We want to know these things because it is not simply enough to know who the lobbyists are. Otherwise all we need is a collection box for business cards. The Prime Minister could have an in basket at his door and as the most powerful lobbyists in this country walk through, they could take their business card out of their wallet and drop it in. That would be the result of simply registering lobbyists and forgetting about lobbying.

I think the Minister's comments in committee laid bare the fact that the Government does not really want to do anything effective about lobbying. It does not want to expose what goes on when the powerful come to Ottawa seeking favours from the Government. Oh, it is nice to have the newspapers report on the activities of spontaneous grass roots groups such as Rural Dignity. Then the Post Office can send out staff and have that group followed everywhere. We will not ask them for their business cards, but we will sure see what they are doing.

That is a double standard. The activities of ordinary Canadians when they protest the policies of government are visible, but when it comes to those who yield enormous influence, those who can get Governments to make decisions against the public interest, we just want to know who they are; we do not want to know what they are doing. All that says is that the Government is not serious when it comes to registering and controlling lobbyists.

If that is the case, then the Government should not be wasting the time of this House in having us here during the summer months to pass legislation that is not going to throw any new light on what is happening with regard to the making of decisions and the influence that the powerful in this society yield when it comes to the direction of government.

Why does this legislation not ask the Business Council on National Issues or the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers' Association to provide the same information as it does of its friends in the Tier I category, such as Government Consultants International? Why do they not apply a consistent standard across the board? Why is it that the two associations which influence government policy do not have to give information? Why is it that the one group that was able to undercut legislation, that had the support of the vast majority of Canadians, that was able to make the Government go down a road which was unpopular with the vast majority of Canadians, does not have to provide the same information as do other lobbyist groups? Why is it on the Tier II wimp list? Why is it that the one group that told the Government to sell out Canadian sovereignty is not on the Tier I lobbyist list?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. McCurdy: I rise on debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps the Chair will need the help of the Hon. Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs on this matter. On July 21 the House passed a special Order which said that after Question Period on Monday, July 25, the House would consider third reading of Bill C-82, an Act respecting the registration of lobbyists, and complete the debate on that Act before five o'clock.

The Chair understands that at the time this motion was proposed by the Hon. Minister of State he thought there would be a Private Members' Hour today. There is no Private Members' Hour today, but nonetheless there was an Order made that it was up to the Chair to put the question on third reading of Bill C-82.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I am in the hands of my colleagues. I understand that the House Leader had agreed that when the debate was completed we would suspend and come back at six o'clock for the divisions. I am hesitant to keep colleagues here any longer. They have now endured two speeches of some volume and lacking any sense. If we had some assurance that there would not be further abuse for long periods of time, I would certainly not be reluctant.

However, perhaps I can delegate this responsibility to the House Leader who has the unfortunate job of having to deal with the NDP on a day-to-day basis. I would not want to undermine any relationship he might have with that organization, although I cannot understand how anyone can endure that task day after day.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I want to say how much I appreciate the comments of my friend, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I am not sure that he has helped me in future negotiations, but it helps my colleagues opposite understand what I have to put up with.

This agreement was worked out last week. The intention was that once we had dealt with this legislation there would be no more business put before the House prior to the vote taking place at six o'clock. We have a choice of calling it six o'clock or recessing the House until six o'clock, whichever the Chair finds to be more appropriate under the circumstances.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, the Minister who spoke first on this issue wanted some indication of what we have left on our speakers' list. We have one more speaker and if it is agreeable we will have one more speech and then take the vote at that time.

Mr. Gauthier: That is no problem, Mr. Speaker. In our usual co-operative mood we would agree to extend the time to allow for that one speech.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The lucky member of the New Democratic Party will be the Hon. Member for Windsor—Walkerville.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, far be it from me to impose any additional abuse to that self- inflicted by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Andre). I appreciate the polite generosity of others in the House in extending to me this opportunity to say a few words about a matter which has not been exhausted in debate here.

I am sure that not even the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs would suggest for a moment that we have before us in Bill C-82 the be-all and end-all on the issue of lobbying. This is a matter of great concern to all Canadians. It was certainly of considerable concern to the Committee on Elections, Privileges and Procedures which submitted its report some time ago and asked a great deal more of the Government than the Government has offered in this legislation.

My colleagues have, with a great deal of eloquence and insight, examined the issue of lobbying. However, I must say that after listening to the debate there might be a temptation to see lobbying as, by definition, evil rather than an aspect and a part of the process of this place which becomes evil only as a consequence of its abuse.

Therefore, it is perhaps useful for the electorate to understand the role that lobbying plays. Lobbying is a special word which is applied to the exercise of individual citizens' rights to petition their Members of Parliament, members of Government, or members of the bureaucracy in order to achieve some end. I think you would agree, Mr. Speaker, that that is a substantial and key part of doing our job properly.

You yourself, Mr. Speaker, have probably come to realize, as have I and my colleagues, that the vast complexity of issues with which Members of Parliament have to deal is far beyond the competence or intellect of Members of Parliament to have mastered. We are required to deal with an infinite number of complex, specialized issues about which we could not be expected to have expertise. It must be added that in many cases, no matter how well aware we are of the environment in which we operate or how well read we are, we may not even know that certain matters are indeed even issues.

When those who ask to see us, lobbyists included, initiate discussions on a variety of matters, very often it is helpful, and not only helpful but necessary in order to give us the impulse to begin the study and investigation which allows for the formulation of points of view.

This kind of lobbying occurs in our offices here on the Hill and may occur in our riding offices back home. It is frequent and involves ordinary Canadians, Canadians who have special recognition in our communities, the wealthy, the poor, labourers, employers, and women. It involves a whole spectrum of people who represent our constituencies.

One does not have to be around this Hill very long to realize the frequency with which one could accept invitations to very exorbitant dinners or fine cocktail parties or, in the case of one significant lobbying organization, an extraordinarily, exorbitantly luxurious party which people vie to attend in order to share the beneficence of those who seek to purchase influence to ensure that the directions chosen are consistent with the will of those able to entertain Members of Parliament at such a level as to bend their minds.

Members of Parliament, of course, have to keep in mind that they have an electorate to face. We also know that lobbying does not include only Members of Parliament but members of the bureaucracy not answerable to the electorate; those who write the legislation, those who can distort and bend the minds of Ministers and shape legislation to reflect, not the interests of the Government but the interests of those special interests better informed and better heeled, and who can determine directions in subtle ways of which we ourselves are all too often unaware. Lobbying is a normal part of the process of democracy subject to abuse.

The issue is that there ought to be full disclosure and transparency of the character of lobbying wherever it occurs. This Bill purports to allow intelligent people to determine whether questions should be raised about a particular lobbying activity, the costs incurred for that lobbying, the pay-off, who is being lobbied, and about what. Those are activities that we ought to be able to track down.

This legislation fails on a number of accounts. Its first failure is that it constructs an artificial distinction between those who may be described as professional lobbyists working for businesses that, for a fee, uses whatever means it has to pursue Members of Parliament, the Senate, and the bureaucracy to achieve certain ends. Such firms as Government Consultants International and Public Affairs International will make certain contacts for a fee.

One may gauge that the effectiveness of such groups may be based on expertise and intimate knowledge of Government. However, it is perfectly clear that when one examines closely the way these organizations work, particularly GCI operated by Mr. Moores, one must be suspicious that it is not the expertise developed by virtue of education or anything of the sort, but the personal contacts and influences gained over years of intimate involvement in partisan political activity. That is what gives such organizations a special claim.

Furthermore, it appears that such a consulting organization may measure its fee on a contingency basis. If it is pursuing a contract like the Airbus contract, amounting to billions of dollars, such a consulting organization could earn millions of dollars. Obviously, the message to all Canadians is that the more money one has, the better one is able to influence the outcome of a bureaucratic or governmental decision. That is an important consideration in the issue of transparency of lobbyists and knowing how much it costs, how much is paid, how much changes hands, and for what. It is important to know what is being discussed and who is involved, because it could constitute a form of extreme prejudice to the rest of the population of ordinary Canadians who cannot mobilize these huge sums of money. This is one example of the application of a particular approach to charging clients to obtain goals on their behalf.

If we are going to have legislation to make lobbying transparent, it is self-evident that we should know what fees are changing hands. We should also be aware that if the size of a contract determines the fee, it will introduce the kind of bias and motivation to make as much as possible at whatever cost.

Contingency fees should be banned and we should ensure that we know what fees are being charged so that we do not create a situation in which wealth, even more than now, will determine a business' ability to gain an appropriate response from government.

Others have spoken about the artificial division between Tier I and Tier II. Tier I constitutes consulting firms such as GCI and PAI. The purpose of this artificial division is to create a loophole so vast as to provide all the room necessary for another scandal, which the Government needs desperately. We have a crazy situation in which the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers' Association can spend all the money it wants and hire a former Liberal Minister for all kinds of money to do nothing but lobby while calling her a vice-president. She would not be included in this legislation.

Mr. Keeper: Who is it?

Mr. McCurdy: I would not mention names because that would be unparliamentary and impolite. This former Liberal Minister, in the face of purported Liberal opposition to Bill C-22, was suddenly hired as a lobbyist, with the title of vice-president of the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers' Association of Canada. Surely her activities and activities like those should be registered in the same way as those listed in Tier I. That is elementary.

Since this legislation creates an artificial division, excluding from effective registration employees who function as lobbyists, it is an essential waste of time. This legislation is more rhetoric than substance, and therefore it fails.

There are other shortcomings in addition to those which I have already enumerated. This legislation is so deeply flawed that it should be rejected on that basis alone by any rational person who wants to make lobbying as transparent as it should be. The Government wanted to pass the test of honesty and fairness. I am happy to join my colleagues in voting against this legislation until something better comes along. We know that it will not come with this Government. We will have to wait until more rational and principled heads take power.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member knows that I think he is intelligent. He, along with his colleagues, is being a little more than self-righteous about these matters. What would be their reaction if we brought to the House Conservative Party resolutions that were sponsored by Joe's Diner, the Canadian Cattlemen's Association, or General Motors?

I have noticed lately that his Party has resolutions from certain locals of unions. I believe the Canadian Auto Workers Association can introduce motions directly at his Party's semi-annual conventions. How can he to pretend for one moment that he is acting in the interest of his ordinary constituents, young, old, and of all incomes? In fact, the joke is often made that Bob White runs his Party. I do not think it is a joke; I think it is a reality with respect to the trade issue.

How is it that the Hon. Member can pretend that he is so virtuous and speaks for ordinary people when in fact members of one particular interest group can introduce motions and have them passed at his Party's conventions?

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to get a question from a colleague whose intelligence, which I also respect, is indicated by the frequent occasion he has to criticize the shortcomings of his own Party. However, there is that Tory flaw. The Hon. Member asks how we can talk about lobbying when UAW, the Womens' Incentive Centre of Windsor, or the farmers of Kent County can bring in resolutions that become a party policy. That is exactly the point.

Any policy initiative of the New Democratic Party is derived from a clear identification of source, and those who join our Party have the right and responsibility to determine what the policies of our Party will be. It is easier for the Hon. Member. His Party does not do that. Its policies are made in that chair right over there, and I suppose even the Hon. Member wonders where they come from, he has questioned them so frequently.

Of course, my eminent colleague across the way, intelligent as he is, seems to have missed the point. We are not talking about the processes which occur at the conventions of political Parties. We are talking about those activities that occur in respect to elected officials and the bureaucracy in their official functions as members of the Government. It is our concern that because of the way in which the Conservatives arrive at their policies, secretively and without identification of source, that GCI, PAI, and the like will spread the loot around to create party policy for the Conservatives. This policy will not have the UAW, the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, or the name of Conrad Black written under it. It will be secret, at least to the extent that we can measure untoward influence in this House. This legislation should do something about that, and this legislation has failed.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, I think that the Hon. Member did not catch my point. My point was how this gives credibility to his Party. I hate to say anything good about the Liberals, but in the two other Parties, an individual man or woman but not a member of a group, a lobby group or a union, can go to our conventions and introduced resolutions. How does it help his Party to act in the public interest when one can pick up its list of resolutions, as I am sure the Hon. Member has, and find that a good percentage of them are sponsored not by men and women as individuals but directly by the Canadian Auto Workers Union or local this and local that?

I hope the Hon. Member will agree with me, when he rises to give me the answer to that question, that it will be a better day when the only resolutions of his conventions will be sponsored by flesh and blood individuals rather than by unions.

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member must have said that in jest. Individual members come to the Conservative conventions and move resolutions that are forgotten about. New Democratic Party members, whether through unions or through local constituency associations, have not simply bought their membership cards the day before nomination meetings, subsequently to be forgotten about. They have joined the Party and they have responsibilities. One of those responsibilities is to go to riding association meetings and convince the associations to support their resolutions.

I am not surprised that the Hon. Member does not understand the principle. It is democracy.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Order made Thursday, July 21, 1988, the recorded division stands deferred until six o'clock this day.

SITTING SUSPENDED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House will suspend its sitting until six o'clock p.m.

At 5.27 p.m. the sitting of the House was suspended.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 6 p.m.

INCOME TAX ACT AND RELATED ACTS

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Thursday, July 21, 1988, consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-139, an Act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Frederal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, 1977 and certain related Acts, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee, and on the amendment of Mr. Garneau (p. 17724).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being 6 p.m., pursuant to order made Thursday, July 21, 1988, the House will now proceed to the deferred recorded division on the amendment of the Hon. Member for Laval-des-Rapides (Mr. Garneau) concerning Bill C-139.

Call in the Members.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Garneau) which was negatived, on the following division:

PETITIONS

PROTECTION OF RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present to the House today petitions from Duncan, Mill Bay, Cobble Hill and Shawinigan Lake, British Columbia, signed by over 680 people who petition Parliament to prepare legislation immediately to the effect that all human beings from the moment of fertilization until natural death be protected in the Charter of Rights, with the only exception being where medical procedures are necessary to prevent the death of the mother.

PROTECTION OF ROUGE RIVER VALLEY WILDERNESS AREA

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Scarborough Centre): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to present a petition from the residents of Scarborough, who join thousands of others working to protect the Rouge Valley in Scarborough as a unique and precious natural area.

Protecting the endangered wildlife and wilderness areas in this Rouge Valley is in the national interest, so we join with the federal Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan), Save the Rouge Valley System, and the Coalition of Scarborough Community Associations in expressing support for saving the valley, and call on the Government to work with the Government of Ontario to establish the Rouge River Valley as a Canadian heritage land or a provincial park.

Mr. Édouard Desrosiers (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure of presenting a petition from my constituents and from other residents of Canada, who humbly pray and beseech Parliament to pass legislation giving full protection to the human foetus, from conception to birth, to take the necessary measures for this law to be respected and for adequate services to be put in place to come to the assistance of pregnant women in difficulty.

There are 10,000 names on the petition I am presenting.

CANADA-U.S. FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have the duty to table another petition from Canadians regarding the Mulroney-Reagan trade agreement.

The signatories to this petition say that the Mulroney Government has sold Canada without getting anything in return; that Canadian industries are still not protected from American trade laws; that the United States has got everything it wanted in the important sectors, particularly agriculture, energy, trade, the automobile industry, financial services, investments; that thousands of Canadian jobs are threatened; and that the Conservative Government has not provided for any assistance to help Canadian workers adapt.

For these reasons, the petitioners humbly pray Parliament to censure the government for having signed the Mulroney-Reagan trade agreement.

RAILWAY SAFETY ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

Hon. Bill McKnight (for the Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of, and concurrence in, the amendment made by the Senate to Bill C-105, an Act to ensure the safe operation of railways and to amend certain other Acts in consequence thereof.

CANADA GRAIN ACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-112, an Act to amend the Canada Grain Act and other Acts in consequence thereof, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There are two motions in amendment on the Notice Paper for the report stage of Bill C-112, an Act to amend the Canada Grain Act and other Acts in consequence thereof, both standing in the name of the Hon. Member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo).

Motions Nos. 1 and 2 are admissible and will be debated and voted on separately.

I shall now put Motion No. 1 to the House.

Mr. Gauthier: The Member is not here.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): We will proceed to Motion No. 2. I will listen to the Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell (Mr. Boudria) on a point of order.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, if the House would give its consent I would gladly move Motion No. 2 in the place of the Hon. Member who proposed this motion to the House. However, I could not do so with Motion No. 1. That is why I did not rise to suggest it at that point. Perhaps one of his colleagues could move the motion for him.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (for Mr. Hovdebo) moved:

That Bill C-112 be amended in Clause 35 by striking out lines 38 to 40 at page 15 and substituting the following therefor:

"35.(1) Section 2 shall come into force January 1, 1990.

(2) Section 4 shall come into force January 1, 1990.

(3) All other provisions of this Act shall come into force on a day or days to be fixed by order of the Governor in Council."

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate on the motion introduced by the Member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) for the Member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo).

The purpose of Motion No. 2 proposed by the Member for Prince Albert is to ensure that Clause 2 and Clause 4 of the Bill do not come into force at the present time but that the application of those two clauses be delayed until January 1, 1990.

The House may ask why the Hon. Member for Prince Albert would want these two clauses of the Bill to come into force on January 1, 1990. I know the Hon. Member would want me to respond. Clause 2 of the Bill states:

> There shall be a Commission to be known as the Canadian Grain Commission consisting of three commissioners to be appointed by the Governor in Council to hold office, during good behaviour, for a renewable term of up to seven years.

The old section in the Act states that there shall be a commission to be known as the Canadian Grain Commission consisting of three commissioners to be appointed by the Governor in Council to hold office during pleasure. Notice the difference. Why does the Government want a seven-year term of office for members of the Canadian Grain Commission? The Hon. Member for Prince Albert quite ably pointed out why. My distinguished colleague, the Hon. Member for Algoma (Mr. Foster), during the debate on second reading and during committee proceedings also very eloquently pointed out that what the Government wanted to do in this case was to provide a sinecure, as in patronage, for one of its members to sit on the Canadian Grain Commission.

You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that the Conservative administration made a number of promises to the Canadian people. You will remember that the Conservatives told the people of Canada that patronage was wrong and that the preceding Government, which had appointed 19 people prior to the last election to various boards, agencies and the Senate—all positions which existed, mind you—was wrong. Upon coming into office the Conservatives went whole hog at patronage, and I use the words "whole hog" quite appropriately, I think. They fired people who had sat on various boards and agencies. They fired members of the Canadian Grain Commission, another agency of the Government.

I say to the Hon. Member opposite to pay attention because some day he may be one of those appointees, if the Government does not get defeated first. I say to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and Western Economic Diversification (Mr. McKnight), who seems to be taking notes of my remarks, that what the Conservatives did after they came to power, firing people as they did, taking away the livelihoods of these people, was for the mere purpose of replacing them with their Tory friends.

The Government in its wisdom, and I use the word loosely, has now decided that if it appoints a Conservative Member of Parliament to sit on the Canadian Grain Commission, the Liberals, when they are in power—which will be whenever the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) has the nerve, I will not use the words "intestinal fortitude", to call the election—may choose to fire that particular former Member of Parliament for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) from the Canadian Grain Commission. In order to avoid that, the Government has proposed a Bill which would have the effect of ensuring that the Member for Lisgar, in his incarnation as a member of the Canadian Grain Commission, will not be fired. In other words the Government wants to provide a sinecure for the Member for Lisgar.

All these Tories opposite might think I am cooking this up because they are far too partisan, but I know, Mr. Speaker, you would not believe that this is something I have cooked up. However,but let me read from an article in The Toronto Star of July 5, 1988. It is a very reliable source. It is a Canadian Press release and you can always believe the Canadian Press. It reads:

> Progressive Conservative MP Jack Murta, a former cabinet minister, will give up his House of Commons seat and accept a position with the Canadian Grain Commission, a newspaper says. Sources told the Winnipeg Free Press that the Manitoba MP will be appointed a commissioner with the federal grain-regulating agency, at a salary of $70,000 to $80,000 a year, within five weeks.

What is happening here is that the Government wants to appoint this Member of Parliament to that job. The Member of Parliament wants the job, but he feels it is too risky to accept because he could be turfed out later. Therefore, the Government in turn is trying to provide that protection for the Member of Parliament. I am not suggesting that the Liberal Government, when it is elected very shortly, will turf out the Member for Lisgar.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Boudria: I see I woke up a few Tories. That makes it all worthwhile. I am not saying the Liberals will turf this person out. But the rules are there, that people who sit on those commissions are deemed to be appropriate. If the Conservative Leader thought it was appropriate to fire everyone just because they did not happen to be Tories, why should Parliament now give the Conservative administration any special powers to protect a Member of Parliament of its own persuasion?

There is an article in the Manitoba Co-operater of February 18, 1988, by Sprinkler Sam. He writes:

> Hear ye, hear yea. The bed is being feathered for one Tory MP Jack Murta even as we speak. We have finally uncovered the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, on how Murta will become chief commissioner of the Canadian Grain Commission. (Have I ever lied to you before?).
> But follow carefully, for Murta's path has more curves and dips than the slalom ski run at Calgary this week.
> Apparently Charlie Mayer and Murta have agreed for some time that no one was better qualified than the Lisgar MP to head the grain commission. But there was one obstacle.
> CGC commissioners are employed "at the pleasure" of the reigning government. In other words, a new government could turf Murta out as fast as you can say Beth Candlish. Checking the polls, Murta told Mayer, uh-uh.
> On the other hand, Canadian Wheat Board commissioners are appointed to terms based on "good behaviour." That is, the government must show just cause in order to fire them. It makes a big difference.
> So? So in the House of Commons last week Mayer introduced amendments to the Canada Grain Act. Oh, nothing major. Just a bit of tidying up, we're told. A few odds and ends. Except for one amendment that will make CGC commissioner posts fixed seven-year terms based on "good behaviour".
> Murta goes to the commission, Klassen over to the wheat board, and both are safe if the Tories lose the next election. You're welcome.

Now you will understand, Mr. Speaker, why the Hon. Member for Prince Albert moved his amendment. It is a very good amendment, and I suggest to all Conservative Members of this House who may have made speeches on patronage during the last election campaign, that now is the time to put their money where their mouths were.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak for just a moment on Motion No. 2 which proposes to amend Bill C-112, which is an amendment to the Canada Grain Act. The proposed Bill would give the Government the ability to appoint up to six persons known as assistant commissioners to hold office during good behaviour with a renewable term of up to five years. In other words, an appointment is good for 10 years, one five-year term and a renewable five years. The old Act, I think, was quite adequate. It dealt with the phrase "for good behaviour" and also mentioned "at the pleasure of the Minister". The Canadian Wheat Board is appointed at the pleasure of the Minister as is the Canadian Grain Commission, and this will be the case until this Bill comes into effect.

The reasons for this amendment were made quite clear by my Liberal colleague from those three points southeast of Ottawa. He correctly pointed out the suspicions running throughout the western grain community that this particular amendment is designed to keep the retiring Member of Parliament for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) in an appointed position long enough to live out his working career and retire. That was not the original intention of the Canadian Grain Commission.

The original intention of the Canadian Grain Commission was to find the best people with the best backgrounds in the grains business.

I do not have any strong objection to the background of the Hon. Member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) to fill the position. However, I think that it is not necessary to make it a sinecure, which is the effect of this particular amendment.

There have been a few political appointees to the Canadian Grain Commission before. Generally, they were defeated candidates appointed by previous Liberal Governments and by previous Conservative Governments. It has become a sort of Senate of the western Canadian grains industry. Yet, for the most part, those appointees have been people with adequate background to do a good job of serving on the commission. There was no need prior to now, and I think there is no need now, to make those sinecures unassailable for at least five years and, upon good behaviour, a reappointment for a further five years.

George Leith was a former Member of the Legislature in Saskatchewan under the Thatcher Liberals. I believe he was a cabinet Minister for a brief time. He served honourably and well on the Canadian Grain Commission.

Years ago Forrest Hetland, who is now a member of the Canadian Wheat Board, served on the Grain Commission. He was considered to be something of a political appointee although I do not believe that he ever sought office. It was his father who had served as a Member of Parliament.

The tendency of Governments has been to appoint supporters to the commission. The recent appointment which went in reverse was a Diefenbaker appointment. I refer to the former Member of Parliament for Swift Current—Maple Creek, Mr. Frank Hamilton, who was a defeated candidate and who got his appointment that way. He then came back into politics and served as a Member of this House until his retirement at the end of the 1984 Session of Parliament.

The tradition of political appointees is not what we are opposed to in this particular motion, although I cannot particularly condone it, as long as the appointees are people who know the business. However, I think it is going a little too far when one ties the hands of all future Governments and future Ministers to the tradition of making those appointments at the pleasure of the Minister. To my recollection there has not been a practice by Ministers of the Crown to dispose of these appointees to the Grain Commission immediately upon taking office. Their appointments, if they are competent people, are relatively secure. I see no need for this particular amendment that the Government has put into these amendments to the Canadian Grain Act which would permit its appointees to hold the office during good behaviour, for at least five years.

I support the motion moved by my friend from Prince Albert which would delay the coming into force of this particular amendment until January 1, 1990, which is just beyond the longest possible mandate that this Government can have. Since we have been unable to have the clause deleted entirely, that would be the second choice.

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, very briefly, I wish to oppose the motion that has been brought forward by the Hon. Member. I do so as Chairman of the Standing Committee on Agriculture which, over the past several weeks, has studied these proposals in detail and made recommendations to the House.

The essence of the Canada Grain Act is that we have a set of commissioners whose responsibility it is to ensure the integrity of the grading system and the sampling system in Canada, and to ensure that Canada's reputation as a supplier of quality wheat and quality grains to the rest of the world remains intact.

A number of responsible farm organizations in the western Prairies have suggested to me, and I am sure to other members of the committee, that the best way to ensure the integrity of the grain commissioners is to give them a modest term of, say, seven years, in order that they have some security of tenure. In this way if they will be going to the expense of moving their families and setting up house in Winnipeg they can be reasonably assured that the job would endure for that length of time. Therefore they would be more independent and not subject to the whims of, perhaps, a particular Deputy Minister, or to a particular political pressure of the day. They would in fact have the independence required of such a responsible position in order to carry out the thrust of the Act which, after all, is to maintain the quality and integrity of Canada's grains and its reputation in the world market.

I cannot let the words of the Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell (Mr. Boudria) pass unchallenged. Only a Liberal could stand in this House and make the sort of ridiculous representations that he made. Only a Liberal would have the nerve to do it. The last time there were any substantive amendments to the Canada Grain Act was in 1971 when the then Liberal Government changed the Act. At that time and prior to it commissioners were appointed for a 10-year term which, in fact, may be too long. I believe that a period of five to seven years is probably about right. But the fact is that the commissioners were appointed for 10-year terms and the Liberal Government of the day brought forward legislation to eliminate that 10-year term and change it to "at the pleasure" for the specific reason of getting rid of Frank Hamilton, to whom the Hon. Member for Humboldt—Lake Centre (Mr. Althouse) referred.

Mr. Hamilton was an expert in the grains field. He belonged to the commission for some eight years and was summarily dismissed by the Liberal Government as a result of its having played politics with the legislation and overturning it. I think that the Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and Members of his Party have a lot of nerve to stand in this House and talk in terms of political manipulation of this Bill.

I simply want to say that I can think of no better guarantee to ensure the independence of the members of the commission than to give them a reasonable term of office. I think the suggestion of seven years is a reasonable and adequate one, one which I believe is supported in the main by responsible farm organizations and producers on the Prairies.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address the two motions briefly. First, Motion No. 1, which has been moved by the Hon. Member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) on behalf of the Hon. Member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo) is opposed to requests on the part of the commission that it be enabled or be given the authority to delegate certain responsibilities. During the course of the committee hearings the relevant authorities made it very clear—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would just like to say that Motion No. 1 was not put because there was no one in the House to put it. We are on Motion No. 2.

Mr. Clark (Brandon—Souris): I misunderstood, Mr. Speaker. I thought that it had been put by the Hon. Member for Nickel Belt on his entry into the House.

With respect to Motion No. 2, I would like to echo the comments made by the Chairman of the committee, the Hon. Member for Swift Current—Maple Creek (Mr. Wilson). I wish to point out that what the industry is seeking in its recommendations is that a length of term be established for grain commissioners, as has already been suggested, to secure some continuity. The Grain Commission is largely responsible for Canada's reputation which the Canadian wheat industry has achieved throughout the world. In times of difficult markets we have always been able to sell. The quality of our grain and reliability has never been in question. That is largely due to the work of the Canadian Grain Commission and those who represent the Government of Canada in that regard.

Many regulatory bodies are staffed by individuals who have a specific term, whether it be five or 10 years. What is suggested here is a compromise position that individual grain commissioners be put in position for a specific term of seven years, and assistant grain commissioners for a slightly lesser term. As has already been suggested to the House, we are anxious that people of quality be appointed. We are also anxious that people be protected in their appointments to the extent that it makes it worth-while for them to relocate to Winnipeg from Saskatchewan or Alberta. For example, with respect to assistant grain commissioners, one of the decisions made in recent months was that a position should be moved from Winnipeg to Brandon. People who accept such positions need to know that they will be there for a reasonable period of time if they are to accept that type of responsibility.

The suggestion that there should be a specific term is an appropriate one. It is consistent with other types of regulatory appointments that the House has made in the past. It should be stressed and sought by all Members that some assurance be given that those who are appointed to those important positions be well qualified individuals who are prepared to act on behalf of the industry, and indirectly on behalf of the Government of Canada. Since the Government came into office in 1984 it has built into the system a provision that such individuals can be called before a committee of Parliament to be questioned, if anyone should have any reservations whatsoever about the quality, qualifications or integrity of the individuals who are appointed.

In my opinion this amendment will strengthen the Grain Commission. It will encourage people with the appropriate qualifications to accept appointments if they are offered in the future. Quite frankly, it is in the long-term benefit of the industry, and that is why I hope at this stage the House will reject Motion No. 2.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question? The question is on Motion No. 2. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

Motion No. 2 (Mr. Hovdebo) negatived.

Hon. Frank Oberle (for the Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)) moved that the Bill be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When shall the Bill be read the third time? At the next sitting of the House?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

WESTERN GRAIN STABILIZATION ACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-132, an Act to amend the Western Grain Stabilization Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There are two motions in amendment on the Order Paper and Notices for report stage of Bill C-132, an Act to amend the Western Grain Stabilization Act. Motions Nos. 1 and 2 are acceptable and will be debated and voted on separately. I shall now put Motion No. 1 to the House.

Mr. Vic Althouse (for Mr. Hovdebo) moved:

Motion No. 1.

That Bill C-132 be amended in Clause 19 by striking out line 14 at page 20 and substituting the following therefor:

"man and four other members to be".

He said: I proposed this amendment, the effect of which is to provide an executive committee of a chairman and four members instead of an executive committee of seven members, to make it simpler to operate.

Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would like to explain briefly to the House why the Government prefers that the Motion No. 1 not be approved, and why the Government proposes that there be full and regional representation. The Government proposes that there should be eight members in total on the committee rather than five, as the motion moved by the Hon. Member for Humboldt—Lake Centre (Mr. Althouse) on behalf of the Hon. Member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo) would provide for.

We are seeking the opportunity to ensure that there be as full a regional representation as possible on this advisory committee. The opportunity to have eight members instead of five would enable us to add one additional member from each of the three prairie and grain producing provinces.

Therefore, we hope that the House would give us the authority to enlarge the committee because we believe that greater representation on the part of the industry is in the interests of the industry. The more opportunity we provide the industry itself to be directly represented the better it will be for the industry as a whole.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

Motion No. 1 (Mr. Hovdebo) negatived.

Hon. Frank Oberle (for the Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)) moved:

Motion No. 2.

That Bill C-132 be amended in Clause 26 by adding immediately after line 16 at page 22 the following:

"(7) The provisions of the said Act enacted by this Act, other than those in respect of which subsections (1) to (5) apply, shall be deemed to have come into force on July 31, 1988 and, for greater certainty, the following provisions of the said Act shall apply in respect of the crop year ending on that date, namely:

(a) the amendments to subsection 2(1) of the said Act, set out in subsections 1(1) to (3);

(b) subsections 4(2) to (4) of the said Act, as enacted by section 2;

(c) the amendments to paragraphs 8(4)(a) to (c) and subsections 8(5) and (6) of the said Act, as enacted by section 3;

(d) the amendments to paragraphs 10(1)(b) and (1.1)(b) and subsection 10(2) of the said Act, as enacted by section 4; and

(e) section 12 of the said Act, as enacted by section 5."

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a few moments to explain why Motion No. 2 has been introduced at this particular point. The difficulty that has arisen is that Bill C-132 may not be enacted into legislation as early as we had anticipated. This amendment would ensure that once Bill C-132 is proclaimed, it will take effect as of July 31, 1988, and shall be deemed to have come into force on that date. Therefore, it shall apply retroactively to the entire 1987-88 crop year.

During the committee stage of the Bill it appeared that there was a reasonable possibility that the Bill would not be proclaimed until sometime in August, assuming passage through the House and the other place. The purpose of this amendment is to make it very clear that the Bill shall be deemed to have come into effect on July 31, which is the last day of the crop year, and it shall apply retroactively to the entire 1987-88 crop year.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have no negative reaction to this particular proposal. I regret that the Government had worded it in that manner to begin with.

• (1150)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea?

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion carried.

Motion No. 2 (Mr. Mayer) agreed to.

Hon. Frank Oberle (for the Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)) moved that the Bill be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When shall the Bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Frank Oberle (for the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds) moved that the Bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I want to take a few minutes to indicate my Party's support for the technical amendments provided for in Bill C-132. We know, of course, that the Bill provides for the write-down of some $750 million of the Western Grain Stabilization Fund under the Western Grain Stabilization Act. We know that the provisions of the Bill are to permit and encourage farmers to participate in stabilization and that this would be enhanced if the Bill were passed by July 31. Our Party indicated its usual full co-operation with the Government in assisting the Minister and his Parliamentary Secretary by consenting to immediate third reading debate rather than the customary wait of one day that was imposed. We were glad to participate and to accommodate the Government in that way. We want farmers to be able to participate this year, and that will be possible with the passage of this Bill now.

I just wanted to state as well that we welcome the fact that the Government has this commitment to the Western Grain Stabilization Act. We know that that commitment to the Act was not always there on the part of Conservative Members. We remember the fine work that was done in that area by the then Minister, Otto Lang. I want to reiterate the good wishes to Mr. Lang for his fine work and, of course, to the excellent Parliamentary Secretary that he had at the time, Ralph Goodale. Ralph will very shortly be the Premier of the Province of Saskatchewan. We wish him well. I know that all Hon. Members, particularly the Conservative Members who are now such fans of stabilization, will want to pay homage as well to Ralph Goodale. I thought that I would mention that to ensure that all Members of Parliament were aware of the excellent work done in that regard.

[Translation]

So, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleagues in the Liberal Party, on behalf of my colleague the Hon. Member for Algoma (Mr. Foster), on behalf of the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Gary (Mr. Axworthy), I would like to express our consent to this government measure. We are happy to see that the Conservative Government has finally come round to favouring western grain stabilization. This hasn't always been a Conservative policy, as you know, because at a certain moment the extreme right of the Conservative Party had some difficulties with the idea of a stabilization program. It was seen by yesterday's Tories—I say "yesterday's", but some of yesterday's Tories are still with us today, and we call them the dinosaurs—it was seen by yesterday's Tories as some kind of socialist measure. That is not the case. We know this system is good for the agriculture sector, and we also know that governments intervene in agriculture in almost every country in the whole world.

[English]

So we know that there is government intervention in agriculture in most countries of the world, and that the Government has a moral duty to assist Canadian agriculture.

The stabilization program is an example of a system which can benefit farmers during particularly bad years—such as the one that the grain sector is going through right now—bad years that are caused in large measure by the war of subsidies between the United States of America and the European Economic Community. Canada is standing in the middle of this war of subsidies and money and is being bombarded on both sides. Our farmers have had a very low return for their crops.

It is interesting to note that the United States—and I have said this previously—chose to adopt the U.S. Farm Bill, the United States Food Security Act 1985, at the same time as it was going through this trade deal between our two countries. In other words, they were negotiating to end subsidies, to end all kinds of trade-distorting measures between the two countries, yet at the same time the Government of the United States was imposing what is by far the most offensive piece of legislation that it could have ever aimed at Canadian agriculture. I suppose it was not directly aimed at Canadian agriculture; it was aimed at European agriculture. When you are standing in the crossfire, it is very small comfort to know that when you are shot, it is really someone else that they wanted to shoot, but you are still shot. That is in fact what happened to Canadian agriculture. It has received a severe blow from those subsidy wars. I hope that a solution is found to that in the near future so that Canadian farmers, particularly grain farmers, can start receiving income which is more reasonable than what they have been subjected to over recent years, particularly, I might add, last year.

This year there have been other problems, with the drought and everything else. All those situations combined have caused many Canadians to pause and to reflect on the necessity of supporting our agriculture.

I received a number of interesting phone calls, some from my constituents right here in eastern Canada. They contacted me a few weeks ago and asked the following: "We see our brothers and sisters in western Canada affected by this drought. What can we do to help as easterners?" I thought that was fascinating. It demonstrated an element of goodwill from constituents and from citizens outside my constituency but nevertheless around the general area that I represent in the House of Commons, and I was glad to see that kind of a reaction.

I indicated to them the plans that the Government had and the fact that opposition Members in the House were encouraging the Government to go even further in assisting our agricultural sector and that we would continue to do that and, as Members of the House, we would give every assistance to the Government to ensure that help was forthcoming to that sector of Canadian life, mainly western Canadian agriculture. I was glad, and I thought that I would take a moment to express that, in order to see the reaction of some of the people that I represent. I think that it is a very healthy sign when we see our citizens paying for a long-distance phone call to contact Members of Parliament to express their wish to help fellow citizens who live 2,000 or 3,000 miles away from them. That, for me, was very heart-warming. It is far better to see that than some of the divisions which we have experienced from time to time in Canada.

That being said, I want to give my support to this Bill and hope that the House will pass it very shortly. I think that after we pass this Bill we may find time to deal with another agricultural issue if the Parliamentary Secretary wishes to seek our consent for it. I will let him address that later.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to take a few moments at third reading to describe the amendments to the Western Grain Stabilization Act, which I think all Members of the House know has been a very, very important part of the income support program in western Canada.

I might note in passing that there are a variety of support programs. Eastern Canadian producers are able to participate in the agriculture stabilization program, but at recent meetings which took place in Toronto and which I had an opportunity to attend with the federal Minister and his provincial counterparts, there was increased interest in the possibility of creating some sort of national stabilization program. Some talks are being held along that line, but in the meantime it is extremely important to the agricultural well-being of western Canada that the Western Grain Stabilization Act be as effective as it possibly can be. These amendments are designed to achieve that, and I appreciate the supportive sentiments of the Hon. Member who just spoke.

This legislation is part of a long-range program. I guess all of us in this House are conscious of the fact that we must respond to the crisis of the moment in an ad hoc fashion, but I think we all believe that the ideal solutions are long-term solutions, and this legislation is part of that umbrella which has played an important role these last three or four years.

As you will recall, in his meeting with farm leaders last December, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) announced that some changes to this Act would be proposed as part of a comprehensive agricultural policy to assist producers in financial need primarily as a result of the trade war which has been going on between the European Community and the U.S. Unfortunately, we are very much victims of that war.

Some of the things we have done have been very important. I would refer just in passing to the Special Grains Program No. 2 which of course injected $1.1 billion into the hands of all grain producers. Then there were fuel tax rebates and other programs. However, the legislation before us today addresses what has probably become the most important income support program available to western Canadian producers. During the course of this last year alone the participants received some $1.4 billion. That was of tremendous benefit to the 135,000 western Canadian farmers who are part of the program.

However, we are concerned about the fact that not all farmers chose to participate, for a variety of reasons. Certainly a number of farmers disliked the program when it was originally created, some for philosophical reasons, some because they feared it would not be productive to join. Now that we are in a situation where a lot of the income support made available to western farmers is provided by this program we are troubled by the fact that an estimated 15 per cent of western farmers are not participants. These amendments are designed to encourage a significant percentage of that group to join and benefit.

As a result, the 10 per cent penalty for rejoining has been removed. The deadline for participation in the 1987-88 crop year will be extended so non-participants can rejoin. More crops are being covered. I think that is appropriate because western agriculture is becoming more diversified and a number of crops such as mixed grain, sunflower seeds, safflower seeds, buckwheat, peas, lentils, faba beans and canaryseeds, to name just a few, have been added. Payments for rejoining and conditional participants has been increased.

In addition, we are trying to put the program on a solid financial footing, of course. Unfortunately, we are now looking at a $2.2 billion deficit. If this program were operating without strong federal government support it would probably no longer be in operation, as my hon. friend suggested. The deficit must be addressed sooner or later, and as announced last December we decided to try to address it sooner and ensure that it be viable and that those who participate understand its viability and are encouraged to continue to participate.

We hope to address the deficit in three ways. The debt write-down of $750 million in this legislation will, apart from the obvious, further reduce the deficit by virtue of the fact there will be a reduction in interest charges levied against the account. In addition, there will be an appropriate increase in the Government and producer share of the levy. It is only fair that mechanism be reformed to make it more responsive to the fund's condition. Unfortunately, in the past, when the fund was in a surplus position, the levy seemed to be rising. When it moved into a deficit the levy seemed to be declining. That did not make any sense and that is why the amendments are before us.

Without the $750 million deficit write-down we believe that any increase in producer levies which would have been necessary would have been so prohibitive as to have discouraged participation and therefore would have reduced the effectiveness of the program. As I say that, I am conscious of the fact that there is a significant group in western Canada, the so-called committee of non-participants, who appeared before the legislative committee and made representations. We are hoping that upon reflection they will see there are some advantages for them in the amended program and many will be encouraged to participate.

As a result of increases for this crop year and next, producer levies will be increased from 1 per cent to 4 per cent. The Government's share will be increased from 3 per cent to 6 per cent. The federal Government will of course continue to pay in the bulk of the fee, and I for one have suggested in the past that the provinces at some point might wish to join and make this a tripartite program, but it may be no surprise to you if I were to say that there has been no provincial stampede in that direction as yet.

The federal Government believes we must maintain the effectiveness of this Act because it is the only program which automatically makes payments to western grain farmers when their income drops. We do not believe we can depend on ad hoc approaches even though they are sometimes necessary. We believe we need long-term programs like this. We believe it has proven its effectiveness, particularly in these last three or four years. There were many doubters, but we believe these amendments will strengthen the program and broaden the farm safety net by encouraging more producers to join. Therefore, we hope the Bill will be supported by the House.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on Bill C-132, amendments to the Western Grain Stabilization Act. This Act has always represented a bit of a dilemma for western farmers. In its original form it did not go far enough. It did not look to the income needs of individual farmers. Instead, it paid attention to the cash flow in the total region. We had disparities and odd situations occurring with the pay-outs that were generated, such as in 1977 when I, as a farmer and member of the program, received a payment although I had one of my best income years ever. I took that payment and paid a big chunk of it back to Revenue Canada as income tax. I think it would have been much more useful to the region had we been able to target it in parallel with crop insurance so that those who had an income requirement would have reaped the benefit of the program.

I have some reservations about the over-all direction of the program because I think we will find it will have to be changed and perhaps replaced with something else because it is not available to all farmers unless they apply. The program cannot be applied to individual income needs and the ups and downs of a particular crop production. It does not run parallel with crop insurance so it does not do much to address income stability on the individual farm. There is no disaster component in this program nor is there a disaster component in the crop insurance program. I think that three successive droughts in the last five years would show us that something like that is needed in any future income stabilization program.

As well, the fact that it has been a regional program has, to some extent, been a problem. It becomes a problem when we end up, as we have now, with a deficit of close to $3 billion in this program.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, having gone through the original debate, the arguments about whether or not the premiums were set properly. Mr. Whelan, in the last days of his administration, fiddled with the formula so it would trigger a pay-out during an election. With the advent of this administration, the formula was further fiddled with so it would pay a much larger pay-out. In short, the result has been a deficit of approximately $3 billion.

That 15 per cent to 18 per cent of farmers who are still outside the program are facing a real dilemma. They do not know if they should rush in and take this last payment that is now open to them with this window of opportunity before August 1 and then be responsible for premium increases of 400 per cent, the premiums moving from 1 per cent to 4 per cent, immediately upon joining the program. At the same time, the Government's share of the contribution will drop. It now pays $3 for every producer dollar, and that amount will drop to $6 for every $4 producers put in.

Some of the producers who are outside the program are asking themselves if they should join now only to be responsible for paying off the $3-billion deficit. The Government has responded with a bit of a carrot by saying that $750 million of that deficit will be written off by some of the amendments presented in this Bill and therefore the deficit will be only $2.2 billion. However, this still does not solve the dilemma facing those people.

Over the last five years, the program has been changed to the point where it is no longer on a financially sound footing. The combination of amendments made by the former Minister, Mr. Whelan, and by the current Minister, has changed the position of the program from having a net figure of just over $1 billion in the fund to having a net deficit of something in the order of $3 billion. In the short time of just five years, it has paid out approximately $4 billion more than it has taken in. To me, this points out that recent amendments have made this a very shaky financial institution for the stabilization of grain incomes on the Prairies and sets the stage for a complete revamping of the stabilization attitude to grain production that exists right across Canada. It gives any future Government, a Government which my Party may form, an opportunity to introduce a new concept of income insurance that would in fact provide stabilization to individual farmers based on their production and their income, and would have a disaster component built into it in the event of the kind of drought or hail storms that occur on the Prairies or some of the local disasters that can occur in the rest of the country.

It is a great opportunity to see the program's failings as they exist. These amendments are an attempt to make the best we can out of a bad piece of cloth. It is a badly made coat which we are trying to wear to keep some of the rain out. With the experience we have had since the early 1970s, we can now see ways of making a much better income stabilization program for farmers, and I hope that we can have the opportunity to present such a program after the next election.

At this time, I have no major objection to the Government's attempt to make this badly fitting garment somewhat more waterproof. I hope we can therefore allow the Government to go through with the amendments, even though they do not correct the over-all problems that have existed with the western grain stabilization program from its inception right up to this time.

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a brief point of clarification. The Hon. Member who just spoke referred to producers joining before July 31 of this year, before the end of the current crop year. It is important to point out that the Bill has in fact provided for an extension of that deadline so that current non-participants would have a chance to join retroactive to August 1 of 1987. They will have, as I understand it, 60 days after proclamation of this Bill in which to join, which, as a practical matter, should run the deadline up to approximately October 1, and producers can rest assured that they will receive plenty of notice as to the actual deadline.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Clark (Brandon—Souris): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think you may find that there is a unanimous disposition on the part of Members of the House to consider Bill C-112 for third reading at this time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there such unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADA GRAIN ACT

Hon. Frank Oberle (for the Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds) moved that Bill C-112, an Act to amend the Canada Grain Act and other Acts in consequence thereof, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I do not know if the Parliamentary Secretary would have wished to speak first. If so, I would gladly give my place, and if not, I will make my remarks now. Perhaps the Parliamentary Secretary can summarize, after having heard what other Hon. Members have said.

Mr. Nickerson: Let's get through with it.

Mr. Boudria: I think the Hon. Member across is not aware that we have had discussions in order to co-operate by giving the Government unanimous consent to proceed with third reading of this Bill today. This just goes to show that when it is reasonable to do so, the Opposition always co-operates with the Government. Sometimes we cannot co-operate with the Government when it is too unreasonable, but when it is reasonable, the Opposition can be reasonable as well, and I am sure that Canadians are noting the consent we are giving to the Government.

Bill C-112 is a Bill about which we have reservations because of a provision in the Bill. Nevertheless, we have conceded to giving that unanimous consent. That just goes to show the kind of co-operation that can exist.

The précis of the Bill provided by the Government to Members of the House states that the amendments to the Canada Grain Act provide for clarification and standardization of terminology used in the Act. That is true, of course, and we recognize that. It provides for the authority to establish by regulation, subject to Governor in Council approval, time limits for the deferral of pricing, the storage of grain in elevators and payments for grain by licensed elevators and grain dealers. That is true as well. It provides for the limitation of protection of securities posted within the commission to actual producers holding cash purchase tickets and the clarification of which documents are to be issued by licensed elevators for grain dealers. It provides for the consolidation of authority to establish and change grades by regulations of the commission subject to Governor in Council approval, the flexibility to package and certify specific qualities of grain and, finally, specific terms of office for commissioners and assistant commissioners.

You will notice the way in which the Government worded that last part. It is just a little less than accurate to say, "to provide for specific terms of office for commissioners and assistant commissioners". As I indicated previously, that really means that the Government has decided to provide for a guaranteed seven-year term of office for one of its colleagues. The Member for Swift Current—Maple Creek (Mr. Wilson) was all upset a while ago because I dared to raise this issue in the House of Commons. The Member was so successful in his representation that I was not going to speak on this issue again. However, since he raised it again I thought that I should mention it once again myself just to remind Canadians of what is going on.

In his remarks the Member for Swift Current—Maple Creek said that only a Liberal could say that this issue is inappropriate, implying—if you can believe it—partisan motives on my part. I know that you do not believe that either, Mr. Speaker. However, do not think for one minute that I am the only one concerned about this. In fact, a very well respected newspaper, The Toronto Star, has raised this as an issue of concern.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Boudria: I see that a few Tories wake up whenever you talk about The Toronto Star. Well, if the Tories will cool down for a minute I will give them other sources almost as factual as The Toronto Star. The Manitoba Co-operator was of the same opinion as I on this. Tories sometimes believe that everyone in the media is out to get them. I suppose they can believe whatever they like, however inaccurate it is.

I will remind you of a letter sent by Prairie Pools Inc. I ask the Conservative Member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Belsher) to pay attention to this because it is important and we may ask questions later. Prairie Pools Inc. sent a letter to the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Agriculture who happens to be the Member for Swift Current—Maple Creek. The letter is dated July 18. This letter was not written by myself as an opposition Member of Parliament but by Prairie Pools Inc. It says:

> In regard to Bill C-112, the three Pools support the authority of the Canadian Grain Commission in establishing and maintaining standards of quality for Canadian grains and oilseeds and regulating grain handling in Canada . . . PPI believes that it is imperative that appointments be made on the basis of relevant background and requisite skills to ensure continuity and effectiveness within the CGC. PPI also has some concerns with the length of the renewable term of appointment contemplated in the legislation of up to seven years.

I did not cook this up. I certainly did not tell Prairie Pools Inc. to include this in the letter it sent to the Government. Even if I had tried, I doubt that I would have had much influence in causing it to do so because it is, of course, a pretty independent-thinking group which says what it wants based on what it believes is correct.

Prairie Pools Inc. says that the Government has failed by not indicating specific qualifications necessary to do this job and by providing for a seven-year term of appointment.

Mr. Althouse: Renewable.

Mr. Boudria: Yes, as the Member for Humboldt—Lake Centre (Mr. Althouse) has just indicated, a renewable seven-year term.

I just wanted to express those concerns to the House. We do agree with the other provisions but I have strong reservations about that clause. My colleagues, the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Gary (Mr. Axworthy) and the Hon. Member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) have expressed those concerns in the House. The Member for Algoma even moved an amendment at committee. I expressed those same reservations at report stage earlier today.

I hope that the representations we have made have convinced government back-benchers to take a second look. I know that deep down inside some of the Tory back-benchers who will not be getting such a sinecure are probably wondering why this Member should be getting such a sinecure when they will not. When the Member for Nipissing (Mr. Mantha), who is seated over there, is defeated shortly no one will give him a juicy job at $80,000 a year, much less a juicy job renewable for two seven-year terms.

I remind Members of that and remind them to be free and independent thinkers because the Government will not take care of them in that way. Conservative Members of Parliament should not opt for a system which provides for appointments in such a manner.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, this concludes the remarks I wanted to make at third-reading stage of Bill C-112, and I venture to hope that the House will pass the Bill today, even if personally I have to express my reservations about the clause in the Bill that allows Commissioners to be appointed for seven years, a new formula not found in the existing Act.

[English]

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few remarks at third reading stage in support of Bill C-112. This legislation is long overdue. It has been 17 years since there have been any substantial changes to this Act. The Government is very committed to consulting with the industry, and the amendments before us today are a by-product of that consultative process.

The Canada Grain Act provides a framework for the very important work of the Canadian Grain Commission. It is exceedingly important that we in this House affirm our support for the Canadian Grain Commission because, as I said earlier today, to a very large degree the integrity of our reputation in international grain markets is directly a result of the activities of the Canadian Grain Commission. We certainly want to reaffirm our commitment to the commission and to the quality of product which it ensures is made available for sale throughout the world by the Canadian Wheat Board. Those high quality standards in the regulation of the grain handling system are an integral part of our entire marketing process. The well-being of Canadian agriculture depends on the success of this committee.

I would like to address briefly the issue of the length of service which Canadian Grain Commission members will provide as a result of these amendments because that is of some concern to Hon. Members in the Opposition. At one time we in this country, as in most other democracies, used to have a civil service which was largely, perhaps even essentially, politicized. One of the reasons for that was the fact that all members of the civil service were appointed at the pleasure of the Minister and, consequently, were subject to dismissal by a Minister at any give time.

Canadian legislators who came before us very wisely decided to reform that system. One of the ways in which they did it was by ensuring that those who had appointments in the Public Service were guaranteed the opportunity to function free of political interference. We moved toward a non-politicized civil service by moving in the direction of permanent appointments. That was an important and necessary direction which was established some time ago.

In my opinion, the proposed amendments which will give assistant grain commissioners and commissioners a specific term of office is a step in that same direction. We are hereby ensuring that those individuals will be free to act irrespective of even the displeasure of their superiors. They will be free to do what is necessary to maintain the integrity of the Canadian grain industry. I believe that these proposed amendments are very much in the continuing tradition of a non-politicized Public Service and I believe they have the good support of the industry throughout the country.

We are striving to make the Canada Grain Act more efficient. These amendments essentially involve two categories: to improve the administration of the Act and to provide for more flexibility in grading and in standards.

The first category of amendments improve the administration of the Canada Grain Act by including amendments that adapt to new grain handling and information processing techniques.

There are also amendments which define the specific terms for those who hold the important offices provided for in the Act.

The second category of amendments provide for more flexibility in developing grades and grade standards. For example, in the future the commission will be able to package and certify specific types of grain according to what buyers want. It is a changing market and something we have discovered is that the grains standards and labelling we have employed in the past are not necessarily totally consistent with what buyers in different parts of the world are seeking today.

We believe that the new flexibility provided for by these amendments will permit us to tap into new markets. That is extremely important in a very competitive international market.

The third category of amendments are those which clarify the financial protection operative of the Canada Grain Act. They were dealt with before in the committee.

The Canadian Grain Commission has helped Canada maintain a very solid reputation as a reliable supplier of high quality grain and grain products. The amendments we are proposing today will make it easier for the commission to operate. We think that is good news for all those who are dependent on the Canadian grain industry.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe there is unanimous consent to call it one o'clock?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the Chair until two o'clock this day.

At 12.33 p.m., the House took recess.

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT—CALL FOR GENERAL ELECTION

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, this morning the National Action Committee on the Status of Women said that the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement is like an iceberg. There is much more to it than what appears. In other words, this is not just a trade agreement but an agreement which threatens Canadian independence with respect to our resources, our water, our energy, the environment, social policy and regional development.

We in the Liberal Party are not opposed to freer trade, but we are opposed to this agreement. Unfortunately, many Canadians are confused by this complex deal and want time to examine it at greater length. This Bill will change the nature of Canada and make us a quasi colony of the United States. It is for this reason we must have an election before the trade Bill is passed.

Let Canadians decide if they want this deal or not. What is the Government afraid of? Call an election!

THE SENATE

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, the Senate is an institution that costs $34 million a year and does not benefit Canada. Rather, it is an obsolete body that must be abolished.

Canadian democracy, as we would like it to be, has no place for this second chamber which intervenes in a partisan way without any mandate to do so.

The Canadian provinces have only one legislative body, made up of elected representatives who have had to go through the democratic process. The political development of the provinces is not endangered by having a unicameral legislature.

If the Liberals continue to intend to use the Senate to block the passage of the Free Trade Agreement and to insist that Canadians vote on this issue in the next election, we too can ask Canadians to speak out for the abolition of the Senate.

FUR TRAPPING INDUSTRY

CHANGE IN TRAPPING METHODS URGED

Mr. Roland de Corneille (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, not many Canadians condone the use of the brutal leghold trap in the fur industry. It is obvious the European Community believes that no one should make their living by the inhumane suffering of animals. An animal caught in a leghold trap endures tremendous suffering for a considerable amount of time. It has been documented that animals have chewed off their own legs to escape the pain caused them by these traps.

Alternate trapping devices do exist and they are more humane than the leghold device. A motion passed by this House on July 20 even states that Canada is a world leader in humane trap research. However, while this motion is aimed at maintaining the livelihood of many Canadians, it is really only a stop gap mechanism, falling far short of providing a solution to the controversy.

If the fur industry is to continue, then those involved in it must change their trapping methods forthwith. They must understand that using the leghold trap will always bring about a public outcry and will lead to the elimination of the fur industry's domestic as well as overseas markets, and even an end to the fur industry itself in Canada.

DESTRUCTION OF PLANET'S RAIN FORESTS

Mr. John Oostrom (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, the destruction of our planet's rain forests will lead to environmental disaster. Scientists have predicted the Amazon Basin which contains the world's largest great rain forest, covering an area the size of Western Europe, will be destroyed by the end of the next decade. Rain forests in other parts of the planet have similar futures. With that destruction there will be a sharp increase in the level of carbon dioxide.

As carbon dioxide levels increase, so does the warming of our planet, which creates the greenhouse effect. Our planet is already experiencing its effects now. The present drought in North America and last year's unpredictable winter in Europe are examples of what we can expect. We in the developing nations must do whatever is necessary to reverse this trend while at the same time providing these nations with assistance so that they have viable economic alternatives.

SHIPYARDS

CONSTRUCTION OF MINESWEEPERS—ANNOUNCEMENT MADE BY MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, the Conservative Government has started to repeat what it did in the 1984 election, namely make promises that it will not keep.

We had the best evidence of that yesterday, when the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Beatty) was in Quebec City to lead the people of the Lauzon, Sorel and Vickers shipyards to believe that the Government would build 12 minesweepers.

After Quebecers were cheated on the frigates, after the Ministers and Members from the region had promised spinoffs, we see the Minister of National Defence again trying to lull Quebecers.

Mr. Speaker, the people at the shipyards in Lauzon, Sorel and Montreal will not make the same mistake of believing this Government. They want elections so they can beat this Conservative Government.

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT—POSITION OF LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, Quebecers will never forgive the Leader of the Liberal Opposition (Mr. Turner) for working hand and glove with the Senate to block the will of Canada's elected representatives. The Francophone press in Quebec has severely criticized the Liberal Leader's strategy. On July 22, Claude Masson wrote in La Presse about the undemocratic nature of a decision he qualified as inconceivable and unpardonable. Paul-André Comeau, in an editorial in Le Devoir of July 22, under the heading "A desperate wager", asked the following question: "Is the Liberal Leader playing Russian roulette, with bullets in every single chamber?"

Mr. Speaker, this new blunder by the Liberal Leader shows once again that he doesn't understand the people of Quebec. Most Quebecers think the Senate is useless and costs too much money, and they will never have any sympathy for a politician who hides behind the skirts of this institution. In the next federal election, Quebecers will make the Liberal Leader pay a very high price for this underhanded manoeuvre which reveals a lack of the most elementary leadership!

THE ADMINISTRATION

CRITICISM OF POLICIES

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I sense cynicism and skepticism off this Hill because of a lack of balance for fair economic policy coupled with fair social policy. Conservative scales of justice are tilted by a market-driven philosophy for its own sake.

Seniors see through the Government's hypocritical language to the fine print realities of living in this Tory land, seniors and middle-income earners who understand they are bearing the brunt of this Tory-vision world.

What an unfair, hidden, tax-ridden destiny, seniors tell me have been foisted on them. Yet the Government thinks Canadians are stupid. After taxing hundreds of dollars from each of our pockets since 1984 it thinks that we are fooled and will say thank you for putting back a few dollars in this month's pay-cheque. We are not deceived.

Does it think us so senile that we cannot remember its attack on fixed incomes through a sneaky attempt at deindexing our pensions, or for even considering a food tax? Shame on the Government for deindexing the tax table, for removing the $1,000 pension investment income deduction, for discriminating in allocations of spousal allowances, for attempting cuts in our New Horizons programs, and particularly for calling its trade deal free when it is a total sell-out of Canada.

There is no integrity out there in Tory-land. Seniors will never trust a Conservative Government again.

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

INCREASED FEDERAL FUNDING

Mr. Don Ravis (Saskatoon East): Mr. Speaker, the federal Government stands firmly behind the Farm Credit Corporation. That is good news for Canada's farmers.

The $400 million in support announced last week by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) will ensure that the FCC continues to assist the agricultural community. This is a first step toward financial recovery for many Canadian farmers.

To ensure total financial recovery for the FCC, additional funds will be provided as needed over the next three years. The corporation will be able to continue to provide long-term credit to farmers at competitive rates. Farmers with outstanding debt to the FCC will continue to be treated fairly.

Saskatchewan farmers are carrying the largest FCC debt load. This announcement is very good news for the farmers in our province.

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY

REPORT OF CANADA EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION ADVISORY COUNCIL

Mr. Jack Harris (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, the tabling of the report by the Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council on the employment needs and policies for Newfoundland and Labrador is welcomed.

The Advisory Council's report has supported the recommendations put forward by the New Democratic caucus on the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, and on the need to concentrate on the traditional industries of Newfoundland, such as the fishery, as a source of future employment and prosperity.

On ACOA, the report supports the New Democratic caucus proposals to have board members of the agency include representatives of business, labour, and social organizations, which proposals were rejected by the Government. The council supports the New Democratic Party's proposal that ACOA funding be allocated to Newfoundland on the basis of its economic disparity, rather than to be treated as if its needs were the same as the other maritime provinces. It supports the long-held view of this Party that it is time for Canada to adopt a policy of full employment for our young people based upon the Swedish model.

Newfoundland and Labrador will need 80,000 new jobs between now and 1995 in order to meet their needs. Only 18,000 are ever likely to be created under current policies.

Hibernia is not the answer, and never will be for the unemployed of Newfoundland. New approaches are needed.

I call upon the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mrs. McDougall) to announce immediately that she will implement the proposals and recommendations of this committee so that the unemployed of Newfoundland will have some hope for the future.

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT—POSITION OF LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce): By asking the Senate to block the free trade legislation, Mr. Speaker, John Turner has acted irresponsibly. This partisan manoeuvre sets a dangerous precedent. By using their majority of non-elected representatives in the Senate, the Liberals are short-circuiting the parliamentary decision-making process to oppose the will of a majority of Conservative Members, who were elected as a result of the clear desire for change indicated by Canadians in the election of 1984. This was a desperate gesture on the part of the Liberal Leader. According to the polls, most Quebecers and Canadians are in favour of free trade. There are so many benefits—

Conscious of the fact that his Party will go down to defeat, the Liberal Leader has attempted this manoeuvre before the election to dramatize the debate. This goes against the economic interests of Canadians. Formerly, federal Liberals in Quebec were considered as brothers by the provincial Liberals. Subsequently, the climate changed. No longer brothers, they became cousins. But today, federal Liberals in Quebec have definitely become the enemies of the provincial Liberals in that province. By opposing an agreement that would be highly beneficial for Quebec, Mr. Speaker, John Turner's federal Liberals have dug their own grave.

Mr. Speaker, the ones who are being manipulated are the non-elected senators. As Mr. Masson pointed out in La Presse: "They are taking part in a highly irregular, outrageous, blasphemous and anti-democratic manoeuvre". Shame on the Senators who let themselves be manipulated!

RAILWAYS

RAIL SAFETY TASK FORCE REPORT

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Bouchard) has now received a report from the federal Rail Safety Task Force, and as we have learned from one of the task force members who issued a minority report a few weeks ago, the charge was that the task force was biased in favour of the railway lobby and that a plan to relocate rail lines for dangerous goods transportation away from the Metropolitan Toronto area, and other urban centres, to less populated areas, was only recommended for further study based on the question of economics. I beg to differ.

The question of relocating railway lines and slowing down railway speeds should not be settled on the basis of economics but on the safety and viability of communities living along those railway lines. Various neighbourhoods in my own riding of York West are already burdened and frustrated with the noise levels and vibrations and the de-evaluation of their properties because of these railway lines. They do not need another threat of dangerous spills in their community.

I ask the Minister, in preparing a response, to take a lesson from the mishaps that have already occurred and to establish that the fact of safety must be the first, the foremost, and the undisputed priority for this Government to consider.

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION ADMINISTRATION

JURISDICTION OVER IRRIGATION PROJECTS

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, the PFRA has for some 50 years developed and managed water reservoirs, irrigation projects and other works in southwestern Saskatchewan. Current PFRA patrons appreciate the expertise of the PFRA and express their satisfaction with the job that PFRA has done. The patrons are therefore opposed to any transfer of irrigation projects to provincial management under the Saskatchewan Water Corporation.

The Palliser Triangle is a unique area of Canada, a low rainfall area beset by periodic drought, an area wherein water management and conservation are of critical importance. The farm families who utilize the irrigation system appreciate the competence and expertise built up by PFRA over the past six decades. They therefore reject any suggestion of transfer of their projects to the Saskatchewan Water Corporation. They are unanimous in requesting that the federal Government, through the PFRA, continue to operate and manage the District Three southwestern Saskatchewan irrigation projects.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

CLOSURE OF STEAM PLANT IN WINNIPEG

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg—Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, I have a statement to make which I hope will be brought to the attention of the Hon. Member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), who is the Government's pointman with respect to the redevelopment of the CNR east yards in Winnipeg. It has to do with the fact that the old CNR steam plant is being closed down and a new steam plant is being built under the auspices of VIA.

The concern is that the employees who now work at the CN steam plant are not being given an opportunity to transfer over to the new plant, to the VIA plant, in the way that many other CNR employees have been given such opportunities over the years, as various jobs have gone from CN to VIA Rail. I would call on the Hon. Member for Provencher to look into this and to see if some justice can be done, if these CNR employees can be treated in the same way as previous CNR employees have been treated when there has been a transfer of jobs to VIA.

RIDEAU RIVER POLLUTION

Mr. Barry Turner (Ottawa—Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the Rideau River at Mooney's Bay is a polluted mess. When storm sewers run off into the river—and it is raining today here in Ottawa—the fecal coliform count in the river rises to unacceptable limits and the beach is closed. For all intents and purposes there is no industrial pollution going into the river; it is strictly from domestic animals.

