by the bank; whereupon the prisoner returned it to the prosecutor and told him of the informality. The prosecutor tore up the informal cheque, and drew another, which he gave to the prisoner; who cashed the second cheque and appropriated to his own use the difference between the actual amount of the wages and the amount falsely stated in the wage-sheet. Held, that the false pretence upon which the first cheque was obtained continued in force and was the acting motive which influenced the prosecutor's mind in giving the second cheque. (3)

INTENT TO DEFRAUD. — Although it must be shewn that the defendant obtained the money or goods with intent to defraud, it is only necessary to shew a general intent to defraud. It is not necessary to allege that the intent was to defraud any particular person; (see section 855 (c), post); and if the evidence shew that there was, on the part of the defendant, an intent to defraud, it will be sufficient.

The intent to defraud may be implied from the facts of the case.

Where A owed B a debt, of which B could not obtain payment, and C (B's servant), went to A's wife and obtained, from her, two sacks of malt by telling her that B had bought them of A, — he (C) knowing this to be false,—and he (C) took the two sacks of malt to his master to enable him to thereby pay himself the debt owing to him by B, it was held that C could not be convicted of obtaining the malt by false pretences with intent to defraud. (4)

In a case in which the indictment averred an obtaining of a particular sum of money, with intent to defraud the prosecutor of the same, and it appeared that the intent was to defraud him of part only of that sum, the rest of the amount being really due, it was held, nevertheless, that the prisoner might be convicted. (5)

It has been held that the fact that, at the time of obtaining goods by false pretences, the defendant intended that he would pay for them, if and when it should be in his power to do so, affords no defence. (6)

Where a prisoner was tried on an indictment charging him with having obtained food and money by false pretences,—the false pretences being that he was a bank clerk receiving his salary fortnightly,—and the jury found him guilty, but added that, with regard to the intent to defraud, they considered there was not sufficient evidence, and, therefore, strongly recommended him to mercy, the verdict was accepted by the trial Judge as one of guilty. Upon a case reserved, the prosecution argued in support of the conviction, that the verdict was separable,—the latter portion of it being merely the jury's reason for recommending the prisoner to mercy, —and that, if it was not separable, the only possible meaning to be given to the latter portion of it was that the jury considered that the prisoner, when he obtained the food and money, intended at some future time to pay for the food and return the money; but, it was held, that the verdict was not separable and that, inasmuch as the latter portion of it negatived the intent to defraud,—without proof of which the previous portion of the verdict could not have been found,—the conviction could not be sustained. (7)

Proof of other false pretences.—On an indictment for attempting to obtain money by falsely pretending that a ring was composed of diamonds when in fact it was composed of crystals, it was held that, to shew the defendant's guilty knowledge and his intent to defraud, evidence was admissible of a false pretence, by the defendant, on a prior occasion, to another person that a chain was gold, whereas it was plated, and on another distinct occasion, that a ring was of diamonds, which it was not. (8)

In another case, it was held that, where there is evidence that, at dates subsequent to the offence charged, the prisoner obtained goods from other persons by false pretences similar to those used on the occasion charged in the indictment on trial, such evidence is admissible, when it points to one and the same system of fraud and a connected scheme of dishonesty. (9)

A prisoner was indicted for obtaining money under false pretences by means of worthless cheques. He had been previously indicted for a similar offence and acquitted. Held, that, notwithstanding such acquittal, evidence of the facts in that case was admissible on the subsequent indictment as tending to shew that the prisoner's conduct was not inadvertent or accidental, but was part of a systematic fraud. Upon a charge of obtaining goods under false pretences evidence of other similar acts committed by the accused was held to be inadmissible in corroboration of the fact that the accused committed the act charged, but upon due proof of the act charged, such evidence, it was held, may be given in proof of criminal intent or of guilty knowledge. (1)

FURTHER COMMENTS. — It will be noticed that section 405 expressly declares that the obtaining by false pretence shall be punishable whether it is done directly or through the medium of a contract.

H. Page sold to H. Pagnuelo, for $150, a horse described in a written document signed in duplicate by the parties at the completion of the sale, in which document it was stated that the purchase money was paid by Pagnuelo, the purchaser, on the faith of the warranty contained in the document, and not upon any verbal representations, and in which it was stipulated that if the horse should not come up to what it was warranted to be by that document, Page would repurchase it from Pagnuelo if brought back within thirty days in the same condition as when sold. On the day following the delivery of the horse and payment of the price, criminal proceedings were instituted by Pagnuelo, charging Page with having obtained the $150 by false pretences. At the trial in June, 1892, before Taschereau, J., in the Court of Queen's Bench, at Montreal, objection was made on behalf of the defendant, Page, to the adduction of any verbal evidence to contradict the writing, and especially that part of it expressly declaring that the prosecutor, Pagnuelo, paid the money on the faith of the warranty contained in the writing and not upon any verbal representations. The Crown counsel, however, took the ground that the writing was a part of the alleged fraud, and resisted the defendant's counsel's objection, which was overruled; and verbal evidence was admitted to shew (inter alia), that the defendant, Page, had, before the completion of the sale, and before the signing of the written document, represented to the prosecutor, Pagnuelo, that the horse was a high bred, fast trotting horse, called "Prince Wilkes," well known in the sporting world, and upon this evidence and proof of some other facts of minor importance (including evidence that the horse was worth from $80 to $110), the defendant, Page, was found guilty and sentenced to three years' imprisonment. (1a)

Parol evidence has been held admissible to prove the false pretences laid in the indictment, although a deed made between the parties and stating a different consideration for parting with the money was put in evidence for the prosecution; such deed having been made for the purpose of the fraud. (2)

If the false pretence be in writing and it be lost, it may be proved by secondary evidence. (3)

On the trial of an indictment for obtaining goods by false pretences,—if the alleged false representation is in writing, it is permissible to ask the person who is alleged to have been defrauded what opinion he formed on seeing the writing. (4)

A person who has assisted in the fraud practised in obtaining money by false pretences may be convicted as a principal, though not present at the making of the false pretence and obtaining the money. (5)

Where several persons were indicted for obtaining money under false pretences, it was objected that, although the defendants were all present when the representations were made to the prosecutor, yet the words could not be spoken by all and that none of them who did not speak the words could be affected by words spoken by another of them, but, that each was answerable for himself only, the using of the words constituting the pretence being, as in the crime of perjury, a separate act in the person using them. But it was held that, as the defendants were all present, acting a different part in the same transaction, they were jointly guilty. (6)

A count in an indictment for false pretences by means of an advertisement alleged that the prisoner falsely pretended to the subjects of Her Majesty the Queen, that he required a housekeeper and that, by means of such false pretence, he obtained, from C. a certain valuable security. Held, that the count sufficiently stated that the false pretence was made to a definite person. (7)

It has been held, in England, that an indictment which does not aver to whom the alleged false pretence was made nor from whom the money was attempted to be obtained is bad. (8) But, see section 855, clauses (a) and (c), post, by which it is provided that no count shall be deemed objectionable or insufficient, on the ground that it does not contain the name of the person injured or intended or attempted to be injured, or on the ground that it charges an intent to defraud without naming or describing the person whom it was intended to defraud. The court, however, is empowered, by a proviso at the end of the same section, 855, to order the prosecutor to furnish particulars.

Section 863, post, renders it unnecessary to set out, in the indictment, the false pretences; but the Court may (under section 859, post), order the prosecutor to furnish a particular thereof.

The giving of a post-dated cheque implies no more than a promise to have sufficient funds in the bank on the date thereof, and is not, in itself, a false representation of a fact past or present. (9)

False representations amounting to mere promises or professions of intention, though they induce the defrauded party to part with the possession of his goods, are not false pretences under this section, as they are not representations of a matter of fact either present or past; and where a person is induced, by a false representation, to part with the possession of goods but does not part with his right of property therein (ex. gr. in a contract of hire of a chattel), there can be no conviction for obtaining the goods under false pretences. (10)

A person who is present when a false pretence is made by another person in conjunction with him, and who knows it to be false, and gets part of a sum of money obtained by such false pretence, is guilty of obtaining such sum of money by false pretences. (1)

The appellant with two others were jointly charged in five counts of an indictment with obtaining money by false pretences, and in the sixth count with conspiracy. The sixth count did not allege that there were any other or unknown parties to the conspiracy. The three defendants were arraigned together, all pleading "not guilty" to the first five counts; the appellant pleaded "guilty" to the sixth count (charging conspiracy), and the other two defendants pleaded "not guilty" to that count. A verdict of "not guilty" was returned in favor of the appellant on the five counts charging false pretences, and the trial of the other two defendants was proceeded with, and resulted in a verdict of "not guilty" on all the six counts. The appellant moved for leave to withdraw his plea of "guilty" to the sixth count, and to enter a plea of "not guilty;" and the court refused the application on the ground that the court had no power to grant it. On a case stated for the Court of Crown Cases Reserved, it was held that the conviction must be quashed inasmuch as the appellant's plea of "guilty" to the charge of conspiracy was inconsistent with the verdict of "not guilty" in favor of the other two defendants on that charge. Held, also, that the lower court had a discretion to allow the withdrawal of the appellant's plea of "guilty" and enter a plea of "not guilty," and that the omission to exercise that discretion was of itself a ground for quashing the conviction, as it deprived the appellant of the chance of being tried and possibly acquitted. (2)

An accused, who had one office in London and another at Middleburgh, in Holland, was the proprietor of a publication called Football Record, which announced each week that certain sums of money would be divided as prizes among those giving the correct results for certain football matches on a particular day, each competitor being required to send a sum of money as an entrance fee, along with a coupon, to the accused's office at Middleburgh. The accused was indicted for obtaining money by false pretences; and at the trial evidence was adduced by the prosecution that, in Football Record, announcements were made that certain competitors whose names and addresses were given had received prizes, as to whom it was proved that they were bogus competitors, and that no money had been received in respect of those prizes by any bona fide competitor. The accused called evidence to show that the insertion of bogus names as winners was part of a conspiracy of certain persons to defraud him. The trial judge charged the jury that the moment the prosecution had established that no money had been paid to persons alleged to have received prizes, the burden of proof was upon the accused to show that in fact he had paid money or to give a satisfactory explanation why it was not paid. Held, a misdirection and that the jury ought to have been told that the prosecution having adduced prima facie evidence from which the accused's guilt might have been presumed, and which therefore called for an explanation by the accused, the jury ought to consider the evidence on both sides, and if, upon a review of the whole of that evidence, they were satisfied that the accused was a party to what had been done they should convict him, but that if their minds were left in a state of doubt they ought to acquit him, as the burden of proving the accused's guilt was still upon the prosecution, and that, as it could not be known that if the jury had been properly directed, they would have thought the facts proved were inconsistent with the accused's innocence, the conviction must be quashed. (3)

An accused was convicted of obtaining money by false pretences. He had carried on a business of advertising in newspapers that persons could earn from two to ten shillings a day in their spare time. On receiving answers to his advertisements he sent out circulars explaining the conditions of the employment offered, and saying that each applicant must deposit two shillings before beginning the work. The employment offered to those making the deposit consisted in trying to induce people to buy stylographic pens, etc., to be supplied by the accused. After receiving applications, the accused sent a post-card to each applicant that if he was dissatisfied he need only write and say so and the deposit would be returned. Some people demanded back their deposits and received them, but the majority finding they had been tricked, did not apply at all. It was contended for the accused that, as he had offered to return the deposit to any one asking for it, there was no offence. Held, that there was ample evidence to support the conviction. (4)

406. Obtaining execution of valuable security by false pretence.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to three years' imprisonment who, with intent to defraud or injure any person by any false pretence, causes or induces any person to execute, make, accept, endorse or destroy the whole or any part of any valuable security, or to write, impress or affix any name or seal on any paper or parchment in order that it may afterwards be made or converted into or used or dealt with as a valuable security. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 360.

See section 2^{w}, ante, for definition of valuable security.

A was convicted on an indictment charging him with falsely pretending to B that he "was prepared to pay him £100," and thereby fraudulently inducing him to "make a certain valuable security, to wit, a promissory note, with intent thereby to defraud B." Held, that the indictment was good, as it must be taken by necessary inference to allege a false pretence by A, of an existing fact, viz.: that he was prepared to pay £100, and had it ready for him on his signing the note. (5)

407. Falsely pretending to enclose money, etc., in letter.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to three years' imprisonment who, wrongfully and with wilful falsehood, pretends or alleges that he inclosed and sent, or caused to be inclosed and sent, in any post letter any money, valuable security or chattel, which in fact he did not so inclose and send or cause to be inclosed and sent therein. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 361.

It is not necessary to allege in the indictment, nor to prove at the trial, that the act was done with intent to defraud. (Sec. 846, post).

Personation.

408. Personation with intent to obtain property.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to fourteen years' imprisonment, who, with intent fraudulently to obtain any property, personates any person, living or dead, or the administrator, wife, widow, next of kin or relation of any person. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 456.

For the definition of property, see section 2^{ss}, ante.

Upon an indictment, under the 2 and 3 Will. IV., c. 53, s. 41, for personating a soldier, it was held to be no defence that the prisoner was authorized by the soldier to personate him, or that the prisoner had bought, from the soldier personated, the prize money to which the latter was entitled. (6)

Upon an indictment, under the 28 and 29 Vic., c. 124, s. 8, for personating a seaman in order to obtain his wages, it was held that the offence was complete, although the wages had already been paid. (7)

409. Personation at examination.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence, and liable, on indictment or summary conviction, to one year's imprisonment, or to a fine of one hundred dollars, who falsely, with intent to gain some advantage for himself or

410. Personation of owners of stock, etc.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to fourteen years' imprisonment who falsely and deceitfully personates,—

(a) any owner of any share or interest of or in any stock, annuity or other public fund transferable in any book of account kept by the Government of Canada or of any province thereof, or by any bank for any such Government; or,

(b) any owner of any share or interest of or in debt of any public body, or of or in the debt or capital stock of any body corporate, company, or society; or,

(c) any owner of any dividend, coupon, certificate or money payable in respect of any such share or interest as aforesaid; or,

(d) any owner of any share or interest in any claim for a grant of land from the Crown, or for any scrip or other payment or allowance in lieu of such grant of land; or,

(e) any person duly authorized by any power of attorney to transfer any such share or interest, or to receive any dividend, coupon, certificate or money on behalf of the person entitled thereto;

and thereby transfers or endeavors to transfer any share or interest belonging to such owner, or thereby obtains or endeavors to obtain, as if he were the true and lawful owner or were the person so authorized by such power of attorney, any money due to any such owner or payable to the person so authorized, or any certificate, coupon or share warrant, grant of land, or scrip, or allowance in lieu thereof, or other document which, by any law in force, or any usage existing at the time, is deliverable to the owner of any such stock or fund, or to the person authorized by any such power of attorney. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 458.

411. Acknowledging any instrument in a false name.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to seven years' imprisonment who, without lawful authority or excuse, the proof of which shall lie on him, acknowledges, in the name of any other person before any court, judge or other person lawfully authorized in that behalf, any recognizance of bail, or any cognovit actionem, or consent for judgment, or judgment, or any deed or other instrument. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 459.

The Dominion Elections Act.

The Dominion Elections Act is chapter 6 of the Revised Statutes, 1906 (as amended by the 7-8 Ed. VII. c. 26), the principal provisions of which, with reference to the forgery, etc., of ballot papers, and with reference to personation and other offences at elections, are the following:—

Forgery of ballot papers and ballot box frauds, etc. Sec. 255 (as amended by the 7-8 Ed. VII., c. 26, s. 26), enacts that "Every one who—

(a) forges, counterfeits, fraudulently alters, defaces or fraudulently destroys a ballot paper, or the initials of the deputy returning officer signed thereon, or,

(b) without authority supplies a ballot paper to any person, or,

(c) fraudulently puts into a ballot box a paper other than the ballot paper which he is authorized by law to put in, or,

(d) fraudulently takes a ballot paper out of the polling station, or,

(e) without due authority destroys, takes, opens, or otherwise interferes with a ballot box or book or packet of ballot papers then in use for the purpose of the election, or,

(f) forges or counterfeits any legal or authorized stamp for the stamping of ballot papers, or uses any such stamp for any purpose other than the stamping of ballot papers, or not being a returning officer, has in his possession any such stamp or any counterfeit or imitation thereof, or,

(g) being a deputy returning officer, fraudulently puts, otherwise than as authorized by this Act, his initials on the back of any paper purporting to be or capable of being used as a ballot paper at an election, or,

(h) with fraudulent intent, prints any ballot paper or what purports to be or is capable of being used as a ballot paper at an election, or,

(i) being authorized by the returning officer to print the ballot papers for an election, with fraudulent intent prints more ballot papers than he is authorized to print, or,

(j) being a deputy returning officer places upon any ballot paper except as authorized by this Act any writing, number or mark, with intent that the voter to whom such ballot paper is to be or has been given may be identified thereby; or,

(k) manufactures, constructs, imports into Canada, has in possession, supplies to any election officer, or uses for the purposes of any election, or causes to be manufactured, constructed, imported into Canada, supplied to any election officer or used for the purposes of any election, any ballot box containing or including any compartment, appliance, device or mechanism by which a ballot paper may or could be secretly placed or stored therein, or, having been deposited during polling, may be secretly diverted, misplaced, affected or manipulated; or,

(l) attempts to commit any offence specified in this section, shall be disqualified from voting at any election for a term of eight years thereafter and guilty of an indictable offence and liable if he is a returning officer, election clerk, deputy returning officer, poll clerk, or other officer engaged in the election, to imprisonment, without the alternative of a fine, for a term not exceeding five years and not less than one year, with or without hard labor, and, if he is any other person, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding three years and not less than one year, with or without hard labor."

Secrecy of voting. Section 258 (as amended by 7-8 Ed. VII., c. 26, s. 27), contains special provisions for ensuring the secrecy of voting and for the punishment of any interference therewith.

No flags nor party badges to be used at elections. Section 260 makes it an offence (punishable, on indictment or summarily by fine not exceeding $100 or imprisonment not exceeding three months, or both, in the discretion of the Court), for any person to furnish any party flag, etc., or any ribbon or badge, with intent that the same shall be carried, or worn or used, on or for eight days prior to an election day, for distinguishing the bearers or wearers thereof as supporters of any candidate, or for any person, during such period, to carry, or wear or use any such party flag, etc., or any such ribbon or badge.

Bribery. Bribery is defined by section 265 (as amended by 7-8 Ed. VII., c. 26, s. 29), and it is thereby provided that a person who does any of the acts thereby defined as bribery shall be disqualified for eight years thereafter from voting at any election or holding any government office, and is guilty of the indictable offence of bribery and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months with or without hard labor; and shall also forfeit $200 and costs to any one who sues therefor.

See sections 266, et seq., of the Act as to other corrupt practices, etc., at elections.

Personation at elections. Section 272 enacts that "Every person is guilty of personation and liable to a penalty not exceeding two hundred dollars and not less than fifty dollars, and to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years and not less than three months, who, at an election,—

(a) applies for a ballot paper in the name of some other person, whether such name is that of a person living or dead, or of a fictitious person; or—

(b) having voted once at any such election, applies, at the same election for a ballot paper in his own name.

And by section 273, it is enacted that "Every person who aids, abets, counsels or procures the commission by any person of the offence of personation shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding two hundred dollars and not less than one hundred dollars, and to imprisonment for a term of two years and not less than three months."

Section 272 of the Dominion Elections Act, by expressly enacting that every person, who, at an election, applies for a ballot paper in the name of some other person, is guilty of personation,—follows the view taken by Judge Blackburn in the English case of R. v. Hague, cit. below.

See sections 274 and 275 of the Act, as to other offences of the same nature.

A prisoner was convicted of having, while acting as a deputy returning officer, put false ballot papers into the ballot box; and, upon a case reserved as to whether the prisoner was legally chargeable with the offence seeing that he was not legally appointed by reason of the fact that, although the commission for appointing him was signed by the returning officer and delivered to him, his name as appointee had been left in blank, it was held that, as the prisoner had acted as returning officer, he was such officer de facto, if not de jure, and that he was rightly convicted. (8)

Where a person who applied for a ballot paper in a name which was not his own nor the name by which he was generally known, but which name appeared on the voters' list, and had been inserted therein by the officials who prepared the list under the belief that it was the applicant's real name, he was held entitled to vote, and not guilty of personation. (9)

(8) R. v. Holman, 14 C. L. T., 376.

It has been held that, in an indictment for the offence of personating a voter, there should be an averment negativing the identity of the defendant with the voter alleged to have been personated. (10)

In a prosecution for personation of a voter, it was held unnecessary to state in the indictment or to prove at the trial that the officer presiding at the polling booth where the offence was committed, was duly appointed. (1)

A defendant was convicted by a Toronto police magistrate of an offence,—under section 167 of the Consolidated Municipal Act (55 Vic., c. 42),—of applying, at a municipal election, for a ballot paper in the name of some other person, and was sentenced to one month's imprisonment with hard labor. Upon a motion for the defendant's discharge, the question was raised as to whether the conviction was valid, in view of a subsequent provision (as to the same offence), contained in section 210 of the same Act, providing that every person who applies for a ballot paper in the name of some other person, shall be deemed to have committed the offence of personation and shall incur a penalty of $200, with imprisonment for sixty days in default of payment. Held, that the two provisions could not be read together or reconciled as providing cumulative punishments for the same offence, nor could they be allowed to stand as providing alternative punishments for the one offence at the option of the magistrate,—the very essence of the criminal law being that it should be certain and so plainly expressed as to be intelligible to the sense of ordinary people, and that the law which is later in date as well as later in position in the statute book must in case of inconsistency or repugnancy prevail against the earlier in time and place. Order made discharging the prisoner, as illegally held in custody. (2)

A prisoner was charged with having, on a Dominion Election day, presented himself at a polling station and applied for a ballot, stating that he was Mathew Leggatt, an elector on the list of voters for the district, and with having, on being required to be sworn, taken the book and falsely sworn that he was Mathew Leggatt and that he was an elector on the list of voters. The prisoner was convicted; but, as it did not appear that he was an elector, the questions were raised and reserved, as to whether the deputy returning officer was authorized to administer the oath to electors, only, whether, as the prisoner was not an elector, the deputy returning officer had authority to administer the oath to him, and, whether, therefore, the prisoner, although he had falsely sworn that he was an elector, could be legally convicted. Held,—affirming the conviction,—that the word "elector" applies to any person acting or representing himself as an elector. (3)

Where a defendant was convicted of inducing one James Fogle to personate a voter at an election of town councillors, it was held by the English Court of Appeal,—affirming the conviction,—that the offence of inducing another to personate a voter is complete upon the personator tendering the voting paper, although, on being asked if he is the person whose name is signed to the voting paper, he answers, "No," and the vote is accordingly rejected. In this case, Blackburn, J., said, "I take it that as soon as a man holds himself out to be the person entitled to vote, and does this in the name of another, he commits the offence; and, that it is utterly immaterial that he is stopped before he succeeds in his object. Upon his tendering his voting paper he has done sufficient to warrant the conclusion that he personated." (4)

PROCEDURE.—By section 284 of the Act, it is provided that, (except in cases of indictable offences and offences made punishable on summary conviction), all penalties and forfeitures imposed by the Act shall be recoverable or enforceable with full costs of suit by any person who sues therefor by action of debt or information, in any Court of competent jurisdiction in the province in which the cause of action arises, and that, in default of payment of the amount which the offender is condemned to pay within the period fixed by the Court, the offender shall be imprisoned for any term less than two years, unless such penalty and costs are sooner paid; but by section 285, it is provided that no action or information for the recovery of any such penalty or forfeiture shall be commenced unless the person suing therefor has given security to the amount of $50 for the defendant's costs of defence.

Section 301 of the Act provides that the provisions of Part XVI of the Criminal Code shall apply to all proceedings under the Act against any person or persons accused of personation.

By section 306 of the Act, it is enacted that no indictment for corrupt practices shall be tried before any Court of Quarter Sessions or General Sessions; and section 583 (j), post, of the new Criminal Code provides that no Court of general or quarter sessions has power to try any indictment for bribery or undue influence, personation or other corrupt practice under the Dominion Elections Act.

Section 307 of the Dominion Elections Act provides that every prosecution for an indictable offence under the Act, and every action, suit or proceeding for any pecuniary penalty given by the Act to the person suing therefor shall be commenced within one year next after the act committed and not afterwards (unless the prosecution is prevented by the withdrawal or absconding of the defendant out of the jurisdiction of the Court), and, when commenced, shall be proceeded with and carried on without wilful delay.

Notwithstanding section 71 (now sec. 161) of the Dominion Elections Act, a voter called a witness in a trial on an indictment charging a criminal offence may be required to state for whom he voted, the provision of section 71 (now section 161), applying only to election petitions or other legal proceedings questioning the election and not to a prosecution of a deputy-returning officer for fraudulently putting into a ballot box false ballot papers. The answer of a witness stating for whom he voted is not secondary evidence because the vote was by mark upon a paper upon which the candidates' names were printed and on which there was or should be nothing to identify the ballot as that marked by the voter; and such evidence is admissible without production of the ballots. (5)

CRIMINAL CODE (RESUMED).

Fraud and Fraudulent Dealing with Property.

412. Obtaining passage by false ticket.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to six months' imprisonment who, by means of any false ticket or order, or of any other ticket or order, fraudulently and unlawfully obtains or attempts to obtain any passage on any carriage, tramway or railway, or in any steam or other vessel. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 362.

413. Official destroying or falsifying book or valuable security.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to seven years' imprisonment who, being a director, manager, public officer or member of any body corporate or public company, with intent to defraud,—

(a) destroys, alters, mutilates or falsifies any book, paper, writing or valuable security belonging to the body corporate or public company, or,

(b) makes, or concurs in making, any false entry, or omits or concurs in omitting to enter any material particular, in any book of account or other document. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 364.

A collector of poor rates, whose duties included the keeping of the overseers' account book of receipts and payments, stated the account shewing a balance to be due from the overseers to the inhabitants of the district in which he was the collector for the overseers. This balance,—which was correct as to the difference between receipts and expenditure,—was stated by him as "balance in hand." But he was unable to produce the amount: Held, that the words "in hand" did not make the entry a false entry, the account being a correct record of receipts and expenditures, and that, therefore, the collector could not be convicted of falsification of accounts, even if he had misappropriated the amount of such balance in hand. (1)

414. False prospectus, statement, etc., by promoters, directors, etc.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to five years' imprisonment who, being a promoter, director, public officer or manager of any body corporate or public company, either existing or intended to be formed, makes, circulates, or publishes, or concurs in making, circulating or publishing any prospectus, statement or account which he knows to be false in any material particular, with intent to induce persons, whether ascertained or not, to become shareholders or partners, or with intent to deceive or defraud the members, shareholders or creditors, or any of them, whether ascertained or not, of such body corporate or public company, or with intent to induce any person to entrust or advance any property to such body corporate or public company, or to enter into any security for the benefit thereof. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 365.

It has been held, in England, that when a director, manager, or public officer of a body corporate or public company makes or publishes false statements of account knowing them to be false and intending them to be acted upon by those whom they reach, he is presumed in law to have done so with intent to defraud. (2)

In considering a charge made, under the above section 414, against the "president" of an incorporated company, of publishing a false statement, judicial notice will be taken of the statutes of the province under which the company was incorporated requiring the president to be chosen from the directors; and a warrant of commitment against the president as such is legal and sufficient without alleging that he was a director, proof being made of the manner of incorporation of the company. (3)

(1) R. v. Williams, 19 Cox, 239.
(2) R. v. Birt, 63 J. P., 328.

A charge against the president of an incorporated trading company of having made and published a statement of its affairs knowing the same to be false and with intent to defraud may be tried either in the province in which the statement was despatched by mail to the party to be defrauded or in the province in which it is received by mail at the address to which the defendant directed it; it being held that the offence, in such a case, commenced in the province where the letter containing the statement was mailed and is continued in the province to which it is sent, and under section 584 (b), post, is to be considered as completed in either jurisdiction; (4) and a magistrate of the district to which the letter is addressed, and in which it is received by the party to whom it is addressed, may take the information in such a case under section 653 (b), post, and compel the attendance of the accused by a warrant executed in the province from which the letter was despatched. (5)

Where it appeared that the alleged false statements were mailed from a place in the province of Ontario to the parties intended to be deceived, in Montreal, the offence thus commenced in Ontario is completed in the province of Quebec by the delivery in Montreal of the letter containing the statement to the parties to whom it was addressed, and in such a case the Courts of the province of Quebec have jurisdiction to try the accused when duly committed for trial by a magistrate of the district. (6)

A person who, in fact, manages the affairs of a limited company is a manager within the meaning of section 84 of the Imperial Larceny Act,—although he may not be appointed to the office under the Companies Act,—and he is therefore liable to be convicted of unlawfully making, circulating and publishing written statements false to his knowledge with intent to induce persons to become shareholders in the company. (7)

Company directors who issue an advertisement in Ontario inviting public subscriptions to shares of a company incorporated under the Ontario Companies Act, are liable to summary conviction thereunder if the advertisement does not include all the statutory requirements of a prospectus. (8)

415. Officer or clerk destroying or falsifying book or valuable security, or making or concurring in making any false entry in any book, etc.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to seven years' imprisonment who, being or acting in the capacity of an officer, clerk, or servant, with intent to defraud,—

(a) destroys, alters, mutilates or falsifies any book, paper writing, valuable security or document which belongs to or is in the possession of his employer, or has been received by him for or on behalf of his employer, or concurs in the same being done; or,

(b) makes, or concurs in making, any false entry in, or omits or alters, or concurs in omitting or altering, any material particular from or in, any such book, paper, writing, valuable security or document. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 366.

In an English case taken under the Imperial Falsification of Accounts Act, 1875, section 1, the accused was employed in Paris to receive money on account of his employers in London. It was his duty to pay money so received into a bank, to enter on slips an account of all such sums, and to send those slips to London. A cash account book was kept in London into which those slips were entered by one of the prisoner's employees. The accused received various sums of money which he kept, and intentionally omitted from the slips sent to London, knowing that entries omitted on the slips would likewise be omitted from the cash account book kept in London as, in fact, they were. Held, (Kennedy, J. and Channell, J., doubting), that the accused was properly convicted of omitting and concurring in omitting the entries in the cash account book in London, and that, as the offence was completed in London, where the slips were received, the English Court in London had jurisdiction to try the case. (9)

In another English case it was held that in order to support an indictment charging a servant with making false entries in an account it must be alleged in the indictment and proved that the account belongs to or was in the possession of the employer, and was received by the servant for or on account of his employer. (10)

In a charge of falsification of accounts, it is necessary to shew not merely false entries in the books or accounts, but that such false entries were made with intent to defraud; and the question of the intent with which such entries were made is for the jury. (1)

416. False statement or return by public officer.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to five years' imprisonment and to a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, who, being an officer, collector or receiver, entrusted with the receipt, custody or management of any part of the public revenues, knowingly furnishes any false statement or return of any sum of money collected by him or entrusted to his care, or of any balance of money in his hands or under his control. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 367.

The Bank Act.

The provisions of the new Bank Act, (R. S., 1906, c. 29), relating to returns and statements to be made by Banks, are sections 112, 113, 114, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 153, 154, 155, 156 and 157; which sections are to the following effect:—

Monthly Returns and Penalties for not Making Same.—"Monthly returns shall be made by the bank to the Minister, (2) in the form set forth in schedule D of this Act.

(9) R. v. Oliphant, [1905], 2 K. B., 67; 74 L. J., K. B., 591.
(10) R. v. Palin, 69 J. P., 423; 75 L. J., K. B., 15.
(1) R. v. Drewett, 69 J. P., 37.
(2) "Minister" means, according to the Interpretation section of the Bank Act, the Minister of Finance and Receiver-General. (See sec. 2, of the Bank Act).

2. Such returns shall be made up and sent in within the first fifteen days of each month, and shall exhibit the condition of the bank on the last juridical day of the month last preceding.

3. Such returns shall be signed by the chief accountant and by the president or vice-president, or the director then acting as president, and by the manager, cashier or other principal officer of the bank at its chief place of business." (Sec. 112 of the Bank Act).

(See chapter 7 of 7-8 Ed. VII., authorising banks to make certain additional issues of notes during the usual season of moving the crops and requiring them to make monthly returns of such additional notes.)

By section 147 of the Act it is provided that every bank which neglects to make up and send to the Minister, within the first fifteen days of any month any such monthly return shall incur a penalty of fifty dollars for each and every day after the expiration of such time, during which the bank neglects to make and send in such return.

SPECIAL RETURNS AND PENALTIES FOR NOT MAKING SAME.—"The Minister may also call for special returns from any bank, whenever, in his judgment, they are necessary to afford a full and comp'ete knowledge of its condition."

2. Such special returns shall be made and signed in the manner and by the persons specified in the last preceding section.

3. Such special returns shall be made and sent in within thirty days from the date of the demand therefor by the Minister: Provided that the Minister may extend the time for sending such special returns for such further period, not exceeding thirty days, as he thinks expedient." (Sec. 112 of the Bank Act). And, by sec. 148 of the Act, it is provided that every bank which neglects to make and send in any such special return within thirty days from the date of the demand therefor by the Minister, or, if such time is extended by the Minister, within such extended time, not exceeding thirty days as the Minister may allow, shall incur a penalty of five hundred dollars for each and every day such neglect continues.

ANNUAL RETURNS.—Section 114 requires the bank, within twenty days after the close of each year, to transmit or deliver to the Minister returns of all dividends remaining unpaid for more than five years, of all drafts or bills of exchange issued by the bank to any person and remaining unpaid for more than five years, and of the names and addresses of its shareholders and the number and value of their respective shares. And by sections 149, 150 and 151 of the Act, it is provided that every bank which neglects to transfer or deliver to the Minister, within the time aforesaid, any of such annual returns, shall incur a penalty of fifty dollars for each and every day during which such neglect continues.

Other Offences against the Bank Act.

MAKING A FALSE STATEMENT IN ANY RETURN, ETC.—Sec. 153 enacts that, "The making of any false or deceptive statement in any account, statement, return, report or other document respecting the affairs of the bank is an indictable offence punishable, unless a greater punishment is in any case by law prescribed therefor, by imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years;" and that "every president, vice-president, director, auditor, manager, cashier or other officer of the bank, who (a) prepares, signs, approves or concurs in any such account, statement, return, report or document containing such false or deceptive statement, or (b) uses the same with intent to deceive or mislead any person, shall be held to have wilfully made such false or deceptive statement and shall further be responsible for all damages sustained by any person in consequence thereof."

Where an indictment, under sections 85 and 99 of the old Bank Act, (sections 147 and 153 of the new Act), for making a wilfully false and deceptive statement in a return, alleged that the defendant unlawfully made and sent to the Minister of Finance and Receiver-General, a monthly report of and concerning the affairs of the Bank, and added, by way of paraphrase to characterize the term "monthly report," the words, "a wilful, false and deceptive statement of and concerning the affairs of the said Bank," and finally that such monthly report was made with intent to deceive and mislead, it was held that the ingredients of the offence were sufficiently set forth and the indictment was maintained,—it being sufficient, in indictments, to charge in substance the offence created by the statute and clerical errors or faulty grammatical construction not having the effect of vitiating the indictment. (3)

DIRECTOR REFUSING TO MAKE CALLS IN CASE OF SUSPENSION.—It is enacted by sec. 154 that—(a) If any suspension of payment in full, in specie or Dominion notes, of all or any of the notes or other liabilities of the bank continues for three months after the expiration of the time which under the provisions of the Act, would constitute the bank insolvent; and (b) if no proceedings are taken under any Act for the winding up of the bank; and (c) if any director of the bank refuses to make or enforce or to concur in the making or enforcing of any call on the shareholders of the bank, to any amount which the directors deem necessary to pay all the debts and liabilities of the bank; such director shall be guilty of an indictable offence, and liable—(a) to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years; and (b) personally for any damages suffered by any such default.

(3) R. v. Weir, 3 Can. Cr. Cas., 102; Que. Jud. R., 8 Q. B., 521.

OFFICERS GIVING UNDUE PREFERENCE TO ANY CREDITOR.—"Every person who, being the president, vice-president, director, manager, cashier or other officer of the bank, wilfully gives or concurs in giving to any creditor of the bank any fraudulent, undue or unfair preference over other creditors, by giving security to such creditor or by changing the nature of his claim, or otherwise howsoever, is guilty of an indictable offence, and liable—(a) to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, and (b) for all damages sustained by any person in consequence of such preference." (Sec. 155 of the Bank Act).

UNAUTHORIZED USE OF TITLE OF "BANK," ETC.—"Every person assuming or using the title of 'bank,' 'banking company,' 'banking house,' 'banking association,' or 'banking institution,' without being authorized so to do by this Act, or by some other Act in force in that behalf, is guilty of an offence against this Act." (Sec. 156 of the Bank Act).

PUNISHMENT OF OFFENCES AGAINST THE BANK ACT.—"Every person committing an offence declared to be an offence against this Act, shall be liable to a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years, or to both, in the discretion of the Court before which the conviction is had." (Sec. 157 of the Bank Act).

See sections 8-17 of the Bank Act, as to Incorporation and Organization of Banks.

It is a ground for a new trial of a charge, under the Bank Act, of wilfully making a false return, that evidence of other returns both before and after that in question was admitted and no instruction was given to the jury as to the limited purpose for which such evidence of other returns were admitted in evidence. To sustain a conviction against the president of a bank for wilfully making a false return to the government it must appear that the accused knew that he was sending a statement which misrepresented the bank's affairs, and not merely that he adopted and signed the return prepared by other officials and neglected to take any steps to verify the statements it contained. (4)

In a prosecution under the above quoted section 153 of the Bank Act against a local bank manager for signing a false statement in the government returns it must be made to appear that the accused knew that he was signing a statement which misrepresented the bank's affairs, and the signing of such statement is not a presumption juris et de jure of wilful intent or guilty knowledge. CRIMINAL CODE (RESUMED).

417. Defrauding creditors by disposing of property, or failing to keep books of account.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a fine of eight hundred dollars and to one year's imprisonment who,—

(a) with intent to defraud his creditors, or any of them, (6)

(i) makes, or causes to be made any gift, conveyance, assignment, sale, transfer or delivery of his property, or

(ii) removes, conceals or disposes of any of his property, or,

(b) with the intent that any one shall so defraud his creditors, or any one of them, receives any such property; or,

(c) being a trader and indebted to an amount exceeding one thousand dollars, is unable to pay his creditors in full and has not, for five years next before such inability, kept such books of account as, according to the usual course of any trade or business in which he may have been engaged, are necessary to exhibit or explain his transactions, unless he be able to account for his losses to the satisfaction of the court or judge and to show that the absence of such books was not intended to defraud his creditors. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 368; 4 E. VII., c. 7, s. 1.

418. Destroying or falsifying books to defraud creditors.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to ten years' imprisonment who, with intent to defraud his creditors or any of them, destroys, alters, mutilates or falsifies any of his books, papers, writings or securities, or makes, or is privy to the making of, any false or fraudulent entry in any book of account or other document. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 369.

On the trial of an indictment, under the English Debtors' Act, 1869, charging two persons, the one, a bankrupt, with disposing of goods with intent to defraud his creditors, and the other, the bankrupt's brother-in-law and manager, with aiding and abetting him therein,—the evidence shewing that, in August 1890, the bankrupt had transferred to the other prisoner his business and stock, (including goods purchased from his creditors and not paid for), and had, then, presented against himself a bankruptcy petition and was adjudged a bankrupt in October, 1890,—it was held that statements made by the bankrupt, at the time of obtaining the goods from his creditors, were admissible as evidence against both prisoners, although such statements were made in the absence of the other prisoner.

(6) See R. v. Rowlands, 51 L. J. (M. C.), 51; 8 Q. B. D., 530.

Held, also, that, whether the brother-in-law knew that the bankrupt had bought goods and had not paid for them was a question for the jury, and that the jury might infer from the relationship proved to have existed between the parties that the prisoner, who was charged with aiding and abetting, was, at the time of receiving the goods, aware of the fact that they had not been paid for by the bankrupt. (7)

C and D purchased, from L. & Sons, an engine and boiler at the price of $1840. Of this amount they paid $1000, in cash, and gave notes at 6 and 12 months for the balance. Before the delivery of the engine and boiler, C and D had agreed with L. & Sons to give the latter a bill of sale or chattel mortgage thereon as security for the payment of the notes; but they failed to give the security, and being pressed by their creditors, they made an assignment of their property, including the engine and boiler, to one S. as trustee for the benefit of their creditors. S being prosecuted and convicted under sub-section (b) of section 368 (now section 417), it was held that the reception of the property by him was not an offence under that section in the absence of proof of the original fraud. Held, also, that what was contemplated by the section was such an abstraction or doing away with property as would, if carried out, completely rob the creditors or any of them of any benefit whatever. (8)

A. finding that an insolvent has secreted a part of his property with intent to defraud his creditors, is not supported by evidence merely of a discrepancy between two financial statements made by him a few months apart, and the failure of the insolvent to account for the deficit in his affairs other than as being the result of an expenditure of capital in living expenses. (9)

It has been held that the disposal of property under the above section, 417, must be such as, if not interfered with, would deprive the debtor's creditors of any benefit whatever therefrom. (10)

419. Vender concealing deeds or encumbrances or falsifying pedigrees.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a fine, or two years' imprisonment, or to both, who, being a seller or mortgagor of land, or of any chattel, real or personal, or chose in action, or the solicitor or agent of any such seller or mortgagor (and having been served with a written demand of an abstract of title by or on behalf of the purchaser or mortgagee before the completion of the purchase or mortgage) conceals any settlement, deed, will or other instrument material to the title, or any encumbrance, from such purchaser or mortgagee, or falsifies any pedigree upon which the title depends, with intent to defraud and in order to induce such purchaser or mortgagee to accept the title offered or produced to him. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 370.

No prosecution for any offence under this section can be commenced without the leave of the Attorney-General. (See sec. 597, post.)

420. Fraudulent registration of land titles.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to three years' imprisonment who, acting either as principal or agent, in any proceeding to

422. Fraudulent hypothecation of real property.—Every one who pretends to hypothecate, mortgage, or otherwise charge any real property to which he knows he has no legal or equitable title is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to one year's imprisonment, and to a fine not exceeding one hundred dollars.

423. Fraudulent seizures, under execution, of land.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to one year's imprisonment who, in the province of Quebec, wilfully causes or procures to be seized and taken in execution any lands and tenements, or other real property, not being at the time of such seizure, to the knowledge of the person causing the same to be taken in execution, the bona fide property of the person or persons against whom, or whose estate, the execution is issued. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 374.

424. Unlawfully dealing with gold or silver.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment, who,—

(a) being the holder of any lease or license issued under the provisions of any Act relating to gold or silver mining, or by any persons owning land supposed to contain any gold or silver, by fraudulent device or contrivance defrauds or attempts to defraud His Majesty, or any person, of any gold, silver or money payable or reserved by such lease, or, with such intent as aforesaid, conceals or makes a false statement as to the amount of gold or silver procured by him; or,

(b) not being the owner or agent of the owner of mining claims then being worked, and not being thereunto authorized in writing by the proper officer in that behalf named in any Act relating to mines in force in the province in which the offence is alleged to have been committed, sells or purchases, except to or from such owner or authorized person, any rock, ore, mineral, stone, quartz, or other substance containing gold or silver or any unsmelted, or untreated or unmanufactured or partly smelted, partly treated or partly manufactured gold, or any gold or silver; or,

(c) purchases any rock, ore, mineral, stone, quartz, or other substance containing gold or silver, or any unsmelted or untreated, or unmanufactured, or partly smelted, partly treated, or partly manufactured gold or silver, except from such owner or authorized person, and does not, at the same time, execute in triplicate an instrument in writing, stating the place and time of purchase, and the quantity, quality and value of gold or silver so purchased, and the name or names of the person or persons from whom the same was purchased, and within ten days file the same with the clerk of the county or district court of the county or district in which the purchase was made, or with the officer with whom in the said county or district bills of sale or mortgages of personal property are filed or deposited.

(d) the two next preceding sub-sections (b) and (c) shall not extend or apply to the Yukon Territory. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 375. (As amended by the Criminal Code Amendment Act, 1909, 8-9 Ed. VII., c. 9, s. 2).