On the weekend I visited the marina at Mooney's Bay with my three children. As we walked around the kids looked at me and said: "Dad, you aren't going to go into that water, are you?" I said: "No, I'm not". They said: "It looks rotten." The youngest, the five-year old, said: "It looks brutal". I told them that I was not going to go in it, but that many people do: boaters do, canoeists do, and water skiers do.

If you are ever out there water-skiing on Mooney's Bay, Mr. Speaker, and you fall in, you may become so polluted that you will have to go to hospital to be injected with something.

The river is a mess. It has to be cleaned up, with co-operation from the federal Government, municipal governments, and particularly the Ministry of the Environment in the Province of Ontario. I pledge myself to the people of Ottawa South to work closely to clean up the river so that we can all enjoy swimming in it.

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT—WATER RESOURCES

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, last week, Mel Clark, a former GATT negotiator for Canada, and Don Gamble of the Rawson Academy of Aquatic Sciences, informed the committee studying the trade Bill that the proposed federal water Bill would not really stop water exports and diversions because all Acts of Parliament will be overridden by the trade legislation.

In addition, they pointed out that even an amendment to the trade Bill would not protect Canadian water from being exported and diverted to the United States. Clark and Gamble insist that the trade agreement itself must be amended if we want, with certainty, to exclude water from the trade Bill. We in the Liberal Party have also said so.

Evidently, since the trade deal as proposed will not stop water exports and diversions, it is clear that only Canadians will be able to stop the trade deal with their vote in the next election, and hopefully that will be soon.

CHILD CARE

CRITICISM OF GOVERNMENT PLANS

Mr. Ernie Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, despite Conservative boasts, the child care crisis in our country continues to worsen. The Conservative Government claims to be working for accessible, quality child care, but it has not specified national objectives and standards in its plans. The funding it advances so grudgingly will not be adequate to the need.

In Thunder Bay the city provides 165 subsidized spaces in its excellent municipal child care centres, but at least 320 children are left out in the cold or in whatever arrangements their desperate parents are able to make.

Canadian children need child care arrangements and a national strategy that meets all the needs with the type of high quality care that they deserve.

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT—MEDIA RESPONSIBILITY

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Mr. Speaker, the free trade agreement will not affect senior citizens' pensions, medicare, or water, and the agreement can be cancelled by Canada at any time on six months' notice. You know that, Mr. Speaker, I know that, and Liberal Senator van Roggen knows it too. That's why he publicly supports the free trade agreement. Even our Canadian dollar knows it because its value drops every time the Opposition threatens to rip up the agreement.

The Opposition has a duty to criticize and spread fear, if possible, about the free trade agreement and everything else the Government does regardless of the merit of its argument. However, the press and media have a duty not to spread fear but rather to report the free trade agreement and all news in a fair and balanced manner. I hope that they will bear that in mind.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT—REQUEST FOR GENERAL ELECTION

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister for International Trade. Yesterday the American President sent the final form of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement to the U.S. Congress for ratification. With that particular piece of legislation the United States has gained substantial new powers against Canadian exports. Included within the Bill is a brand new set of procedures to harass Canadian exports. The Government finds itself with a much tougher set of U.S. trade laws now than when it began the negotiations two and a half years ago.

Considering that Canadian exports will now face an additional form of scrutiny and harassment that no other country will face, how can the Government put the Canadian people at such a disadvantage? Would the Minister not agree that it is important now to have an election to allow people to decide, before this country agrees to additional new U.S. trade laws that will provide substantial new protectionism against Canada?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, that sounds rather peculiar coming from a member of the Liberal caucus. He wants the people to decide. I thought the Senate is to decide, the unelected Senate.

Yesterday the President of the United States delivered to an elected Senate the proposed U.S. legislation. It is not a Senate made up of appointees, 15 of whom were appointed in the last few weeks of the mouldering term of former Prime Minister Trudeau and the few weeks term of then Prime Minister Turner. That is the difference between the two systems.

I notice that Manitoba Liberal Leader Sharon Carstairs says she has some concerns about these tactics. She has reservations about the constitutionality of them. There is some danger of a backlash. She thinks it is an incredible gamble that could be very badly misinterpreted nation-wide. She is exactly right.

With respect to the legislation introduced yesterday, I am glad to report that several of the offensive provisions of the draft legislation have been removed, including—

Ms. Copps: Get the hook!

Mr. Crosbie: Apparently the hon. lady is not interested in listening to what is in the legislation. They are not interested in listening here. They do not want Senators to examine and listen to what is in the legislation. Why would they be concerned about the U.S. legislation?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, it is very simple. If the Minister is concerned about democratic choice, then why don't you put it to the ultimate test, which is an election? Put it before the people of Canada. That is where the real choice lies.

Mr. Speaker: I know the Hon. Member will want to address the Hon. Minister through the Chair. If we can keep our minds on the rules we will get along just fine.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to address the Minister in kind by simply saying that if he wants an election, call it today, we are ready to go. Don't worry about the Senate.

TERMS OF U.S. LEGISLATION

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, the U.S. President and his administration, and now Congress, are bringing in legislation to implement the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement. That legislation will include further powers of scrutiny, further powers of monitoring, further powers of harassment, and further powers of retaliatory action. With all those new trade powers, is it not true that the result of these negotiations has been improved U.S. protectionism against Canada? Under those circumstances let us have an election and let the people decide who is right or wrong.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the position is that the hon. gentleman's Leader has now shown that it does not matter whom the people of Canada elect to form a Government. It is an unelected Senate, which will have a majority of Liberal Senators until the year 2008 if they all live to be 75, which is going to be making the important decisions for Canada.

For the first time since 1913 a Member of the House of Commons has called on the unelected Senate, the 50 appointees of former Liberal Prime Minister Trudeau, to stop the House of Commons, the elected body, in its tracks.

Where were they when Prime Minister Trudeau got elected opposing wage and price controls and then came into office and put wage and price controls into effect? Where was the Senate then? Where was the Senate when the Auto Pact was introduced in the House? Where was the Senate when GATT was introduced in the House? The Senate is the unelected Government of Canada and the people of Canada are going to have to decide that issue in the next election.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, before the Hon. Minister bursts from an excess of gas, why does he not simply call the election and be relieved of his discomfort and pain? That is the best way of dealing with it.

Mr. Speaker: That, of course, was a question but I would ask the Hon. Member to put his question directly to the Minister.

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I suppose you know we will probably never get a straight answer from that Minister.

The U.S. Congress now has a Bill in front of it which it can amend and which includes additional powers to monitor Canadian imports to determine if they have subsidies, and the right to take retaliatory action. It is a Bill that gives United States Congress legislation full superiority over the trade agreement, compared to the fact that our trade Bill puts all our legislation subservient to it. All those measures create major discrimination, discrepancy and disadvantage for Canadians. Under those circumstances, is it not only proper, right and responsible for this Government to call an election and let the Canadian people decide? That is the real democratic choice.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, what feeble logic. Why does the hon. gentleman not call on President Reagan to call an election? Why did he not call on President Reagan to resign his seat and run again, using the same demented logic that he is using today?

The hon. gentleman has nothing to depend upon but the senatorial lemmings in the Senate. The Leader of the Opposition is now leader of the senatorial lemmings, and he is going to have an election. When the election comes, it will be decided by the Prime Minister in accordance with the Constitution, not by the hidden Government, not by Senators crawling out of their crevices in the Senate and then trying to force elections. The Constitution provides for a democracy here in Canada and that is what we are going to have.

DAY CARE CENTRES

DAY CARE SERVICES—ACCESSIBILITY FOR ALL CHILDREN—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mrs. Lucie Pépin (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Yesterday the Government tabled its Bill on child care. We looked at the Bill and found that our forebodings about this Bill were correct, namely that access to daycare for all children in Canada is not guaranteed and will depend on the choice the provinces will make. The provinces have a choice between two programs: the CAP which prioritizes lower and middle-income families, and the new legislation tabled yesterday which makes no specific mention of these families. Why didn't the Minister specify these groups in his legislation so that all children in this country would have access to day care?

[English]

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I remind the Hon. Member that in all areas of social policy which fall within provincial jurisdiction, former Liberal Governments when they received agreements, whether on health care, on medical care or on the Canada Pension Plan, just to name three, and as recently as the Canada Health Act, attempts were made by the former Minister, my predecessor, to bring in national standards but the Government did not get national standards because of constitutional requirements.

Therefore, the Hon. Member should not think that, just because provinces have jurisdiction in the area of social policy, there will not be standards that will be acceptable to the public or that the provinces are recalcitrant in establishing standards. When the legislation is passed, we will have federal-provincial agreements with the provinces. In each and every case where there is an agreement, it will reflect not only the Bill but also the agreement between the federal and provincial Governments.

I say to the Hon. Member very clearly that if she is asking that standards be imposed by the federal Government, that was done neither by her Government nor by any other Government. They were national objectives—

Ms. Copps: False, false.

Mr. Epp (Provencher): The Hon. Member for Hamilton East is as uninformed on this issue as any other issue on which she has been uninformed.

Mrs. Pépin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the Minister that I was discussing accessibility for all Canadian children, and the former Minister of National Health and Welfare got five national standards.

MINIMUM STANDARDS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mrs. Lucie Pépin (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is addressed to the same Minister. We still have no answer as to what will constitute the minimum standard of care in this so-called child care program. There are no guidelines in the law. There is an obvious abdication of responsibility as to what aspects, if any, of child care will have to meet minimum standards, whether it will be the training of child care workers or merely administrative skills.

How can the Government guarantee these minimum standards without specifying in the law what aspects of child care will have to meet such standards? Will the minimum standards be left entirely to negotiation with the provinces? Is that the Minister's vision of a fair public policy for our children?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is wrong. There are not national standards in the Canada Health Act. There are five objectives. In fact, if she will talk to former Cabinet Ministers in her Party she will learn that the former Minister of Health tried to get standards and was not able constitutionally to do so. Therefore, we are left with the situation of having objectives rather than standards in the Canada Health Act.

Second, we have principles. We have the principles of 200,000 spaces, and a cost-sharing arrangement, as well as the agreements with the provincial Governments.

Finally, the Member says that there should be national standards with respect to training. I point out to her that teachers, lawyers, and pharmacists hold provincial licences. She knows that as does every Member of the House. She is trying to score a political point which does not exist constitutionally in Canada.

We will have agreements with the provinces and I trust that the provinces will want standards which meet public criteria.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT—PLYWOOD EXPORTS

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I would like to raise a question with the Minister for International Trade who last month indicated that he and his Government had protested the plan of the United States to stop plywood exports going into that country despite the terms of the trade deal which had been signed.

The United States administration has now put its Act before Congress and that Act contains precisely that attempt to stop our plywood exports unilaterally.

What does the Minister intend to do in response to this slap in the face to the Canadian people and to himself personally?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman, as usual of course, is exaggerating the situation. I did not hear the hon. gentleman announce that he was pleased by the fact that several changes had been made in the U.S. legislation. For example, an obnoxious provision that the Canadian provinces should be looked to for their concurrence with the agreement has been removed. An obnoxious provision which requires that lobsters comply with U.S. size requirements has been removed.

There have been several improvements, but the hon. gentleman always looks on the gloomy side. He cannot see anything good in life at all and I feel sorry for him in that respect.

With regard to the plywood situation, it is an attempt by the Americans to get better access for their plywood in Canada. It is not the other way around. Unfortunately, there has been a disagreement between us as to whether U.S. plywood meets the requirements set by CMHC. CMHC did an evaluation with which the United States is not satisfied. We have set up a panel of experts to test Canadian and U.S. standards to see whether they can come to an agreement on whether U.S. and Canadian standards should or can be the same.

In the meantime the U.S. is proceeding in a way which, in our view, would be a violation of the U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement once it goes into effect. If that is the case, when it goes into effect we will proceed either to withdraw concessions or to dispute resolution in connection with that.

Mr. Langdon: So in fact, Mr. Speaker, we will start this great new era of trade relations with the United States with a trade war. What nonsense, what absolute nonsense.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST THAT MINISTER PROTEST

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, now is the time to protest. Now is the time to start shouting at Americans, not at Canadians. Now is the time to try to get some action. What action is the Minister prepared to take now to protest and counter this insult to him and this country?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, imagine the hon. gentleman talking about a trade war. This is the representative of a Party whose Leader, if elected as Prime Minister, is going to go to Washington and tell the President, "I'm down here to tear down the free trade agreement", as compared to the Leader of the Liberal Party who is going down to tear up the agreement.

Following that the President will say to new Prime Minister Broadbent, "Too bad, Mr. Prime Minister, I just tore up the Auto Pact". Then we will see what kind of a trade war there is.

Mr. Broadbent: You've already done it. You've already torn it up.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, it is Tories who go to Washington to pass messages. Any message we pass would be from Ottawa to the United States.

AMERICANS' AMENDMENTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, there are many changes in the U.S. Bill which are not in the free trade agreement. Will this Government proceed with its Bill despite these unilateral changes?

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman talks about changes. What about the New Democratic Party message? Last Wednesday the Leader of the New Democratic Party gave the message that he was saying aye, aye to the Leader of the Liberal Party, that the Senate should be called in in an undemocratic way to stop the free trade legislation which might be passed by a majority in this House.

Then on Friday the message from the Leader of the New Democratic Party was that that would be totally undemocratic, and the New Dinosaur Party is never undemocratic.

Those were two different messages in three days from the Leader of the New Democratic Party, and the hon. gentleman has the gall to criticize the Americans for not being consistent. Go look in the mirror!

ENERGY

QUEBEC—GASOLINE TAXES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

An analysis of documents from the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources proves beyond a doubt that Quebec drivers now pay 2.5 cents more per litre of gas, compared with November 1987. The reason is not the increase of 23 cents per gallon, which the Conservatives introduced. It isn't the escalator tax either. It is simply because the multinational oil companies failed to pass on the drop in the price of oil per barrel, which in November was selling for $26.20 and is now selling for $19.57.

My question is: Would the Deputy Prime Minister ask the directors of Petro-Canada to do its Quebec shareholders the courtesy of reducing the price per litre in Quebec by 2.5 cents, so that Quebecers will get a fair deal?

[English]

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Member for his question but I think he has his facts all wrong.

An Hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Shields: You might listen and learn something.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

• (1440)

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Parliamentary Secretary.

Mr. Shields: The prices that the hon. gentleman is talking about are the very stable gas prices in the Montreal area as compared to the volatile prices that have existed in Toronto and western Canada, where price wars have been going on for the past six or eight months.

If the hon. gentleman would look at it fairly, he would understand that the average does not come out properly because of the price wars in western Canada and the volatility in the Toronto market.

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF PETROLEUM COMPANIES

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, the Parliamentary Secretary does not know what he is talking about. So I will direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Since all oil companies in Quebec seem to be in agreement not to lower the price of gasoline at the pump, while the price of crude oil has greatly decreased, and since there seems to be collusion among the various oil companies in Quebec to overcharge Quebec drivers 2.5 cents a litre, is the Minister prepared to ask his Department, which is responsible for anti-trust cases, to investigate why Quebecers are unfairly treated?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if there is a cartel and the companies are getting together to fix prices, they are committing a criminal offence. I would ask the Hon. Member to pass that information over to the Director of Investigation Research of my Department who will certainly be interested in seeing that evidence, if the Hon. Member has any.

In the meantime, the Department has a group that monitors petroleum prices. If there is any evidence of collusion, or trying to fix prices, the Director of Investigation Research will certainly take action.

NATIONAL OBJECTIVES—FUNDING CRITERIA

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Unfortunately, the child care Bill that was tabled yesterday is as flawed as the Conservative child care strategy. For example, the Minister will know that the preamble to the Bill mentions the need to improve the availability, affordability, quality, and accessibility of child care services. Yet the Bill does not include these as national objectives.

We agree that standards are a provincial jurisdiction. However, why has the Government refused to establish national objectives for child care in the body of the legislation, with the requirement that the provinces and territories must adhere to these to qualify for federal funding? Is it because your restrictive funding mechanism makes it impossible to meet these objectives?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, no, that is not the case. If the Member looks at Bill C-144, she will find that the objective for availability is to increase subsidized spaces over the next seven years with 200,000 spaces. If she looks at affordability, she will find that the provinces that are spending below the national average and have less revenue than the national average will have more generous funding arrangements under this plan than the Canada Pension Plan or other cost shared arrangements.

When she talks about quality, she will find clearly that the provinces themselves, as well as in the negotiations we are having, want to increase the quality. We can build that into the federal-provincial agreements.

I appreciate her comment about the quality aspect to any arrangement relating to licensing being provincial jurisdiction.

If she looks at accessibility, there is an increase of 100 per cent in subsidized spaces in seven years. That will obviously increase accessibility.

The Government has responded exactly to those principles in the preamble.

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT POSTPONE PASSAGE OF LEGISLATION

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, how can the Minister talk about accessibility when an average of 30,000 new spaces a year that he talks about will not even meet the needs of Metro Toronto, much less the needs of two million working families across Canada? He should know from the research that has been done that the funding for of profit operations will not ensure quality.

Since the Government's child care strategy is destined to fail dismally in meeting Canada's need for child care and, if proceeded with, will set child care back across the country rather than establishing a program of which we can all be proud, will the Government hold back this Bill until after the next election and let Canadians have the final say?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker. If the Hon. Member looks at the very question she asks, she will know that their policy has been based on 1.4 million children needing day care. That has not been proven. They want a policy that will cost at least $11 billion a year. They want a policy in which parents do not have choice. They want a policy in which they will dictate to the provinces how to run provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Broadbent: All not true.

Mr. Epp (Provencher): All true. We will pass this legislation and take it to the people. They will then decide.

APARTHEID

TENNIS TOURNAMENT—PARTICIPATION OF WHITE SOUTH AFRICANS

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. It concerns the South African athletes who propose to participate in the Player's Tennis Tournament in my riding in August. In July, 1985, the Conservative Government put out a policy which can only be called racist because it backtracked on the Commonwealth Gleneagles Agreement on sporting contacts with South Africa, by condoning the participation of South African individuals in sporting events if they were not purporting to represent their country.

The Government knows well that in the real world these athletes do represent their country. Last night it was reported that the Minister of State for Amateur Sports was asking Tennis Canada to ask the athletes to withdraw voluntarily from the tournament. I ask the Government directly to change its 1985 policy and make it clear that South African individuals and teams are not welcome in Canada, and to take steps to ensure that these athletes will not participate in the Player's Tennis Tournament in August.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I believe the House is well aware of the position of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Prime Minister, and the Government on the system of apartheid in South Africa, and of the many steps we have taken in the last four years to show our abhorrence of that system. They are steps that were not taken by the predecessor Government which we never heard from in that context when it was in power.

With respect to the particular tennis question, our policy on sporting contacts with South Africa accords with the 1977 Gleneagles Agreement between the Commonwealth heads of Government, and the 1982 Code of Conduct adopted by the Commonwealth Games Federation in Brisbane.

In addition, the Secretary of State for External Affairs initiated a review of these policies several weeks ago. That review is under way now. Changes will be made that we are sure will more than suit what is needed in the near future.

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): But if the Government really wants to prevent these South Africans from participating, why does it do so indirectly behind the scenes, as was reported last night? Why not go about it directly? Is the Government at last afraid of South Africa?

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, that question is so jejune, so feeble that it does not require any answer. The Secretary of State for External Affairs was Chairman of the Commonwealth Committee on this subject. The Prime Minister's record at the Commonwealth and other conferences has been outstanding in this area. I am not going to get disturbed or cross at such a weak-kneed suggestion.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

SIGNING OF AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for the Secretary of State Department and Official Languages. The Minister has just signed agreements to promote official languages with Saskatchewan and Prince Edward Island. I would like to ask the Minister if he is prepared to sign similar agreements with other Canadian provinces, like Alberta, Ontario or even Quebec?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Secretary of State of Canada): Mr. Speaker, we have indeed negotiated and concluded agreements with Prince Edward Island and Saskatchewan in an effective and favourable manner, I believe; these agreements will certainly benefit the francophone minorities. We are now negotiating other agreements, in particular a subsidiary agreement on community colleges with New Brunswick and an agreement on health and social services with Quebec. We are also holding discussions with the Government of Alberta. In the next few days, I will meet the Education Minister of that province and I am confident that by using the co-operative, dynamic, open-minded approach we used recently in other cases, we can negotiate an extremely satisfactory agreement with that province to provide real benefits, especially in the field of education, for francophones in that province.

APARTHEID

SPORTS—CONTACTS WITH SOUTH AFRICAN ATHLETES

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed once again to the Acting Prime Minister. It concerns the selective application of the Gleneagles Agreement by this Government which allows two tennis players to come into the country because they are entrepreneurs, but prevents the provision of a visa to a black South African softball player who is not even here to play softball. Will this Government act, as it has so far failed to act, and implement the Gleneagles Agreement, with a complete ban of all involvement of Canadian athletes, in Canada or outside, with South African athletes, black or white?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, as I have stated, and repetition cannot change the facts, we have adopted and followed the Gleneagles policy. The difference between the tennis players and the other gentleman referred to by the Hon. Member is that one is an official representative and therefore comes clearly under the policy, while the others are not official representatives of any sports body, nor have they any connection with the South African Government.

We will continue with our vigorous policy of opposition to apartheid in ways that are effective about the world and in the Commonwealth, as I have said just a few minutes ago. The Secretary of State has also initiated a further review of this situation to see what changes might be necessary in the particular regulations as they apply to sports. He is doing this in co-ordination with the Minister of State for Youth.

GLENEAGLES AGREEMENT

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, this vigorous application of the Gleneagles Agreement has led to more South African athletes being admitted into Canada since this Government came to office than previously. The Government continues to apply the policy of the previous Government that allows certain athletes such as tennis players and golfers to come into the country as entrepreneurs, but excludes a South African softball player who came merely as an individual observer and not a representative. I ask the Minister again if this Government will now implement in its policy the entirety of the Gleneagles Agreement and ban access by all South African athletes to this country, as the world demands?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, it would be interesting at sometime if the hon. gentlemen could be factual in their questions. The suggestion in this question is that more South African athletes have been admitted to Canada, presumably to play at their particular sport, in the last four years than in the previous four years.

Mr. McCurdy: Three.

Mr. Crosbie: He wants to narrow it to three. Let's have some facts from the hon. gentleman. I do not think what he alleges to be fact is fact. Our policy is clear. Our policy is in accordance with other Commonwealth countries. The Secretary of State for External Affairs is reviewing it now, and when he has finished his review we will see whether he thinks changes are needed or not.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ACQUISITION OF ALL-TERRAIN TROOP CARRIERS

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence who has found an excellent election tool in the Department of National Defence.

The Minister and some of his colleagues were really grasping when they dashed out to Calgary last week to announce the building of 820 all-terrain troop carriers at a greatly inflated cost, and the company will not even begin to retool its plant until 1992. Two elections could be over in Canada by that time.

The damning thing about the Government's action was the ignoring of the tendering process on defence contracts in Canada. Why was no other company in Canada given the chance to bid on this contract? Why was a Request for Proposal not sent out to other potential bidders? And, simply, why was there no tender whatsoever on this whole $420 million defence contract? You are not protecting the taxpayers of this country.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, if the Department of National Defence has become a good election vehicle for the Government, it is because it was ignored for 20 years by the Liberal Government of the time.

What we are doing is keeping a promise that was made to the men and women serving in Canada's Armed Forces to re-equip the Armed Forces of Canada after 20 years of neglect.

The Canadian Forces already have over 100 of these vehicles. These vehicles are used by our allies with whom we would have to be working in Norway. They are used as well by our ally, the United States, in Alaska. No other existing vehicle is for sale in Canada which meets the requirements of the Canadian Forces. If we were to ask that some be designed, we would have to start from scratch at considerably greater cost. That would result in orphaning the existing vehicles which are compatible and interchangeable with allied equipment, and we would drive up the cost to the Canadian taxpayers. If that is what the Hon. Member is suggesting, let him say so directly.

COST OF VEHICLES

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, that is rather odd. Maybe the Minister could explain why he is paying almost triple the cost for the same vehicles he bought between 1984 and 1987? Why the greatly inflated cost if this was all so handy, with no added expenses?

The Minister is going to need vehicles for the militia training centres in Canada. The Government has suggested that it may go sole source for those purchases as well, which means no tendering. When is this Government going to stop ignoring the tendering system and put some integrity and fairness back into the defence purchasing of this country instead of using the same old slogans? The Minister stands up on his feet and uses his rhetoric instead of telling the taxpayers of Canada why their money is not being well spent under the tendering system for defence projects.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, do I understand correctly that it is the position of the Liberal Party of Canada that we should break this agreement with Canadian Foremost Ltd. of Calgary and say that the contracts should be given to somebody else? If that is the position of the Liberal Party, let it say so honestly and directly to the people of western Canada.

The Hon. Member is incorrect when he suggests there has been a tripling of the costs of these vehicles. The average cost of the vehicles purchased by the Department of National Defence was $140,000 in 1984 dollars. The vehicles we are contracting for now in 1988-89 dollars are about $170,000 a piece. The difference is the difference in the exchange rates and the inflation during that period.

This is a very good deal for the taxpayers of Canada. It is exceptionally good for the militia of Canada who have been neglected for so long and will finally be getting the equipment they need to do their job of serving the people of Canada.

NATIONAL PAROLE BOARD

APPOINTMENT OF MINISTER'S FORMER EXECUTIVE ASSISTANT

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. Since 1984 the Conservative Government has been packing the National Parole Board with faithful Tory supporters, including former Tory MPs and former constituency assistants to Tory MPs. Now, however, the ultimate has happened. The Solicitor General has appointed his own executive assistant, Nancy Stableforth, to the board.

How can the Minister possibly justify this blatant pork-barrelling appointment of his own executive assistant to the National Parole Board?

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, one of the things this Government has been trying to do since it came to power is to raise the quality of the appointments.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Kelleher: I notice there is no criticism of the qualifications of this particular individual who had a very distinguished career as a lawyer in private practice. She has served the Public Service well, and I do not think a person should be disqualified for having worked for this particular Minister.

• (1500)

REQUEST THAT APPOINTMENT BE RESCINDED

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are becoming—

Mr. McDermid: Whom would you appoint?

Mr. Crosbie: What about Stephen, your little buddy? He was okay. What about the other guy who went to Ireland? He was all right. What was his name?

Mr. Mazankowski: Dennis McDermott.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Burnaby has the floor.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, it is not surprising that they are a little sensitive over there about this appointment.

Canadians are becoming increasingly fed up with the failure of our parole system and with the National Parole Board in particular. Given the appalling record of Tory patronage appointments to the Board and the public's loss of confidence in the parole system, will the Minister rescind immediately the appointment of his former executive assistant and faithful supporter, Nancy Stableforth, and bring in a new appointment process for the Parole Board, one that operates on the basis of merit and ability, not on faithful service to the Conservative Party of Canada?

Hon. James Kelleher (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I think that this Government has an excellent record of appointing people from all political Parties and all sectors of the Government as well as the private sector. If the Hon. Member has some problem or question with respect to the qualifications of this individual, instead of smearing people such as this in public he should come forward to tell me what is wrong with the qualifications of this particular person.

Mr. Riis: Absolutely no experience!

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Mr. Speaker, when I speak to senior citizens in my riding they ask me if the free trade agreement is going to affect their pensions, whether it will affect their medicare, and whether it will affect our water.

Some Hon. Members: Yes!

Mr. Redway: I tell them absolutely not.

Mr. Harris: Is this a question?

Ms. Copps: What are you asking a question for if you already know the answer?

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member will put his question, please.

Mr. Redway: Mr. Speaker, I was pleased today to hear that Liberal Senator van Roggen agrees with me. When the senior citizens in my riding pick up a Toronto newspaper day after day they see that all of these things are going to be wiped out.

I want to ask the Minister for International Trade—

Mr. Riis: He hasn't read it yet.

Mr. Redway: —whether Senator van Roggen and I have this all wrong. Who is right, Mr. Minister?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Cochrane—Superior.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: When am I going to be allowed to answer?

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Cochrane—Superior.

Mr. Axworthy: That's the best answer you've given all day, John.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Hon. Member for Cochrane—Superior.

ABORIGINAL RIGHTS

DENE AND MÉTIS LAND CLAIM

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand yesterday's edition of Hansard. In reply to a question I posed regarding the status of the Dene and Métis land claims in the Northwest Territories the Acting Prime Minister said as follows:

> There are a couple of outstanding items still. These are being negotiated . . . and those negotiations and discussions are continuing.

That is encouraging and reassuring news. I want to ask the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development if he could clarify the nature of those continuing negotiations. Can he tell the House what steps he is taking to ensure that progress will continue?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification): Mr. Speaker, the reply by the Acting Prime Minister yesterday is accurate. There are, as the Hon. Member knows, opportunities for clarification of the Dene-Métis claim. There was a negotiation which led to a negotiated AIP which should be signed.

The opportunity for clarification can be discussed and is being discussed by the Dene-Métis with officials. But I am prepared to sign the agreement in principle that was negotiated. I think that is something that is known to the Dene-Métis leadership. The clarification that may be necessary can be explained and explored by the officials, as it is being done now.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER MEET REPRESENTATIVES OF CLAIMANTS

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, the Dene and the Métis have accepted 90 per cent of the proposed agreement. On the remaining outstanding items on which there is a difference of opinion they have asked for a meeting with the Minister in order to explore all possible options, leading to a possible settlement of this important claim.

Is the Minister prepared to meet with the Dene-Métis? When will that meeting take place? Will he keep the door open so that those remaining items can in fact be settled in a way that is just and equitable for the Dene and the Métis of the Northwest Territories?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification): Mr. Speaker, the agreement in principle that was negotiated is just and fair to the Dene-Métis. It is just and fair to the Government and people of Canada. It is a just and fair agreement in principle.

The agreement in principle that has been negotiated is there. I am prepared to sign that negotiated agreement in principle.

If there is clarification that may be needed as to certain points, as I said before that clarification can be explored and examined by the Dene-Métis with officials prepared to clarify it for them at any time.

There have been negotiations which led to an agreement in principle. That agreement in principle was a negotiated, fair and just agreement in principle. I am prepared to sign that agreement in principle.

POINT OF ORDER

CORRECTION TO STATEMENT

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to make a brief correction to the record.

A few minutes ago I had a question with regard to costs of the BB 206. I indicated that the simplest vehicle, which was the cargo variant of the BB 206, cost Canadians $140,000 in 1984. I was incorrect in the second figure I gave. The announced program costs allow for $175,000, not $170,000, in 1988-89 dollars for the same vehicle. Other variants, obviously, would cost different costs. But the difference is the difference in inflation and exchange rates.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

DISPOSITION OF RESOLUTION ON ABORTION

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of State and Minister of State (Treasury Board)): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions among the Parties. I believe Your Honour would find agreement with the following consent order. I would say that some people have copies of this consent order since it was widely distributed. However, there is a change from what is in front of everybody which takes place in Clause 8.

I move:

That, notwithstanding the Standing Orders and usual practices of the House, the following procedures be in order with respect to proceedings on Government Business No. 36 (Motion respecting abortion):

1. Any Member may give notice of an amendment to the main motion by filing such notice with the Clerk no later than 6 p.m. on Wednesday, July 27, 1988;

2. The Speaker, in a manner similar to the practice at the report stage of Bills, will have power to select, group and determine the voting procedure for all such amendments, with his statement and ruling on such selection, grouping and voting (consistent with Part (8) of this Order) to be made to the House when the debate is first resumed on the main motion on Thursday, July 28, 1988;

3. No amendment or sub-amendment to the main motion will be receivable or in order during debate on government business No. 36 except as provided for in parts (1) and (2) of this order;

4. Debate on the main motion will be, following adoption of this order, the only order of business for the House today, until any Member present and wishing to speak in debate has spoken, after which time but no later than 6.00 a.m. Wednesday, July 27, 1988, the Speaker shall adjourn the debate and the House until 2.00 p.m. on Wednesday, July 27, 1988;

5. The provision of part (4) of this order shall apply, mutatis mutandis, on Wednesday, July 27, 1988, at the end of which sitting the Speaker shall adjourn the debate and the House until 11 a.m., Thursday, July 28, 1988.

6. No Member who has spoken in debate on the main motion before the Speaker's statement and ruling (as per part (2) of this order) may speak again subsequently in debate;

7. Quorum may not be called during debate on government business No. 36, and no 10-minute periods of questions and comments will be provided for;

This clause is changed somewhat. It reads:

8. On Thursday, July 28, 1988, following the Speaker's statement and ruling, (pursuant to part (2) of this order), the House will suspend its sitting for one hour, when the Speaker shall put all questions necessary to dispose of every amendment selected according to the groupings and voting procedures set out in the Speaker's statement and ruling, and to dispose of the main motion, following which the House shall stand adjourned until 2.00 p.m. on Wednesday, August 10, 1988.

Provided

(a) That, if necessary, at the request of the Government, Mr. Speaker shall fix a time for the purpose of the giving of Royal Assent to any Bills that have not been given Royal Assent;

(b) That after the giving of Royal Assent to any such Bills, the House shall stand adjourned to the time and day stated in this order;

(c) That during any such adjournment of the House, the provisions of Standing Orders 5 and 68(3) and (4) shall apply; and

That when the House returns on Wednesday, August 10, 1988, or at an earlier date, except for the giving of Royal Assent, as the case may be, the provisions of the order of the House adopted on Monday, June 20, 1988, shall apply.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the order. Is the House in agreement?

• (1510)

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the order accepted.

Motion agreed to.

ABORTION

PROPOSED INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of State and Minister of State (Treasury Board)) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the Supreme Court of Canada having declared that the provisions of the Criminal Code relating to abortion are inconsistent with the provisions of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and are therefore of no force or effect, the government should prepare and introduce legislation, consistent with the Constitution of Canada, including the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which reflects the fundamental value and inherent dignity of each human being and the inherent worth of human life, and which achieves a balance between the right of a woman to liberty and security of her person and the responsibility of society to protect the unborn; and

When, during the earlier stages of pregnancy: a qualified medical practitioner is of the opinion that the continuation of the pregnancy of a woman would, or would be likely to, threaten her physical or mental well-being; when the woman in consultation with a qualified medical practitioner decides to terminate her pregnancy; and when the termination is performed by a qualified medical practitioner; and

When, during the subsequent stages of pregnancy: the termination of the pregnancy satisfies further conditions, including a condition that after a certain point in time, the termination would only be permitted where, in the opinion of two qualified medical practitioners, the continuation of the pregnancy would, or would be likely to, endanger the woman's life or seriously endanger her health.

Mr. Speaker: Before commencing debate, and I will recognize the Hon. Minister of State (Mr. Lewis) in a moment, I believe that it is appropriate for the Chair to make the following comments. First, I want to reiterate that I have not only listened very carefully to the motion, but have given it as much careful consideration as I can in the few minutes available to me. I also want to say that the motion has been adopted by the House by consent.

As your humble servant, I am charged with doing everything that I can to make sure that the consent of the House is adhered to. However, I do point out that it is an unusual order, and I know that all Hon. Members, on the government side, in the Official Opposition, and in the New Democratic Party, will co-operate with the Speaker if, during the process of this debate I may have to call upon the House Leaders, at least under some circumstances, possibly to give the Chair some further guidance. I am quite sure that, in view of the consent that we have received in the House, the Speaker will be able to take us through this debate. If I need some help, I will be very quick to call for it.

We are now entering debate. I recognize the Hon. Minister of State.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of State and Minister of State (Treasury Board)): Mr. Speaker, I want to start off my remarks by thanking my colleagues opposite for their co-operation in coming up with the consent order which was just passed by the House. I believe that it will facilitate debate without restricting debate or the ability of Members to either put their comments on the record or vote as they wish. I am sure that all Members will co-operate with the spirit of the order, and if there are any glitches as we go along, they can be worked out.

Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and the privilege of tabling a motion that will open the debate in Parliament on a most sensitive issue, namely abortion.

In recent years, many Private Members' Bills and motions have dwelt on this important topic, and there was also a great deal of discussion during the hearings on the Constitution and the debate on the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms in 1981 and 1982. These discussions took place at a time when abortion in Canada was still subject to Section 251 of the Criminal Code.

Section 251 prescribed the conditions under which abortion could be practised. This section had been in effect since 1969.

[English]

On January 28, 1988, the Supreme Court of Canada struck down Section 251 of the Criminal Code on the basis that it offended the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Actually, this decision left a void in terms of the law of our land with respect to abortion. Some will argue that there should be no more requirement than the fact that the abortion be performed by a qualified medical practitioner. Others will argue that abortion should be restricted by law, and that is what this debate is all about. Abortion is a sensitive, moral issue which touches every one of us deeply. Viewpoints on the issue cut across social, economic, cultural, religious and political backgrounds. For that reason, we decided that we would take a sense of the House before we drafted legislation.

• (1520)

Furthermore, we decided that government Members would be free to vote as they wish. I will expand on that comment later. I want to deal, if I may, with the sense of the House. Our Government has many achievements to its credit, and two of them should be mentioned within the context of this debate. First of all, it is a willingness to tackle tough issues and, secondly, it is a dedication to parliamentary reform. By engaging in this debate, we are demonstrating our commitment to both.

An Hon. Member: You have no guts.

Mr. Lewis: Abortion is an issue which deserves to be debated in Parliament prior to the legislation being passed. Members should have the right to put their views on the record, for themselves, for their constituents, and as part of the input to provide it to the Cabinet and to the legislative drafters.

True parliamentary reform means that when issues such as abortion are raised, Governments recognize the value and input of every Member. Normally, that takes place within a caucus, from a government caucus to Cabinet. In this case, because of the nature of the subject, we are giving all Members of the House an opportunity for that input.

There are very, very few issues which have the depth and scope of the abortion issue and can therefore demand that attention. I submit that that is a further demonstration of our Government's commitment to parliamentary reform.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: There are those who argue that we should present a Bill. That argument is there to be made, and I am sure that it will be made during the course of this debate.

We decided instead to take the sense of the House rather than proceeding immediately with legislation.

[Translation]

Initially, we tabled a motion overruling certain rules of debate and providing for a vote in the House on a motion with two amendments which reflected the tenets both of pro-choice and the moderate pro-life movement.

The Government caucus reached a consensus on this motion.

The motion was then transmitted to the Leaders of the Opposition in the House for presentation to their respective caucuses.

The motion was rejected by the Liberal caucus and the New Democratic Party caucus, without amendments being proposed.

[English]

Nevertheless, we placed our motion on the Order Paper for public scrutiny on May 25, 1988. We were pleased with the general reaction to our efforts. The public and the media recognized that we were dealing with a complex and sensitive moral issue. The motion rested on the Order Paper for some time, and we announced our intention to debate the procedural acceptability of the motion on Monday, July 11.

Over that preceding weekend I had an opportunity to review, in detail, the arguments of the Hon. Member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray) and the Hon. Member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), which they made on May 25, 1988. I respect the views of those gentlemen. They have both been Members of Parliament for a long time, and it behooved me to pay attention to what they said. They argued that the motion that was on the Order Paper was faulty on a procedural basis: (a) because it restricted debate; (b) because it did not provide for amendments; and, (c) because it placed a multiplicity of questions before the House at one time. I was convinced that we could meet the first two arguments: (a) the motion could be amended; and, (b) we were providing more time for debate than is normally allowed on a Bill, because Members are only allowed a 20-minute speech during the first eight hours of debate on a Bill.

I did agree, after much reflection, that a procedural point could be made for the case that the House should not be presented with a multiplicity of questions without the unanimous consent of the House. If the opposition Parties had agreed on consent, there would have been no problem. However, in the absence of consent, which it was in their right to withhold, there was a problem.

We did not want a sensitive, moral and religious issue debated after an acrimonious procedural debate. We felt that we should be debating the issue and not the procedure. That is the reason that I decided not to proceed on Monday, July 11, 1988. It was not the happiest day of my life and it is not the happiest decision that I had to make, but that is the decision that was made and that is why it was made. So we regrouped and decided to go with this present motion.

The preamble refers to the Supreme Court decision and suggests that the Government should prepare and introduce legislation consistent with the Constitution of Canada, including the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which reflects the fundamental value and inherent dignity of each human being, and the inherent worth of human life, and which achieves a balance between the right of a woman to liberty and security of her person, and the responsibility of society to protect the unborn.

The scope of the legislation proposed by the motion is—

Such legislation should prohibit the performance of an abortion, subject to the following exceptions:

When, during the earlier stages of pregnancy: a qualified medical practitioner is of the opinion that the continuation of the pregnancy of a woman would, or would be likely to, threaten her physical or mental well-being; when the woman in consultation with a qualified medical practitioner decides to terminate her pregnancy; and when the termination is performed by a qualified medical practitioner; and when, during the subsequent stages of pregnancy: the termination of the pregnancy satisfies further conditions, including a condition that after a certain point in time, the termination would only be permitted where, in the opinion of two qualified medical practitioners, the continuation of the pregnancy would, or would be likely to, endanger the woman's life or seriously endanger her health.

[English]

I understand that there was some discussion, after this motion was put on the Order Paper, by the opposition Parties. I think it was helpful. I had some other remarks, but in view of the consent order I am not going to pursue them at this time. I would say that I understand that the motion has been criticized by both the leaders of the pro-choice side and the pro-life side. If that is the case, we have achieved our purpose, because we sought to favour neither side but to present a motion which could be the basis for debate. If both sides find fault, we have done our job. We did not seek to favour either side. We sought to frame a debate on an important issue. We sought a sense of the House.

The House will know, the public will know, that we have made certain changes to the normal rules. They are made on consent, and the debate will go forward in accordance with those rules.

I want to return to one point, if I may, and that is to point out that by moving by way of a motion we do provide every Member of the House with an opportunity to spend 20 minutes putting his or her view on the record. If we had proceeded by way of a Bill, only those Members speaking during the first eight hours of debate would have had the opportunity for a 20-minute speech.

I suggest that we have expanded the opportunity for debate.

An Hon. Member: We could have consented to more time.

Mr. Lewis: I want to deal with the tone of debate. The Members will know that a little over a year ago this House debated the controversial issue of capital punishment. At that time we suggested that each Member owed to society and to this House to debate that issue on as high a level as possible. That was not thought possible, and in fact some Members ridiculed the possibility. I suggest to you that the capital punishment debate was carried out without excessive acrimony and division, and I would suggest that the same guidelines apply to this debate. We owe it to each other, we owe it to the issue and we owe it to our constituents, to be both passionate and dispassionate in this debate—passionate as we present our point of view and dispassionate as we consider the viewpoints of others.

The time frame is set. We will extend hours to allow Members to speak, both tonight and tomorrow night. So the debate is set. I want to speak briefly, if I may, to the question of a free vote. Members on the government side will be free to vote as they wish on the motion and any amendments or subamendments. I think this is an issue, as was capital punishment, which demands or dictates a free vote. As I said before, it is a highly sensitive issue, a moral issue, a religious issue, and cuts across Party lines. Therefore, it is the essence of parliamentary reform when we say that we believe Members should be free to voice their own opinion as they speak and to vote as they wish on this issue.

In conclusion, I regret that my role in this debate does not permit me to speak to the issue, because I have very deeply held convictions. However, in the final analysis, I am proud that we as a House of elected representatives are to debate this difficult issue at the end of a long session. I say to you that I am sure the House and its Members will be equal to the task.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, in opening my remarks for the Official Opposition, I want to indicate right at the outset that we have decided that for our Party this will also be regarded as a free vote. It was an option that we had reserved in the expectation that the Government might propose a very one-sided, extreme motion which we would want to deal with as a Party. One cannot characterize the motion before us as extreme other than to say that it is extremely vague, to the point of being meaningless.

I have something to say about that but I want, first, to respond to the Minister's lecture on procedure. I think Canadians ought to note that absolutely nothing was said by the Minister on the subject of abortion.

[Translation]

All we had was a lecture on procedure. Personally, my conclusion is that no resolution will be forthcoming as a result of the motion that is before the House for the rest of this week. I expect, despite the efforts of individual Members of the House to get a consensus one way or another, that a resolution, with or without amendments, will be rejected by a majority of the House. And I want to point out that the Government is to blame for this procedure.

If the Government had tabled a Bill, we could have come out of this with some kind of legislation.

[English]

I think the failure of the Government to show leadership on what Members opposite delight in characterizing as a fundamental issue, an important moral issue, is going to result in a failure to have legislation. While Members opposite may want to go into the election, as the Minister said, saying, "We have tackled the tough issues", and that was his expression, I ask Canadians to notice, and I am making a prediction here, that there will be no result of this debate. There will be no legislation. The Government will have produced an abortion environment by default. We will have no legislation governing abortion at all.

While Members opposite will want to blame anyone but themselves, the fault for such a result is their own. They are taking sides in this debate by failing to show leadership, by failing to bring forward legislation.

Nearly six months ago, on January 28, the Supreme Court of Canada determined that Section 251 of the Criminal Code which regulated abortion in Canada violated the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. They struck Section 251 down. In so doing, they invalidated a law which had been on the statute books of our country for nearly 20 years. The law was introduced by the man who is the Leader of our Party in the House of Commons, the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Turner). That invalidated law, when it was introduced, was regarded as a better social alternative to the then existing situation.

I want to talk for a moment about that situation because it may be relevant again. There are Members who are proposing that we move to a situation in which virtually all abortions are illegal. What I would like to say to those Members is that this is not a new alternative. I invite them to look back at the situation that existed before the important reform introduced in 1969 by the man who is now the Leader of the Official Opposition in the House of Commons. That provision, and ironically it is still in the Criminal Code although of course it was amended in 1969, provides simply that everyone who, with intent to procure the miscarriage of a female person, and I am summarizing here, or who uses any means for the purpose of carrying out his intention, is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for life. That is the law that was replaced by Section 251.

I think there are a lot of us here, and a lot of Canadians across the country, who will remember why the reform was important and what we achieved by that reform. There are those of us who will remember the humiliation and danger that Canadian women were subject to under the legislative regime that existed until 1969 when the attempt to obtain any abortion was a criminal act. Low standards of health, poor medical facilities and unqualified practitioners were the order of the day for women who were driven by circumstances to decide for themselves that an abortion was required.

For the last 20 years I think we have been relatively well served by the law that was introduced in 1969. I recall this because I know it is fashionable to criticize Section 251, and I wanted to remind Hon Members that that law, when it was brought in, was a great humanitarian reform and was much appreciated. It was supported by the majority of the House, by Members from all Parties, made a lot of sense, and on top of that, it worked. When it was discredited and rejected by the Supreme Court of Canada, it was on the basis of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

I am going to talk about that in a moment, but it could have been rejected on another very important ground. It could have been rejected because, after 20 years of living with it, it no longer was working. I know there are those who say, let's bring back Section 251. After all, the Leader of the Official Opposition brought it forward and it worked. It worked for a time but it stopped working several years ago. It stopped working in some important respects of which I want to remind Members now, although I think perhaps all Members are aware of them.

In the first place, the statute relied on the following expression of the criterion, that the pregnancy or the continuation of the pregnancy should be, and I quote, "likely to endanger the life or health of the woman". No expression in the Criminal Code got kicked around more than the expression "likely to endanger life or health". In every hospital and in every doctor's office in our country it had a different meaning.

You cannot have criminal law that depends on a statute that imposes a penalty and has a definition that is that vague. As I say, it worked at the beginning, but on that count alone, Section 251 needed to be replaced.

There was another problem with Section 251, and that was that even when an abortion was authorized or would have been authorized, in many parts of Canada there was no procedure for a woman to have a lawful abortion pursuant to Section 251 of the Criminal Code. Whole provinces had excused themselves from the application of Section 251. That is unacceptable in a country as broad and wide as Canada with its diverse regions. If the Criminal Code is to be respected, if women are to be put through a procedure and come out entitled to an abortion, that service has to be available. Otherwise, there is no point in saying that there is a law on the books with which we should try to comply.

My third observation about Section 251 is that when an abortion was not justified and when an abortionist who performed an abortion was charged with a violation of Section 251, juries in various parts of Canada would not convict. There were cases of judges in effect telling the juries that they had no alternative but to convict the abortionists for the offences that had been proven beyond a reasonable doubt before the courts, and the juries refused to convict. That is obviously another important shortcoming in the legislation.

We already know about the pre-1969 situation, a tough criminalization of all abortions. We also know about the problems of living with Section 251, whether or not we had a Canadian Charter of Rights. It is time for us as a Parliament to deal with the issue. The Supreme Court of Canada, in the case that went before it, provided us with the opportunity that was needed to deal with the question of abortion under the law of Canada.

I would like to turn now to the resolution introduced by a Government which is determined to get the credit for tackling the tough issues of our day. The Supreme Court of Canada made its judgment on January 28. On January 29, my Leader was up on his feet in this place making four points. In particular, he demanded that the Government act with urgency to take up the challenge the Supreme Court of Canada had put by introducing legislation which would be valid.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn), who has not had the courage to speak in this debate and who, to my astonishment, was not the first speaker for the Government, rose on January 29 to say that we have responsibilities. I do not want to read the whole tortured paragraph, but he concluded by saying that we will be dealing with this matter on an urgent basis.

For six months we have had nothing of substance from the Government on the commitment that was made by the Minister of Justice the day after the Supreme Court made its decision. We still do not have anything from this Government in the way of leadership or in the way of legislation. The Government is revelling in its decision not to take a position on this important issue.

I would like to deal with one particular government commitment on the subject. On January 29, my Leader was persistent. He wanted to be certain that the Government would not throw out the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms by introducing an abortion law validated by a notwithstanding clause under the Constitution, making it apply in spite of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. He said:

> Can I have a guarantee from the Minister of Justice that his Government will rule out using the non obstante clause to get around the Supreme Court of Canada decision?

What did the Minister of Justice say in answer on the same day? He said:

> What I can tell the right hon. gentleman is that I do not contemplate the use of the non obstante clause on the part of the Government with respect to this issue.

A funny thing happened in the last six months. Even from that very minimal commitment, the Government has backed away. The resolution brought before us does require a non obstante clause in order to be translated into legislation, at least that is the way it appears to me. I will show how it does in a moment. The Government has indicated that there are no holds barred on the debate, so that this commitment made on January 29 is thrown out of the window.

I would like to turn now to the resolution. The resolution divides a pregnancy into two periods. In the latter period, the consent and authorization of two doctors is required, and I will talk about that later. During the earlier stage of pregnancy, it is provided in the Government's resolution that a qualified medical practitioner must be of the opinion that the continuation of the pregnancy of a woman would or would be likely to threaten her physical or mental well-being. In other words, if a woman wants an abortion, according to this resolution she still has to have a doctor agree that a continuation of the pregnancy would or would likely threaten her physical or mental well-being. That is precondition on her right to an abortion as defined by the Supreme Court of Canada. I think the only way that condition can be imposed is by having the Government propose to violate what the Minister of Justice said on January 29 by introducing a notwithstanding clause.

I will turn now to the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada. The judgment of Madam Justice Bertha Wilson quotes the judgment of the Chief Justice which was concurred in by Mr. Justice Lamer. Three of the members of the Supreme Court of Canada, a majority of those who made the decision, are of the view that legislation would be invalid and would violate the Charter which based its decision on "criteria entirely unrelated to the pregnant woman's priorities and aspirations". That was a portion of the Chief Justice's judgment which was quoted with approval by Madam Justice Bertha Wilson. This means that the woman herself decides. Madam Justice Bertha Wilson went to on to say that Section 251 violates a woman's right to liberty by deciding for her something that she has the right to decide for herself.

What have we gotten from the Government? I understand that this resolution has been put forward as a middle position. A pro-life position would lie to one side and a pro-choice position would lie to the other. However, this resolution in itself can only be translated into legislation if a notwithstanding clause is introduced. That makes this resolution unacceptable to those of us who agreed with the Minister of Justice six months ago when he said that it was important that we not put aside the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms for the sake of this abortion issue.

I have other difficulties with the resolution as well.

An Hon. Member: What would you suggest?

Mr. Kaplan: I will make a suggestion. The first thing I would suggest is that if we want to put forward a middle position which I personally would support, it would be a position in which a woman's rights as enunciated by the Supreme Court of Canada are recognized in the early period of a pregnancy and the rights of the foetus are given recognition in balance with the woman's rights in the later portion of a pregnancy. That should be put forward in a resolution that purports to be in the middle of the two extremes.

The Minister rejoiced and claimed credit for having brought forward a resolution that both the pro-life and pro-choice people, as he put it, rejected. I have news for him. He has a resolution which not only the two extremes but the people in the middle as well reject because it does not respect the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms as interpreted by the highest court of the land, the Supreme Court of Canada, in its decision.

The resolution has many other problems, and I want to go over some of them. I mentioned earlier the difficulty with the expression "life and health" under Section 251. This resolution has the same difficult expressions. It talks about the physical or mental well-being of a woman. What is meant by that? What type of precision will be attached to that? Later it talks about the woman's life or health, again the same words that appear in the discredited Section 251. What is that supposed to mean? I submit that the Government owes the Canadian people and this Parliament more than a resolution as ambiguous, difficult, and self-contradictory as that.

I predict, as I said a moment ago, that there will be a lot of conflicting amendments. We wish the Speaker well in trying to put them in order and will co-operate with him. More will be rejected than will be accepted. I predict, although it is not my intention, that the resolution will be defeated. I am hoping that there will be some kind of resolution for which I can vote. It will be up to the Government to bring in legislation.

We are now in the fourth year of the mandate of a very discredited Government and it will be very difficult for the Government to bring forward legislation which will be taken seriously and addressed by this House. However, from what the Government has said about the subject of abortion and about this resolution I predict that nothing will be done.

I am very critical of a government decision and an undoubted government policy which will lead to having no abortion law in effect in Canada at all. Public opinion will be extremely polarized, and in the coming election, abortion, which is not a partisan issue, may, in the result, have far more attention than some of the other issues in which there is a partisan aspect involved and on which it is very important that Canadians speak and express themselves in choosing the next government.

I will not be introducing any amendments myself. I have indicated the areas with which I am dissatisfied, but I do not want to add to the very low credibility of this resolution by suggesting that merely amending it will make it okay.

I want to talk for a moment about the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Sometimes people think of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which, after all, is only six or seven years old, as a fringe or frill produced by a country which lived for 100 years without it. It is thought of as sort of a fringe benefit of having been here and having been governed by the rule of law for such a long time.

I want to emphasize how important I think the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms is, particularly in the context of a country which has evolved tremendously over the last 100 years and has become far more complex than anyone might have realized in the mix we have achieved. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, in its short life, is becoming a road map for how Canadian society is going to hold together, how a multicultural, pluralistic society with very diverse values is going to be able to survive and become ever stronger.

It is a trite observation that a multicultural and pluralistic society presents to the Canadian people a variety of customs and values. It is a part of Canadian political life to recognize this essential fabric of Canada and, indeed, to celebrate our variety and diversity. It is enriching to experience variety in life. Very often in the great variety of Canadian life differing values fit together and we tend to enjoy and celebrate the fact that within our great diversity there is a tremendous amount of positive similarity and compatibility. We do this by noting that in all the human societies and cultures which make up Canada there are basic shared values, even in our variety.

From the point of view of the members of any particular cultural group there is a great deal of satisfaction in bringing their values into the larger Canadian society. We have watched multiculturalism as a policy evolve. We encouraged groups to express and develop within their groups, their cultures and their values and have moved to the point where the greatest pleasure of a minority cultural community in our country comes from presenting its values to the whole of Canadian society and seeing the values of the group resonating, finding favour, being understood, and being appreciated by fellow Canadians.

More and more we try to develop opportunities for taking the values of particular groups to the larger Canadian community. We think of each of these efforts as a contribution by a cultural community to Canada as a whole. This applies to a food which a cultural community brings into Canada which Canadians enjoy and buy, as well as to a moral precept which comes from a community such as respect for plant life and animal life, greater respect for the aged, methods of raising children, or different ideas for relationships between spouses. These are all enriching Canada, and individual communities enjoy bringing these ideas forward and sharing them.

I do not think I trivialize the debate by putting this as the context within which I want to talk about the very fundamental values on which our ideas about life, death, and abortion are based. I think I am justified in talking about those important values in the same context as the pluralistic other values that exist in the diverse Canadian society.

Abortion is one of the fundamental issues that exist in the diverse Canadian society. Abortion is one of the fundamental issues that relates to the meaning and value of human life. Merely saying this does not make it clear how the criminal law should treat it.

Some religions offer a categorical approach. The Catholic view, as I understand it, is that life begins at the moment of conception and that abortions are morally wrong and should not be condoned. I can say, as a Canadian of the Jewish faith, that that is also the view of orthodox Judaism.

It is the moral responsibility of believers in these religions to carry their message, not only to members of their community but to members of the world. If we have a way in our community, whether Catholic, Jewish or whatever, of looking at the world, it is part of an understanding of Canadian life and also a religious commitment to bring that value forward, to explain it to people, to try to earn respect for it, to try to have our ideas and values adopted and spread.

It is the moral responsibility of believers to carry their message to the world. However, if this debate on abortion, which has been raging for six months and even longer, shows anything it is that that view of abortion is not a consensus view. It is a view held by many Canadians, but not a view totally shared across Canadian society. That reminds us of all the views of Canadian communities which are not always compatible. Conflicts develop among values. While we prefer in Canada to emphasize the positive, we must also deal with the fact of values in our society which are not compatible.

I want to suggest in all seriousness that it does not strengthen a pluralistic society to entrench or enshrine one group's morality in the law of the country, unless it has the broadest possible consensus. To take a value of a group, however large, or of a number of groups, however numerous those groups are, and insert it in the criminal law of our country is not a way of strengthening a pluralistic society.

In my opinion, this is where the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms comes in. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms takes a very fundamental view about the individual in Canadian society and that view, which is part of our law, settles at a fundamental level the issues on which our laws and practices can be founded.

At the highest level of our judicial system, the right of a woman to determine her own priorities and aspirations in relation to a pregnancy in the early period has been recognized, not by one judge, but in one way and another by a majority of judges who spoke. In the later stages of a pregnancy the responsibility of society is recognized to legislate in the interests of the foetus.

I want to call on the Government to bring in legislation that reflects this decision based on the Charter of Rights. It has failed the Charter and it has failed the Canadian people in not doing so.

As I indicated, the only way in which the resolution before us could be validated, or in which more onerous pre-obligations on a woman's right as recognized by the Supreme Court of Canada could be validated, would be to use the notwithstanding clause which is enabled by Section 33 of the Constitution and thereby put aside Charter guarantees.

For all the reasons I have given about the viability of a pluralistic society, about the need and our interest in strengthening our pluralistic society, I would urge those who oppose this fundamental freedom not to seek to impose their view through legislation. Certainly, their ideas should be put forward. Certainly, their ideas should be explained. They should seek to convince Canadians of their point of view, but to enshrine a position in legislation in my submission is to diminish the viability of the pluralistic society which is Canada.

A parliamentary debate on abortion in a multicultural society should not be an argument about which conception of life is right, about when life really begins, and about what the consequences should be of that determination. Such a debate would be important and valuable, but it would be theological or philosophical. We would not be debating an issue which could be settled by the will of the majority. That is the kind of issue that we debate in Parliament. They are issues that can be settled by the will of a majority.

When we want to talk about a theological or philosophical issue, we must recognize that truth does not depend for its validity on the number of people who proclaim it. Therefore, the truth of the question of life is not an issue to be settled by parliamentary debate. We are not here to determine the truth by relying on the will of the majority. What we are here to settle is how we should live together as Canadians with an issue on which there is no broad consensus, on which there are those whose morality opposes abortion on one side of the debate but others whose morality opposes compelling a woman under any circumstances to carry and bear an unwanted or unloved child. I think that is the issue and the basis and the decision-making process that should be exercised in this place.

When we talk about the conflict which exists on the fundamental question of abortion, it is often forgotten that right across the board, wherever a group or individual stands on the question of abortion, there is much common ground among all participants. No one values an abortion. No one considers it to be a good or desirable alternative. Abortion is undesirable. What we all recognize on all sides of the debate is that abortions can be substantially reduced and should be substantially reduced because I believe there is the national will to reduce them.

Everyone recognizes that abortions can be avoided in almost every case by better sex education. When I speak of better sex education, I am thinking about parts of our country even having some sex education. There are many parts of Canada where there is none. There must be a national will to change that because that is the method of reducing what everyone recognizes as being undesirable, namely, the number of abortions.

They can be reduced by better planning. They can be reduced by a greater sense of responsibility on the part of women and on the part of men in their individual sex lives. They can be reduced by improved programs for pregnant women. They can be reduced by improved programs for new babies and by enlightened adoption policies.

We can take steps in this country and show leadership in this place to make women feel more comfortable with their pregnancy, more comfortable with the idea of bearing a child. We can assist them to have healthier children. We can do more on this than we have in the past.

I regret that this debate is not seized by the Government as an opportunity to bring forward a policy which would reduce abortions, a policy which would cover some of the bases I just described.

[Translation]

This Government has failed to table concrete measures for debate in the House, measures that it is in a position to promote, to reduce the number of abortions in our society. Personally, I regret that the Government has failed to act and has failed to draft a policy to reduce the number of abortions with the exception of those allowed under the Criminal Code.

[English]

We should all fight against abortion. I think all Canadians know that a foetus cannot be regarded the way tonsils or gallstones are regarded. There are greater implications of which all Canadians are aware. What is required is a government commitment to do something about it, a commitment which has not been expressed in this place. There must be an encouragement for provincial Governments in their responsibilities which has not been given by this Government.

I conclude by observing for myself that while I would like to see legislation brought in along the lines that I have described, I would not be able to vote for the resolution before us in its present form. I indicated at the outset and want to reiterate that this is a free vote. Members of our caucus will be voting without the whip being imposed. I know that many of my colleagues are looking forward to participating in the debate. I regret very much the failure of the Government to participate in the debate on the substance of the issue of abortion.

Ms. Marion Dewar (Hamilton Mountain): I suppose it is with some trepidation, Mr. Speaker, that I rise to speak to this resolution. I think the danger in front of the Canadian people today is the fact that they think we are dealing with an abortion issue. That is sheer hypocrisy. What we have in front of us is a resolution. We do not have any legislation. This resolution is particularly vague. It talks about the early stages of a pregnancy when an abortion would be allowed and the later stages when there would be more restrictions. We do not know what the stages are. Are we supposed to make a decision about the stage at which a child is viable? What is it we are supposed to be dealing with?

We heard the Minister say after the Supreme Court decision that it was now time for leadership, that there was an urgency to bring forward legislation. Six months have passed without any legislation, and I think it is really important we recognize that the number of abortions in Canada have not increased. We have to look at what is in front of us and what this Parliament is going to do. We know this Parliament is sitting in its last stages. We know it can only go for another year at most and probably not. We know that whatever the resolution of this marathon debate we are entering into today, it will certainly not bring forward any legislation.

I think it is sheer hypocrisy of the Government to pretend it is doing something when it knows it will be another Parliament that will have to deal with it. I really take exception to that because if we as politicians want to reduce the amount of cynicism about politics in our country today, we have to be accountable and upright with the people. That is not what we are doing today with this resolution.

The Supreme Court has made the decision that it will hear the Borowski case in another three months. That will be a decision which will certainly affect what kind of legislation, if any, will be brought forward. It seems to me that is just another reason this resolution should not be in front of the House today. I think the crass hyprocrisy of the Government is something the people of Canada have to be aware of.

It is not the case that we are afraid to deal with any legislation. If the Government wants to bring a Bill before us, we will deal with it and decide whether it is good, bad or indifferent, proposing or not proposing amendments. What we are being asked to do here is to put forward amendments on a resolution that is vague. We do not know when those early stages are. That is not right. It is crassly political. The Government is pretending it is doing something when in fact it is doing absolutely nothing.

As far as the New Democratic Party is concerned, we have taken the position for a very long time that there should be a choice. That does not mean that the New Democratic Party is pro-abortion. What we are saying is that women should have some rights to choose. People who feel very strongly that abortion is wrong and would like to see the number of abortions reduced are the ones who should be dealing with public policy as our Party has been doing for a very long time. I think women have to have access to services. I do not know any woman who has lightly made the decision to have an abortion, and as a public health nurse I have dealt with many. It has never been an easy decision. Very often, if there were other alternatives, they would decide not to have an abortion.

We do not have child care, we very often treat women as sex objects and refuse to put services forward, and then have the gall to say they have a choice. Very often they do not have a choice. The New Democratic Party would like to see real choices for women.

I have heard for a long time many people talk about the fact that we do not value children, and we do not value children in our society. Certainly, this Government, which has put extra tax measures on families is not valuing children. We examined a reform Bill last week that actually increased the taxes on families, with two children rather than on a couple with no children. What kind of hypocrisy is that? If we really want to talk about a loving and compassionate society, we have to start putting in services to prevent the need for our women to make a decision to have an abortion. What has happened with the family planning programs? One-third of its funding was cut by this Government.

How can the Government want to have a more restrictive law and at the same time cut back on family planning? I think it is important that we look at the realities of some of the countries where there is liberalized abortion laws. Norway and Sweden made it compulsory to increase the education in sexuality in all the schools, and they found there was a dramatic reduction in the abortion rate in those countries. One country I know of which has rigid abortion laws is Brazil. It is totally illegal to have an abortion in Brazil, but there are over one million illegal abortions taking place in one year. There were 100,000 maternal deaths and over 10,000 abnormalities because of unsuccessful abortions.

When we talk about our ability to implement these laws, let us be realistic about it. I know there are a lot of people in this House who feel very powerful because they are going to be very rigid about this legislation. They are going to keep these women in line. They will force these women to carry the children they are unable to care for. I think it is really important to look at the numbers of women who are battered in our society. We know for a fact about one in eight women are battered. I would like to hear those same people talk about services for those women. People who are afraid to put in a comprehensive child care program are saying they want to see a very rigid law on abortion. Those are the kinds of things we want to talk about if we want to reduce the number of abortions. I certainly do not accept the fact that by putting in rigid laws, or no laws at all and pretending something is going to be done, is an effective way to deal with the problem.

I think many of us in this House have looked at the kind of things that have happened and have decided that this is really a moral issue.

One hundred years ago, the Catholic Church declared that in the case of a baby of the male sex, abortion was allowed at 40 weeks of gestation and in the case of a baby of the female sex, after 80 days. Which means that there has been a lot of discussion on the subject. For years, people speculated on sex and age, but the only real issue that must be dealt with is: How can we reduce the number of abortions in our society? That is the only sensible question that has been asked here in the House. The next question is, what measures must be taken until a Bill is forthcoming?