See sections 353 and 378, ante, as to concealments and thefts of gold, etc.

(b) knowingly and wilfully accepts, transmits or uses any such false receipt or acknowledgment or writing. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 376.

(b) knowingly and wilfully aids and assists in making such disposition for the purpose of deceiving, defrauding or injuring such consignee.

2. No person commits an offence under this section who, before making such disposition of such merchandise, pays or tenders to the consignee the full amount of any advance made thereon. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 377.

427. Fraudulent receipts under Bank Act; or fraudulently alienating property covered by receipt.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to three years' imprisonment who,—

(b) having given, or after any clerk or person in his employ has, to his knowledge, given, as having been received by him in any mill, warehouse, vessel, cove or other place any such receipt, certificate or acknowledgment for any such grain, timber or other goods or property, or having obtained any such receipt, certificate or acknowledgment, and after having endorsed or assigned it to any bank or person, afterwards, and without the consent of the holder or endorsee in writing or the production and delivery of the receipt, certificate or acknowledgment, wilfully alienates or parts with, or does not deliver to such holder or owner of such receipt, certificate or acknowledgment, the grain, timber, goods or other property therein mentioned. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 378.

428. Innocent partners.—If any offence mentioned in any of the three sections last preceding is committed by the doing of anything in the name of any firm, company or copartnership of persons, the person by whom such thing is actually done, or who connives at the doing thereof, is alone guilty of the offence. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 379.

2. Every such person who, by himself or his agent, purchases or receives any old marine stores into his shop, premises or place of deposit, except in the daytime between sunrise and sunset, is guilty of an offence and liable, on summary conviction, to a penalty of five dollars for the first offence and of seven dollars for every subsequent offence.

432. Marks to be used on public stores.—The marks specified in this section in that behalf may be applied in or on any public stores to denote His Majesty's property in such stores.

STORES.	MARKS.

2. It shall be lawful for any public department, and the contractors, officers and workmen of such department, to apply such marks, or any of them, in or on any such stores. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 384. (As amended by 6-7 Ed. VII., c. 7).

See sections 1 to 4 of the 38-39 Vic., c. 25, (Imp.)

See section 991, post, as to proof in cases relating to public stores.

Section 636, post, authorizes searches of persons suspected of being in possession of public stores, and searches of vessels, etc., in which stolen or unlawfully obtained stores are suspected to be; such searches to be made by any constable or peace officer deputed by a writing from any public department.

433. Unlawfully applying marks to public stores.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment, who, without lawful authority the proof of which shall lie on him, applies any of the said marks in or on any public stores. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 385.

434. Obliterating marks from public stores.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment, who, with intent to conceal His Majesty's property in any public stores, takes out, destroys or obliterates, wholly or in part, any of the said marks. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 386.

435. Unlawful possession, sale, etc., of public stores.—Every one who, without lawful authority the proof of which lies on him, receives, possesses, keeps, sells or delivers any public stores bearing any such mark as aforesaid, knowing them to bear such mark, is guilty of an offence punishable on indictment or on summary conviction, and liable, on conviction on indictment, to one year's imprisonment, and, if the value thereof does not exceed twenty-five dollars, on summary conviction before two justices, to a fine of one hundred dollars or to six months' imprisonment with or without hard labor. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 387.

For the definition of "having in possession," see section 5, ante.

436. Being in possession of public stores without being able to justify.—Every one, not being in His Majesty's service, or a dealer in marine stores or a dealer in old metals, in whose possession any public stores bearing any such mark are found who, when taken or summoned before two justices, does not satisfy such justices that he came lawfully by such stores, is guilty of an offence and liable, on summary conviction, to a fine of twenty-five dollars.

2. If any such person satisfies such justices that he came lawfully by the stores so found, the justices, in their discretion, as the evidence given or the circumstances of the case require, may summon before them every person through whose hands such stores appear to have passed.

3. Every one who has had possession thereof, who does not satisfy such justices that he came lawfully by the same, is liable, on summary conviction, of having had possession thereof, to a fine of twenty-five dollars, and in default of payment to three months' imprisonment with or without hard labor. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 388.

437. Searching for stores near His Majesty's vessels, wharfs or docks.—Every one who, without permission in writing from the Admiralty, or from some person authorized by the Admiralty in that behalf, creeps, sweeps, dredges, or otherwise searches for stores in the sea, or any tidal or inland water, within one hundred yards from any vessel belonging to His Majesty or in His Majesty's service, or from any mooring place or anchoring place appropriated to such vessels, or from any mooring belonging to His Majesty, or from any of His Majesty's wharfs or docks, or victualling or steam factory yards, is guilty of an offence and liable, on summary conviction before two justices, to a fine of twenty-five dollars, or to three months' imprisonment, with or without hard labor. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 389.

438. Receiving regimental necessaries, etc., from soldiers, militiamen or deserters.—Every one who,—

(a) buys, exchanges or detains, or otherwise receives from any soldier, militiaman or deserter any arms, clothing or furniture belonging to His Majesty, or any such articles belonging to any soldier, militiaman or deserter as are generally deemed regimental necessaries according to the custom of the army; or,

(b) causes the color of such clothing or articles to be changed; or,

(c) exchanges, buys, or receives from any soldier or militiaman, any provisions, without leave in writing from the officer commanding the regiment or detachment to which such soldier belongs;

is guilty of an offence punishable on indictment or on summary conviction, and liable on conviction on indictment to five years' imprisonment, and on summary conviction before two justices to a penalty not exceeding forty dollars, and not less than twenty dollars and costs, and in default of payment, to six months' imprisonment with or without hard labor. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 390.

See section 13 of the 38-39 Vic., c. 25, (Imp.), and note as to regimental necessaries at p. 1009, Arch. Cr. Pl. & Ev., 23rd Ed.

See 44-45 Vic., c. 58, (Imp.), and note at p. 1009, of Arch.

439. Receiving necessaries from seamen or marines.—Every one who buys, exchanges, or detains, or otherwise receives from any seaman or marine, upon any account whatsoever, or has in his possession any arms or clothing, or any articles, belonging to any seaman, marine or deserter, as are generally deemed necessaries according to the custom of the navy, is guilty of an offence punishable on indictment or on summary conviction and liable on conviction on indictment to five years' imprisonment, and on summary conviction before two justices to a penalty not exceeding one hundred and twenty dollars, and not less than twenty dollars and costs, and in default of payment to six months' imprisonment. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 391.

440. Receiving seaman's property, unless in ignorance, or on sale by authority.—Every one who detains, buys, exchanges, takes on pawn or receives, from any seaman or any person acting for a seaman, any seaman's property, or solicits or entices any seaman, or is employed by any seaman to sell, exchange or pawn any seaman's property, unless he acts in ignorance of the same being a seaman's property, or of the person with whom he deals being or acting for a seaman, or unless the same is sold by the order of the Admiralty or commander in chief, is guilty of an offence punishable on indictment or on summary conviction and liable on conviction on indictment to five years' imprisonment, and on summary conviction for a first offence to a penalty not exceeding one hundred dollars; and on summary conviction for a second offence, to the same penalty, or in the discretion of the justice, six months' imprisonment, with or without hard labor. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 392.

441. Not justifying possession of seaman's property.—Every one in whose possession any seaman's property is found who does not satisfy the justice before whom he is taken or summoned that he came by such property lawfully is liable, on summary conviction, to a fine of twenty-five dollars. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 393.

442. Cheating at play.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to three years' imprisonment who, with intent to defraud any person, cheats in playing at any game or in holding the stakes, or in betting on any event. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 395.

The Imperial Statute 8-9 Vic., c. 100, sec. 17, treats and punishes cheating at play as an obtaining by false pretences.

Where the offence is committed by two or more persons and there is any doubt whether the facts are such as to bring the case within this section, a count should be added charging a conspiracy to cheat or a conspiracy to defraud.

443. Pretending to use witchcraft.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to one year's imprisonment who pretends to exercise or use any kind of witchcraft, sorcery, enchantment or conjuration, or undertakes to tell fortunes, or pretends from his skill or knowledge in any occult or crafty science, to discover where or in what manner any goods or chattels supposed to have been stolen or lost may be found. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 396.

Opposite to a corresponding section of the English Draft Code, the Royal Commissioners have a marginal note referring to the Imperial Act, 9 Geo. II., c. 5, s. 4, as the basis of it.

Deception is an essential element of the offence of "undertaking to tell fortunes," under this section, and it has been held by the Court of Appeal for Ontario, that to uphold a conviction for that offence there must be evidence upon which it may be reasonably found that the accused was asserting or representing that he had the power to tell fortunes, with intent that his assertion or representation should be believed and with intent to delude and defraud others. (1)

So, that where the prediction of the future was expressly stipulated only to be a delineation made pursuant to rules laid down in published works on palmistry, etc., an acquittal was directed as the express contract negatived any intention to deceive. (2)

444. Conspiracy to defraud.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to seven years' imprisonment who conspires with any other person, by deceit or falsehood or other fraudulent means, to defraud the public or any person, ascertained or unascertained, or to affect the public market price of stocks, shares, merchandise, or anything else publicly sold, whether such deceit or falsehood or other fraudulent means would or would not amount to a false pretence as hereinbefore defined. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 394.

Def'y.

According to the general definitions of it, a conspiracy is an agreeing or combining, or confederating together, by two or more persons, to accomplish some unlawful purpose, or to accomplish a lawful purpose by some unlawful means. (3)

Bishop's definition is as follows:—"Conspiracy is the corrupt agreeing together of two or more persons to do, by concerted action, something unlawful either as a means or an end; (4) and he remarks, as to the gist of the offence,—namely, the combination,—that, in many circumstances, if two or more combine to do a wrong,—whether, as the means to something else, or, as the contemplated end,—such mere combining more endangers or disturbs the community than would the executed wrong accomplished by a single will. This is the central idea in the law of conspiracy."

not intention but agreement

A conspiracy consists not merely in the intention of two or more but in the agreement of two or more to do an unlawful act or to do a lawful act by unlawful means. So long as there is an intention only, it is not indictable. (5)

It is doubtless on account of the dangerous nature of the offence as affecting the community at large that the legislature has considered it expedient, in many instances, to deal more severely with a conspiracy to commit an offence than with the offence itself when committed independently of the conspiracy.

An act which may be done innocently by individuals separately may constitute the offence of conspiracy when done by several in concert. Thus, where the combination alleged was an agreement to incite farmers,—who had agreed to pay certain rents,—not to pay the rents which they had contracted to pay, but to break their contracts with their landlords and refuse to pay rents, it was held to be an indictable conspiracy. (6) civil

Conspiracy to defraud is indictable although the object was to commit a civil wrong, and although if carried out the act agreed upon would not constitute a crime in itself. (7)

Where one of two partners, during the continuance of the partnership, combined with a third party to enable the one partner to cheat the other, with regard to the division of the partnership property on a contemplated dissolution of the partnership, it was held that the combination was a conspiracy, although for one party to cheat another might be only a civil wrong and not a criminal offence at common law. (8)

Where a woman and her mother were indicted for conspiring together to get a quantity of jewellery and other goods from various traders by false pretences and fraud, — and it appeared that one of them obtained goods on credit in order to sell them to the other below the value, that other aiding as a referee and giving a character,—it was held that, though the acts complained of might not amount to a crime in an individual, yet that an indictment might lie for conspiracy when they were the result of an agreement between two or more persons. (9)

It is an offence, under the above section, 444, to conspire by any fraudulent means to defraud any person. Thus, if there was a conspiracy to permit persons to travel free on a railway, that would be a conspiracy to defraud the railway company. (10)

A conspiracy to defraud is indictable even though the conspirators are unsuccessful in carrying out the fraud; (1) the offence being complete when the agreement to do the wrong thing or to employ the wrong means is made. (2)

A servant who, in order to make a profit for himself, sells his master's goods at less than their proper market value, thereby defrauds his master of the difference between the value of the goods and the price at which he sells them. Where, therefore, a person was indicted for conspiring with a servant to cheat and defraud his master, and it was proved that such person had offered a bribe to the servant as an inducement to him to sell certain goods of his master at less than their value, it was held, that he might be convicted of such conspiracy. (3)

The following are examples of CONSPIRACIES TO DEFRAUD:—

A conspiracy to impose upon a man pretended wine as and for true and good Portugal wine in exchange for goods; (4)

A conspiracy by traders to dispose of their goods in contemplation of bankruptcy, with intent to defraud their creditors; (5)

A conspiracy by persons to cause themselves to be reputed men of property, in order to defraud tradesmen; (6)

A conspiracy to defraud by means of false representations of the solvency of a bank or other mercantile establishment; (7)

A conspiracy to defraud the public by issuing and negotiating bills in the name of a fictitious and pretended banking firm; (8*a*)

A conspiracy to defraud the public by means of a mock auction, that is, an auction with sham bidders, who pretend to be real bidders, for the purpose of selling goods at prices grossly above their worth; (9*a*)

A conspiracy by a female servant and a man whom she got to marry her, to impersonate her master in order to defraud her master's relations of a part of his property after his death; (10*a*)

A conspiracy to injure a man in his trade or profession; (1)

A conspiracy to shew by false and fraudulent representations that a horse bought by one of the defendants from the prosecutor was unsound, in order to induce him to accept less for it than the agreed price; (2)

A conspiracy by the promoters of a joint stock company to cheat and defraud, by means of false pretences, those who might buy shares in the company; (3)

A conspiracy to raise, by false rumors, the price of public funds. (4)

See sections 855 and 863, post, as to requisites of indictments.

An indictment charging a conspiracy "by divers false pretences and indirect means to cheat and defraud A of his monies," was held good. (5)

But an indictment charging a conspiracy to defraud the creditors of W. E. (not saying of what), was held too general. (6)

The conspiracy itself is the offence, that is to say, the offence is completed by the combination and agreement; (7) and, therefore, it is not necessary, although it is usual, to set out, in the indictment, the overt acts, that is, those acts which may have been done by any of the conspirators, in order to effect the common purpose of the conspiracy. (8)

If the parties conspire to obtain money by false pretences of existing facts, it seems to be no objection to the indictment for conspiracy that the money was to be obtained through the medium of a contract. (9)

A conspiracy must, from its nature, be by two persons, or more; one man alone cannot be tried and convicted of it, unless he be indicted for conspiring with other persons to the jurors unknown; (10) or unless he be charged with having conspired with others who have not appeared, (1*a*) or who are since dead. (2*a*) And, where two persons are indicted for conspiring together, and they are tried together, both must be convicted or both acquitted. (3*a*)

One conspirator may be indicted and convicted on an indictment charging him with conspiring with another or others to defraud, without joining the others, although living within the same jurisdiction. (4*a*)

Where A, B and C, were charged in an indictment for having conspired together and with divers other persons to the jurors unknown, etc., and the jury found that A had conspired with either B, or C, but they could not say which, and there was no evidence against any other persons than the three defendants, A was held entitled to an acquittal. (5*a*)

A count in an indictment charged eight defendants with one conspiracy to effect certain objects; and a finding that three of them were guilty generally, and that the other five were guilty of conspiracy to effect some of the objects, and not guilty as to the residue, was held bad and repug-

nant, the principle underlying the decision in that case being this, that where there are two or more persons charged with conspiracy in the same count, the count is a single and complete count, and cannot be separated into parts. (6)

With reference to the proof of a conspiracy, the commission of the offence is generally a matter of inference to be deduced from certain acts of the parties accused done in common between them in pursuance of an apparent criminal purpose. (7) General evidence of the nature of the conspiracy may be gone into before adducing evidence to connect the different defendants with it. (8)

It is not necessary to prove that the parties came together and actually agreed in terms to carry out their common design, but the jury may group the detached acts of the parties, and view them as indicating a concerted purpose on the part of all as proof of the alleged conspiracy; and there is no unvarying rule that the agreement or conspiracy must first be established before the particular acts of the individuals implicated are admissible in evidence. (9)

The acts and declarations of any of the conspirators in furtherance of the common design may be given in evidence against all of them. But before evidence of the acts of one conspirator can be given against the others, the existence of the conspiracy must be proved, and that the act in question was an act done in furtherance of the common design. (10)

A case of conspiracy may be tried where the agreement was entered into or where any overt act was done in pursuance of the common design. When there has been no act done in the execution of the design forming the subject matter of the conspiracy then the place of trial is single and must be where the offence is complete by the making of the agreement. But if the matter goes beyond agreement and passes into execution in other localities, then the conspiring mind manifests itself wherever an overt act is done and the offence is thereby extended and continued elsewhere. (11)

On the trial of a conspiracy, proof may be made of attempts to defraud other persons than those mentioned in the indictment. The production of a written agreement, although constituting one of the elements of proof of the conspiracy, will not prevent supplementary verbal proof of false representations before or after the agreement. FURTHER COMMENTS.—It is a conspiracy to defraud a railway company for an employee of the audit office of the railway to agree with train conductors to sell to them secret information as to the time of special audits of passenger tickets on their trains, which information it was the duty of the accused, as such employee, to keep secret. (3)

Upon a charge of conspiracy to defraud the Canadian Pacific Railway Co., by bribing clerks in the company's employ to illegally and fraudulently disclose information of the secret audits to be made on trains and to furnish such information to conductors to enable them to be prepared for audits when made and to be free at other times to retain fares and to allow passengers to ride free or for a reduced fare, the Court properly rejected evidence of conductors to the effect that if they knew the date of a proposed secret audit, they would communicate it to the conductor, whose train was to be audited, for a purpose other than that of defrauding the company. (4)

It is not error for the trial judge to permit proof of acts of the alleged conspirators to be given in evidence before the agreement to conspire had been established if the latter is in fact proved during the course of the trial. (5)

The defendants were indicted for unlawfully conspiring and agreeing together to deprive one W. G. of the necessaries of life, to wit, proper medical care and nursing, whereby his death was caused. Held, that this count did not charge the defendants with a conspiracy to commit any indictable offence known to the law and was properly quashed. A second count charged the defendants with having unlawfully conspired and agreed together to effect the cure of W. G. of a sickness endangering life, by unlawful and improper means, thereby causing his death. Held, that this count was equally bad and was properly quashed. (6)

An information laid in general terms charging that the accused did in specified years "conspire with others whose names are unknown by deceit, falsehood and other fraudulent means to defraud the public," sufficiently states an offence under section 394 (now section 444) of the Code to give jurisdiction to a magistrate to hold a preliminary enquiry. (7)

A combination by two or more persons to obtain by false representations from the Foreign Office in England a passport in the name of one person with intent that it should be used by another person is an act tending to bring about a public mischief and is therefore an indictable offence at the common law. (8)

It has been held that the offence of conspiracy to defraud under the above section 444 of the Code does not include a conspiracy to defeat a candidate's chances of election, by the employment of unlawful devices. The charge of conspiracy the particulars of which severally allege that the accused conspired to defraud a candidate at an election to the Saskatchewan Legislature, the electors of the division and the public, by illegally obtaining the return of the opposing candidate, does not disclose an offence under section 573, post (that is to say, a conspiracy to commit an indictable offence); for the acts alleged as the object of the conspiracy do not constitute an indictable offence either by statute or at common law (9). Held, further, that particulars furnished under section 859, post, have not the effect of amending or extending the scope of the original indictment or charge, and of including therein a separate and distinct offence; and the inclusion or addition, in a particular, of an offence separate and distinct from the offence of conspiracy to defraud contained in the indictment, will not authorize a conviction which would otherwise not be within the scope of the indictment itself. (9a)

On an information laid in the county of York, the accused were charged with numerous offences against the election law alleged to have been committed in the county of York and in the county of Middlesex. None of the accused resided nor were found nor apprehended in the county of York, but they were brought into that county solely by process under the information. At the trial the offence established, and on which the accused were convicted, was a conspiracy entered into and wholly carried out in the county of Middlesex with no overt acts outside that county. Held, on a case reserved, that there was no jurisdiction to try the accused in the county of York, and that the conviction should be quashed notwithstanding section 577, post. Robbery and Extortion.

445. Robbery defined.—Robbery is theft accompanied with violence or threats of violence to any person or property used to extort the property stolen, or to prevent or overcome resistance to its being stolen. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 397.

Robbery is a stealing from the person aggravated by circumstances either of actual force and violence or of threats of violence,—a threat of violence being looked upon by the law as constructive violence. (1)

If there be actual wounding or beating of the person robbed, it will be an aggravated robbery, punishable under section 446, infra; if not, it will be a robbery punishable under section 447, infra.

If the complete offence be not proved, the jury may, according to the actual facts, find a verdict of guilty of attempt, (see section 949, post), or of an assault with intent to rob, (see section 448, post), or of stealing from the person, (see section 379, ante), or of a common assault. Section 951, post).

446. Robbery with violence—Punishment.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for life and to be whipped, who,—

(a) robs any person and at the time of, or immediately before or immediately after, such robbery, wounds, beats, strikes, or uses any personal violence to, such person; or,

(b) being together with any other person or persons robs, or assaults with intent to rob, any person; or,

(c) being armed with an offensive weapon or instrument robs, or assaults with intent to rob, any person. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 398.

When robbery is committed in an open street, road or square, it is called highway robbery.

On an indictment for "robbery with violence and wounding," which does not expressly charge either common assault or assault occasioning bodily harm, a verdict of "guilty of assault as charged, but not guilty of robbery," is improperly recorded, and the result is a mistrial. The jury should have been directed to reconsider the case, with a view to finding definitely the character of the assault, and as to the wounding, and should have been instructed as to the different verdicts which they might find on the indictment. New trial granted. (1*a*)

447. Robbery—Punishment.—Every one who commits robbery is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to fourteen years' imprisonment. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 399.

448. Assault with intent to rob.—Every one who assaults any person with intent to rob him is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to three years' imprisonment. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 400.

The difference between robbery and stealing from the person is that the former is open and violent, while the latter may be and generally is done clandestinely. In robbery, force is a necessary ingredient; in simple stealing from the person, it is not. For instance, merely snatching property from a person, unawares, and running off with it, is not robbery. The rule appears to be well established that no such sudden taking or snatching is sufficient to constitute robbery, unless at the same time some injury be done to the person, or there be a previous struggle for the possession of the property, or some violence, or threats of violence, used to obtain it. (2)

Thus, where a boy was carrying a bundle along the street in his hand, after dark, and the prisoner ran past him, and snatched it suddenly away, it was holden that the act was not done with the degree of force and terror necessary to constitute robbery. (3) And the same was holden in a case where it appeared that, as two little boys were carrying a parcel of cloth to one of the inns at Bath, for the purpose of its being carried by a stage-coach to London, the prisoner came up suddenly, snatched the cloth from the hand of one of them, and ran off with it. (4) The same doctrine has been held in three other cases: in one of which the hat and wig of a gentleman were snatched from his head in the street; (5) in another, an umbrella was snatched suddenly out of the hand of a woman, as she was walking along the street; (6) and in a third, a watch was jerked, with considerable force, out of a watch-pocket. (7)

In this last case, A had caught hold of B's watch chain, and had jerked his watch from his pocket, with considerable force, after which a scuffle ensued, and A was secured. Garrow, B., held that, the force used in jerking and obtaining the watch did not make the offence amount to robbery, —but only stealing from the person,—and that, the subsequent scuffle, and the force then used, did not alter the original offence; for the violence necessary to constitute robbery must be either immediately before or at the time of the stealing, and not after it. The learned Judge said: "The mere act of taking being forcible will not make this offence highway robbery; to constitute the crime of highway robbery the force used must be either before or at the time of the taking, and must be of such a nature as to shew that it was intended to overpower the party robbed, and prevent his resisting, and not merely to get possession of the property stolen; thus, if a man, walking after a woman in the street, were by violence to pull her shawl from her shoulders, though he might use considerable violence, it would not, in my opinion, be highway robbery, because the violence was not for the purpose of overpowering the party robbed, but only to get possession of the property."

If, however, any injury be done to the person, or, if there be, by the person stolen from, any struggle to keep possession of the property, before it is taken from him, there will be a sufficient actual violence. Thus, in a case, where, while a lady was stepping into her carriage, the prisoner snatched at her diamond ear-ring, and separated it from her ear by tearing her ear entirely through; but there was no proof of the ear-ring ever having been seen in his hand, and upon the lady's arrival at home, it was found amongst the curls of her hair; the Judges, upon a case being submitted for their consideration, were all of opinion that it was robbery, although the prisoner must have only had the ear-ring in his possession for a moment, and could not retain but probably lost it, in the same instant. (8)

So, where the prisoner had torn some hair from a lady's head in snatching a heavy diamond pin from it, the pin having a corkscrew stalk, and being twisted very much in her hair, which was closely frizzed and strongly craped, it was held to be robbery. (9)

Where A laid hold of the seals and chain of B's watch and pulled the watch out of the fob, but the watch being secured by a steel chain which went round B's neck, A could not take it until, by pulling with two or three jerks, he broke the chain and then ran off with the watch, it was held by the Judges, upon a case reserved, that this was robbery, as A did not get the watch at once but had to overcome the resistance made by the steel chain, and used actual force for that purpose. (10)

Where it appeared that the prisoner had snatched at a sword while it was hanging at a gentleman's side, and that the latter perceiving him laid tight hold of the scabbard, upon which there ensued between them a struggle, in which the prisoner got possession of the sword, and took it away, the Court held that this was robbery. (1)

A ran against B, for the purpose of diverting his attention while he picked his pocket. Held, that the force used, was sufficient to make the stealing robbery, such force having been used with that intent. (2)

Even where the violence is used for a different purpose than that of obtaining the property of the person assaulted; yet, if property be obtained by it, the offence will, under some circumstances at least, amount to robbery; as where money was offered to a party endeavoring to commit a rape, and taken by him. Blackham assaulted a woman with intent to ravish her, and she, without any demand from him, offered him money to desist, which money he took and put into his pocket, but continued to treat the woman with violence, in order to effect his original purpose, until he was interrupted; and this was holden to be a robbery, on the ground that the woman, from the violence and terror occasioned by the prisoner's behavior, and to redeem her chastity, offered the money, which it was clear she would not have given voluntarily; and that the prisoner by taking it, derived an advantage to himself from his felonious conduct, though his original intent was to commit a rape. (3)

It is not necessary that the thing when taken should be actually on the owner's person. It will be sufficient if, by means of violence or threats of violence, it be taken in his presence. (4)

Therefore, if A, upon being assaulted by a thief, throws his purse or cloak into a bush, and the thief takes it up and carries it away; or if, while A is flying from the thief, he lets fall his hat, and the thief takes it up and carries it away, such taking being done in the presence of A, will be sufficient. (5) So, it has been said, that if a man's servant be robbed of his master's goods in the sight of his master, this shall be taken for a robbery of the master. (6) So, if the thief having first assaulted A, takes away his horse standing by him; or, having threatened and put him in fear, drives his cattle, in his presence, out of his pasture, he may be properly said to take such property from the person of A, for he takes it openly and before his face while under his immediate and personal care and protection. Where, on an indictment for robbery, it appeared that the prosecutor gave his bundle to his brother to carry for him, and, while they were going along the road, the prisoners assaulted the prosecutor, upon which his brother laid down the bundle in the road, and ran to his assistance, and one of the prisoners then ran away with the bundle; Vaughan, B., intimated an opinion that under these circumstances the indictment was not sustainable, as the bundle was in the possession of another person at the time when the assault was committed. Highway robbery was a felonious taking of the property of another by violence against his will, either from his person or in his presence; the bundle in this case was not in the prosecutor's possession. If these persons intended to take the bundle why did they assault the prosecutor, and not the person who had it? (8) The prisoners were convicted of simple larceny; but if, when the attack was commenced, the bundle had been in the prosecutor's own possession, and he, instead of his brother, had thrown it down, and the prisoners had picked it up, it would surely have been held to be robbery.

It is not necessary that after being taken the property should continue in the possession of the thief. Thus, where a robber took a purse of money from a gentleman, and returned it to him immediately, saying: "If you value your purse, you will please to take it back, and give me the contents of it;" but was apprehended and secured before the gentleman had time to give him the contents of the purse; the Court held that, there was sufficient taking to complete the offence, although the prisoner's possession continued only for an instant. (9)

If the property be once taken, the offence will not be purged by the robber delivering it back to the owner.

For instance, A requires B to deliver his purse, and he delivers it accordingly, when A, finding only two shillings in it, gives it to him again. This is a taking by robbery. (10)

The taking must be against the will of the person robbed, or, rather he must not be a voluntary party to the transaction; and, therefore, where the person from whom the property was taken concerted and connived at the robbery and got one of his confederates to procure two strangers to commit it, for the purpose of getting a reward upon the apprehension and conviction of the strangers, the Judges held that it was not a robbery, because the property was not taken against the party's will. (1)

The taking in robbery, as in all other cases of theft, must be animo furandi; and therefore if a person, under a bona fide impression that the property is his own, obtain it by threats, it is a trespass, and it may be an assault but not a robbery. Therefore, where A owed B money and B violently assaulted A and forced him by that means to then and there pay him the debt, it was held that there was no felonious intent and no robbery. (2)

Although it is clear that if a person by force or threats compel another to give him goods and by the pretence of payment oblige him to take less than the value, it is robbery, (3) it is doubtful whether it would be robbery for a man by force or threats, to compel another to give him goods which he has to sell, and in return gives him money amounting to the full value of the goods. (4)

So, that, where a traveller met a fisherman with fish, who refused to sell him any, and he by force and putting in fear took away some of his fish, and threw him money much above the value of it, judgment was respited, because of the doubt whether the intent were felonious on account of the money given. (5) The Fisherman's Case, 2 East, P. C., 661, 662.

Upon an indictment for robbing A of three wires and a pheasant, it appeared that B had set the wires in one of which the pheasant was caught, and A, a gamekeeper of the manor where the wires were set, took the wires and the pheasant into his possession. B came up soon afterwards and said to A, "Have you got my wires?" A replied that he had, and that he had also a pheasant that was caught in them. B then asked A to give him the pheasant and wires, which A refused to do; whereupon B lifted up a large stick and threatened to beat out A's brains, if he did not give them up. A, fearing personal violence, then gave them up. Vaughan, B., in putting the case to the jury, said: "If the prisoner demanded the wires under the honest impression that he had a right to them, though he might be liable for a trespass in setting them, it would not be a robbery. The game-keeper had a right to take them, and when so taken they never could have been recovered from him by the prisoner; yet, still, if the prisoner acted under the honest belief that the property in them continued in himself, I think it is not a robbery. If, however, he used it merely as a pretence, it would be robbery. The question for the jury is, whether the prisoner did honestly believe he had a property in the snares and pheasant or not. (6)

It seems that, where violence is used and the prosecutor forced to deliver his property under circumstances calculated to excite fear, the offence will not the less amount to robbery on account of the thief having had recourse to some colorable or specious pretence, in order the better to effect his purpose. For instance, if a man, with a sword drawn, asks alms of a person who gives them to him through mistrust and apprehension of violence, it is as much robbery as if he had demanded the money in the ordinary way. (7) And, where the defendant took goods from the prosecutrix of the value of eight shillings and by force and threats compelled her to take one shilling as a pretence of payment for them, it was held that this was robbery. (8)

One Hall, at the head of a riotous mob, stopped on the highway a cart laden with cheeses and insisted upon seizing them, for want of a permit. This was a mere pretence, no permit being necessary. After some altercation, Hall induced the owner, one Merriman, to go with him before a magistrate; and, while they were absent, the mob, by preconcerted arrangement with Hall, pillaged the cart. On an action against the Hundred, upon the statutes of hue and cry, it was objected that this was no robbery, because there was no force; but Hewitt, J., overruled the objection, and left the case to the jury who were of opinion that Hall's conduct in insisting upon seizing the cheeses for want of a permit was a mere pretence, so as to defraud Merriman, and they found that the offence was robbery. This finding was afterwards confirmed on a motion for new trial; the opinion that the case amounted to a robbery being based upon the consideration that the first seizure of the cart and goods by Hall, being by violence, and while the owner was present, constituted the offence one of robbery. (9)

In another case, the offence was held to be robbery, though the violence made use of was under the color and pretence of a legal proceeding. The prosecutrix was brought to a police office by the prisoner, into whose custody she had been delivered by a headborough, who had taken her up under a warrant, upon a charge of assault. The magistrate, having examined the complaint, ordered her to find bail; but, advised the parties to make the matter up. The magistrate then left the office, and the prisoner, who was an under-servant to the turnkey of the New Prison, Clerkenwell, but had no regular appointment either as a constable or other peace officer, nor had in particular any order to carry the prosecutrix to prison, took her to a public house, where her husband was waiting. When her husband found that the matter was not settled, he requested the prisoner to wait, while he went to procure bail, and immediately left the house. As soon as he was gone, the prisoner began to treat the prosecutrix very ill, locked her up in a stinking place, and then brought her out and threatened to carry her to prison. She was terrified, and implored him to wait till her husband returned; and offered to give him half-a-crown, if he would comply with her request; but he refused, and handcuffed her to a man whom he had in custody. The prisoner then kicked her, thus handcuffed before him; and shoved her and the man into a coach; and, upon the coach setting off, put a handkerchief to the mouth of the prosecutrix, and forcibly took from her a shilling. He then asked her if she had any more money, said that he was sorry for her children, and that if she had as much money as would pay for the coach, she should not go to prison. She said she had no more money; but the man who was handcuffed to her rattled the handcuffs against her pocket, and the prisoner put his hand into her pocket and took out three shillings. In about ten minutes after taking the three shillings, he stopped the coach at a public house, called for some gin, drank some himself and gave the coachman a glass. He gave in payment for the gin the shilling which he first took from her, and got six pence in change. As the prisoner had promised to carry her back, the prosecutrix made no complaint at the public house, but said, that if the prisoner would carry her back he might keep the other three shillings which he had taken from her. The prisoner, however, proceeded with her to the New Prison. He paid for the coach; but returned no part of the money to the prosecutrix. Nares, J., who tried the prisoner, said, that in order to commit the crime of robbery, a violence, though used under a colorable and specious pretence of law, or of doing justice, was sufficient, if the real intention was to rob; and he left the case to the jury, with a direction that if they thought the prisoner had originally, when he forced the prosecutrix into the coach, a felonious intent of taking her money, and that he made use of the violence of the handcuffs as a means to prevent her making resistance, and that he took the money with a felonious intent, they should find him guilty.

The jury found the prisoner guilty; and, upon the case being referred to twelve Judges, they were unanimously of opinion that the offence was a robbery. (10)

When the robbery is effected by means of threats, the threats will be sufficient, if they were such, or if the circumstances proved are such as to be calculated or likely to create a fear of some violence to the prosecutor's person or property, or an apprehension that it would be dangerous or unsafe for him to refuse to accede to the robber's demands, or useless to attempt to withhold the property which he is thus induced to part with. (1)

Where, therefore, on an indictment for robbery, it appeared that the prisoners and their companions hung around the prosecutor's person in the streets, so as to render all attempts at resistance hazardous, if not vain, and rifled him of his watch and money, but it did not appear that any force or menace was used, it was held that this was a robbery; for if several persons so surround another, as to take away the power of resistance, that is force. (2)

A stage coach having frequently been robbed on a particular road, J. N., on one occasion took a little money and a pistol in his pocket for the purpose of apprehending the highway robber; and went into the coach as a passenger. The highwayman, as usual, met the coach, presented a pistol and demanded money of the passengers; J. N. delivered up his money, but, immediately afterwards, jumped out of the coach, and, with the assistance of others, secured the robber. Held to be robbery. (3)

As we have already seen, the violence or threats of violence should be before or at the time of the thing being taken, and therefore, if a man privately steal money from the person of another, and afterwards keep it by threats of violence, it will be no robbery, but stealing from the person. For instance, where a thief clandestinely stole a purse, and, on its being discovered in his possession, threatened vengeance against the party if he should dare to speak of it, and then rode away, it was held to be simple theft only, and not robbery, as the words of menace were used after the taking of the purse. (4)

There may, however, be cases of robbery in which the property is not obtained immediately upon the threat being made; but, in these cases, although there is not an immediate taking, in fact, there may be a taking, in law, sufficient to constitute a robbery. (5) It has been held, for instance, that, if thieves attack a man to rob him, and finding little or nothing about him, force him, by menace of death, to swear to fetch them money, which he does accordingly, and delivers it to them while the fear of the menace still continues upon him, and they receive it, this is a sufficient taking in law. (6) And if, upon A assaulting B, and bidding him to deliver his purse, B refuse to do so, and then A pray B to give or lend him money, and B does so accordingly, under the influence of fear, the taking by robbery will be complete. (7) For, where the thief receives money, etc., by the delivery of the party, either while the party is under the terror of an actual assault, or afterwards while the fear of the menaces made use of by the thief continues upon him, such thief may, in the eye of the law, as correctly be said to take the property from the party, as if he had actually taken it out of his pocket. (8)

To obtain money by a mere threat to take a person before the police Court for not taking and paying for goods pretended to be sold to her at a mock auction has been held not to amount to robbery. For instance, where the prisoners got the prosecutrix into a house, under pretext of an auction being carried on there, forced her to bid for a lot of articles which was immediately knocked down to her, and then, upon her not producing the money to pay for it, threatened to have her taken to Bow Street and thence to Newgate to be imprisoned till she should raise the money; and then a pretended policeman was introduced, who said to her "Unless you give me a shilling you must go with me;" upon which she gave him a shilling so as to obtain her liberty and avoid being carried to prison, and not out of fear of any other personal violence, the judges, after discussing the circumstances, were of opinion that they were not sufficient to constitute robbery,—the threat to take the prosecutrix to Bow Street and thence to Newgate being only a threat to put her into the hands of the law, which she ought to have known would have taken her under its protection and set her free, as she had done no wrong; and, therefore, that the terror arising from such a threat was not sufficient to induce a person to part with property so as to amount to robbery. (9)

A similar state of facts would, no doubt, be sufficient to sustain an indictment for conspiracy to defraud, or an indictment under section 452, post, for demanding with menaces, with intent to steal.

Where the defendant decoyed the prosecutor into a house and chained him to a seat and there compelled him to write orders for the payment of money and delivery of deeds, the paper on which he wrote remaining in his hands half an hour but he being chained all the time, it was held (before the 24 and 25 Vict., c. 96, s. 48), that it was not an assault with intent to rob. (10)

Such cases as this are now covered by the Imperial Statute; and they come under our section 450, post.

It seems that the fear of violence to the person of a child of the party from whom property is demanded will fall within the same consideration as if the fear were of violence to the party himself; and so, where the case was put of a man taking another's child and threatening to destroy it unless the other would give him money, Hotham, B., said he had no doubt that this would be robbery. (1) And Eyre, C.J., expressed the same opinion in the course of his remarks in Reane's case cited below.

A man named Reane was indicted for highway robbery, and one Watkins was charged with him as an accessory before the fact. Reane met the prosecutor, to whom he was an entire stranger, and asked him for money, and, being refused, he went away muttering angry expressions. Next day, he again met the prosecutor and repeated his request, and, on being again refused, he said, "You shall be the worse for it." Later on, he again accosted the prosecutor and told him he had taken indecent liberties with him in the park, and this could be proved by a third party who had been present. The prosecutor with a violent exclamation, asked him what he meant; to which he made no reply, but walked away. On the next day, the prosecutor received a letter containing similar charges; and, having consulted with a friend, he made an appointment with and met Reane, who said, that if the prosecutor did not give him money he could prove his indecencies, as a third person had seen it; upon which the other prisoner, Watkins, said; "Yes, I saw you." The prosecutor exclaimed, that it was a horrid abominable falsity.

On the following morning, Reane met the prosecutor, and told him he must have twenty pounds in cash, and a bond for fifty pounds a year; upon which the prosecutor, in pursuance of a plan previously concerted with his friend, told Reane that if he would wait a few days he would bring him the money and the bond. The prosecutor afterwards gave the bond together with nineteen guineas to Reane, who carried both bond and money away with him, saying he would give the prosecutor no further trouble. It was objected for the prisoners that this proof was defective; as, in order to constitute robbery there must be a violence, or a fear of danger, as to the person or character, existing when the property is parted with; but the case was left to the jury, who found the prisoners guilty; upon which the opinion of the twelve Judges was taken, and they held that the conviction was wrong as there was no violence,—either actual or constructive,—at the time the prosecutor parted with the money. (2)

Cases of this kind, however, are covered by section 453, post.

The cases in which the offence of robbery has been committed by threats or fear of injury to the property of the party are principally those in which the fear excited was of the probable outrages of a mob.

A, the ringleader in some riots amongst the tinners of Cornwall, went with about seventy others to the house of B, and said they would have from him the same as they had got from his neighbors, namely a guinea, or they would tear his mow of corn and level his house. B gave them a crown to appease them, when A swore that he would have five shillings more, which B, being terrified, gave him. They then opened a cask of cider by force, drank part of it, and ate B's bread and cheese; and A carried away a piece. This was held to be robbery. (3)

If a mob go to a person's house, and civilly ask and advise him to give them something, if this be not done bona fide, but as a mere mode of robbing him, the offence is robbery; and evidence of demands of money, made by the same mob on the same day, at other houses, is admissible, to shew that this was not done bona fide. (4)

In Spencer's case, corn was taken from the prosecutor by the prisoner and a mob who accompanied him, compelling the prosecutor to sell it under its value, by a threat that if he would not sell it at the sum offered, it should be taken away. The prosecutor had corn belonging to other persons in his possession when the prisoner came with a great mob marching in military order. One of the mob said, that if he would not sell they were going to take it away; and the prisoner said that they would give thirty shillings a load, and if he would not take that, they would take the corn away; upon which the prosecutor sold for thirty shillings, corn which was worth thirty-eight shillings. This was ruled to be robbery, and the prisoner was convicted, and executed. (5)

In a case arising out of the London riots in 1780 the prosecutor swore at the trial that the prisoner and another man entered into his dwelling-house; and, upon being asked by him what they wanted, the prisoner, having a drawn sword in his hand, said with an oath, "Put one shilling into my hat, or I have a party that can destroy your house presently;" upon which he gave him a shilling. It was also sworn by another witness, that the prisoner also said, that if the prosecutor "would keep the blood within his mouth, he must give the shilling." This offence was also holden to be robbery. (6)

In another case against the London rioters of 1780, it appeared that a boy with a cockade in his hat knocked violently at the prosecutor's door, who thereupon opened it, when the boy said to him, "God bless your honor, remember the poor mob." The prosecutor told him to go along; on which he said, "Then I will go and fetch my captain," and went away; soon afterwards the mob, armed with sticks and other things, came, headed by the prisoner, who was on horseback, and whose horse was led by the same boy. On their coming up, the boy said, "Now, I have brought my captain;" and some of the mob said, "God bless this gentleman, he is always generous." The prosecutor then said to the prisoner, "How much?" to which the prisoner answered, "Half-a-crown, sir;" upon which the prosecutor gave the prisoner half-a-crown. The mob then gave three cheers, and went to the next house. This was holden to be robbery. (7)

During some riots in Birmingham, A threatened B, that, unless he would give him a certain sum of money he should return with the mob and destroy his house. B, under the impression of this threat, gave A the money. Held, by the judges to be robbery. (8)

449. Stopping the mail with intent to rob.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for life, or for any term not less than five years, who stops a mail with intent to rob or search the same. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 401.

A "mail" includes every conveyance by which post letters are carried, whether by land or water. (Sec. 2*f* of the Post Office Act, R. S., 1906, c. 66.)

The property in any mailable matter may be laid in the Postmaster-General. (See section 869, post.)

As to receiving stolen post letters, etc., see section 400, ante, and as to stealing post letter bags, post letters and other mailable matter, etc., see sections 364, 365 and 366.

450. Fraudulently compelling execution of document.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for life who, with intent to defraud or injure, by lawful violence to, or restraint of the person of another, or by the threat that either the offender or any other person will employ such violence or restraint, unlawfully compels any person to execute, make, accept, endorse, alter or destroy the whole or any part of any valuable security, or to write, impress or affix any name or seal upon any paper or parchment, in order that it may be afterwards made or converted into or used or dealt with as a valuable security. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 402.