[English]

The kinds of policies we need are positive public policies. We do not need policies that are more restrictive, that really do force decisions on people, that make women become again the victims of the back alleys. We must recognize that our society has had literally no effective law concerning abortion in the last six months. The Province of Quebec has not implemented it since 1976. Yet I hear people saying there is a terrible urgency, that we really have to deal with this issue very quickly, that it is a very chaotic situation we are in. I think that is an irresponsible kind of approach to this subject. It is irresponsible because it is attempting to fear monger.

I do not think that is what we want. We as a Party were quite willing to deal with this subject in a comprehensive way and be responsible and accountable to the Canadian people. We have not had the opportunity to do so in this House because the Minister speaks out of one side of his mouth saying it is urgent that we have some kind of law and at the same time brings forward only a resolution. As my Leader said last week, we had a three-headed monster in front of us and now we have a one-headed monster in front of us. It is non-specific. The motion does not give us any sense of where we are going.

As we look at it we recognize that we certainly do not want that to continue in the country. We do not want to see Canadians thinking that they are getting action and not getting it. That very hypocrisy is something that is an affront to the House of Commons.

As Members of Parliament we have been asked to be accountable. We have been asked to be responsible. Instead of that what we get is a Gallup poll in the House of Commons. I do not think that that is the kind of thing that Canadians are looking for.

I have heard a great deal of discussion among members of the public ever since the Supreme Court decision came down. After the decision came down there was a great deal of speculation with respect to what would happen. What we saw was a variety of types of services delivered across the country.

As a woman, as a New Democrat, I would like to see the same type of services available to all Canadian women so that they will be able to have equal access. I would also like to see them have the types of services that would enable them to make a choice decision. It would be very nice if we knew that women were not any longer earning 64 cents for every $1 that a man earns. It would be very nice if we knew that there was safe, quality child care available for every woman who has a child. It would be very nice if we knew that women had access to health services where they could have pap tests and mammary examinations, as well as contraceptive information, all easily accessible to them. That is not easily accessible in the country right now.

It would also be very nice if we saw all our mother led families in adequate housing and living above the poverty line. When I hear people telling me that they are worried about the children in the country, and I realize that 40 per cent of the clients of the soup kitchens in the City of Toronto are children, I say it is a scandal and a disgrace. For us to pretend that children are a priority to us is absolute nonsense.

If we really want to start treating each other as dignified human beings with quality care, with relationships of quality, if we want to look at life and value it in the true sense of the word, then what we should be looking at is public policies that give us the ability to give each person a sense of dignity. It would give each person the ability to have access to education, nutrition, and the types of things we think are so important. It is certainly not the type of thing that we need to do by having a Gallup poll conducted in the House of Commons to decide whether or not we will have legislation, knowing very well that this Parliament will never implement any.

If we were being honest and if the Government felt very strongly that there was a vacuum which needed some legislation to fill it, then it would have brought legislation forward. Because it cannot come to any consensus in its own caucus, what it has really done is say: "We will use the House of Commons to conduct a Gallup poll".

If Members of Government want some Gallup poll information, I have some here dated April 13. At that time 69 per cent of people thought that the decision whether to have an abortion or not should rest with the woman in consultation with her physician. If the Government wants the results of Gallup, we can give it to it without it bringing it to the House of Commons.

I can probably find other figures which are far different from that. The Government can pick out whichever ones it wishes. But, please, Mr. Speaker, do not use the Members of the House of Commons to do this Gallup polling. The Government is here to govern. It is not here just to try out a resolution. It is disgraceful that what we are being asked to do right now is to pretend that we are doing something that will never happen in this House of Commons.

We know that in the next election, sure, there will be a lot of discussion. But I will be very comfortable to go out on the campaign trail to say: "You thought, maybe, that the Government was doing something about this question, but it was doing absolutely nothing. What it did was try to raise the expectations of Canadians about how seriously it was taking this subject and what it was really doing was making a sham of it". That is totally unacceptable. It is the kind of thing that as New Democrats we resent very much. I think that the women of Canada should resent it as well.

They do not know into which crack they have to fall since at this point in time there has not been a great deal of chaos. Services are being delivered. The number of abortions has not increased. The ability for Canadian women to make responsible decisions is there. The ability for our medical profession to deliver adequate care is there. Those are the types of decisions that are being made now. There is not that terrible vacuum that some Members are referring to which claims that there is a chaotic society. We are not living in chaos. If we really do care about what the future of this country will be, we will start to look at comprehensive, public policy that respects the dignity of men, women, and children.

That is the type of law that I would like to see in front of the House. That is the type of society in which I would like to live. I hope that the rest of Canadians feel that way. I think that after the next election we will find that they do.

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey—Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, as all of us are fully aware, on January 28, 1988, the Supreme Court of Canada struck down Section 251 of the Criminal Code which governs abortion.

January 28 was the day on which the sanctity of human life was decreed to be of inferior value to personal convenience. The Supreme Court judgment also forced people to wake up from the mistaken notion that righteousness automatically rules. We have been startled to see that darkness prevails when good people do nothing.

If the Supreme Court judgment has shocked us into recognizing that if we want to influence the laws and rules governing our society, we who believe in the sanctity of life of the unborn have to be in the fight and learn to fight smart, then perhaps it has served a useful purpose. It also reminds us not to rely solely on legislation to solve our problems. Legislation may control actions but it does not change attitudes. Influencing public opinion, changing hearts, are part of the fight as well.

While striking down Section 251 of the Criminal Code dramatically illustrates the new power of the courts under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, it by no means prevents Parliament from using its criminal law to restrict abortion. If this were the case, it would be all too convenient for elected representatives to avoid the controversial issue of abortion by insisting their hands are tied by the Supreme Court pronouncement.

The question as to whether an unborn child is a human being has been pondered, it has been considered, it has been discussed, and the decision arrived at by the medical profession and others is, yes, the unborn child is indeed a human being from the time of conception.

If this is a human life, then we are faced with a question, one that says yes or no to the entire abortion question. Should we give legal protection under the law to every human in this nation from the beginning of his or her life until each individual's natural death, or should we discriminate fatally under the law against entire classes of living humans?

For two millennia in our western culture, written into our Constitutions, specifically protected by our laws, and deeply imprinted in the hearts of all men and women, there has existed the absolute value of honouring and protecting the right of each human to live. This has been an inalienable and unequivocal right. The only exception has been that of balancing a life for a life in certain situations, or by due process of law.

Never in modern times, except by a small group of physicians in Hitler's Germany, and by Stalin in Russia, has a price-tag of economic or social usefulness been placed on an individual human life as the price of its continued existence. Never in modern times, except by physicians in Hitler's Germany, has a certain physical perfection been required as a condition necessary for the condition of that life. Never in modern times, has a state granted to a citizen the absolute legal right to have another killed in order to solve her own personal, social or economic problem. Yet, if this is a human life, the Canadian Supreme Court decision, as well as the permissive abortion laws in other countries do all of the above. They represent a complete aboutface, a total rejection of one of the core values of western man and an acceptance of a new ethic in which life is only of relative value. No longer will everyone have a right to live simply because he or she exists. Man will now be allowed to exist only if he measures up to certain standards of independence, physical perfection, or utilitarian usefulness to others. This is a momentous change that strikes at the very root of western civilization.

Last year more than 60,000 unborn babies were legally "terminated" in Canadian hospitals. This means destroyed for no offence at all. Abortion is an extreme form of child abuse inside the womb. It violently destroys a unique young human being. Some people claim that abortion is a woman's right. What is more, they insist that we should all be forced to pay for it with our taxes. They call themselves "pro-choice". There is no freedom of choice for a child destroyed by abortion. Its every instinct is to live. As the pro-choice people use the phrase, a women's right to choose is really a right to destroy life.

Can anyone honestly claim this right? If it is wrong to kill timber rattlesnakes in some countries, how can it be all right to destroy helpless human beings? Don't we have a right to oppose this? All human life, before and after birth, has a right to protection; not just the strong, the whole, the well connected, but also the weak, the handicapped, and the unwanted.

You do not solve human problems, Mr. Speaker, by destroying human life. To place the issue of human abortion into its proper context, we must first know why abortions are being performed. Today there are only two primary medical indications for abortion: cancer of the cervix and womb and ectopic pregnancy. If the cancer is detected early in pregnancy, treatment of the mother would likely cause the loss of her unborn child. The other is with regard to ectopic pregnancy. In this situation, the child is developing in the Fallopian tubes instead of the womb. In this case, the unborn child would have to be removed to protect the life of the mother.

Such cases represent such a small number of actual abortions it becomes evident that the vast majority of Canada's approximately 60,000 yearly abortions cannot properly be called therapeutic. Section 1 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms states:

> The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in it subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be justified in a free and democratic society.

In 1969, when the Criminal Code was amended to permit abortion under certain therapeutic circumstances, the intent was to maintain the basic rights of the unborn child while at the same time set reasonable limits to allow for therapeutic abortion in cases such as I have mentioned.

Since that time we have seen an increasing abuse of this law, to the point that we now have a situation in which abortion in Canada is undertaken primarily for socio-economic reasons. The clear intent is no longer to heal but to destroy the unborn child because he or she is supposedly unwanted and inconvenient. The wording in the Criminal Code addressed the seriousness of this act when it could not be justified on therapeutic grounds by a select committee of physicians.

Section 251(1) of the Criminal Code states:

> Everyone who, with intent to procure the miscarriage of a female person . . . uses any means for the purpose of carrying out his intention is guilty of an indictable offence . . .

It is evident that Members of Parliament never intended to provide a loophole to legalize abortion on demand and thus remove all lawful protection from the unborn child.

Section 15(1) of the Charter prohibits discrimination based on age, and yet we continue to destroy 60,000 unborn babies every year for reasons of convenience. Is this not discrimination on the basis of age, because they are so young and not yet able to express themselves fully? Scientifically, the process of birth is simply a change in residence for one who has already been living and interacting with his or her protective environment for nine long months.

The fact is that each new human life begins at conception and proceeds through stages identified as embryo, foetus, infant, child, adolescent, and adult. The Charter requires that every human being from the very young to the very old, especially the helpless and defenceless, must be afforded equal protection. Anyone whose rights or freedoms as guaranteed by the Charter have been infringed on or denied may apply to a court to obtain such remedy as the court considers appropriate and just in the circumstances.

Obviously the Charter made these provisions to assure that those who felt their rights being denied were given a fair hearing. Further to this guarantee of the right to life, Section 12 states:

> Everyone has the right not to be subjected to any cruel and unusual treatment or punishment.

Today we constantly see new evidence that points to the pain experienced by the unborn child during an abortion. The suction abortion, used up to 12 weeks, disembowels and dismembers the child alive. There are no survivors. The saline abortion, used in the second trimester, consists of the removal of some of the amniotic fluid from the womb. This is then replaced with a saline solution. During the next several hours this slowly kills the child: it burns the eyes, the lungs, and the skin. The mother goes into labour and gives birth to a dead child. Some babies have been known to survive such a procedure. They are simply left to die, unattended and alone.

The issue of foetal pain has become very prominent in the last few years. Medical science doctors confirm that when the lives of the unborn are snuffed out, they often feel pain, pain that is long and agonizing.

Twenty-six physicians, including two past presidents of the American College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists have affirmed foetal pain. Their response stated in part: "The ability to feel pain and respond to it is clearly not a phenomenon that develops de novo at birth. We all have sympathy and empathy for our fellow man, and even animals that show outward signs of pain and suffering. Surely, if animals can be protected from inhumane killing techniques, the unborn child should have the right not to be subjected to this kind of cruel and unusual punishment".

With the advent of technology such as amniocentesis, we now see abortions being done to assure parents that a child of desired sex is obtained. Most often these sex selection abortions result in the retention of the male and the destruction of the female.

More and more people are beginning to recognize that women themselves are victims of abortion. Women are often not told the facts concerning the unborn child. Women are often not told about the physical and psychological problems which can result from abortion.

That is why we need and we must have a tremendous increase in services for pregnant women, so that the thoughts of contemplating abortion would be nullified by the thought that good support programs, moral support, and financial support are readily and amply available for women during pregnancy and for some time after the birth of the baby. This is imperative. All of us, including those of us in public office, must work together to make more of these services a reality. I know that the cost for such services would be tremendous, but how can one equate that cost with the present holocaust of killing some 60,000 unborn babies annually? There is no comparison. That is why we must push forward for an increase in these services.

Women today are not given the type of support that is necessary at such a vulnerable time. Decent and reasonable alternatives are often withheld. Some are forced to abandon further education or employment. Then society politely offers abortion and calls it the "women's choice". More and more women are realizing that they are being terribly exploited by our selfish abortion-oriented society. This is discrimination against women and against the very nature of womanhood. I support women's rights, but individual rights top when they affect the rights of another. No man or woman has the right to take the life of another individual in or out of the womb.

In summary, I have just reviewed how many Canadian unborn children are denied basic rights as other rights are supposedly pursued. They have no recourse to be heard on the denial or infringement of rights; they have been deprived of the most fundamental right, the right to life; and they are subjected to cruel and unusual treatment. They are discriminated against on the basis of age, and they are discriminated against on the basis of handicap. We have seen that women are discriminated against as they are not protected from abortion. They are manipulated by society to do the most unnatural thing in the world, to kill their own tiny child.

To have a Charter of Rights and Freedoms is commendable, but how can we say that we will respect and even guarantee basic human rights to every individual and then proceed to devalue and dehumanize an entire segment of our human community? Such thinking is unscientific, immoral, and unacceptable.

I have spoken about the plight of the unborn in Canada today. Surely these abuses go far beyond the respectable intentions of the Charter. I hope that you can see, from this very brief outline, that the plight of the unprotected unborn child and his mother is especially pitiful when we consider what a caring and loving society could do for them. As a just, compassionate and humane society, we must extend to these little ones and their mothers the equal respect, the protection, and the benefit of the law.

It was not that many years ago that people in Canada generally had a very high regard and a high respect for the unborn child and there were very few abortions. In the past abortions were provided for truly therapeutic reasons, and they were carried out to save the life of the mother.

Today we have abortion for reasons of convenience, and abortion is the solution that is given to women to solve their problems. Granted, it would take more effort on the part of society to meet the needs and the requirements of these women than it would to pay for an abortion.

I stress again that more support is needed to provide assistance to women who are pregnant and need and want support. When these women come forth for counselling and are offered the kind of love, the kind of compassion, and the kind of services that will meet their needs, they will very rarely opt for abortion. Time and time again they will go on; with assistance, with help that is being offered to them, they will go on and carry their children.

Whether or not the law on abortion is changed in the near future, our attitude to it can change. After all, smoking is not illegal in our society, but the attitude toward it and the formidable educational effort directed against it have led to a significant decline in smoking over the past 15 years. The same sort of result is possible with respect to abortion. All that we require is the resolve to act and the need to act.

In only 16 years from 1970 to 1986, some 907,351 unborn Canadian children were wilfully and painfully put to death by abortion. This is tragic, to say the least, and must be stopped. We must stop this carnage.

Thomas Jefferson once said: "The care of human life and happiness and not their destruction is the first and only legitimate object of good government". He did not say the unwanted or those who do not measure up to certain standards are to be excluded from protection.

The public is being informed that because some lives are deemed to be inferior, they need not be afforded the privilege of life. An expression that is commonly heard today is "quality of life". While "quality of life" is certainly a good thing to which all aspire, the term, as currently used, has meaning beyond this universal desire, and it is the new meaning that makes it so foreboding. The elimination of the unborn who are unwanted, retarded, or handicapped is presently practised because of this new ethic.

Past history tells us that a society that does not respect all human life begins with the killing of the most helpless of victims and then proceeds to the handicapped and others who are considered to be below standard. The ultimate question is: "What is the value of human life and individual human beings?" For thousands of years our Judaeo-Christian tradition has upheld and valued life. Civilization has always been measured by a view of mankind that affirms the worth and dignity of each person. We were born to love, and it is our expression of love that binds us together and elevates our level of humanism.

Canada's challenge today is making firm a future in which free men and women are enabled to live in a society which preserves and promotes the equality, worth, and dignity of every human being. The care of human life and happiness and not their destruction is the first and only legitimate object of good government. It is the duty of all of us as legislators to protect those human beings, those unborn babies who cannot speak for themselves, who cannot defend themselves, and who cannot protect themselves.

The sanctity of human life is too precious for any arbitrariness and compromise in this very important question that we are dealing with today in this Parliament. It is imperative that we take positive action and whatever that action requires to protect the lives of all unborn children from the time of conception.

At this time I would like to file the following amendment to this motion. My amendment would delete all of the words following "Such legislation should prohibit the performance of an abortion, subject to the following exceptions". This amendment is seconded by the Hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm). The following will be substituted therefor: "When two or more independent qualified medical practitioners have in good faith and on reasonable grounds stated that in their opinion the continuation of the pregnancy would or would be likely to endanger the life of the pregnant woman."

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, I take the view that it is essential for Parliament to have this debate. I believe that Canadians have a right to know what and how their legislators are thinking about this vital issue. It has been said that living itself is life's most complete treasure. We all know that there are many kinds of violence in our society, violence that robs life of that treasure of living. There is war, highway traffic accidents, dreaded diseases of many kinds, murders, and suicides, but it is chilling for me to realize that the most violent place in Canada today is not some dark side street in a decayed section of an inner city; it is, rather, the human womb.

Each year in Canada there are more than 60,000 abortions performed. I want to say that in no way can abortion be considered as merely an elective surgical procedure. It is, as former Prime Minister Trudeau once said, and I quote: "The very frightening moral decision of killing something which is living inside a person". Even Madam Justice Bertha Wilson admitted that abortion was not just a medical decision. She said that it was a profound social and ethical one as well. This was part of her recent decision that struck down the legislation on the statute books of Canada. She also said, and again I quote: "The precise point in the development of the foetus at which the state's interests in its protection becomes compelling I leave to the informed judgment of the legislature".

It will be noted that Justice Wilson recognizes that there is a state interest in protecting the foetus. Her only question is: When does that obligation commence? That is her question. She does not indicate, either, by what means this protection can be granted and guaranteed. She leaves that to us. She leaves that to the Bill which will eventually have to follow the motion we are debating today. I return to my first point, that it is therefore essential that we debate this subject in Parliament.

There are some who say that we must find that middle ground on this serious social and moral issue of abortion. I think the middle ground that some people are talking about is mythical in nature. It is non-existent. I wonder, how can there be middle ground? There is life and there is death.

In 1975 Hon. Otto Lang, then Liberal Minister of Justice, said in an interview with Bruce Garvey for The Toronto Star, and I quote: "You cannot distinguish between the life of the unborn and the born, there's no biological cut-off date". I have had the privilege to listen to distinguished physicians who have confirmed and verified that point of view.

When this Parliament, once again in a free vote, made its decision on the question of capital punishment, I, for a third time as a Member of Parliament, voted for abolition. I did so because I am pro-life and anti-violence. I am not persuaded that when the state kills felons who are guilty of murder that it makes society a better or a safer or a happier place for others.

On the contrary, I took the view that state executions merely add to the sum total of violence in society and perhaps even, in a certain sense, condone violence as an acceptable means to achieve a satisfactory end. I say no. It does not work that way. The means is unacceptable and the end is unsatisfactory.

Recently I read Truman Capote's best seller of many years ago, In Cold Blood. The savage, brutal murder of an entire family in rural Kansas by two deeply disturbed young men was a story of unprovoked, irrational violence at its worse. Yet, as Capote went on to reveal the background and personalities of those two young men, by the end of the book one did not want to see them hanged. Treatment for them, yes. Full freedom, never. But death? No.

When I voted against capital punishment I knew that a majority of my constituents thought otherwise, but I did so on the grounds of being for life, even life which is stained and marred and warped by dreadful human experiences. At this moment, however, I am grateful that on this issue of abortion I am able to be more in tune and in step with what I know to be the prevailing view in my constituency.

In being for life on the abortion question I must say that I take this stand not without some difficulty. One of those difficulties has to do with the life and the health of the mother. Thank goodness, Sir, that modern gynaecology makes it less and less likely that pregnancy can cause death or seriously impair the health of the mother. To medical science we pay tribute for that fact. Still, if there are those clear and indisputable cases where a choice has to be made between life or death for one or the other, the mother or the unborn child, it is in my view the mother without question who must live.

Of great concern to me also is the victim of rape or incest who becomes pregnant. That is among those extreme cases where an appeal from the woman in a just society would demand a sympathetic and most responsive hearing. To have children born as a result of rape or incest will do nothing to achieve quality family life and that really goes without saying.

However, an even harder case is the one involving a highly strung, harassed mother of four young children living in a remote mining town and married to a weak-willed, self-indulgent man. Her fifth pregnancy was more than she could bear and abortions at that time were illegal. Therefore, she went to a back street abortionist, got blood poisoning as a result, and subsequently died. She left behind a guilt burdened husband and four motherless children.

One of the arguments that the pro-abortionists use is that before legalization, before the Criminal Code was amended, there were thousands of such women dying every year as a result of botched up back alley abortions. I thought that, too, until Doctor T. A. Kasper, an Edmonton pathologist, noted in a letter to Members of Parliament quite recently that this argument for abortion is without any valid statistical foundation. He goes on in his letter to say, however:

> Even with legal abortions performed under the strictest control, in the finest institutions, the statistics show that the risks to the life of the mother are greater than the risks to her carrying the infant to term.

Going back to the tragic case of the harassed mother of four, I would suggest to you and my colleagues in the House that the answer to that situation was not an abortion being used as a means to solve a serious social problem. Rather, the answer was to have a more responsible husband, to live in a more caring community, with facilities to help that person, with affordable and easily accessible child care facilities, a community that had adequate counselling services.

Are you aware that there are people who live in the more remote parts of this country who, when they have a difficult and real problem, really have no place to go? There is no one to whom they can turn. There is no one who will take the time to listen. There is no one who can listen in a way that can be helpful.

I sometimes suspect that the rationale for an abortion on demand policy is basically anti-child in nature. Richard Needham, a former columnist for The Globe and Mail, once wrote in his own inimical and cynical style:

> The first half of our lives is ruined by our parents, the second half by our children.

Well, Sir, you know as do I that children place heavy demands on parents. Children create huge costs for society in education, child care, health and recreational facilities, yet we are not spending enough for our children. I say, Sir, that it is better to incur those huge costs than it is to waste our money on useless war toys like nuclear submarines.

Children need and demand an extensive amount of nurturing, watching, attending, and loving. All of this conflicts so often with a consumer driven, upwardly mobile society. The ideal has become: double income and no kids. Why? So that more of the good things of this world can be accumulated and acquired.

Sir, few can have it both ways. You cannot have it all and children as well. Those two life-styles are often seen as incompatible. Children are extremely costly to raise and parental responsibilities tend to go on and on before those children become fully independent and self-supporting adults.

Having said that, the decision not to have children is entirely a personal one. However, to abort a foetus goes beyond the personal. It involves society as a whole. That point of view is supported and backed up by the recent Supreme Court decision. Thus, I contend that consumerism, materialism, and plain selfishness are possible motives which may lie in part at least behind the call for abortion on demand.

Those who are pro-life are not necessarily stupid and ignorant as Henry Morgentaler has charged. They may in fact be more caring, more compassionate and concerned, less ruthless and far more respectful of life in all its many manifestations and more willing to share what they have.

Morris C. Shumiacher, a distinguished and highly respected legal counsel from Regina, Saskatchewan, said in an address to the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons the following:

> There is no challenge in death—only defeat. There is no hope in destruction—only despair. Therefore choose not death but life that the world may not despair and die. Choose life—that we may live.

The Supreme Court of Canada will in due course, shortly, have to rule on the meaning in our Constitution of the phrase that stands out whenever I read it which says that everyone has the right to life. What the Supreme Court will decide in that pending case I do not know. However, for me, the right to life applies equally to the born and to the unborn. It therefore follows, again in my view, that the Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees that this right to life is protected "subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society". Based on that constitutional principle, there would be many, many fewer abortions performed in Canada.

The Government's motion with regard to abortion is not one that I am, in all conscience, able to accept. I am grateful for the debate. The motion, however, is not acceptable. I will, therefore, on Thursday be voting against it.

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, let me briefly outline some of the arguments in support of the pro-life position on abortion, a position which I have consistently and unequivocally held up throughout my tenure in public office. The case can best be put by simply allowing the biological and physiological facts to speak for themselves.

First, it is well known that all the information necessary for the development of each of us as a unique human being is contained in the genetic code that is present from the moment of conception. The colour of our eyes, the size of our feet, and the capacity of our brains have all been established in that instant. Nothing needs to be added other than food, shelter, and care.

Second, the indicators of life and development are early and dramatic. The unborn produces its own blood at 17 to 20 days after conception. Its heart begins beating at 24 to 25 days. Between the sixth and seventh weeks, the electrical activity of the brain in readable, and at eight weeks all the essential organs are present. The unborn can cry, hiccup, develop individual tastes, be startled, and feel pain. Indeed, according to Sir William Liley of New Zealand, knighted because of his pioneering work in amniocentesis, the unborn child is not a part of the mother's body but is a separate person who dictates its own growth and when he or she is to be born.

Third, apart from abortion, the medical community treats the foetus as any other patient. It is now possible to perform corrective surgery on the foetus while still in the womb or even to remove, operate on, and subsequently replace the foetus so that it may come to full term. Clearly, it cannot be and it is not viewed as a piece of tissue to be removed and discarded at will.

Fourth, remarkable developments in neo-natal technology now allow foetal viability as early as five months from conception. Witness, for example, the survival of a baby recently born here in Ottawa at just 21 weeks gestation. Yet we know that abortions are even now being performed upon foetuses above and beyond 21 weeks development and furthermore that some of these have even survived the attempts to abort them.

The fact that the unborn are now viable at increasingly early stages of development has rendered the whole question of foetal viability something of a moving target. It is forcing American legislators to reconsider their trimester approach to abortion. Why then, I ask of those of my colleagues who are in favour of a gestational approach, must we repeat the errors and ignore the lessons of the American experience?

Finally, I think it is instructive to read how, in 1975, after an exhaustive examination of the available biological and physiological evidence by 133 world renowned scientists, geneticists, and gynaecologists, the West German Federal Constitutional Court responded to the question as to when life begins. The court was acutely conscious of the events which took place in Germany between 1933 and 1945 and was therefore especially anxious to ground its judgment in scientific objectivity. Its conclusion was:

> Life, in the sense of historical existence of a human individual, exists according to definite biological-physiological knowledge, in any case, from the 14th day after conception (nidation, individuation) . . . The process of > development which has begun at that point is a continuing process which exhibits no sharp demarcation and does not allow a precise division of the various steps of development of the human life.

I hope that the judgment of Canada's Supreme Court on the Borowski case will be equally objective and unequivocal in its estimation of the evidence.

One's position on abortion cannot be construed and thereby dismissed as being simply a matter of personal opinion or belief. Rather, in and of itself, the medical evidence is concrete. It is objective. It is compelling. Life is an uninterrupted continuum which begins at conception and ends at death. Without doubt, abortion brings about the cessation of a living human being during the process of its development along that continuum.

The performance of an abortion must contend with this incontrovertible fact. For those who value human life, it can only be justified on grounds of self-defence in those rare instances when another life, that of the mother, is in demonstrable danger, and where there is no other acceptable medical procedure to obviate that danger.

Consequently, while each Member is free to make up his or her own mind, this free vote should not be viewed as one Member's beliefs, values or opinions against those of another, with the added implication that one opinion is just as good as another. On the contrary, a Member's opinion on a matter of such fundamental significance as this can only be valid if the facts are there to support it.

Facts are facts, Mr. Speaker, whether you accept them, reject them, or ignore them. You cannot have your list of facts while I have mine. The biological and physiological evidence concerning the unborn child will simply not allow us the expedient and fallacious post-enlightenment liberal separation between the public world of fact on the one hand and the private world of values on the other.

The medical facts support those who are committed to the value system that upholds the unborn as a living human being deserving of legal protection. It is incumbent upon those who would argue otherwise, that is, those espousing a pro-choice or gestational approach to abortion, to supply the requisite, concrete evidence in support of their own particular beliefs, values or opinions. To refuse to do so, I submit, is pure hypocrisy and intellectual dishonesty.

Therefore, in the light of what I have sought to outline, both the gestational and the pro-choice options must be rejected as completely unacceptable to those concerned to uphold the sanctity of human life. The reasons are self-evident.

First, the pro-choice option leaves the issue of abortion to be decided by the woman in consultation with a qualified medical practitioner. Of course, this begs the obvious question as to precisely what it is the woman is being given the freedom of choice to do. The obvious answer is that she is free to terminate the life of the developing foetus. Such an action flies in the face of all the medical data concerning the foetus. Furthermore, if the growing evidence concerning post-abortion syndrome is considered, the pro-choice position does a terrible disservice to the well-being of the mother herself.

The motion before us, the so-called middle ground, is in fact a gestational approach. It would allow an abortion in the early stages of pregnancy where continuation of the pregnancy threatens the woman's physical or mental well-being. While the exact time limit to be placed upon this early stage is yet to be determined, it is unlikely that it would be much less than 12 weeks and, in all probability, it would be closer to 18 to 24 weeks. Henry Morgentaler has stated 24 weeks as his preference.

Given that Statistics Canada figures show that 89 per cent of current abortions take place before 13 weeks and that 96.5 per cent occur before 17 weeks, and given the fact that the term "mental well-being" is extremely broad in scope, the motion, as a gestational approach, effectively functions as abortion on demand in the vast majority of instances.

Furthermore, this motion would also allow abortions at a later stage in the pregnancy should the continuation of the pregnancy endanger the woman's life or seriously injure her health. This, of course, is virtually the same as the former abortion law under Section 251 of the Criminal Code and shares all of its obvious deficiencies. Why, it may be asked, would we want to re-enact legislation that the Supreme Court has recently struck down?

Consequently, neither the pro-choice nor gestational options will do. Indeed, they completely bypass all medical evidence concerning the nature and status of the foetus. They are but thinly guised legislative means of allowing the women, doctor, and legislator to abdicate their responsibility and ignore the evidence.

It has been argued by some, for example the Hon. Member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan) and the Canadian Abortion Rights Action League, that a restrictive abortion law is unconstitutional. Indeed, some have claimed that only a gestational approach or even a pro-choice direction would be acceptable to the Supreme Court.

This argument, I submit, is completely false. It is largely based upon the opinion of Justice Bertha Wilson who suggested that the commencement of Parliament's interest in the foetus, it seemed to her, "would fall somewhere in the second trimester".

Judge Dickson, however, said: "The precise point in the development of the foetus at which the state's interest in its protection becomes 'compelling' should be left to the informed judgment of the legislature which is in a position to receive submissions on the subject from all the relevant disciplines".

By way of further contrast, Justice Beetz, in giving his judgment, cited favourably United States Supreme Court Justice O'Connor's opinion in City of Akron vs. Akron Centre for Reproductive Health, to the effect that "the state's interest in protecting potential human life exists throughout the pregnancy"; in other words, from conception to birth.

To anyone who affords the Supreme Court judgment on the Morgentaler case a careful reading, the following facts are self-evident. First, there is no constitutional right to an abortion. Second, as Judge Dickson indicated, it is Parliament's prerogative and responsibility to summon together all available evidence and then decide the state's interest in the foetus. Third, Parliament's interest need not necessarily require a gestational or pro-choice position. Fourth, as Judges Beetz and Estey stated, Parliament's interest need not exclude a life and health standard approach which includes the confirmation of a second, independent medical opinion. Fifth, Parliament's interest need not disallow a life and health standard which is very restrictive, even to the point of excluding first trimester abortions.

Clearly, it is both Parliament's privilege and responsibility to decide as to the rights of the foetus from conception on. I can only agree with Judge Dickson that Parliament should reach its decision on this matter after informing itself by means of all evidence at hand.

As I have argued throughout, all biological and physiological data available leads one to one conclusion only, that the foetus is an autonomous life in development. As such, the only reasonable legislative option is that which serves to protect the rights of the foetus throughout its development.

Furthermore, this right can only be abrogated, on the grounds of self-defence, in those rare instances where the mother's life is in demonstrable danger and where there is no other acceptable medical procedure to obviate that danger.

Of course, there must always be concern for the well-being of the mother, but her best interests are served only when the utmost respect is afforded all human life; that of the mother, her unborn child and, indeed, society itself.

This, therefore, is the pro-life position. I shall support any amendment before this House which gives a strong pro-life direction to the Government, and I encourage my colleagues to do the same.

Unfortunately, the abortion debate has been construed as one of competing interests, the right of the mother to be free to choose versus the right of the unborn to live. However, surely it defies all that we hold dear about humanity to speak of a mother and her unborn child as being in competition against one another. Only a pathetically distorted sense of what is right and what is freedom could render mother and child as antagonists.

Every reasonable Canadian knows that there are necessary and legitimate limits to rights and freedoms, especially where human life is concerned. Otherwise, we are left vulnerable to the tyranny of anarchy.

As the esteemed American Judge Learned Hand has said: "A society in which men recognize no check upon their freedom soon becomes a society where freedom is the possession of only a savage few . . . (but the true) spirit of liberty is the spirit which weighs (the interest of others) alongside its own without bias".

Consequently, as the philosopher Francis Schaeffer has noted, abortion is not solely a feminist issue any more than slavery was only a slave owner's issue; rather, "the fate of the unborn is a question of the fate of the human race. We are one human family. If the rights of one part of that family are denied, it is of concern to each of us. What is at stake is no less than the essence of what freedom and rights are all about".

Given all that I have said, I would like to take advantage of the unanimous agreement of the three Parties and table the following amendment. "That all of the words in the motion after the "to protect the unborn; and" be deleted and the following substituted therefor: "Such legislation should prohibit the performance of an abortion except when: —two independent qualified medical practitioners have, in good faith and on reasonable grounds, in writing, stated that in their opinion the continuation of the pregnancy would, or would be likely to, endanger the life of the pregnant woman or seriously and substantially endanger her health and there is no other commonly accepted medical procedure for effectively treating the health risk; but the grounds for such an opinion are not to include (I) the effects of stress or anxiety which may accompany an unexpected or unwanted pregnancy, or (II) social or economic considerations."

That motion is seconded by the Hon. Member for Surrey—White Rock—North Delta (Mr. Friesen). It is crucial to note that this amendment specifically defines the parameters of the term "health", which was a requirement in the Supreme Court judgment, that is, the threat to a woman's health must be, first, serious and substantial; second, such that there is no other commonly accepted medical procedure for effectively treating the health risk; and third, other than the anxiety and stress which normally accompanies an unexpected or unwanted pregnancy. Additionally, socio-economic factors may not be grounds for an abortion.

It is also important to realize that the distinction between this amendment and the amendment just put by the Hon. Member for Grey—Simcoe (Mr. Mitges) is a very fine one. This view is in accordance with the interpretation of pro-life medical and legal experts. For example, in my own Kitchener constituency, Dr. John Sehl, obstetrician and gynaecologist, views this amendment as extremely restrictive and has urged me to support it. He is convinced that if the medical community were to act in accordance with the wording of this amendment it would effectively allow it to perform abortions in life threatening circumstances only. The validity of this position has received widespread recognition throughout a broad cross-section of those concerned about Canada's unborn.

For example, the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops has called upon us here to "take serious account of the concern expressed by many pro-life Members of Parliament that abstention from voting, because the perfect law has not been presented, may indirectly contribute to the passage of a motion which allows for the totally unacceptable gestational approach".

Similarly, the Evangelical Fellowship of Canada, representing some 2.4 million Canadians, urges Members to vote for an amendment which "is at least pointing our society in a life-affirming direction". It adds: "It would be a tragedy if our children recorded that at a critical moment in Canadian history evil prevailed because good people did nothing".

Likewise, the Salvation Army says the following:

> It is our firm opinion, based on the Christian conviction that all human life is sacred, and borne out of our many years of experience in ministering to the needs of women, that (such an amendment as this) ... most nearly offers a civilized nation a way whereby all human life may continue to be regarded with awe and treated with utmost dignity.

It is with this view that I have submitted this amendment. I encourage my colleagues to support it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have tabled the Hon. Member's amendment as per the agreement.

Mrs. Mary Collins (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, it is with mixed feelings that I rise to participate in the debate we have begun this afternoon on the motion which would give guidance to the Government as to what direction legislation should take with respect to abortion.

During the time available to me I want to talk about the issue of abortion itself, my feelings about it, the feelings that have been expressed to me by constituents and others across the country, and then to talk about the motion itself and some of the changes I believe should be made to it.

I do not believe that my position on abortion is a surprise to anyone in the House or indeed in my constituency. I have made it clear, when we have had debates formerly on Private Members' Motions with respect to abortion, that I am a strong advocate of the concept that women must have the right to choose whether or not they wish to terminate a pregnancy.

We had several debates about the former law, Section 251 of the Criminal Code. I was not happy with it, yet it seemed at that time, as it seems now, that it was difficult to obtain a consensus about what kind of changes should be made in the law. We tended to say that it is there, it seemed to work relatively well, and perhaps it should not be changed.

Of course, the situation occurred with the Supreme Court decision on the Morgentaler case which has required us now to reconsider this vital question involving so many different competing interests of philosophical, religious, and moral views about life and about the role of women. I know it is a very difficult hard decision for many people to make. Some of my colleagues have already talked about the Supreme Court decision. It struck down the old law because, in the view of the Supreme Court, it did not meet the requirements of the Charter of Rights. The requirement of the hospital committees was deemed to be arbitrary.

The decision itself and the writing of some of the judges in that decision have been important in terms of determining the kind of approach we are discussing now. Philosophically, my own view would be that we do not really need legislation. Yet I know there is a strong feeling among colleagues and many members of the public that there needs to be some statement in law about abortion, about women's rights, and potentially about the developing rights of the foetus. Indeed, some of the words that were expressed in the decision of the Supreme Court would lead us to believe that this is what they were thinking as well.

Madam Bertha Wilson's comments in that decision are the ones that I feel very close to. I think she expressed many of my own views very well. She talked in her decision about the ways in which one could balance the women's role and the women's right to choose, and the possibility that at a certain stage in a pregnancy that the role of society could come into play. She said: "There is a point at which the state interest and the protection of the foetus becomes compelling. This point is to be left to the legislature. It seems to me however, that it might fall somewhere in the second trimester".

We are not dealing, in the motion before us, with the particular point in time. That would obviously come forward with legislation, but we are dealing with a gestational concept, to try to find that balance about which I know many people feel strongly.

Although my own view is that we do not actually need this legislation, and that the decision to terminate a pregnancy should be that of a woman in consultation with her physician, I recognize that the approach put forward by the Government is one that requires serious consideration.

Let us look at the state of abortion in Canada and elsewhere. We have heard from time to time that the number of abortions are rising dramatically and that without law this might become an even greater issue.

First, Canada is not among those nations that has the most liberal abortion law. About 40 per cent of people around the world live in countries where there is basically abortion upon request, certainly in the early stages. That includes United States, U.S.S.R., China, France, and Italy. We fall in a category with about 25 per cent of the world's population which has certain constraints. They are similar in some ways to Britain, India, and Japan.

The remaining 25 per cent of the world's population lives in countries where, generally speaking, there are very tight laws with respect to abortion, countries with either strong Roman Catholic or Moslem religions which have had greater influence on public policy.

It is interesting to look at the situation, because even in those countries where abortion has been stringently constrained, when women make the decision that they wish to pursue this course of action, they will find ways to do it. Although there are tight abortion laws in Ireland, Irish women are as likely as women in the liberal Netherlands to obtain abortions. It would be a matter of going to the United Kingdom.

To some extent we find this in Canada, and this was one of my great concerns with the old law. Indeed, I knew a young woman who had to take this course. When abortions are not available in their communities, they would have to go to the United States to obtain an abortion. I do not think that was appropriate or right. I hope that situation will change.

Some people also claim that the incidence of abortion in Canada is high and disproportionate. I would argue that. According to the last statistics, 1984-85, there were in the order of 61,000 abortions performed in Canada, 99 per cent prior to 20 weeks. Only in a very few and exceptional circumstances were abortions performed after that time.

In other countries with which we often associated ourselves as having similar standards of morality, such as England, the incidence of abortion was 33 per cent higher. In France it was 30 per cent higher, in Japan it was 75 per cent higher, and in the United States it has been twice as high.

I do not personally believe that should this motion pass and legislation be introduced, it would have an impact on the numbers. I believe that once a woman makes that kind of decision she will find a way. We have a responsibility to ensure that she has the facilities in which an abortion can be provided safely and under proper medical conditions and that it is covered by our health care plans.

This brings me to something about which I want to comment as a woman and as the mother of three children. I have had discussions about abortion with women I have dealt with over the years. I have talked to women who have had abortions and mothers of daughters who have had abortions. I do not think women take this issue lightly. I sometimes hear from people that abortion is used as a method of birth control. There may be times when that is done, but I think it is certainly the exception to the rule. For most women, the decision to terminate a pregnancy, to have an abortion, is a very difficult and traumatic decision. It is not one that is taken lightly. I do not think that we as a society should impose further difficulties on women so that in some cases they have to suffer the possibility of further health problems or mental health problems in terms of seeking a solution.

I would like to turn to the Supreme Court decision. Bertha Wilson in her rationale of why the old law was struck down, in my mind, went to the heart of the issue. She said:

> . . . the decision to terminate a pregnancy . . . is one that will have profound psychological, economic and social consequences for the pregnant women. The circumstances giving rise to it can be complex and varied and there may be . . . powerful considerations militating in opposite directions. It is a decision that deeply reflects the way the woman thinks about herself and her relationship to others and to society at large. It is a profound social and ethical decision. Her response to it will be the response of a whole person.
> The old Section 251 put the decision in the hands of a committee and so takes away the decision that a woman has a right to make for herself without any state interference.

Judge Wilson goes on to say that Section 251 also violates the right to security because it treats the pregnant women as a passive recipient of a decision made by others as to whether her body is to be used to nurture a new life. I would certainly concur with the reasoning of Justice Bertha Wilson. I cannot comprehend any laws which take away my right to make a decision about my body, about my future. I just do not think that is right. I would ask other Members to think about that.

If women are faced with the situation of a pregnancy they do not wish to carry to term, they want to make that decision as quickly as possible. The evidence is clear. Only .3 per cent of pregnancies in Canada are carried out in the last trimester. Those are the truly exceptional cases. Perhaps we do not really need, then, to consider a gestational approach because that probably is not the issue. At the same time, however, there is this feeling in society that there should be some statement of protection of the developing foetus at a certain stage. I can accept that and would be prepared to accept some limitations on the right of a woman to make that decision in the later stages of the pregnancy. I will come to some suggestions about that in a few moments.

There is often a lot of statistics quoted about the public's view. A Gallup poll in April indicated that about 70 per cent of Canadians believe that a decision to terminate a pregnancy should be a matter of choice for the woman and her physician. That is certainly supported by a survey undertaken in my own riding. I asked the question in my householder this spring and received over 2,200 replies. That is a much larger response than I would ever have expected and is really very significant. The number of people who wrote comments, wanting to give me their views, was very heartening. It showed that the constituency of Capilano is very much in tune with the general views of Canadians. Only 12 per cent indicated that they would support legislation to prevent all abortions, but 69 per cent indicated that abortion should be a matter of choice between a woman and her doctor during the early stages of pregnancy.

Despite the strongly held views people might have on religious grounds against abortion, and I appreciate those views, I think we have to consider that the majority of Canadians believe that abortion, certainly in the earlier stages of pregnancy, should be a choice between the woman and her physician. Those who feel strongly on the other side of the question should have the right to promulgate their views, to try to encourage women to pursue other options. I would hope as well that they and all of us would pursue more options to encourage all people to be more responsible with respect to reproduction. We should be encouraging Planned Parenthood and other organizations so that these women are not faced with the question of unwanted pregnancies. I think people should make their views known, but I would ask them not to constrain my right as an individual with what in my mind is a minority view that there should be a law imposed on the majority. I do not think the majority accepts that.

I want to share with the House some of the comments of my constituents when they wrote to me on this issue. I received many letters on both sides of the issue, but these are some of the comments I thought particularly interesting:

> There may be numerous instances where abortion is the only choice available for the woman involved. I feel that no one has the right to tell me what to do with my body. I am a responsible person who takes precautions at all times but if I found myself facing an unwanted pregnancy, it would be that one chance in a thousand or more where birth control fails. No one should force me to carry through with such an unwanted pregnancy.

And another constituent wrote:

> As each case is different in nature, it should be judged on its individual merits by the woman involved with advice from her doctor, not ruled by some blanket across-the-board law.

And a third constituent wrote:

> Each person has a responsibility to decide their own future. Whatever choice they make, they have to live with it.

And finally:

> Women must have the fundamental right to decide according to their own conscience on this matter. There should be no interference from those holding a particular religious view. Separate church and state, in justice to all living women.

I would like to conclude by speaking to the motion itself and to the suggestions I have already laid on the table for some amendments which I feel would substantially improve the motion. They would bring it in line with what I believe to be the opinion of the majority of Canadians. They would certainly bring it much closer to my own views.

The motion as it stands, in trying to find that very difficult and delicate balance between the right of a woman to liberty and security of her person, and the responsibility of society to protect the unborn, still provides too many constraints on that right of choice for the woman in the early stages of pregnancy. It still requires a qualified medical practitioner to be of the opinion that the continuation of the pregnancy would or would likely threaten her physical or mental well-being. It seems that that is someone else telling me that it threatens or does not threaten my life or well-being. I do not accept that. I believe it must be my choice, in consultation with my physician, as to whether I want to proceed with an abortion.

I have laid before the House an amendment which would delete that provision in the first part. It would mean that in the early stages of pregnancy it would be the right of the woman to choose. In the early stages of pregnancy I feel that the requirement to have two physicians is onerous. It is arbitrary. I do not believe that it would withstand a court challenge. In fact it could result in delays which could be detrimental to the health or life of the mother.

I feel it should be only one qualified medical practitioner who is of the opinion that the continuation of the pregnancy would or would likely endanger the woman's life, or seriously endanger her health. In that respect we have to be sure that health is interpreted as it is by the United Nations to include both the physical and mental health of the mother. In many cases tests are not available until later in the stages, tests which detect serious foetal abnormalities and which could have a serious impact on the woman's mental health. She would then still have the right, in consultation with her physician, to choose how to terminate the pregnancy at that point. Generally speaking, that is an extremely rare situation but we must provide for such situations as well.

I know people sometimes say that on the Progressive Conservative side of the House there are not too many of us who are strong advocates of a choice position. There is a large group of Tories for choice in my City of Vancouver with whom I have been working, as well as a group in Toronto.

The National Progressive Conservative Women's Federation passed a motion which indicated that we believe that the final decision to have an abortion during the first phase of pregnancy should rest with the woman. I want to put that on the record because, as we will see during this debate, this is not an issue which breaks down on Party lines. It is an issue which breaks down on one's own philosophical view, one's own moral view. Ultimately, for me, it is my view as to the rights of a woman.

I am asking colleagues on all sides of the House to support the amendments which I have tabled. I think that with these amendments the motion before the House could truly provide guidance to the Government. It could result in some legislation which would find that appropriate balance of the life, the security of the woman and the potential concern over the developing foetus.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I thank the Hon. Member for filing the amendment earlier today. The Chair would like to recognize the Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier on debate.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, this debate on a motion dealing with abortion is unfortunate because it will not produce any concrete results, it will not give Canadians any firm direction, and it will not give us legislation that will satisfy anyone in this country. It is too bad the Government did not have the courage to table a Bill because of the divisions within its Party on this issue, and it is also regrettable that this is the second motion to be put before the House, a motion which I find unacceptable because it is neither hot nor cold, ignores the real issues and does not offer any kind of solution.

Mr. Speaker, when last January the Supreme Court of Canada handed down its decision in the case of the Queen versus Dr. Henry Morgantaler, Dr. Leslie Frank Smoling and Dr. Robert Scott, everyone was taken by surprise, and after giving the problem some serious thought, the Government announced, through the Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn) that it would react with celerity, and that it would shortly table new legislation that would meet the legal test, in other words, it would contain the kind of legal language that would stand the test of the courts. In an interview he gave on March 18 of this year,

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn) is quoted as saying, in an article in The Ottawa Citizen of March 18, 1988, the following:

> The federal Government won't wait for a Law Reform Commission report before it introduces a new abortion law . . . It is necessary to act on an urgent basis.

That was some six months ago. We are now faced, after several months, with a motion which, in my view, will not satisfy anyone. It will not give Canadians that new law on an urgent basis.

I am satisfied that at least my Party, the Liberal Party, will have a free vote on this issue. I think that it is a good thing for Members of Parliament to express through a free vote their views on issues such as abortion. We expressed our views on the death penalty. On these difficult moral and ethical issues we have to stand and tell our constituents where we stand. I think that is good. People can say: "Well, my Member voted against the death penalty. He is not in favour of this motion put forward by the Government on abortion because basically he has been saying for the last 16 years in the riding of Ottawa—Vanier that he is against abortion on demand. He has said that repeatedly before every election". I am one of those who believe that there are reasons, serious reasons, to justify interrupting a pregnancy when the health of the mother is threatened, or when the individual has been violently and sometimes strongly emotionally affected by rape, or is the object of such a heinous crime as incest.

In my riding the people understand that abortion cannot be used as a means of contraception. I know that the people in my riding who hold the other view do not think that I am being very supportive of the free choice movement, but I am neither pro-life nor pro-choice. I believe that the pro-choice movement, the extreme pro-choice movement, does not represent a view which I can defend. I do not think that the pro-life movement, the extreme of that movement, represents my views either. I have said so over the years to them. In my riding I have been called the worst traditionalist there is. If being a traditionalist means standing up for certain things, then I am a traditionalist.

I want to talk about the need for legislation and why I think this motion is wrong. However, I want to talk about the difficulty that we are having in the country with the lack of leadership of the Government in terms of giving Canadians a clear and unequivocal stand on where the Cabinet sits and on what it does. That is the parliamentary system as I know it. They have been elected and chosen to administer and to make proposals to the House. The House is then supposed to dispose of them in a democratic fashion.

I do not think that the Government can get away by hiding behind a wishy-washy motion such as the one before us, which is procedurally correct, thank you very much. The first motion, Motion No. 25, was not procedurally correct. We told the Government that. This one is procedurally correct and, by unanimous consent, we have accepted that debate be limited, but everybody will have a chance. All those who want to speak can come into the House until six o'clock tomorrow morning—if they have the patience—and state their views. Tomorrow the same scenario will apply, starting at three o'clock until six o'clock, Thursday morning. There is the possibility for some 60 to 70 people to speak. That will be a minority of the House, but at least it will be a debate which is open to all those who want to participate.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, one of the reasons why I truly believe the Government showed a lack of courage and leadership by not tabling a Bill is that legislation would give Canadians some clear and specific parameters on the issue of abortion. In a motion, which has no force of law, it is hard to describe and define what one wants to say, while legislation, with its definitions and terms and the way it is drafted, can give us a much broader range of understanding by the way it defines those terms.

This motion, Motion No. 36 before the House today, does not provide a definition of health and does not define what the motion means when it says, in the second paragraph:

> When, during the early stages of pregnancy: a qualified medical practitioner . . .

What are the early stages of pregnancy? To be defined. And further, when we read:

> When during the subsequent stages of pregnancy . . .

What is the subsequent stage? Somebody in my riding explained: The early stages are from the beginning to the middle and the subsequent stages from the middle to the end.

Mr. Speaker, as you know, there was a very important debate in Great Britain recently on a motion to restrict access to abortion to 18 weeks, as opposed to 22 or 23 weeks. The motion was defeated. I am told that in France, women can have an abortion on demand in the first 10 weeks, but that afterwards it is rather difficult. In Canada, there is no limit, but the Government does not say what it means by "earlier stages of pregnancy" and "subsequent stages". No, it leaves that to possible amendments from Members. That is not courageous, nor is it very clear.

For example, a Bill could have made it possible to meet women's needs in more than one way. Certainly, it would have had to deal with the question of abortion as such, that is whether abortion should be allowed or not, under what conditions an abortion could be performed, and at what stage of pregnancy. This would have to be clear and explicit in the Bill. Such a Bill would have made it possible to provide alternatives to abortion, like special counselling programs, for example, with professionals who, by giving a pregnant woman psychological support, would make it possible to avoid abortion in some cases, because the woman would at least have other alternatives available to her.

For example, a program could be set up to provide clinics where competent people could give not only women but also families and couples social, cultural or financial support to help them through the difficulties facing them. There is nothing like that now throughout the country. It does exist in some centres, but not everywhere in the country. Such programs might well be successful in some cases and provide less drastic solutions than abortion.

Mr. Speaker, it is difficult for us to pass judgement on who should authorize an abortion or who should be entitled to have one. It is not an easy decision to make.

If the Government had assumed its responsibilities, it would have presented a Bill, as I said, that would provide a recourse and support from the community, from health professionals, by providing an appropriate, fair, understanding response to the serious needs of women in difficulty; I am sure that worthwhile alternatives could be found.

This problem is not insoluble. It is not necessarily a legal issue or strictly a health issue. It may be a moral, ethical or social issue for some. In Canada, it may also be a matter of whether one lives in a remote region that does not provide access to the same quality of health care as other regions. It is not an insoluble problem, Mr. Speaker; it is just a matter of showing leadership. You must think about it and act.

In 1988, we should think of the whole question of human reproduction; every day, we hear reports of troubling experiments on human life. And abortion is only part of this problem. It is a big issue, I admit, but it must be dealt with and solved quickly in the best interest of all Canadians.

But it is not the only part. We must deal quickly with the matter of in vitro fertilization. Yesterday evening, again, there was a program on the national CBC network about in vitro fertilization. Fertility clinics and genetic manipulation will certainly upset Canadians, men and women. The problem of surrogate mothers must also be considered. Modern technology and medicine now pose a major moral problem for us and we, legislators, must for once take a pro-active role in this.

We cannot afford to wait for the Supreme Court or other courts to throw the ball back to the politicians, to us here in the House of Commons. We must study these issues now and react immediately.

There is more and more talk about foetal tissue cultures for transplantation. This poses a serious moral problem. Will foetuses be cultivated only for their use as raw material? Can we in all conscience allow this? Will we have foetus farms, laboratories to grow human tissues and foetuses so that organs like the liver, heart or eyes can be taken from them? That may seem like science fiction, Mr. Speaker, but it is on its way. It has already arrived. We recently saw foetal cells transplanted into the brain of some people suffering from Parkinson's disease, for example. This procedure has already been developed and demonstrated.

The door has also been opened to possible large-scale organ transplants. And, Mr. Speaker, we must ask whether this is a legal question, a medical question or just a social and ethical question. I think that it is most important to discuss it.

I know that this debate does not deal directly with the abortion issue, but I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the motion before us will solve nothing, because the problem is much bigger. In this debate we must state whether we are for or against the motion, and I have said clearly where I stand: I am against the motion because it falls far short of my moral or social standards, as I see it, nor does it embody the essential elements of a legislative position.

Mr. Speaker, another reason which calls for legislation rather than a simple motion is that a statute would make it possible to offer a much wider array of options than does a simple motion of principle.

I am one of those who believe that, on ethical and moral grounds, unrestricted abortion, abortion on demand is unacceptable. As I said earlier, there are circumstances where such an option can be justified. This is why I favour abortion when medical evidence indicates that pregnancy may endanger the woman's life. In such cases—and I am not qualified to make the decision—we have to rely on the opinion of the physician or the qualified medical team. Should these health professionals conclude that the mother's life is seriously threatened and recommend an abortion, then I sincerely believe we should allow the procedure.

Finally, there is a last category which I think ought to be accepted, and I referred to this ealier in my remarks. I am talking about cases where pregnancy is the result of criminal or violent behaviour. I am thinking particularly of incidents of rape and incest. From a psychological standpoint, Mr. Speaker, such situations are difficult enough to live through for both the victim and her parents, and I think this psychological trauma justifies ending the pregnancy. A woman who is the victim of such an act of violence should have the right to seek an abortion during the first weeks of pregnancy if that is her decision and, of course, if that option is recommended by health professionals.

In simple terms, Mr. Speaker, that is my position. I am not a lawyer. I did not want to debate Criminal Code Section 251 nor say that it is a legal issue because I do not believe it is a legal issue. It is a matter of ethics with far-reaching socio-economic components. It is a personal matter which each of us has to settle as he or she sees fit.

For the record, I wanted to make my position clear. I do not see how I could be more convincing than by saying that I am pro-life, Mr. Speaker. Of course I am. That is how I voted throughout my life. I am not a violent man. I believe that abortion on request is an exaggerated and immoderate approach, therefore a bad option as far as I am concerned. That is a personal position which I am prepared to uphold and defend.

• (1800)

[English]

Mr. John Oostrom (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to be able to participate in this very important debate. I believe that there are only two positions in this debate. Either one is for life or one is against life. Any position in between is pure hypocrisy. The abortion issue, simply put, is black and white. Therefore, I cannot support the Government's motion. From the time of the ancient Greeks until recently, western civilization has condemned abortion and has traditionally upheld and honoured the Hippocratic oath.

A pagan physician, Hippocrates, wrote the oath to serve as a medical and ethical guide for students in roughly 367 B.C. Hippocrates said, and I quote: "I will give no deadly medicine to anyone if asked, nor suggest any such counsel; and in like manner, I will not give to woman a pessary to produce abortion."

Taking the oath has customarily been a part of medical school graduation, but lately the part on abortion has been dropped by many schools. Although Hippocrates lived in a pagan civilization, abortion was unmistakably condemned. One wonders if civilization has really progressed over the last 2,000 years.

Opposition to abortion was reflected almost universally by the world's great religions—Hinduism, Islam, and in ancient Vedic spiritual writings in India. With Judaism, from 1200 B.C., there was a strong tradition of opposition to abortion.

Christianity, at the same it emerged in the Mediterranean area during the 1st century A.D., strongly upheld the censure of abortion as a major moral principle. This prohibition was one of the distinctive behavioural injunctions of the early Christian church. The Christian community became vocal in the 2nd century and emphatically deplored and condemned abortion at any stage of pregnancy. Therefore, it is apparent that all societies, regardless of whether or not they had any religious beliefs, were universally consistent on abortion. Abortion was universally condemned as the taking of life or, simply put, murder.

As our society became more and more technologically advanced, religious beliefs began to wane. Science became the vehicle on which mankind began to rely. History has shown that the more a society becomes advanced the less it relies on religious and moral teachings. However, in the case of life, science has provided irrefutable evidence that life does begin at conception.

Science tells us that when the sperm and ovum unite, they become a complete genetic package programmed for development into a mature adult. Nothing will be added except time and nutrition. Each stage of development from fertilization to old age is merely a maturing of what is entirely there from the start. To put it in better perspective, the fertilized egg is like a computer chip. A genetic program to produce the person is already there.

Even pro-abortion journals admit that life does begin at conception. An editorial in the pro-abortion journal California Medicine of September, 1970, states, and I quote: "The reverence of each human life has been a keystone of western medicine, and is the ethic which has caused physicians to try to preserve, protect, repair, prolong, and enhance every human life.

Since the old ethic has not yet been fully displaced, it has been necessary to separate the idea of abortion from the idea of killing which continues to be socially abhorrent. The rest has been a curious avoidance of the scientific fact, which everyone really knows, the human life begins at conception, and it is continuous, whether intra- or extra-uterine, until death. The very considerable semantic gymnastics which are required to rationalize abortion as anything but taking a human life would be ludicrous if they were not often put forth under socially impeccable auspices." The pro-abortion journal pulls no punches. It recognizes that the concept that life begins at conception is the tenet in which the majority of the population still believes.

The overwhelming number of abortions are conducted for purely social and economic reasons. There is no thought given to the innocent life which is about to be destroyed. The rationale which the pro-abortionists use to justify this barbaric act is to describe abortion as socially acceptable and as a means for a woman to control her own body. By appealing to the feminist principle of a woman controlling her own body, the true reality of the abortion act is shielded. In fact, we are using the argument of the self to dictate supremacy over everything else. The self is the only thing that matters, an innocent life is only an appendage and the father is merely a participant in an act. It is only when we take time to examine the true facts that a truly rational decision can be reached.

When the law changed in 1969, health became the key word. The generally accepted definition of health by 1973 was that of the World Health Organization. Health is a state of complete physical, mental, and social well-being and not merely the absence of disease or infirmity.

In Canada, physicians gave health unlimited interpretation. Therefore, abortions can be performed for "health" reasons such as interruption of education or career, social embarrassment, sexual preference for a child, and so on. In fact, according to official statistics, 95 per cent of all abortions in the western world are performed on alleged psychiatric grounds. It would seem legitimate to ask how the psychiatrist arrived at the conclusion that having an unwanted child will result in complete psychiatric breakdown.

As a result of this, according to Statistics Canada there were 11,200 abortions in 1970, the first year of legalization. In 1985, the last year for which complete statistics are available, StatsCan reported that the number had risen to 60,956, an increase of over 260 per cent in 15 years. Even more startling is the fact that abortions outnumber live births in some Canadian cities, and there is an increasing number of women having multiple abortions. StatsCan reported that the repeat abortion rate in 1975, women who were having their second or subsequent abortion, was 8.6 per cent; 12.9 per cent in 1978; 18.9 per cent in 1983; and in 1985 it had reached 20.4 per cent.

It is apparent from these statistics that abortion is being used as a method of birth control. Abortion as a means of contraception is probably one of the most reprehensible acts that an individual can commit. In today's society there simply is no excuse for not being aware of the various methods of contraception available. Abortion cheapens the value of life. The ability to terminate a pregnancy with minimum discomfort gives individuals a lax attitude toward the sanctity of life. The greater ease with which abortion is conducted will serve to further desensitize the population into disregarding the value of human life. The more we do that, the more apt we are to inflict more injustices on our society.

Science has now given us the means by which we can tell if a baby is to be born defective, retarded, handicapped, and what sex it will be. Should these individuals be aborted? Do we have the right to play God? I want to read to you a newspaper report of an attempted abortion in 1981 as reported by the Philadelphia Enquirer:

> A woman's scream broke the late night quiet and brought two young obstetrical nurses rushing to Room 4456 of the University of Nebraska Medial Centre.
> The patient, admitted for an abortion, had been injected thirty hours earlier with a salt solution, which normally kills the fetus and causes the patient to deliver a mass of lifeless tissue, in a process similar to a miscarriage.
> This time, though, something had gone wrong. When nurse Marilyn Wilson flicked on the lights and pulled back the covers, she found, instead of a still-born fetus she'd expected, a live two and one-half pound baby boy, crying and moving his arms and legs there on the bed.
> Dismayed, the second nurse, Joanie Fuchs, gathered the squirming infant in loose bed covers, dashed down the corridor and called to the other nurses for help. She did not take the baby to an intensive care nursery, but deposited it instead on the stainless steel drainboard of a sink in the maternity unit's dirty utility room—a large closet where bedpans are emptied and dirty linens stored. Other nurses and a resident doctor gathered and gaped.
> Finally, a head nurse telephoned the patient's physician, Doctor C. J. Labenz, at home, apparently waking him. "He told me to leave it where it was" the head nurse testified later, "just to watch it for a few minutes, that it would probably die in a few minutes".

This type of incident occurs more than 400 times a year, according to the Centre for Disease Control, and those are just the documented cases.

It is ironic that a criminal proven guilty has more protection under the law than the unborn. Just stop and think about it. The guilty criminal has more protection than an unborn human being today. The unborn are innocent, yet their fate is determined with very little or no consideration at all. Compare the consideration given the unborn to that given a criminal in our justice system and it becomes apparent that something is very wrong with our morality.

Once life has begun it has the right to reach its natural end. By destroying life to ensure one's economic and social success, the human race is losing its honour and dignity. A human race now reaching for the stars must not be allowed to regress to the level where life has only a relative value. The whole existence of mankind has been toward the protection of human life. It represents an ultimate value. Therefore, protection cannot be limited and no distinction can be made between unborn and born life.

During World War II we abhorred the holocaust of the born, and today we must abhor the holocaust of the unborn. Life is sacred in all its stages, thus any attempt to define or legislate the beginning of human life as occurring at some point other than at conception would not be based on either biological or moral fact, but on arbitrarily chosen terms which merely describe stages of the embryological development of the human organism.

Therefore, it must be realized that the personhood of the human being is an intrinsic quality derived from the very fact of his or her existence as a human being. It is not derived from man-made law. Personhood, since it is always present while the human being has life, and is a concomitant of human life, cannot be awarded to, diminished, or withdrawn from any human being by Parliament or any judicial action. As a result, I cannot vote for the government motion and I therefore present an amendment to the motion which will recognize life as the only value which is supreme, and the innocent will be protected from the point of conception onwards. Therefore, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Welland (Mr. Pietz): that all the words in the motion after the words "should prohibit the performance of an abortion," be deleted and the following substituted therefor: "While allowing those medical treatments which are necessary to prevent the death of the mother or to remedy a condition that, if left untreated, would cause the death of the mother."

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member's amendment will be tabled as agreed.

[Translation]

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as a matter of fact and in this parliamentary debate, I am pro-life. In any case, how can anyone be against life? However, contrary to those who hold radical positions on both sides of the issue, I have a practical and realistic approach towards this social dilemma which the Members of this House are called upon to resolve.

Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the Government could not introduce a Bill at this point in time. Those who say otherwise have not, to my mind, thought about all the measures which will have to be taken into consideration when drawing up a Bill on abortion. And, in any case, is a possible social consensus on abortion? That is the main issue.

The 282 members of this House are asked to be the Canadian people's conscience. I would say to you, Mr. Speaker, that this is not fair, that it is sheer nonsense that a Member of Parliament he or she, in the course of his or her duties, should have to legislate on women's morality. Obviously, I quite appreciate the fact that there should be laws to protect life and that it is the duty of this House to enact rules aimed at guaranteeing the safety and freedom of this country's citizens. From time immemorial, the laws and regulations which govern us have been promulgated by men.

Women have had practically no say in the matter until today, Mr. Speaker. It seems to me that people are more concerned about the result than about the reasons for an unwanted pregnancy. Mr. Speaker, when one holds the reins of power, one must be reasonable. After all, to govern is to do what is possible.

I speak as the Member for Argenteuil—Papineau, but my comments on abortion come from the heart of a woman and the mind of a Member of Parliament. I want my constituents to know why I cannot support the demands of the pro-life movement which wants to make abortion illegal, nor those of the pro-choice movement which wants abortion on demand. I am in favour of a realistic approach that takes into account the daily lives of women and mothers, and that is why, Mr. Speaker, I am in favour of a solution that would go halfway, setting a legal limit of 18 weeks on abortion. Women must exercise their rights within limits that can be scientifically determined. Our technology today is, in any case, able to determine the exact number of weeks of a foetus.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, the pro-life position and its enforcement are a paradox. How could the Government enforce regulations arising from an anti-abortion law? If you ask members of pro-life who, I may add, and I want to make this quite clear, take a position that is entirely praiseworthy, if you ask them whether they want a pregnant woman to be thrown into jail, they will answer: Of course not. So we must be realistic. After all, the Government would look pretty silly if it tabled legislation that was unenforceable. These are all aspects which the anti-abortion groups have failed to consider. Abortion has always existed. If women can't get an abortion here, they will go across the border.