The provision contained in this section meets such cases as the Phipoe case, in which it was held that, where one person compelled another, by threats, to sign a promissory note, it was no robbery, the note being of no value to the party signing it. (9)

Under section 42 of the Imperial Act 24-25 Vic., c. 96, (which is to the same effect as the above section 450 of our Code), the defendants were indicted for having, by threats of violence and restraint, induced the prosecutor to write and sign the following document:—

"London, July 19th, 1875.

"I hereby agree to pay you £100 sterling on the 27th inst. to prevent any action against me."

Held, that the document was a valuable security. (10)

See sections 453, 454, post, as to extortion by threats.

451. Letters demanding property, with menaces.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to fourteen years' imprisonment who sends, delivers or utters, or directly or indirectly causes to be received, knowing the contents thereof, any letter or writing demanding of any person with menaces, and without any reasonable or probable cause, any property, chattel, money, valuable security or other valuable thing. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 403.

See section 2, sub-sections 40 and 42, ante, for definitions of "valuable security" and "writing."

Section 451 is to the same effect as the Imperial Statute, 24-25 Vic., c. 96, section 44.

The expression "menaces" in section 44 of the Imperial Statute above mentioned is not limited to menaces or threats of violence and injury to person and to property and of accusations of the crimes set out in section 46 of the Imperial Act, (see p. 514, post), but includes menaces or threats of a danger by an accusation of misconduct though of misconduct not amounting to a crime. (1)

Under this section it will be sufficient evidence of the sending or causing to be received to prove that the defendant placed the letter in a place where he knew the prosecutor would come, and that it thus reached him, or that it was there picked up by another person and by him delivered to the prosecutor; (2) or that the letter is in the defendant's handwriting and came to the prosecutor through the post. (3)

Where the prosecutor, having received such a letter, traced it to a woman who was in the habit of going errands for prisoners in Newgate, and she proved that she received it from the defendant, then a prisoner in Newgate, with instructions to post it, and the post office employee proved that the letter in question was brought to the office by the woman, and forwarded in the regular course, the evidence was held sufficient not only of the sending by the defendant but also that he knew its contents. (4) Sending a letter to A, in order that he may deliver it to B, is a sending to B, if the letter is delivered by A to B. (5) And the leaving of a letter, directed to A, near A's house, with the intention that it should not only reach A but B also, was held to be a sending of it to B, by whom it was afterwards seen. (6)

Where the letter contained a request only, but intimated that if it were not complied with, the writer would publish a certain libel then in his possession accusing the prosecutor of murder, it was held to amount to a demand. (7)

The demand must be with menaces and without reasonable or probable cause, and it will be for the jury to consider whether the letter does expressly or impliedly contain a demand of this description. The words "without any reasonable or probable cause" apply to the demand for money, and not to the threatened accusation to be made against the prosecutor; and, therefore, it is immaterial in point of law whether the threatened accusation be true or not. (8)

An anonymous letter intimating that some persons had conspired to burn or otherwise destroy the prosecutor's property, and offering to make a disclosure, if £30 were placed for the writer in a certain spot, was held not to be within the 7 and 8 Geo. 4, c. 29, s. 8, as it did not contain any menace, although its contents might create some apprehension in the owner's mind. (9)

In a later case, it was, however, decided that a very similar letter was a letter demanding money with menaces, within the same statute of Geo. 4; the letter being one written to a banker, stating that it was intended by a cracksman to burn his books, and cause the bank to stop, and that if £250 were put in a certain place, the writer of the letter would prevent the mischief, but if the money were not put there it would happen. (10)

It is as much incumbent upon the prosecution to prove that the demand was made without reasonable or probable cause as that it was made with menaces; both of which questions are questions of fact; and, if the judge's charge is so ambiguous that the jury may have been misled into thinking that a material issue of fact was withdrawn from their consideration as being a matter of law, then, in case of a conviction, a new trial should be ordered. (1)

As to extortion by threatening to publish a libel, see section 332, ante.

452. Demanding with intent to steal.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who, with menaces, demands from any person, either for himself or for any other person, anything capable of being stolen with intent to steal it. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 404.

This section is to the same effect as section 45 of 24 and 25 Vic., c. 96.

(4) R. v. Girdwood, 2 East, P. C., 1120; 1 Leach, 142.
(5) R. v. Paddle, R. & R., 484.

(1) R. v. Collins, 33 N. B. R., 429; 1 Can. Cr. Cas., 48.

In order to bring a case within this section, the demand must be such as would, if successful, amount to stealing; and the menace contemplated by the section must be of such a nature as to unsettle the mind of the person upon whom it operates, and to take away from his acts that element of voluntary action which alone constitutes consent. It must, therefore, be left to the jury to say whether the conduct of the prisoner is such as to have had that effect on the prosecutor. (2)

The gist of the offence is the demand itself accompanied by menaces and an intent to steal; and, therefore, if such a demand is successful it amounts to an actual theft.

Where a policeman, professing to act under legal authority, threatened, that, unless money were given to him he would imprison a person on a charge not amounting to an offence in law, and the person believing him gave him money, it was held that he might be indicted under the Imperial Statute 24 and 25 Vic., c. 96, s. 45; although he might also have been indicted for stealing the money. (3)

As menaces are of two kinds, — by words or by gestures, — it seems that it is not necessary to prove an express demand in words, but that if the words or gestures of the defendant at the time were plainly indicative of what he required and tantamount in fact to a demand, though not in actual words, it would seem to be sufficient proof of the allegation, in the indictment, of a demand. (4)

The question whether the demand was made without reasonable or probable cause is one of fact. (5) And where any doubt exists on the point, the prosecution is called upon to give some evidence of the want of reasonable or probable cause. (6)

A prisoner was convicted, under the above section, 452, of having demanded money of the prosecutor with menaces, with intent to steal the same; and a case was reserved on the question of whether the evidence was sufficient to establish the charge. The prisoner had demanded $75 from the prosecutor under threat of having him prosecuted for an infraction of the Liquor License Act. Held, that any menace or threat, — coming within the sense of the word "menace" in its ordinary meaning,— proved to have been made with intent to steal the thing demanded would bring the case within this section, and that it need not be of a character to excite alarm, but that it would be sufficient if it were such as would be likely to affect any man in a sound and healthy state of mind, and that the question of whether there was the intention to steal the money demanded is one of fact and not of law. And held further, that, a threat of prosecution made to a licensee who, to the knowledge of the prisoner, had been previously convicted of an offence under the Liquor License Laws, and, who was, therefore, liable to a cancellation of his license, etc., is a threat likely to affect a man in a sound and healthy state of mind. (7)

A defendant was convicted by a magistrate of an offence against the above section, 452, upon the following evidence: The defendant, as agent for others, went to the complainant's abode to collect a debt from him. The defendant threatened the complainant that if the latter did not pay the debt he would have him arrested, and he demanded of the complainant certain goods, a portion of which had been sold to the complainant by the defendant's principals, and on account of which the debt had accrued, but upon which they had no lien or charge. The complainant,—as he swore,— being frightened by the defendant's threats, acquiesced in the latter's demand for the goods which the defendant took away. The defendant swore that he took the goods as security for the debt he was seeking to collect. Held, that there was no evidence of intent to steal; and the conviction was quashed. (8)

A demand, with menaces, of money actually due, is not a demand with intent to steal. A prisoner, who owned a house, having gone away and deserted his family, his wife let the house to the prosecutor. The prisoner afterwards returned and demanded the rent from the prosecutor, who refused to pay him, but paid it to the prisoner's wife. The prisoner, having again demanded the rent and being again refused by the prosecutor, he told the latter that, if he did not give him the money, he would blow out his brains and burn up everything in the place. The prisoner was convicted; but, on appeal, the conviction was set aside, Robinson, C.J., saying,—"The prisoner had the law on his side in insisting on the money being paid to him; and, whether he had or not, if he demanded the money under that impression, he was not committing the offence charged against him. He used violent threats; but, if he had induced the prosecutor to pay him the rent he claimed, he never could have been held to have stolen that money from him; and, therefore, his demanding it with threats, under such circumstances, cannot be held to have been a demand with intent to steal. (9)

453. Extortion by threats to accuse of a capital or infamous crime.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to fourteen years' imprisonment who, with intent to extort or gain anything from any person,—

(a) accuses or threatens to accuse either that person or any other person, whether the person accused or threatened with accusation is guilty or not, of

(i) any offence punishable by law with death or imprisonment for seven years or more,

(ii) any assault with intent to commit a rape, or any attempt or endeavor to commit a rape, or any indecent assault,

(iii) carnally knowing or attempting to know any child so as to be punishable under this Act,

(iv) any infamous offence, that is to say, buggery, an attempt or assault with intent to commit buggery, or any unnatural practice, or incest,

(v) counselling or procuring any person to commit any such infamous offence; or,

(b) threatens that any person shall be so accused by any other person; or,

(c) causes any person to receive a document containing such accusation or threat, knowing the contents thereof;

(8) R. v. Lyon, 18 C. L. T., 289; 29 O. R., 497; 2 Can. Cr. Cas., 242.

or who by any of the means aforesaid compels or attempts to compel any person to execute, make, accept, endorse, alter or destroy the whole or any part of any valuable security, or to write, impress or affix any name or seal upon or to any paper or parchment, in order that it may be afterwards made or converted into or used or dealt with as a valuable security. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 405.

The provisions of the Imperial Law on these subjects, are contained in sections 46 and 47 of 24 and 25 Vic., c. 96, which are as follows:—

"Whosoever shall send, deliver or utter, or directly or indirectly cause to be received, knowing the contents thereof, any letter or writing, accusing or threatening to accuse any other person of any crime punishable by law with death, or penal servitude for not less than seven years, or of any assault with intent to commit any rape, or of any attempt or endeavor to commit any rape, or of any infamous crime as hereinafter defined, with a view or intent, in any of such cases, to extort or gain, by means of such letter or writing, any property, chattel, money, valuable security or other valuable thing from any person, is guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable at the discretion of the court, to be kept in penal servitude for life, or to be imprisoned [etc.]; and the abominable crime of buggery, committed either with mankind or with beast, and every assault with intent to commit the said abominable crime, and every attempt or endeavor to commit the said abominable crime, and every solicitation, persuasion, promise or threat offered or made to any person whereby to move or induce such person to commit or permit the said abominable crime, shall be deemed to be an infamous crime within the meaning of this Act." (Section 46.)

"Whosoever shall accuse, or threaten to accuse, either the person to whom such accusation or threat shall be made or any other person, of any of the infamous or other crimes lastly hereinbefore mentioned, with the view or intent, in any of the cases last aforesaid, to extort or gain from such person so accused or threatened to be accused, or from any other person, any property, chattel, money, valuable security or other valuable thing, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable to be kept in penal servitude for life; [etc.] (Section 47.)

It will be seen that, under the provisions of the above section, 453, the accusation or threat to accuse may be either verbal or in the shape of a document; and that under the English sections the accusation or threat may be either verbal or in the shape of a letter or writing; and, as both refer, in effect, to the same offences, there is very little difference between the English sections and our own law as contained in section 453. But section 454, post, extends the above provisions so as to cover accusations or threats to accuse of any other offence.

The word "accuses" in this section, 453, includes accusing by the laying of an information and complaint before a magistrate under section 654, post. So, that, where the prisoners were convicted of having, with intent to extort, unlawfully accused the prosecutor of rape (by laying an information against him, therefor, and causing him to be arrested and brought before a justice of the peace thereon, and of having, while he was under arrest, taken from him two promissory notes and then called in the justices of the peace, who, on the prisoners (then prosecutors) saying they had no witnesses, dismissed the charge), it was held, on a reserved case, that the conviction for extortion of the notes was right. (10)

It is not necessary, however, that the threat should be a threat to accuse before a judicial tribunal; but that a threat to make the accusation before a third party is sufficient. (1) So, that, if A, with intent to extort money from B, were to threaten to accuse him, before his wife, of having committed an infamous offence, it seems that this would make A liable under the above section, 453.

The section expressly states that it shall be immaterial whether the accusation be true or not; and, therefore, it would be no defence that the prosecutor was guilty of the offence of which he was accused or threatened to be accused; (2) for the gist of the crime is the accusing or threatening to accuse with intent to extort or gain anything.

The prosecutor's guilt or innocence of the crime imputed to him may, however, be material where the question arises as to whether, under the circumstances, the prisoner had an intention to extort money. (3)

If the prisoner's intent do not appear from the accusation or threat itself, it may be proved by circumstances from which the jury may fairly presume it; as by subsequent expressions of the defendant. (4)

Proof that the prisoner went to the prosecutor, and threatened to accuse his son of an unnatural offence with a mare unless the prosecutor would buy the mare for £3, was held to sustain an indictment for threatening to accuse of an abominable crime, with intent thereby to extort money. (5)

Where, on a trial of a charge of having, with intent to extort money, accused or threatened to accuse a physician of having procured an abortion on the prisoner's wife,—the evidence for the prosecution being that the demand for money was on a claim of seduction as well as abortion, and the defence claiming that the demand was in respect of seduction only,—it was held that evidence on the part of the defence to prove the truth of the charge of seduction was not admissible. (6)

As to threats to murder, see section 265, ante; and, as to threats to burn, see section 516, post.

454. Extortion by threats to accuse of any other offence.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for seven years who,—

(a) with intent to extort or gain anything from any person accuses or threatens to accuse either that person or any other person of any offence other than those specified in the last section, whether the person accused or threatened with accusation is guilty or not of that offence; or,

(b) with such intent as aforesaid, threatens that any person shall be so accused by any person; or,

(c) causes any person to receive a document containing such accusation or threat, knowing the contents thereof:

or who by any of the means aforesaid, compels or attempts to compel any person to execute, make, accept, endorse, alter or destroy the whole or any part of any valuable security, or to write, impress or affix any name or seal upon or to any paper or parchment, in order that it may be afterwards made or converted into, or used or dealt with as a valuable security. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 406.

Sections 453 and 454 are to the same effect as sections 295 and 296 of the English Draft Code, except, that under the first of the latter sections the punishment is penal servitude for life, (with one whipping in the case of a male offender under sixteen), and seven years' penal servitude, under the other section.

Upon section 296 of their Draft the English Commissioners have the following remark:—

"The provisions as to Robbery and Extortion re-enact the existing law, with the exception of section 296, which is new. At present a policeman or game-keeper who levies blackmail under threats of accusing of larceny or poaching is,—if criminally responsible at all,—only punishable with imprisonment and fine."

The word "offence" in this section, 454, applies to offences against provincial as well as Dominion Acts and is not confined to offences against the Criminal Code. (6)

A obtained five shillings from B by pretending to be a bailiff, and threatening to distrain. It was held that his guilt depended on the question whether or not he made the threat in such a way as to unsettle B's mind, and take away from his acts that element of free voluntary action which alone constitutes consent. (7)

Where, on the trial of a charge of sending a threatening letter to a person with intent to extort money, it is proved that the accused had stated that he had written a letter to such person and that he had stated its purport in language to the like effect as the threatening letter, it is not error for the Court to admit the threatening letter in evidence without further proof of the handwriting and to submit it to the jury for comparison with an exhibit already in evidence admittedly written by the accused. (8)

It is an offence, under the above section 454, for any person, with intent to extort or gain, to cause another person to be served with a justice's summons charging the latter with a criminal offence, notwithstanding that the information was laid by a third person who had no such intention to extort. (9)

A summons by a justice of the peace, requiring the person summoned to answer a charge punishable on summary conviction under the Code, is a "document containing an accusation," within the meaning of the above section, 454 (c). (10)

Upon a charge of extortion,—in causing a person to be summoned for ill-treatment of a horse, with intent to extort money,—a letter, written by the summoned person to a third person, on whom he had given an order for the demanded money to settle the charge, is not admissible in evidence against the accused charged with the extortion, unless such accused is shewn to have known the contents of the letter, notwithstanding that it was given concurrently with the order and delivered therewith to the third party by the accused. (10*a*)

It seems that a justice of the peace who wilfully receives fees to which he is not entitled is liable to indictment for extortion, under section 905, (now section 1134, subsection 3, post). (10*b*)

Justices of the peace and their clerks and clerks of the peace are liable to indictment for extortion. (10*c*)

Burglary and Housebreaking.

Burglary,—according to some of the ancient authorities,—was the felonious breaking and entering of houses, or churches, or the walls or gates of a town. But it is generally considered as having reference to the breaking and entering of private houses; and, in that sense, it is described as:—"A breaking and entering the mansion-house of another, in the night, with intent to commit, within the same, some felony, whether such felonious intent be executed or not. (1)

The word "burglar" is supposed to have been introduced from Germany by the Saxons, and to be derived from the German, burg, house, and larron, a thief, the latter being from the Latin, latro. (2) But, Sir H. Spelman, thinks that the word burglaria was brought into England by the Normans, as he does not find it amongst the Saxons; and he says that "burglatores" or "burgatores" were so called, quod dum alii per campos latrocinantur eminus, hi burgos pertinacius effringunt, et deprocdantur.

The crime, however, appears to have been noticed in our earliest laws, in the common genus of offences denominated Hamsecken, and by the ancient laws of Canute and of Henry I., to have been punished with death. (3)

Originally, the circumstance of time does not seem to have been material: and the malignity of the offence was supposed to consist entirely in the invasion on the right of habitation, to which the laws of England have always shewn special regard.

The learned editor of Bacon's Abridgement says that his researches had not enabled him to discover at what particular period time was first deemed essential to the offence, but that it must have been so settled before the reign of Edward VI. (4)

There is no material difference between the above common law description or definition of burglary and that contained in section 457, post.

A verbal change, however, is necessary, on account of the abolition by our Code, of the distinction between felony and misdemeanor.

The general definition of burglary, therefore, will now stand thus:—A breaking and entering of a dwelling-house by night with intent to commit an indictable offence therein.

Clause (b) of section 457, post, however, makes it burglary, also, to break out of a dwelling-house, by night, after having committed an indictable offence therein, or after having entered it with intent to commit an indictable offence therein.

455. Breaking place of worship and committing any indictable offence therein.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to fourteen years' imprisonment who breaks and enters any place of public worship and commits any indictable offence therein, or who, having committed any indictable offence therein, breaks out of such place. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 408.

456. Breaking place of public worship with intent to commit any indictable offence therein.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to seven years' imprisonment who breaks and enters any place of public worship, with intent to commit any indictable offence therein. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 409.

Upon an indictment for breaking into a parish church, and stealing two surplices and a scarf, it appeared that the surplices and scarf were stolen from a box kept in the church tower; this tower was built higher than the church, and had a separate roof, but it had no outer door, the only way of going into it being through the body of the church, from which the tower was not separated by a door or a partition of any kind. It was objected that the stealing of these articles deposited in the tower was not sacrilege. Held, that a tower, circumstanced as this tower was, must be taken to be part of the church, and that the stealing of these articles in the tower was a stealing in the church. (5)

Where, in another case, it appeared that the offence had been committed by breaking into the vestry and stealing the sacramental plate out of a chest in the vestry; and the vestry had, in old times, been the porch of the church, and when the church was altered the porch was turned into the vestry room, and it had never been used for vestry purposes, but only for the robing of the clergyman, and the custody of the sacramental plate; and the vestry had a door opening into the body of the church, and another into the churchyard, which was always kept locked inside, Coleridge J., held, that this vestry, being as much a part of the church as the altar or the nave, it was for the purpose of the indictment in the case, a "place of divine worship." (6)

457. Burglary.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for life who,—

(a) breaks and enters a dwelling-house by night with intent to commit any indictable offence therein; or,

(b) breaks out of any dwelling-house by night, either after committing an indictable offence therein, or after having entered such dwelling-house, either by day or by night, with intent to commit an indictable offence therein.

2. Every one convicted of an offence under this section who when arrested, or when he committed such offence, had upon his person any offensive weapon, shall, in addition to the imprisonment above prescribed, be liable to be whipped. 63-64 V., c. 46, s. 3.

"Night" or "night time" means the interval between 9 p.m. and 6 a.m. of the following day. (See section 2[29], ante.)

The ownership of the goods need not be stated in the indictment. (Section 855 (b), post.) (7)

The intent to commit an indictable offence ought to be charged; (8) or it will be necessary to prove the commission of some indictable offence in the house after the breaking and entering. Thus, where an indictment was for burglariously breaking and entering a dwelling-house and then and there stealing goods therein and it omitted to state the intent, it was held that the defendant might be convicted of the burglary, if the alleged stealing were proved, but not otherwise. (9)

Before the statute 7 Will. IV., and 1 Vic., c. 86, sec. 4 (re-enacted in 24 and 25 Vic., c. 96, sec. 1), which first declared that for the purposes of a burglary the night should be from 9 p.m. to 6 a.m., many nice questions arose as to what fell within the meaning of "night." If the breaking and entering were in the night it was burglary; if in the day time it was not; if it were committed during twilight then if there were not daylight or crepusculum enough left to discern a man's face, it was burglary; otherwise it was not. (10) But this did not extend to moonlight nights. (1)

Both a breaking and an entering are necessary to constitute burglary; and the breaking and entering must both be in the night. If the breaking be in the day and the entering in the night, or the breaking in the night and the entering in the day, it will not be burglary; but the breaking may be on one night and the entering on another; (2) provided the breaking be with intent to enter, and the entering with intent to commit an indictable offence. (3)

Every entrance into a house, in the nature of a mere trespass, is not sufficient. Thus, if a man steals in a house which he enters by a door or window which he finds open, or through a hole or opening which was made there before (unless it be such a permanent opening as a chimney, etc., as is mentioned in the second paragraph of section 340 ante), he will not be guilty of burglary. (4) But see section 462, post, as to being found in a dwelling-house, at night. There must be either an actual breaking of some part of the house or a breaking by construction of law, as where the entrance is obtained by some threat or artifice, or by collusion with some one in the building, as provided by the said second paragraph of section 340. (See p. 391, ante.)

Section 335 (c), ante, declares that to "break," means to break any part, internal or external, of a building, or to open, by any means, whatever (including lifting in the case of things kept in their places by their own weight) any door, shutter, cellar-flap, or other thing intended to cover openings to a building or to give passage from one part of it to another. And, by section 340, ante, it is declared that entrance into a building is made as soon as any part of the body of the person making the entrance, or any part of any instrument used by him is within the building, and that everyone who obtains entrance into a building by any threat or artifice used for that purpose or by collusion with any person in the building or who enters any chimney or other aperture of the building permanently left open for any necessary purpose, shall be deemed to have broken and entered that building.

ACTUAL BREAKING.—Where a cellar window, which was boarded up, had in it a round aperture of considerable size, to admit light into the cellar, and through this aperture one of the prisoners thrust his head, and, by the assistance of the other prisoner, he thus entered the house, but the prisoners did not enlarge the aperture at all; it was held that this was not a sufficient breaking. (5) So, where a hole had been left in the roof of a brewhouse, part of a dwelling-house, for the purpose of light, and it was contended that an entry through this hole was like an entry by a chimney, it was held that this was not a sufficient breaking. Bosanquet, J., "The entry by the chimney stands upon a very different footing: it is a necessary opening in every house, which needs protection, but if a man chooses to leave an opening in the wall or roof of his house, instead of a fastened window, he must take the consequences. The entry through such an opening is not a breaking." (6)

The following are some examples of burglarious breakings:—

Making a hole in a wall; forcing open the door; putting back, picking or opening the lock with a false key; breaking the window; taking a pane of glass out of the window, either by taking out the nails or other fastening, or by drawing or bending them back; putting back the leaf of a window with an instrument; drawing or lifting a latch; turning the key where the door is locked on the inside; or unloosing any other fastening which the owner has provided. (7)

Where a pane of glass had been cut for a month, but there was no opening whatever, as every portion of the glass remained exactly in its place, and the prisoner was both seen and heard to put his hand through the glass, this was held a sufficient breaking. (8)

So, where a window opening upon hinges is fastened by a wedge, and pushing against it will open it, if such window be forced open by pushing against it, there will be a sufficient breaking. (9) So, pulling down the sash of a window is a breaking, though it has no fastening, and it is only kept in its place by the pulley weight, although there was an outer shutter, which was not closed. (10)

Any raising a window which is shut down close, but not fastened, is a breaking, although there be a hasp, by which it could have been fastened and kept down. (1)

Cutting and tearing down a netting of twine which is nailed to the top, bottom, and sides of a glass window, so as to cover it, and entering the house through such window, though it was not shut, constitute a sufficient breach and entry. (2)

Where a window was partly open, but not sufficiently to admit a person's body, and the prisoner raised it higher and entered by the larger aperture thus made, it was held, on a case reserved, that this was not a breaking. (3)

Where, however, a square of glass in a kitchen window, through which the prisoners entered, had been previously broken by accident, and half of it was out at the time when the prosecutor left the house, and the aperture was sufficient to admit a hand, but not to enable a person to put his arm in, so as to undo the fastening of the casement, and one of the prisoners thrust his arm through the aperture, thereby breaking out the residue of the square, and having so done, he removed the fastening of the casement, it was held that this was a sufficient breaking, — not by breaking the residue of the window pane,—but by unfastening and thus opening the window itself. (4)

Where an indictment for burglary charges only the breaking and entering with intent,—and does not charge a breaking out,—and the evidence shews that two windows had been disturbed sufficiently to allow of an entrance, one of them being previously closed and the other partly open, but it does not appear by which one of them the entrance was made, it is error to instruct the jury that an entrance by either is sufficient and the misdirection is a substantial wrong entitling the accused to a new trial. (4a) R. v. Burns, 7 Can. Cr. Cas., 95; 36 N. S. R., 257.

On one occasion, it was doubted whether getting into a house through the chimney was a sufficient breaking and entering to constitute burglary; but it was afterwards agreed that it was sufficient, on the ground that a house, with no opening, except through the chimney, is as much closed as the nature of things will permit. (5) And, it has been held, that, getting into the chimney of a house is a sufficient breaking and entering to constitute burglary, even if the party does not enter any room of the house. The prisoner got in at the top of a chimney and went down to just above the mantle-piece of a room on the ground floor; and upon a case reserved, two judges thought it was not a breaking and entering, as the prisoner could not be considered as being in the dwelling-house when he had not got below the mantle-piece; but the ten other judges held otherwise, on the ground that the chimney was part of the dwelling-house, that the getting in at the top was a breaking of the dwelling-house, and that the prisoner's lowering himself down was an entry within the dwelling-house. (6)

A case is reported, in which the breaking was held to be sufficient, though there was no interior fastening to the doors which were opened. The place which the prisoner entered was a mill, under the same roof, and within the same curtilage, as the dwelling-house; through the mill there was an open entrance, or gateway, capable of admitting wagons, and intended for the purpose of loading them more easily with flour by means of a large aperture or hatch, over the gateway, communicating with the door above; and this aperture was closed by folding doors, with hinges, which fell over it, and remained closed by their own weight, but without any interior fastening; so that persons on the outside, under the gateway, could push them open at pleasure, by a moderate exertion of strength. The prisoner entered the mill in the night, by so pushing open the folding doors, with the intention of stealing flour; and this was held to be a sufficient breaking, and the prisoner was accordingly convicted of burglary. (7)

But doubts were entertained whether lifting up the trap-door or flap of a cellar, which was kept down solely by its own weight, was a sufficient breaking; such trap-door or flap being used for the purpose only of taking in liquors to the cellar, and not as a common entrance for persons. The prisoner was indicted for stealing some bottles of wine in a dwelling-house, and afterwards burglariously breaking out of the house. The wine was taken from a bin, in a cellar of the house, which was a public-house, and removed by the prisoner from the bin to the trap-door, or flap of the cellar, in getting out of which he was apprehended. The cellar was closed on the outside, next the street only by the flap, which had bolts for bolting it on the inside, and was of considerable size, being made to cover the opening through which the liquors were usually let down into the cellar. The flap was not bolted on the night in question, but was down; in which situation it would remain, unless raised by considerable force. When the prisoner was first discovered, his head and shoulders were out of the flap; and, upon an attempt being made to lay hold of him, he got quite out, and ran away, when the flap fell down, and closed by its own weight. Upon this evidence, it was doubted whether there was a sufficient breaking to constitute burglary; and, the prisoner having been convicted, the question was reserved, for the opinion of the twelve judges, who were divided in opinion as to this being a sufficient breaking. (8)

It has, however, since been held, that lifting up the flap of a cellar, which was kept down by its own weight, is a sufficient breaking, although such flap may have been occasionally fastened by nails, and was not so fastened at the time the entry was made. (9)

A door or wall forming part of the outward fence of the curtilage and opening into no building, but into the yard only, was held to be no such part of the dwelling-house as would render it burglary to break and enter by such door or wall; and it was held to make no difference that the door broken was the entrance to a covered gateway, and that some of the buildings belonging to the dwelling-house and within the curtilage were over the gateway, and that there was a hole in the ceiling of the gateway for taking up goods into the buildings above. The prosecutor had a dwelling-house, warehouses and other buildings and a yard; the entrance into the yard being through a pair of gates, which opened into a covered way. Over this covered way were some of the warehouses, and over the gates there was a loop-hole and crane to admit of goods being hauled up. There was also a trap-door in the roof of the covered way; and there was free communication from the warehouse to the dwelling-house. The prisoners broke open the gates in the night, with intent to steal. They then entered the yard, but they did not enter any of the buildings. Held, that the outward fence of the curtilage, not opening into any of the buildings, was no part of the dwelling-house. (10)

An area gate, opening into the area only, is not such a part of the dwelling-house that the breaking of the gate will be burglary, if there be any door or fastening to prevent persons in the area from entering the house, although such latter door or other fastening may not be secured at the time. (1)

It has been held, and it is expressly declared by section 335 (c), ante, that the breaking requisite to constitute a burglary is not confined to the external part of the house, but may be of an inner door after the offender has entered by means of a part of the house which was open. Thus, if A enter the house of B, in the night time, through the outward door which is open, or by an open window, and, when within the house, turn the key of a chamber door, or unlatch it, with intent to steal, this will be burglary. (2) So, where the prisoners went into the house of the cook at Sergeant's Inn, in Fleet street, to eat, and taking their opportunity, slipped up stairs, picked open the lock of a chamber door, broke open a chest, and stole plate, it was held that the picking open of the lock of the chamber door constituted burglary, though the breaking open the chest would not have done so. (3) And it will also amount to burglary if a servant in the night time open the chamber door of his master or mistress, whether latched or otherwise fastened, and enter for the purpose of committing murder or rape, or with any other felonious design; or if any other person, lodging in the same house, or in a public inn, open and enter another's room door, with such evil intent. (4) But it has been questioned whether, if a lodger in an inn should, in the night time, open the door of the chamber occupied by him, steal goods, and go away, the offence would be burglary; on the ground of his having a kind of special property and interest in his chamber, and the opening of his own chamber door being therefore no breaking in the inn-keeper's house. (5)

But he would be guilty of burglary, by breaking out, if, after stealing he not only opened his own chamber door but lifted a latch or turned a handle of the outward door so as to get completely out of the house. (6)

It is clear that the breaking open of a chest, or box, by a thief who has entered a house by means of an open door or window, is not a kind of breaking which would constitute burglary, because such articles are no part of the house. (7) But the question with respect to the breaking of cupboards, and other things of a like kind, when affixed to the freehold, has been considered as more doubtful. Thus, at a meeting of the judges, upon a special verdict, to consider the point, whether breaking open the door of a cupboard let into the wall of the house were burglary or not, it appears that they were divided upon the question. (8) Lord Hale says that such breaking is not burglary at common law. (9)

CONSTRUCTIVE BREAKING.—Where, in consequence of violence commenced or threatened in order to obtain entrance to a house, the owner, either from apprehension of the violence, or in order to repel it, opens the door, and the thief enters, such entry will amount to breaking in law: (10) for which some have given as a reason that the opening of the door by the owner, being occasioned by the felonious attempt of the thief, is as much imputable to him as if it had been actually done by his own hands. (1) But if, upon a bare assault upon a house, the owner fling out his money to the thieves, it will not be a burglary; (2) though if the money were taken up in the owner's presence, it is admitted that it would be robbery. (3) And though the assault were so considerable as to break a hole in the house; yet if there were no entry by the thief, but only a carrying away of the money thrown out to him by the owner, the offence could not, it should seem, be burglary, though certainly robbery. (4)

Where an act is done, in fraudem legis, the law gives no benefit thereof to the party. Thus, if thieves, having an intent to rob, raise hue and cry, and bring the constable, to whom the owner opens the door, and they, when they come in, bind the constable, and rob the owner, it is burglary. (5) And, upon the same principle, the getting possession of a dwelling-house by a judgment of ejectment obtained by false affidavits, without any color of title, and then rifling the house, was ruled to be within the statute against breaking the house, and stealing the goods therein. (6) So, if a man go to a house under pretence of having a search warrant, or of being authorized to make a distress, and by these means obtain admittance, it is, if done in the night-time, a sufficient breaking and entering to constitute burglary, or, if done in the day-time, house-breaking. (7)

If admission to a house be gained by fraud, though not carried on under the cloak of legal process, but merely by a pretence of business, it will also amount to a breaking by the construction of law. Accordingly, it was adjudged, that where thieves came to a house in the night-time, with intent to commit a robbery, and knocked at the door, pretending to have business with the owner, and, being by such means let in, robbed him, they were guilty of burglary. (8) And so where some persons took lodgings in a house, and afterwards, at night, while the people were at prayers, robbed them; it was considered that, the entrance into the house being gained by fraud, with an intent to rob, the offence was burglary. (9)

In another case, the entrance was gained by deluding a boy who had the care of it. The prisoner, who was acquainted with the house and knew that the family were in the country, asked the boy, who kept the key, to go with her to the house, promising him, by way of inducement, a pot of ale. The boy went with her, opened the door, and let her in; upon which she sent him for the pot of ale, and, while he was gone, she robbed the house and went away. This being in the night time, it was held that the prisoner was clearly guilty of burglary. (10)

Where a servant conspired with a thief to let him into his master's house to commit a robbery, and, in pursuance of this arrangement, opened the door or window in the night-time and let him in, it was considered burglary, both in the servant and the thief. (1)

Two men were indicted for burglary. One of them was a servant in the house where the offence was committed. In the night-time he opened the street door, let in the other prisoner, and shewed him the sideboard, from which the other prisoner took the plate. The servant then opened the door, and let his confederate out. The judges were all of opinion that both prisoners were guilty of burglary; and they were accordingly executed. (2)

ENTRANCE.—Any, even the least entry with any part of the offender's body or with any part of any instrument or weapon used by him is sufficient. (3)

So, that, where A, in the night-time, cut a hole in the window shutters of B's shop, which was part of his dwelling house, and putting his hand through the hole, took out some watches which hung in the shop, it was held to be burglary. (4) And, if a thief breaks the window of a house in the night-time, with intent to steal, and puts in a hook to reach out goods, or puts a pistol in at the window with intent to kill, it is burglary, in either case, although his hand be not in the window. (5)

In a case where thieves came in the night to rob A, who, perceiving their intent, opened his door, issued out, and struck one of the thieves with a staff, when another of them, having a pistol in his hand, and perceiving persons in the entry ready to interrupt them, put his pistol within the door, over the threshold, and shot, in such manner that his hand was over the threshold, but neither his foot nor any part of his body, it was adjudged to be burglary. (6)

It has even been held that to discharge a loaded gun into a house is a sufficient entry, although neither the person discharging it nor any part of the gun be within the house. (7)

It seems, therefore, that no distinction is to be made between the implied entry effected by discharging a pistol or other fire-arm into a house, and that effected by means of an instrument introduced within the window or threshold, for the purpose of committing an indictable offence.

Where it appeared that the prisoner had bored a hole with an instrument called a centre-bit through the panel of a house door, near to one of the bolts by which it was fastened, and that some pieces of the broken panel were found within the threshold of the door; but it did not appear that any instrument, except the point of the centre-bit, or that any part of the bodies of the prisoners had been wihin the house, or that the aperture was made large enough to admit a man's hand; the Court held this not to be a sufficient entry. (8)

Introducing the hand between the glass of an outer window, and an inner shutter, is a sufficient entry to constitute burglary, on the ground that, as the glass of the window is the outer fence, whatever is within the glass is within the house. (9)

Where, in breaking a window in order to steal something in the house, the prisoner's finger went within the house, it was held that there was a sufficient entry to constitute burglary. (10)

DWELLING-HOUSE.—Every house for the dwelling and habitation of man is taken to be a dwelling-house in which burglary may be committed; (1) and under section 335, clause (e), it means any permanent building the whole or any part of which the owner or occupier keeps for the residence therein of himself, his family, or servants, although, at intervals, unoccupied and under section 339, ante, any building occupied with and within the same curtilage with any dwelling-house is deemed to be part of the said dwelling-house, if there is between them a communication either immediate or by means of a covered and enclosed passage; and evidence of the breaking and entering of a building so attached will sustain an indictment charging a breaking and entering of the dwelling-house. (2)

A dwelling-house, therefore, in relation to the offence of burglary, is any place kept for the purpose of living in; and it will be sufficient if any part of the family of the owner or tenant live there.

Sets of chambers in an inn of court or a college are deemed distinct dwelling-houses, they being, in their nature and manner of occupation, as unconnected with each other as if they were under separate roofs. (3)

A burglary cannot be committed in a tent or booth in a market or fair, even although the owner lodge in it; because it is a temporary, not a permanent edifice; (4) but, if it be a permanent building, although used for the purpose of a fair, it may be a dwelling-house if a part of it be used as such during the fair. (5)

A loft situated over a coach-house and stables, in a public mews, and converted into lodging rooms, has also been holden to be a dwelling-house. The prosecutor, who was coachman to a lady, rented the rooms at a yearly rent; but he had never paid any rent; and the rooms were not rated in the parish books as dwelling-houses, but as appurtenances to the coach-house and stables; the way to the coach-house and stables was down a passage out of the public mews, to a staircase which led to these rooms, and the entrance to which staircase was through a door, which was never fastened, but there was a door at the top of the staircase to the rooms, which was locked at night, and was broken by the prisoner. It was contended, on behalf of the prisoner, that these rooms did not form such mansions or dwelling-houses as to become the subject of burglary; but, the objection was overruled, and the rooms were held to be the habitation of the prosecutor and his family. (6)

Where the prosecutors' house consisted of two living rooms, of another room used as a cellar, downstairs, and of three bedrooms, upstairs, — one of such bedrooms being over the wash house, and the bedrooms over the house place communicating with the bedroom over the wash house, but there being no internal communication between the wash house and any of the rooms of the house, though the whole were under the same roof, and it appeared that the defendant broke into the wash house and was breaking through the partition wall between the wash house and the house place, it was held that the defendant was properly convicted of burglary in breaking the house. (7)

But where adjoining to the house was a kiln, one end of which was supported by the wall of the house, and adjoining the other end of the kiln there was a dairy, one end of which was supported by the wall of the kiln, at that end, the roofs of all three being of different heights, and there being no internal communication from the house to the dairy, it was held that burglary was not committed by breaking into the dairy, the kiln being between it and the house. A Mr. Smith, having purchased a house with an intention to reside in it, had moved into it some of his furniture and effects; the house was put under the care of a carpenter for the purpose of being repaired; but Mr. Smith had not himself entered into the occupation of any part of it, nor did any part of his family, nor any person whatever sleep therein. While the house was in this situation, it was broken open in the night time; and, upon a case reserved, the Judges were of opinion that it could not be considered a dwelling-house, being entirely uninhabited; and that, therefore, there could be no burglary. (9)

Where a house (which a former tenant had quitted), was taken by a new tenant, who put all his furniture into it, and frequently went thither in the day time, but neither himself, nor any of his family had ever slept there, it was ruled that burglary could not be committed therein. (10)

And, though persons sleep in a house thus situated, yet, if they are not of the family of the owner, it will still not be a dwelling-house in which burglary can be committed. (1)

So, in a case where the prosecutor had lately taken the house which was broken open; he himself never having slept there nor any of his family; but on the night on which it was so broken, and for six nights before, he had procured two hairdressers, who were not in any situation of servitude to him, to sleep there for the purpose of taking care of his goods therein; the Court was of opinion, that the house could not, in contemplation of law, be considered as the dwelling-house of the prosecutor. (2)

Where the owner of the house has no intention of going to reside in it himself, and merely puts some person to sleep there at nights till he can get a tenant, the same rule applies, and the house, under such circumstances, cannot be considered as the dwelling-house of the owner. (3)

Where the owner of the house has never, by himself nor by any of his family slept in it, though he has used it for his meals, and all the purposes of his business, it is not his dwelling-house, so as to make the breaking thereof burglary. (4)

When the owner or occupier has once entered into possession and begun to use the house, as a dwelling, either by himself, or by some of his family, it will not cease to be his dwelling-house by reason of any occasional or temporary absence, even though no person be left in it. (5) Thus if A have a dwelling-house, and upon occasion he and his family be absent for a night or more, burglary may be committed in their absence; and so, if A have two residences and be sometimes with his family at one and sometimes at the other, the breach of one of them in the night time in the absence of his family will be burglary. (6)

Also, if A. have a chamber in a college or inn of Court, where he usually lodges in term time; and, in his absence in the vacation, his chamber be broken open in the night, the same rule will apply. (7)

A, having a residence in Westminster, took a journey into Cornwall with the intention of returning; and he sent his wife and family out of town, leaving the key with a friend who was to look after the house. After A had been gone a month, the house,—there being no one in it,—was broken into, in the night, and robbed. A month afterwards, A returned to the house to live there. Held, that the breaking was a burglary. (8)

In another case, it was held that the prosecutor's residence was still his dwelling-house, although he and his family had left six months before, he having left his furniture in it, and having the intention to go back to it. (9)

In these cases, there must be an intention on the part of the owner or occupier to return to his house, animus revertendi. If he has quitted without any intention of returning, the breaking of a house so left will not be burglary. (10)

So, that, if a man leaves his house without any intention of living in it again, and means to use it as a warehouse only, and has persons, not of his family, to sleep in it to guard the property, the house cannot be described as his dwelling-house. (1)

But, though a man leave his house, and never mean to live in it again, yet, if he uses part of it as a shop, and lets a servant and his family live and sleep in another part of it for fear the place should be robbed, and lets the rest to lodgers, the habitation by the servant and his family is a habitation by the owner, and the shop will still be considered part of his dwelling-house; the putting in of a servant and family to live there being considered different from putting them there merely to sleep. (2)

The mere casual use of a place, or the using it upon some particular occasions for particular purposes is not considered sufficient to constitute it a habitation where burglary can be committed. (3) Thus, it was held that, the fact of a servant having slept in a barn, on the night in which it was broken open, and for several nights before, he being put there, for the purpose of watching thieves, did not make the offence burglary. (4) And the circumstance of a porter lying in a warehouse to watch goods,—this being only for a particular purpose,—was held not to make it a dwelling-house.(5)

It was formerly necessary to correctly state the ownership in the indictment, and, therefore, the question of the ownership of the house at the time of being broken and entered, was, then, a matter of great importance.

Although the allegation of ownership is no longer absolutely necessary, and although its omission will not render the indictment objectionable or insufficient,—(see section 855, (b), post),—it is better to state to whom the dwelling-house belongs; and it may not be out of place, here, to notice some of the cases on the subject of ownership and its exercise either by the owner's own occupation and that of his family and servants or by others who hold from him some interest which constitutes in them an ownership as to the whole or some part or parts of the dwelling-house.