Mr. Speaker, abortions carried out by the woman herself or by some charlatan have had, and would have, a very serious impact on fertility. We have heard the horror stories about women who used the services of the worst kind of backroom butchers to obtain an abortion. To allow, within reasonable limits and based on the common sense of the woman involved, access to therapeutic abortions, preceded and followed by psychological care, would minimize the physical and mental side effects for women. Mr. Speaker, one or more abortions may be followed by wanted pregnancies. There are hundred of examples of women who at some time in their lives had an abortion and subsequently gave birth to one or more children. That is why abortions must be carried out under proper conditions. Making abortion illegal would mean going back to the dark ages. It would not reduce the number of abortions, and anyone who says so is sadly mistaken. With good psychological support, couples will learn to take a responsible attitude towards pregnancy.

Mr. Speaker, how does one make the father feel more responsibility for an unwanted pregnancy? Would those who want to make abortion illegal and in so doing, as I was just explaining, take drastic measures, even going so far as to create prisons for pregnant women, agree to punish the man who should have put on a condom before having sex?

The advocates of free choice, for their part, are too radical. Again, it is the duty of sex partners to protect themselves from unwanted pregnancies. I find the use of abortion as a means of contraception totally repugnant, especially since taxpayers must contribute to a woman's third, fourth, fifth, sixth abortion, and so on. The positions of the pro-choice movement are too broad and too vague for me to endorse them. One must still have enough common sense and intelligence to realize that there have been abuses and that they would continue if abortion were unlimited.

Mr. Speaker, I can understand the churches' position; it is deeply rooted and laudable. I can tell you this evening that I will not personally feel myself less Catholic tomorrow morning by voting for the Government to submit later a Bill limiting but not banning abortion, because my conscience as an elected representative of the people is not involved but rather the conscience of a woman who will make a decision with her doctor in a definite period of time. As legislators, how can we judge and condemn another person's moral feelings? How can we as legislators claim to improve the people's moral standards? It is impossible. Women have abortions for many reasons. A woman who decides to have an abortion is profoundly unhappy.

Have we in conscience really got to the bottom of these causes? As a society, have we thought of how to remedy the deep problems of women who, as you know, Mr. Speaker, have in the great majority of cases to care for their children after a divorce or separation? The statistics are overwhelming: three quarters of single-parent women—and most single-parent families are headed by women—live below the poverty line and the situation of childless women who have left their parents' or husband's home as a result of family breakdown is hardly any better. Instead of engaging in sterile, illogical debates on abortion, we should try to set policies to really encourage people to have children and to correct the shortcomings of our society. If we want to be honest with ourselves and admit it for once, the present policies do not encourage families to have several children. We build dwellings with only one bedroom. It costs less. For a woman with two, three or four children to use public transport today is quite a feat. Has this problem been thought of?

A number of individuals have made the point that falling birth rates and adoption problems were mainly due to abortion.

Nothing could be farther from the truth in my view! We are now living in 1988, and when a woman brings her pregnancy to term, she keeps her child. It is extremely rare that a woman, in spite of her solitude, her emotional, financial and other problems, chooses to give her child away for adoption. That was done in 1938, not 1988!

Decreasing birth rates are this century's burden. It is my hope that nobody in this House nor even outside will think that women are to blame. We are facing a scary increase in violence against women and children, from men albeit distressed and desperate no doubt, but still from men. Are we considering those abused children, those horror stories we read in the papers?

Would those who would legislate against abortion think for a minute, deep down in their conscience, of those serious problems experienced by women, a large proportion of Canadian women in the native, visible minority and other groups? Again, there are a number of factors involved in falling birth rates, and it is my deepest hope today that provinces will join the Canadian Government in asking for a Royal inquiry on all aspects of the future of families into the 21st Century and on measures that will have to be taken now to promote higher birth rates.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, it is my hope that this Government when preparing the legislation that of necessity will follow the vote on the motion now before us, will reflect the wisdom of Members in this House who reflect the views of their constituents. I have the deep conviction that a very strong consensus will emerge in favour of a middle ground.

Moreover, I urge government Ministers to consider right now, not tomorrow, as a preventive measure, a campaign of information and popular education, and I stress popular, Mr. Speaker, among young people and the general population, and that as a minimum, increased help and financial support will encourage mothers to complete their pregnancy.

Mr. Speaker, when we go back to our constituencies and meet young women who have to care for a young child on a welfare cheque that is hardly one sixteenth of the weekly pay of a Member of Parliament, Mr. Speaker, how can we claim that such a woman can decently live, while sharing the joy of life, bringing up a child under conditions that will necessarily lead to that child growing under conditions that are totally conducive to his or her personal growth?

Mr. Speaker, only then shall we solve for the major part that delicate question of abortion in the interests of Canadians.

• (1830)

Mr. Alain Tardif (Richmond—Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to take part in the consideration of the important issue now before the House.

Like my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier (Mr. Gauthier), Mr. Speaker, I would like first of all to object to the Government's past and present handling of this important matter.

Abortion is obviously a very currrent subject much discussed every day in every way, mostly in the media. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Bouchard) recently said that he did not want an election as long as the House had not settled this important matter, lest the next election become the ideal forum for both schools of thought on this major issue.

I think that statement brings out the significance of the problem. Despite the scope of the discussion and the depth of the issue under review, the Government merely put forward a kind of compromise motion which does not satisfy either side and represents, from what the Government's spokesman is saying, an attempt to take a sense of the House.

In the circumstances, I deplore that systematic refusal to settle or approach the issue head-on so that the Canadian people know once and for all where the Government stands.

As I emphasized before, this is a very important matter. I have been a Member of this House for over nine years and, Mr. Speaker, despite the big problems and major issues that surfaced in those nine years, no other question has given rise to so many responses, meetings, papers and letters in my constituency. I have certainly received several thousand very moving pleas from persons—women in most cases—who, for the first time in their lives, have gone to the trouble of writing to their Member of Parliament to state their preoccupations and their apprehensions concerning this very important issue.

In the course of all these exchanges and experiences it is obvious that I have had to express my views and attitudes on the matter. I do not think that it is possible for any Canadian man or woman to have no opinion on this issue, particularily in view of the fact that those on both sides of the issue have provided so much information and lobbied so powerfully. I therefore believe that in some way or another just about all Canadian men and women have committed themselves one way or the other.

It is an important choice in a person's life, a choice based, to some extent, on personal experience.

As a lawyer, I have had the opportunity over the years to get acquainted with the regulations and the legislation on abortion. As a politician, I have also seen alarming statistics on the subject; if I am not mistaken, nearly 100 000 abortions are performed every year in Canada. However, their number varies considerably from one region to another. The access and the criteria also varies considerably. The interpretation of the regulations was very liberal in some places and very conservative in others, and there were places where the matter was just not considered at all. These regulations had tragic repercussions in many ways since they created situations that were totally discriminatory. There were cases where the lady, the young woman who wanted an abortion could get one without any problem or restriction as opposed to other regions, other places where it was definitely impossible and unacceptable to get an abortion, very often even when it was justified.

That is a reality which we must, I think, take into consideration. It is a reality which must be taken into account in any debate like the one we are having in this House.

Here is another reality. I have three sons of whom I am very proud, three sons who have given me and obviously still give me the joys of fatherhood, of family life. I am obviously aware that my view in this matter is somewhat biased, given the fact that my experience of the family unit is not, admittedly, the general rule.

As a practicing lawyer, I have seen young couples who, not being able to have children and knowing that a woman was about to give birth, have asked me to take the necessary steps in order to get a private adoption. These couples were absolutely distressed, absolutely traumatized by their incapacity to have children and were hoping to adopt a child. In the light of these experiences, I have come to the conclusion that I am definitely pro-life, in the sense that I am systematically and staunchly opposed to what could be called abortion on request.

Yet, although I feel somewhat uncomfortable, I must be candid about it and recognize that no matter how much experience or knowledge I may have as a man, there is no way I could describe or define what a woman might go through at a time when beside being pregnant she must face harsh, cruel and painful realities, such as the possible loss of her job. I do not think that a man can understand what a woman goes through in such a situation.

There are circumstances where a woman, for economic reasons, cannot even consider, either directly or indirectly, the possibility of living a reasonably decent life with a child.

Such is also the situation of any young girl who suddenly realizing that she is pregnant is deeply traumatized by the thought that her parents might find out—and I could go on and on like this—Therefore I feel that under these quite particular circumstances, I am not qualified as a man to appreciate what women go through in such circumstances. However, I think that as legislators, we must deal with this issue, and that is why I said at the outset of my remarks that it is unfortunate that we should address this important issue through a simple motion which, really, does not solve anything.

I think that, as lawmakers, we had and still have the obligation to propose to the Canadian public a framework which is more complete and thorough, in order to develop eventually a society where a person faced with such an important decision will not be alone, but will be able to rely on sufficient resources readily available to overlook all the constraints which I listed before.

As a matter of fact, the situation in a great many respects is quite unacceptable, because there is hardly any place where a woman could seek the advice of resource people about the possibility of keeping her child. I feel that, quite the contrary, over the past few years, many women have been using abortion as a means of family planning.

These days it has become a rather simple exercise. I was even told that a young secondary school student could indeed enter the school at 1 p.m. and leave three hours later after having an abortion without her parents being told about it. I suggest that over the years there has been totally unwarranted and intolerable acceptance and that it is incumbent upon us as legislators and Government spokesmen, not to make the decision on behalf of women, for that is their personal choice, but to propose solutions, provide financial resources and do everything we can to defend and support the cause so that people will more readily think in terms of pro-life rather than follow what appears to have been the prevailing trend over the past few years and say not to worry, it is always possible to have an abortion.

Personally, I think it is important to say where I stand on this issue. I feel that in such particular and specific situations as when the health of the mother is at stake, when her health is involved, then we should have no hesitation and let the woman, the mother make up her own mind. In the resolution I refer to a consultation with the attending physician. I am not sure that is the ideal formula, for the very simple reason that there is a danger of reverting to the situation that prevailed some time ago, namely that some have more conscience than others, disparities will exist depending on which province or area you live in, so much so that eventually, for lack of a very specific framework, there will be situations where unfortunately there will be basic disparities or discrimination, under which the well-off can find services that may not necessarily be available in their own areas. I think that specific aspect is of vital importance when discussing this major issue. All Canadian women without exception, in all areas, in all provinces without any exception, should be able to rely on a framework within which they are equal, regardless of their place of origin of their place of residence.

The other aspect, and I think this was the subject of a number of speeches, the fact of becoming pregnant by reason of a criminal act, Mr. Speaker, again is a situation where the mother should have the unequivocal right to decide whether she should continue or stop the child's development.

Mr. Speaker, there is also an important question that eventually will have to be solved in my view, that is the time element. Some have proposed 10 weeks, 15 or 20 weeks. I think science is sufficiently advanced to come up, if a date must be set, with a number of weeks, the smallest possible number of weeks so as to lessen the major controversy regarding the beginning of life. I know that in some countries the reference is to 10 weeks, in others 20 weeks. I am told that in the countries where it is 20 weeks, they want to shorten that period and where it is 10 weeks, they want to extend it. But then again, if the Government had really wanted to assume its responsibilities and face this important issue, as the people expected and demanded, it could have put forward a bill including all these elements so that we could have found a common ground which, while not pleasing everybody, would have assured Canadian women of fair and equitable treatment, taking into account of course the North American reality. On the other hand, if we moved towards very strict and restrictive legislation and regulations, a large number of Canadian women would circumvent them by going to places that are a lot more permissive.

During this important debate, I had the opportunity to meet and discuss with a number of representatives, particularly from the Pro-Life movement, with whom I talked a lot. I totally agree with some of their arguments.

My colleague just gave me a document which says in paragraph 4: "The only solution to abortion is adoption. Thousands of couples are waiting to get permission to adopt children." We have heard of all the procedures, problems and long delays such couples must go through before finally being authorized to adopt children. It has been admitted that it could be a very good approach, but it must also be understood that a couple's problem cannot be solved at the expense of the mother. I think a massive effort must be made to encourage more women to complete their pregnancies, to give those couples who want a child, or hope for one as many chances as possible of adopting one. We could not say that men and women who wish to adopt a child will see their problem solved because abortion would be banned from now on. I do not see it as an acceptable way of solving this issue, all the more so since I believe what is required is an effort, and that is where things get very difficult, for greater awareness and enhancing, efforts on ressources, on available services, to be able to correct a course that seems to have started, unfortunately, in the last few years.

I conclude and summarize, Mr. Speaker, by declaring myself as pro-life. My pro-life position is non-exclusive as that demonstrated by some of my colleagues, but pro-life in the hope that regulations will eventually de-criminalize that aspect, that there will be generous consideration of the very specific cases I described earlier, particularly when the health of the mother is at risk, when the pregnancy is the result of a criminal act, cases which, in my opinion, it would be entirely acceptable and reasonable to consider in the regulations the country will adopt eventually.

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I am particularly pleased to be given an opportunity to speak in this debate which is the most important debate, as far as subject matter is concerned, to come before this Parliament. I say that because we are dealing with a life or death situation with respect to abortion. Before getting into the body of my remarks, however, I would like to state my position. We have a motion before us which I cannot support for what I feel are three very important reasons.

First, I cannot support this motion because it does not clearly declare that the unborn is a human being. Second, I cannot support the motion because it does not invoke Section 33 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms to ensure that any future legislation will be effective in the wake of the Supreme Court of Canada judgment to which some of our Members have already referred. Third, I cannot support this motion because it does not place the burden of proof on those who would snuff out the lives of the unborn by abortion. In my opinion, it is that group which should be required to show that such lives should be ended.

Having said that, let me say that I have already filed with the Clerk of the House an amendment that I hope will be considered. Immediately after the preamble of the motion, I propose that notwithstanding Section 7 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, such legislation giving pre-eminence to the protection of all life, and recognizing that the foetus is a human being, should prohibit the performance of an abortion except when first, two independent qualified medical practitioners in good faith and on reasonable grounds state that in their opinion the continuation of the pregnancy would, or would likely, endanger the life of the pregnant woman. Second, the termination of such pregnancy is performed by a qualified medical practitioner and, third, the pregnancy is the result of rape or incest where, in the opinion of two qualified medical practitioners, the continuation of the pregnancy would, or would be likely to endanger the woman's life or seriously endanger her health and the termination of such pregnancy is performed by a qualified medical practitioner.

I have already filed that suggested amendment with the Chair. Let me remind the House and Hon. Members what this process is all about. The Government has asked us to consider the motion which I have indicated I cannot support, but it fully anticipates that amendments will be made and considered and that in due course the House will pass on, presumably, its amended motion and that will show the Government the sense or mood of the House concerning the question of abortion. I feel that when a free vote is the order of the day, that is a very reasonable approach for the Government to have taken. I am surprised that those spokespeople from the Official Opposition and the New Democratic Party are critical of the process. It is rather dismaying that the very act of democracy, the very act of asking Members to voice their opinion before legislation is drafted, should so startle the two opposition groups in this House. I hope that the attitude taken by those two opposition Parties will not become, if you like, a common attitude in the House. In short, this debate, prior to the Government, through its Cabinet, drawing up legislation to deal with abortion, is a vital ingredient of what the country would like to see prior to new legislation being introduced.

That leads to the question, as some Members have already indicated, why we need any legislation. In my opinion, the Supreme Court of Canada decision has left this nation in a totally unacceptable position. That decision means today that we have no law, certainly of a criminal nature, touching on the question of abortion. We literally are in a position of having a woman pregnant in the seventh, eighth or even ninth month and, from a criminal standpoint be aborted by the abortionist with no criminal implication.

Let us just step back and think of where we are. I have just said that a child could be in its ninth month and be aborted and there would be no criminal sanction on the abortionist or any party involved. Let the child be born and, of course, the whole weight of our law would come down on the person who would dare kill that child, and rightfully so. Surely the people of Canada do not expect this House to leave that situation unattended.

Let me go further. This afternoon I had an opportunity to listen to the official spokesperson from the Official Opposition and then to the official spokesperson from the New Democratic Party. With respect to the Hon. Member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan), I was very disappointed to hear how vague his remarks were. He even went to the point of saying that the Charter of Rights must be upheld over any question of abortion. That was never my understanding of the Charter. I thought that the Charter was to guarantee liberties, freedoms, and certainly to guarantee the sanctity of life itself. To have the official spokesman from the Opposition say that somehow or other the Charter is supreme and that even the question of abortion should never be allowed to alter the provisions of the Charter is inherently wrong.

As far as members of the New Democratic Party are concerned, they have made it very clear that they are virtually unanimous in supporting abortion on demand. On hearing the official spokesperson today for that Party, I thought that there was a coldness, an unbelievable coldness in the remarks concerning the subject we are debating here today.

Let me put my remarks into some type of perspective. It is easy, and Members have already made this reference, to say that there are approximately 60,000 abortions performed each year. The figure trips off our tongues very easily. But let us think of what that really means. Since 1970, for example, if we add up the aggregate abortions to this year, we see that this year is a very bad year. This is the year in which we passed the one million mark in total abortions in the country since 1970—one million future Canadians snuffed out by the system that we have allowed to develop and have tolerated in Canada.

Again let me put that into perspective. What exactly does one million Canadians mean? It is the entire population of Saskatchewan. It is the entire population of Manitoba. It is more than the entire population of Nova Scotia. We are talking about one million Canadians being wiped out, taken out of our future.

If we want to relate that figure to cities, it is approximately one-half the size of Metropolitan Toronto. It is more than the size of Ottawa-Hull combined. I hope that Hon. Members will try to seize upon the magnitude of what we are talking about. To say simply that 60,000 people in the form of abortions are wiped out is one thing. But let us put that into real terms. Let us put it into a real perspective.

The NDP, and in this I often agree, often speak about the horrors of war, the tragedies, the killing and how we must do all we can to ensure that wars will not break out in the future. Again, let us put this evening's debate into perspective. When we say that 60,518 abortions occurred in 1985, let us relate that to the last war, the Second World War. In that entire five-year period the total fatalities suffered by Canadians was 51,992. In short, in the one year, 1985—and I suggest the figures hold for 1988—we wiped out more than the total fatalities suffered by Canada in World War II. In fact, if we want to add up all the fatalities that suffered by Canadians in wars since the time of Confederation we would see that it is less than 120,000. In short, as a result of abortion in two years alone we killed more future Canadians than have been killed in all the wars in which we have ever engaged as far as troop fatalities are concerned.

I say these things because I feel that sometimes we become clouded. We see it is as some type of an academic idea. What could be more real than the fact that deaths are occurring and the fact that the Parliament of Canada is being asked to somehow condone or even to facilitate these deaths?

When one says that there were over 60,000 abortions performed in 1985, one might ask what the comparison of that figure is with the leading cause of death for the same year. The leading cause of death was heart attack. We find that 58,000 Canadians died of heart attacks in 1985. Through our abortion approach we kill more future Canadians than were wiped out by the number one killer in 1985, heart attacks. The interesting thing to note is that about three-quarters of those heart attacks that occurred in later years occurred in persons over 65 years of age. If we wish to look at the 45-year or older level, we see that the bulk of deaths were as a result of heart attacks. Think of the tragedy. Those people are dying, regrettably in their more senior years, while we are allowing 60,000 other future Canadians to be killed before they even have the opportunity to be born. That is what we are talking about in this debate.

In fact, one could put it this way. As far as an infant is concerned, from its point of conception until its ultimate death the most tricky period that it will go through is in trying to avoid the hands of the abortionist. At the present time there is one chance in six that that infant will be wiped out before it leaves the womb of its mother. That is what we are dealing with in this debate. That is what was being permitted prior to the Supreme Court of Canada's decision. One in six pregnancies ends in abortion.

Let me put that another way. If from the point of conception through to death is the most difficult period, what happens if a child is lucky enough to be born? He's away to the races. If he is a male his life expectancy is 73 years of age. If she is a female her life expectancy is 80 years of age. I ask Hon. Members to think of how critical this debate is. What we are really talking about is will we preserve a system wherein up to the point of birth a person can be killed but upon birth their life expectancy is from 73 years of age to 80 years of age. If anything happens to them, if there is a murder or other type of mortality, the person responsible will pay with a very severe criminal sentence. That is what we are talking about. I would hope that, when we weigh the pros and cons on this question, we come down on the side of the unborn.

In giving my reasons why I cannot support the motion before us, I have said that I do so partly because I feel the onus should be on those who want to perpetuate the abortion system to put the case through Parliament to the Government that we stand for the unborn and we want the unborn protected. I say that because when Cabinet considers whatever draft legislation may be forthcoming there will not be any unborn able to speak at that Cabinet session. It is up to this House to make it loud and clear that we feel there must be a presumption in favour of the unborn. To do that, let me come to a second reason.

I said that I disagreed with the motion because it did not use the Section 33 notwithstanding clause of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Any meaningful abortion legislation that may be decided upon by the Government must include that notwithstanding clause to be meaningful in the context of the Supreme Court of Canada's decision. I see nothing wrong with suggesting that that clause should be utilized first. Why was it put in if it was never to be utilized? If it was put in to deliberately ensure that there is that escape valve, when would one want to use it when it is a question of life or death? In commenting at that time concerning the notwithstanding clause in the Charter of Rights, Mr. Alan Borovoy, legal counsel to the Canadian Civil Liberties Association, is reported in the Canadian Press to have stated:

> Canada at the moment is a parliamentary democracy in which the will of Parliament is supreme. If there were no notwithstandings in the proposed Constitution, this supremacy would shift to the judges who would decide whether or not a law offended the Constitution.
> By making it legally possible but politically difficult to override the Charter, they have married the two notions . . . The result is a strong Charter with an escape valve for the legislatures.

That is counsel to the Canadian Civil Liberties Association's comment on the justification of the notwithstanding clause. I am suggesting that it is now time for we politicians to take the difficult course of saying that this is an instance when that notwithstanding clause must be invoked to ensure that the lives of future children are not snuffed out even before they are born.

Let me touch on another question. What is the mood in the country? I can tell you that I would not be making the remarks that I am tonight without consulting. I feel in my capacity as representative for York—Peel I must particularly consult with my constituents. In a poll of those responding with an opinion, 69 per cent say that they believe there should be restrictions on abortion. Eighty-one per cent say that those restrictions should apply if the life of the mother is endangered physically by the continuation of the pregnancy. This is one reason why I have included in my suggested draft that that be a ground for abortion.

I would also like to point out in dealing with the question of the Charter of Rights that 53 per cent of those responding to the question stated that they felt the Charter of Rights must protect the unborn, and I read that that they believe the notwithstanding clause that I am suggesting be used in this motion should indeed be used. It has already been commented on. Certain religious groups have made comments concerning this matter. I have received, as many Members have, undoubtedly, representations from religious groups. Some are pro-choice and some are pro-life. One of the most meaningful representations I received was from the Salvation Army. In a letter from Commissioner Will Pratt he stated:

> The century-old experience of The Salvation Army through its Women's Social Services has been that abortion is not the panacea imagined by a woman regretting a pregnancy.
> Usually the long-term effects on the mind and spirit of a woman who does abort are harmful. It is not unusual for a girl deliberately to become pregnant again after abortion through experiencing guilt at having "murdered my baby". Carrying the fetus to term is almost always in the best interests of the mother, her family, and society as a whole. However, where rape or incest occurred, the mental health of the mother could be a determining factor, and we believe such exceptions are covered by the clause—

—to which they have referred. That is why I included that provision, Mr. Speaker.

Finally, perhaps the most disturbing aspects of what we are discussing are not only that the total number of abortions in this country has risen from 11,000 in 1970 to a current 60,000 per year, but we find the startling fact that persons having an abortion after one abortion has now doubled. The ratio of those who are having two abortions has doubled since 1975; and most alarmingly those who are having two, three, four, and five abortions has gone up fourfold since 1975. Surely when we are experiencing that type of situation it is time that we send, through this motion, a clear message to our Government that we want a pro-life, a sympathetic piece of legislation for the unborn. That is what the House has in my suggested amendment.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, it is a sad day when we have to resort to debate on an issue as sensitive as abortion, but I fear not having any legislation in place at all. The situation is reaching a crisis level, especially in British Columbia, but still there are those who shout for greater access and say that they have to go across the border to have an abortion.

It is a real tragedy when a woman finds herself with an unwanted pregnancy, whether or not she is married. Where can she turn for guidance, for help, and for the right direction? Are there agencies in place that will help her and tell her the options? It is this that must be addressed as we go into this debate.

In my opinion the motion before us, alone and by itself, is not satisfactory, and I will speak further on it in my address on the amendment that I believe should be put in place to correct the approach of the motion.

The statistics tell the story. Since 1969 the number of abortions authorized under Section 18 of the Criminal Code increased yearly with the exceptions of 1981, 1983, 1985. The abortion rate per 100 live births remained steady at 16.5 deaths in 1985 and 1984, and then dropped to 16.2 in 1985. For the Province of British Columbia, the rate was the highest in Canada. There were 26.1 abortions per live births or a figure of 11,264. For every 100 live births there were 26 abortions in British Columbia. In 1985 from Statistics Canada figures we see that 89 per cent of abortions that were performed were performed before 13 weeks of pregnancy. In 1985 that represented 54,226 abortions of a total of 60,900 for that year. A further 4,685 abortions were performed between the thirteenth and sixteenth week gestation, while 1,831 abortions were performed between the seventeenth and twentieth weeks. Therefore, one can see that the main motion will have little or no effect on these statistics.

I am sorry to say that repeat abortions have risen dramatically over the last 10 years on the national level. In 1975, 8.6 per cent of all the women who had abortions were repeats. In 1985, the figure was 20.3 per cent of all the abortions. In fact, more women were repeaters in 1985 than the total of all the officially recorded abortions in 1970. In British Columbia, 25 per cent of all the abortions performed are repeats. In case you are not sure of what that means, it means that this is the woman's second abortion, or at least the second, and could be the third or fourth.

The word "therapeutic" has been tossed around quite a bit during all of the previous discussion on abortion, and I thought it would be worth while to find its meaning in the dictionary. According to the Concise Oxford Dictionary, it is defined as "the branch of medicine concerned with the treatment of disease and the action of remedial agents in disease or health". With this in mind, pregnancy is not a disease and abortion is not therapeutic. It heals no disease but rather kills a human being.

You may ask, why do I support the protection of the unborn? I believe that if you accept the sanctity of life, it is impossible to avoid the fact that, no matter how a child is conceived or what kind of life he or she will have, that life should be protected.

Is the unborn child a human being with equal rights? I think so and if that is the case, laws should always seek to protect that life. We should be more concerned with the saving of the unborn child's life than with making it easier, safer and cheaper for those who seek to end it.

Those who believe that the woman has the right to do whatever she wants with her own body must also say to themselves that if she has control in this aspect, should she not also have the control of what is required to prevent the pregnancy in the first place, whether that be making sure that she has the proper birth control or whatever? Our society does not allow individuals complete control over their own bodies. Laws prohibit taking drugs, drinking alcohol before a certain age, and prostitution, just to mention some of the things that our laws prevent us from endeavouring to do.

We all value our rights to free choice, our vocation, our religion, our goals in life. Genuine freedom, however, does not give us the right to trample the human rights of others.

You may ask me, are you not trying to impose your morals on others? I really do not think so. It is important to recognize that every basic law which governs our lives is an expression of morality. The point is that many of our laws are based on morality and much of that morality is based on Judaeo-Christian ethics. Those who seek to change abortion laws are legislating morality, but so were those who sought to legalize abortion back in the sixties.

What if the mother's life is endangered by pregnancy? You cannot blame the mother for choosing her life over the child's. This is an act of self-defence, not murder. This goes back to when I talked about therapeutic. I see no inconsistency with saying that the life of the mother must have a pre-emptive role over the life of the unborn but, only in serious, life-threatening situations. These do not happen very often.

The unborn child is not like an arm, a leg or an appendix. Though they are dependent on their mothers, unborn children are complete, separate entities.

Let me give some examples: The baby can be male and the mother is female. The mother and the baby can have two different blood types and these can even be incompatible. The mother can be fair and the baby dark-complexioned. The umbilical cord and placenta belong to the baby. They are not part of the mother's body.

Why do some people believe that the unborn child does not become a human being until it is delivered? Do they not recognize that even at his earliest development this child is just at one special stage in a whole series of steps that will eventually lead to old age? The difference lies in the process of maturing and aging—in developing. We must see the unborn child as a human being.

Should every child not be a wanted child, you may ask. This makes the incorrect assumption that unless a child is wanted by the parent, they are not wanted, period. Simply to be unwanted becomes then a capital offence. The child itself, though, must always retain his or her right to continue living. A child is not a piece of property. There are so many couples trying to adopt children that many agencies cannot take any more names. Yet, 60,000 babies are aborted each year. It is a crying shame.

You may ask the question, do not unwanted pregnancies become abused children? Abortion has not solved the problem of battered children. In fact, since abortion has become commonplace, child abuse has increased by at least 500 per cent. These facts show that in more cases it is the so-called wanted children that are abused.

I mentioned at the beginning of my speech that guidance must be given to the woman who finds herself in the situation of being pregnant and not really wanting her baby. I believe that the medical profession has a role to play in this, one that should be giving all clients the relevant information regarding abortion, including such things as the true nature of the procedure, the nature and development of the life to be terminated, the risks to the client both during and after the abortion.

Many women, when they understand what abortion really is, the risks associated with it and the actual nature and development of the life, would look for alternatives. Are we giving them this information? Such disclosures by the medical society would lead to greater education, encouraged scientific knowledge on the abortion question, and place the onus directly on the people involved. Those who practice abortion must be held responsible for its consequences. Even the United Nations has a declaration of the rights of the child. This reads that "the child, by reason of his physical and mental immaturity, needs special safeguards and care, including appropriate legal protection, before as well as after, birth".

There is an alarming and disturbing amount of evidence, and it is growing, that the post-abortion experience may be even more traumatic than the pre-abortion period of decision-making. We must not forget that every baby who dies in an abortion has a whole family whose lives are connected with that baby: the grandparents, the aunts, uncles, cousins, sisters, brothers. Society is also closely linked with that baby. For instance, within the last year the B.C. Ministry of Social Services conducted the province's first-ever apprehension of a foetus. The seizure occurred after a woman, 36 weeks pregnant, told doctors at the Vancouver Grace Hospital that she did not intend to consent to medical treatment for her child after it was born.

The doctors used the word "child" when referring to the foetus and the social worker conferred with a supervisor and a superintendent, and all three of them agreed that the child should be apprehended.

This shows us that society is definitely involved in one single case, and this is not an isolated case. In Ontario, a judge ordered a 38 week old foetus to be made a ward of the Belleville Children's Aid Society after its mother, who planned to give birth in an underground parking lot, refused medical treatment. I think these are landmark cases.

I commend the churches and those organizations which have sought to help by giving direction for what they deemed to be right. I would like to acknowledge the material that was sent to each Member of Parliament by the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops, the Salvation Army, the Evangelical Fellowship of Canada, the Pentecostal Assemblies of Canada, the Coalition for Family Values, and the Council of Christian Reformed Churches in Canada. These organizations have endeavoured to help give us direction as to how we might proceed on this very, very important question.

Many people today have opted for a self-serving role in society because their vision of life is limited and based on selfish value systems. Today, we, as leaders, are struggling to give leadership to a society which seeks to do what is right in its eyes.

What do we do? I have already said that there is a need for agencies and places that will help in a time of crisis. When an unwanted pregnancy occurs, the Government has to help these agencies in these circumstances. Many churches are now coming to the assistance of people who find themselves with an unwanted pregnancy. One organization which I have already mentioned, the Salvation Army, has been at the forefront of this practice for many, many years. They must be commended and they need to be copied on what they have done.

How do we deal with this? How do we try to find the balance between making sure that the rights of the mother and the rights of the unborn are kept in proper perspective when we try to put forward legislation?

I would like to support at this time the amendment tabled by the Hon. Member for Kitchener (Mr. Reimer), which I feel will go a long way to reach that balance, and the personage of the woman and the personage of the unborn will be clearly recognized. I thank you for this opportunity of putting my thoughts on the record and to let the people of Fraser Valley East know where their Member stands on this very important issue, and to thank the 2,500 people of Fraser Valley East who have written to me and substantially backed me on the statement that I have made tonight.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all of us will agree that abortion is a very emotional, ethical, and moral issue. The differing views in this House reflect the Canadian pluralistic society, although not in proportion to the general public. I only wish this debate could have included many more young men, and women of child-bearing age, because they are the people directly affected and they are not represented adequately in this debate.

While I think we must respect each other's differing views, I cannot condone anyone forcing their views on another person. This is why I believe in choice. For women, a decision regarding termination of an unwanted pregnancy is a very difficult moral issue as well as a personal health matter. I know of no one, man or woman, who favours abortion. So why are some women and young girls forced to consider abortion? Usually it is because contraception has been ineffective or because no method of birth control was used by either the man or woman. In some cases, the high incidence of teenage pregnancies, and we know of increasing numbers of 13 and 14 year old girls who have become pregnant, may be because they are ignorant about sex and birth control. Very often they are afraid to tell their parents that they are pregnant. Some do not even know until several months later. Often, I am sure, if they think it through, they would be aware that they cannot care for a child. Perhaps their parents will decide and advise them their lives could be ruined, so they agree to an abortion.

Many women who seek abortions are single, with no partner to share the responsibility, financially or as a parent. The sex partner often takes no responsibility for contraception. Men usually think this is a woman's responsibility, or perhaps they do not even care. More often than not, the man takes off, leaving the woman alone to either consider the painful decision of seeking an abortion or to care for their child with no support from the father. There are many women in this situation and I do not think we can stand in judgment on them when they choose an abortion.

Still other women may be married with many financial, health and family reasons for not wanting another child. This is true of men also. One woman that I know very well had four children, including twins. The children were very young. At the same time she had an alcoholic husband. She told me how desperate she was 20 years ago when she found out she was pregnant again. Even 20 years later she was really upset talking about it. She was so desperate that she decided to go through the agony of using a back street abortionist, there being no legal abortions at that time. It was either that or suicide, she said. So at great risk to herself she chose the abortionist, and she had many complications as a result.

Over the years this woman and many of her sisters in the women's movement have worked very hard to be sure that their daughters will not have to face this kind of tragedy in similar circumstances. They have worked together to ensure that legal medical abortions are accessible and based on the decision of the woman in consultation with her doctor.

The public has become much more liberal in its attitude toward choice. In a 1988 Gallup poll, 69 per cent of Canadians agreed that "the decision whether to have an abortion should rest with the woman in consultation with her physician". The Canadian Medical Association, a fairly conservative group, has also taken this position. So has the United Church of Canada.

The Supreme Court decision in the Morgentaler case judged previous legislation under the Criminal Code to be unconstitutional since therapeutic abortion committees delayed procedures, denied access, and threatened the security of the person. The majority of judges acknowledged the right of a woman and her doctor to choice in the earlier stages of pregnancy. In the later stages, they acknowledged the importance of also protecting the foetus.

I think most women, and men also, who support choice would not disagree with those principles, but many object very strenuously to recriminalizing abortion under the Criminal Code. Imposing criminal sanctions against women and physicians is no solution. Statistics show that most abortions are performed in the first trimester, long before a foetus is viable. I would like to give several facts which I received from the Canadian Abortion Rights Action League to clarify certain misinformation which has been circulated.

First, women do not approach abortion as a means of birth control. As Doctor Marian Powell's 1987 study showed, the majority of girls and women seeking abortion become pregnant while using contraception. Despite public perception, contraceptives are not 100 per cent effective, nor are they easily available, especially for the poor, the young, or people in isolated or rural areas.

Second, women do not have abortions for convenience or for frivolous reasons. On the contrary, women choose abortion because they take the responsibilities of motherhood seriously. Women realize how important the timing and number of children can be to the well-being of their families.

Third, women who want to have abortions want to have them as early in the pregnancy as possible, as do the doctors who perform them. Some 89 per cent of all abortions in Canada are performed by the twelfth week of pregnancy, and 99.6 per cent are performed by the twentieth week. Reduction in the legal impediments to access results in fewer delays and earlier abortions.

Prevention of unwanted pregnancies and earlier access to medical abortions are needed rather than criminal sanctions. It is interesting that countries with tough criminal prohibition have not reduced the number of abortions. In Brazil, where abortions are prohibited, over one million illegal abortions were performed in one year and many deaths resulted. Criminal prohibitions did not prevent or reduce abortions.

It is also interesting that the incidence of abortions in Quebec decreased during the period when the Criminal Code was ignored and abortions were available through community clinics. There is no evidence during the past six months, when we have not had any law, that abortions have increased. Therefore, why do we need Criminal Code legislation? We all want to reduce the need for abortion, but tough criminal sanctions will not do it.

One of the saddest aspects of the abortion debate, particularly on the part of those who are anti-choice, is the fact that no attention is given to prevention. The federal Government and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) have consistently refused to support positive sexuality programs and family planning. We support it for Third World countries through the UN but we do not support it in our own country.

The Conservative Government and the previous Liberal Government both cut back on funding to Planned Parenthood, which works hard at prevention and has proposed particular programs targeted at reducing unwanted pregnancies in young teenagers. It has published information in the national media. You may have seen a big ad entitled "Five Ways to Prevent Abortion and One Way That Won't". They recognized that all Canadians want to see the need for abortion reduced. This can be achieved by reducing the number of unintended pregnancies. Making abortions illegal will not work. It never has. Whenever governments have made abortions illegal, it has not stopped them.

Planned Parenthood had a recent campaign which advocated the following five ways to prevent abortion. First, ensure that all Canadians have access to contraception and family planning services. Second, ensure that all young Canadians have access to sexual health education. Third, increase the involvement of men in preventing unintended pregnancies. Fourth, increase government support of research into new and safer methods of contraception and, fifth, make Canada friendlier to children. Planned Parenthood studies support the premise that young people with high levels of self-esteem are the least likely to compromise their futures by taking the risk of unintended pregnancies. Thousands of Canadians across Canada have signed petitions in response to these proposals which I think make eminent good sense.

The one way that will not work in reducing abortions is to outlaw abortion and to have tough criminal sanctions. This will not prevent unwanted pregnancies or reduce the number of abortions. It will make women and doctors criminals and force back street abortions in some cases. It ignores the dignity and the right of women to make their own decisions for themselves and their families. It ignores the reality of statistics which show that women want early abortions and doctors do not perform late abortions except in extremely exceptional circumstances. It also ignores the fact that despite tough criminal sanctions in some countries, desperate women will still seek abortions, largely because of economic and social situations that are intolerable and are injurious to health and well-being.

Some have said that the debate on abortion is obsolete in view of the changing reproductive technologies including in vitro fertilization, surrogate parenthood, the use of foetal tissue and gender selection techniques, all very serious moral and ethical issues that society must consider and perhaps regulate. Our Party has recommended support for a Royal commission on reproductive technologies composed of at least 50 per cent women to look into this matter and to make recommendations. Scientists and physicians are also asking for directions on these matters.

The NDP supports a policy of choice which allows women to make a personal health decision in consultation with their doctors. We respect our colleagues and members of our caucus and Party who hold different views on this issue. They have the right to express their opinions. Choice does not mean that one favours abortion. I hope no one favours abortion. Choice means that a pregnant woman must have access to a whole range of options. She must have the finances and the emotional support to raise a child. The Government has an obligation to provide adequate income assistance and community support.

Second, men must take much greater responsibility for preventing pregnancies, for planning families and for sharing parenting. Third, there must be parental leave, access to adequate, affordable quality child care. We must eliminate child poverty and give more support to single parents, including affordable housing.

Fourth, adoption is another option which must be available to people. Fifth, in addition to all these options, a woman who is pregnant with an unwanted pregnancy must have ready access to a safe medical abortion with adequate pre- and post-abortion counselling if this is her decision. Free abortions must be available in all provinces and territories in Canada and must be covered by the insurance programs of the Canada Health Act. Public clinics should be encouraged.

In closing, I would like to say that I must oppose this motion. As my colleague said earlier, we object to it for procedural reasons and for technical reasons. We think it is poorly phrased and not adequate. I oppose it particularly because it calls for the recriminalization of a matter which I believe should be a medical question involving a personal decision between a woman and her doctor.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we are here debating an issue of national importance such as few debates include. In fact, it is an inter-generational debate. We are discussing values and attitudes that we will share with our children and our grandchildren and that we will pass on from generation to generation. We are in fact examining what kind of people we are, what kind of a society we are and what shape we want our society to be in years to come. It is probably one of the most futuristic debates we could hold in this House. It is of incredible importance.

I might add in response to the Hon. Member for Vancouver East (Ms. Mitchell) that we are not here to sit in judgment over those who are facing unwanted or unplanned pregnancies.

Surely we have grown to the point where we do not do that any longer. We are here to embrace those who are faced with frustrations, but we cannot run away and we cannot present illusions to today's people or to future generations. We must face this squarely, be realistic, look at the repercussions and at the inheritance we want to pass on to future generations.

We do so, Sir, with some urging from the Supreme Court itself. Chief Justice Dickson has said:

> Similarly, Parliament must be given room to design an appropriate administrative and procedural structure for bringing into operation a particular defence to criminal liability.

On page 35 of his judgment, he said:

> Simply put, assuming Parliament can act, it must do so properly.

On page 37, he said:

> I have no difficulty in concluding that the objective of s. 251 as a whole, namely, to balance the competing interests identified by Parliament, is sufficiently important to meet the requirements of the first step in the 'Oakes' inquiry under s.1.

On page 38, he said:

> Like Beetz and Wilson JJ., I agree that protection of foetal interests by Parliament is also a valid governmental objective. It follows that balancing these interests, with the lives and health of women a major factor, is clearly an important governmental objective.

Then he went one step further. On page 39, he said:

> State protection of foetal interests may well be deserving of constitutional recognition under s. 1.

There he refers to Section 1 of the Charter. Certainly we have the urging of the Supreme Court on our side. The Supreme Court is urging us to debate this thoroughly and to pass on to future generations the values that we think are important for the preservation of our way of life.

When we debate this issue, we are in fact debating the role of law. It is the law which is our guidance mechanism today. Society has lost many of the institutions of support that historically have given us the moral and ethical standards by which we could guide our lives. We have lost those moorings. By and large, society has now rejected regular church participation. Schools are preaching irrelevance, moral relevance and situational ethics. There is no anchor. There are no absolutes which can guide us any longer.

For many people, the only thing we have left to give us guidance is the law. Justice Dickson said on page 32 of his judgment:

> The criminal law is a very special form of governmental regulation, for it seeks to express our society's collective disapprobation of certain acts and omissions.

For those who have no moorings, no ethical guidance mechanisms, no moral guidance mechanisms left, the only thing left is the law. Therefore, as we debate the law as we would like to see it today, we have to be especially careful about how we deliberate, about what we choose as our values and about what we think is important. For most people the law is the last guidepost of morality. It is the plumb line that tells them what is right and wrong. While the law is designed to put before us the limits of behaviour that we find acceptable, for many people it is also the maximum, it is both minimum and maximum. Since we have diminished the use of the institutions we have to be careful of the law.

While the law describes limits it does not describe "oughtness". It may describe how we can behave, how we are allowed to behave, but it never describes how we ought to behave. That sense of "oughtness" has melted away. For that reason we have to be very careful of how we define our law today.

The law itself has become for us the expression of our values, the protection of what we treasure, an expression of what we ought to be as well as the prohibitions of what we would design for our society in order to protect what we treasure.

That is why I support what is popularly called Option A, the amendment put forward by the Member for Kitchener (Mr. Reimer). That amendment allows us to circumscribe behaviour in a way which is reasonable. It protects what we cherish, namely, life. It provides access to abortion for those who really need abortion, and it makes a statement about life that is important to us. I commend to Members the speech made by the Member for Kitchener in which he described what we value in our society.

There is no doubt that this measure will be challenged in court. Whatever law is passed by this Parliament is going to be challenged. Whatever group is on the other side of the legislation will be certain to challenge it. However, I am convinced that the measures which this amendment provides for can withstand a court challenge. It is defensible before the Supreme Court. It is not enough for me to say that I believe that, because we are all entitled to opinions. We must be able to establish why we believe that and do so on a basis of argument and fact.

Because I am not a lawyer and do not have the advantage of a constitutional background, I took the trouble to engage a constitutional expert who has the respect of the entire legal community of Canada, has argued before the Supreme Court on a number of occasions, and is highly regarded there. I engaged the services of Mr. Goldie of the firm of Russell & DuMoulin. I would like to read to Members the statements he has made regarding such a motion as this. He said:

> Parliament has a legitimate constitutional interest in the protection of the foetus.

That is his conclusion based on his study of the Supreme Court decision. He goes on to say:

> In recognition of this interest, Parliament could restrict abortions to situations where the life or health (including psychological help) of the pregnant woman was threatened.
> Parliament could adopt a standard with respect to the condition threatening the life or health of the pregnant woman which required some independent medical opinion.

I will give copies of this to Members in order that they can read it for themselves. He says:

> Only one Judge expressly holds that Parliament cannot place any restrictions on abortions performed in the first trimester of pregnancy, except possibly that the woman's decision be taken after consultation with her physician. The two dissenting Judges base their dissent on their conclusion that the Charter does not protect the woman's right to terminate pregnancy at will. A standard, therefore, permitting abortions on request in the first trimester would in all likelihood be subject to constitutional challenge on the basis of Parliament's failure to balance the competing interests of the pregnant woman and the foetus. The Court has not ruled on this.

Therefore, I contend that the motion before us submitted as a basis for debate will not withstand a Charter challenge, if for no other reason than it is ultimately very arbitrary. What, in the name of common sense, could lead us to conclude that a woman who is pregnant and seeks an abortion at the sixteenth week is not committing a criminal offence, but if she goes into the seventeenth week she is a criminal? What could be more arbitrary than that? Putting it the other way, how could we make a law which says that a child is safe during the seventeenth week of pregnancy but not in the sixteenth? What could we be more arbitrary than that? The Supreme Court, in its judgment said over and over again that if the law is going to be fair it cannot be arbitrary, it must applied throughout Canada in the same way, it must be applied to all people in the same way, and it cannot be arbitrary.

I resist that motion on the basis of its arbitrariness whereas the motion standing in the name of the Member for Kitchener deals with the arbitrariness of the law. I support that motion, second, because it preserves the values important to our society.

I have already mentioned the value of life. I come from a province in which there are four live births for each one abortion, a ratio of four to one. That says something about our attitude toward life and our attitude toward society. Do we want to be judged by future generations on such an expression?

I want to leave Members with an observation by the eminent French historian sociologist Jacques Ellul who made some very perceptive observations about life. In a book entitled The Betrayal of the West he said:

> Reason combined with control leads to coherence. When the individual wins his freedom from the social body and wants to be free in the face of . . . others, he runs the great risk of incoherence . . . If a relationship is to be authentic, the other must be able to rely on the continuity of my behaviour, for instance, and know that he can expect certain kinds of words of help or refusals from me. Without such continuity a relationship becomes impossible . . .
> Coherence enables me to regard my commitments to others as durable. Marriage or a contract are not mere external formalities; they are meant to be declarations of intentions that are firm and fully accepted.
> Only then will I succeed in not becoming the inconstant prey of circumstances. Inconstancy in relations between the sexes is surely not an advance in freedom, but a withdrawal from true personhood, for it indicates the inability to resist circumstances and the impulse of the moment. Just think of the countless novels since Madame Bovary that have justified adultery and a way of life contrary to "bourgeois marriage". What do we find in them? Everything is the outcome of circumstances; a delightful evening, a ball etc., etc., throw people into one another's arms, people who want the marvelous experience of "free" love, unhindered by the conventions of the kind of marriage society will accept. But such free love is in fact no better than the marriage it rejects—

The point is that we all have contracts with each other. When two people engage in a sexual union there is a contract between those two people. Witness the pithy, terrible jokes about life: "Will you love me tomorrow?" Everyone hates to be jilted. There is a contract between two people. When that sexual union creates another person, there is another contract between the two people and a new individual. That new person is depending on the fulfilment of that contract for life. Society recognizes that.

As Mother Theresa said in Vancouver, when a woman has an abortion she commits murder twice, first she kills a child then she kills her conscience. Even Paul Anka recognized the contract in that song which was popular two years ago, Having My Baby. He said: "You could have swept it from you but you didn't do it". You see, there was a contract between two people.

If our society is going to maintain any kind of coherence, if people are to be able to depend on relationships in which there is a contract between two people, we have to depend on it in a sexual union and in a pregnancy contract because we depend on one another.

Third, I support that motion because it is the most compassionate. There is no doubt that we tend to be very flippant about this. But we need to enter into the world of the people who see themselves "in trouble". We need to walk alongside that teenage girl who is unexpectedly pregnant and is in distress because society might reject her, her parents might reject her or her boyfriend might reject her. We, as individuals, and our society need to learn to walk alongside those people and embrace them, care for them, provide for them support mechanisms that will allow them to enter into an enduring relationship with a life they are creating. We are thankfully beginning to do that.

Is it not significant that yesterday we celebrated the tenth anniversary of Louise Brown, the first test tube baby. I recall the outpouring of hunger for parenthood that took place the day after she was born. The day after Louise Brown was born, around the world there were 60,000 applications for in vitro fertilization.

Think of that hunger for parenthood. Why is it necessary to abort when there are countless thousands of couples across Canada who are saying: "We want to be loving and caring parents".

I think it is significant that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) yesterday tabled provisions that would create in our society new levels of child care that would allow people who are facing an unwanted or unexpected pregnancy another avenue of help. It may not be the answer for everyone because I think all of us believe that children grow up best and do best in the home. That is the most natural place for them to be, but if that is not possible we have to find other ways of doing it.

We all know that there are better and more fulfilling ways of facing life than through an abortion. But we as a society need to care for them.

For over 100 years the Salvation Army has cared for young mothers who found themselves in distress. Now, having built a chain of hospitals across Canada to help young ladies who are to become mothers, they cannot fill these hospitals with mothers for that purpose. Is it a sign of our health, of our social and spiritual and ethical health that when we have support mechanisms out there to help people like this they get counselling that diverts them from it and counsels an abortion rather than a delivery? Is that a sign of our health?

Why should we deny charitable organizations like the Salvation Army that way of ministering to our society?

I commend to Members the motion that was put forward by the Member for Kitchener (Mr. Reimer) because I believe it fulfils the requirements that the Supreme Court has already strongly suggested it would look for in any kind of legislation. I ask them to resist the lure of thinking that a gestational approach is actually a solution because that motion is nothing but abortion on demand and there is no security of the person in that.

I say to Hon. Members: We need to look for hope, and look at the exuberance of life. Where there is distress and depression, we need to embrace and hold up those people who are in distress and provide hope for them so that this generation and succeeding generations can look to us as those who have saved a generation.

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I intend to echo the comments made by my colleague, the Member for Surrey—White Rock—North Delta (Mr. Friesen). This is probably one of the most important debates to be held in the House of Commons since the constitutional debate. At that time I stood up and voted against the Constitution simply because there was no specified protection in that piece of legislation for the unborn child.

Certainly it is the responsibility of society to protect the unborn, for if society will not do it, who will? The unborn have rights, and that is why this debate is so important.

Part of the problem may be due to a breakdown in our society. While there are probably many causes for that breakdown, one may be due to the fact that people have so much time on their hands in this technological age. I am not sure that we are using that time as we should. When I grew up we had chores to do that did not give us the time nor money that people have today.

We must impress upon society that the abortion question is a problem with which we all must deal. The Hon. Member for Vancouver East (Ms. Mitchell) said she wished there were more young people taking part in this debate. The last person I spoke to before I came into the House was a 22-year old lady who advised me about what I should say and how. She told me what she wanted to convey and that is why I am speaking today on behalf of my constituents. They expect it of me.

At a Mass on Sunday, the priest recommended to his congregation that they get in touch with me to make sure that I was here to represent their views. That is what I am attempting to do now.

We all must recognize that we are part of the process and cannot escape it. Certainly we are our brother's keeper, our sister's keeper and our daughter's keeper. We must accept the responsibility to give help where it is required.

I want to refer to an article in the Red Deer Advocate on Saturday, July 2, 1988. The column is called "A Closer Look", and the headline of the article is: "Abortion Trauma Entwines Itself in Women's Lives". It is written by Valerie Starno, a freelance writer and a former correspondent for the Daily Interlake in Kalispell, Montana.

One of the problems we possibly have is the fact that sometimes women think this is only their problem. I do not see it that way. I think it is a problem for all of us. We have to accept the responsibility. Perhaps it is because of a lack of discipline in our society, perhaps it is because of a lack of restraint, perhaps a lack of supervision. There could be multiple reasons why we have this problem to deal with. I would like to put this news story on the record:

> Five months have passed since the Supreme Court of Canada declared federal abortion laws unconstitutional.
> Since the Jan. 28 decision there has been intense debate, most of which has focused on the rights of the woman and the unborn child. An important aspect of the abortion issue which has received less consideration is the effect of abortion on women and society. Yet this aspect surely deserves attention for there is increasing evidence that abortion may be contributing to a plethora of personal and social problems.
> According to Tanya Hughson, national co-ordinating director of the Abortion Outreach Centre in Calgary, 75 per cent of the centre's 150 monthly calls are directly related to "post-abortion trauma" counselling.
> Hughson describes the trauma as, "sustained emotional denial which produces a variety of physical and emotional responses". She likened it to the clinically recognized Vietnam disorder, which has produced similar symptoms among many Vietnam combat veterans. The basis for post-abortion trauma appears to be the act (abortion), regardless of the woman's personal feelings of right and wrong and independent of society's values.
> She said some of the more severe manifestations of the trauma include depression, suicide attempts, chemical dependencies, child abuse and multiple abortions. Hughson's remarks were made during a presentation to 1,200 women attending a meeting with Elaine McCoy, minister of women's issues, May 5 in Edmonton.
> The volunteer-run centre is known nationally and has a 24 hour crisis telephone line to provide anonymity and easy access to counselling, Hughson said. The centre is privately funded.

The reason I want to put this on record is the fact that this is women speaking.

At a Red Deer College Nursing Association forum on abortion held earlier this year, another woman told of her own experience with abortion . . . (she) vividly described the post-abortion difficulties she had experienced—massive haemorrhage, several subsequent miscarriages and great emotional conflict.

She spoke of the numerous support groups forming throughout the United States (where abortion on demand has been legal for 15 years) for women who are experiencing similar difficulties. Rather than helping, abortion is hurting women, she said. Smith currently operates a home for unmarried pregnant teenagers and counsels pre- and post-abortion women.

Dr. Philip Ney a clinical psychiatry professor at the University of Calgary's department of psychiatry has reviewed the medical literature on the effects of induced abortion. He has also researched and published several articles that deal with the personal and social implications of the procedure.

In his most recent paper, Mental Health and Abortion—Review Analysis and Recommendations, (March 1, 1988, . . . Dr. Ney cites recent studies which are, "turning up an alarming rate of post-abortion complications such as pelvic inflammatory disease (with its subsequent infertility), depression, and a host of problems that may occur in the following pregnancy".

After a detailed review of studies on the mental health complications of elective abortions, Dr. Ney concludes: "When the psychologically harmful effects of abortion and its medical complications are considered, it is reasonable to state that elective abortion is more harmful than helpful to mental health".

In addition to his research activities, Dr. Ney has treated women suffering from psychiatric complications of abortion.

Women who have aborted may also be placing the mental health of their existing or future offspring at risk.

In an earlier article, A Consideration of Abortion Survivors, published in Child Psychiatry and Human Development, Vol. 13 (3), Spring 1983, Human Sciences Press, Dr. Ney calls attention to the plight of Children who, aware of their mother's abortion(s), "have considerable conflicts regarding their existence." He presents evidence which suggests that these children may exhibit psychological difficulties similar to children who live through disasters, accidents or illness or whose siblings died of the same.

"The knowledge they have been chosen to live creates peculiar psychological problems which may retard their development, subject them to an increased risk of abuse, neglect, existential guilt, as well as the possibility of becoming parents who have difficulty relating to their children," states Dr. Ney.

It is interesting at this point to consider the recent ethical dilemma of "pregnancy reduction"—the procedure whereby one or more unborn babies are eliminated while letting the other(s) survive. Currently, pregnancy reduction is largely confined to in vitro fertilization or fertility drug induced pregnancies where all lives may be lost due to pre-mature births. It is reasonable to conclude, based on Dr. Ney's findings, that survivors of this procedure would be among those at high risk of experiencing psychological difficulties.

So-called "survivors" are not necessarily restricted to persons whose mothers have experienced abortion, for as Dr. Ney said, "When up to 50 per cent of North American pregnancies end by induced abortion,it is reasonable to consider a live newborn as a survivor."

He adds, "We might wonder what happens in the future when abortion survivors hold in their hands the fate of those aged or enfeebled parents and professionals who regarded them so callously when as unborn children they were so vulnerable.

Perhaps the most disturbing aspect of the effects of induced abortion on mental health is the possibility that permissive abortion may be contributing to the problem of child abuse.

We all know of the dangers and problems associated with child abuse today.

In another article, Relationship Between Abortion and Child Abuse, (published in the Canadian Journal of Psychiatry, Vol. 24, 1979), Dr. Ney cites studies which indicate a higher rate of child abuse among mothers who have previously had an abortion. He offers this explanation: "Once bonding is interrupted in the (first pregnancy), there are long-lasting psychological changes which makes it more difficult for a good bond to develop in subsequent pregnancies. For this reason, it is possible that abortion contributes to bonding failure, an important cause of child battering."

That is why I say we all have a part in this. It is all important to our society and is something for which we must all be held responsible. Certainly we all have a responsibility to ensure that abortions decline instead of increase.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I preface my remarks by saying that I regret that we do not have before us a legislative initiative. Instead, we are speaking on a motion. Notwithstanding the results of this motion, there may or may not be legislation. The law we had and which we followed was effectively abolished on January 28, 1988, by a Supreme Court decision. Although this law, which came into effect in 1969, was not very valuable because it did not adequately protect human life, nevertheless it did make a statement merely by the fact it was there. Today we have a complete legislative vacuum, a vacuum which has existed now for some six months.

I do not want to spend my time tonight criticizing the Government. Instead, I would like to concentrate on the issue at hand. I would like to speak to the issue of life and to the issue of abortion which we are called upon to discuss tonight.

I make my remarks perhaps being in an unusual, some would say unorthodox, position of being the only Member of Parliament who has changed his mind, or who has admitted publicly to having changed his mind, on this issue. First, perhaps I should explain to the House and to Canadians why I changed my mind on abortion.

This is the second very intense moral debate that we have had in the House of Commons since I came here. The first one was the debate on capital punishment. Today, we are discussing abortion. On the issue of capital punishment I took a position. The more I spoke of the position I took the more I was convinced that I was right.

I also took a position with respect to abortion. However, the more I spoke of my position, the more I attempted to defend it in front of constituents and in front of others, the more I was convinced that what I stood for was wrong. On April 11, 1988, I stood in this House and admitted that the position I had taken was wrong. I apologized to my constituents for having taken such a position. I sought to correct the wrong that I had myself created.

Mr. Speaker, as you no doubt know, since you are a Member of Parliament like us, after an MP changes his mind in this debate, many Canadians approach him and express their opinion. When a Member stirs controversy, as I did by changing my mind, needless to say, I got the attention of many Canadians. Those who agreed with my position said so; those who disagreed certainly did not fail to say so.

Mr. Speaker, that being said, this whole controversy has created a situation in which those around me asked me many questions. One day, my ten-year-old daughter Julie came to ask me, a few days after I had changed my mind on abortion, what an abortion is. She is barely ten years old. And she asked me that question in front of several people. I told her that I would explain it to her once we were back home. Naturally, once we were back home, I forgot, but my wife did not and neither did Julie. My daughter again came to me to say, "Dad, you have to tell me what an abortion is." I then tried to do so as best I could, with all the imperfections of a father, and I said to her, "Sit down, Julie, I will tell you briefly." I told her, "You know, Julie, when a woman gets pregnant, if she decides for one reason or another that she does not want to have a child, she can have an operation to remove the child, to have it taken out of her womb." Julie answered me, "Remove it—you mean kill it?"

Mr. Speaker, my 10-year-old daughter understood in 30 seconds what I had failed to understand for so long.

[English]

We are discussing abortion—we are certainly not inventing the wheel as legislators. It is a topic which has been discussed by many and, of course, for a very long time. The Hippocratic oath stated, and it was written somewhere in the neighbourhood of 400 BC:

> I will give no deadly medicine to any one even upon request, nor suggest any such counsel; and in like manner I will not give to a woman a pessary to produce abortion.

Hippocrates was a pagan physician, just in case people believe that the Roman Catholic Church or anyone else has a monopoly on being against abortion.

In the 11th century BC the Hittite code of Assyria provided for the flogging of a man responsible for an abortion for the daughter of a freeman. Of course at that time the only measure of life was whether or not someone was free. Therefore life was deemed to have value.

The Old Testament states: "If men while quarrelling knocked down a pregnant woman, thus causing a miscarriage, they were fined".

St. Thomas Aquinas maintained that the soul was directly created by God and that it was infused in the embryo, not on the day of conception but when the embryo was formed enough to receive it. I still do not know what that means. Nevertheless, it was recognized to have been some point during a pregnancy.

Pope Gregory XIV in his encyclical letter excommunicated those found guilty of the abortion of a foetus after the first moments of life.

The Napoleonic Code of 1810 provided for imprisonment and hard labour for the woman and the abortionist.

The issue of abortion is difficult for us to deal with. It is certainly the most gut-wrenching and difficult issue that I have ever had to deal with and probably ever will. If it gives us any comfort, it did not seem to be much easier 2,000, 3,000 or 5,000 years ago. But we were not sent here to do easy things. We were sent here to do the job at hand.

When I changed my mind on abortion I did so believing in the sanctity of life. One of the things that made me change my mind more than anything else, if you can believe this, Mr. Speaker, is that when I reread my own speech that I made on capital punishment I realize that I stated then that life is sacred and that all life is worth preserving.

I note that is the House of Commons Debates of November 9, 1967, when the then Solicitor General was banning capital punishment he said in his speech: "I believe that so long as the state claims the right under the law to deliberately take human life there will be a tendency to regard life more cheaply". That was 19 years ago. I believe he was correct. I believe also that the same comments are applicable when we deal with abortion.

There is an interesting contradiction at the present time between criminal law and civil law in Canada. Criminal law is simply non-existent as it pertains to the foetus. Jurisprudence in civil cases in the past year to be stated in this House in order to demonstrate to Members of Parliament the glaring contradiction between criminal and civil law.

In many wills there is an expression stated by the person leaving his or her estate that they leave it to "all my living children". This has been interpreted by the courts, as it should be, upon occasion. It is interesting to note that Judge Mathers in Manitoba Court of King's Bench ruled in 1918 in the case of a woman who was pregnant and who had not yet given birth in the following way. A gift as in this will to "all living children" comprehends those living at the testator's death and those who are "en ventre sa mère". In other words, civil law, in that case, and in the 1907 case of Villar vs. Gilbey was that a child yet unborn was a child for the purposes of receiving an estate. Interestingly enough, the child unborn is not deemed to be a child if its life is taken away. I would submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that that contradiction in itself should make us think about what it is that we are doing.

Some people claim that the unborn child is not yet a living person, that it is some form of amorphous blob, and that the taking of that life is not necessarily wrong. I do not know at what point human life begins. Unless someone proves differently to me, I shall assume that it begins at the time of conception.

Why do I come to those conclusions? First, I do not think that the onus is upon me to prove it. I think the onus is upon those who believe otherwise to tell me why life begins at some other point. To prove my case, I have here in front of me volume 317, dated November 19, 1987 of The New England Journal of Medicine. This journal can hardly be considered to be pro-life propaganda. It published an article entitled "Pain and its Effects in the Human Neonate and Fetus". In the article it states:

> Cutaneous sensory receptors appear in the perioral area of the human fetus in the 7th week of gestation; they spread to the rest of the face, the palms of the hands, and the soles of the feet by the 11th week . . .

In other words, from the seventh week on there is a feeling or sensory perception on the part of the foetus. We know that there are live births at 18 and 19 weeks. We know that there are abortions at 20 weeks. Yet for some reason we pretend that that is not murder.

Mr. Speaker, some people will say that abortion should be allowed when there is a possibility the child may be deformed or handicapped.

I should like to voice my disagreement with this suggestion. As a matter of fact, I express not only my disagreement but also, I believe, that of our country as a political entity.

Indeed, on November 20, 1959 Canada signed the United Nations Declaration of the Rights of the Child. Here is what Canada signed when it endorsed the declaration.

[English]

I read from this declaration one of the preambles which states:

> Whereas the child by reason of physical and mental immaturity, needs special safeguards and care, including appropriate legal protection, before as well as after birth.

As a nation we signed that Declaration of the Rights of the Child in 1959 which stated that the unborn child, when handicapped, deserved special protection, not elimination.

Canada has also signed other international covenants regarding the issue of the foetus. In 1947 the World Medical Association published its new version of the Hippocratic oath. Canada is a member of that illustrious group. I have here the Declaration of Geneva, the modern day Hippocratic oath, which states:

> I will maintain the utmost respect for human life from the time of conception; even under threat, I will not use my medical knowledge contrary to the laws of humanity.

Again a document that we as a nation signed some 41 years ago.

If we as a nation fail to legislate on abortion, I believe that we are allowing society to crumble and we would be contributing toward it. There is a dangerous situation happening now. I have before me the text of an editorial from The Globe and Mail of June 18, 1983. The article is entitled "Life and Death". It states: The City of Toronto's Health Department reported that in 1981, the latest year for which statistics are available, 8,313 abortions were performed in that city and that there were 7,597 live births." There is something dreadfully wrong when there are more abortions in the city than there are live births.

To further this case, I have a chart in front of me that was published by the pro-life movement, Alliance for Life, in which it describes the number of abortions from 1970 to 1986. They have identified it on that chart as representing 907,351. That compares to the number of Canadian deaths in the Boer War, World War I, World War II, and the Korean War of 99,449. In other words, there were ten times more abortions in the last 16 years than deaths in the last 80 years of warfare.

Mr. Speaker, I spent a good many years as a child in the care of my grandparents. I used to live with them when I was a small child and my grandmother would tell me that it was wrong to break a bird's egg because it contained life, the small bird yet to be born. I think my grandmother was right, Mr. Speaker. The unborn exists not only in a bird's egg but elsewhere as well.