With regard to the exercise of ownership by the occupation of the owner's servants, it has been held that, where apartments in a house belonging to a corporation were appropriated as lodgings for servants of the corporation, a burglary committed in them should be laid as committed in the corporation's dwelling-house. (6)

Where a servant lived rent free in a house belonging to his master, the master paying the taxes, and having his business carried on in the house, but the servant and his family being the only persons who slept there, and that part of the house in which his master's business was carried on being at all times open to those parts in which the servant lived, it was held, upon an indictment for breaking and entering that part of the house in which the master's business was carried on, that it was properly described as the servant's house; but, the Judges would not say that it might not, also, have been described as the house of the employer. Where a servant lived in a cottage quite distinct from his master's house, and had entire control over the cottage, it was held that it might be described as his dwelling-house, although he paid no rent for it, and might be liable to give it up whenever his service was terminated. (8)

The governor of a workhouse was appointed under contract for seven years, and was to have the chief part of the dwelling-house for his own and his family's occupation, the guardians and overseers who appointed him reserving the use of one room for an office, and three others for store rooms. The governor was assessed for the dwelling-house, excepting the reserved rooms. The office having been broken into, the indictment described it as the governor's dwelling-house; but, after conviction, upon a case reserved, the Judges held that the description was wrong. (9)

Where a policeman was allowed to live in a house, in order to take care of it and a wharf adjoining, it was held that the house was properly described as the dwelling-house of the policeman, on the ground that he must live somewhere; and he was not otherwise the servant of the owner than in the particular matter. (10) But, where upon an indictment for burglary in the dwelling-house of Bird, it appeared that Bird worked for one Woodcock, who did business as a carpenter for the New River Company, and put him in to take care of the house and flock mill adjoining, which belonged to the Company, and he received no more wages than he did before he lived there, nor had any agreement for any, it was doubted whether the house was properly laid, and it was thought that there might be some difference between this and the preceding case, as here the man was put in by a person who did the work for the Company, and it was thought the safest course to consider the indictment as not properly laying it to be the dwelling-house of Bird. (1)

Where a company in the country rented, for their agent, a house in London, in the upper part of which house the agent lived, with his family, it is reported to have been held by Graham, B., and Grose, J., that a burglary committed in the house was well laid to have been committed in the dwelling-house of the agent: the use of the house being given by the company to the agent as part of the remuneration for his services. (2)

Where, with certain wages, a laborer had a cottage to live in, rent free, it was held that as he occupied it for his own benefit, and not for the benefit of his master, it was properly described as the dwelling-house of the laborer. (3)

Where a person was employed by the lessee of tolls to collect such tolls, at a weekly salary, besides the privilege of living in the toll-gate house, erected by the trustees of the road, and the toll-gate house was broken and entered in the night-time, it was held that the house was well described as the dwelling-house of the toll-gate keeper. (4)

With regard to the exercise of the ownership of a house by persons other than the proper owner thereof, it seems that where they have no fixed or certain interest in any part of the house, the proper owner retains the ownership in himself: as for instance, where persons are abiding in a house as guests, and a burglary is committed in any of their apartments, the indictment should lay the offence as committed in the dwelling-house of the proprietor of the house. (5)

So, that, where the chamber occupied by a guest in an inn was broken and entered at night, the indictment for the burglary should lay it as having been committed in the dwelling-house of the innkeeper. (6)

A. the lessee of a house, suffered B, his son-in-law, to live in it. B failed, and left the house, but one of B's servants, C, continued in it. A, the lessee, died, and the house was given up to the landlord, who through his steward suffered C to continue in the house, and the only goods in the house belonged to C. In an indictment for breaking the house, it was laid to be the house of C, and upon the point being saved, the Judges held that it was rightly laid, as C was there not as a servant, but as tenant at will. (7)

Where the owner, who let out apartments in his house to other persons, slept under the same roof, and had but one outer door at which he and his lodgers entered, it was considered that all the apartments of such lodgers were parcel of the one dwelling-house of the owner: but, that if the owner did not himself dwell in the same house, or if he and his lodgers entered by different outer doors, the apartments so let out were the mansion, for the time being, of each lodger respectively: (8) and it was held, accordingly, that where a house was let out to several lodgers, a burglary committed therein must be alleged to have been committed in the dwelling-house of the lodger whose apartments were broken and entered. (9)

Where a lodger occupied one room in a house, the landlady keeping the key of the outer door, it was held that this could not be described as the lodger's dwelling-house: (10) but, it was otherwise where the house was divided into several chambers with separate outer doors. (1)

A burglary was committed in a house belonging to one Nash who, however, did not live in any part of it himself, but let the whole of it out in separate lodgings from week to week: and an inmate named Jordan had two apartments in the house, namely, a sleeping-room up one pair of stairs, and a workshop in the garret: which he rented by the week as tenant at will to Nash. The workshop was the room broken open by the prisoner. And upon a case referred to the Judges for their consideration, whether the indictment had properly charged the burglary in the dwelling-house of Jordan, ten of them were of opinion, that as Nash, the owner of the house, did not inhabit any part of it, the indictment was good. (2)

In a case in which it appeared that the house was situated in a mews, and the whole of it let out in lodgings to three families, with only one outer door, which was common to all the inmates, one of whom rented the parlor on the ground floor and a single room up one pair of stairs and that the parlor on the ground floor was the part of the house broken open: all the Judges held that the offence was well laid in the indictment, as having been committed in the dwelling-house of the particular inmate. (3)

It was held that, where a house was let to A and a warehouse under the same roof, and with no inner communication, to A and B, the warehouse could not be described as the dwelling-house of A. (4)

A building may be divided so as to form several separate dwelling-houses by letting off parts, and leaving no internal communication between the parts so let and the remainder of the building. An indictment charged that a burglary was committed in a house forming the centre of a building with two wings, one of which wings was the dwelling house of A. and the other consisted of the dwelling-houses of B and C respectively. The centre consisted of three manufactories in one of which A, B, D and other persons were jointly concerned, and of the other two, D was the sole proprietor. C was merely in D's employ. There was no internal communication between the centre building and the houses of A and B nor between it and the house of C, except a window in the house of C which looked into a passage that ran the whole length of the centre building. One count in the indictment alleged the centre building to be the house of C; but the Judges held that, the window merely was not such an internal communication that the centre building could be deemed a portion of C's house. (5)

THE INTENT.—There must be an intent to commit some indictable offence; and if the intention of the entry be alleged or be proved by the evidence to have been only for the purpose of committing a trespass the offence will not be burglary. An indictment charged the prisoners with a burglary in the dwelling-house of A with intent to steal the goods of B. It appeared that B, who was an excise officer, had seized uncustomed bags of tea entered in the name of C, and being in C's possession without a legal permit, and after seizing them, B had removed them to his lodgings at A's house. The prisoners and many other persons broke open A's house in the night, with intent to take this tea. It was not proved that C was in company with them: but the witnesses said that they supposed the tea to belong to C: and supposed that the act was committed either in company with him, or by his procurement. The jury, being directed to find as a fact with what intent the prisoners broke and entered the house, found that they intended to take the goods on behalf of C, and, upon the point being reserved, all the Judges were of opinion that the indictment was not supported as, however outrageous the conduct of the prisoners was, in so endeavoring to get back C's goods, still there was no intention to steal. (6)

Where the intent laid was to kill a horse, and the intent proved was merely to lame him, in order to prevent him from running a race, the variance was held fatal. (7)

Where the intent laid was to steal, and the intent proved was to carry away the defendant's trunk containing money which he had previously embezzled from his master, it was held that the offence proved did not amount to a burglary, for it was no felony in the defendant to remove the money. (8)

If there be evidence of a theft but none of burglary and none shewing the theft to have been committed in the dwelling-house, the defendant may be convicted of the simple theft, and if two or more are indicted, one may be found guilty of the burglary and the other of the theft only. (9) And a verdict may be rendered finding the defendant guilty of an attempt, if the evidence warrant it. (10)

Where a room-door was latched, and a person lifted the latch and entered the room, and concealed himself for the purpose of committing a theft there, which he afterwards effected; and two other persons were present with him when he lifted the latch, for the purpose of assisting him to enter, and screened him from observation, by opening an umbrella, it was held that those two were, in law, parties to the breaking and entering, and were answerable for the stealing which afterwards took place, though they were not near the spot when it was perpetrated. (1)

Where the intent laid was to steal the goods of J. W. and it appeared in evidence that no goods of any person of the name of J. W. were in the house, but that the name of J. W. had been inserted in the indictment by mistake, the Judges held the variance to be fatal, and the defendant was acquitted. (2)

But, where the indictment alleged the intent to be generally "the goods and chattels in the said dwelling-house then and there being" to steal, and charged the defendant with stealing the goods of A therein, it was held to be satisfied by proof of a breaking into the house, with intent to steal the goods there generally, though the goods actually stolen did not belong to A alone. (3)

The best evidence of the intent is, that the defendant actually committed the offence alleged to have been intended by him; (4) but, any other facts may be given in evidence from which the intent may be presumed. It may be inferred from the nature of the weapon or instrument, with which the defendant is found armed, the place in which he is found, his own declarations, or from any other circumstances.

Where an indictment charges a breaking and entering, at night, with intent to commit an indictable offence, proof of the actual commission of an indictable offence will be sufficient and in fact the best evidence to establish the intent; but, it is best to allege both the intent to commit and the actual commission of an indictable offence. (5)

It should be observed, also, that different intents may be stated in the indictment. Thus, where the first count of an indictment for burglary laid the fact to have been done with intent to steal the goods of a person, and the second count laid it with intent to murder him; it was objected, upon a general verdict of guilty, that there were two several capital charges in the same indictment, tending to deprive the prisoner of the challenges to which he would have been entitled if there had been distinct indictments, and also tending to perplex him in his defence; but, the indictment was holden good, on the ground that they were the same facts and evidence, only laid in different ways. (6)

Although an indictment charging a breaking and entering, with intent to commit an indictable offence, will be supported by evidence that, on breaking and entering the defendant actually committed the indictable offence charged, it seems that where the indictment charges a breaking and entering and the actual commission of an indictable offence, but does not charge the intent, it will not be supported, if the evidence merely shew a breaking and entering with intent to commit and no actual commission of the offence. (7)

It will be seen that the essentials of the crime of burglary, as defined and punished under section 457, are:—

1. A BREAKING and ENTERING a dwelling-house, by night, with intent to commit an indictable offence therein;

2. A BREAKING OUT of a dwelling-house, by night, after committing an indictable offence therein; and,

3. A BREAKING OUT of a dwelling-house, by night, after having entered it, by day or by night, with intent to commit an indictable offence therein.

But section 457 does not expressly declare that it is burglary to break and enter a dwelling-house, by night, and commit an indictable offence therein. Quære, would it, therefore, be sufficient in an indictment for burglary, under that section to allege a breaking and entering of a dwelling-house by night and the commission therein of an indictable offence, without also alleging an intent to commit it? And, if, in a trial for burglary, the evidence were to shew that, when the accused broke and entered the house, he had no intention whatever to commit any indictable offence therein, would he, by afterwards committing an indictable offence therein, become guilty of burglary under section 457?

Sections 458 and 459, infra,—relating to housebreaking,— expressly state that the offence of housebreaking is committed, 1—by breaking and entering a dwelling-house, by day, and committing an indictable offence therein, 2—by breaking out of a dwelling-house by day after having committed an indictable offence therein, and 3, by breaking and entering a dwelling-house, by day with intent to commit an indictable offence therein.

If upon an indictment for burglary, it be proved that the breaking and entering were in the day time and not in the night time, the accused may be convicted of house-breaking under section 459, infra, (8); and, if the breaking and entering be not proved, the accused may be convicted,—under section 380, ante,—of stealing in a dwelling-house provided the property stolen amount to $25, or provided (though less then that amount), he, by threats, put anyone in the house in bodily fear; and, if the stealing do not come within the terms of section 380, ante, the accused may be convicted of simple theft. (See section 951, post).

458. House-breaking.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to fourteen years' imprisonment who,—

(a) breaks and enters any dwelling-house by day and commits any indictable offence therein; or,

(b) breaks out of any dwelling-house by day after having committed any indictable offence therein. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 411.

459. House-breaking with intent.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to seven years' imprisonment who, by day, breaks and enters any dwelling-house with intent to commit any indictable offence therein. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 412.

See comments under section 457, at pp. 518, et seq., ante.

The breaking and entering must be proved in the same manner as in burglary, (9) except that it need not be proved to have been done in the night-time; but, if it be proved to have been done in the night-time, so as to amount to burglary, it seems that the defendant may, notwithstanding, be convicted upon an indictment for burglary. (10)

The proof of the stealing will be the same as in any other case of theft; and the least removal, as we have seen already, will be sufficient. For instance, where it appeared that the prisoner after breaking and entering the house, took two half sovereigns from a bureau, in one of the rooms, but, being immediately detected, threw them into the grate in that room, Parke, J., held, that this was a sufficient asportation to constitute the offence of house-breaking and stealing therein. (1)

If the prosecutor succeed in proving the theft, but fail in proving any of the other facts necessary to constitute the offence of house-breaking, the defendant may be convicted of simple theft; or, if the prosecutor fail in proving the breaking and entry, and the goods be laid and proved to be of the value of twenty-five dollars, the defendant may be convicted of stealing in the dwelling-house.

Where a defendant was tried upon a charge of house-breaking accompanied by theft, and the evidence did not prove that offence, but the prosecution contended that a case of receiving stolen goods had been made out, it was held, upon a reserved case, that the power, under section 951, post, of convicting of an offence other than that charged can only be exercised when all the essential elements or ingredients of the offence proved are included in the offence charged, and that, according to that rule, the offence of receiving stolen goods is not comprised in the offence of house-breaking accompanied by theft, the crime of theft being the taking and carrying away of the goods of another, while the crime of receiving stolen goods is that of receiving goods stolen by a person other than the receiver. (2)

A defendant may, if the evidence warrants it, be convicted of an attempt to commit the offence, if the prosecutor fails to prove its full commission. (See section 949, post.)

460. Shop-breaking.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to fourteen years' imprisonment who, either by day or night, breaks and enters and commits any indictable offence in a school-house, shop, warehouse or counting-house, or any building within the curtilage of a dwelling-house, but not so connected therewith as to form part of it under the provisions hereinbefore contained. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 413.

461. Shop-breaking with intent.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to seven years' imprisonment who, either by day or night, breaks and enters any of the buildings mentioned in the last preceding section with intent to commit any indictable offence therein. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 414.

See Comments under sections 457, 458, 459, ante.

The breaking and entering must be proved in the same way as upon an indictment for burglary, except that it is immaterial whether the breaking and entry be by night or by day. If the proof of the breaking and entry fail the defendant may be convicted of simple theft.

A warehouse was, at one time, held to be such as factors or traders keep their goods in, for sale and where customers go to view them, and not such as is used for the safe keeping of goods merely; (3) but this distinction is now exploded. (4) There is a dictum of Alderson, B., upon the repealed statute 7 and 8 Geo. IV., c. 29, s. 15, that a shop to be within it, must be a shop for the sale of goods, and that a mere workshop such as a carpenter's or blacksmith's shop, would not be sufficient. (5) But, Lord Denman, C.J., dissented from that dictum, and held that a blacksmith's shop, when used as a workshop only, was within the statute. (6)

Where A had in connection with his chemical works a building commonly called the machine house in which goods sent out were weighed, and in which a book was kept by A's servant for entering the goods weighed and sent out, and it also appeared that the time of the men employed in the works was also taken and their wages paid in that same building, the books in which their time was entered being brought there for the purpose of being entered up and for paying their wages, it was held upon an indictment for breaking and entering this building that it was a counting house. (7)

Section 339, ante, includes, as part of a dwelling-house, any building occupied with and being within the same curtilage with it, provided there be, between such building and the dwelling-house, "a communication either immediate or by means of a covered or enclosed passage leading from one to the other;" and the breaking and entering of any such building is punishable as burglary or house-breaking,—according to the facts,—under sections 457, 458 and 459, ante; but sections 460 and 461 also cover and punish the breaking and entering of any building which is within the curtilage of a dwelling-house, though not so connected with it,—either immediately or by means of a covered or enclosed passage,—as to form part of it. The word "curtilage" (which is derived from the Saxon word curt, signifying court), means a court, a yard, a garden, a field, or any piece of land (with or without buildings on it), surrounding, or near and belonging to a messuage or dwelling-house; and so in olden times, the mansion or dwelling-house, in which burglary might be committed, included the out houses,—such as warehouses, barns, stables, cow-houses, dairy-houses, offices,—and all other buildings and erections, which were within the curtilage, or same common fence as the mansion house itself, though not under the same roof and not joined to the dwelling-house, upon the ground that the main house protected and privileged all its out-buildings, branches and appurtenances, if within the curtilage or common home-stall. (8)

Sections 460 and 461, therefore, make it an indictable offence to break and enter any building occupied with, belonging to, and within the curtilage of a dwelling-house.

462. Entering or being found in a dwelling-house at night with intent.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to seven years' imprisonment who unlawfully enters, or is in, any dwelling-house by night with intent to commit any indictable offence therein. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 415.

This section will meet cases in which the prisoner has entered (either by an open door or window or otherwise), a dwelling-house or is found therein, by night, and where, though there is no proof of any breaking or of the commission of any indictable offence, the circumstances shew an intent to commit one, and that the prisoner was there with that intent.

On an indictment for being unlawfully in a dwelling-house by night with intent to assault, a written verdict of "guilty of being in the house unlawfully, also guilty of assault" is a good verdict of guilty on the charge, as the assault necessarily includes the intent; and to complete the offence of being unlawfully in a dwelling-house with intent to assault, it is sufficient that the intent originated after the entry, and that the assault was threatened by the accused in his efforts to escape from the house after being discovered therein. (9)

463. Being found armed with intent to break into a dwelling-house.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to seven years' imprisonment who is found,—

(a) armed with any dangerous or offensive weapon or instrument by day, with intent to break or enter into any dwelling-house, and to commit any indictable offence therein; or,

(b) armed as aforesaid by night, with intent to break into any building and to commit any indictable offence therein. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 416.

For the definition of "offensive weapon," see section 2 [38], ante.

464. Having burglars' tools, or being disguised, etc.—Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to five years' imprisonment who is found,—

(a) having in his possession by night, without lawful excuse, the proof of which shall lie upon him, any instrument of house-breaking; or,

(b) having in his possession by day any such instrument with intent to commit any indictable offence; or.

(c) having his face masked or blackened, or being otherwise disguised, by night, without lawful excuse, the proof whereof shall lie on him, or,

(d) having his face masked or blackened, or being otherwise disguised, by day, with intent to commit any indictable offence. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 417.

For the definition of "having in possession" see section 5, ante.

With reference to the provisions contained in the section of the English Draft Code, corresponding with our section 464, the Royal Commissioners say: "These are extensions of the existing law. It is that being disguised by night affords sufficient prima facie evidence of a criminal intent."

465. Punishment after previous conviction.—Every one who, after a previous conviction for any indictable offence, is convicted of an indictable offence specified in this Part for which the punishment on a first conviction is less than fourteen years' imprisonment is liable to fourteen years' imprisonment. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 418.

See sections 851 and 963 and 964, post, as to the indictment and as to the procedure when a previous conviction is charged.

FORGERY AND PREPARATION THEREFOR.

On the subject of forgery and preparation for forgery, the Royal Commissioners have the following remarks, at pp. 29 and 30 of their Report on the English Draft Code:—

"It is not possible to say precisely what are the documents the false making of which is forgery, at common law. But, by a great many different enactments, passed at different times, a great many forgeries have been made felonies, and as such, punishable with great severity.

"The statute law was, for the most part, consolidated by the 24-25 Vict. c. 98.

"Like the other consolidation Acts, the Forgery Act assumes that the common law definition of forgery is known. This definition, however, is a somewhat intricate matter involving various questions as to the extent of falsification implied in forgery; the character of the intent to defraud essential to it, and the circumstances essential to the completion of the crime. These matters are dealt with in sections 313 to 317 both inclusive. (1)

(1) Sections 313-317 of the English Draft Code correspond with sections 335 (f), 24, 335 (h), and 335 (j) of the present Code.

"The part relating to Forgery contains an enumeration of the various classes of documents, the forgery of which is punishable. They include all those which are mentioned in 24 and 25 Vict. c. 98, though not always in the same order or under the same names. They also include a considerable number of documents (contracts, for instance, documents intended to be produced in evidence, and false telegrams), which are not included in that Act.

"This part makes provisions for the forgery of some documents as to which it is doubtful whether to forge them is or is not a common law offence.

"Finally, it contains a general clause (section 336), (2) punishing the forgery of any document, whatever, with intent to defraud the public or any person, or to pervert the course of justice, or to injure any person, or to deprive any person of or prevent his obtaining any office, etc.

"We believe that few, if any, cases would be punishable under this section which would not be forgeries at common law. There is a considerable difference between this part and the corresponding chapter of the Bill. The general section (section 336), corresponds very nearly to a similar provision in the Bill, which proposed to subject offenders against its provisions to a maximum punishment of seven years penal servitude instead of two years imprisonment with hard labor. Such an enactment would have rendered unnecessary a considerable part of the enumeration of documents contained in the Draft Code. The provision was regarded as objectionable on the ground that it authorised a sentence of penal servitude for the forgery of various documents which were not defined, and the forgery of which could be at present punished by fine and imprisonment only. The difference in length between the Draft Code and the Bill is to a great extent due to the manner in which, perhaps ex abundanti cautelâ, the former deals with each particular forgery. In the result, there will, we believe, be but little practical difference. The Draft Code adheres more closely than the Bill to the existing law, and is in these matters more explicit and detailed.

"The provisions as to preparations for forgery are chiefly re-enactments of existing statutes.

"In section 356, (3) we have re-enacted 25-26 Vict. c. 88, as to Trade Marks, omitting some clauses which seem not practical."

466. Forgery defined.—Forgery is the making of a false document, knowing it to be false, with the intention that it shall in any way be used or acted upon as genuine, to the prejudice of any one whether within Canada or not, or that some person should be induced by the belief that it is genuine, to do or refrain from doing anything, whether within Canada or not.

2. Making a false document includes altering a genuine document in any material part, or making any material addition to it or adding to it any false date, attestation, seal or other thing which is material, or making any material alteration in it, either by erasure, obliteration, removal or otherwise.

3. Forgery is complete as soon as the document is made with such knowledge and intent as aforesaid, though the offender may not have intended that any particular person should use or act

(2) See clause (n) of section 470.
(3) See sections 486-488, post, as to forgery, etc., of Trade Marks.

upon it as genuine, or be induced, by the belief that it is genuine, to do or refrain from doing anything.

4. Forgery is complete although the false document may be incomplete, or may not purport to be such a document as would be binding in law, if it be so made and is such as to indicate that it was intended to be acted on as genuine. 55-56 V., c. 29, s. 422.

For the meaning of "false document," see section 335 (j), ante. It is there defined as (i) a document the whole or some material part of which purports to be made by or on behalf of any person who did not make or authorize the making thereof, or which though made by or by the authority of the person who purports to make it, is falsely dated as to time or place of making, where either is material, or (ii) a document, the whole or some material part of which purports to be made by or on behalf of some person who did not in fact exist, or (iii) a document which is made in the name of an existing person, either by that person or by his authority, with the fraudulent intention that the document should pass as being made by some person, real or fictitious, other than the person who makes or authorizes it.