[English]

In conclusion, and unfortunately this is all the time left to me, I urge upon my colleagues the following. In our society, we need strong family policies, assistance for families, assistance for unwed mothers, stronger child encouragement such as child care, but more than that we need a strong abortion law which states our position as a society. We need a strong law to protect a human from the time of conception. I say only one thing to my colleagues that, before they vote, they reflect upon the following, and I ask them to let them live.

• (2040)

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, the abortion issue which, as elected representatives, we have to address tonight is indeed a very difficult and complicated one. Are we for or against abortion? Deep down, is this something that we can wish for? Can anyone, whether a man, a woman, a priest, or just about anybody here hope to live through an abortion? Human life is something we all have in common, Mr. Speaker, and that is what is the most important. An unborn child for a couple or for the continuation of our society is the major principle of human life. As an elected Member of this House, however, I have a responsibility to legislate. The responsibility of the Church is to promote ethics, life and the respect for human life, but it is also the responsibility of legislators to promote the same respect, while considering its consequences. It is these consequences that we, as Members of this House, will have to take into account when we are called upon to vote at 12 o'clock next Thursday.

What did the former legislation say? It said that when a girl had an abortion, she could face a two-year prison sentence, and the physician who procured the abortion could face a life prison sentence. That was the legislation which we had before but which was not enforced and which was ruled unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of Canada. That is why we have to deal with this issue.

Mr. Speaker, we should not shut our eyes and refuse to look reality in the face.

As a legislator, what do I do about a young girl of 14, 16, 18 or 20 who for various reasons decides to have an abortion in the earlier stages of pregnancy? If I vote according to my principles and ignore the consequences of my legislation, am I not also making a mistake with some very serious social consequences? Should a young girl who is afraid of being thrown out of the house by her parents because it was incest or rape or for any other reason, a young girl who panics and decides to have an abortion in the earlier stages of pregnancy, be brought before the courts and charged with murder, with the obvious social consequences for the girl herself and her family?

Another question, Mr. Speaker. Should I as a legislator overlook the fact that U.S. border states allow abortion, no questions asked? Am I not trying to ignore the fact that a young girl who can afford it will fly to the United States, have her abortion, not say a word to anyone and come back here? While the other girl who can't afford it will go down to the basement to be cut up by God knows who, with further consequences for her own fertility and health.

As the legislator, I have to consider that as well, Mr. Speaker. I cannot afford to vote according to my principles without considering the consequences of the legislation itself. Because after all, it could be your daughter, it could be mine, it could be the daughter of any of us. But in spite of all this, we cannot afford to leave the door wide open. That would not make sense. But how to find a middle ground from which we can protect life and at the same time not go overboard with coercive discipline?

On the weekend, I was talking to constituents in my riding. I tried to visualize some amendments, and I said: Actually, if we allow abortion only for minors, in cases of incest and rape, what do we do? So the girl goes to the doctor after two months and she says: It was rape. How can that be proven? It is impossible. Whenever we try to pass equitable legislation aimed at protecting life, problems do arise. That, Mr. Speaker, is the decision which we, as legislators, must make on Thursday.

Also, it is easy for us, men, to vote on the principle, but we are not the ones who bear children. However, we do have a stake in the matter. We must promote life, but we must also pass legislation which will not create social problems of similar significance.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, when I speak about abortion, I feel very much concerned because my wife and I have adopted two children. If their mothers had had an abortion, I would have been deprived of the opportunity of adopting these children. Therefore, I also know what I am talking about because I know the importance of the issue. Unfortunately, nowadays, women too often forget that there are couples who want children and would be only too willing to adopt the children they carry. As legislators, we also have a duty to make this possible and to improve the conditions in which the women who experience these problems find themselves.

So, Mr. Speaker, the motion before us today reads in part as follows:

> Such legislation should prohibit the performance of an abortion, subject to the following exceptions:
> When, during the earlier stages of pregnancy: a qualified medical practitioner is of the opinion that the continuation of the pregnancy of a woman would, or would be likely to, threaten her physical or mental well-being;

This objective, however, is flawed due to its lack of precision. We must not swing the doors wide open. It is obvious that we must be against abortion, but we must make allowance for specific conditions in which people find themselves in our society. It is in that context that I will try to analyze carefully, on Thursday, all the amendments which are proposed. As a Member of Parliament, I refuse to vote on a principle without giving any thought to the impact of this legislation. In so doing, I think that we must allow for certain options in order to make the legislation as human as possible.

[English]

Mr. Ernie Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, last January, when the Supreme Court struck down the old abortion law, the Government said it was ready to give leadership on the question. On the day after the Supreme Court decision, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn) said:

> "As far as our responsibilities are concerned, we intend to provide the leadership that is required on this issue.

I am reading from Don McGillivray's column of May 17:

> He was going to take "a position of leadership" and "provide all Canadian citizens right across the country with a uniform approach. That is the commitment that we make at this point in time. In addition, we will be dealing with this matter on an urgent basis."

Mr. McGillivray then added:

> Since then, the urgency as well as the leadership seems to have gone missing.
> Instead of talking about leadership now . . .

And this was more than two months ago.

> . . . the government is ducking responsibility. The prime minister says abortion is not something on which a party position is proper. The justice minister says he wants to "let the House of Commons determine the course of this matter".

Mr. McGillivray observed that:

> As the Mulroney government goes into hiding on the abortion issue, it is forcing individual members of Parliament into the open.
> A free vote shifts responsibility to the individual MP. He or she must take a stand on a subject the government itself considers too hot to handle.

Those comments seem to be very fair ones, with regard to the kinds of responsibility or, rather, lack of it, that the Government has shown on this issue, if it regards the matters as being important in doing what it seems to do.

What we are given this day and over the next couple of days, through extended hours of debate through the night, perhaps, is the opportunity for individual Members to express their opinions. I am reminded of the practice in the U.S. Congress where members very often want to put something on the record and simply do so by inserting it in that record. They do not have to speak it in the Congress. It is simply printed as if it had been spoken. This happens to be one of those times when American usage might have been useful.

Instead, we are going to be going through this particular charade, and I say that advisedly, of expressing ourselves on the matter. There is going to be a kind of reading taken in the House of what Members think about various aspects of the question. We may get a majority on the motion and we may not. It is all too likely that this Parliament will end before it can consider legislation. It will have been quite literally a charade with the votes occurring, ironically enough, six months to the day last January when the Supreme Court of Canada rendered its verdict.

There is a very serious question to be asked at the outset when considering this motion, that is, how serious have the consequences of the Supreme Court decision actually been? There are those who suggest that chaos reigns in the land. I have seen that in material sent to me by the Evangelical Fellowship of Canada. I noted in the comments by the member of the Official Opposition who responded to the Deputy Government House Leader, observations about some sort of crisis into which Canada had been cast last January. I am not sure that this is the best way to read the situation.

What continues to be the case is that abortions can only occur legally by the actions of medical practitioners in hospitals or in clinics, if they are going to be legal and provided for within the national medicare system. It is not obvious that there has been any great increase in numbers. In fact, if there is one vital fact to be noted about the consequences of that Supreme Court decision, it is that in a number of jurisdictions there has been a flouting of the decision. There is no more equality of access within the law in a number of provinces than there was before.

That is a very different kind of problem from the one that alarmists are trying to raise in pressing this issue. Is it possible that the Government has backed off from legislation because of its recognition that the situation is not nearly as chaotic, or as much a matter of crisis as some of the alarmists would have us think?

It is worth saying, of course, that with the Supreme Court decision on Section 251 of the Criminal Code dealing with therapeutic abortion committees and hospitals, we are not left by any means without law on abortion. There are still illegal abortions as there always were. That is to say, it is possible for an illegal abortion to occur. It is still necessary to ensure that the proper medical practices prevail. In that particular context, I think one of the other facts that those who wish to stampede us into action need to consider is that the decision rendered by the Supreme Court of Canada after years of decisions at lower court levels, in which Doctor Henry Morgentaler played a central role, made one thing very clear about the law that Parliament passed and established. One of the most fundamental principles of public life, of jurisprudence, of the practices of the judicial system in Canada, one of the most fundamental principles on which we depend for our security of person, is the principle that one will be found guilty only by a jury of one's peers.

The fact that juries refused to convict women or Doctor Morgentaler as a qualified medical practitioner said something about the law of Canada. We in this Parliament, recognizing the importance of jury decisions as fundamental to our security of person, certainly needed to respect those decisions.

Having said these things about the situation which, it seems to me, does not deserve nearly all the alarmism projected by various persons, it is after all in this context that we may see colleges of physicians and surgeons, provincial departments of health, conceivably the federal Department of National Health and Welfare, and hospital boards, respecting the Supreme Court decision and the law as it has declared it, developing the standards and ethical practices which are to be applied when physicians consider the question with a woman of the desirability or otherwise of an abortion.

The fact that this is through and through a moral question seems to me to make it quite appropriate that colleges of physicians and surgeons, hospital committees and boards, departments of health, provincial and federal, should be involved in considering what is proper, what is right, in these matters, with all the assistance that can be provided by medical ethicists in universities and other places and by informed public debate, the kind of debate this resolution does in its way make possible.

The position of the NDP is well known, I think, to all Canadians. It is sometimes misinterpreted but there is little doubt, I am sure, in the minds of any Canadian that the NDP is committed to freedom of choice for women. I would say, in fact, particularly following on some intensive discussions which took place in our caucus over some hours today in clarifying the position we would adopt vis-à-vis the resolution put before us, that the position of the NDP is profoundly focused on freedom of choice because in our Party, perhaps above all of the three Parties, there has been a recognition of the extent to which the abortion question is part of the struggle of women in our country and in other countries to establish their security of person, to establish their rights and their control over their present and future.

The fact that this is an ongoing struggle in the way I have already suggested, the failure of jurisdictions such as Prince Edward Island where no abortions are available at all, or other jurisdictions which have failed to follow through on the Supreme Court decision or the spirit of that decision, the fact that those things exist underscores the way in which this struggle by women to ensure their own security of person continues in our country.

It is quite clear in the debate that took place among us in caucus, and in my brooding over the resolution, that the policy position the NDP has taken, which is opposed to any kind of criminalization of women or physicians involved in these matters, reflects a profound commitment to the desire of women to control their own lives and their own circumstances and to be secure in their own persons. For those reasons, in a certain sense, the NDP could rejoice last January in the fact that the Supreme Court came to a somewhat similar position on the whole matter.

The fact that there is this insistence, then, that women must have this security of person, must have the opportunity to make this decision in consultation with a qualified medical practitioner , the reality of that fact in our caucus and in the positions we have taken over the years, is quite clearly paralleled.

This is in the most genuine of senses a concern about life. We New Democrats are not for abortion. We are for choice and for the right of women to be able to make those choices, to be free to make them. It is a concern about life on which that is based. It is a concern about the lives of women, the lives of families and the lives of children. It is a concern about all these human realities. It is imperative that that be appreciated.

It is all too easy for persons to recognize that abortion is a control question. Every time another man rises to make a speech against abortion, it is astonishing how often he gives himself away in the extent to which he understands that this is a control question, or halfway understands it at least. He knows perfectly well that keeping women in check and under control is a way for men to continue in the control that they have exercised for so long in society.

Against such a context is a choice as an assertion of the freedom of women and their desire to achieve full lives for themselves, to have good lives for their families and to be able to provide for their children the comfort and plenitude we would all like to have. Those are the things that are vital to life in society. To focus in a very narrow way on the question of whether it is a human life from the moment of conception and on not interfering with it in any way is surely to get involved in one very particular aspect of the question and all too easily to ignore all the others.

One Conservative after another is claiming to be really committed to life in this debate this evening which presumably will continue through the nighttime hours and similarly tomorrow and into Thursday. At the same time, they support a Government which in one area after another has acted against the interests of the family. It is not doing enough in the interests of children. It is interfering with the need for family planning and for education in sexuality. To be supporting all those things while at the same time claiming to be a great supporter of human life from the moment of conception is hypocrisy of the worst sort.

This Government has cut back on funding for Planned Parenthood of Canada. It is holding back on family allowances and increasing taxation for families. It cannot find the money to meet the child care needs of the day let alone into the future. It is a Government which has done nothing in the area of housing policy. I refer as well to previous Liberal Governments which, over the past two decades, have driven the cost of housing to exorbitant levels which load every family down with pressures that force women into the workforce, whether they choose to or not. These pressures make it absolutely essential that both husband and wife be wage earners. Those realities cannot be avoided in any consideration of who is for life and who is against it.

This question is very clearly a moral one. Each of us looks to his own community for assurance or otherwise. As a member of the United Church of Canada, I note that among other points that were made to all Members of Parliament in March of this year by the United Church, the following observations were made:

> The United Church of Canada is not pro-abortion.
> It is in favour of responsible and informed choice in certain medical, social and economic crisis situations.

That is quite clearly a position very much like the one New Democrats take. The United Church also observed:

> Abortion is always a moral issue.
> It must always be seen as the lesser of two evils, a decision to be made in full recognition of the consequences for the woman and her family of either choice. It must not be treated as a form of contraception.

Again, that is a position that New Democrats take time after time. Another item is as follows:

> Women must be respected as moral agents.
> Few, if any, women undertake this decision lightly. Their right to be treated as moral persons must not be ignored.

I put those on the one side in support of what I am saying about the matter of life. I put against that those who claim the pro-life label for themselves and put forward their own radical position that life must be sacred in practically every circumstance from the moment of conception, quite ignoring the realities of spontaneous abortions which occur in remarkable numbers of pregnancies, and other brute facts of pre-natal life. This is an assertion which is largely just an assertion.

Having grown up in an evangelical context, and a number of colleagues in the House are familiar with these influences as well, I have looked at the Scriptures to see if there is any contradiction to the position I am spelling out. I found practically nothing. If one has to look to the poetry of Scripture in the Psalms for some sort of support for a radical position, then it is on the very thinnest of ice that one is skating. If one has then to fall back on the attitude to life that characterizes Judaism, the attitude to life that Christ taught, then we are surely not very far away from what I have been saying about a regard for the freedom and security of person, of women, a concern for the health of the family, a regard for little children and their safety, all of which are concerns of New Democrats. These should be the concerns of the Government, and particularly of those Members who claim to be pro-life. Those are the contexts within which we put abortion.

I too regret the number of abortions that occur in Canada, but it is not by means of criminal law that we will deal with the fact. In moving to a conclusion, I would consider what the needs of the hour actually are. In making a suggestion, I have to go beyond the policy of the New Democratic Party which, as I have already said, has been focused in a peculiar way, though quite understandably historically, on the rights of women and protection of their security. I have to go beyond that by suggesting that with a moral question of this sort, it is not the criminal law that we need at all. It is development in the ethics with which we approach these matters and it is development in the social provisions that are most imperative.

If we do not get the kind of development in the protection of families that I have already suggested, women will continue to be faced with harsh economic and social situations. Women will find themselves victims of the abuse of men, as happens time after time.

Just over the weekend, I was reading an article from the Canadian Journal of Women and the Law, under the rather cute but ultimately incredibly painful title of "Men Will Be Men". It focused on the fact that 98.5 per cent of cases of sexual abuse are cases of which boys and men are guilty. What is it in our society that leads to that kind of abuse? How profoundly wrong it is to focus on women and the abortion decision they may be driven to in these circumstances instead of recognizing that it is society that needs to be changed and transformed.

What we need most imperatively, obviously, is equality of access. I would suggest that the Government consider using the Canada Health Act and taking strong actions with those jurisdictions that refuse to provide ease of access for women, particularly during the first trimester of pregnancy. If women were able to achieve an abortion when forced into it by the harsh necessities of life in the first 12 or 14 weeks of pregnancy, all our concerns about later abortions would fall by the wayside, except of course in those terrible situations that arise when a doctor must make a choice between saving the life of a pregnant woman or the foetus. Of course we generally save the life of the pregnant woman. In other circumstances I doubt that there would be many abortions occurring at the later stages of pregnancy, so all of those concerns would be provided for.

If we needed to provide any limitations I suggest that regulations under the Canada Health Act could do the job perfectly well in stating the desire of society, that is to say, our moral expectations. We could specify what we will fund and what we will not fund in the way of procedures which occur in the area of abortion. We could lay out for physicians, hospitals, and the departments of health in the provinces the expectations that we have.

All of this could be done without using the criminal law power of the federal Government at all but focusing, instead, on the spending power of the federal Government. That, it seems to me, is the way to move ahead on this profoundly difficult question before us. It is something which could be done without acting with the sense of panic which alarmists all around us have been trying to create.

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, after the striking down of the existing law respecting abortion by the Supreme Court in the Morgentaler case it has become our duty and responsibility, as Members of Parliament, to fill the void left in the law. Only an extreme fringe would argue that it is acceptable to perform an abortion at eight and a half months. The previous speaker outlined the official NDP position on abortion on demand paid for by the state, although I know there are members of that Party who take a differing view. I am sure that even that Member would not countenance abortion done a couple of days before an expected birth. That, Sir, is too close to infanticide.

What the law should be is one of the most difficult things that we as Parliamentarians have been called upon to decide, certainly in this Parliament. People have strong opinions firmly held on one side of the question or the other. It is not my intention tonight to get involved in the technical arguments on one side or the other. Those have been given many times by speakers much more eloquent than myself.

People, including Members of Parliament, are unlikely to be swayed by argument. There is one Member of this House, the Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell (Mr. Boudria), who has admitted to changing his mind on the issue. Everyone else is of the same opinion as they were years ago. People hold these views on account of strong moral, ethical and religious convictions.

We all have our own biases. My particular bias is well known. I am certainly towards the right-to-life end of the spectrum. To me abortion is only acceptable under very special circumstances where there is a real risk to the life or serious threat to the health of the mother or in certain cases such as rape or incest.

However, it is incumbent upon us to bring this debate to some sort of a conclusion and to put in place law dealing with this subject. It is a given fact that whatever the law, it cannot reflect all views. Therefore, there has to be some kind of a compromise, and that in an area in which people are singularly reluctant to make such a compromise. The best that we can expect from an eventual law is that the result will be criticized equally strongly on both sides, but perhaps we will end up with something with which people can live.

The easy thing for a Member of Parliament to do in this debate—and we have seen much of this today—is to state his or her point of view and then vote against anything that does not coincide with that. It is pretty easy to be critical and it is very difficult to work toward this necessary compromise which is bound to cause much discomfort. However, to take that attitude is tantamount to washing our hands of the issue. It is a denial of the responsibility and duty to which I referred earlier placed on us as Members of Parliament by the people of Canada.

It may be that Members in the Opposition, and perhaps even private Members on this side of the House, can take that attitude. However, the Government, per se, cannot. I know of the great amount of thought and discussion which took place within the Cabinet and within the various Party caucuses before the motion which we have before us tonight was placed on the Order Paper. This motion, if passed, or if passed as amended, will form the guide for legislation to be drafted and brought into this House at a later date.

In short, the concept contained in the main motion is that we will have relatively easy access to abortion in the early stages of pregnancy. If we have such a Bill before us I will probably argue in favour of a pretty restricted period. We are going to have a much more strict limitation in the later stages of pregnancy. Of course there will be a requirement that the procedure be done by properly qualified medical practitioners. I do not think that that particular provision will cause much dissension.

Despite personal opinions to the contrary, it seems to me that this approach as expressed in the government motion is the only approach with which the great majority of Canadians could eventually live. It is one which would comply with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms as interpreted by the Supreme Court of Canada and one which would be complied with and not ignored by those seeking an abortion. It would worry me if we were to pass a very strict law on this subject which would then be disregarded by thousands of Canadians, most of them young women.

When we draft the law we will have to address ourselves to what penalties are to be imposed for breaking the law. What are we going to do with a 15, 16, or 17-year-old girl who goes out and has an abortion contrary to this very strict law? Are we going to throw her into jail? Are we going to subject her to a heavy fine? It seems to me that the best answer is the one contemplated in the motion in order that we will not be throwing young women into jail and they will not be forced to skip the country.

We should, at the same time, do all the other things which so many people have mentioned to reduce the number of abortions performed in Canada. Estimates of that number vary between 60,000 and 100,000 a year, and that is unacceptable. We must use all other methods besides strict legal ones to make sure that there is a reduction in the number of abortions performed in our country.

Therefore it is my intention to fulfil that responsibility and duty imposed on me as a Member of this House, not avoid it. It is my intention to vote in favour of the motion standing in the name of the Deputy Government House Leader.

Mr. Jim Jepson (London East): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed both an honour and a privilege for me to rise in my place this evening to speak in this debate on this most controversial yet vital and important issue, namely the abortion question.

As most Canadians know by now, this House is debating the abortion issue as a result of the Supreme Court of Canada overturning Section 251 of the Criminal Code and supporting this decision on the basis of Section 15 of the Charter. By this decision the court has left the innocent unborn in their mothers' wombs completely unprotected and vulnerable to the abortionist's tools.

At the outset, I want to thank the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and the Government for allowing me as a Member of Parliament the freedom to take my place and, without pressure of any sort, to vote on what I and I believe a majority of people feel is right in this situation. I thank the Government for that opportunity.

When we talk about abortion, we are not talking about the very few pregnancies that result from reported rape or incest, or the case of the threat to the life of the mother. We are talking about approximately 100,000 abortions in Canada, as reported in Statistics Canada figures, as well as those abortions carried out by various abortionists across the country.

What most Canadians also do not know is that in 1982, 11,000 women in Canada had an abortion for the second time, and 2,000 women for the third or fourth time. In 1981, the City of Toronto released figures stating that 8,300 abortions were performed, while there were only 7,600 live births.

It becomes obvious from these figures that abortion is not really a result of serious health problems but more a result of choices based on personal inconvenience or added financial burden.

The irony of the high number of abortions is that essentially, Canadians believe life is worth protecting. In 1982, they spent $30 billion or 8.4 per cent of our Gross National Product because they believed that life is the greatest gift we are given. It is hard for me to fathom that on one floor of a hospital all the medical expertise available is being used to save a life, yet one floor down in that same hospital an unborn baby is being cut up by an abortionist's tools and sucked out by a vacuum into a waste basket in an operating room.

We hear the term unwanted pregnancies, yet in Ontario there is a five-year waiting period for adoption. The population of Canada is approximately 25 million. In order to maintain the status quo, Canadians should average 2.3 children per family, yet the average family size is 1.6 children. In fact, in Québec, the average is 1.3 children per family.

It must be stated clearly, though, that many women are forced to look at abortion because of men or boyfriends who are not willing to accept their responsibility and offer love, understanding and financial support to see this pregnancy through. In stating the obvious: "It takes two to get pregnant", it is not just a woman's problem.

Essentially, we are only maintaining our population through increased immigration. In Ontario in 1969, official agencies processed the adoption of 5,400 children. In 1979, this figure had dropped to 1,248. By 1984, 862 children were adopted through provincial agencies in Ontario. In this same time frame, abortions have increased over 600 per cent. As a Government, it is important to see that those women faced with unexpected pregnancies have available counselling services and possible financial assistance.

One of the basic debates in this very difficult and emotional issue is, when does life begin? I believe, if one is totally objective, that medical evidence clearly shows that life begins at conception. Did you know, Mr. Speaker, that four days after conception the sex of the unborn can be determined under a special microscope, or that after 24 to 25 days the heart begins to beat and pump its own blood, or that 43 days after conception brainwaves can be determined? Did you know that 30 days after conception, foundations of the brain, spinal chord, nerves and sex organs are completely formed?

All of the following occur even before the mother knows she is pregnant. Nerves and muscles begin working together, lips become sensitive to touch and the shape of the body is unmistakenly human and possesses all the internal organs of an adult.

In fact, the stomach produces digestive juices, the liver manufactures red blood cells, and the kidney eliminates uric acid from the body. Even the legs, arms, fingers and toes have already been formed. From this point on the only changes will be in size and sophistication of use of the unborn's parts. When we consider the abortion procedure, it becomes very clear that if the unborn foetus were not a living being there would be no reason for terminating its life.

I think it is important for Canadians to realize just what happens when a baby is aborted in its mother's womb by an elective abortion procedure. I realize there are those who are offended by such descriptions, yet I think in many cases people's consciences are pricked when they see and hear what really happens when an abortion is performed.

The first procedure is the D&C or the dilation and curettage abortion. This method is most often used in the first 13 weeks of pregnancy. A tiny hoe-like instrument, the curette, is inserted into the womb through the dilated cervix, its natural gateway. The abortionist then scrapes the wall of the uterus, cutting the baby's body to pieces. This is now used less frequently than suction.

The second procedure is suction abortion, the most commonly used method for early pregnancies. The principle is the same as in the D&C. In this technique, which was pioneered in Communist China, a powerful suction tube is inserted through the cervix into the womb. The body of the developing baby and placenta are torn to pieces and sucked into a jar.

The third procedure is salt poisoning, or hyper-natremic abortion. This method is generally used after 13 weeks of pregnancy. According to Statistics Canada, in 1985, 1,715 babies were aborted between 17 and 20 weeks, and 181 babies were aborted after 20 weeks.

In this procedure, a long needle is inserted through the mother's abdomen and a strong salt solution is injected directly into the amniotic fluid which surrounds the child. The salt is swallowed and breathed and slowly poisons the baby, burning his or her skin as well. The mother goes into labour about a day later and expels a dead, grotesque, shrivelled baby. Unbelievably, some babies have actually survived this "salting out", and were born alive.

As graphic and distasteful as these descriptions are, I believe Canadians must have awareness of the medical procedures involved in an abortion if they are going to continue to voice partial support for abortion in this country. When the abortion issue becomes a question of respect for human life, and it always does, it not only refers to the lives of unborn children, but to the lives of the elderly, the sick and, indeed, our own lives. Abortion is only the tip of the iceberg as we see today in our society euthanasia being discussed and even practised in moderate form. Does this mean in the final analysis, as Dr. Harley Smith at the Hospital for Sick Children in Toronto stated:

> There is relentless pressures on Governments to govern and physicians to practice on the principles of pure utility. In this view, what is good is not what is just or what is right, but what is useful. What is strong will survive. Who is wanted will be welcome.

I find it ironic that we live in a country that protects eagles' eggs and baby seals under law and yet allows abortion on demand. Throughout the abortion debate, we cannot get away from the fact that we are talking about the protection of or the taking of the life of the innocent unborn. We are living in a different world since Mr. Trudeau brought in his Charter, Section 15 of the Charter in particular. We hear an emphasis on rights, but what about responsibility and accountability?

In the abortion debate we constantly hear that women should make the choice over their own bodies. I agree that women should have the choice, but that choice should come before she enters into a sexual relationship with her partner. Grown men and women know that by entering into a sexual relationship there is always the possibility that a pregnancy could occur. Surely, abortion should not be considered a solution in that situation, like removing a troublesome wart. Margaret Eihler, one of the leaders of the radical feminist movement in Canada, stated: "Thanks to the feminist movement, the traditional or nuclear family is a goner". The radical feminist lobbyists, supported strongly by taxpayers' money, feel that Governments should put sexual orientation into the human rights code and have abortion on demand. Let us not be fooled by these demands. If we accept their premise, we only destroy the family unit which history has already revealed is the strength of a nation.

When we consider the simple facts, that our population is declining and abortions are increasing, does it not become obvious that we are virtually destroying our own population? Do I dare say, we might even become an endangered species? Let us never forget that civilizations are judged by the way they treat their weakest members. That is why in closing, I take pleasure in moving an amendment to Government Order No. 36, that the motion now under consideration be amended by striking out all the words following "to protect the unborn" and replacing them with the following: "Such legislation should prohibit the performance of an abortion except when two independent qualified medical practitioners have, in good faith and on reasonable grounds, stated that in their opinion the continuation of the pregnancy would, or would be likely to, endanger the life of the pregnant woman.

We have heard excellent speeches from the Hon. Member for Kitchener (Mr. Reimer), the Hon. Member for Surrey—White Rock—North Delta (Mr. Friesen) and the Hon. Member for Grey—Simcoe (Mr. Mitges). I look forward to voting with them and others to protect life in Canada and against the resolution put forward by the Deputy House Leader.

Mr. Raymond Garneau (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, in the few moments during your absence, the rules have been changed somewhat on the matter of amendments. Thank you for this opportunity to speak on this subject which, as you know, is a difficult, complex and in some respects emotional one. It is difficult because of the various tendencies in a multicultural society such as ours where rules are no longer easily found that are widely accepted, especially those involving ethics, lifestyle, education and culture. So, this is a difficult debate, but it is also a complex one, because on whichever side one is, pro-life or pro-choice, it is difficult to draft legislation that is certain to achieve the desired goal, and I think this task is nonetheless an extremely important one for legislators.

While difficult and complex, this debate also is emotional because lives are involved—the lives of unborn infants, and what could be more marvelous in fact than witnessing the birth of a human being, a new baby?

Therefore, the motion on abortion raises a question that is linked to our culture, our religious beliefs, our lifestyle, and in order to find a solution, we must strike a balance between various rights, that of the mother over her own body, that of the foetus which is an unborn baby, its right to live, and the moment during pregnancy where that right takes precedence over that of the mother.

In terms of rights, there is something else we were reminded of recently by certain newspapers. What are the rights of the biological father of the unborn baby?

Mr. Speaker, I would like to state at the outset that I oppose abortion on demand. Such an approach would not answer the questions I raised, the questions raised by this debate on abortion— namely those of balancing the rights of the various parties involved.

Before going any further, I would like to stress that what is before this House is a motion rather than a piece of legislation. I heard colleagues earlier refer to the legislation. There is no legislation before us.

Instead of assuming its responsibilities and presenting the House and the Canadian people with a legislative measure which would have spelled out the fine details of its intentions, the Government—probably intent on avoiding internal dissention within its own membership—chose to throw the whole issue at the House of Commons in a haphazard approach. No bill, no leadership in terms of ideas and guidance for the Canadian nation. So here we are debating this motion, and once we all have had our say the problem will still be with us because no legislation will have been enacted. We will still be empty-handed, trying to cope with the Criminal Code or the provisions which the Supreme Court of Canada struck down because they are ultra vires. Nothing will have been solved, we will simply have talked about the issue for a while. Undoubtedly this will enable the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) to go on the hustings and claim that the question has been debated in the House of Commons. But his Government—this Conservative Government—will have done absolutely nothing to find a solution to a problem which the Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn) described as a priority which had to be dealt with at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. Speaker, I had to say that, because I still think that Quebecers and other Canadians, men and women both, will be under the impression that this debate has solved the problem. Far from it.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, drafted as it is the motion under consideration would not stand the test of court action and a reference to the Supreme Court. What did the Supreme Court have to say in its January 28 judgment? For all practical purposes it stated that Criminal Code Section 251 which provides that the uninterrupted pregnancy of a woman would probably endanger her life or health is contrary to Canada's Charter of Rights. And according to Criminal Code Section 251 the decision must be made by a group of physicians, a kind of medical council of at least three doctors appointed by a recognized hospital, and these doctors are allowed to decide whether the mental health of the mother might be endangered if the pregnancy is not brought to an end.

The Supreme Court ruled that this clause was ultra vires because it interfered with the right of a woman to use her own body as she saw fit.

Mr. Speaker, because I heard a great many speeches in this House dealing with the motion before us and suggesting amendments which are exactly consistent with Section 251 of the Criminal Code, I feel that those who moved these amendments should know that the notwithstanding clause in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms should also be used to achieve their goal. Concerning the use of the notwithstanding clause, we should be aware that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn) had indicated that using it was out of the question.

They will have to live with this and the consequences of their actions. All Conservative, Liberal or NDP Members who want to propose such amendments must be willing also to say that they will propose amendments to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, because even by using the notwithstanding clause, such legislation would have a five-year sunset clause, so that every five years, they would have to return to the House, debate and pass the same legislation, failing which it would become ultra vires.

Mr. Speaker, the motion before us is extremely vague and does not define any of the criteria necessary for us to pass judgment. For instance, this motion states in part:

> Such legislation should prohibit the performance of an abortion, subject to the following exceptions:
> When, during the earlier stages of pregnancy: a qualified medical practitioner is of the opinion that the continuation of the pregnancy of a woman would, or would be likely to, threaten her physical or mental well-being; when the woman in consultation with a qualified medical practitioner decides to terminate her pregnancy;

I try to read and understand exactly what this really means. If there is a direct intervention by a physician before the woman may make a decision and that her decision is not contrary to the physician's opinion, we are faced again with Section 251 of the Criminal Code which the Supreme Court ruled ultra vires while replacing the medical board by a physician. Then again, if we assume that, in the third paragraph of the motion before us, the first part does not lead into or precede the second part, we could read that the woman in consultation with a qualified medical practitioner decides to terminate her pregnancy.

In those conditions, can she exercise the freedom of choice called for by the Supreme Court ruling? Such would be the case only if a doctor is of the opinion that her physical and mental well-being is in danger or if the decision can be made by the woman alone. And when I read the English version, Mr. Speaker, things become even more complicated, because the French version reads as follows:

> . . . la femme enceinte, après avoir consulté un médecin qualifié, décide de mettre fin à sa grossesse;

While the English version reads as follows:

• (2140)

[English]

"When the woman, in consultation with a qualified medical practitioner, decides to terminate her pregnancy".

The French version reads as follows:

> . . . la femme enceinte, après avoir consulté . . .

While the English version reads as follows:

[English]

"When the woman, in consultation—"

Which of the two versions, the French or the English, is to take precedence? Will the decision be made by the woman alone or in consultation with her doctor? And what happens if the English version takes precedence and the woman and her doctor are not of the same opinion?

Therefore, the motion before us is extremely vague and, in my opinion, contrary to the Supreme Court's ruling. If we use this motion in a Bill or translate it into a bill, I think we open the door to another court challenge and a resumption of the debate while the matter goes back to the Supreme Court.

Mr. Speaker, I will therefore have to vote against the motion because it is far too vague. For instance, what does "in the earlier stages of pregnancy" mean? If the motion were more specific and referred to a certain number of weeks, perhaps I might give this aspect some serious thought. However, when someone refers to "the earlier stages of pregnancy", some people define this as the first 20 weeks or the first 24 weeks, while others say it is the first 12 weeks. Having tabled a motion as vague and as unspecific as this one, was the Government really serious about asking us to speak to this motion as Members of Parliament?

Mr. Speaker, I would like to leave the technical aspects of the motion and get back to the substance. What is the role of the legislator in our modern society? What is our role here in the House? As I see it, we are here to organize a social order, not to impose our personal views, views that I may have as a Catholic, as a citizen of Montreal, or other beliefs, other personal attitudes which I may be prepared to defend outside the House as a private citizen. Mr. Speaker, I am for the protection of life. I could preach all kinds of sermons outside the House of Commons to defend the right to life and try to convince people. If my daughter came and told me she was pregnant, I would certainly try and persuade her not to have an abortion. However, those are my personal beliefs. That is my set of values.

But when I speak in the House, is that what I am supposed to defend? Shouldn't I try to organize our social order instead? That is my perception of the debate we are having today. It's all very well to say, I am against abortion, except in cases of incest or rape. Mr. Speaker, can you imagine how long it would take to prove this before a medical board? Who is going to determine whether a woman was raped? Who will be able to say, in front of whom, in front of which doctor, that it was a case of incest? I think it is too easy to say this.

We can satisfy our conscience. We can act very pro-life, if we happen to hold that position, but between the moment the problem is brought before a physician and the moment there is enough evidence to prove it was incest or rape, the child will already be born. I say we must be realistic. Of course we have an easy time of it. Earlier, I heard another Member say: A woman who doesn't want to be pregnant should realize this before. Before having sexual intercourse, I suppose. But what about the man's responsibility? Why put the entire onus on the woman, who is trapped, while we men can just go home and forget about it! I think it is unfair to look at the problem from that perspective, from the perspective of male morality alone. And what is our morality? To let others, to let women cope with a situation that men have created?

I say that when organizing this social order, we must take into account the position of the woman in this situation, and her desires and rights, but we must also define those rights in relation to the rights of others. I believe that the foetus has a right to life. But at what moment does the foetus exist? After the fourth week or the fifth week? I think we need legal and medical opinions. And then perhaps the rights of the foetus will have to take precedence over the rights of the woman, but there is also the right of the biological father. And there is also, according to the Supreme Court's judgment, the right of the woman to control her own body. I believe that if we want to organize this social order, we cannot do so solely on the basis of one set of values. We live in a society that is extremely pluralistic in its religious beliefs and its attitudes to life.

We have people from different countries. We are evolving into a pluralistic society that is much more permissive than before. Some of my colleagues have quoted the Bible and Scripture. Even if we quoted legal texts from 50 or 60 years ago, there was then a set of values to which 90 per cent of the population subscribed. Today this is no longer possible, and much as I feel at ease in a church and I agree with the bishops who set Catholic morality as a goal, Orthodox Jews set their morality as a goal and other religions set their morality as a goal. But there is a difference between proposing something as a value, which I support, and trying to impose it on those who do not have the same values. Since we live in a pluralist society with different opinions, I think that we have to take account of all these factors in organizing the social order.

That is why, just as I am opposed to free, unrestricted abortion, I believe that the State has the responsibility to consider the various opinions in society and to set a legal framework, not in a vague, imprecise motion like the one the Conservative Government presented, but in a series of precise clauses that would to some extent limit a woman's right, as described by the Supreme Court of Canada, to dispose of her own body and determine when this right takes second place to the right of the unborn child. This must all be put in a legal context. I think that if the motion were more precise, we could perhaps draw some conclusions and positions for the Government, but as it is written, this is impossible. I believe that we must find a solution that certainly at the beginning of a pregnancy allows a woman to exercise some judgement on the future of the foetus she is carrying and to make her own decisions. I find it a pity that such a question must be decided by a majority of men. I would like there to be many more women in this House to help us make that decision. I am not ready to blame women who, in their conscience and because of the environment in which they live, decide to have an abortion.

In this House, we have all seen examples of families in our neighbourhood where such things have happened. I find it easy to make very impassioned speeches, but who is ready to jail a woman for deciding to have an abortion at the beginning of her pregnancy? I am not prepared to do that and that is why I ask those on the extremes, either pro-life or pro-choice, to be a little more reasonable in their approach and to distinguish between one's own deeply held beliefs and the organization of our society. Personally, as a legislator, my choice is to let women at the beginning of a pregnancy be free to choose, but I also say that the State has a responsibility to set limits for this freedom and that we must be presented not with a vague motion that goes nowhere but with a legal text, a Bill, that would enable not only Members of this House but all Canadians, men and women, to judge the value of the proposals contained in it, not just a vague motion of principle like the one in the resolution we have before us.

Mr. Ricardo Lopez (Châteauguay): Mr. Speaker, I too am pleased to rise today on the motion before us which deals with a very controversial and stirring issue. Of course, a matter as important as this one deserves much consideration and must be dealt with not emotionally but with wisdom and most of all with a cool head.

I cannot agree with the Hon. Member for Laval-des-Rapides (Mr. Garneau) who, earlier, criticized the Government for having brought forward too vague a motion that will not necessarily become law if it is adopted.

Considering the complex and controversial nature of the issue, we will have to take as much time as we need to understand it fully and to have consultations, seek legal advice and other views likely to enlighten us to arrive at a more appropriate conclusion. To pass a motion or legislation hastily would seem to me a shunning of responsibilities, particularly on a matter of such enormous, vital importance.

Mr. Speaker, of course, I too am against abortion. I am sure that all Canadian men and women are against abortion. But we must not close our eyes, because there are times in life when decisions must be taken, and it is never easy especially on an issue as crucial as this one.

I am sure any woman who makes the painful decision to get an abortion, and I am referring to the physically and mentally painful aspects of it, does not do so with a light heart and takes that decision because she finds herself in a situation she considers desperate, she sees no end to the tunnel and no other way out.

I also believe, Mr. Speaker, that before judging women who get abortions, we must rather judge ourselves as Parliamentarians and as a government.

It is obvious that the Government has a social responsibility. We often hear that, in some cases, when women reach the very sensitive and painful decision to get an abortion, it is due to a lack of resources. In the old days, it could have been because they were judged too harshly and condemned by society. Today women think that they want children, but cannot afford to raise them. So they decide not to bear children who might be victimized.

This is an economic issue which should not necessarily prevail over morals. But things being what they are, we cannot change every Canadian's mentality.

It seems to me that, in such circumstances, the Government should design programs to aid women, particularly single parents, poor women and homemakers.

I would be very happy to see and vote for a piece of legislation giving a salary to women who stay home to care for their children. I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that if such a law were enacted, the abortion problem would be greatly reduced. If we could at that point have support for women in need, financial support of course as well as moral help and support, I believe the scourge or problem of abortion could be significantly reduced.

• (2200)

A lot of money is spent on other things, things that of course are often legitimate and acceptable, but in my view, Mr. Speaker, the most important thing, the most valuable institution in this country is still the family. And in this case, since it is the most important in my view, I believe it should be the priority for our Government. The priority of helping women who support and contribute to this country, who raise children, who work very hard to conceive them, to bring them up, and who are often considered careerless, lacklustre, some even say insignificant because they link a person's worth to a career or a high standard of living, and of course a woman who spends her life at home rearing children cannot at the same time have a career, she cannot go into business and earn a high income either.

Therefore, the sad thing about our society is that we pass judgment on those women, and we may be unfair to them.

Therefore, before we pass judgment on women, of course, I too do not accept that a girl or woman of any age be put in prison because she decided to get an abortion. All we would then be doing is trading one wrong for another. This would not solve the problem.

We should first provide women who find themselves in the difficult situation of having to make such a hard choice with an alternative. After providing them with the alternative support they deserve, I think then the Government perhaps should bring in much tougher legislation to deter some women from using abortion as a contraceptive method. This would be sad. My concern is that some might ultimately do that.

This is why I oppose abortion, because my concern is that some individuals could abuse that right if it were unrestricted.

So I hope, Mr. Speaker, that today's exercise will raise our consciences, will bring out the ideas and the issues and will lead us to reflect further and to seek expert advice.

After this conscience-raising debate, we will be in a much better position to present an excellent and real piece of legislation, which, of course, will have to be precise, and yet take into account the situation. We must not forget today's reality. We must not forget that we too often tend to be judgmental. These are victims in our society. Therefore, before passing judgment, I think we must encourage them through our own attitude.

I keep saying that, before judging a woman, we must offer alternatives in the form of assistance and, of course, a salary for the woman who has children, a measure which has long been hoped for. As a matter of fact, last week, I submitted a questionnaire to my constituents and it appears that a large percentage of the population is in favour of such a measure. Such a measure could get these women out of a distressing situation, confined as they are at home and unable to see any alternatives except through prostitution or even, when they are pregnant, by asking for an abortion, although we may not agree. But as a result of the situation they are stuck in without any possibility of getting out of they feel compelled to take such an unfortunate action.

Mr. Speaker, we should start by asking the question ourselves and the exercise we are involved in now is a step in that direction: we should adopt an attitude which is more fair, equitable and understanding toward these women who sometimes, because of their situation, are compelled to make decisions which they often regret afterwards, and we will end up with legislation to prevent some people from abusing the situation.

Often women have tried, and this is the reason I am against abortion, having heard during the public hearings which we held last year throughout Canada from a great many women who came and told us individually: "I tried on several occasions to get an abortion, but I failed. Finally, with time, I decided to accept this notion as a fact and to keep my baby." They are telling us today: "I am glad I kept my baby." This should silence those who claim that an unwanted child will be an abused child and that the wanted and planned child is a happy and well treated one. Such is not the case, Mr. Speaker.

Now thanks to planning, families can have the number of children they want when they want them, etc., to the point where they can even determine the sex.

If that were the case there would be no mistreated children today. But unfortunately the contrary is true. There are more and more of them. So it is not because the child was planned, wanted, hoped for. There is no guarantee that the child will be well treated. None at all. Just like the opposite is also true. Nor is it because at the outset a woman did not want to become pregnant and did not want to bear a child. It does not necessarily mean either that the child will be mistreated. He will probably be the most loved. I know some cases which attest to this. And it does not prove either that the child will not grow up to be an outstanding citizen, perhaps even the kind of good Parliamentarian we really need.

So, Mr. Speaker, for me this is an opportunity to reflect upon the issue and I urge all my colleagues to give serious consideration to this matter, and either of the two extreme positions which might be proposed or adopted seem totally unreasonable to me. I think that free abortion on request at any time for any woman is a cop out which I cannot accept. But there is the other extreme view that abortion should never be considered under any circumstances, and again I must express disagreement. It seems to me there should be a way to reach a compromise somewhere, and I leave it to the experts to shed more light on the issue, but there must be a middle course which all Canadian men and women would find acceptable.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, July 26, 1988

The House continued its sitting.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, let me begin by saying that I fully realize and am cognizant of the fact that most of what can be said about the issue of abortion in Canada has been said in this debate. However, I think it behooves every Member of the House of Commons to take the opportunity to express his or her own views on the issue of abortion, for the benefit of their constituents and all other Canadians who are willing to listen to that expression of views.

In order to express my views, for the records of the House of Commons, and anybody else who is interested enough to review them, let me begin by examining the motion placed before the House of Commons. Basically, the Government in this motion has asked the House of Commons in Parliament to achieve a balance between the right of a woman to liberty and security of her person and the responsibility of society to protect the unborn.

I think that that is a laudable goal, but I am afraid that it is not the issue that now exists in Canada. I say that because we are here debating this matter simply because we cannot bring Canadians to a consensus on this issue. Even though the Government and Members of the House of Commons may try to be even-handed, may try to come down the middle of the road, there are in fact two totally different views with respect to abortion in Canada, that is to say, there are groups of people who have banded together on one side or the other of the issue and demand that their view be accepted. That is the problem we face. Coming down the middle of the road is not the solution. It is indeed the problem because too many Canadians will not accept that approach to the issue of abortion.

Quite frankly, and contrary to the resolution, I think the House of Commons and the Government of Canada and every other person must take a position and then be judged on that position. It may seem difficult, it may even be cruel in the circumstances of a real and growing and living society, but it is the fact of the matter, in my view.

What am I talking about? I am talking about the pro-life view or anti-abortion view on the one hand and the pro-choice or the individual right of the woman on the other hand. How do you rationalize those two opposing views? We are here because the Supreme Court of Canada failed to rationalize those two views. If an individual looks at the decision of the Supreme Court in the Morgentaler case, one might say that the judges of the Supreme Court in some cases were Solomon-like in their decision. They looked at the two opposing views, that is the right of the mother and the right of the unborn, and tried to make a compromise between those two connected but in a sense different views.

I recall specifically that Madam Justice Bertha Wilson, in expressing her judgment, took that kind of Solomon-like approach by saying simply, here we have a problem, it relates to the termination of pregnancy, so what we will do is look at the whole of that pregnancy and in fact cut it off in the middle. On the one side we will say pro life or preservation of life in the later stages, and on the other side we will say the right of the mother to terminate the pregnancy in the earlier stages.

That obviously represented an attempt similar to what Solomon did in the famous case involving cutting the baby in half and looking for the real mother to object. Unfortunately, that view has not, in my opinion, been accepted by a great majority of Canadians. They do not believe in compromise on the issue. That is the problem we have to face. If compromise could be achieved, if Canadians could come to a consensus on the issue, then the difficulty would dissipate. Therefore, let us not put that aside. The choice has to be made between the two opposing disparate positions.

As I said, Madam Justice Wilson tried to deal with it, and our problem is that that decision is not accepted by a great many Canadians. The solution is not to rely on the Supreme Court of Canada decision. The solution lies in Parliament making a decision.

What can Parliament decide? Is the House of Commons capable of rendering a decision on the issue of abortion? That leads me to a review of the current situation.

In 1982, Members of this House of Commons, with the consent and concurrence of nine of the 10 provincial Premiers, adopted the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. That Charter contained very specific provisions. I do not recall, when I attended here on Parliament Hill in the presence of Her Majesty the Queen at the signing of the Charter, anyone standing up and saying: Do not sign the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. There was almost unanimous support for the Charter, although there were some very important objections.

However, the point is that we made the Charter of Rights and Freedoms the law of Canada, and now we must live with its provisions. One of those provisions grants to individual Canadians rights which the Supreme Court of Canada, I think quite properly, has interpreted as meaning in the case of a pregnant woman the right to terminate a pregnancy in certain circumstances and at a certain point in time.

I do not quarrel with the adoption of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I certainly do not quarrel with the Supreme Court of Canada's interpretation of it. However, that allows us to look only at what our law-making power is in the Parliament of Canada, and that is to enact criminal laws. Indeed, that lies at the heart of the Supreme Court decision in the Morgentaler case involving Section 251 of the Criminal Code of Canada.

It is worthwhile reminding Parliamentarians that that provision of the Criminal Code made it an offence for a mother to have an abortion and it was punishable by imprisonment for two years. In the case of other persons involved in an act of abortion it was an indictable offence punishable by imprisonment for life. That is what the Supreme Court of Canada was looking at.

I think some people will understand that such a law was questionable. Some people would wonder whether that was the right approach to what is basically a social problem. Therefore, we should not be too critical of the Supreme Court of Canada when they tackled this problem of Section 251 of the Criminal Code and the extreme punishment that was imposed in certain circumstances on those involved in abortion. It is understandable that the law was questioned.

Therefore, what can Parliament do, having received the judgment of the Supreme Court? There are two things it can do, in my opinion. The first is to enact a new provision of the Criminal Code that does not violate the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Second, if Parliament is determined to abolish abortion or restrict it more than the previous law did, then we must seek an amendment to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. All Members of the House know that that involves concurrence of the provinces under the current formula, which is seven provinces representing 50 per cent of the population.

It is very clear. If you want to change the abortion law in Canada from the current void that exists following the decision of the Supreme Court, you have to enact a new provision of the Criminal Code because that is the only power Parliament has with respect to abortion.

Second, if you are not satisfied that a criminal law of less force and effect than Section 251 is sufficient, then we must have an amendment to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. That, simply stated, is why I object to the resolution we have before us. It does not address either of these problems. It does not make clear what the change in the Criminal Code would be, and it does not even deal with the matter of a possible amendment to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

I think it is a terrible flaw in the motion that it does not mention punishment. We are talking about criminal law which means offences and punishment. Every Canadian should know that if we pass judgment on this motion, we should be condemning people involved in abortion to imprisonment or some other punishment.

I am not saying that that is wrong. Indeed, that is what criminal law provisions are all about, but let us have it in the motion. The great crime in Canada is that 60,000 and more abortions take place each year, with the consequences we have all heard described. Is the alternative to place 60,000 women in jail? Do we want to stop abortions by punishing those who have abortions with jail terms?

I do not know what the people of Canada want. I have not got a clue. I have heard submissions made to me from both sides. I know there is a real concern about the right to life and the pro-life movement. I accept that and understand it. However, what are the alternatives? That is what we have to face.

I do not believe that this resolution helps us face the real problem. That is why I introduced in the House of Commons last Monday a new private Member's Bill, Bill C-312, which proposes an Abortion Law Interim Measures Act. That Bill spells out very clearly that abortion is an offence punishable by two years' imprisonment, but there is an exception. If an abortion is medically necessary and that is certified by a medical practitioner, there is no offence. Indeed, if a woman who believes her life is in danger and that an abortion is medically necessary has one but does not have access to medical assistance of the kind described in the provision, then there is also no offence.

One of the complaints and concerns of the Supreme Court of Canada was that the previous law did not fall equally upon all Canadian women. Those who had easy access to medical practitioners and hospitals could comply with the provisions, and other expectant mothers who did not want to carry their children to full term did not have that kind of access. That meant an inequality in the law that in effect destroyed the law from within. Its failure to provide for equal application across Canada to all Canadians made it invalid in the eyes of the Supreme Court. I do not think anyone can blame the Supreme Court for coming to that conclusion because if there is one thing to which we all subscribe, and I defy anyone to deny this, it is the equality of all Canadians before the law. Once we see on the face of a law a failure to observe equality, then the law is worthless.

Through my Bill, I have tried to overcome the objection that the provision of the Criminal Code under Section 251 was unequal in its application. I have also dealt with the second point, which is that we can enact a criminal law and we can also seek an amendment to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms to protect the unborn. If we are not willing to seek an amendment to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms to protect the unborn, then we are not serious about doing anything about abortion law in Canada. Through the simple expedient of amending the Charter of Rights and Freedoms by extending it to include the unborn, we can enact a law that protects the foetus.

Historically, and I do not think anyone will deny this, a distinction was made under Canadian law, and under the British law on which our law is based, that until a child was born, the child had no rights under the law. Indeed, in the Criminal Code of Canada, there are offences like infanticide, which is when a child is killed at birth. There are offences like concealing a child and failing to provide assistance at childbirth. It is clearly understood that until a child is born, under the law of Canada, the child has no rights.

We have faced this problem in the law for literally centuries. We have faced it in Canada since Confederation, and before that it has been faced by British law. Therefore, we are talking about a very substantive change in the law if we want to protect the unborn child, and we need a constitutional amendment to do so. I am sure the officers of the Department of Justice understand that. I am sure that that is the advice they would give to those who say that they want a law that protects the unborn to the extent that some Hon. Members have mentioned.

The only way we will get such an amendment to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms is by going to the provinces and obtaining their concurrence to such a change. That is exactly what I have provided for in my Bill. I have provided that upon the enactment of the legislation I have proposed, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) would have to convene a conference of First Ministers to deal with the matter of a change in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms or, alternatively, introduce it as a priority item at a conference of First Ministers. If the Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn) is so asked, he would prepare an amendment to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms that would achieve that purpose.

Let me make what I am saying abundantly clear. If we are to deal with abortion in the manner indicated by a great many Members, that is to say if we are to have greater protection for the lives of the unborn and assurance that abortions will be performed only in very extreme circumstances, then we must have a change to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. We must have a constitutional base for a law. Otherwise, we are restricted to the kind of law that I have proposed in the Bill I have introduced, Bill C-312 which has been entitled the Abortion Law Interim Measures Act.

My solution to the problem is to have legislation before the House and to seek a constitutional amendment. Of course, we must recognize all the time that if a constitutional amendment cannot be achieved, if the House of Commons and the Senate of Canada with all its lofty deliberations refuses to amend the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, if Parliament approves an amendment but the provinces do not concur, then we have to recognize that we cannot change the abortion law of Canada in the substantial way that many Canadians and indeed many Members of this House seek. That is the issue and let us deal with it. Let us not hide behind resolutions.

Let me end by simply reading into the record the statement of Archbishop James M. Hayes, President of the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops. He said:

The Government has introduced a Motion that proposes the totally unacceptable gestational approach for a new Canadian abortion law.

The position of the Catholic Church is that human life begins at conception and must be valued, respected and safeguarded from the beginning.

To a degree, this is an exercise in futility. Neither those who try to achieve protection for life like the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops, nor the people who believe in freedom of choice and the status quo, will accept this resolution with whatever amendments may be made. I would like to see Bill C-312 or some similar legislation passed, and I wash my hands of this resolution.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, none of us feels comfortable with being required to engage in this debate. I think it is an example of one of those situations in which Members of Parliament or of any legislature often find themselves, which is that they have to take a position and make their position known. There are times when one cannot be whipped from one side or the other by one's electorate. One must express one's view on the basis of one's philosophical, moral, and ethical point of view. I must say that I was disappointed in the intervention just made by my hon. colleague across the way. He pointed out that there are two quite different opinions on the issue. He said that there could be no compromise, then proceeded to take both sides. I hope that I will not be a victim of that approach.

We have entered into this debate tonight because the Supreme Court, almost exactly six months ago, handed down a decision which, on the basis of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms threw out Section 251 of the Criminal Code which regulates abortions in Canada. In so doing it once again posed the dilemma of reconciling divergent, often polarized opinions among Canadians.

There are very many Canadians, and I was among them, who did not see that decision as a victory of the enlightened over those of darkness. It was not a victory, in my view, for abortion on demand, and it was not an occasion for those on either side to regard the others as either stupid or unprincipled because they did not share these views of the polarized factions in this debate.

This is a significant issue to all Canadians. It is an issue of great controversy, an issue of great disagreement, an issue which tests Parliamentarians and tests the Government, a test which the Government fails by the very nature of its response.

We are given a resolution, which I will discuss in a moment, which may or may not be adopted, which promises legislation as a result of the outcome of this debate. Yet, we know that what we are involved in here is a charade. It is another example of the failure of the Government to live up to its responsibilities, another example of a Government which, in failing to live up to its responsibilities, would like to fool the Canadian people into believing that it is doing something of significance.

What is going to happen to whatever comes out of this deliberation? If this resolution is passed, what will happen to it? Is the Government going to introduce legislation before the end of this Parliament? I do not think there is anyone in this country who seriously believes that there will not be an election before this matter is resolved. Therefore, why bother?

The only appropriate action for which the Government had plenty of time was to introduce legislation, to take responsibility, to take the knocks of having acted as a Government should, and bring forth legislation which could be discussed in detail and which would provide Canadians with an understanding of where they stood. Most important, the Government should have attempted to reconcile the divergent views in this country which must be reconciled.

We have basically two quite polarized, divergent positions on abortion which have been clearly identified in debate. There is, on the one hand, the pro-life position and, on the other, the pro-choice position. The Member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby) indicated that virtually all Canadians are on one side or the other and, indeed, must be on one side or the other.

His experience indicates that that is so. My experience indicates the contrary. My experience indicates that the great majority of Canadians would like to see a position somewhere in between those two extremes, because they are extremes.

As I have said before, this matter divides Canadians on the basis of deeply held religious and philosophical convictions. Our task is to resolve this problem, to produce legislation which is permissive, and to produce legislation which does not compel anyone to act counter to their religious or philosophical beliefs.

Let us examine those two sets of beliefs. On the one hand we have the pro-life position, most clearly, but not exclusively, articulated by the Catholic Church. It is beautiful in its consistency and not open to attack, and I am not here to attack it. That position is that we have, at every period of gestation, from the moment of conception, a human life itself.

That position argues that there really is no distinction between the potential for human life and human life. That is not a position which St. Thomas Aquinas, St. Augustine, Aristotle, or even the Catholic Church until a little over 100 years ago, accepted. It was clear to the philosophers in that church, and to others, that there was a biological distinction to be made between an embryo, an early foetus, and a fully developed human being. Separate from such considerations, as an almost life-long biologist, I am convinced, because the evidence is clear, that there is a distinction between an embryo and an infant that has the characteristics of a human being defined by St. Thomas Aquinas as a rational being, a being which can exist independently and is capable of thought.

However, that is the position of the pro-lifers, that life in its potential is equivalent to human life and that its consistency extends, not only to the point of conception but beyond because it accords to the egg and the sperm equivalent respect. That is the basis for opposition to artificial methods of birth control. This is a belief deeply held by many Canadians and they are offended, as their beliefs would have them be offended, by any attack on that which they define as human life.

On the other hand, we have those who represent the pro-choice position. They are conscious of the many instances in which women have been driven to have abortions and the very many situations in which such abortions are justified, and cognizant of the imposition, mainly by males, upon the abilities of women to make decisions. This is the position which has been described as abortion on demand. It has been interpreted far too much on the basis that that kind of position means the trivialization of life.

I have difficulty with the pure pro-choice point of view when it is expressed exclusively in terms of the need of a woman to have complete control over her body. Surely it is possible to argue that in certain circumstances and over a period of time during gestation that can be true, as the Supreme Court at least recognized in terms of the judgment of Justice Bertha Wilson who pointed out that there ought to be increasing restrictions depending upon the stages of development. What is offensive to me in the free-choice position, justified exclusively on the basis of a woman's control of her own body, is that the question of reproduction is not simply a question of the decision of an individual at all stages. It cannot be.

Reproduction of humankind is not just a question for the individual; it is a question for humanity. As Justice Wilson recognized, it must include some consideration of the interest of society in general as it is expressed by the state. Therefore, neither position is acceptable to me.

However, a rational position can be taken and it is, at least in some measure, recognized in this resolution as it was in the judgment of Justice Bertha Wilson. It is to recognize that as development occurs, certainly in the early stages it is appropriate that the decision to abort a foetus be made between a woman and her doctor. It is not abortion on demand; it is abortion on the basis of choice, with full consideration of the health of the woman in consultation with appropriate medical practitioners. That is as it should be during the early period.

Surely it ought to be evident to all that in the later stages of pregnancy there is a fully viable human being, an entity that would be fully viable if born at that stage. Recently, one of my assistants gave birth prematurely to an infant at six and one-half months. Surely it must be clear at that stage that we are dealing with something other than the abortion of a foetus, other than the termination of a pregnancy that does not entail larger values and considerations than abortion normally would in the context of the appropriateness of freedom of choice.

Most European nations have recognized these limits. Most recognize that there should be sharp restrictions on access to abortion at the stage of potential independent viability. The test should be the survival of the mother and other such significant considerations. The question of what to do between the twelfth week and twentieth week should be determined in the deliberations of whatever committee will deal with this resolution. It seems clear to me that the rational position to be taken, which can be justified philosophically and morally, involves free choice during the early stages of pregnancy with increasing limits thereafter, as this resolution proposes. That is the position that the vast majority of Canadians would accept.

I believe it is an indication of the rationality of most Canadians that they have not adopted either of the two extreme positions, however meritorious they may be to those who hold them. We must find a means to reconcile appropriately the diversity of opinion that exists. It cannot be either of the two extremes suggested by the Hon. Member for Halifax West. It must be a compromise position that does not insist that one employ abortion and one that does not exclude it as a medical means to deal with serious problems which we all know necessitate abortion in many instances. When abortion is not available it leads to all kinds of tragedy brought about by illegal abortions.

I am not standing in this House in support of abortion. No pro-choice individual to whom I have talked, nor anyone I know concerned with any part of this issue, likes abortion any more than they like amputation or other severe medical solutions to a medical problem. If we want to eliminate abortion, we should begin to address the circumstances which have led to abortions.

Twenty-three per cent of terminated pregnancies involved teenagers. Teenagers are all too frequently denied advice and counselling on sexual behaviour. According to a study conducted a couple of years ago, teenagers spend an average of two minutes a day talking to their families. We have created an environment in which the family is under the test. We will not solve the problem by banning abortions. We can certainly do a great deal more than we have to prevent unwanted pregnancy, which means information on contraception should be available and young people should be provided with the kind of knowledge about sexual behaviour that they need.

We must do much more to strengthen the family. If we are concerned about the issue of abortion and deal with that problem in the next Parliament, we ought also to address the other significant issues arising with respect to reproduction. These include the new reproductive technologies, the use of foetal tissue for experimental purposes, genetic engineering, and all scientific and technological manipulations that can take place to shape human beings or select the gender of offspring. All these matters are of equal importance to the future of humankind and to the family.

If we ever resolve this issue, I hope we will also address the other considerable problems that technology presents to the future of humankind as we know it, and the future of society as we would like to have it.

[Translation]

Mr. André Plourde (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup): Mr. Speaker, let me start my speech against abortion by quoting His Holiness John Paul II: "Life must be defended from the moment of conception against everything that threatens it, such as famine and war; it must be cured of anything that weakens or dishonours it, such as illness, alcohol and drug abuse; it must be protected from anything that debases it, such as violence, sub-human living conditions, degrading working conditions and so many ills of that kind." And the Holy Father, at the end of a 10-day trip in the United States, in September 1987, thanked Vice President George Bush with these words: "The final test of your greatness is the way you treat each human being, particularly those who are weak and defenceless. Feeding the poor and welcoming refugees, strengthening the social fabric of the nation, encouraging an authentic advancement of women, guaranteeing the rights of minorities, pursuing disarmament while ensuring self-defence, none of that will succeed unless the respect for life and its protection in law are granted to every human being."

• (2250)

Mr. Speaker, the motions put forward when the political climate does not seem to point in that direction, appear illogical, abnormal and inhuman, and contain drastic provisions which would not even be necessary in most cases if we bothered, in this society, to offer serious sex education programs, particularly with regard to contraception. Both matters go hand in hand. If people only hear about abortion, they won't think in terms of contraception and that will lead to abuses tied to a serious act which represents the termination of a human life through barbarous means and should not have its place in a human and civilized society.

Mr. Speaker, to make myself quite clear and illustrate what I just said, I would like to quote an article from a book entitled Les trois menaces à la société contemporaine written by Father Lawrence Abello and published by Mouvement Pro-Vivère inc.. This article called "Victim declared subhuman" reads as follows: "It is no wonder that so many in our society say, without any proof, that the unborn child is not a human being. Throughout history, every time exploiters wanted to kill a group of persons, they claimed that the victims were subhuman. For example, higher castes, slave owners, explorers and Nazis have rationalized that untouchables, slaves, savages and Jews were subhuman, non-persons in the eyes of the law, and therefore did not even have the right to life, which is the foundation of all rights." Because of such de-humanization, the above exploiters in the past could not realize that killing their victims was killing human beings. In the same way, in our present society, many people cannot realize that abortion is murder.

For those who are reluctant to characterize abortion as murder or to compare abortion clinics to communist or Nazi extermination camps, let us look at what happens in abortion clinics.

Mr. Speaker, I will refer to two cases which, morally speaking, are typical of all abortions to the extent that in each abortion an unborn child is killed directly. The only unique feature in both cases was the publicity they enjoyed. The first one is the Waddill case. We must refer to a 1977 court decision in California, followed by another decision in 1978, and the proceedings that led to those decisions. Mr. Speaker, in that case the abortionist replaced part of the amniotic fluid with a salt solution, which not only poisons the system and burns the skin of the unborn child, but also causes its premature expulsion from the womb. The baby girl survived the abortionist's attempt at burning and poisoning her, and also her traumatic and premature expulsion from the womb. Did the baby survive the abortion? In fact, during an hour, half suffocated, she cried after escaping the doctor's attempt at taking her life. Then the doctor returned, caught her by the throat and strangled her to death.

An abortion as we now understand it is not complete so long as the child is not put to death. That abortionist could not claim self-defence or the need to protect a victim from an aggressor. Therefore, from an ethical point of view, how can that abortion be characterized?

Mr. Speaker, that was a direct killing of a harmless human being, that is a human being that threatened nobody's life through a positive act. Even if that type of crime is generally called an abortion, or euphemistically a pregnancy termination or removal of the product of conception, the fact remains it is pure murder.

The other case, Mr. Speaker, is the testimony of a nurse in September 1981 to a Vancouver radio station, CJOR, during a program chaired by the former Minister of Health of British Columbia, Rafe Mair. After attending a hysterectomy abortion, the nurse snatched away the living baby on the abortionist's sterile table in order to baptize him, Mr. Speaker. The abortionist turned to the anaesthetist and shouted: "Did you see that? She snatched my specimen away!" The nurse replied: "I just baptized your specimen Paul."

Mr. Speaker, is not using human beings as guinea pigs before killing them what went on in concentration camps? Let us recall that morally, those abortion cases are no different from any other kind of abortion, either by means of abortives such as drugs and intra-uterine instruments, or by an abortionist who pulls a baby to pieces by means of a vacuum tube, carves it out with a blade or removes the uterine wall to prevent the baby from implanting, the so-called expansion and curettage. He ties up the umbilical cord to suffocate the baby or simply throw the aborted baby into a garbage can where it dies after struggling for a period of between 15 minutes and three hours, etc.

Faced with such cases, Mr. Speaker, any refusal on our part to recognize that abortion clinics today are the equivalent of concentration camps is to deny reality.

Two remarks must be made here: First of all, in the Waddill case, if the physician for instance had strangled the same baby, also prematured, but born in the delivery room across the street from the abortion clinic, he might have been accused of murder instead of being paid for carrying out a medical procedure. Which means that the life of the baby would have protected by the legislation only if someone, perhaps the mother had, wanted it. But to allow any interested person to determine at whim whether or not the baby in question is a human being with the right to live reminds us of Nazi methods.

Mr. Speaker, the Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup riding which I have the honour and privilege to represent in the House is mostly a rural riding. I have made it my duty over the past few years to visit one of the finest counties in Quebec and I have had the opportunity to discuss with groups representing the area, including l'Âge d'or, the AFEAS groups, Maison des femmes, Knights of Columbus, Cercle des fermières, Filles d'Isabelle, and a great many others, and I asked their opinion about such issues as capital punishment and abortion. Mr. Speaker, I often had extraordinary exchanges with fathers and mothers with families of 10, 12, 15 children, sometimes even more, and during a survey I carried out as early as 1985 on the abortion issue, 65 per cent of my constituents were against abortion. Some in all of its forms, others with restrictions.

Mr. Speaker, even more recently, on April 22 last, Mrs. Adrienne Tanguay of Saint-Pascal and Mrs. Gertrude Madore of Kamouraska held a press conference to hand me a petition against abortion signed by 8,016 residents of 18 parishes in the Rivière-du-Loup and Kamouraska regions. They also handed me a similar petition signed by 698 residents of five parishes in the Transcontinental, that is the Pohénégomook region.

These two women, both of whom are mothers and grandmothers, acted spontaneously without the support of an organization, simply bacause they love life, consider abortion to be a crime and believe that it is their duty to defend innocent and defenceless beings, "choosing to act in silence for those who die in silence".

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, the idea that human life must be respected is very important in the long run because of the extremely negative consequences which can occur otherwise. After having been conditioned little by little to accept the idea that the human foetus is nothing more than a sandwich, human beings could very well reach the stage where they seek to destroy themselves more or less unconsciously. Euthanasia would rapidly become, with all its dangerous aspects, another step in this lack of respect for human life. People would then start asking, as in the case of abortion, who must die and when and in the case of which disease and below which IQ or following which emotional reaction.

Mr. Speaker, the role of health professionals and physicians could become dangerously ambivalent since in too many cases they would begin to wonder whether they should treat a disease, save a life, or quite simply end one. The cowboy approach might prevail quickly, and by that I mean it might become very easy to eliminate any individual whose behaviour is frustrating or embarrassing, or whose face one does not like.

The interest of any human being commands respect for one's own life and that of others, and everything begins with the life of the human foetus.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell you the true story of a mother who is glad she said no to abortion. Here it is:

> My baby gave me a reason to live. I was glad I decided to keep my child. My daughter was beautiful and beaming with joy. Her small and warm body made me dream. She was entirely dependent on me and gave me a reason to fight.

After a difficult pregnancy and delivery which required several weeks of rest and hospital care, Marlène finally got her daughter back. She is happy and looks to the future with confidence.

Marlène says:

> I had agreed to live with the father of my child in Quebec City. In the beginning I was proud to have my own daughter, at last. We shared a nice apartment, my friend had a job and I was getting social assistance for myself and my daughter. We had everything to be happy, but we were not. There was a big problem between us. I was never satisfied. I was independent and demanding, and gave little. I no longer wanted to stay with my friend who did not provide financial support since I was independent. Moreover, I was not satisfied with his educating skills for our daughter. So I returned to Jonquière with my daughter where I went back to school.
> It is at that time that I got back in touch with my girl friend Claude. I was really happy to see her and we renewed our friendship. But she seemed different to me. She had changed. During our separation, she had become a Christian and had learned to put her confidence in God. She took me one night to her church and I was really impressed by the atmosphere of the place. I felt at peace. Claude gave me a bible that evening and I started to read. I did not understand everything but I kept on reading.
> Time went by and my little girl was growing up. But as I watched her grow up, I started thinking I had failed in the way I brought her up. This bothered me and it became an obsession. That was when I turned to God to ask Him for His help. When I was reading my bible, I saw in the Old Testament that many problems were due to the fact that people ignored God. My friend Claude also told me that if I talked to God, I could be sure He would listen.

And she concludes as follows:

> I have always been very proud of my daughter. I never regretted keeping my baby and refusing to have an abortion. God has always watched over us. He has always been true.

Marlène maintains that although being a single mother is very difficult, she never regretted keeping her child.

> When she was small, I marvelled . . .

. . . she says, . . .

> . . . at her very presence and at the progress she made. I loved to watch her learn about life. Later on, when times were difficult, her presence meant something to fight for. And often when I felt hurt, her little arms around my neck were a great comfort.
> After my mariage, when we had our other children, my husband and I, she was a great help in taking care of the little ones and their education. We are really very proud of her. Today, she is a lovely young girl of 13 who is a real joy. We could not do without her.

Mr. Speaker, there are thousands of stories like this about women or unmarried mothers who said no to abortion.

Mr. Speaker, in concluding, I ask God to enlighten all Members of this House in this important historic debate, and especially during the vote on Thursday, so that reason may prevail.

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I too am pleased to take part in the debate on a subject that I think is increasingly important. But before getting into the subject, I must tell you that looking at the motion the Conservative Government presented, I must express my disappointment, as my colleagues have done, and I think that Quebecers and Canadians are disappointed with the Conservative Government and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), who lacked the courage to present a Bill.

As we speak, I think many Quebecers are certainly asking themselves questions. Why did the Conservative Government not have the courage six months after the Supreme Court decision to bring in a Bill to amend the Supreme Court decision? Why did the Conservative Government wait until July 26? We will discuss it on July 27, at a time when many people are away on vacation. Why did the Government wait so long to come up with just a motion? Why did the Government only bring forward a motion which, in my opinion, is not sufficiently clear and does not meet the needs of the situation? The Government already failed in its attempt to submit to the House of Commons three options for motions that were only meant to sound out people's opinions. Since the Official Opposition, the NDP and even most Conservative Members disagreed with this approach, Mr. Speaker, we would have thought that the Government would have learned its lesson and that it would have brought us at least a Bill to legislate clearly and precisely on the abortion issue.

Mr. Speaker, all that we have before us are unclear wishes.

● (2310)

The Government's motion reads as follows:

> Such legislation should prohibit the performance of an abortion . . .

I am all for prohibiting abortion.

> . . . subject to the following exceptions:

And then it reads as follows:

> When, during the earlier stages of pregnancy: a qualified medical practitioner is of the opinion that the continuation of the pregnancy of a woman would, or would be likely to, threaten her physical or mental well being;

My first question is: What is meant by "earlier stages of pregnancy"? Two weeks? Three weeks? Four weeks? Ten weeks? Twenty weeks? Mr. Speaker, no one in this House can honestly defend the interests of his or her constituents and vote on such a vague motion.

If one reads well the definition, apart from the imprecise nature of the phrase "earlier stages of pregnancy", the decision is linked to a doctor's decision. On the other hand, the same paragraph states the following:

Then, there is a second attitude. Not only do we not know the duration, according to the Government, but in this case, contrary to the first option which requires that the physician should decide with the pregnant woman whether she should end her pregnancy for physical or mental health reasons, it is the opposite: it is the woman who, after seeing a physician, whatever his decision, may decide to have an abortion. Now, if we look at the English side, the interpretation is different: It is the pregnant woman who, with her physician's agreement, may decide to end her pregnancy.

There is a third option, still in the part which deals with the "early stages of pregnancy" of which we do not know the duration. Is it six months? In this option, the termination is performed by a qualified medical practitioner.

In the second paragraph:

> When, during the subsequent stages of pregnancy:

Again, it is not clear. We do not know what the Government's intentions are. I do not think there is a single Member in this House who is serious about his responsibilities to his constituents who can support such a motion.

Mr. Speaker, I can tell you right away that I will vote against the Government's motion.

When we look at the amendments moved by some Members who are extreme Pro-Life supporters who came to the House and said: Abortion should be permitted only when the physician decides that the very life of the mother is at stake. Or in the case of rape, incest, or other difficulties, perhaps for mental health reasons, following consultation with a physician and at the request of the pregnant woman, the termination of the pregnancy is necessary. Unfortunately, I find that those who support the extreme Pro-Life position lack compassion. Because the decision we have to make today, in addition to our religious belief—a while ago, someone was praying to the Lord who, I think, was always quite generous with women faced with such enormous difficulties, because God would have permitted the termination of the pregnancy for different reasons.

There is the other extreme represented by the Pro-Choice supporters who are promoting abortion. I do not care for this approach at all. I would have liked it better had the Government introduced a Bill stating: We are against free abortion on request. I honestly believe there are not that many Members or that many people in Quebec and in the rest of Canada who favour unrestricted abortion. But it could have been allowed with certain limits for various reasons, limits with respect to the time to make decisions, not partisan decisions but decisions made by people fully conversant with the legal and medical aspects, people who would be able to tell us which month or the number of weeks which would be acceptable.

I would also have liked it if the Government had tabled a Bill and announced a family assistance program, a program to set up clinics, but not the kind of clinics where an individual or a young girl for instance realizes that she is pregnant and thinks that her parents will not want to see their unmarried pregnant daughter, so her companion says: We are too young, we have no money, so the first decision is to say that we have no choice—and this is quite human—we will have an abortion. So she goes to a clinic, something like the Morgentaler clinic, and the attendant for whom this is the only interest, the only way to earn a living, the only employment, says to her: So you came to have an abortion. Well, fill in this form and we will perform the abortion.

I would have preferred to see a Bill where the Government provides for financing clinics jointly with the provinces across Canada. As in the example I just gave you, a young girl or young couple would come to the clinic and explain their situation and ask for advice. However, the decision would still be up to them. And before opting for the most extreme solution, because there may be people who decide to have an abortion because they don't think they would be able to afford a child, perhaps the Government could make provision in the legislation for some kind of financial assistance during the initial years for what we used to call unmarried mothers, if that is still the term used today. The clinic would include social workers and health professionals who could offer a range of choices, and when the girl or the couple go home after two days, they may have decided, although when they first arrived at the clinic they were in favour of an abortion, they may have decided differently because they were initially unaware there was a program that could help them. And there would be a way to explain this to the parents and get them to accept it. And there would also be the question of adoption. There would be several options. And after that, the decision would be up to the woman.

I think it would have been better to have a debate around a Bill, which I think would have had very good results, and we could have proposed some solutions to the problem we are confronted with today, and certain sums of money would have been allocated, and we would not have had a series of good intentions that will be allowed to gather dust until after the election.

Mr. Speaker, I think the Prime Minister of Canada did not have the courage of his convictions. Sad but true, it has been six months since the Conservative Government realized it had to face up to its responsibilities. And it is particularly unfortunate that the Government brought us into this debate near the end, just before an election, and the only reason we are discussing this subject today is as a face-saving measure, to avoid losing any votes.

Mr. Speaker, if the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mulroney) cannot show courage, he does not deserve to lead the Government. Extremists often pretend that senior citizens are all pro-life. But in every constituency, including mine, we find some older people who are totally against abortion and others who understand, who, because they had children and for other reasons, had to get an abortion since it was the only option. People accept it today.

It is no longer a matter of age, but rather a humane approach in my view that a the majority of Quebecers, a majority of Canadian women and Montreal women today share. I believe a majority of the Canadian people support a middle position rather than either of the two extremes.

It is not a strict matter of principles, namely that a woman's body is involved and the decision is hers. Because it will be a man's body and the decision will be his—if one decides to take one's own life, one will take one's own life. And it is not strictly a matter of pro-life.

Therefore, at the other extreme, independent from the moral implications for families, those who maintain, and I base my reasoning . . . if we now look at the trend toward child-parent reunion, what we see on television or in newspapers, reunion associations, mothers who 20 or 30 years ago, for various reasons, were forced to abandon their child . . . and as we remember, what 30 years ago being an unwed mother was like . . . but today, this is accepted and there is a very generous realization, nobody turns away anymore, but 30 years ago matters were different.

If we look at all those persons who are interviewed, they did not decide alone. It was not the mother's decision, it was a choice forced upon her by her parents, thinking . . . my intention is not to hark back in order to blame anyone, I am simply recalling those facts in order to show people who believe that today the free choice is strictly that of the woman, she would decide—I believe that this could happen today and that in the absence of specialist advice we would see today what we saw 25 or 30 years ago. Abortions would be forced upon young girls against their will by their parents, or a husband or spouse, having decided not to have an unwanted child, would force his wife or spouse into abortion where she would have decided otherwise.

Therefore I prefer to check—and I understand how couples in a difficult situation could turn to abortion first.

But I go back to the importance of having clinics that are not exclusively abortion clinics but rather family counselling and planning clinics where health professionnals would soon discover that an abortion was not the first choice nor the decision of a wife, a spouse, a pregnant woman who had yielded to pressures from her husband or her companion and had come to the clinic, but when she got there, those professionals could perhaps give her advice and suggest ways to convince her companion that the pregnancy would be a happy experience and that the birth of the child might bring much more joy than anticipated.

So, Mr. Speaker, I again raise these questions and I would hope that the Prime Minister or the Minister of Justice will answer tomorrow. I have two minutes left. Why did the Government wait six months after the Supreme Court judgement to react? After it tried to present three motions and most Members refused to take a stand on them, saying that they wanted a clear and precise Bill, why did the Government again present us with just a motion, one that is imprecise and that no Member of Parliament can accept? Why does the Government bring such an important subject up for discussion on July 26 or 27? Why did the Government not wait for the session to resume in September, if it did not want to call an election immediately? Why have this sham discussion, which is what I think it is? Perhaps on Thursday morning, if one listens to the speeches and follows what people are saying . . . I have not heard most Members who have spoken say that they would vote for the Government's motion.

So it is possible that we will wake up on Thursday to find that the Government's motion has been beaten, that the amendments from the various groups have been defeated, and that we are right back where we started. And the Government knew very well that this was a possibility, because among those who have spoken against the motion and condemned the Government's behaviour are Liberals, New Democrats and Conservatives.

So, Mr. Speaker, I conclude, my time is up. But tomorrow, I would like either the Prime Minister, who I think has lacked courage, or the Minister of Justice to answer the questions that I asked them.

[English]

Mr. Elliott Hardey (Kent): Mr. Speaker, before entering debate on this issue, which I think is the most important issue facing Canadians today, I want the House to hear the observations of Mother Teresa, recipient of the Nobel Peace Prize in 1979. She said that the nations with legalized abortions are the poorest of nations. She said that it took centuries for our civilizations to recognize a legal personhood of blacks, with the right to equal protection of the law. She said that it took a decision of the Privy Council in 1929 to determine that a woman was a legal person and therefore eligible for appointment to the Senate. She said that surely the time had come for Canadians and Canadian leaders, with a large revision of human rights, to recognize the unborn, the weakest, the most helpless of mankind, who have no less a claim to freedom and equality and logically the right to live.

This debate must not be treated lightly. The argument presented today and in the following days will be seriously considered when a law to replace that which was struck down by the Supreme Court of Canada is brought forward later this year. It is my intention in the time allotted to me to present arguments based on facts and common sense and in harmony with our Constitution and the Charter of Rights.

I find that I cannot support the motion in front of this House without amendment. My position is that abortion should only be permitted when two independent and qualified medical practitioners have, in good faith and on reasonable grounds, stated that in their opinion the continuation of the pregnancy would likely endanger the life of the pregnant woman, or seriously and substantially endanger her health. Grounds for such opinion would not include (a) the effective stress or anxiety which may accompany an unexpected or unwanted pregnancy and (b) social economic considerations. I will support the motion as amended in this matter, and I appreciate the opportunity to participate in a free vote on the question.

How can we move into this debate on the question of legal abortions in Canada, without first, and absolutely first, considering the rights of the unborn? I continue to be astounded by the fact that in spite of well-known advances in medical technology and observations of the foetus in early stages, the rights of women were the only rights considered by the judges in the decision last January 28. It is puzzling, to say the least, why the majority of Supreme Court judges believed they should not have to consider the question of the rights of the unborn in the Morgentaler case. If there is a constitutionally guaranteed right to life, then the Supreme Court will have countenanced the death of countless unborn children because it struck down the only law providing any protection of that right. It would clearly have been preferable for the court to address the constitutional right of the unborn, possibly hearing both cases and then rendering a simultaneous judgment.

By the way, one might also ask why men have been legally, psychologically and medically bypassed at a time when they are changing roles and becoming increasingly involved in raising their children. Yet they are systematically denied the right to be involved in life or death decisions affecting their unborn children.

Somewhere in this debate we must ask this question, and indeed we will end this debate by answering it. At what stage of embryonic or foetal development does a child become sufficiently like the rest of us to earn the right to life even if the mother wishes otherwise? Such discussion is rendered difficult by the fact that there is no qualitative difference between someone who is conceived a week ago and someone who was conceived 70 or 80 years ago. To distinguish, you must have to invent some arbitrary line based not on morals or principle but on size or appearance. No matter where you draw your imaginary line, the decision nonetheless affects a distinct and defenceless human life.

The question that simply has to be answered is: When does life begin? Madam Justice Bertha Wilson noted in her decision that the state's interest in the unborn child could not in any circumstances be paramount in the early stages of pregnancy, and that a differential abortion policy with a time limit in the second trimester is in operation in a number of countries, and the examples given were the Soviet Union, China, and some Eastern European countries.

Certainly I cannot accept that line of reasoning. Medical advances and common sense make it absolutely clear that the foetus in the second trimester is the very same human being that it is in the first trimester. We must refrain from supporting measures which fail to give the unborn full legal protection from the moment of conception. The fundamental right to life must always be in place and only put under consideration when the life of the mother is in jeopardy.

The eventual law we are seeking will have to deal with possible conflicts of rights of mother and child, for once we recognize the unborn as children or human beings or people then we are back to the Charter, and under the Charter lives of people or persons are protected. Surely if there is a conflict between the rights of mother and child, the right to life is primary.

There can be no quick fix of this complex issue, but the country's whole future is at stake and time is of the essence. Since Section 251 of the Criminal Code was struck down, the Ontario Government has taken the most sweeping and liberal approach possible. Almost immediately the Ontario Minister of Health, Elinor Caplan, announced that therapeutic abortion committees would be abolished and that the provincial health plan would fund abortions whether they were conducted in hospitals or doctors' offices or in clinics such as the Toronto facility operated by Doctor Morgentaler. We are now in a state of complete abortion on demand at any stage and this is not only disturbing, it is frightening and totally unacceptable.

I realize there is no doubt that many women consider abortions because of social as well as economic pressures. No one can ignore the terrible agonizing effect on the women who find themselves carrying an unwanted child. Many of these women are abandoned by their families and sometimes by the father of the child. I am aware of the problems that would result if an abortion were denied to these women, and much work needs to be done by society to assist in this area. By that I mean assisting in sex education, planned parenthood, as well as finding homes for unwanted children.

However, the results of abortion and the agonizing effect on so many women, both physically and mentally, are equally important and as common. I am in no position to criticize the medical profession, but I have often wondered about doctors and surgeons taking so much time with a patient who is about to undergo any kind of treatment or surgery other than therapeutic abortions. They will explain with pictures and sketches and drawings exactly what the patient will be subjected to during that treatment or surgery. Every detail of the operation is explained and even what are expected to be the feelings experienced during the period of recovery.

Yet I am told over and over again that none of this is explained to women who enter an abortion clinic. Afterwards, the stark reality of what really took place begins to come about. So many people experience guilt and depression beyond their ability to cope partly because the unborn child was denied humanity, or that he or she was denied a grave or a grave marker, and the grieving process is left unfinished. Worse still is finding out later what the doctor or the abortionist really physically did to the child.

I will not go into it further, but it is a fact that much or more social work to assist in repairing the mental anguish after an abortion will be needed if abortions continue unchecked. The amount of assistance required to control and assist with unwanted pregnancies in ways other than abortion or killing an unwanted child needs to be found.

We as legislators have a duty and responsibility, and it would be all too convenient for us to avoid this controversial issue by insisting our hands are tied by the Supreme Court. That is not true. On reading the judgments one clearly finds that a fairly restrictive abortion law would be constitutionally acceptable. Parliament can indeed adopt another system to assure that the life or health of the pregnant woman is endangered before an abortion is permissible. That system, according to the judgments, could include a requirement that the danger be verified by a reliable and medically sound opinion of a person or persons other than the pregnant woman's own physician. A majority of the judges would uphold a criminal law that restricts access to abortion from conception to situations where there is an independently verifiable danger to the pregnant woman's life or health.

There are, therefore, a number of legal options available to Parliament to protect the rights of the unborn, and in the wake of the Morgentaler decision, even without resorting to the power to override certain sections of the Charter granted by Section 33. It is my opinion, indeed the opinion of most people in my riding of Kent, that we must consider these options and replace the law quickly and decisively, considering the right to life of the unborn child.

Abortions in Canada must be controlled. Any caring society must find ways to give both mother and child the right to life and the freedom to live well.

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to take part in this very important debate. It is an opportunity to explain to my constituents of Broadview—Greenwood and to all who are taking part in the debate nation-wide where I stand on this issue.

I must begin by saying that I find that the labels pro-life and pro-choice both present difficulties. In my philosophic approach, I am very much shaped by the fact that I am a Christian believer in a religion which teaches me a sense of reverence for life and a belief in the purpose of creation. However, I have been a woman involved in the women's movement for so many years that I have a very strong sense of the desperation of women with unwanted pregnancies and of the need to have legal access to abortions.

I certainly respect the ideals of those in the pro-life movement. I certainly respect their vision as well. In a good society, there would not be recourse to abortion. In a better society than the one in which we live today, there would be no unwanted pregnancies. I think there are many practical ways we could work to achieve that.

When our friends in the pro-life movement say that they want a law which respects human life from the moment of conception until death, I have to respond as a practical legislator by saying that it cannot be done. Such a law, if passed by Parliament, would simply not be respected in practice. Many illegal abortions would occur. There would be test cases and we would have another Morgentaler-type clinic. A case would go to court and I think a jury would, as in the past, decide that medical necessity prevails and we would see that law thrown out as unconstitutional.

Very severe laws mean that women will seek illegal abortions. There will be botched abortions and people will go back to the back street butchers. We know that that results in infertility and suicides in some cases. We do not want to go back to those days.

As legislators, we can promote the choice for women to carry their children to term. We can do this in practical ways. We can ensure that there is adequate child care and that there is parental leave which will make it possible for parents to welcome a new addition to the family. We can see that there will be support for single parents to raise children in difficult circumstances. We can see that there is practical support through family allowance and child tax credits as well as better provisions for parental leave. We need better contraceptives and adequate sex education.

I think that men can play a much more important role by acting responsibly and by thinking about the consequences of their own sexuality. I am rather disturbed when I hear that men want to intervene through court injunctions and the heavy hand of authority. Men have it within their power to teach young men that there are consequences of a sexual act and that if they do not want to be responsible for abortions being performed, they should not be responsible for unwanted pregnancies.

I would hope that those who want to see abortion eliminated from society, and I share that goal, would be much more active in dealing with the question of unwanted pregnancies and would take a much more responsible approach to sexuality. I think there is much we can do as legislators, but I do not think we have the option of simply passing some kind of idealistic law that would be flouted and would be ruled

The Government's motion suggests that there are two different stages in a pregnancy and that they ought to be treated differently. People in the pro-life movement resent this because they argue, quite correctly, I think, that human life exists from the moment of conception. What else is it but a human life? They are quite right. However, practically, the decision for a late abortion is a greater tragedy. It is much riskier medically and much more stressful psychologically.

All of us recoil in a very common sense way from the idea of an abortion of a viable foetus, an eight-and-a-half-month old foetus to take a fairly extreme case. It is a different thing, and it seems to me to be very reasonable to take a different approach to abortions at a late stage. This approach of the Government, given the difficulties of the situation, is not an unreasonable compromise.

However, it is important that the decision to have recourse to an abortion for the purposes of health be that of a woman. In the case of a later pregnancy, the idea of having a second medical opinion is reasonable. There may be other ways of recognizing the differences as well. I do share the pro-choice principle that we cannot shut off access and that it is the woman whose life and health is at stake, and therefore, it must be the woman who makes that decision. Where I part company with some of my colleagues in my own Party and with other people who support the pro-choice position is that I do not share that position for all kinds of abortions.

My own Party is referred to in very blanket terms as the pro-choice Party, as if we all had the same point of view. That is not true. There is a majority position and a minority position, as there is in every Party. As well, we have to look at the context in which those debates took place. They took place in the context of the women's movement, with women claiming control and demanding the right to be able to make decisions without being thrown into desperate circumstances.

We now live in a different world. There is reproductive technology which permits other kinds of choices. I think it is morally wrong for abortion to be used for purposes of sex selection. It is wrong to decide that a male or a female child will be wanted and that the sex that is not wanted will be aborted. That is morally wrong, and I think we could have laws that would provide that women would have the right to abortions only in the cases of their own health but not in the cases of selecting the sex of the children.

We are now getting into a science fiction, futuristic scene. There is the possibility that women could try out pregnancies, and if they did not get foetuses with the right qualities, say a foetus that was not athletic enough or one that did not have the right physical or mental characteristics, they could abort them. This possibility now exists. Playing God in that way is inappropriate for human beings, and I do not think abortions for those reasons should be permitted. Those reasons are quite different from the reasons of the health or the life of the mother.

As well, the use of a foetus for medical or experimental purposes is morally wrong. A pregnancy for those purposes with an aborted foetus to be used for medical or experimental purposes seems to me to be wrong in principle. We could have a law that deals with that issue.

I note, however, that the motion before us put by the Government does not specify anything of this kind. I suspect we would find a very large number of Canadians who would share the horror I feel at the prospect of abortions for these kinds of reasons, reasons which are quite unrelated to the life and the health of women themselves.

A more difficult question arises when we deal with the issue of foetal abnormalities. This is a grey area. Some people claim that a woman should have the right to make this decision no matter what. I find it inappropriate that a decision be made that a child should not live, that its life is not worth living. That kind of decision should not be made by the mother, the father or anyone else. We do not allow people to make that kind of decision after the birth of a child. If there is a disability, no one has the right to decide that that life ought not to be continued. If we do not make that kind of decision about children who have been born, it seems to me that that kind of decision should not be made by human beings when it comes to viable foetuses.

We can imagine that the prospect of this kind of traumatic pregnancy might be extremely stressful to the mother. It might have health consequences and there may be reasons for the mother to seek an abortion on those grounds. However, simply to say that the prospective quality of life of a foetus as a human being is not worth living and that therefore that person will not have the opportunity to live on the basis of our decision about that value, is an inappropriate decision for human beings to be making.

I think we do need a law on abortion. I would like to see it as an Act of Parliament rather than in the Criminal Code. I think that such penalties have been tried too much in the past and have not been very effective. They have caused a number of horrors. However, there are some issues on which we should be stating our position. We should be supporting practical measures to make unwanted pregnancies an infrequent or non existent fact of life. We should be working on all the practical issues I suggested earlier from contraceptives to education, financial support for the family, parental leave, and child care. The Government has been negligent in all of those respects.

We must recognize that freedom of choice is often only rhetoric which does not mean very much. The reality is that very often a woman is pressured into an abortion by financial stress and also a lot of psychological stress from her partner. Sociologically we know that one of the major reasons for abortion is this pressure from the male partner, be it husband or boyfriend, of the pregnant woman.

There are instances in which we need further study such as the case of foetal abnormality. I support the proposal put forward by my Party that there be a Royal commission on reproductive technology. That would be very helpful. However, we do not need a Royal commission on issues such as the use of foetal tissue and the use of abortion for sex selection or the selection of other characteristics. Those issues are right or they are wrong and we have positions as moral persons on those issues. Some of them are perfectly clear and we can proceed on them without further study. However, I think that we do need further study on some issues and we should be prepared to amend our laws as we attain the results of those studies.

Finally, it is extremely difficult to respond to a specific motion, some parts of which I agree with and some parts of which I do not agree with. My own Party is putting forward an amendment which reflects the majority view of the caucus. I do not share it entirely although I share parts of that approach. I believe that many of us find that when we work out our philosophy it does not entirely fit the mold of any particular organization.

In conclusion, I hope that we will have a good discussion throughout the couple of days during which we will be considering this issue. I hope there will be good amendments moved. I hope we can proceed in an orderly fashion to deal with the issue. We will never reach a solution which will have 100 per cent or even an enormous amount of consensus. We are going to be divided, but we must come up with a solution which will be acceptable to a very broad range of Canadians. We will have to deal with those differences in a constructive way. I hope that we will proceed to deal with the root cause of a recourse to abortion, that is, the unwanted pregnancy. I hope we will be much more vigorous in dealing with those in a constructive way.

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I approach this subject with a great deal of difficulty. I have a major concern with the situation in which we now find ourselves. We have before us a government motion which clearly calls for protection during the gestation period. If we as pro-life supporters were to say that we cannot live with that condition and were to vote against the motion of the Government, we would in turn find ourselves faced directly with abortion on demand. As a result of the Supreme Court decision, we have in Canada today a rapid growth industry known as free-standing abortion clinics under another name.

I would like to talk about Peterborough for a moment. Since the Supreme Court decision was announced the provincial Government has intentionally moved to establish clinics in Ontario which will operate as extensions of hospitals and give consultation to expectant mothers and then offer the service of abortion. This is being done in a great number of communities against the will, in my perception, of the majority of those communities.

In the City of Peterborough the provincial Government moved in against large demonstrations, candle-light vigils, and marches on the hospitals and announced its intention, through the provincial Minister of Health, to open a free-standing clinic as an extension of the Civic Hospital and fund that clinic to the extent of $800,000. This was at a time when it announced to the other Peterborough hospital, St. Joseph's Hospital, which is a Catholic hospital that will not perform abortions, that it did not have the money to assist it in a $400,000 over expenditure.

It could find some $800,000 to open this clinic to offer a service of consultation to expectant mothers when the medical profession in the City of Peterborough is currently offering those services. This new free-standing clinic was going to do that at a cost of $800,000 for the Civic Hospital when the provincial government could not find $400,000 to cover the deficit of St. Joseph's Hospital, forcing it to close beds, reduce services, and reduce operating procedures.

If that is not bad enough, add to it that as a result of the desire to find doctors in Peterborough who will perform abortions, the provincial Government has allocated funds to this free-standing clinic to train doctors to perform abortions. In the City of Peterborough there is only one medical doctor who will perform all abortions. In addition to that there is one doctor who will perform abortions for his patients only.

Part of the reason I am having so much difficulty with the abortion issue is that a lot of my personal friends, male and female, are medical doctors. My wife is a registered nurse. The situation within the medical profession has become so bad that a great number of doctors have decided that they can no longer recommend to boards that abortions should occur. Part of the reason for that is that they see young people who have had not only one abortion but two and in some cases, although not a large number, three abortions as a means of birth control.

There are two things which we must consider.

One is whether society is ready today to accept the fact that abortion is the norm and there should be free-standing clinics and abortion on demand. Some people tell me that they know I have fought for the return of capital punishment, and have shown by my interest in the return of capital punishment a lack of respect as it pertains to human life through the execution of the convict.

I thought about that for a long time. I answer my constituents by saying that when I deal with a convicted murderer I deal with someone who has been convicted as guilty and to take that life as a penalty that fits the crime is a reasonable form of justice available to Parliament to consider in the form of legislation. I ask the abolitionists who, in a number of cases, happen to support abortion, why they have so much respect for the proven guilty, like the Clifford Olsons, and so little respect for the life of the unborn child. That sort of analogy shows the difficulty facing Members of Parliament with this very controversial issue.

I find it difficult to deal with the Criminal Code and its sections that bring with them the penalties of law when we have a Constitution in Canada that is mute on the protection of the unborn child. That is why in the past year I have appreciated the opportunity to support Private Members' Bills that have called upon the Government of Canada to take to a First Ministers' Conference, as a priority, changes to the Constitution Act, 1982, which would recognize the foetus as a human being with some rights. I do not believe one can take the foetus through the gestational period and come to the conclusion that at 12 o'clock noon on the fourth week, it suddenly becomes a person. I think it comes to the point where each Member of Parliament will have to decide whether rights should be extended to the foetus and who among us has the right to determine on what hour, on what day, in what week, or in what month those rights take place.

I look to church leaders for their views on a number of these issues. Although I did not have the support of the Catholic bishops on my stand for capital punishment, I think I will have their support on my position in the protection of the foetus and the extension of rights to the unborn. Of all the correspondence I have received, this one letter that I received from Archbishop James M. Hayes, a member of the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops, sums up my position on this issue of abortion. He says:

> The Government has introduced a Motion that proposes the totally unacceptable gestational approach for a new Canadian abortion law.
> The position of the Catholic Church is that human life begins at conception and must be valued, respected and safeguarded from the beginning. The gestational approach is scientifically and ethically indefensible because it draws an arbitrary dividing line between life which is worthy of protection and life which is not.
> The government's Motion abandons a primary function of the law: The protection of human life. Furthermore, it does not achieve the socially imperative balance between the rights and interests of women and the equally important rights and interests of unborn children.
> We count on the good will of everyone who values human life to work and pray for legislation which recognizes, values, respects and protects human life from conception to natural death.
> To this end, a new abortion law must be developed in the context of other laws and social policies which together will make this a society ever more hospitable to all human life at all stages of development.

Let us carry that to the next stage in dealing with the motion before the House. I was pleased to be able to table an amendment to the government motion that I believe would satisfy the Catholic bishops who have said that they are prepared, when it would cost the life of the mother, to bring the pregnancy to fruition. They would consider in the protection of the life of the mother the loss of the life of the infant.

I was disturbed that the justice critic for the Official Opposition, the Member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan), said that one of the most difficult problems arising from Section 251 of the Criminal Code is the definition of the life and health of the mother. If I am quoting him correctly, I believe he said that over his years it has been the number one problem in the broad definition of the term "health of the mother". Yet that same justice critic for the Official Opposition said he would not put in an amendment, but would wait and see.

He does not like our motion and other Members opposite have said that they do not like our motion. Perhaps they are simply not used to a free vote in the House of Commons. Anyone who is at all interested in the protection of the unborn or the rights of the unborn would give serious consideration to amending a motion to allow it to answer their concerns.

According to my amendment, we would delete all the words after the words "to protect the unborn" in the main motion and substitute therefor: "Such legislation should prohibit the performance of an abortion except when two independent qualified medical practitioners have, in good faith and on reasonable grounds, stated that in their opinion the continuation of the pregnancy would or would be likely to endanger the life of the pregnant woman".

That is the amendment. I believe that in Peterborough we would have more success in finding doctors who would perform abortions if the cause of the abortion was that. What the doctors object to is the rubber stamping of abortion on demand through free-standing clinics like Dr. Morgentaler's.

The motion in the House would allow people like Morgentaler and company to sign an abortion. That would make it legal if we approved the Government motion without an amendment requiring that the life of the mother be the prime requisite for the granting of an abortion.

I would like to close with two thoughts. First I will recap my opening remarks. If we do not win a pro-life amendment to this motion, if this House cannot carry the consent and wish to protect the unborn child, then there are only two other alternatives. The first is to vote for the government motion which recognizes a gestational period but removes abortion on demand and, second, to vote against the government motion and go with the status quo today, thanks to the Supreme Court of Canada, which specifically says we can continue on the way we are, and the way we are today is abortion on demand.

I am still in the position where I am considering. I am pro-life. I want a pro-life amendment as much as I want anything, and I want to be able to offer an abortion to my constituents who require an abortion if it threatens the life of the expectant mother. However, I would much prefer the government motion to what we will have if we do not get the government motion through. We would then have abortion on demand.

I think it is best stated in the words I wrote down this afternoon. I do not want to be too brutal. I do not like to preach "holier than thou" types of sermons. I was raised in a parsonage and I heard a lot of sermons in my day. But I would like to give the House this thought. First, by allowing abortions, we are deliberately allowing a destructive, brutal and violent act to be undertaken with state approval. Second, we live in a society that will not allow discrimination on the grounds of sex or colour. Yet we are prepared to consider allowing abortions on the grounds of foetal abnormality. I feel quite strongly about this. If this occurs, as sure as night follows day it will be followed by infanticide, the liquidation of the handicapped and the euthanasia of the aged.

I think the time has come when Members of Parliament will have to stand up and be counted. Are we prepared to give recognition to the foetus? Are we prepared to give protection to the life of the foetus? Are we prepared to accept what Christian-Judaeo teachings tell us that a person is a person from the time of conception until death? Or are we moving our society closer and closer to the kinds of dilemma that will follow if we fail to give protection to the foetus at this most important point in this Parliament's history.

Mrs. Lucie Pépin (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, I rise feeling a certain difficulty this evening about speaking to the resolution that the Government tabled today with the intention not of legislating on abortion but rather of finding out where MPs stand on termination of pregnancy. Let me explain: the debate we have had this evening has not been a debate on a bill, it has been a poll by the government to find out what all our positions are.

Why? I think that if the Government had done the responsible thing, it would have tabled a bill and not a resolution which is neither fish nor flesh, which wants to be seen as the via media and doesn't satisfy anybody, neither the pro-life groups nor the pro-choice groups.

I also think it is hypocritical of the Government to hide behind a mediocre resolution instead of presenting us with a Bill.

The motion we are discussing this evening flies in the face of the Supreme Court ruling, because the approach the ruling took gave women a voice. And the motion we are faced with this evening is quite a different story. When I listen to the majority of the speeches that have been made in the House this evening, it seems to me that a majority of MPs want to take away women's voice. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, what percentage of the Hon. Members actually read the Supreme Court ruling before giving their views. I don't think I would be wrong if I asserted that at least 90 per cent of my fellow-Members have not read the ruling, because, (if they had), there would have been a number of speeches this evening that would surely not have taken the tack they did. Some even referred to the rights guaranteed by the Charter, and if you read the ruling, you will find it is based on those very rights.

They confront us with a resolution, as I said just now, that flies in the face of the Supreme Court ruling, because in the ruling it says that in the early stages of pregnancy the decision is entirely up to the woman. And here we have a motion that says she has to share that decision with her doctor, and in the second paragraph that she has to share it with two doctors. I won't read the motion, Mr. Speaker, because a number of my colleagues have already done so. But I am taken aback to see the Conservative Government, which claims to be a government that extends and promises liberty and equality to women, blundering so badly when it comes to the right of women to terminate a pregnancy, which is a fundamental right, as the Supreme Court ruling spelled out. But is is a right that seems to terrify a number of lobby groups, and the Conservative government too. Otherwise it would have tabled a Bill.

As I listened to certain MPs this evening, I thought how interesting it would have been to have their wives speaking in their place this evening. I am sure the approach taken would have been a very different one, because I know very few women who—even if a majority of women tell you that life begins at the moment of conception, they'll also say that the decision rests with the woman. I know very few women, Mr. Speaker, who think abortion is a good thing. To be in favour of the freedom to choose is not the same thing as being in favour of abortion. You have only to recall all the difficulties and physical pain women used to undergo to obtain an abortion, simply to obtain a therapeutic abortion.

I can look back to around 1966, when the first family-planning clinic was opened in Montreal, when it was still illegal to talk about contraception. At that time I was the nurse in charge of an obstetrics and gynecology ward, and on Monday we would be told, "There've been 15 admissions for miscarriages—" But, abortion being illegal, all those cases of miscarriage would turn out to be cases of abortion. And when you examined the patients you found that they had used lye, Javex, knitting needles. We were told crazy stories such as: I was painting and the smell of paint caused my miscarriage, or I fell and at that very moment, I had contractions and aborted.

But if you took a closer look at it, you could see that these women had had a voluntary abortion. At that time, they had to be reported. I remember, after taking a nurse training course in the suburbs, I came to Montréal for my specialization, I had never been faced with a woman who was arrested because she had had an abortion. Then, as head of my department, I see two policemen coming. They tell me: You have a patient under the name of Mrs. X. Then I answered to them: Yes, she is in bed 15-3. Then I ask: Did anything happen in her family so that you come and visit her? They answer: No, we have had a report that that woman has had an abortion and she must be arrested. Can you imagine my surprise? That did not take place 50 years ago, Mr. Speaker, but in the years 1967-68 in Montréal.

Thus, I decided to have a meeting with the staff and nurses and to tell them that before they report women and send them to jail, they would better make their comments and reports to the department head so that it doesn't happen again.

But some of these women who had had an abortion on the kitchen table woke up later on and thought they had aborted; they were haemorrhaging, most of them did not abort but they could not have sex for the following months and years.

Later on, the rate of miscarriages was very high. If you look at it, since the passage of the therapeutic abortion legislation or even in the past few years, you will see that the percentage of miscarriages in Canadian hospitals was very low because there have been abortions. But at that time the number of miscarriages was very high because everybody was having so-called spontaneous miscarriages and everybody knew that they were voluntary abortions.

In 1969, we passed the therapeutic abortion legislation. I would like to deal with it, Mr. Speaker, because I sat on the first committees on therapeutic abortion. I sat on and helped set up abortion committees from Newfoundland to Victoria. All the committee members were men. We had to fight for one or two years before they agreed to have women sitting on those committees. Each woman, each case that was studied, because we had no right to ask the patient. A case was presented and defended and each woman about to have a therapeutic abortion had to talk with a psychiatrist to ascertain whether she was not mentally disturbed. Or else it was said that she was going through a breakdown or that she would be deeply disturbed, but there was always some reference to a psychological disorder and that was the only way to get a therapeutic abortion.

Of course, women were 12 weeks pregnant when they arrived because they were coming from regions where nobody knew that they were entitled to a therapeutic abortion.

Subsequently, I was a member of the Badgley Commission which considered the implementation of the abortion legislation. We travelled throughout Canada and realized that women were going to hospital to undergo a therapeutic abortions thinking that it was still forbidden. But again, according to the provinces, it was a federal legislation that some of the provinces refused to enforce. There were also some hospital administrators who refused to provide for therapeutic abortions. Thus, according to the region where you lived, according to your financial means, you could or could not have a therapeutic abortion.

I remember being told by some provincial officials: There is no abortion here, we do not need it. Women had to go to the neighbouring province. They were going in particular to the Town of Lethbridge where abortions were provided for the whole Province of Saskatchewan where therapeutic abortions were not available. They had to go to the Atlantic provinces where the federal legislation is not implemented at the present time, and Montréal hospitals are overflowing with women coming from the Atlantic provinces because they cannot have access to therapeutic abortions in the hospitals of those provinces. Montreal hospitals were packed and officials used to say, what are we going to do with those patients? And those patients went to clinics.

The Badgley report on the implementation of the Abortion Act made some major recommendations but said, among other things, that if we were to stop unwanted pregnancies, what was needed were clinics providing for sexual education and contraception services throughout Canada.

But when I sat on the committee on child care services in 1986, we travelled throughout Canada and I ventured to ask questions about pregnancies among teenagers, since we were dealing with child care, and I was told that no sexual education course was given in several regions because it was not permissive to even say the word "sex", and that contraception means were even less offered. With the result that in one of the Atlantic provinces, in 1985, there were more childbirths among single mothers than among married women. That was not 20 years ago, but two or three years ago!

At present, it seems that women are being denied the right to interrupt their pregnancy but on the other hand, we do not provide support services either to those who have children or to those who want to go on with their pregnancy. We have at present in Canada no service that is designed for women willing to go on with their pregnancy. We have no drug service, they are not given any particular assistance, any welfare, they have no housing. If they are young, there is no way they can go on with their studies and they have to turn to food banks. They are undernourished and often give birth to sick babies.

The Conservative Government has introduced a motion instead of a Bill. They say that they are for the family, that they want to do more for children. But if you look at what the Conservative Government has accomplished since 1984 for the family and children, we find, first, the Badgley report on child abuse tabled in 1984. Only one committee has been created since and no recommendation has been implemented.

The birth control department was closed down in 1985. There have been dramatic cut-backs in the budget of Planned Parenthood. The tax reform has increased taxes for Canadian families. Naturally, there is no sex education program and obviously no contraception program because this is permissive!

Very little if anything at all has been done for battered women. There are not enough day care centres. One out of five children in Canada is poor and 57 per cent of children between the ages of six and 14 are left alone after school.

Then, the women are told to shut up and that it is not up to them to determine whether they can continue their pregnancy and take care of their children afterwards. And all this to protect the unborn child!

Mr. Speaker, I agree that we shall have to decide up to which stage of a pregnancy abortion can be practised.

Earlier, I heard an Hon. Member say that he would accept abortions when the life of the mother is threatened.

I simply want to point out that the mental balance and the very life of many mothers in Canada are threatened every day because they live in poverty, because they do not have access to daycare, because they are battered, because they are sexually abused. We talk about danger. It is always more dramatic to speak about a threat to the life of the mother. But what are we doing for women in their everyday life? What are we doing to help them? I must admit that it is very little.

Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier, no one is for abortion and being pro-choice is not necessarily the same as being for abortion. Being pro-choice means to respect the choice and to provide support for every woman who decides to continue her pregnancy and to help those who decide to have their pregnancies terminated. People will say: those women could continue their pregnancy and give up the child for adoption, because there are not enough children for those who want to adopt. However, we should look at the figures. Most teenage mothers do not give up their child for adoption. They keep their child, maybe for three years and then they decide to put up the child up for adoption. The child will remember that.

There is no family policy in Canada, and this causes a lot of hardship. To support free choice, we must have services. We need clinics providing termination of pregnancies and services to help women who want to continue their pregnancy, as well as education services and follow-ups. I quite agree with several Members who said: there are clinics where women have abortions, after which they go home and we do not know what happens to them afterwards. There should be follow-ups to provide support services to all the women who get an abortions. First, to avoid re-occurrences, and second, to check on their psychological state. There is nothing like that at this time.

Teenage pregnancies have reached epidemic proportions in Canada. As I recall, teenagers account for 34 out of every 1,000 pregnancies in Alberta. Naturally, there is no sex or contraception education program.

I have been listening to my colleagues since 3 p.m. this afternoon, and I have found that Members generally confuse two different concepts, the right of the mother and the right of the unborn child. I believe that we should have a Bill which takes both concepts into account. It is not the case now. We have a motion which does not solve anything.

It is rather strange to hear Members tell us that women do not have the right to make the decision when we are given the responsibility to raise our children. Women are given custody of the children in case of separation or divorce, but we are denied the right to decide whether to continue a pregnancy or not. We are given responsibilities, but denied the right of decision.

From what we hear, women are no longer having children. Many will say that it is because of abortion. Howevere, Mr. Speaker, it is not because of abortion, but because of our economic system and the economic position of women. I believe that this is the major responsibility.

We also have to remember the ruling of the Supreme Court which speaks about human dignity for women. As I said earlier, I know that the majority of my colleagues have not read the ruling of the Supreme Court, and I shall therefore conclude my speech by reading a few passages from that ruling. When the court speaks about the human dignity on which the Charter is based, it is referring to the right to make fundamental personal decisions without interference from the state. This is a crucial component of the right to freedom. Mr. Speaker, in a free and democratic society, the right to freedom does not require the state to approve the personal decisions of its citizens. However, it requires the state to respect these decisions.

In addition, the right to freedom provided in section 7 guarantees for each individual some personal autonomy about the major decisions affecting his private life.

More recently, and this is still in the ruling of the Supreme Court which I would have liked my male colleagues to read, the fight for recognition of women's rights has been a fight against discrimination so that women would find a place in a man's world, to develop a package of legislative reforms to put women on an equal footing with men. We are not struggling here to define the rights of women in relation to their particular position in the social structure or in relation to the biological difference between the sexes. The sole form taken by the needs and aspirations of women today is that of guaranteed rights. The right to reproduce or not to reproduce is one of those rights, and it is rightly considered an integral part of the contemporary fight by women to affirm their dignity and value as human beings.

I would also like to summarize briefly what the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Beetz point out, that is, that the existing legislative structure for obtaining an abortion plainly "subjects women to considerable emotional stress and unnecessary physical risk." And then they add that in their view the existing legislative structure "is more deeply flawed" than that. Essentially what it does is assert "that the woman's capacity to reproduce is to be subject not to her own control but to that of the state." She is not to be allowed to choose to exercise that capacity or not. In my opinion, this not only violates her right to liberty, in the sense of her right, her personal autonomy in decision-making, it is also "a direct interference with her physical person".

How can a woman in that situation have the slightest feeling of security about her person? And the justices conclude by saying that they consider that Section 251 of the Criminal Code deprives the pregnant woman both of her right to security of the person and of her right to liberty.

Mr. Speaker, I would very much like to see my colleagues in the House of Commons approach this motion bearing in mind what the Supreme Court ruling says. I think women must make themselves respected. It's very nice to want to respect the unborn child, but we live a daily reality where women are always there, and obviously they tend to get forgotten. They are inconvenient, because they speak out and demand things.

So I just want to say that I will vote against the motion because it does not respect the liberty or the human dignity of women, and also I hope that one day the Government will assume its responsibilities and table a Bill in which there will be a balance between the rights of the mother and the rights of the unborn child, and in which there will be provision for services such as education, contraception, and support for the mothers who want to continue their pregnancies as well as for those who want to interrupt them, because I must say that a motion like this one is in my view an abdication on the Government's part and a step backward.

So I hope we will soon have a Bill, and above all that this motion will not be used to gain Brownie points during the upcoming election campaign, because I think the Government has no call to be proud of what it has tabled here today.

[English]

Mr. Brian White (Dauphin—Swan River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in tonight's important debate. For me the issue goes back to 1983 when I was first nominated. In the 18 months that I spent campaigning between that time and the election I was taken aback, or perhaps a little off guard, at the number of times I was confronted by future constituents on the abortion issue. Economic matters would be brought up and someone would mention the abortion issue and ask where I stood on it. It was something that took me quite by surprise. I felt that the citizens whom I was purporting to represent had a right to know where I stood on the issue.

After careful study and much reflection I decided that, should I be elected to Parliament, I would support the pro-life position on abortion whenever I had the opportunity. I feel that I was elected to serve the constituents of Dauphin—Swan River. Occasionally votes come up on moral issues such as the current abortion debate. In such issues I feel that I must vote as my conscience directs. Therefore, on Thursday my vote will reflect my pro-life position on the abortion matter.

I recognize quite clearly that many of my constituents and many other Canadians disagree with me, but I believe that a moral and very emotional issue such as abortion cannot be voted upon based on public opinion polls. We must show tolerance and respect for minorities and, at the same time, we must also protect those unable to do so for themselves, such as our unborn. I intend to vote on Thursday for the amendment which best considers the rights of our unborn, from the time of conception to birth.

On June 2, 1987, I joined with 61 other MPs in voting in favour of the motion brought forward by the Hon. Member for Grey—Simcoe (Mr. Mitges) which attempted to entrench the rights of the unborn in our Constitution. Then, as we all know, in January of 1988—in fact, the very reason that we are debating the issue tonight—the Supreme Court ruled that Section 251 of the Criminal Code was unconstitutional. At that time it was said that the ruling by the Supreme Court on Section 251 was a blow to the pro-life movement. I disagree. In fact, I was glad that Section 251 was ruled unconstitutional. I was also ashamed, quite frankly, that under Section 251 over 60,000 Canadian unborn children were aborted every year, almost 200 a day. Since 1969, when Section 251 became the law of our land, over one million Canadian unborn children have been aborted. I was ashamed to say that our country would condone such a slaughter of our unborn.

We now have the opportunity to recognize the rights of the unborn. That point was mentioned in the ruling brought down by the Supreme Court, that it was within the power of Parliament to recognize the rights of our unborn.

Today, we have begun debate on what we as Parliamentarians feel should be the basis of legislation on abortion. Several options are available to us. The main motion, as presented, will attract many amendments that will reflect many differing opinions of how Parliament should deal with the issue.

I reject the so-called free choice option, that is, that abortion is a matter between a woman and her doctor. I reject it because it ignores a third party—a very important third party—namely the unborn child, whose very life is at stake.

At the same time, some would have us accept a compromise, that is that abortion is okay after the first trimester or perhaps that it is okay until the 24th week, which is currently in place in other countries; that somehow the foetus becomes worth while at some arbitrary point in development. I will not now, nor will I ever, accept such a compromise.

Who on this earth has a right to determine at what point in foetal development the unborn becomes too valuable to abort? Not I, not anyone. Genetic science has clearly showed us that life begins at conception. We know at that point that it is clearly defined what the eye colour of the child will be, how tall that child is going to grow up to be, the hair colour, the skin colour, the personality.

The trimester approach to abortion presents our society with many other bio-ethical issues, the first of which is foetal tissue experimentation. If the trimester approach is accepted, do we as a society then condone a scientific experimentation or organ harvesting, for example? Second, the other bio-ethical issue that is brought to mind is euthanasia. The logical extension, in my mind, of a gestational approach to abortion is to say that at a certain age a senior citizen becomes somehow arbitrarily worthless. That is as equally abhorrent to me as the arbitrary assessment of worth of the foetus as it develops. Therefore, in my opinion, the ultimate legislation must consider foetal rights from the time of conception.

To quote Mr. Iain Benson of the Canadian Bar Association, "what is a distinction between the foetus before birth and a child after birth, such that one has the right to life and the other does not?" I say that there is no distinction, and both must have equal rights to life.

Many Canadians claim to be defenders of human rights yet at the same time advocate abortion on demand. In my humble opinion, no person can be taken seriously on matters of human rights if they do not at the same time defend human life at its frailest, at its most defenceless, namely, in the mother's womb.

Those who support abortion on demand are dooming our unborn and taking away their most basic right, the right to life. They are dooming our unborn, whose only crime is being unwanted, who gets in the way and are not strong enough to protect himself or herself.

I for one am prepared to do and offer whatever I can to support and protect our unborn from conception onward. The government caucus has said that MPs of our Party are free to vote according to our consciences on this issue on Thursday. I expected nothing less from the Government. It shows it recognizes the sensitivity of the issue. I find it astounding that anyone would criticize a free vote in the House of Commons. What could be more democratic? Every Canadian is represented in this House of Commons, and it is our difficult duty as MPs to decide on how Parliament should proceed on this most difficult and emotional issue.

I look forward to standing on Thursday and voting in favour of amendments that will protect our unborn from the moment of conception until birth.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg—Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, my intention this evening is to provide what I hope will prove to be a reflective intervention on the resolution before us. The word "reflective" is used on purpose, because for those who have gone beyond the reflective mode to hold without doubt either the pro-life or the pro-choice position, the abortion debate has long since ceased to be a debate in any real sense of the word. Instead of a contest for considered public opinion, it has become a psycho-political case of nerves and a shouting match which excludes the vast majority of people who are so humble as to not be absolutely sure what is right.

Unfortunately, the real debate has been a long time in coming, as both so-called sides of the debate have been so given over to name calling and the impugning of the motives of those with whom they disagree, that many who could have made a useful contribution to the debate over the years have found themselves without a place and unable to stomach the self-righteousness which has abounded around this issue.

The debate tonight has been commendably civilized, and I hope that it continues in this way. I commend everybody who has been involved so far.

When I say that those who take a position have gone beyond what could be called debate, I contend that they are players in a dispute which is a classic example of what is wrong with contemporary moral disagreement.

This sorry state of contemporary moral debate has been well described by Alastair MacIntyre in his book After Virtue. I quote:

> Every one of the arguments is logically valid or can be easily expanded so as to be made so; the conclusions do indeed follow from the premises. But the rival premises are such that we possess no rational way of weighing the claims of one as against another. For each premise employs some quite different normative or evaluative concept from the others, so that the claims made upon us are of quite different kinds.
> It is precisely because there is in our society no established way of deciding between these claims that moral argument appears to be necessarily interminable. From our rival conclusions we can argue back to our rival premises; but when we do arrive at our premises argument ceases and the invocation of one premise against another becomes a matter of pure assertion and counter-assertion. Hence perhaps the slightly shrill tone of so much moral debate.

What follows is an attempt at a non-shrill contribution.

Abortion

The official policy of the New Democratic Party of Canada, with respect to abortion is that the decision to have an abortion is a private decision to be made by a woman in consultation with her doctor or, in other words, the pro-choice position.

This is not a policy with which I have ever been comfortable for a variety of reasons. Indeed, in the federal elections of 1979, 1980, and 1984, I made it clear to those who inquired of my views on this issue, both publicly and privately, that I did not support the Party policy in this case, that I did not support abortion on demand, and that I was very concerned about some of the implications of such a policy, both in terms of an increased number of abortions and in terms of the arguments advanced in favour of the pro-choice position in so far as some of the assumptions which underlie these arguments reflect values that, in my view, are questionable and have not been thought through by the pro-choice movement, however well-intentioned they may be and are.

I am a critic of what might be called the cosmology of the pro-choice movement, about which I will have more to say later. Therefore, I will not be supporting the amendment which was moved on behalf of the majority of the NDP caucus today by the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Ms. Dewar). I appreciate the tolerance which has been extended to me by my Leader and caucus colleagues to put before the House a position different from theirs.

Life has always been cheap but it has been a feature of capitalism to rationalize and sanctify the devaluation of human life by introducing an economic ethic that reduces persons to things, to commodities exchanged in the market-place. Thus, if we wish to fight for the sanctity of life we must fight for it on all fronts, and in particular at the source of all current exemplifications, which in my view is the materialistic and technological view of humanity implicit in advanced capitalist societies.

The question for New Democrats is, as I see it, whether on the issue of abortion we have with the best of intentions ended up buying a piece of the very world view we otherwise oppose. Therefore, with fear and trembling, knowing that one's position on abortion has become for many on the left the litmus test of whether one is truly progressive, I will offer arguments against uncritical acceptance of the pro-choice position.

First, I would like to say a word about why I have not been a supporter of the pro-life position or the movement associated with it, for a number of reasons. I do not like their cosmology either. I was reminded of another way in which this is the case when I heard the Hon. Member for Surrey—White Rock—North Delta (Mr. Friesen) this evening use the language of contract to describe marriage, how liberal and commercial the language of Christian pro-lifers has become, using the language of the market-place and of contract instead of the deeper, biblical concept of covenant to speak about the relationship between men and women. That reflects a deeper malaise that I do not have time to go into tonight.

I have been critical of the pro-life movement because, in the first place, it was always unrealistic for pro-lifers to expect abortion to be as restricted as they wanted it to be. In light of the Supreme Court's action, I think it is now even more unrealistic to expect severe restrictions on the availability of abortions at all stages, particularly in the earlier stages. Neither if it were achievable would such an almost total ban on abortions be desirable. Abortions would continue. Back alley butchers would be back in business. Poor women would be put in comparably more danger than women who could afford to travel to where abortions could be performed safely.

My personal moral preference is for a world in which no one chooses abortion as a solution to a difficult situation, but that does not blind me to this reality. Morality also demands that, knowing what we know, we make decisions on that basis and not as if we did not know or as if it were not the case.

I have also been critical, among other things, of the extent to which the pro-life movement has been associated in general with a right wing politics whose passion for children seems to end at birth, after which they have to take whatever the free enterprise system dishes out to them and their families according to the law of the market-place. From the safety of their mother's womb that certain pro-life MPs would wish on them, some babies are then to be cast out by these same Members into ramshackle housing and cut-backs in lunch programs in inner city schools. Such ideologically selective compassion is unacceptable to me and is really only anti-abortion without being comprehensively pro-life.

This criticism does not apply to the Roman Catholic Church which has on occasion been articulately critical of free enterprise. However, it most certainly applies to some fundamentalist Protestant pro-lifers and to many of my colleagues on the other side of the House whose real God, I would suggest, on occasion is the market-place, or, idol if you prefer.

My problem with Roman Catholic teaching on this issue is in another area and that is with respect to its rigid attitude toward contraception and the fact that it often seems to counsel its members to vote on only one issue, i.e., abortion, when on issues of peace and economic justice, domestically and globally, there is little difference at all between the views of the NDP and the views of the Canadian Catholic Bishops. Are the deaths caused by the lack of global and domestic economic justice that both the bishops and the NDP are calling for relevant to our political choices? I hope not.

The abortion issue is also used by some on occasion just to create anti-NDP feelings for larger political purposes. The recent provincial election in Manitoba is a good example of this. I know many in my area were encouraged to vote Liberal in the mistaken view that this would be an anti-abortion vote. The irony, of course, is that in Liberal Ontario and Liberal Quebec, Doctor Morgentaler operated freely long before the Supreme Court decision. It was an NDP Government that would not tolerate his illegal activities. New Democrats, many of whom wanted the law changed, at least respected the law and did not try to impose their view by default or neglect.

I have tried to be an honest critic of both sides of this debate and in doing so I think I have been in tune with a lot of Canadians who have felt that neither Morgentaler nor Borowski spoke for them. This has meant that I have received criticism from both sides, but I am quite willing to accept such criticism rather than artificially choosing sides and then plugging my ears to other arguments.

If, as some pro-lifers have said recently, one is not totally with them, then one is against them, then I accept the judgment that I am against them. I take my stand with what I would call the humble majority who, like me, are interested in finding a policy that is an acceptable compromise, who realize that what we are talking about here is part of the tragic imperfectability of the human condition, who do not envision a world without sin as the pro-life people do, or a world without guilt as the pro-choice people do.

This humble majority realizes that a compromise is in order which reflects the reality that abortion will be sought and will be obtained, but wants to maintain a value context in which abortion is still something that people are expected to have good reasons for, even if in practice this will not always be the case.

As I understand the Supreme Court decision, it does speak of the need to balance the rights of the woman with the rights of the unborn child. The implication seems to be that some rule which restricted the time frame within a pregnancy in which abortion would be permissible on request might well stand up in court. Whether such a rule either would or should take the form of a criminal sanction against individual women is debatable. I have never been happy about making criminals of women who, for whatever reason, good or bad, feel they must have an abortion. This, incidentally, is what I understand to be the historical essence of the NDP position.

However, whether it be through the Criminal Code or an abortion Act with sanctions, or preferably in some other way outside the Criminal Code altogether, it is obvious that some regulation or restrictions are in order. I agree with those who argue, both in terms of the Supreme Court judgment or separately from it, that abortion has not and should not be established as an absolute right. For me it is a question of establishing what policy we will have in Canada to address the conflicting claims of both women and the unborn, a policy which needs to be determined in Parliament so that abortion is dealt with the same in all provinces, with all Canadian women treated equally, having equal access to those abortions determined to be legal by Parliament.

I am informed that even Doctor Morgentaler will not perform abortions after 12 to 14 weeks, for whatever reason, which is chronologically well in advance of viability and may be just a range that might be acceptable as the time before which, for now, and I stress for now, it is purely a matter of choice and beyond which good reasons, to be determined in the Bill which should follow the passage of the government motion, but which we will probably never get to as a result of the election, must be had for seeking an abortion.

Beyond this time, and particularly after the time of viability, a time which is earlier due to modern technology, perhaps only something of the magnitude of a genuine threat to the physical life of the mother, or a gross deformity of the foetus detectable only at a later stage, should be grounds for an abortion. It is at the point of viability that I am convinced that law should come into play. Before the earlier deadline before which choice and viability will be the rule, there may well be a grey area where good reasons will have to be given but only regulation will be necessary. This three-stage policy would not satisfy those who feel that life at conception is equal in value to life at birth, at 20 weeks or at 12 weeks, but it may be near the compromise that in my judgment will be necessary as well as advisable.

I am not sure whether the government motion calls for a two-stage or for a three-stage policy. This is part of the problem. It is unclear in this respect and it is unclear as to what the words "further conditions" might entail.

All that I have said so far is said in view of what I regard to be the political and judicial reality of Canadian society in 1988 and of what is possible in a democratic society that has deep divisions within it about the value and status of unborn life, in which choice when it comes to abortion has become a symbol for many women and indeed for many men of real freedom for women to shape their own lives, when for others, getting tough on abortion is seen as a symbol of taking a final stand against the creeping amorality of the age.

This political reality is a fact of life, not just for Canadian politicians but for all Canadians. In my judgment, pro-lifers have to accept this reality without accepting various pro-choice arguments which I myself question. One such argument is, for instance, that society does not have a right to impose its morality on individual decisions. Obviously society does this all the time. It is how we handle an issue over which there is fundamental disagreement that is the question.

In my view, morality is what politics is all about. It is not just about abortion or about issues like capital punishment. It is also about our economy and how we organize our economy. I reject the view that morality is somehow only a private or individual matter restricted to a small range of issues.

I also reject the pro-choice argument that abortion is only a health issue. This unacceptably reduces what is involved in the decision to have an abortion and in my view is a contradiction of the argument also made by the pro-choice advocates that women should be able to choose abortion for whatever reason they personally choose it for, unless of course the concept of health is used so broadly as to make no distinction between needs and wants, a distinction which is too often blurred in our consumer society. Therefore, I am not morally indifferent to all the abortions that will be chosen by women if the Supreme Court decision leads to abortion on demand up to a prescribed number of weeks.

Many of the abortions that will follow from this decision and the federal law which follows from it will be abortions that in my view are unjustified, wrong, and tragic. However, I cannot bring myself to single out pregnant women who feel that they absolutely must have abortions as objects of moral outrage or punishment. In my judgment, they are to be perceived more as victims, not necessarily of men or of themselves in any simplistic reference to sexual behaviour, but victims of a society that all of us are responsible for, a society which encourages irresponsible sex, underspends on research and development into contraception, and tolerates social and economic policies which make choosing life very, very difficult for many women.

Nevertheless, abortions which are chosen purely in order not to inconvenience the life of the potential mother or couple or as a form of birth control are wrong, in my view, but so are all the decisions that all of us make when, for reasons of convenience, we make decisions that deny life to others.

Without making any strict comparisons, I ask Hon. Members to think of the fact that every cent we spend individually or collectively as a country on unnecessary items is money that could be spent to save dying children somewhere in the world, including Canada, but we do not propose laws to make frugality compulsory or tithing mandatory. We are all murderers in the name of convenience, to use the language of the pro-life movement. We have all sinned and fallen short of the glory of God, to use the language of St. Paul. Let he or she who is without sin in regard to putting his or her own personal convenience over the rights of starving and/or diseased children be the first to demand of pregnant women that they display a morality higher than that which we expect of ourselves or our country.