It will be readily seen that the expression "false document" as used in connection with forgery has a meaning entirely different from what is meant by a document which is false in the sense of being simply an untrue statement of facts. Where a letter purports to be signed by A B, but is, as a matter of fact, signed by C D, in A B's name, without A B's authority, a third party to whom it is shewn is deceived and led to believe that it is A B's letter, which, in fact, it is not; and, in that sense, it is a false document, whether its contents be true or false. It may be a true document as to the facts set forth in it; but, whether true or false as a statement of facts, it is a false document in regard to the signature. If the letter, instead of being signed by C D, in A B's name, were really signed by A B himself, or by his authority, and if its contents were false, then, although a false document in the sense of being an untrue statement of facts, it would be a true and genuine document in regard to the signature, and no forgery. A document whose contents are true may thus be a forged false document; and a document which contains false statements of fact may, nevertheless, be a genuine document, in the sense of being no forgery: although it may amount to and be punishable as a false pretence. For instance, if in a letter, written and signed in his own name, A. make a false statement, whereby B is induced to part with his money or goods, the letter would not be a false document in the sense of being a forgery, but it would be a written false pretence.

Forgery at common law is defined, by Blackstone, as "the fraudulent making or alteration of a writing to the prejudice of another man's right." (4) It has also been defined as "a false making, a making malo animo, of any written instrument, for the purpose of fraud or deceit;" (5) the word "making," in the latter definition, being considered as including every alteration in or addition to a true instrument.

As to the word forge, Lord Coke says, "To forge is metaphorically taken from the smith who beateth upon the anvil and forgeth what fashion or shape he will. The offence is called crimen falsi, and the offender falsarius: and the Latin word to forge is falsare or fabricare." (6)

Besides the offence of forgery at common law, which was of the degree only of misdemeanor, a great many kinds of forgery were specially subjected to severe punishments by various statutes, which, as stated by the English Commissioners, (7), were, for the most part, consolidated by the Imperial Act, 24-25 Vic., c. 98.

(7) See p. 536, ante.

When documents filed as exhibits in a civil suit form the subject matter of indictment for forgery and uttering, they may be impounded on the application of the Attorney-General acting for the Crown. (8)

The gist of the offence of forgery, as defined by the present Code, is the knowingly making of any false document, (defined by section 335*j*, ante), either, 1, with intent, that such false document shall be used or acted upon as genuine, to the prejudice of any one, or, 2, with intent that any one shall, by belief in its genuineness, be induced to do or refrain from doing anything; and it is expressly declared by section 466, sub-sec. 2, that making shall include any material alteration in or addition to a genuine document; and that the forgery shall be complete as soon as the false document is made, "with such knowledge and intent as aforesaid."

It is unnecessary that the forgery should reach the point of being actually used or acted upon as genuine, or that it should have actually prejudiced any one. As soon as the false document is made with intent that it shall be acted upon or used as genuine, it is sufficient; and the forgery is complete without any further step being taken, and therefore without any uttering of it. For, although the publication or uttering of the instrument is the usual medium by which the intent is made manifest, the intent may be proved as plainly by other evidence.

Thus, in a case where the note which the prisoner was charged with having forged, was never published, but was found in his possession at the time he was apprehended, no objection was taken to the conviction on the ground of the note never having been published, there being in the case circumstances sufficient to warrant the jury in finding a fraudulent intention. (9) In another case, it was held by LeBlanc, J., that, though the note there in question had been kept in the prisoner's possession, and never attempted to be uttered by him, yet it was a question for the jury, under all the circumstances of the case, whether the note had been made innocently or with an intent to defraud. (10).

It is forgery to execute a deed in the name of, and as representing another person, with intent to defraud, even though the prisoner has a power of attorney from such person, but fraudulently conceals the fact of his being only such attorney, and assumes to be the principal. (1)

See section 477, post.

Where a party committing forgery uses a name different from his own, it is immaterial whether the name used be that of a person actually existing or that of a merely fictitious person who never existed. (See section 338*j*, clause 2.) It is as much a forgery in the one as in the other. (2)

Where the forgery is committted by using the name of an existing person, it makes no difference whether the offender passes himself off for such person or not. (3)

If three persons, A B and C, have authority jointly to draw out money from a bank, and A, one of them, draw out the money by a cheque signed by himself, and D and E, two strangers, who personate B, and C, it is forgery. (4)

Where there is no false making, it will be no forgery although a person falsely assume to be the real endorser and the one who has really endorsed the bill, and thus obtain money or goods upon it, and although all this be done in concert with the real endorser, and for the purpose of fraud. The prisoner, John Hevey, was indicted for having, with intent to defraud, forged an endorsement in the name of Bernard McCarty on the back of a bill of exchange for £30 drawn in favor of McCarty, upon and purporting to be accepted by Beatty & Co., and for uttering such forged endorsement. The evidence shewed that the prisoner Hevey went to the pawnshop of the prosecutors, to buy a watch and offered them the bill in question, with the endorsement then upon it, saying that it was a good bill, that his name was Bernard McCarty, that he had endorsed the bill, and that Beatty & Co. were agents to the Bath Bank. The pawnbrokers sent their servant to enquire about the acceptance, and, on the latter returning and saying that the acceptance was good, they let the prisoner have the watch, and gave him the difference of the bill. It was proved that the prisoner had always been known as John Hevey, but it also appeared that there was such a man as Bernard McCarty, and that the endorsement was in the latter's handwriting. The jury found the prisoner guilty; but, the case being afterwards submitted to the consideration of the judges they were all of opinion that it did not amount to forgery, the jury having found that there was no false endorsement but that the endorsement was truly made by a real person whose name it purported to be. (5)

An instrument may be a forgery by being falsely dated as to the time of making it: (section 335); and, so, it has been held that a man may be guilty of forgery by making a false deed in his own name: as, where A. having made a conveyance in fee of his land to B. afterwards fraudulently executed a deed of lease, for 999 years, of the same land, to C, which lease, by being ante-dated, purported to be prior to the conveyance in fee to B. (6)

A prisoner was indicted, under the English Forgery Act, for having feloniously caused and procured to be delivered and paid to Henry Dorber the sum of £9, the money of George Crompton and Samuel Radcliffe, upon a certain forged message purporting to have been handed in at a certain post-office, — "the Royal Exchange, Manchester," — for transmission by telegraph and purporting to have been transmitted by telegraph to the General Post-office in Manchester, with intent to defraud, the prisoner knowing it to be forged. The prisoner, who was a clerk in the Manchester General Post-office, — (post-offices in England having a telegraphic department),—had obtained permission from Dorber, to make bets, in the latter's name, with Crompton & Radcliffe, who were bookmakers. On the 27th June, 1895, the "Newcastle Handicap" was to be run at 2.45 p. m.; and the prisoner, on that day, sent the telegram in question, in Dorber's name offering to bet £3 on "Lord of Dale." The telegram purported to have been handed in at the Royal Exchange post-office at 2.40 p. m., and to have been received at the General Post-office at 2.51 p. m., whence it was transmitted to Crompton & Radcliffe, who,—acting on their usual practice and believing that the telegram offering the bet had been handed in before the race was run,—accepted the bet at current odds, and, in due course, paid the amount won. As a matter of fact, the telegram was not handed in at the Royal Exchange post-office at all, but was despatched by the prisoner direct from the General Post-office after the prisoner had received news of the fact that "Lord of Dale" had won the race. Held, that the telegram,—being written so as to make it appear that it was sent in for despatch before the race was run, when it was not,—was a forged instrument, and that the indictment was good. (7)

FORGERY BY ALTERATION.—The general principle upon which making a false document includes altering or adding to a genuine one (as provided by the second paragraph of section 466), is that an alteration of any material part of a true instrument changes and falsifies the whole.

Upon an indictment for "making, forging and counterfeiting" a bill of exchange, and for uttering it knowing it to be forged, the prisoners were convicted upon evidence of an alteration of the bill, from £10 to £50. (8)

The fraudulent alteration of a material part of a deed is forgery, however slight the alteration may appear in itself; as, for instance, the making a lease of the manor of Dale to appear to be a lease of the manor of Sale, by changing the letter D into an S; or by making a bond for £500, expressed in figures, seem to have been made for £5,000. (9)

Where a party made a copy of a receipt, added to such copy material words, not in the original, and then offered it in evidence on a suggestion of the original being lost, it was considered that he might be prosecuted for forgery. The words inserted were "in full of all demands." (10)

Altering the date of a bill of exchange after acceptance, and thereby accelerating the time of payment is forgery: (1) and so is altering a bill payable at three months into a bill payable at twelve months. (2)

Where a note of a country banker was made payable at their house in the country or at their bankers in London, and the London bankers had failed, it was forgery to alter the name of such London bankers to the name of another London banker, with whom the country bankers had made their notes payable subsequent to the failure: the judges deciding that the act done by the prisoner was a false making in a circumstance material to the value of the note, and its facility of transfer, by making it payable at a solvent instead of an insolvent house. The alteration was effected by pasting a slip of paper bearing the words Ramsbottom & Co., over the words Bloxam & Co., in the same manner as the prosecutors had themselves altered their re-issuable notes, after the failure of their first London bankers, Bloxam & Co. (3)

Altering a banker's one pound note by substituting the word ten for the word one was held to be forgery. (4)

Discharging one endorsement and inserting another, or making it thereby a general instead of a special endorsement has been held to be an altering of an endorsement, and to be a forgery. (5)

A person, having an order for delivery of wheat for the support of the poor persons in a municipality, is guilty of forgery, if he materially alters the order, so as to increase the quantity of wheat which is obtainable thereunder, with intent to defraud. (6)

The prisoner, a railway station master, had the paying of B, who was employed to collect and deliver parcels; and the company provided a form in which the charges due to B were entered by the prisoner under the heads of "Delivery" and "Collecting" respectively. The prisoner having falsely told B, that the company would no longer pay for delivering, but only for collecting, continued to charge the company for the collecting as well as the delivering; and, in order to furnish a voucher, after paying B the sum entered in the form for collecting, and obtaining a written receipt for it, the prisoner, without B's knowledge, put on such written receipt a receipt stamp, and put in the receipt, in figures, (as the aggregate for collecting and delivering), a larger sum than he had actually paid. This was held a forgery. (7)

On an indictment for forgery, it appeared that a promissory note had been drawn by the prisoner, payable two months after date, to the order of one J. S., and afterwards endorsed by said J. S., and that the prisoner then altered the note, by making it payable three months after date, and discounted it at the Bank of British North America, in London, Ontario. The jury convicted him of forgery, and on motion for a new trial, on the ground that the forgery, or uttering, if any, was a forgery of or uttering of a forged endorsement, the note having been made by the prisoner himself, and that there was no legal evidence of an intent to defraud, it was held that the altering of the note while in his own possession, after endorsement, was a forgery of a note, and not of an endorsement, and that the passing of the note to a third party, who was thereby defrauded, was sufficient evidence of an intent to defraud. (8)

It is forgery for a person, having authority to fill up a blank acceptance or a cheque, for a certain sum, to fill it up for a larger amount. Therefore, if a person gives another a blank acceptance, and at the time limits the amount either by writing upon it, or otherwise, and, if in the filling up of the acceptance that amount be exceeded with intent to defraud the acceptor, or any other person, it is forgery under section 335*j*, ante. (9)

FILLING IN BLANK CHEQUES WITHOUT AUTHORITY.—Filling in (without authority) the body of a blank cheque, to which a signature is attached, is a forgery.

The prisoners were indicted for uttering a forged cheque, and it appeared that one Townsend was in the habit of signing blank cheques, and leaving them with his clerk when business called him away from home; one of these cheques fell into the hands of the prisoners, who filled up the blank with the words "one hundred pounds," and dated it; it was objected that the signature being genuine, it could not be said that the prisoner had uttered a forged instrument; but, Bailey, J., held, that it was a forgery of the cheque. By filling in the body and dating it, it was made a perfect instrument, which it previously was not, and, although it was not in point of fact made entirely by the prisoners, yet it had been held that the doing that which is necessary to make an imperfect instrument a perfect one, is a forgery of the whole. (10)

FORGERY BY SIGNING FORGER'S OWN NAME AS THAT OF ANOTHER PERSON.—If a bill of exchange, payable to A B or order, get into the hands of another person of the same name with the payee, and such other person knowing that he is not the real payee, in whose favor it was drawn, endorse it, for the purpose of fraudulently possessing himself of the money, he is guilty of forgery. (1)

Coal, consigned to G. P. of New York, arrived, and was claimed by another person of the name of G. P., who resided there, and who, knowing this, obtained an advance of money, on endorsing the permit for the delivery of the coal, with his own proper name. This was held to be forgery. (2)

FORGERY BY USING A FICTITIOUS NAME.—The use of a fictitious name may be sufficient to constitute forgery.

Thus, a person who endorsed a fictitious name on a bill of exchange to give it currency was held to be guilty of forgery; and, where a bill of exchange was drawn in fictitious names, there being no such persons existing as the bill imported, it was held to be a forged bill. (3)

It has been held that an order on a banker, for the payment of money, falsely purporting to be made by one who kept cash with such banker, was a forgery, though made in a fictitious name, or in the name of one who had no authority to draw on the banker; (4) and that a receipt, in a fictitious name, endorsed on a bill of exchange was also a forgery, although it did not purport to be the name of any particular person. (5)

In a case where the prisoner was indicted for uttering a forged deed, purporting to be a power of attorney, from Elizabeth Tingle, administratrix of her (Elizabeth Tingle's) father, Richard Tingle, deceased, late a marine belonging to His Majesty's ship the Hector, to F. Predham, of Bernard's Inn, etc., empowering the said Predham to receive all prize-money due to her, etc., the facts were clearly proved, and the prisoner was convicted. But a doubt was entertained, whether, as Richard Tingle had died childless, and as there was no such person as Elizabeth Tingle, the case amounted to forgery; and the point was referred to the consideration of the twelve judges. Eleven of them were very clearly of opinion, that it was forgery. (6)

Forging, in a false name assumed for concealment, with a view to a fraud, of which the forgery is part, is sufficient to constitute the offence. And if there be proof of the prisoner's real name, it is for him to prove that he used the assumed name before the time he had the fraud in view, even in the absence of proof as to what name he had used for several years before the fraud in question. (7)

Where the prisoner obtained money from B, for a cheque on Jones, Lloyd & Co., purporting to be drawn by G. Andrews in favor of,—Newman, Esq., or bearer, telling him that it was for Mr. Newman, of Soho Square, in whose service he was for three months, and that Mr. Newman had put his name on the back; and it appeared, upon an indictment for forging and uttering the cheque, that no person of the name of G. Andrews kept an account with Jones, Lloyd & Co., that Mr. Newman of Soho Square did not write his name on the back of the cheque, and that the prisoner was never in that gentleman's service; Parke, J., held this to be sufficient primâ facie evidence that G. Andrews was a fictitious person, and told the jury that if G. Andrews really drew the cheque, the prisoner might produce him or give some evidence upon the subject. The prisoner was convicted. (8)

Where the prisoner was indicted for forging and uttering a cheque on Greenwood & Co., army agents and bankers, purporting to be drawn by J. Weston; and a clerk in the army department was called to prove that J. Weston kept no account with his employers; he admitting that he did not know the names of all the customers, but adding that he knew of no customer named J. Weston, and that, upon inquiry of the other clerks, he found that there was no such person; Parke, J., with the concurrence of Patteson, J., and Gurney, B., held this to be primâ facie evidence sufficient to call upon the prisoner to show who J. Weston really was. (9)

If a person write an acceptance in his own name to represent a fictitious firm, with intent to defraud, it is a forged acceptance; for, if an acceptance represent a fictitious firm, it is the same as if it represented a fictitious person. (10)

Two men named Parkes and Brown were indicted for forging and uttering a promissory note purporting to be signed by "Thomas Brown" and being for £5, 5s, 0d, payable to bearer. The prisoner Brown uttered the note to one Hulls, a shoemaker, in payment for some boots, he pretending that he was a Captain Brown, and, that he had a brother who had just married a lady with £15,000 which his brother had deposited in the hands of Down and Thornton, bankers, London, and, in handing Hulls the note, he said, "I am sorry I cannot pay you in gold; but I can give you what is just as good, one of my brother's drafts." Hulls asked him if it was on the money lodged with Down, Thornton & Co. and Brown said it was. The note was soon discovered to be a forgery; and it appeared that Brown and Parkes were connected together, that the note was in Parkes' handwriting, including the signature "Thomas Brown," and that Down & Co., had no such customer as Thomas Brown. Both prisoners were found guilty, the jury saying they thought Parkes signed the note with Brown's assent and that Brown uttered it under a representation that it was his brother's, knowing that it was not so, with intent to defraud Hulls. The following objections to the conviction were taken by the counsel for the prisoners: first, that Thomas Brown was the real name of one of the prisoners; secondly, that it was no forgery in Parkes to sign the name of Thomas Brown, with his, Brown's, consent; thirdly, that if Parkes were not guilty of forgery, Brown could not be guilty of uttering the note knowing it to be forged; and fourthly, that the subsequent misrepresentation of Brown ought not to affect Parkes, as there was no evidence that he was aware of the fraudulent circumstances under which Brown was going to utter the note; the principle being, that misrepresentations do not amount to forgery, or make that a forgery which was not so at the time of the original making.

The judges held the conviction wrong as to Parkes, but right as to Brown, for the following reasons:—that forgery is "the false making of a note, or other instrument, with intent to defraud; which might be done either by using the name of one who did not exist, or of one who did exist, without his consent; that this was of the former description, being uttered by the prisoner as the note of his brother, no such person as his brother of that name appearing to exist; and that the circumstance of its being made in the same name as his own could not make any difference; the note being uttered as the note of another, and not as his own. The same answer applied to the second objection. As no such person existed to whom the name of Thomas Brown, as the signer of the note, could apply, there could be no consent given to sign the name. It was signed by the authority of a Thomas Brown, but not of the Thomas Brown, for whose note it purported to be given; for the person in whose name the note was made, was, according to the description of him in the note, then a resident at Ringhton, in Salop; and it imported that he was a correspondent of Down, Thornton & Co. and had money in their hands; and he was also represented to be the brother of the prisoner; but no such person of that name and description appeared to exist. And all this was proved and found to be done for the purpose of fraud. Thirdly, that the indictment did not charge that Brown uttered the note knowing it to have been forged by Parkes, but only knowing it to have been forged; and, therefore, let it have been forged by whomsoever it might, it was equally an offence in Brown to utter it." (1)

It is immaterial whether any additional credit be gained by using the false or fictitious name. (2)

Where the fictitious name used by the prisoner in the forged instrument was found by the jury to have been assumed by him with the intention of defrauding the prosecutor, although the prisoner's real name would, as admitted by the prosecutor, have carried with it as much credit as the assumed name, a conviction for forgery was held to be right. (3)

It has, however, been held that where a man, who had been long known by a fictitious name, drew a bill in that name, it was not a forgery. (4)

INTENT.—The intent necessary is an intent, that the false document shall be used or acted upon as genuine to some one's prejudice, or that some one shall be led by belief in its genuineness to do or refrain from doing something.

So, that, a man who makes a false note and issues and gets money or anything on it, will have led some one to act on it as genuine, and will be guilty of forgery, although he may mean to take it up, and even if he actually does take it up, at maturity. In a case in point, the prisoner was tried for uttering a forged bill of exchange with intent to defraud S. Minor. It appeared that the parties to the bill were all fictitious persons, that circumstance being fully known to the prisoner at the time he uttered it, and that there was no doubt that the names were forged, and the bill uttered by the prisoner with full knowledge of that fact. There was, however, reason to contend that the prisoner, who had filled a respectable station in life as a farmer, and who had endorsed the bill to Minor, intended at the time he so uttered it to take up and pay the bill when it arrived at maturity. For the prisoner it was urged to the jury, that the existence of such an intention, if they believed it, was ground upon which they might properly negative the intention to defraud Minor, as charged in the indictment; and a case was cited in which Lord Abinger, at the previous assizes for Shrewsbury, had so decided. In summing up the case, Alderson, B., told the jury (after consulting Gurney, B.), that if they were satisfied that the prisoner uttered the bill in payment of a debt due to Minor, knowing at the time he so uttered it that it was a forgery, and meaning that Minor should believe it to be genuine, they were bound to infer that he intended to defraud Minor. The prisoner was found guilty; but, Alderson, B., thought it proper, from respect to the opinion of Lord Abinger, to state a case for the opinion of the Judges, in order to know if the rule laid down by him in his summing up to the jury was correct; and the Judges, having considered the case, were unanimously of opinion that the conviction was right. (5)

Upon an indictment for forging and uttering an order for the payment of money, signed John Phillips, with intent to defraud F. Rufford and others, it appeared that the order was presented at Messrs. Rufford's bank; but they would not pay the amount; and no person named John Phillips kept cash with them; it was objected that there could be no intent to defraud Messrs. Rufford, as there was not the most remote chance of their paying the money; but it was held that the prisoner's going to Messrs. Rufford's and presenting the paper for payment, was quite sufficient evidence of an intent to defraud them. (6)

Where it appeared that the forged bill had since it was uttered, been paid before proceedings were taken against the prisoner, Parke, B., in addressing the jury said this made no difference and that they were bound to infer an intent to defraud from the act of the forgery and the uttering. (7)

If a person put the name of another on a bill of exchange, as acceptor, without the other's authority, expecting to be able to meet it when due, or expecting that such other person will overlook it, it is forgery. But, if the person either had authority from such other person, or from the course of their dealings bona fide considered that he had such authority, it is not forgery. (8)

Nothing short of bona fide belief that the defendant had authority and a fair ground for that belief, from the acts of the party whose name is used, is sufficient. Thus, where A was indicted for forging and uttering an acceptance on a bill of exchange in the name of B, and B admitted that he had had money transactions with A and had been connected with him as a partner in a hat manufactory and that they had had many bill transactions and had trusted each other largely, and that a mutual accommodation existed between them, Coleridge, J., in his summing up, said, "We now come to B's statement that he has been for the last eight years in habits of great intimacy with the prisoner and in partnership with him. Now, I put the question whether, though he had not authorized the signing of his