Enforcing such a demand would be even more spiritually pretentious. Nevertheless, I believe that a good abortion policy would provide for the kind of balanced counselling in which women contemplating abortion would be exposed to the variety of views that exist on abortion, including those that condemn it, and to the alternatives to abortion, provided that society is serious about supporting such alternatives.

Having said this, I also want to say that the debate over abortion to date has centred almost exclusively on whether or not a woman has the right to choose an abortion based on her own personal judgment of whether or not she wants to have a child. Unfortunately, regardless of what one's views are or have been on this question, the issue has become much more complicated of late with the growth of technologies that may make it possible to predict with considerable certainty various characteristics of the child the foetus will become if brought to birth.

I see that you are indicating to me, Mr. Speaker, that I have only one more minute left. I wonder if I could beg the indulgence of the House to continue my remarks and finish my speech.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to allow reasonable time for the Hon. Member to complete his remarks?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Blaikie: We have now a new debate, hardly begun, about whether or not, if personal choice is to be favoured, this personal choice extends to making choices not about whether or not to have a child but what kind of child to have. The prospect of women having abortions, not because they do not want children but because they want different children than those conceived, opens up a whole new arena of decision making which, in my view, should not be uncritically assumed even by pro-choice people to be adequately dealt with within the moral framework of personal choice even at the earliest stages of pregnancy.

Are pro-choice people, whose arguments may have been overtaken by genetic diagnosis and technology, really saying that the community is not entitled to have any say about any standards or regulations for what will be acceptable in this whole new range of possibilities? The possibility of gender selection becoming an acceptable practice is certainly one possibility, but there may be others. The extension of the consumer ethic to babies is something that I oppose. Designer babies should not be the wave of the future.

This is a dimension which I think the pro-choice community has not thought through and which I hope it will think through very soon, as indeed all of us should, for it is an area of new developments which have been largely left to the no doubt well intentioned but ad hoc decisions of doctors and scientists.

The National Action Committee on the Status of Women has called for a Royal commission into all the questions posed by new reproductive technologies, and I think such a study is now absolutely necessary, precisely because there are questions to be answered that neither pro-life nor pro-choice people have addressed. The compromise we have before us is a compromise based on the current state of the debate, a debate which may be dated by new technologies.

The question of the use of foetal tissue for medical purposes is another issue. The government motion which provides effectively for abortion on demand in the earliest stage has not addressed these new realities. It is in this respect that I am tempted to vote against it. However, I have not made up my mind.

I will not be able to touch on all aspects of my thinking on this issue, but I would like to say a few more words about my critique of the assumptions and implications of the pro-choice rhetoric. For instance, some pro-choice rhetoric calls into question the validity of religious arguments per se. I may disagree with some of the religious arguments offered by my pro-life colleagues on the other side, but their arguments are not wrong just because they are religious. I have my own arguments from a religious viewpoint and I would not want them dismissed just because they are religious. All arguments are religious in the sense that they are based on some claim about ultimate reality, including the arguments of the pro-choice groups, unless they want to maintain that their arguments are just unfounded opinions. The attempt to make religious arguments inadmissible in public debate is something I will not support in any way.

In the end, such abortions as may be permitted by any new law can only be described as tragedies, certainly not as liberation; in some cases as sin as opposed to crime; and in many cases as reflection of a larger and more deep-seated pragmatism about human life that has its worst manifestation in the so-called "practical" dictates or a foreign and defence policy supported by many, although obviously not all, pro-life leaders of incinerating all the children of the world, born and unborn, in a nuclear war fought to preserve our standard of living based, as it is, on our privileged position in the global economy which makes many poor that we might continue to be affluent.

That would be the ultimate sin of material convenience and the mercy of God will be much less available to those who commit that sin than it is to the many women who have chosen abortion, as indeed was the mercy of Jesus himself much more available to the woman caught in adultery, an offence then punishable by death, than it was to the Pharisees or the powers and the principalities who were very good at seeing the sliver in the eyes of others but could not see the beam in their own.

The only people who have a self-righteous leg to stand on in this debate are those who live in voluntary poverty, who are against capital punishment, and who are pacifists on the issue of war. I do not fall into that category, nor do I claim to. It is only those who do who have what I would call a self-righteous leg to stand on.

There are many more things I could say, Mr. Speaker, and I regret that I am unable to do so. I would not want to push the tolerance of my colleagues any further than I have. I look forward to another opportunity to put the rest of what I have to say on the record.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, today and tomorrow we are debating Motion No. 36 in order to get the sense of the House on the abortion issue. This is a very complex issue. It is a sensitive, moral, and religious issue.

I do not believe in abortion on demand. I do not believe that abortion should be used as a method of birth control. I strongly believe that abortion is a matter between a woman, her God, and her physician, and it should be permitted up to and including the eighteenth week of pregnancy. Of course, if the mother's life is physically or mentally at risk at any time, termination of the pregnancy should be permitted. An abortion is a medical procedure and should only be performed by a licensed physician in a licensed facility.

For most women the decision to have an abortion is one of the most difficult they will ever make. It has implications for women and families, for people with deeply held religious views. It requires careful thought and analysis.

Counselling is extremely important and all women deserve to be informed about the effects of an abortion and other means available to carry on the pregnancy. However, once she and her God—her belief, her morals—decide to have the operation, it is her decision.

I cannot support the pro-life faction. I truly respect their views and admire them. However, the Government cannot propose legislation which would be struck down again by the Supreme Court of Canada. The Charter of Rights and Freedoms respects the rights of women. Women have the right to control their bodies.

In a dramatic and forward looking step the Supreme Court ruled last January that women have rights which must be satisfied and protected. The Supreme Court's decision on abortion is no more and no less than confirmation of a woman's right to choose without the interference of strangers. It is not a celebration of abortion, it is not an instruction to abort.

An unwanted pregnancy is a heartache that no Supreme Court decision can heal. The best way to prevent abortion is to make sure that there are no unwanted pregnancies and that women are never left in the position of having to make that last resort choice. We do not solve a problem by making it illegal.

Banning abortions might be a satisfying moral answer, but it would be unworkable. It would force women who seek abortions to travel to the United States, that is, those who could afford to, or worse, risk their health in back alley clinics. It would compound the tragedy and put women's safety at risk.

Family life education is truly a necessity in the school curriculum right across Canada. Young people are not being taught about life, love, sex, and the reproduction of the human body. Unfortunately, many children today know nothing, or that which they do know is incorrect.

I recognize that the school system is under provincial jurisdiction, but surely in 1988 a national program with both federal and provincial funding could be initiated. All the facts should be taught; what a female is, a male, intercourse, contraception, and responsibility—the responsibility of pregnancy, of parenting, and of love. Let us teach life.

The motion before us states:

> Such legislation should prohibit the performance of an abortion, subject to the following exceptions:
> When, during the earlier stages of pregnancy: a qualified medical practitioner is of the opinion that the continuation of the pregnancy of a woman would, or would be likely to, threaten her physical or mental well-being; when the woman in consultation with a qualified medical practitioner decides to terminate her pregnancy; and when the termination is performed by a qualified medical practitioner—

I would like to move an amendment to Motion No. 36, which will be seconded by the Hon. Member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. James), as follows, that the motion be amended by deleting the words "during the earlier stages of pregnancy" and replacing them with the following: "up to and including the eighteenth week of pregnancy", so that the amended motion will now read: "When, up to and including the eighteenth week of pregnancy: a qualified medical practitioner . . . and when the termination is performed by a qualified medical practitioner; and". I tabled this amendment prior to the debate this evening. The reason for my amendment is that "earlier stages" means 12 weeks. Amniocentesis cannot be performed until the fourteenth or fifteenth week of pregnancy in order to find out if there is a genetic disorder, deformity, or serious malformation of the foetus. It takes approximately 10 days to two weeks to receive the results of this test. For those who live in a remote area, it probably takes three weeks, for a total of 18 weeks. Also, some women do not have regular periods. Indeed, the very young who would not realize or recognize early pregnancy symptoms would need up to the 18 weeks.

Female bodies are different from one another. We are not all the same. We have different times of ovulation, intermittent cycles with some at 24 days, some at 28 days, and some at 30 days. We are not a machine that operates according to a manual; we are human.

In conclusion, I want to emphasize that I am pro-choice, with limitations. I do not support abortion on demand. It is up to a woman and her God and her doctor to make the decision, with counselling. I strongly believe that abortion should be permitted up to and including the eighteenth week of pregnancy, by a licenced physician in a licenced facility.

I spent this afternoon, this evening, and now the wee hours of the morning listening to the views of my colleagues. I recognize and value all the information I have received and heard. On Thursday there will be a free vote, a non-partisan democratic vote. I shall be here to vote my belief.

Mr. Pat Binns (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, not only are hundreds or thousands of abortions unacceptable, even one abortion of an unborn child is unacceptable. If we can begin by saving one life at a time we will have made progress in our society.

Despite my belief, I am concerned about why a woman believes she must reach a decision to abort her unborn child. Perhaps it is that society today is not giving the kind of support necessary for a woman who is carrying a child in order to go on with that pregnancy. There are a number of pressures that are brought to bear. Whether it is from the boyfriend, family, colleagues at work, but it must be addressed. We need more understanding and support for the woman who is carrying that child so that she will reach a different conclusion.

Unfortunately, there is not enough time tonight to discuss how we change attitudes and society in order to give support to the woman who faces that monumental decision in her life about whether to carry the child through to completion of her pregnancy or to have an abortion because the support is not there for the woman and her child.

I acknowledge from the outset that God is the giver of life and that, in my opinion, neither I nor anyone else has the right to take the life of that unborn child. The Bible says that man was made in the image of God, and everything I have learned tells me that each of us has a soul, a body and we inhabit spirit. We will be conscious beings through eternity. We are created by God and we have a responsibility to respect and protect others whom God has also created.

Many great leaders have acknowledged God's laws. U.S. President Thomas Jefferson, in 1776, said in Philadelphia: "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men were created equal, they are endowed with certain unalienable rights; among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness". I believe that the unborn child has these same rights and that its life is also inalienable.

When God called Jeremiah to be a prophet he said: "Before I formed thee in the belly I knew thee; before thou came forth out of the womb, I sanctified thee . . . ". Those words establish in my mind beyond a shadow of a doubt that the foetus is important to God from the point of conception onward.

I am disturbed when I hear some people say that while they agree abortion on demand is wrong, the unborn child with some form of physical or mental defect is perhaps a different case and aborting that life would be acceptable. I do not believe it is.

When God called Moses at the burning bush and wanted him to speak to the people of Israel, Moses was not very enthusiastic and told God that he was slow of speech and of a slow tongue, indicating that he probably was not the person to speak to the people of Israel. But God answered Moses by saying:

> "Who hath made man's mouth or maketh the dumb or the deaf or the seeing or the blind? Have not I", sayeth the Lord?

Whether we like it or not, it seems to me that God makes what we might call the perfect and the imperfect. I do not think God makes a mistake in that regard.

How many Members in this House have lived with a retarded or perhaps a severely handicapped person? Everyone who has would recognize and reinforce my belief that those people are special in this world and in fact enrich our daily lives. They give us insight and experience that we would otherwise never have. We gain some kind of appreciation for life by seeing the difficulties that some people live with. They are simply glad to be here on this earth, to be able to enjoy it and live with us. That makes us better and makes our communities stronger.

Some Members have talked about development before birth. Let me reiterate some of the comments that have been made. There has been much development well before the mother even is sure she is pregnant. By 18 to 25 days, the heart is already beating. At 45 days brainwaves can be detected. By nine to 10 weeks, the baby can squint, swallow, and move its tongue. By 13 weeks it can suck its thumb. Doctors accept that by at least six months the baby can survive outside the womb.

That leads me to the question of viability, about which I hear many people talking today. People seem to suggest that the foetus should be protected once it is viable, but up to that point protection is not so important. I cannot accept the argument of viability. After all, if we accept the definition of viability as being able to survive on one's own, who is viable? Is the newborn baby viable? Of course not. It could not live without the mother to feed it or a nurse to take care of it in the hospital.

We could ask if the one-year old could survive alone. It could not. Could a three-year old survive? Could it feed itself, provide clothes, or build a house? Of course not.

I do not think you or I could survive if we did not have our society to help us provide an interrelationship. We could not survive without friends and colleagues to provide a sense of purposefulness in life. We are interrelated from conception onward.

How did we let ourselves be stampeded into the belief that abortion is somehow acceptable? At some point it seemed that people began believing that the quality of human life gained respectability at the expense of human life itself. But many of these arguments are without foundation. Thousands of women were said to be dying each year at the hands of criminal abortionists. In the United States in the mid-1960s, some estimated that 10,000 women died each year of illegal abortion. However, on closer scrutiny, the U.S. Public Health Service reported that from all abortions, legal and illegal, only 189 deaths occurred in 1966, and 160 deaths in 1967.

It seems to me that inflation hit the abortion statistics perhaps before it hit the economy. Part of the problem today when we speak of abortion relates to terminology. It used to be said that an expectant mother was with child. Today, people who are pro-abortion and many scientists will only talk about the foetus. They talk about aborting the foetus. But, in reality we should be talking about killing children.

Where are we today? As everyone knows, the Supreme Court has struck down the abortion law we had in this country. In fact, right up until the moment of delivery abortion would seem to be acceptable because of the fact we do not have an abortion law. That is why we are here. We have a responsibility to bring in a new law.

I believe that the legalization of abortion on demand, if it is not reversed, will some day be looked upon by historians as the last turning point of our materialistic society in abandoning the advantages that came to our society from a Christian-Judaeo heritage in favour of a change in our culture where an unreal concern about materialism and personal freedom replaced our traditional view of the sanctity of life. I am afraid that it takes almost nothing to move from abortion, which is the killing of an unborn baby, to the killing of the retarded, the crippled, the sick, and the elderly. We have to show leadership in returning our society to the belief that the highest level of culture is when we protect the sanctity of human life.

Great nations in which freedom and justice have governed the affairs of the people have upheld this principle. This principle is the bedrock of our civilization. It is a principle which has distinguished free and democratic systems. When the moral foundations of our country are being shaken as they are now, it is time for us to act. I think that just as ancient Rome and other nations have died when they ceased to live by great principles, so can we.

Our choice is clear. We have to believe that we have the power to overcome the pro-abortion decision which was recently taken because of the Supreme Court action. I believe we have to do this since no nation can survive if it abandons natural moral leadership and embraces a doctrine of death. Some of my colleagues who have already spoken earlier today have moved true pro-life amendments and I look forward to supporting those amendments.

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, the subject of this motion and the amendments proposed concern an issue which, in the words of The Ottawa Citizen editorial of Monday of this week "no Government can settle easily and uncontroversially. It is a question of feeling and faith more than logic and science, and divisions must surely cut across all Party lines". I would like to say at the outset that the vast majority of my constituents, like most Canadians, are opposed to abortion on demand, and with this position I agree. I could not, as a matter of conscience, vote for any proposal that would allow for a termination of pregnancy simply upon request. Yet that is the present situation in Canada as a result of the Morgentaler decision rendered in January of this year.

The decision of the Supreme Court of Canada struck down the old law as being inconsistent with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, the majority of judges having found that Section 251 of the Criminal Code deprived a pregnant woman of the right to security of person under Section 7 of the Charter. We are, of course, aware that the Borowski case will soon be heard by the Supreme Court. Presumably, the justices will take that opportunity to define the rights of the unborn human. Pending that decision, and given the significance of the Charter, Parliament, in a very real sense, is left in limbo. That is why I commend the Government for bringing forward this debate to enable individual Members of Parliament to express their positions and ultimately to seek consensus on the preferred direction legislation might take.

This issue touches in the most profound way the absolute fundamentals of an individual's concept of life itself. It is the kind of issue that Members will decide freely, without Party discipline and irrespective of the representations of lobby groups, but Members will answer to their constituents. In this regard, I disagree with Edmund Burke. I believe that where there is a clear-cut expression of opinion within a constituency, under the circumstances of a free vote each Member ought to respect the wishes of the majority of his constituents.

Back in early 1985 I included an abortion questionnaire to be inserted in a householder and received over 1,500 responses at a time when this issue was not on the front burner. Some 80 per cent of my constituents rejected the idea of abortion on demand. Seventy-seven per cent felt that the law should give rights to the unborn child, and abortion was rejected in all situations other than where there was an imminent threat to the mother's life. With this direction, last year I voted in favour of the private Member's Bill put forward by the Hon. Member for Grey—Simcoe (Mr. Mitges) which sought to afford to the unborn human protection under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Recently, after the Supreme Court of Canada decision on Morgentaler, I canvassed my constituents on the basis of three possible courses of action: first, to permit abortions only where the mother's life or physical health was in danger; second, to permit abortion without restriction; and, third, to permit abortion without restrictions during the first 16 weeks of pregnancy and thereafter only when the mother's life or physical health was in danger. Sixty-four per cent of my constituents chose option one. Only 9 per cent chose option two and 24 per cent chose option three. A clear majority of people in my riding believe that abortion should only be allowed if the mother's life or physical health is in danger. Most important, 68 per cent of women supported this position as compared to 59 per cent of the men. Given that this subject has been termed by some as a woman's issue, I regard this feminine response as most significant.

On many occasions when responding to constituents, I have indicated that I am against abortion on demand, that I am against free-standing abortion clinics, and that it would be my intention to support legislation that best restricts abortion to situations wherein the life of the mother is endangered. I have not always held these views. These are views which have evolved over a considerable period of time.

This debate obliges us to ask ourselves difficult questions. When does life begin? What is the nature of human life? What is the value of the individual? Who should choose between the life of a woman and her child? Does a woman's individual freedom override the life of an unborn human? What is the role of the state in all of this? The abortion question is only a part of a larger issue that is now just beginning to be examined as a result of technological and scientific advances. These advances, if indeed they can be called that, raise for the first time questions concerning genetic manipulation, research into recombinant DNA, fertility drugs, in vitro fertilization, multiple births and the accompanying issue of pregnancy reduction, transplants, implants, surrogate motherhood, and the experimental use of foetal tissue. I need not elaborate or speculate as to some of the bizarre possibilities inherent in some of these procedures. Suffice it to say that we must have some rules, some prohibitions and some sanctions.

I should now like to recognize my colleague, the Hon. Member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore (Mr. Boyer) who as a private Member's initiative proposed a human life Act in an attempt to deal with these issues as well as those of euthanasia, suicide and all issues of intentional intervention in the human life cycle. The common theme linking these matters is the sanctity of human life and, as such, abortion is only one dimension which begs for resolution on moral, legal and ethical grounds.

The Government of West Germany has announced plans to ban research on human embryos, to outlaw surrogate motherhood, to curb artificial insemination, to prohibit production of foetal tissue for experimentation and to forbid choice of the child's sex in artificial insemination. It may be that a Royal commission should be struck in this country to receive evidence and to hear witnesses, to listen to experts and to examine in detail all aspects of these human life issues. I believe also, Mr. Speaker, that efforts have to be made educationally toward heightened individual responsibility and that further efforts have to be made to assist and improve adoption procedures. In passing, I cannot help but note how ironic it is that here in Canada, a vast nation in physical terms but short of population, we hear people supporting termination of life while at the same time complaining about what they see as rising immigration and lax refugee determination procedures. In fact, we should be encouraging a high birth rate in Canada in order to increase our population and our domestic consumption.

The recent Morgentaler Supreme Court decision and the comments of Madam Justice Wilson suggest a gestational approach wherein the relative value of the unborn presumably increases as the pregnancy advances. Under this approach the value of the foetus would eventually outweigh the freedom of the woman to decide as to her person. With the greatest respect, I say that the gestational approach is nothing more than abortion on demand. Whether the cut-off is 16 weeks or 20 weeks, whether you decide that life exists at 21 weeks and not at 20 or, conversely, whether you decide at 21 weeks the rights of the mother are extinguished in favour of the foetus seems illogical. A hard decision has to be made. It cannot be papered over. It will not go away. Either you have life or you do not, you have life at 20 weeks, at 18 weeks, or 16 weeks, or at eight weeks. It seems to me that eventually you get back to the moment of conception and that life springs from that moment. I repeat that the compromise motion, the gestational approach is in my mind abortion on demand. This approach does nothing whatsoever for security of the person. It represents abortion on demand and would legalize fully 95 per cent of all abortions. With the greatest respect I say that you cannot say you oppose opening wide the door to abortion and then in the same breath say that up to 20 or 24 weeks it is a matter of choice. That, surely, is a direct contradiction.

It is now 1.45 a.m. Mr. Speaker. I have listened with interest and with the greatest respect to the views that have been put forward by a number of Members in this House yesterday afternoon and evening and early this morning. Finally, I want to say that as a Christian and as one whose personal philosophy is first and foremost the basic work of the individual, the sanctity of human life and the primacy of the family in our society, I have to take a decision and I choose life. In so far as possible, every human life from conception should be given a chance. If I am in error, I have to err on the side of the unborn human being.

Feeling as I do, and with the reassurance that I am supported in this by the clear majority of my constituents, I certainly cannot support the main motion. I will support proposals that best protect the unborn human. I will support the amendment proposed by the Hon. Member for Grey—Simcoe (Mr. Mitges) which I believe would restrict abortion to those situations wherein the life of the mother is endangered. Should that motion fail, I would support the motion placed by another of my colleagues, the Hon. Member for Kitchener (Mr. Reimer) to the effect that abortion be permitted only where the mother's life or physical health is endangered. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for this opportunity to contribute to the discussion and the debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Duvernay (Mr. Della Noce) to be followed by the Hon. Member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman).

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State and Minister responsible for Multiculturalism): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to participate in this evening's work, which has become this morning's work since it is now 1:46 a.m. It isn't Tuesday anymore, it's Wednesday. And on behalf of my consituents in Duvernay, I felt I had a duty to speak this morning. Even though almost all of those contituents must be asleep now because they have to go to work in the morning, they can sleep in peace because I have a duty to perform and it is a pleasure to rise in their name and debate an issue that over that past three or four days has become quite an important matter in Duvernay. A number of people have been doing nothing but tell us what they want, what they would like us to do for them; the churches have taken a hand, the parish priests, all parishioners were expected to sign postcards. In the space of those few days I have once again received 3,000 postcards. I have here 2,910 of them, received in three days, and that, Mr. Speaker, shows the level of interest in the riding of Duvernay and perhaps the whole City of Laval.

I have checked all these letters and cards—we have received a lot of letters from our fellow citizens, and quite apart from that there were 300 phone calls to our office from people who wanted to be heard. The most interesting thing is that the people who signed these cards weren't afraid to sign their names, their addresses, their postal code, and I shall make a point of getting back to all of them with my comments on the vote we will be holding this Thursday at noon.

Mr. Speaker, it isn't easy to reach a consensus. Probably we will never have one here in the House. The majority of my constituents oppose abortion. I believe that here in Parliament the majority also oppose abortion. As my colleague, the Hon. Member for Outremont (Mrs. Pépin) said earlier: because some people claim that free choice would be their choice, just because someone is in favour of the freedom to choose, doesn't mean they like the idea of abortion.

There is another think that struck me just now, because when I discussed this question with a number of women in my riding, and in particular with my wife, almost every time I heard the comment, "It's a bunch of men, a bunch of chest-thumpers, who are trying to settle a woman's problem . . . " Certainly, if the wives or the mothers of some of the MPs who have spoken this evening had spoken in their place, I can promise you the speeches would not have been the same. I'm sure they would have been very different! Nobody is "for" abortion, Mr. Speaker, and I am certain that women who have had abortions must regret it. It isn't easy to make a choice, it isn't easy for an MP when he sees the feelings that have been expressed over the past three days. For example, on Monday more than 350 letters and cards were brought to me in my office, signed by residents of my riding. That has to be respected, Mr. Speaker, because normally scarcely 1 or 2 per cent of the population express their views by one means or another, either by mail or by phone, and when it seems to be so difficult for people to take one minute to make themselves heard, then when more than 2,000, 3,000, 4,000 letters arrive in our offices you have to take five minutes and read them and pay attention. Sometimes it's easy to read them because all of them say roughly the same things, or usually there's a standard card that gets repeated over and over.

Mr. Speaker, soon we will be voting on the question of abortion, and it's going to be one of the most difficult and even agonizing, choices I have ever had to make in my whole career.

Like many of us, I'm sure, I find myself confronted with the necessity to make a choice that conflicts, be it even partially, with my personal convictions. It seems to me that in all intellectual honesty, I must place myself on the side of the opinion expressed by a majority of my constituents, several thousands of them. I have a duty to reflect the general opinion, the consensus, that has become obvious in the riding of Duvernay, and to follow the avenues and the explicit indications and the will clearly expressed by my voters in Duvernay, that is, to vote against the motion introduced by the government which we are considering here today. But I would be ready to vote for the amendment moved by my colleague the Hon. Member for Kitchener (Mr. Reimer), Amendment A, which I would like to read into the record for the benefit of my fellow citizens:

> That all of the words in the motion after the words "to protect the unborn; and" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:
> Such legislation, giving pre-eminence to the protection of the foetus, should prohibit the performance of an abortion except when:
> —two independent qualified medical practitioners have, in good faith and on reasonable grounds, stated that in their opinion the continuation of the pregnancy would, or would be likely to, endanger the life of the pregnant woman or seriously and substantially endanger her health and there is no other commonly accepted medical procedure for effectively treating the health risk; but grounds for such opinions are not to include
> (I) the effects of stress or anxiety which may accompany an unexpected or unwanted pregnancy, or
> (II) social or economic considerations.

Mr. Speaker, Amendment A, by my colleague the Hon. Member for Kitchener, seems to me to be very reasonable.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, even though I have received many very very touching letters, and some people even sent us videos, very touching photographs, associations that wrote, like SOS Bébé, the association of Quebec physicians for life . . . We even had certain people, American groups, who sent us their views, who asked us to be very careful before we made a decision. I also had a letter from a group represented by a Mr. Mongeau in my riding, and I'd like to read a paragraph of it:

> "Dear Mr. Della Noce,
> The lawyers, doctors and nurses of "Respect de la Vie", with whom we are working very seriously, provided us with figures in the past few weeks showing there were approximately 700 abortions every week in Quebec. In Ontario it is worse, approximately 1,100 per week. And the rest of Canada accounts for the remaining cases, out of a total of 110,000 abortions a year.
> Canada = a great country dying."

This letter was sent to me in July of 1988 and it's signed by Mr. Mongeau, who asks me very earnestly to think long and hard before voting and to take into account all the petitions and letters that have been sent to us, and he finishes his letter by saying,

> "Vote thoughtfully. Thank you."

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, it's getting very late and I know there are still people who want to speak. It seems obvious to me that in my capacity as representative for Duvernay, I have a duty to set aside, in all honesty, my personal convictions and express those of the majority whose voice I am here today, as I did in the vote on the death penalty. I have a great deal of respect for my constituents, because as an MP we have to wear the MP's hat. We aren't ordinary citizens any longer, we are citizens at the service of our community, and I say to my community, "I am here to say what you have told me to say. Even though it's 1:55 in the morning and you're asleep, my duty is to do what you have asked me to do. And that is what I have done today in this House, with all due respect." I know there will be some people who won't agree with my choice. It is impossible that everybody could approve.

I see certain people who have argued in favour of the right to freedom of choice. I respect that too. It troubles me to see so many abortions in Canada. Who will perform them once a Bill is passed strictly forbidding abortion? A great deal remains to be done, and I hope that we will be able to do everything possible so that those girls and women can get help one way or another, and I say to my fellow citizens, "I have done my duty. It doesn't always reflect my personal thinking. I'm not here as an individual, I'm here for you, and I have made the choice you asked me to make, and I will be voting against the motion that is on the Table today."

[English]

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, it is now 2 a.m. in the House of Commons in Ottawa. When we walk out of these doors tonight into the streets of Ottawa we will find that it is very much closed down. There will be other areas open tonight in Ottawa, and they are the Ottawa hospitals. If one were to visit the wards, in every one of those hospitals one would find expectant mothers. Many babies are being born right now in Ottawa, in Vancouver, and other places in Canada. Many expectant mothers are waiting for the birth of their first, second, or third child. They are waiting with different emotions.

I am sure that there is at least one expectant mother who has an expectant father pacing the hallway in anticipation, who has an excited family waiting at home for the news and for the father to phone home. In fact, they are waiting for a child with a home that is full of love and opportunity surrounding that mother, child, and family. I am sure there is an expectant grandfather and grandmother waiting for that call, no matter how late at night. They waited to hear that very call in that same expectant way for their child and they now await for their grandchild. I am sure there are expectant mothers with emotions like that.

Perhaps in the next bed there is an expectant mother who is more alone than we are, the four or five of us present in the House of Commons tonight. Perhaps there is no father in the home, or perhaps not knowing who the father is. Perhaps there are no parents to give support to that mother expecting that child. Perhaps the mother is jobless and faces raising a child on welfare as a single parent, alone, afraid, but perhaps also committed to giving that child life and letting that child find its potential in its society. It might be because of some religious feeling that she has, or simply that that mother feels it is just not right to take the life of the child inside her.

I am sure there is another expectant mother who probably will not be delivering that child because she has made the decision, after looking at a series of circumstances, that she will not give life to her child, but that she will ask the doctor to take the life of her child from her, to kill that child. One might want to put it in nicer words, but that is the reality.

I feel very different emotions in response to all three. The first mother will share her joy with that very wanted child. For the second mother I have an empathy, and a sorrow that I as a Parliamentarian have been unsuccessful in creating the kind of society that would not see even her child be a joy to her. We have not provided opportunities for adoption, we have not provided opportunities to support that mother to help her raise that child to its full potential. We have not created the social atmosphere where life and children are valuable and needed in our society. We should try to provide for that mother and her child the extended family or the kind of support mechanisms that would replace that extended family if it is not there for that mother.

I am disappointed in myself and in this House of Commons, and I am pleased that we are starting now to talk about child care and alternatives for child care so that all children can be more welcomed into this world.

For mother number three I feel great sorrow. I feel compassion for her in her decision. I feel sorrow for her and know that out of her decision can come nothing but more sorrow, as well as the death of the child, the sorrow of the mother, the hurt for that mother, because no mother makes that choice easily, or happily. She really is making the choice on the basis of what she believes, her conditioning, her values, her circumstances. I would say to her that freedom of choice is broadened, not limited, when one opts for life.

We must consider not just the choices of the mother; we must consider the choices of all of the partners in creating life, in creating and nurturing life and children. We must consider not only the mother but, of course, the child. As the Supreme Court said, "we must consider". We must consider the rights of the mother, the rights of the child, the rights of the father, the rights of society to that child and, of course, we must consider the other partner, the God of that child.

The last time I spoke in this House I spoke about an issue, about life. I spoke in support of an environmental issue, asking that this House of Commons preserve and add to the Pacific Rim National Park, a primitive wilderness area containing the tallest Sitka spruce trees known in the world. I listened in this House of Commons to the Liberal speakers, the NDP speakers, the Conservative speakers. I listened to all speakers without one word of dissent, saying yes, we must save the lives of the giant spruce trees in the Carmanah watershed. Everyone agreed.

I do not understand how this same House of Commons which said "save the trees", can say a few days later "kill the child". "Save the trees, kill the child". Where is our value? Where is our sense of priority? Somehow we should be able to teach those who believe the value of a balanced environment that part of that balance is a balance of population. If we cannot reach that group on the basis of their moral feelings or their other kinds of values, let us talk environmentally about the balance of ages of people of our society.

In Canada right now we have 10 people working for every one person that is retired, 10 people who will work and raise money and pay the pensions and social benefits of our society. By the year 2000, there will not be 10 people working for every one retired, but only five people working for every one who is retired. How will those five people be able to work and support that one?

It gets even more frightening than that if you look into the early 2000s and you find out that in Canada there will only be three people working for each one retired. The reason is that our low end, the children in our society, are not being replaced, which is another kind of social value that young Canadians are going to have to look at. We are going to have to replace that young end of children coming into our society, hopefully through wanted pregnancies of Canadian people. Where the Canadian people cannot produce that young end of our population, we will have to import that on the basis of immigration, because we cannot exist economically on a ratio of three people working for one retired.

At the same time as we see the problem coming we eliminate—no. Not eliminate. That is not the right word. We kill one million potential Canadian babies. We rob that potential and we destroy that population age balance in our society. It does not matter whether you are talking common sense, whether you are talking moral values, whether you are talking human values, we need children in our society for a multitude of reasons that relate to all of those things.

I have spoken in this House of Commons on this issue before. I have voted in this House of Commons in two different Parliaments; on the Constitution and for pro-life amendments. I have voted for the amendment of the Hon. Member for Grey-Simcoe (Mr. Mitges). He is a courageous man who has made further amendments that I will vote for again.

It comes down to what is Canada all about. What is it that we value and that we respect? If we do not respect life, if we do not want to nurture life, it is not the kind of Canada that I came here to speak about, to protect, to preserve, to develop. I came here to encourage my children and my grandchildren to continue the great building of this nation, and I want them to build it for and with life. That is why I will vote for life motions in this House of Commons and why I appreciate this opportunity to stand here and express this view, which I believe is a view of myself, my family and my community.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Edmonton South): Mr. Speaker, it is a lonely night—not just with regard to the numbers in the House—but it is a lonely night because this is a lonely issue. It is an issue in which we stand alone, some of us, because there are those of us who will differ with our constituents. There are those who have not accurately been able to ascertain the views of their constituents because it is an issue on which the country is rather deeply divided.

It is lonely for me because I am about to declare myself. It is not a new position for me but it is the first time that I have had the opportunity to declare myself in this House. I did so during the last election campaign, and I do so now, partly as a father of three daughters of child bearing age. We have been served until January 28 of this year by the 1969 law, Section 251 of the Criminal Code, which in the 1960s was deemed by the then Minister of Justice, presently the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Turner), to be an appropriate compromise in perhaps the classic Canadian mode. However, time and events have overtaken that Section of the Criminal Code because we now have the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

On January 28 the Supreme Court, by a five to two majority judgment, held that Section 251 contravenes the rights of a pregnant woman under Section 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The majority of the judges further held that this breach could not be saved by the reasonable limitation clause under Section 1 of the Charter of Rights and therefore concluded that the abortion legislation was invalid.

Since the rendering of that decision there seems to have been some division in interpretation of the ramifications of the Supreme Court judgment. Pro-choice advocates celebrated a decision they believed would give a woman complete control of her body. Anti-abortion groups mourned the ruling as a devastating defeat which said that women could now get abortions anywhere at any time. The truth of the matter, Sir, is that both sides are mistaken, the Supreme Court ruling says neither of those things. The majority did not rule that women have an unconditional right to abortion under the Charter. On the contrary, the Supreme Court merely concluded that Section 251 impaired irretrievably a pregnant woman's right to security of the person embodied in Section 7 of the Charter.

Justices Beetz, Estey and Wilson expressly state that law restricting abortions might yet be consistent with the Charter and that at some point in the later stages of pregnancy the state's interest in protecting the foetus might be sufficiently compelling to override the rights that women otherwise have under the Charter. This approach is not inconsistent with that taken by most other western nations. In fact, abortion based on gestation appears to be the currently preferred route. Indeed, the motion before us would take us down that road. However, is the world-wide trend the way to go? Should Canada instead seek her own way?

There is a dissent from the Supreme Court judgment written by Mr. Justice McIntyre and concurred in by Mr. Justice La Forest. I am going to quote selectively and I hope with reasonable representation from Justice McIntyre's dissent.

In my view, he wrote, the Chief Justice's whole position depends for its validity upon a proposition that interference with the right constitutes an infringement of her right to security of the person. All laws, it must be noted, have the potential for interference with individual priorities and aspirations. In fact, the very purpose of most legislation is to cause such interference. It is only when such legislation goes beyond interfering with priorities and aspirations, and abridges rights, that courts may intervene.

In my view, he said, it is clear that before it could be concluded that any enactment infringed the concept of security of the person it would have to infringe some underlying right included in or protected by the concept. The proposition that women enjoy a constitutional right to have an abortion is devoid of support in the language of Section 7 of the Charter or any other section. It cannot be said that the history, traditions and underlying philosophies of our society would support the proposition that a right to abortion can be implied in the charter.

Finally, he said in so far as it may be said that the administrative scheme of the Act has operated efficiently, a proposition which may be highly questionable, it is caused principally by forces external to the statute, the external circumstances being a general demand for abortion irrespective of the provisions of Section 251. It is not open to the courts in his view to strike down a statutory provision on this basis.

Prior to 1969, and indeed since that time, women in this country have been to a greater or lesser extent unduly deprived of their proper rights. The Charter goes a long way toward establishing in our minds, our laws, and in our hearts, that women are in the fullest sense of the word persons under the law. That principle was first established as recently as 58 years ago in the famous Persons case, in which my kinswoman took part.

However, we must also look at whether or not there is personhood in the unborn. I would like to look at two possible approaches to that particular consideration, one logical and one scientific. I quote first from the research paper Is The Human Embryo a Person? by John Gallagher of the Human Life Research Institute. He states:

> The principle of economy states that one should not posit the existence of some further reality to explain phenomena when the phenomena can be explained just as well by the realities one already knows to exist. To posit the existence of this further reality which is not demanded by the phenomena is to go beyond the available evidence, to be fanciful rather than realistic.
> To be a particular human person is to be a particular living organism. This human person began to live when this organism began to live. We can consider two possible explanations: first, that the human person begins to live at the time of fertilization; second, that the human person begins to live at some time later than fertilization. The first explanation is the more economical one. It holds that the phenomena are explained by the gradual changes which we know take place, without any change of first being in which a non-personal organism ceases to exist and a new organism, a human person, begins to exist. The second explanation posits the additional reality of this change in first being. Clearly we should hold to the first, more economical, explanation unless there is evidence requiring the positing of this additional reality, the change in first being.

Pretty heavy stuff but indeed science points in the same direction. Paul Ramsey has written:

> Indeed, microgenetics seems to have demonstrated what religion never could; and biological science, to have resolved an ancient theological dispute. The human individual comes into existence first as a minute information speck, drawn at random from many other minute informational specks his parents possessed out of the common human gene pool. This took place at the moment of impregnation . . . Thus it can be said that the individual is whoever he is going to become from the moment of impregnation. Thereafter, his subsequent development may be described as a process of becoming the one he already is. Genetics teaches that we were from the beginning what we essentially still are in every cell and in every human attribute.

Is abortion then wrong? Where is it that we are going in considering an unfettered access to abortion or even a reasonably available access to abortion? I quote now from an article by Mr. Richard Bastien who is the author of the book La Solution Canadienne. He says:

> For freedom to remain alive, two ingredients are necessary. The first is the notion that we all are responsible for one another. This is a basic tenet of Western culture. From it we learn the importance of interdependence and the truth that the individual achieves his own fulfilment in service to others.
> The second ingredient is the notion that every human life has an inherent value. This idea constitutes the basis for individual rights; it lies at the very heart of our political traditions.
> The pro-choice stance is incompatible with both ideas. By asserting that abortion is a private matter, it denies we have any responsibility for each other. By defining life's value only in relation to society or those affected by a life, it denies life's inherent value. It is impossible to support a pro-choice position without at the same time arguing that certain human lives should be sacrificed to the privacy or convenience of others.
> This is the utilitarian view of life, which holds that whatever solves a problem on the practical level must be considered acceptable. No action is right or wrong as such. The morality of an act is to be determined only by the desirability of its effect. In short, the end justifies the means.

● (0220)

There are many in society who sincerely believe that because we have now a more and more pluralistic society in its origins and in its beliefs, therefore we must seek the lowest common denominator in our moral standards. I quote from a research paper done by a distinguished barrister and solicitor, Iain T. Benson, Chairman of the Civil Liberties Section of the British Columbia branch of the Canadian Bar Association. Benson writes:

> The statement is sometimes made that Canada is a pluralistic country and that, therefore, one must acknowledge each person's differing beliefs.
> As a recognition of Canada's multi-cultural make-up this statement is accurate; where it becomes unacceptable is when a valid recognition of cultural diversity is confused with moral pluralism. To postulate moral pluralism from ethnic and social diversity amounts to stating that because different groups have different cultural and ethnic beliefs and practices, morality is various and, therefore relative . . .
> Throughout the centuries many of the greatest thinkers have discussed the importance of learning and preserving the central truths which define the society. These truths are not relative or subjective but transcendent. Michael Polanyi has written that:
> . . . the adherents of a great tradition are largely unaware of their own premises, which lie deeply embedded in the unconscious foundations of practice . . . if the citizens are dedicated to certain transcendent obligations and particularly to such general ideals as truth, justice, charity, and these are embodied in the tradition of the community to which allegiance is maintained, a great many issues between, citizens and all to some extent, can be left—and are necessarily left—for the individual consciences to decide. The moment, however, a community ceases to be dedicated through its members to transcendent ideals, it can continue to exist undisrupted only by submission to a single centre of unlimited secular power.

I made a declaration when I ran for Parliament in 1984 that I stood for the preservation of life and that I opposed abortion on demand. Now that the highest court in the land has spoken, the door is open for legislation which strikes a balance between the rights of the expectant mother and those of the unborn child.

My duty, as I see it, is twofold. First it is to work for the reduction of the number of abortions by reducing the demand for them and second, it is to deal with the availability question through appropriate legislation which would preserve and protect as many unborn lives as possible.

Notwithstanding my declared position on the issue, I took it upon myself earlier this year to ascertain the views of my constituents. I concede that this is not a statistically valid survey in that only those who are interested in the issue chose to respond. This survey is based on a sample of 2,319 responses.

Should abortion be available on demand: yes, 47 per cent; no, 48 per cent; not sure, 3 per cent. Should the mother's rights prevail over those of the unborn child: yes, 53 per cent; no, 36 per cent; not sure, 6 per cent. Should all unborn children have legal status: yes, 38 per cent; no, 47 per cent; not sure, 10 per cent. Should the law recognize that both the mother and the unborn have some rights: yes, 61 per cent; no, 27 per cent; not sure, 9 per cent. So we see that there is profound division on the issue.

Now the question arises: if abortions are restricted, what will be the consequences? I received in my office not long ago a letter from a distinguished Edmonton pathologist, Dr. T. A. Kasper, and I will quote briefly from it. He writes:

> As a pathologist, I feel it is my duty to advise you of some very misleading statements that I have heard vocalized by a variety of pro-abortion activists . . .
> The most deceptive statement of all goes something like this. "Before abortion on demand, there were 30,000 or 40,000 women dying every year as a result of botched up back alley abortions"...I worked for over ten years performing or supervising autopsies in the busiest morgue in the City of Edmonton . . .
> Over that time, I personally could not recall a single case of a death due to an illegal abortion.

That statement of Dr. Kasper appears to be borne out by a study conducted by Ian Gentles of the Human Life Research Institute which concluded the following:

> Maternal deaths from abortion declined steadily from 1940 or earlier. The legalization of abortion in the late 1960s had little effect upon a trend that had already been established for over a quarter of a century. It was not legalization but improved treatment of infection that virtually eliminated abortion deaths between 1940 and 1980.

I intend to follow this debate very carefully. I intend to listen to the arguments that are made. I intend to study all the amendments which are before us.

Like my colleague from Duvernay, I am attracted in a way to the amendment put forward by the Hon. Member for Kitchener (Mr. Reimer). I think that that is perhaps where many of us will end up. I intend, though, to see whether there is not a way to have a more restrictive law, but hand in hand with that law I think must go some clear, valid and funded alternatives to the choice of abortion which I suspect most women undertake as a last resort.

Our society does not provide adequate resources to see a woman through to the end of a pregnancy, a single woman particularly, an abandoned woman, a woman who may already have a number of dependants of her own. Our attitudes, to be honest, do not sustain that woman either. However, I am somewhat reassured by correspondence I have received from a distinguished lawyer in my constituency who practises family law. She tells me that the demand for children by would-be adoptive parents is such that the normal channels are not satisfying the demand. Indeed, those who have waited four to five years for adoptive children are now seeking the private route rather than the public route.

I find that the main motion does not satisfy the issue. The main motion is couched in the kind of moral relativism that the 1969 law is couched in. Only if we recognize and embrace a broader, positive social agenda for enhancing procreative choice can we begin to find lines of strategy that will simultaneously bring about both less reliance on abortion and less resort to coercion of women and enforced childbearing.

I believe we should not be seeking a legal compromise but that we should be looking for a truly moral solution.

Mrs. Carole Jacques (Montreal—Mercier): Mr. Speaker, I rise today in the House to speak on abortion, a very difficult and sensitive subject and one that has provoked a great deal of controversy. Abortion is a very personal choice, which belongs to the woman, who often finds herself faced with a decision that cannot be reconciled with her religion, her moral values, her family life and her convictions.

Mr. Speaker, as parliamentarians we have to make a decision that will affect the rights of women as well as the rights of the foetus, and we must try to balance those rights.

The motion before this House approaches the problem from three angles. There is the pro-life angle, formally forbidding abortion even when the health or life of the mother is at stake. It is certainly a right-to-life position, Mr. Speaker. But what about the rights of the woman when her health is in danger? I think this position has lost its relevance in the evolution of our free and democratic society. We are no longer in an archaic society. That position would take us back to the quacks and the knitting needles.

The second approach, from the pro-choice angle, would permit abortion at any stage of pregnancy. This position seems to me irrational. The right to life of both the woman and the foetus cannot be reconciled with a woman's being able to terminate her pregnancy at any point, for no matter what reason, good or bad.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, there is the moderate position, allowing a woman to interrupt her pregnancy in the early stages if she so decides, and also allowing abortion in the later stages of the pregnancy when two doctors agree and the mother's health is in danger.

Taking that as our basis, Mr. Speaker, we would have to be careful to define very clearly in our legislation the concept of health, which in my opinion should include both physical and mental health. This would be in accordance with the United Nations definition.

We would also have to legislate on the question of what exactly are the early stages of pregnancy and what are the later stages.

Mr. Speaker, it is important to note that in Canada only 0.03 abortions are performed in the last trimester of pregnancy, because of serious problems for the mother of foetal abnormality.

The state should make certain services available to pregnant women, which in the case of certain women could influence their decision to terminate the pregnancy or not. The federal and provincial Governments should also provide a basic educational system so that young people and our society generally would be better informed about contraception.

The decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in the Morgentaler case, as expressed by Chief Justice Brian Dickson, and I quote, "Forcing a woman, by threat of criminal sanction, to carry a foetus to term unless she meets certain criteria unrelated to her own priorities and aspirations, is a profound interference with a woman's body and thus an infringement of security of the person."

In the Morgentaler case Mr. Justice Wilson said, and I quote, "The right to "liberty" contained in s.7 guarantees to every individual a degree of personal autonomy over important decisions intimately affecting his or her private life. Liberty in a free and democratic society does not require the state to approve such decisions, but it does require the state to respect them."

"The decision whether or not to terminate a pregnancy is essentially a moral decision, and in a free and democratic society the conscience of the individual must be paramount to that of the state."

Mr. Speaker, the state must be sensitive to the rights of the pregnant woman. The state must also achieve a balance: the Charter of Rights and Freedoms gives every individual, which includes all Canadian women, the right to see to their own protection, both physical and mental, which for a woman necessarily involves the right to make decisions about her personal life, her capabilities, her psychological and physical fitness for bringing a child into the world.

Think, Mr. Speaker, of the woman whose pregnancy endangers her physical or mental health. Think of the woman who becomes pregnant as the result of rape or incest. In such cases, does the state have the right to make criminals of these women when they get abortions?

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, on the basis of my position as a woman and a Member of Parliament, the middle-of-the-road position seems to me to be the most reasonable. It is the position of the majority of the voters I represent. The decision to terminate a pregnancy during its early stages is a personal decision that lies with the woman.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Since it is now 2:35 a.m., pursuant to the Order passed earlier, the debate and the House will adjourn until 2:00 p.m. today, pursuant to Standing Order 3(1).

The House adjourned at 2:35 a.m.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT—WATER RESOURCES

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, from newspaper reports it would appear that the Minister for International Trade (Mr. Crosbie) has finally understood that Canadian water is threatened by the Prime Minister's (Mr. Mulroney) trade deal.

We learned today that an amendment to the trade deal will likely be made by the Government so as to exclude Canadian water from the trade Bill and prevent exports and diversions. This would be a welcome development. Yet, to be effective, the Minister should take the advice of Mel Clark, a former GATT negotiator for Canada, and Don Gamble of the Rawson Academy of Aquatic Sciences, and amend the trade agreement itself.

Unfortunately, the Minister said he will not amend the agreement. In light of that decision, the Prime Minister could save us all a lot of time and energy by calling an election and letting Canadians decide whether or not the Government should sell our water down the river.

PROFESSIONAL SECRETARIES INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION

CANADIAN'S ELECTION AS PRESIDENT

Mrs. Shirley Martin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, today in Kansas City, Missouri, Sandra Brown of the city of Stoney Creek in Lincoln riding will be elected international President of the Professional Secretaries International Association. The association represents 40,000 professionals from 65 countries around the world. It has been 21 years since a Canadian held this position.

Sandra's contribution and involvement in the association for the last 16 years will serve her well in her upcoming leadership role. Her election is an example of the ever increasing involvement of Canadians in shaping policies in global organizations. Lincoln is proud of Sandra and wishes her well.

PROVINCIAL AFFAIRS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—SPYING OPERATION ON CONCERNED CITIZENS FOR CHOICE ON ABORTION

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, British Columbians were shocked and outraged yesterday to learn that former Social Credit Attorney General, Brian Smith, had hired four private detectives to infiltrate and spy on Concerned Citizens for Choice on Abortion. Over $12,000 of public funds were spent on this sleazy operation which involved, among other things, secretly taping conversations and stealing membership lists.

The operation was co-ordinated through the Vancouver law offices of Farris, Vaughan, Wills and Murphy and, in particular, by Smith's legal henchman, Jack Giles. Brian Smith says he reported regularly to the office of Premier Bill Vander Zalm through principal secretary David Poole.

It is absolutely disgusting that government power should be abused in this way to spy on a respected group of citizens seeking to establish a free-standing clinic offering abortion and other reproductive health services in British Columbia. The current Attorney General should immediately turn over all records collected in this immoral operation.

I call upon Conservative Members of Parliament to join with me and my colleagues, and the vast majority of British Columbians, in saying to the discredited, collapsing, unethical Vander Zalm Government, in the name of God, go!

AGRICULTURE

CROP INSURANCE—PROVISION OF DROUGHT ASSISTANCE

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, there is a cash flow problem facing those prairie farmers in drought areas who will have little or no crop this year. The per bushel price guarantee under crop insurance is well below market. At the same time higher prices will likely preclude another Canada Special Grains Program. Therefore, some assistance is needed to bridge the shortfall.

I urge the Federal-Provincial Drought Committee to strongly consider utilizing crop insurance as the vehicle to ensure the fair and equitable distribution of any possible drought assistance to grain and oilseed producers.

TAX REFORM

RETIREMENT SAVINGS—DRAFT LEGISLATION

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, on March 28, 1988, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) released "Draft Legislation—Retirement Savings". You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Hockin) recently said we can have either a fair or a simple tax system, not both. Indeed, the legislation on retirement savings is not simple.

The Board of Trade of Metropolitan Toronto has stated that the Department of Finance is adding complexity and confusion. One feature of the new system will be that anyone who is covered by a pension plan, who is also able to contribute to an RRSP, will have to rely on Revenue Canada for information about how much can be deducted each year for an RRSP contribution. This is because the new system is so complex that only actuaries will be able to quantify the annual entitlement.

We await the tabling of the Bill, which may now be delayed until after an election. Meanwhile we have pension plan administrators and pension contributors around the country readying themselves for the implementation of nightmarish new rules that may not even be passed into law in the foreseeable future.

GOVERNMENT SUPPORT

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) has just given the Farm Credit Corporation $400 million in assistance that will help restore its finances; this makes clear that he supports this organization. Furthermore, the Minister announced that additional funds would be invested in the FCC over the next three years.

Last December, the Prime Minister gave $100 million to wipe out the FCC's losses, in addition to the other funds given so that it could fully participate in the farm debt review process.

Over the last four years, the Government has taken measures worth nearly $10 billion for the food and agriculture sector.

This shows once again that the Conservative Government cares about Canadian agriculture. These achievements in agriculture are unequaled and are intended to ensure that farmers have all the tools they need to prosper.

WESTERN DIVERSIFICATION FUND

GRANT MADE TO COBRA ENTERPRISES LIMITED

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, the Western Diversification Program has been announced and reannounced on an almost daily basis by Conservatives in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and British Columbia as a fund wholly and solely for western Canada, but it is our tax dollars provided to projects which will diversify our western economy.

We learn this month that to Conservatives "western" means Ontario and "diversification" means moving industry from the West to Ontario. This Conservative Government in Ottawa has chosen to give $750,000 from the Western Diversification Fund to Cobra Enterprises Limited which moved from Vancouver to Markham, Ontario, two months ago. This company makes anti-theft alarms for automobiles. Too bad there is not a similar alarm attached to the Western Diversification Fund.

The next time the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) crows about the Western Diversification Fund, those of us who live in the West will remember Cobra. We might even drive by the empty Cobra headquarters in Vancouver and remember that with the Conservatives at the till the Western Diversification Fund is to help steal western jobs and businesses to the east.

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT—SUPPORT OF SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I was interested to read the July-August issue of Small Business. The magazine features free trade. Its editorials illustrate that Canada's business community overwhelmingly gives the green light to the free trade agreement.

The magazine shows that the vast majority of small businesses agree on one thing—Canada will benefit from free trade. They are not afraid to compete in the largest market in the world.

This issue of Small Business should be placed on the summer reading list of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner).

I know that the Hon. Member from Canada's best example of free trade, Oshawa, will also be interested in what ordinary businessmen have to say.

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT—EFFECT ON GRAPE GROWERS

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, we have heard the Hon. Member for Lincoln (Mrs. Martin). We have heard the Hon. Member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Nicholson). I would like to throw them a challenge.

Will the Conservatives sink to a new low as they have done with the free trade deal? These Members in the Niagara Peninsula and in the Okanagan Valley are so afraid of competition from opposition in the election that they have actually written a clause into the grape deal which states that no Member of Parliament can actually take advantage of the deal.

What that is saying is that members of the agricultural community who have a legitimate battle to fight, who have grapes that they will have to bury over the next few weeks as they are ripening on the vines, with no market, do not have the right to run for Parliament because they will not be able to participate in the Government's pay-out on the free trade deal to the grape farmers.

That is a fact. The Government knows that it is a fact. The reason it has put it into place is because areas such as the Niagara Peninsula and the Okanagan Valley will reject the Conservatives totally.

I would like to give the grape farmers a chance to have their say. I would like to give the grape farmers a chance to run. Go to it!

THE FRANCHISE

PENITENTIARY INMATES—ONTARIO COURT DECISION

Mr. Jim Jepson (London East): Mr. Speaker, last week, like many other Canadians, I read in The Toronto Star that Mr. Justice Bowlby of the Ontario Supreme Court struck down as unconstitutional Section 16 of the Ontario Elections Act which disqualified federal and provincial inmates, taking away their right to vote, and feels that these men and women should have the right to vote. Like many other Canadians, I am appalled by this thought. I believe, as many other Canadians do, that when prisoners enter prison they lose their right to vote and other rights as normal citizens.

I call upon the Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn) to call upon his provincial counterparts to encourage the provincial Attorneys General to have the Crown appeal this decision.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

POSITION OF PARTI QUÉBÉCOIS LEADER

Mr. Ernie Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Parti Quebeçois is quoted in today's press as advocating tax discrimination against companies that obtain federal funds to provide services in English in Quebec.

He also expressed concern that non-profit groups which run shelters for battered women and day care centres, which are forced to operate on very limited budgets, might be tempted to hire bilingual staff in order to increase their revenues. "That's frightening", he says, "to subject people to such temptations."

We understand and appreciate the desire to establish French as the language of public life in Quebec. But hundreds of thousands of Anglophone Quebecers would appreciate services in their own language. And, if they become the only bilingual people in Québec, surely it would not be unfair for the federal Government to assist in their employment and the resulting service in both French and English.

Canadian history reveals so many instances of the refusal of English-speaking majorities to respect the rights of linguistic minorities, especially the French-speaking communities outside Quebec. I look forward to the day when the people of Quebec, secure in the vigour of their French, will be ready to accept the use of English in their province as well.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

OPPORTUNITY TO MAINTAIN EARLY RETIREMENT PROGRAM

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, more than two years ago, the Conservative Government abolished the early retirement program that existed to help workers 55 and over in the textile, footwear and clothing industries and even in outlying regions.

Unfortunately, for two years, this Government has been unable to reach an agreement with the provincial governments to give older workers who are in difficulty as a result of the free trade agreement and who lose their jobs an early retirement program so that people of 50 and older could have a decent income.

Mr. Speaker, I would hope that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) will ask the Minister of Labour to end these negotiations and to restore the former program that existed under the Liberals, which helped older workers have decent incomes.

MINES AND MINING

FUTURE OF WAWA IRON ORE MINE

Mr. Aurèle Gervais (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, the offer by Dofasco Inc. on July 18 to buy Algoma Steel Corporation Ltd. has raised some grave concerns on the part of Wawa residents about its impact on the iron ore mine there.

Both Dofasco President, Paul Phoenix, and Algoma President, Peter Nixon, have stated that Algoma Steel Corporation will continue to operate independently as a wholly owned subsidiary and have assured Wawa residents that the Dofasco offer does not change anything with regard to the future of the Algoma Ore Division operation in Wawa.

PROVINCIAL AFFAIRS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—SPYING OPERATION ON CITIZENS COALITION FOR CHOICE ON ABORTION

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, the latest undemocratic anti-women tactics of the Socred Government of B.C. smell of totalitarianism. They are an affront to those who are struggling to provide options for women who seek medical abortions.

The government tactics of infiltrating the concerned Citizens for Choice on Abortion, in order to steal mailing lists and spy on plans for an abortion clinic, are a denial of civil rights and the constitutional right of assembly.

Since the Supreme Court of Canada's decision in the Morgentaler case, abortion clinics are now legal. In Québec and Ontario they provide safer, more cost effective, more accessible abortion services, with counselling.

Costs of abortion should be covered under the Canada Health Act. The Vander Zalm Government was proven wrong when it refused medical coverage for hospital abortions. It continues to ignore the Supreme Court decision by allowing unconstitutional therapeutic abortion committees. Now we learn that the government will stoop to any tactics to carry out the Premier's personal anti-women, anti-choice agenda. It should resign and go to the people for judgment.

THE ANTARCTIC

CONVENTION ON REGULATION OF MINERAL RESOURCE ACTIVITIES

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, in order to provide for the orderly exploitation of Antarctic hydrocarbon and mineral resources, the "Convention on the Regulation of Antarctic Mineral Resource Activities" was negotiated last June under the auspices of the United Nations.

Canadian oil, gas, and mining companies are world leaders in polar operations.

Under the Convention it is up to the state party thereto to represent the commercial applicant for the purposes of acquiring exploration and production rights.

Therefore, the Government of Canada should expeditiously put in place a mechanism so that Canadian companies can get in on the ground floor with respect to these new Antarctic opportunities.

TRIBUTE TO PAGE STAFF

Mr. Speaker: I know that Hon. Members would want me to take a moment to thank our 42 parliamentary Pages.

• (1420)

Mr. Speaker: I can say to the Pages that I was going to read a bit of a statement, but I think that the House has expressed itself very well indeed.

I do want to say to all of the Pages that we are very impressed with your service this year, even though I understand that your skill at either hockey or softball is not that of the assembled Members of Parliament!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Thank you very much for everything you have done. Bonne Chance!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT—TERMS OF U.S. LEGISLATION

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I recognize that the Minister for International Trade does not want to confuse himself with the facts by reading essential documents. I wonder if he has had an opportunity yet to read the final version of the U.S. Bill implementing the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement, particularly those sections which I think that most Canadians will find outrageous and will find out that they have been substantially misled by the Government in all its guarantees and assurances.

There is now provision within that legislation to authorize the President to begin negotiating new measures dealing with investment in energy and culture, to eliminate all the clauses that have been grandfathered in the agreement, to begin to develop brand new regimes that would eliminate all the assurances that we have received.

Considering that that is now the U.S. agenda, does the Canadian Government agree to the negotiation of new measures in energy and culture? Is that part of the deal, that we have agreed to further give away and further sell out these crucial parts of the Canadian integrity?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the premises of the hon. gentleman's question are entirely incorrect. In the U.S. legislation, in the Statement of Administrative Action that accompanies it, it is said in several areas that the Congress would like the President to discuss with or negotiate with Canada certain other matters. Of course, it takes two people to negotiate.

We intend to be negotiating with the United States at the GATT negotiations. We intend to be negotiating with 96 other countries in the GATT round of negotiations. We are not going to negotiate or refuse to discuss with the United States matters that it might want to discuss, and we have matters that we want to discuss with it.

The hon. gentleman's statements about what is in the U.S. legislation otherwise are completely erroneous. If he is such a great reader and such an astute reader, would he refer to one specific item that I can then deal with, and not these wild, unfounded scurrilous, nonsensical pieces of nonsense that he gets on with?

He dealt with his own colleague, the Hon. Member for Montréal—Sainte-Marie this morning. No wonder he is irritable, because there now appear to be two trade critics in the Liberal Party.

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to help the Hon. Minister with his remedial reading program, because I know that he needs all the help that he can get.

Section 304(B) states that the President is authorized to begin negotiations "to the extension of the principles of the Agreement to energy and cultural industries, to the extent such industries are not currently covered by the Agreement". That is written in black and white in the U.S. legislation, and the Minister may want to take the time to read it.

By saying in the House that it is now in agreement to conduct negotiations, why is the Government agreeing to a further elimination of protection for our cultural industries, further elimination of protection for our energy industries? Are we now agreed that we are now in a new bilateral negotiation giving away more that we gave away the last time?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman better get somebody to give him a slide show. He does not understand what he reads.

This states that Congress would like the President to negotiate. Naturally they want the President to negotiate because the President did not get very much from Canada in the free trade agreement that is now before Parliament, so they want to continue negotiating, and we intend to continue negotiating. So does the Liberal Party, because the Hon. Member for Montréal—Sainte-Marie said today: "The Liberals will tell Canadians we won't negotiate one deal with the U.S. but several deals with other countries. We won't put all our eggs in one basket".

The Liberals are not going to negotiate just with the United States, but with all countries. Then we discover later on today in another statement the hon. gentleman says that a Liberal Government would not seek unilateral free trade agreements.

EAST COAST FISHING INDUSTRY

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Just to correct the Minister again, the legislation specifically reads "The President is authorized"—"not we would like"—he is authorized to enter into these negotiations.

Further, we had received assurances in this House that the whole question of the protection of the East Coast fishery would be established. Yet under this agreement, Section 305, the United States Government clearly takes on the power to undertake retaliatory action against any effort by Canada to apply control on unprocessed fish.

Some Hon. Members: Read it properly.

Mr. Axworthy: Canada will no longer be able to provide for the processing of fish without retaliation from the United States. Do you call that free trade, Mr. Minister? You have just given away the whole East Coast fishing industry. Why are you allowing that to happen?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, luckily some Canadians are looking on so they can see the kind of spectacle we see every day in this House. The Hon. Member is raising unfounded fear. We protected the East Coast fishing industry, and in the U.S. legislation—

Mr. Axworthy: You better read the document.

Mr. Crosbie: They can outshout me, Mr. Speaker.

An Hon. Member: You can't read.

Mr. Axworthy: Bring your colouring book next time.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Minister has the floor.

Mr. Crosbie: As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman didn't refer to any specific language in any clause to back up his point about the East Coast fishery. He completely ignored the fact that one section that did affect Canada in the proposed legislation has been completely removed, and that is the section having to do with lobsters and the size of lobsters. That has been taken out and removed from the final version of the U.S. legislation. The hon. gentleman does not mention that. He gets up and tries to mislead the House and the Canadian people about a clause to which he doesn't refer. It is a scurrilous performance, but it is his usual performance.

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT—GUARANTEES—NEED FOR GENERAL ELECTION

Mr. Raymond Garneau (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. The main objective of the talks with the United States was to give Canadian products secure access to American markets. We on this side of the House have said that the talks between Canada and the United States and the agreement that was before the House failed to meet this objective.

Mr. Speaker, President Reagan announced when he tabled his bill—that is what it says in the documents that accompanied the bill—that U.S. anti-dumping laws would continue to apply and that the Americans would continue to enforce other U.S. protectionist laws with respect to Canadian products. Unless the Prime Minister doesn't believe what President Reagan says, unless what comes out of the White House . . . this is no reporter, this is not some third-rate flunky, this is the President of the United States who has clearly set forth in a document the facts that I just mentioned . . . I want to ask the Prime Minister this: What is the purpose, what are the reasons for implementing an agreement that doesn't even guarantee the basic conditions for these negotiations? So why not call an election so that Canadians can pass judgement on the stories the Prime Minister has told us?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member from Montreal says that the Government failed to obtain access to the coveted U.S. market, and that is his complaint. However, Mr. Speaker, the Premier of Quebec, the Hon. Robert Bourassa, says the exact opposite, namely that Canada and Quebec, as a result of the free trade agreement, have secured an historic and unique access for Quebec's and Canada's products, and that is one of the reasons why Mr. Bourassa and practically all businessmen and economic and social partners in Quebec are in favour of the free trade agreement.

CREDIBILITY OF UNITED STATES PRESIDENT AND OF CANADIAN PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Raymond Garneau (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister of Canada can tell us his version of the story, but there is no agreement if the Americans disagree, and the President of the United States says so clearly in the document he tabled in the U.S. Congress.

And another thing: we were promised secure access, and we do not have it. We were told that elements of our cultural policy were not in the agreement, and they are, according to statements by the U.S. President. We were told that the Auto Pact was not on the table, but the Americans, through their President, tell us that it is. And furthermore, farmers are now . . . Mr. Speaker we have been . . . The U.S. President . . .

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Garneau: Mr. Speaker, when we look at the statement in Articles 706 and 703 of the documents tabled by the U.S. President, it says that the Reagan administration tried to eliminate all restrictions on exports of U.S. products to Canada, including chickens, eggs and egg products, all of which are subject to Canadian marketing boards, and which the Prime Minister himself said were not affected by the agreement. So who is telling the truth, the U.S President or the Prime Minister of Canada?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday's headline in La Presse said that:

> Business community launches violent attacks on Turner

We read the following:

> "The business community is flabbergasted by the decision of the Leader of the Opposition, Mr. John Turner, to invoke the power of the Liberal majority in the Senate to block the passage of the free trade agreement.
> "I am thunderstruck", exclaimed Mr. Claude Garcia, President of the Montreal Chamber of Commerce."

Quebecers and the Government of Quebec have taken a position that is completely different from the views expressed by the Hon. Member for Laval-des-Rapides, and I hope . . .

Some Hon. Members: Explain!

Mr. Mulroney: It is not my job to explain statements . . . it it is not up to me to explain decisions made by a non-Canadian. But I wish someone would explain the contradictory statements made by the Hon. Member for Montreal—Sainte-Marie and the Hon. Member for Winnipeg this morning!

WATER RESOURCES

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister for International Trade. For some weeks we on this side of the House have been warning the Minister that water is in fact included in the agreement which the Government has negotiated with the United States. The Minister denied this for many days and has now suddenly acknowledged that perhaps there is a legitimate concern.

The Minister has now acknowledged that there is at least potentially a problem with water and he is rumoured to be considering changing the wording. Could he tell us whether in his deliberations he is planning to make changes in the Bill which is actually before Parliament, or is thinking of making changes in the wording of the actual agreement negotiated between Canada and the United States?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I will try to explain the situation again to the Hon. Member. Water in its natural state is not included in the free trade agreement. There is nothing in the free trade agreement that compels Canadians, or even induces Canadians, to permit water in its natural form to be exported to the United States. If that were ever done it would be as a result of a decision of the government of the day that that was its policy. This Government has decided that that is not our policy, and that statement was made last November.

There has been a deliberate campaign of misinformation up and down this country by the two opposition Parties and others who wish to try to stop the free trade agreement. Therefore, I have said that if the majority of the committee believes that it might help to clear up the confusion which has been deliberately planted in the minds of the public to consider an amendment in the free trade legislation, that can be considered. There can be no amendment to the free trade agreement. The free trade agreement is set.

Such an amendment in the legislation is not necessary, but in order to lay to rest these unfounded rumours and insinuations I will be pleased to consider it.

I have in my hand a statement made yesterday by Mr. Yeutter, the U.S. trade negotiator. On July 26 on Canada A.M. he was asked about water.

Some Hon. Members: Order.

Some Hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the Hon. Minister could come back to that in answering another question.

REQUEST THAT AGREEMENT BE CHANGED

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, the Minister has moved from denying the necessity for any change to saying that maybe there could be a change in the legislation. We know that he has extensive knowledge from his vast reading of the details of the agreement.

Will he acknowledge that any law we pass in the Parliament of Canada which contradicts the agreement in terms of subject matters pertinent to the agreement is in effect null and void and, therefore, if we really wish to protect water in the agreement itself it is absolutely essential to have a change in the wording of the agreement rather than in legislation introduced in the House of Commons?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I want to refer to what was stated by the United States trade representative, Mr. Clayton Yeutter, who negotiated the agreement on behalf of the United States. He was asked yesterday, "There's a lot of concern expressed in Canada in the past few weeks about water and how it figures into the trade deal. Does it?". He said, "Well, as far as I'm concerned, it does not. Certainly we had no intent, as we negotiated the arrangements, to in any way involve ourselves in the water issue".

That is the answer of the United States trade representative. Water is not included. We agree with his statement. Both parties to the agreement agree that water is not included.

We know that bottled water is included as a tariff item in the schedule. We know that compressed air is included as a tariff item in the schedule. However, that does not mean that Canada must sell its air to the United States, although some of it, particularly that surrounding the hon. gentleman, might well be sold to the United States.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, quoting Mr. Yeutter on any aspect of the agreement as it pertains to Canada is like a chicken listening to a quote from Colonel Sanders and believing it.

MINISTER'S POSITION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, if Mr. Yeutter is so convinced that water is not included, and the deputy chief negotiator for Canada, a former civil servant, has said that water is included, why will the Minister not put this question to Mr. Yeutter? If he is convinced water is not included, why will he not agree to a change in the agreement?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has not been here every day and perhaps he did not hear my answer of some days ago. Mr. Frank Stone of the Institute for Research on Public Policy, who was one of our major negotiators at the GATT and is very experienced, said in an article:

> The free trade agreement . . . has nothing at all to do with the diversion or inter-basin transfer of water.

He said:

> Water diversions have never been discussed in the GATT and any suggestion that GATT covers water diversions or inter-basin transfers would be hooted down in Geneva by the GATT member countries.

The hon. gentleman should not bother with chicken. He should bother about those who go around the country crying wolf when all they are trying to do is spread alarm and fear.

CHILD CARE

ACCESSIBILITY—NATIONAL OBJECTIVE

Mrs. Lucie Pépin (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The Government has abdicated its responsibility and failed to ensure national standards through the Canada Child Care Bill. Yesterday the Minister of National Health and Welfare told this House that it was impossible to ensure national standards, that even the Canada Health Act did not have national standards but merely objectives.

Well, one of these objectives is accessibility, an objective sorely missing from the Canada Child Care Bill which does not mention children from lower to middle-income families.

Since the Minister chooses to play with words, will he commit himself and his Government to amending the Canada Child Care Bill to include the national objective of accessibility and to ensure a place for every child in this country?

• (1440)

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the Canada Child Care Act substantially increases the number of subsidized spaces in Canada by 200,000 over a seven-year period. The Hon. Member should recognize and acknowledge that. If she wants to compare it, for example, to health care, it has been a principle between the federal Government and the provinces that everyone should have access to health care.

The other point I think she should understand is that we developed a child care policy, and many Canadians do not agree that the same comparison either exists or that every child below a certain age, say six and under, should have a place or that there should be a formal day care space for it.

I think the Government, given its fiscal capacity and considering its agreements with the provinces, has moved this forward very substantially this year. The number of spaces has increased by 200,000, involving an increased expenditure of $6.4 billion, and the only people I hear who say it is not enough are the NDP and Liberals and those who wanted to see a different child care system, namely, a universal system fully paid for by the taxpayers. That is supported by less than 10 per cent of the public.

REQUEST FOR GUARANTEE DAY CARE CENTRES IN EDUCATIONAL FACILITIES WILL BE SUBSIDIZED

Mrs. Lucie Pépin (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid we definitely do not agree on the statistics, because these 200,000 spaces over a seven-year period mean 28,000 spaces per year, shared among twelve provinces.

Mr. Speaker, it is a fact that 57 per cent of children between the ages of six and fourteen are without supervision after school. Quebecers is one of the few provinces that allows the use of school premises after school to supervise these children, and the Government of Quebec is concerned about this Bill. Why? Because the Bill tabled on Monday makes no mention at all of children between the ages of six and fourteen, and because they are actually excluded from the legislation, and I quote: Does not include any service relating wholly or substantially to education.

Will the Minister therefore guarantee that school day care will be subsidized in his new Bill?

[English]

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the issue of child care spaces within educational facilities has been a matter of discussion between the Government of Canada and the Government of Quebec. I am sure the Hon. Member recognizes the very clear and independent position the current and former Governments of Quebec have taken over a long period of time with respect to provincial rights over education.

What I can say to her is that some of the speculation in the French press over the last few days with respect to the percentages Quebec would receive is just that, speculation. The federal Government has very clearly said in its discussions with Quebec that the province will receive the 50 per cent plus factor, but with respect to school based child care, while we can I think negotiate some of the areas, the Child Care Act is not intended to extend sharing to education and health jurisdictions. That falls within Established Programs Financing. I think when we look at it seriously that is where it should be.

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT—CULTURAL INDUSTRIES

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. He is the person in the Government who said that cultural industries are exempt from the trade deal.

In the U.S. administration Statement of Action, which I have here, the U.S. says that any use of this exemption "would be regrettable" and the U.S. would take action "discouraging the exercise of and reliance on this clause in the future".

How can the Government say that culture is exempt when this very clear threat to the use of that exemption exists?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the Statement of Administrative Action filed in connection with this legislation is a wish list, a sop to individual Congressmen and Senators to get their support for the Bill. That is the way the congressional system works.

We have provisions in the agreement that exclude cultural industries from the free trade agreement except for a clause that protects us in the event there is some action taken by the U.S. It does not foreclose the U.S. from protesting. It does not foreclose the U.S. from trying to export its own goods and services. It does not foreclose the U.S. from expressing wishes. However, we will determine whether or not its wishes are ever acceded to.

There is nothing in the agreement that gives them any right to enforce any particular position with respect to cultural industries. They are fully defended under the agreement, and the hon. gentleman's lachrymose reading of a clause or wish from the Statement of Administrative Action does not change that, no matter how much he might want it to be changed. He is Chicken Little following Colonel Barney Sanders there.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, the Minister should know that the administrative Statement of Action is a precise statement of what the U.S. Government will do, not what it wishes to do—what it will do—with respect to this agreement.

CULTURAL INDUSTRIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): I have a supplementary. Will this Government get in touch with the U.S. administration to protest this American attack on our cultural industries?

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, when we look at the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement we have first to realize that both sides negotiated hard and got a good deal for their respective countries.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: However, in Canada we protected all of the industries we wished to protect, like the cultural industries and the supply-management system. It is a miracle that we have all of these achievements and reached our objectives as we did.

The hon. gentleman says this is what the U.S. will do. The U.S. is free to do what it wishes, to try to put forward its point of view, to make its arguments. However, when it comes to matters within our jurisdiction we will decide. They can express wishes, we will decide. The Opposition believes that a wish from the U.S. is something that someone must carry out, and probably they would if they were in our position. We believe a wish is to be considered, but we will decide the matters that come within our jurisdiction.

ALLEGED GANG RAPE

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, it is amazing that the Prime Minister will not answer why the Government has broken its commitment on culture. Maybe he will answer another question.

Some Hon. Members: Order!

Ms. Copps: All of us were disgusted to read the press reports in the last several days about the gang rape of a militia officer allegedly involving 15 Armed Forces personnel, including a corporal. We understand that the Associate Minister of National Defence has called for an internal investigation.

Given the seriousness of these allegations, and suggestions that this has been known on the Base for more than three years, does the Prime Minister not believe this warrants an independent investigation outside the Armed Forces?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as soon as this allegation was made public the Associate Minister of National Defence ordered a full investigation by the Special Investigations Unit. They would have the authority and ability to lay charges. If there are any grounds to substantiate those charges, they will be laid.

I am as shocked as the Hon. Member that anyone would claim to have information about this for four years and take some four years before making it public. The Special Investigations Unit will pursue this fully. If there is any basis for criminal charges, they will be laid.

REQUEST FOR INDEPENDENT INVESTIGATION

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, we saw the results of the internal investigation into the RCMP incident where an officer of the Musical Ride was forced to leave that unit after she was filmed in a pornographic way by her fellow officers. Does the Prime Minister not feel that these allegations are serious enough that, to clear the air, we need an independent investigation outside the Armed Forces?

We are talking about allegations that a corporal was involved. We are talking about allegations that a whole Base stood silent for more than three years.

Will the Prime Minister clear the air and appoint an independent investigator outside the Armed Forces to put these allegations to rest or to proceed in a more definitive way?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the Special Investigations Unit is from outside CFB Petawawa. If the Hon. Member is suggesting that the Armed Forces would condone or turn the other way—

Ms. Copps: Three years.

Mr. Beatty: —from actively pursuing a case in which rape, a criminal offence, took place—

Ms. Copps: They just did.

Mr. Beatty: If the Hon. Member has any evidence whatsoever suggesting there has been a cover-up by the Canadian Forces of a criminal activity, let her tender that information. Any such activity would be abhorrent to every member of the Canadian Forces and would be a breach of the Criminal Code of Canada. If there is any basis for charges being laid they will indeed be.

FISHERIES

DIXON ENTRANCE—INFRACTIONS BY U.S. FISHING VESSELS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs. Since Dixon Entrance from the AB Line south is listed under Canadian law as our sovereign territorial sea and fishing zone, will the Minister assure the House that it is the policy of the Government of Canada to have enforcement officers on site to board immediately and arrest any U.S. vessel fishing without authority and refusing to comply with the Canadian request to leave the area south of 54:40?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member was very careful in phrasing his question, so I will be careful in answering it. We intend to take the required actions to enforce our jurisdiction.

ROLE OF ENFORCEMENT OFFICERS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, we know that the West Coast fishing industry was not protected under the free trade agreement. There is growing concern that there is a hidden agenda to the free trade agreement over water, fish, plywood and other items.

Why, on June 22, 1988, were federal enforcement personnel in British Columbia advised in writing that their enforcement and arrest powers had been delegated away from them and away from the responsible Ministers? In fact, they are ordered not to take any enforcement action until so instructed by the legal operations branch of External Affairs in Ottawa, even when they are at the scene of a flagrant violation of Canadian law.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will determine the answer to that precise question and communicate it to the Hon. Member. However, he is trying to raise a false fear here about the capacity of the Government of Canada, or the willingness of the Government of Canada to enforce our jurisdiction. That is a false fear. Where there is a Canadian jurisdiction, we shall enforce it.

TAX REFORM

PROVISION AFFECTING PARENTS WITH 18-YEAR OLD DEPENDANTS

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Minister of Finance. It concerns the Government's so-called tax reform. Although there are tax credits available for post-secondary education, parents of 18-year olds who are still in high school or unemployed lose the existing exemption of $1,200 which is not replaced by a tax credit unless the young person is disabled. Will the Minister explain why the Government is making it harder for families with dependent young people?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is quite right. She makes the distinction between different classes as they are treated under tax reform.

The parliamentary committee will be looking at this in the next few weeks. We will see whether adjustments are justified.

I remind the Hon. Member that tuition can now be deducted by a parent, not by a student. This is a very important addition to tax reform, helping parents of students across the country.

Miss Nicholson (Trinity): You do not pay tuition in high school.

SITUATION OF SINGLE PARENTS

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, a single parent who formerly claimed the equivalent-to-married deduction for a dependent child over 18, valued at $3,740 by the Department of Finance, can no longer do so. This is an even greater hardship for the single parent who is supporting an unemployed 18 or 19-year old and earning a very modest income. Does the Minister also intend to review that?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, in most categories of income in this country, single parents will do better under tax reform. As a matter of fact, they can be included in the more than eight out of ten Canadians who benefit from tax reform. The Hon. Member raises a specific issue within that, and I hope the committee will look at it carefully.

HEALTH

CHICKENS FED WITH IRRADIATED FEED

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg—Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It concerns chickens but it has nothing to do with the earlier exchange between my Leader and the Minister for International Trade.

It deals with the fact that some 900 chickens have been fed irradiated feed at the University of Manitoba and are about to be sold to Manitoba consumers. Is the Minister aware that these chickens will not be required to be labelled in such a way as to indicate they have been fed with irradiated feed? If so, why is he prepared to allow these chickens to be sold to Manitoba consumers? Why has he allowed AECL and the University of Manitoba to contemplate releasing these chickens into the marketplace without such labelling?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member knows that before any new product that has been irradiated can be sold on the market, certain requirements must be met. Those were made public some time ago by the Government.

I will check into the specific case he mentions. I do not have details on it, but I will do that later this afternoon.

REQUEST THAT REGULATIONS BE AMENDED

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg—Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, the Minister does not seem to be aware that both the current labelling regulations and his proposed labelling regulations for irradiated food do not require labelling in the case of animals that have been fed irradiated food. Is he prepared to amend these regulations to ensure that any food that has had any irradiation involved in its life cycle or processing will be clearly labelled to that effect? The Minister does not seem to really understand what is going on in this experiment. It is time he got on top of it.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, under the former regulations certain grains could be irradiated. The Hon. Member should know that. Also, certain flour could be irradiated and the Hon. Member should know that as well. As a person with a rural background, I am well aware of the food cycle and what animals are being fed.

As I said in my first answer, I will check this afternoon and report back to him.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

COMMUNICATIONS SYSTEM FOR EMBASSIES—TENDERING PROCESS

Mr. Barry Turner (Ottawa—Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Supply and Services. The Canadian On-line Secure Information and Communications System, or COSIC, is designed to provide a state of the art automation and communication system for Canadian embassies.

In light of the speculation and criticism that have arisen lately both in the press and in the House, will the Minister explain why the RCMP commercial crime division is investigating this matter, and provide the House with any information that he may have regarding the alleged irregularities in the bidding process for this extremely important contract?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, as the Hon. Member knows, a couple of months ago one of the bidders in this very complex contract bid process, that is open and up front, raised some concerns. As a result, the Government of Canada initiated two independent but internal studies, both of which proved to show no wrong-doing.

The Hon. Member knows as well that a couple of weeks ago I confirmed that there indeed was an RCMP investigation into this matter. I want to report to the House that the Commissioner of the RCMP concluded in a letter dated July 22 that: "The investigation determined that the complaints received were totally unfounded. No evidence of any wrong-doing surfaced throughout the investigation". As a result, we are going to continue with our evaluation and proceed according to plan.

APARTHEID

TENNIS TOURNAMENT—PROPOSED PARTICIPATION BY WHITE SOUTH AFRICANS

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Yesterday I asked a question about the loophole which has been opened by the Conservative Government in Canada's policy on sports competitors from South Africa. I challenged the Government to stop trying a weak behind the scenes manoeuvre, and to act directly to exclude the two South African athletes who are intending to play in the Player's Tennis Tournament taking place next month in my riding.

• (1500)

Next week the Secretary of State for External Affairs will be in Toronto hosting a Commonwealth conference on South Africa. Will he now, in preparation for that meeting, accept the position of the Official Opposition, cut off diplomatic relations with South Africa, and close the Mulroney loophole in the Gleneagles Agreement so that these two athletes cannot perform?

Mr. McDermid: What a sleazebag!

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, not to emphasize it too much, it is simply false—if the rules of the House of Commons allowed me, I would use another phrase—it is simply false to suggest this gap was created by this Government. In fact, anyone who wants to compare the actions of the Government in which the Hon. Member was a Minister with the actions of this Government—

Ms. Copps: You initiated the sports policy in 1985.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): —with regard to fighting apartheid will know that the Government of Prime Minister Brian Mulroney has not only led this country but has led the world in fighting apartheid, and we intend to continue to do that.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): With regard to the substance of the question there is a gap. We intend to close it.

Ms. Copps: That you opened in 1985.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): I expect to have it closed before the weekend.

DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH SOUTH AFRICA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): I am delighted with the Minister's announcement, and I am waiting for further developments. My supplementary for the Minister is this: Could he explain to the House and to the people of this country why Canada continues to give credibility to South Africa, to a racist government, by allowing it to maintain diplomatic relations with Canada?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will repeat in French what I said before, namely that the Liberal Party's position on South Africa, when it was in power, was to accept apartheid. The position of the Progressive Conservative Government was and is to fight energetically against apartheid.

As far as diplomatic relations with South Africa are concerned this is an issue that has been discussed at length here in the House. The Canadian Government's position is clear. The Canadian Government's position is respected by the Blacks in Southern Africa as well as by individuals who are truly concerned about fighting apartheid. It may be that for partisan purposes, the Liberal Party would like to change the position it took as a Government . . . To us, it is a matter of principle. The Canadian Government is showing strong leadership in the fight against apartheid.

FRASER VALLEY—EMISSIONS FROM BURRARD THERMAL GENERATING PLANT

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Recent research and air monitoring indicate that a very serious ozone pollution problem exists in the summertime and that the possible operation of two of the six generating units in the Burrard Thermal Generating Plant will greatly increase the pollution. In fact, this would be the equivalent of adding 110,000 car emissions daily to the air in the Fraser Valley.

Will the Minister consider the effect on the environment in the valley, especially Chilliwack, when making the decision whether or not to reissue the permit to B.C. Hydro for energy exports using the Burrard Thermal Generating Plant?

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the question of the Hon. Member for Fraser Valley East is indeed a good one. He has made good representations to the Government on a number of occasions. I would like to remind him that in 1980, B.C. Hydro applied for export permits to export electricity to the United States. At that time the Government issued the necessary permits through the National Energy Board but would not allow exports to come from the Burrard plant because it lacked pollution controls.

Since that time pollution controls have been put in place and they have been issued the necessary permits and licence from the British Columbia Government. As recently as last month the National Energy Board agreed to increase the exports from B.C. Hydro using the Burrard plant because it had installed these necessary pollution controls. The Minister is now looking at that decision.

MUNICIPAL AFFAIRS

HALIFAX HARBOUR SEWAGE PROJECT

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. It concerns a matter that crosses departmental jurisdiction. On February 5, 1987, the Minister of Finance said in the House that municipal infrastructure is the responsibility of the municipalities and the provinces. Yesterday we had the announcement in Halifax of a much needed municipal sewage treatment facility paid for in part by the federal Government. Given that the Canadian Federation of Municipalities has been calling for a federal-provincial-municipal program like the one the Government developed for Halifax for every city in this country, would the Prime Minister now agree that the time has come to help rebuild our cities?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of the Environment and the Minister of Finance have made the Government's position clear on this matter. The particular circumstances in Halifax were quite unique, and the Hon. Member knows the uniqueness behind the Halifax example.

Mr. Broadbent: Yes, a provincial election.

REQUEST FOR FEDERAL FUNDING TO ASSIST MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, the community I come from is also putting raw sewage into the harbours of the Great Lakes. There are other cities which are doing the same thing. Each city has unique reasons for needing federal help. Is it not now time for the federal Government to accept its responsibility on environmental aspects and provide municipalities with the necessary funds to clean up our water, whether it is what we send out or take in, to ensure our cities are healthy and safe?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member knows full well that what is being done for the Halifax harbour is a technological prototype of major importance for Canada. We are delighted for what it means as a demonstration project for Canada. We are delighted for what it means for the harbour of Halifax.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Welland on a single question.

LIBERAL POLICY

Mr. Allan Pietz (Welland): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Official Opposition first said he would tear up the free trade agreement. Then he said he would renegotiate it. Then he said there would be no bilateral agreement. The Hon. Member for Montreal—Saint-Marie now says they would negotiate bilateral agreements with many countries. Could the Minister for International Trade clarify for the Canadian public what the Liberal policy on trade really is?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Robinson: Order Paper!

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time I have ever been asked to perform a miracle in this House. It is impossible to tell what policy they have with respect to free trade because, for example, the Liberal Whip saw some irony in the thought that Mr. Turner, who wanted to rip up the free trade agreement in Washington, is now going to—

Some Hon. Members: More, more!

Mr. Broadbent: That's pretty good, John.

Mr. Crosbie: I was surprised I got this far.

Mr. Speaker: It was a good try.

Point of Order—Mr. Axworthy

POINTS OF ORDER

USE OF UNPARLIAMENTARY LANGUAGE

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a point of order. The Minister for International Trade (Mr. Crosbie), in his normal modest, limited, restricted, moderate way, found himself using a word which is contrary to the rules of debate according to Beauchesne at page 110, the word is "scurrilous". I know the Minister cannot spell it, nor can he understand it, but he did use it and I would like him to withdraw it.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the word "scurrilous" and say "contemptible".

Mr. Axworthy: I want to check that one out, too.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Earlier this day I distinctly heard the Hon. Member for Brampton—Georgetown (Mr. McDermid) refer to one of my colleagues as a sleazebag while a question was being asked.

Mr. Crosbie: Which one was it?

Mr. Boudria: He referred that way to the Hon. Member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan). Some two weeks ago a similar remark from the same Hon. Member was made towards myself and reported in Hansard. I do not recall anyone on this side ever describing that Member with similar remarks. I would hope you, Mr. Speaker, would ask the Hon. Member for Brampton—Georgetown to learn to control himself and at least to withdraw those two remarks.

Mr. John McDermid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw the remarks. I am surprised the Hon. Member would recognize which Member I referred to.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing order 106(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the Government's response to ten petitions numbered as follows: 332-5028 to 332-5030 inclusive, 332-5032 to 332-5035 inclusive and 332-5148 to 332-5150.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

PRESENTATION OF FIFTEENTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the fifteenth report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

In its twelfth report on May 4 the committee recommended the creation of a new standing committee to review government expenditures before they are made. Such a new budget committee would parallel the work of the Public Accounts Committee which reviews expenditures after the fact.

Today, we are announcing that we have asked the committee staff to carry out a study of the Estimates and budgetary process. The Public Accounts study will focus on ways to relax the non-confidence convention so that Estimates might be changed or reduced, where warranted, without bringing down the Government. The study will seek ways to balance the right of the Government of the day to govern and conduct its business in a planned way with Parliament's right to grant supply, that is, to authorize expenditures.

This study will also consider the connection between the supply process and the Ways and Means process, that is, the link between the Government's proposals for spending and the manner in which Government raises its revenues.

By considering how to improve the opportunities parliamentarians have to comment on government spending, the committee is seeking ways to improve the Government's management of the public's money.

PROTECTION OF ROUGE RIVER VALLEY WILDERNESS AREA

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to present to the House of Commons today a petition from a number of residents of Scarborough who are petitioning Parliament. They state that the Rouge River Valley in Scarborough is a unique and precious natural area and that protecting the endangered wildlife and wilderness areas is in the national interest.

The petitioners join with the federal Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan), the Scarborough City Council and Alderman for the City Council, Marilyn Mushinski, who is in the gallery today, the Save the Rouge Valley System and the Coalition of Scarborough Community Associations, in asking the Government of Canada to work with the Government of Ontario to establish the Rouge River Valley as Canadian heritage land or a provincial park.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour to have the opportunity to present a petition on behalf of constituents from Surrey, Langley, Aldergrove and White Rock, British Columbia, who believe that the Government lacks a mandate from the people of Canada to conclude a trade agreement with the United States. They believe that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) promised in the course of the trade negotiation that Canadian sovereignty would not be compromised. They believe our sovereignty in fact is compromised.

They believe that the trade deal would deny Canada the policy freedom to determine it own economic future and would undermine our ability as a country to build a society distinct from that of the United States of America.

They believe that the appropriate thing to do now would be for Parliament to dissolve to allow the people of Canada the opportunity to accept or reject the proposed trade deal during a national general election.

OPPOSITION TO REMOVAL OF FEDERAL WHARF AT SNUG COVE, B.C.

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and privilege to present to you a number of petitions from residents of Bowen Island and other residents of British Columbia.

For the past year people have been trying to get the successive Ministers of Transport to give guarantees that the federal dock at Snug Cove will not be removed in favour of a private dock and that all users will continue to be able to tie up in this area.

The petitions call upon Parliament to preserve the government wharf, floats and moorage at Snug Cove, Bowen Island, for the benefit of all users, and to oppose any development plans which would result in the removal of the government wharf, floats or moorage.

REQUEST FOR FUNDING FOR ALASKA HIGHWAY

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and pleasure to introduce petitions signed by over 200 residents of Watson Lake, the Yukon, Ross River, Lower Post and Dawson Creek, B.C., who have taken the opportunity, among many others, as has the territorial Government and myself, to petition the federal Government to recognize the importance of the Alaska Highway as an important transportation link for the territory. Given that the present condition of this highway is negatively impacting on the transportation industry and the tourism industry, the petitioners call upon the Parliament of Canada to approve immediately and to restore funding for this international highway.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and privilege to present to the House of Commons petitions signed by some 400 citizens from the riding of Hull—Aylmer, which is so well representd in the House, from the riding of Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle and from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, who ask the House to have the Parliament of Canada pass a law giving all unborn children full legal protection from the moment of conception.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

CANADIAN FORCES MARITIME EXPERIMENT AND TEST RANGES

Question No. 327—Mr. Manly:

1. Are radiation monitoring procedures conducted at the Canadian Forces Maritime Experiment and Test Ranges (CFMETR) and, if so (a) with what frequency (b) by whom (c) in what areas?

2. Are chemicals stored on the base and, if so (a) in what manner (b) what procedures are in place (i) for spill prevention (ii) in the case of a toxic spill, and in the latter case, what notification would be given to area residents?

3. Are procedures in place for emergency response to radiological accidents related to the presence of nuclear-propelled or nuclear weapons capable vessels at CFMETR and, if so (a) what are they (b) do they interface with those of municipal and provincial agencies and, if so, in what ways?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Defence): 1. Yes.

(a) Each March and September.

(b) The Department of National Defence.

(c) In areas where nuclear powered ships berth and also from designated upstream and downstream locations.

2. Yes.

(a) Chemicals are stored on the base in barrels and in underground tanks.

(b) The barrels are stored in a locked concrete pad complete with a diked compound, surrounded by a six-foot wire fence topped with barbed wire. A drain in the pad connects to two 250-gallon underground tanks isolated from the surrounding environment. Diesel fuel, unleaded gasoline, and jet fuel are stored in standard underground tanks with standard above ground pumps.

(i) The base maintains prescribed clothing and filter masks to permit personnel to quickly contain and clean up spills of toxic materials, such as cleaning fluids and OTTO Fuel II (a self-oxidizing fuel used in torpedos). A standard oil pollution control plan exists and it is similar to those in existence at other bases.

(ii) If necessary, local residents would be notified of spills in accordance with the alerting procedures established for Nuclear Emergency Response.

3. Yes.

(a) This response is provided by the Nuclear Emergency Response Team which consists of: radiation safety officer; on-scene controller; radiation monitors; decontamination personnel; security; firefighting (including fire and tug boat crews); medical personnel; construction engineering personnel; information services personnel; and other specialist staff as required. Their responsibilities are: to provide an immediate coordinated response of trained personnel to a nuclear emergency; to carry out rescue, firefighting and medical support; to cordon off the area, deny access to all unauthorized persons and ensure those personnel within the cordon are controlled and accounted for; to provide communications facilities between the emergency site, the Command Post and between the various response sections; to provide support and assistance to the base and foreign Emergency Response teams; to ensure contamination control at the scene of the emergency; to conduct radiation surveys; to carry out decontamination at the scene of the emergency of affected personnel to levels set by the Surgeon General; to provide damage control and repair facilities; to restore the scene of the emergency to normal; and to collect data which may be required for future medical or legal purposes.

(b) To ensure that Nuclear Emergency Response Team procedures interface with municipal and provincial agencies, the Region Commander organizes and chairs a local Authorities Committee which meets annually. This Committee consists of the following: civil defence co-ordination; local government; local health officials; local police departments; RCMP; provincial radiation protection services; regional surgeon; base operations; and applicable command.

JOB CREATION IN CONSTITUENCY OF WINDSOR—WALKERVILLE

Question No. 354—Mr. McCurdy:

Since September 4, 1984, have jobs been created in the constituency of Windsor—Walkerville as a direct result of government expenditures and, if so (a) what is the number of (i) jobs (ii) full-time positions created (b) what occupations are represented?

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion as follows:

In so far as the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission is concerned:

(a) and (b) The Canadian Jobs Strategy was introduced in September, 1985, in response to a realization that there was a need to deal more effectively with the problems of the most disavantaged members of the labour market. The previous approach of compensation for cyclical periods of unemployment with short-term, make-work projects, as typified by programs like Canada Works, was phased out. In its place, the emphasis was put on providing training that would prepare people to take advantage of jobs created by the activities of the economy.

Consequently, it is not possible to respond fully to the question of how many jobs have been created in the constituency of Windsor—Walkerville as a direct result of government expenditures since September 4, 1984.

It is perhaps arguable that participants in pre-Canadian Jobs Strategy programs, like Canada Works, occupied jobs created as a direct result of government expenditures. It should be noted, however, that in most, if not all, of these cases, while jobs would have been full-time, they would have lasted for a fixed, short period of time only, so at best it is probably a moot point whether or not these constitute "jobs".

Programs of the Canadian Jobs Strategy, as already indicated, do not "create jobs"; they prepare people for permanent jobs which are created as a result of other economic activities. Hence, the questions asked do not, strictly speaking, apply.

Below is a list of "participants" in all programs, old and new since April 1, 1984.

* not final year-end figures.

In so far as the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion is concerned:

(a) During the period of September 4, 1984 to March 31, 1988, 12 projects were approved for total authorized contributions of $242,215 under programs administered by the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion, creating an estimated 40 positions and maintaining an estimated 19 positions. Our records do not distinguish between full-time and part-time positions.

(b) Our records do not contain information on what occupations are represented.

REPRESENTATIONS REGARDING CRIMINAL CODE

Question No. 368—Mr. Kaplan:

Have any national associations indicated their position regarding Bill C-54, An Act to amend the Criminal Code and other Acts in consequence thereof and, if so, which ones (a) support (b) oppose the Bill?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): A large number of representations have been received from groups and individuals regarding Bill C-54. Indeed, the associations who have provided their views have done so in the context of analysis of the Bill in whole or in part and it would therefore be inappropriate and unfair for me as Minister of Justice to characterize their representations as either categorically for or categorically against Bill C-54.

AECL—GRANTS AND/OR LOANS WITHIN METROPOLITAN TORONTO

Question No. 370—Mr. Redway:

Since September 4, 1984, did Atomic Energy of Canada Limited make grants and/or loans to persons or corporations, non-governmental organizations and governments within Metropolitan Toronto and, if so, to which ones and, in each case, in what amount and for what purpose?

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Atomic Energy of Canada Limited reports as follows:

During the period September 4, 1984, to June 2, 1988, AECL has made an annual contribution of $30,000 to the Centre for Nuclear Engineering at the University of Toronto. These contributions have been made in support of the University's nuclear education and research programs.

ST. CLAIR RIVER—DIOXIN LEVEL MONITORING

Question No. 375—Mr. Langdon:

Since September, 1985, have dioxin level-monitoring procedures been carried out for the St. Clair River, and, if so (a) with what frequency (b) by what groups or individuals (c) with what results?

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of the Environment and of Fisheries and Oceans as follows:

In so far as the Department of the Environment is concerned: no.

It is the responsibility of the Ontario Ministry of Environment to conduct dioxin monitoring procedures in the St. Clair River, particularly with respect to drinking water.

Under the Canada/U.S. Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement, the Department of the Environment is responsible for the monitoring of conventional parameters and contaminants of the open lakes. The Department of the Environment is also developing analytical technology and methods to accurately measure chemicals such as dioxin.

In so far as the Department of Fisheries and Oceans is concerned:

Since 1977, DFO has carried out a contaminants monitoring program on fish and other biota of the Great Lakes in response to federal commitments respecting the 1972 and 1978 Canada/U.S. Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement.

DFO has carried out periodic contaminants monitoring programs on the St. Clair/Detroit River system since 1981. Contaminant burdens, including dioxin, have been measured in whole fish samples of top predator and bottom feeding species. The analysis of the most current (1987) samples has been delayed pending the completion of the priority national pulp mill dioxin/furan survey. There has therefore been no dioxin analysis of fish samples from this area collected since September, 1985.

RURAL DIGNITY

Question No. 378—Mr. Rodriguez:

Has Canada Post Corporation arranged for people to follow the group known as Rural Dignity as it travels across Canada to gather signatures of Canadians opposed to Canada Post's policies in rural Canada and, if so (a) on what date did these people begin following Rural Dignity (b) what number of individuals was involved in this activity (c) what are their names (d) were they regular employees of Canada Post and, if not, what were (i) the conditions of their employment (ii) the name of any third party involved in their hiring (e) what was the total cost of their (i) wages (ii) living expenses (including meals (iii) travel expenses (f) did they file any reports with Canada Post and, if so, will Canada Post make these reports available to Parliamentarians on request?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Rural Dignity—a special interest group representing the interests of the rural postmasters' union—is opposed to Canada Post's program to improve and expand postal services in rural Canada. They are seeking to maintain the high costs and inefficiencies associated with the current network of rural post offices.

Canada Post's rural restructuring program means improved service. As a result, Rural Dignity and other vested interest groups, have had to target their efforts in communities where the program has not yet been implemented; by making unfounded allegations about proposed reductions in local service, spreading misinformation, and creating fear. These groups recently sponsored a cross-country drive to seek support for the preservation of the status quo.

Canada Post, like any other business organization, had to respond to this campaign of misinformation. Our customers were being subjected to threats regarding the future of their local postal service. In order to ensure that the true story about improvements in rural postal services was heard, Canada Post personnel made themselves available to local media, community leaders, and the general public as the drive progressed across the country, from May 18 to June 7, 1988.

This effort was entirely undertaken by regular employees doing their regular work.

PROPOSED GOVERNMENT FUNDING FOR STORA INDUSTRIES

Question No. 379—Mr. Caccia:

Has Stora Industries applied for government funding to assist with their proposal to build a pulp mill in Cape Breton and, if so (a) what amount is (i) being requested (ii) already approved (b) will an environmental impact assessment of the project be a requirement for government assistance?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): The Department of Regional Industrial Expansion cannot divulge whether an application has been made or any details regarding such a possible application since all applications for funding remain confidential until such time as an agreement is concluded. Environmental considerations are a part of every project assessment process.

CANADA PENSION PLAN DISABILITY BENEFITS

Question No. 382—Ms. Copps:

It should be noted that the statistics for the various stages of the application and appeal process do not correspond directly. Many decisions rendered in one year were for applications and appeals received in the previous year and, similarily, decisions on many initial applications and appeals received in 1988 will be rendered during the current fiscal year.

It should also be noted that the great majority of appeals received at the second stage (Review Committee appeals) do not require a hearing. The reasons for this are various: for example, new medical information previously unavailable permits, in the majority of cases, our medical advisers to arrive at a favourable decision; also, many appellants return to work and withdraw their appeal.

* These numbers include cases which were resolved prior to the Pension Appeals Board Hearing.

Did Canada Post Corporation make any expenditure of funds on (a) salaries (b) per diem payments (c) lodging (d) rental of vehicles (e) other items to have officials present at the Rural Dignity "Coast to Coast for Rural Post" cross-Canada caravan and if so, in each case, in what amount?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Rural Dignity—a special interest group representing the interests of the rural postmasters' union—is opposed to Canada Post's program to improve and expand postal services in rural Canada. They are seeking to maintain the high costs and inefficiencies associated with the current network of rural post offices.

Canada Post's rural restructuring program means improved service. As a result, Rural Dignity and other vested interest groups, have had to target their efforts in communities where the program has not yet been implemented; by making unfounded allegations about proposed reductions in local service, spreading misinformation, and creating fear. These groups recently sponsored a cross-country drive to seek support for the preservation of the status quo.

Canada Post, like any other business organization, had to respond to this campaign of misinformation. Our customers were being subjected to threats regarding the future of their local postal service. In order to ensure that the true story about improvements in rural postal services was heard, Canada Post personnel made themselves available to local media, community leaders, and the general public as the drive progressed across the country, from May 18 to June 7, 1988.

This effort was entirely undertaken by regular employees doing their regular work.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call Motion for the Production of Papers No. P-9 standing in the name of the Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton).

CANADA-UNITED STATES FISHERIES ISSUES

Motion No. P-9—Mr. Fulton:

That an humble Address be presented to Her Excellency praying that she will cause to be laid before this House copies of all reports, memos, papers, letters, telexes, telegrams, and any other form of communication between government Departments and between the Government and the Government of the United States, including the White House, with regard to the October, 1985 proposal of the United States Secretary of State, that Canada and the United States appoint a Special Representative to oversee discussions and possible negotiations on outstanding common maritime boundary and fisheries issues, starting with west coast boundaries.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, the documents requested under Motion No. P-9 contain information, the disclosure of which could reasonably be expected to be injurious to the conduct by the Government of Canada of federal-provincial affairs or international affairs or both. I would therefore ask the Hon. Member to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that since this is in relation to the international boundary in my constituency, it be transferred for debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Transferred for debate.

LABRADOR INUIT LAND CLAIMS

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call Motion for the Production of Papers No. P-10.

Motion No. P-10—Mr. Fulton:

That an humble Address be presented to Her Excellency praying that she will cause to be laid before this House a copy of the bilateral memorandum of understanding between the Government and the Government of Newfoundland with respect to Labrador Inuit land claims.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, this document cannot be released pursuant to Section 69 of the Access to Information Act. Therefore, I would ask the Hon. Member to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Since these are documents in relation to a bilateral agreement between the Government of Newfoundland and the Government of Canada with respect to the Labrador Inuit land claims, and are important to my role as their advocate in this Chamber, I would ask that it be transferred for debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Transferred for debate.

SURVEYS ON PRIVATIZATION OF AIR CANADA

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call Motion for the Production of Papers No. P-13.

Motion No. P-13—Mr. Riis:

That an humble Address be presented to Her Excellency praying that she will cause to be laid before this House copies of all public opinion surveys carried out by Air Canada on the privatization of the airline.

[Translation]

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the papers requested are the private information of Air Canada.

I therefore ask the Hon. Member to withdraw his motion.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, those are surveys from Air Canada. It is privileged information to Air Canada rather than to the Government.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): This important issue was a call for papers regarding various surveys that the Government had taken on the public's interest in the privatization of this company. Therefore, I would ask that it be transferred for debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Transferred for debate.

MR. SANTOKH SINGH BAGGA

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call Motion for the Production of Papers No. P-17.

Motion No. P-17—Mr. Heap:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all correspondence, minutes of meetings, telephone logs, telexes, telegrams, memoranda, notes or any other form of communication written on behalf of the former Minister of Employment and Immigration, the Hon. Benoît Bouchard, to the Chairman of the Refugee Status Advisory Committee or any other members of the RSAC, with respect to the granting of refugee status to Mr. Santokh Singh Bagga, a former Indian Army Major.

Mr. Hawkes: On P-17 the documents requested cannot be released pursuant to section 26 of the Privacy Act. I would therefore ask the Hon. Member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I ask that it be transferred for debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Transferred for debate.

NUCLEAR SUBMARINE PROGRAM

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call Motion for the Production of Papers No. P-19.

Motion No. P-19—Ms. Jewett:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all evaluation reports concerning the costing, operations, nuclear safety, and industrial benefits of the nuclear submarine program prepared by officials of the Department of Supply and Services, the Department of National Defence and the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion for the Area Review Board comprised of officials of the above ministries to be completed by June 30, 1988.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, the report for the area review board does not yet exist. It will contain information pertaining to the most closely guarded military and proprietary secrets of the United Kingdom and France, and thus is highly classified. Accordingly, it will not be available for release. Therefore, I ask the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap (Mr. Riis), who is acting as an agent on behalf of the Hon. Member for New Westminster—Coquitlam (Ms. Jewett), to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, as an agent for the Hon. Member for New Westminster—Coquitlam (Ms. Jewett), I know how seriously the Hon. Member feels about this issue, so I would like to ask that it be transferred for debate at the appropriate time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Transferred for debate.

Shall all other Motions for Papers stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

ABORTION

The House resumed from Tuesday, July 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lewis:

That, in the opinion of this House, the Supreme Court of Canada having declared that the provisions of the Criminal Code relating to abortion are inconsistent with the provisions of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and are therefore of no force or effect, the government should prepare and introduce legislation, consistent with the Constitution of Canada, including the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which reflects the fundamental value and inherent dignity of each human being and the inherent worth of human life, and which achieves a balance between the right of a woman to liberty and security of her person and the responsibility of society to protect the unborn; and

When, during the earlier stages of pregnancy: a qualified medical practitioner is of the opinion that the continuation of the pregnancy of a woman would, or would be likely to, threaten her physical or mental well-being; when the woman in consultation with a qualified medical practitioner decides to terminate her pregnancy; and when the termination is performed by a qualified medical practitioner; and

When, during the subsequent stages of pregnancy: the termination of the pregnancy satisfies further conditions, including a condition that after a certain point in time, the termination would only be permitted where, in the opinion of two qualified medical practitioners, the continuation of the pregnancy would, or would be likely to, endanger the woman's life or seriously endanger her health.

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, it is with something less than enthusiasm that I welcome this opportunity today to speak to the motion on the subject of abortion tabled by the Government.

First of all, I must say quite frankly that the motion as it stands contains many ambiguities. It refers to the earlier stages of pregnancy. I wonder exactly what that means. Does it mean fifteen weeks, eighteen weeks or twenty weeks? I heard some Members say it was eighteen weeks, others that it was twenty weeks. There is considerable confusion about this.

There is also the matter of qualified mediacl practitioners. Exactly what does that mean? Would an ophthalmologist like our hon. colleague from Oxford (Mr. Halliday) be qualified to do an abortion?

The motion also refers to the subsequent stages of pregnancy. What are those subsequent stages? Twenty weeks or eighteen weeks or thirty weeks?

In any case, Mr. Speaker, I think the motion is "either fish nor fowl". It was simply tabled to keep Hon. Members busy before sending them off on a one-week holiday. There will be no follow-up on the motion and, as far as I know, I don't think any legislation will be tabled subsequent to the many discussions we have had in this House.

So in my opinion, it is quite futile. Frankly, this exercise should never have taken place and the Government should have shouldered its responsibilities by bringing in a Bill on this subject. Following the conversations and speeches that we have heard, people are saying that after the elections, the Government may bring in legislation on this. But Mr. Speaker, if the Conservative Government, with 211 Members, cannot manage to bring forth a Bill, I am sure there will never be an abortion law, because I have the feeling that they will not come back with 211 Members. I am sure of it. They will come back with many fewer. So if they cannot do something with 211 Members, they are even less likely to do something with a much smaller number of Members.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps we should recall what happened and why the last bill concerning the Criminal Code amendment was passed. You must remember that in 1966, the Canadian Medical Association, which then represented nearly all physicians in Canada, together with the Canadian Bar Association, asked the Government to pass a law so that physicians, whose duty is to save lives and to perform operations like abortions to save the life of a mother who is in danger, would not be prosecuted for performing such an act to save a life.

It is simply the Canadian Medical Association's desire on this subject and there was nothing else. In 1969, a Criminal Code amendment to protect physicians was tabled, but of course many other proposals were added to it at that time. There was a Committee on which I sat that studied the whole subject of abortion. On the Committee, we heard witnesses from across the country, from religious groups and other organizations and everyone who was concerned with this issue, and finally, after months of deliberation, an amendment to the Criminal Code was adopted, and we know what has happened since the Supreme Court decision in February.

Mr. Speaker, abortion is contrary to nature. It is unnatural and that is why I personally will always be against abortion, except in cases where the mother's life is in serious danger.

So I do not see why . . . it is simple, the latest amendment to the Criminal Code resulted in ambiguity and opened a large loophole for abortion; it has become abortion on demand.

The reason I am telling you these things, Mr. Speaker, is that I have some experience. As a physican, I have helped bring some 8,000 children into the world and I was always delighted to see how happy women were to give birth. And I also remember that many of them may have had unwanted pregnancies, but once they had given birth, how happy they were! Furthermore, I saw them again maybe twenty years later and how proud they were of the son or daughter they had brought into the world!

Mr. Speaker, I am sure that since time immemorial in the history of the world, say 4,600 years before Christ, people were generally against abortion because even though they did not have computers in those days they were convinced that it was an act against nature. Some people did resort to abortion to keep the birth rate in check, but as a rule they had very strict legislation against it.

As I see it, the main problem we are facing today in this whole semantic end emotional issue of abortion is that when people did legislate in ancient days they would always be very careful to say that it did not matter whether the foetus was living or not. Aristotle, St. Alphonse de Liguori, Innocent III, Pope Gregory XIV, and St. Thomas Aquinas all maintained that abortion was not allowed when the foetus showed signs of life. Some people said that the soul does not enter the embryo at the time of conception but only 30, 40 or 160 after—80 days after in the case of female children. Mr. Speaker, particularly in ancien Rome abortion was used in all kinds of circumstances, not only to keep the population from expanding too quickly but also to keep young girls beautiful and attractive. Christianism finally put an end to such inordinate numbers of abortion which, for all practical purposes, signaled the beginning of the decadent era of the Roman empire and, ultimately, its demise.

There are a number of quotations concerning abortion, especially with respect to living and non-living foetuses, and something had to be done to clear the issue. I think that contemporary scientists and biologists finally demonstrated that life began at conception, contrary to the teachings of St. Alphonse de Liguori, St. Thomas Aquinas, and others.

So if life begins at conception, and this is undeniable, I am automatically against abortion because the foetus will grow to become a human being, and I should think that nobody would want to destroy a human life, even at the foetus stage. There, I suggest lies the whole problem. Had people in the early days of history known what we know today they would not have advocated abortion when the foetus is inanimate, there would have been no legislation to protect abortion, and all those people who preceded us in history and all thoses laws would not have condoned abortion. My time has expired, Mr. Speaker.

Mrs. Gabrielle Bertrand (Brome—Missisquoi): This week, Mr. Speaker, Ottawa is the focus of attention of thousands, if not millions of Canadians. They are eager and anxious to find out the position of each and every Member from both sides of the House on this most complex, vital and controversial issue of abortion.

They will probably make up a list and in two separate columns the names of those for and those against will appear.

For months now, the media have been calling up to find out about our views in order to be able to write our names on the pro or side.

If I have the privilege and honour to rise in the House today, it is because I am one of 29 women who were elected by their constituents to sit among this group of mostly male Parliamentarians. I am an elected representative of a Party, I am part of the Government, but I am first and foremost a woman. What is more, a Christian, practicing Catholic woman who is the mother of seven children, all wanted and loved. My children in turn have given me eight grand-children, again all wanted and all loved. I am principled. I have definite opinions. I have deep rooted convictions. Tomorrow, I will have to indicate through my vote how I can reconcile my personal opinions and my legislative responsibilities.

All of us, as Parliamentarians, will have to live up to these responsibilities. We represent a society which is already quite divided on this issue.

I have already received by mail or by phone hundreds of messages from individual men and women, from couples and such organizations as the Filles d'Isabelle, from a number of my constituents living in such communities as Magog, Cowansville, Henryville, Brigham and Omerville. I have read all of them and thought all of them over.

I have just returned from my riding where I spent several days trying to ponder further upon the matter. I sought the opinions of physicians, family mothers, theologians, my own children and, after a great many discussions, we parted company without having ruled out anything. They could only offer me their best wishes.

Probably like a great many others, I find myself still struggling with my personal convictions as a Christian and Catholic woman. I also have a responsibility as a parliamentarian, and I am part of a Government that is looking for a better solution, for better legislation in line with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and in the best interests of the society this Government was elected to govern.

I totally disagree with the Opposition's charges that the today's parliamentary exercise is useless and futile. This Government wanted Members of all three political Parties to have an opportunity to express their views and to vote according to their conscience.

I would like to recall an event in Quebec's political history which may provide an analogy for today's situation. In 1967 or 1968, the Minister of Justice at the time, Jean-Jacques Bertrand, introduced legislation to make civil marriages possible. He knew this reflected the new concerns of couples in a new society. Although his personal convictions as a practising Catholic might have stood in the way, he managed to reconcile his personal convictions with his responsibilities as a legislator. He knew that his role was not to pass judgment and to be a disciplinarian but to understand and respect the views of others. He made a distinction between his personal convictions and his duty as a legislator, recognizing the diversity of peoples' views and the complexity of the situation. Twenty years later, I am in a similar situation, but the issue is far more sensitive.

The role of the legislator is to legislate, in other words to adopt the laws by which the country is governed. Any law passed by Parliament has to be enforceable and be politically, socially and economically feasible. If the chosen solution is not enforceable, the result is non-compliance which brings us a step closer to anarchy.

I must consider a motion that gives me three options to vote on: one compromise option and two more extreme positions.

Mr. Speaker, I could not vote for any of the options, and I will explain why. The compromise option prohibits the performance of an abortion, subject to certain exceptions. If abortion is prohibited, one assumes there will have to be legislation. If there is legislation, it must be enforceable and enforced. If the legislation is not enforced and complied with, there will have to be be sanctions and penalties.

Every woman has her own conscience. Every woman has her own freedom. I must show understanding, which means I must respect any woman who, for reasons of her own and according to her conscience, holds convictions that are different from mine.

Mr. Speaker, who am I to say that a woman, who for reasons of her own that are different from mine decides to terminate a pregnancy, is a criminal?

I am quite prepared to defend my own convictions which are dictated by my religious principles, but I am equally unwilling to impose them on others. I am against abortion, but I refuse to condemn any girl, any woman in distress who may be trying to cope with circumstances such as poverty, unemployment, family breakup, poor health, or rape or incest, as the pro-life option would have me do.

The Government and Parliament cannot and should not tell women what they can think and do.

The Government's role should be to help these women opt for life, for a child, for a family. The role of the State is not to act as a substitute for their conscience and to make this difficult and sensitive choice in their stead.

Neither can I support a certain overly doctrinaire approach of the pro-choice option, because its backers give precedence to a woman's freedom to do what she likes with her own body over the right to life of the unborn child. For me, this is quite incompatible with simple human morality. Is this life in the making not the main issue and our main concern in this debate? We women who have had one or more children know the difficulties, the physical suffering, the anguish, the strain of pregnancy and childbirth. But above all, we know the indescribable joys of seeing a child come into the world.

Personally, I spent months, if not more than a year, in hospital when I was pregnant. The fourth time, I felt near death and thought of terminating the pregnancy. With my family's help, I brought seven children to term. When my husband died prematurely, I can assure you that all of my seven children helped me through that difficult period.

A fetous brought to term is an asset for the family and for society. Perhaps we are not sufficiently convinced of that and today more than ever legislators have the opportunity to think about their real responsibilities and maybe even take some blame, instead of passing coercive legislation to eliminate the tragedy of more than 60,000 abortions a year in our country.

Is it not high time to put forward a real family policy reflecting the realities and needs that young couples and single-parent families face?

On June 16, Senator Paul David, in a masterful speech which I suggest everyone read, tried to develop for us a coherent, generous and dynamic family policy.

Since children are our nation's most precious asset, he said, "the time may have come for better ways to revise our laws, our structures, our housing strategies, our tax system, our day care system—we have already begun to do that—as well as maternity leave, hours of work and benefits for mothers who stay at home and for those who work outside."

The motion before the House today is not sufficiently clear and comprehensive in this respect. I refuse to close ranks with either the pro-choice or the pro-life groups that are polarizing women today. I believe women should get together and work with men to develop solutions and legislation that promote respect for women, for the life of the child and for the family.

In 1984, this Government said to Canadians that it would be a government of reconciliation. Today, faced with a sensitive and controversial issue, it must try and reconcile various positions. It may be a perilous undertaking, but I think it is also a very rewarding one.

All parliamentarians—whether they are Conservatives, Liberals or New Democrats—and all Canadians have a duty to find better ways, through legislation and as I see it, through legislation outside the Criminal Code, to way we are prepared to welcome new life.

We must educate our young people and demystify sexuality. We must offer women in distress, whose only option seems to be abortion, the moral, financial and psychological support they so urgently need. Not everyone has the privilege of enjoying the kind of support that I have had.

If we spend millions of dollars to keep unfortunate AIDS victims alive—something I support wholeheartedly—is it not worth spending at least as much on the unborn?

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I hope that my colleagues will continue to express their views while leaving aside all political and partisan consideration. This is a matter of conscience that should be discussed free of any partisan overtones.

• (1540)

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the previous speaker for her very fine remarks. I hope I can express mine as eloquently.

I come to this difficult debate with mixed emotions and opinions that many people have had and have expressed. I do not, however, come to this debate as pro-abortion. I do not come to this debate as anti-life. All of us, I think, share a common objective, that of making this world, this life, a better place for those who are in it and those who will be in it. When it comes to the issue of the role of a legislator the challenge I would say is to decide when to make laws and to decide when not to make laws. Abortion law of all laws in my experience—and this is something I have dealt with for over 30 years, as a mother and a grandmother, generations within my own family have grappled with it too—perhaps exemplifies most what we can call man-made law. Abortion, of all issues, is indeed a women's issue. And I am not a person who believes that there are a whole set of women's issues. Child care is everyone's issue. The economy is everyone's issue. But abortion, of all issues, is perhaps closest to women because they are most affected. Historically, whether 4,500 years, ago as one speaker has said, whether it is today, or whether it was in 1969, abortion law has been man-made law.

The motion before us is seeking the opinion of the House about the fundamental value and inherent dignity of each human being and the inherent worth of human life. I would like to make a few comments on that, Mr. Speaker. This is not a debate in which one side convinces the other. I gave that up many years ago. However, as a legislator I think it is important to look at the objectives we are trying to reach and the methods of achieving them. The objective, I believe, is a common one, that is, to celebrate life, to respect life, and to reduce the number of abortions. That is something with which, I think, all sides can agree. The question is how to do that.

One side of the argument says that it is done by criminal sanctions, by enforcing criminal law. The motion under discussion today talks about legislation. It does not say whether the intent is criminal legislation or health legislation. However, in the past, laws respecting abortion have been under criminal legislation. I do not need to remind the House that criminal legislation has criminal sanctions. That is one way to address this issue.

Another way to address the issue is through a comprehensive public policy which includes such things as sex education, adequate financial resources, and genuine support for the family through the tax system, a comprehensive child care plan, and so on. A further way to address the issue is through improved research and technology, improved research and development on birth control methods and, in addition, enactment of laws. In the short time I have been in this House we have discussed laws about whether fathers will qualify for certain aspects of unemployment insurance. Many of our laws do not take into account the unity of the family and the role of the father in the family and his importance in that role.

Does our society today really reflect a respect for human life? I would say it does not. It is so much easier to stand up and legislate than it is to bend down and give your hand to a child who has been abused, a mother who is tormented, or an unemployed father who is wondering how he is going to feed his family.

Let us examine respect for life in our family. A single parent and child on social assistance in Canada today receives about $8 a day for food and incidentals. Incidentals include clothing and all other necessities. Those who have been following the news lately will know that foster parents are very concerned about the amount of money they are receiving per day, and well they should be. I am well aware of the challenges which foster parents face in this society to assist these very sad children who have often had very traumatic experiences in their families. However, the average foster parent in our society receives more than a parent does to look after his or her own child. A foster parent receives about $10 a day.

As one foster parent recently pointed out, when she went to board her dog it cost $13 a day. I think that example indicates what kind of respect we have for human life, what kind of respect we have for the born.

When we are debating this important issue and sounding out opinions, when we see a person sleeping on the street or we hand out canned goods at a food bank, when we avert our eyes from the 13-year-old prostitute standing on the corner, the group of young adults whom we call street kids, as though being a street kid was simply a way of life rather than a tragedy, it behooves us as legislators to look at the human pain and the human questions with which one must deal.

When I was at the Children's Aid Society a number of years ago as a social worker I saw an 18-month-old who was disciplined by being seated on an electric burner. I went to a house where I saw a six-month-old girl who had been burned by cigarette butts. I spoke to a 10-year-old girl who had been sexually abused by her father for 10 years. There were no marches for those children. There were no pickets. There were no people calling the offices to say, "Let me help that child, that child who is here among us".

When we as legislators talk to these people, we are talking about the rights of the born and are exemplifying what respect for life our society has shown them.

When Mother Teresa came to Canada a few months ago she spoke very eloquently about the issue of abortion. Her position is not necessarily mine, but I respect tremendously her right to present that position because Mother Teresa at least lives her philosophy. She is on the streets with the people who are unwanted. She is working for them. She is enacting what her philosophy of life is. Would that many of us would do the same thing.

Let us talk about legislation. Criminal legislation as proposed here means criminal sanctions; fines and putting people in jail. Let us look for a moment at the practical consequences. Exactly what kind of criminal sanctions would we have? Will we put women and doctors in jail? Will we put them under house arrest? Will we have a 24-hour guard with them? Just how would we deal with this proposed criminal legislation?

I remind you, Mr. Speaker, that as recently as 1969 our society said that attempting suicide was a criminal offence. At that time I happened to be at the Vanier Reformatory for Women. There was a woman there who was incarcerated for having attempted suicide. We believed at that time that the way to prevent the taking of that life was to jail that person. Since then we have rethought the issue, and now attempted suicide is no longer in the Criminal Code.

Anyone who has been following the issue lately knows that suicide is the most common cause of death for young people in our society between the ages of 15 and 21. The majority of suicide victims are male. Are we to address that issue by putting all males between the ages of 15 and 21 in jail? Will we fine them? It sounds almost ludicrous even to be suggesting such sanctions today because we know that there is something much deeper wrong with our society. We must find help and caring in our society which we do not presently have.

What are the alternatives? I have mentioned that medical research on safe contraceptives could offer much to this debate. We need more counselling and education to provide real alternatives to families. We need adequate financial compensation in order for families to live in our society with dignity and to raise their children, not as second-class citizens but as members of our society who can contribute to society.

In many ways the debate we are having today is a debate of the past. When I went to a school recently a young man said to me, "Why is it that so many of the people in Parliament are so old?" Well, that is not very flattering but in fact we are old in the eyes of much of the Canadian population. Very often we debate such issues as this on our experience in the past as opposed to the issues of today which, in this particular debate, are those of reproductive technology and of the very serious questions which have not been answered by my Party or others of the use of foetal tissue and surrogate motherhood. There are many issues with which society has not come to grips. In a sense, my Party would certainly support a royal commission on reproductive technology because I think this deals with the issues of today and tomorrow.

My Party has taken a very clear stand on this issue, and as a result we filed a motion with this House which I would like to read into the record. It outlines our position, a position which is not unanimous in our Party but it is the position of the majority. It says:

> That in the opinion of this House the Supreme Court of Canada having declared that provisions of the Criminal Code relating to abortion are inconsistent with the provisions of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and are therefore of no force or effect, that the motion be amended by deleting all the words following the word "effect" in the first paragraph and the following substituted therefor:
> law and government policy should respect the principle that the decision whether or not to terminate a pregnancy should be that of the woman involved in consultation with a qualified medical practitioner, and that the procedure should be performed by a qualified medical practitioner; and further should ensure that the Canada Health Act and regulations are amended to ensure equality of access throughout Canada.

That, I believe, addresses the issue of greatest concern to everyone, no matter what side of the argument one is on. It is important that even if we cannot agree at either end of the poles, which unfortunately has come to be, people being very divided, perhaps we can at least agree on working together for that kind of public health policy which will make this society a truly caring society, one which shows its respect for life. It is not enough simply to open our mouths. We have to open our hearts. It is very easy to mouth rhetoric.

History has shown that for all cultures abortion has been an issue of conflict. I do not believe, and my Party does not believe, that making the sanctions for abortion so strong will prevent abortions. They never have. I am old enough to remember the sadness and horror of women who used coat-hangers and vacuum cleaners. It is not a very attractive picture, but this is real life. This is not lawyers talk about precedent and what is or is not. This is what is. One thing all of these cultures have had in common with their folk remedies and variety of methods of abortion is that in the end result a high number of women have died. That is not respect for life. It is not respect for the dignity of life.

As for this motion, I cannot support it. I have presented the amendment which I think is more appropriate to address the issue. I respect the opinions of others. It is not something we will agree on. Probably it is not something that we will ever agree on in this country. I hope that we can agree, however, that we must renew our efforts.

Probably the most important thing that could come out of this renewed debate is that, as a society, as legislators, and as individuals, we renew our efforts to ensure that we do not accept homelessness; we do not accept one in six children in Canada living in poverty; we do not accept food banks; but that we do accept supporting the family and seeing that the family is encouraged and supported to enjoy their children. Children are an important part of our society. They are our future and we are willing to invest in them.

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to say a few words, and I will try to be relatively brief with respect to this motion and this very troublesome issue of abortion.

Some people say, and I know you have heard them say it, that this is a debate in which men should not really be involved. This is a woman's issue and men should not be discussing it and voting on it. I suppose I might agree with that, and it would be easy for me to duck the issue and say we will leave it to the women in this House to make this decision, because it certainly substantially involves women. However, as you know, you and I were elected by the people of our ridings and we are expected to take stands on difficult issues. We are expected to be and we are, as you know, accountable for the stands we take with respect to those issues. I am participating in this debate and will be voting tomorrow with that clearly in mind.

I was nominated to run federally, as I think you know, back in November, 1982. From then until the election of 1984, I spent a good deal of time knocking on doors and talking to my constituents. Almost invariably I would be confronted with this question of where I stood on abortion and the question of pro-choice or pro-life. The issue did not arise just over the last few months. It has been with us for a long, long time and, as many of the speakers in this debate have pointed out, it is not going to go away with this debate. In my view, it is certainly going to go on and we are going to hear about it on and on into the future.

When I was involved in the election campaign I made my views quite clear on the issue. I indicated quite clearly that I have a pro-life stand and that I am a pro-life person. Since the election campaign, and I know you have been here on many of the occasions I have spoken in this House, I have had the opportunity to voice my own opinions on this subject. I have, on a number of occasions, set out my views with respect to the abortion issue and my pro life stand. Those views have not only been presented in this House but reported to my constituents through newspapers and other means.

My pro-life view that life begins with conception is based on what I believe are undisputed medical facts. They are as follows:

One, immediately upon the union of a man's sperm with a woman's egg, that is fertilization, cellular development begins.

Two, that the sex is determined at the single cell stage by the x and y chromosomes carried in the father's sperm cell. At the single cell stage the egg is alive and is human and has a sex, either male or female. It immediately begins the growth process which continues from then on until adulthood.

Three, that in the first week the divisions of the cells continue.

Four, that in the third week the foundation of the nervous system has been established. By the end of the week the heart is beating. Five, that in the sixth week brain waves can be measured and the skeleton is complete. The hands and feet are beginning to grow.

Six, that in the eighth week it responds to pain. Feet and hands with fingerprints are formed. The heartbeat is audible on an office instrument. In the tenth week the body is completely formed, and by the twelfth week all organ systems are functioning. It continues to grow and mature.

You and I know that the medical profession is now able to operate on the brain and urinary tract of an unborn child and that the foetus can be kept alive in hospital outside the mother's womb just 26 weeks from conception.

I do not believe any of those medical facts are disputed in any way by either side in this debate. But it is on that basis that I have come to my conclusion on my position as a supporter of right to life.

I believe that the question of abortion involves two lives, not just one, and that both lives need protection. My feelings in this respect are reflected as well in the United Nations 1959 Declaration on the Rights of the Child, which states as follows: "The child, by reason of his or her physical and mental immaturity, needs special protection and care, including appropriate legal protection before as well as after birth". That is the United Nations 1959 Declaration of Rights of the Child.

It is based on those facts that I came to my conclusion and my position with respect to this issue. Certainly I will be supporting the pro-life amendments that have been put forward. No doubt, others will be put forward in the course of this debate.

There is one item that I do not believe has been put forward to date with respect to this issue. It is something that is missing but which I feel very strongly should be included in the debate. It is known as a conscience clause. It is the question of a health care worker's conscience. Many doctors, nurses and other health care workers firmly believe that in caring for pregnant women they actually have two patients, a mother and her unborn child. They do not want to participate in a procedure to terminate a pregnancy because it would conflict with their own moral beliefs and moral values.

There are many hospitals that recognize and respect those views of health care workers. The ones that do, permit health care workers to arrange their assignments to exclude participation in abortion procedures. However, there is no legal obligation at the moment and, to the best of my knowledge, there never has been a legal obligation for a hospital not to discriminate against a health care worker who refuses to assist in an abortion. That is not the case in other countries. I believe in 44 states of the United States, and in the United Kingdom there is such a conscience clause written into legislation to protect health care workers in that sort of situation.

In order to make it clear that there should be this protection, and to ensure that there is this protection, both explicitly and legally, to protect health care workers from discrimination, I have presented to the table the following motion that I trust will be dealt with tomorrow. It states that the following be added to the motion: "And that no person shall be under any duty, whether by contract or by any statutory or other legal requirement to participate in the termination of a pregnancy to which he or she has a conscientious objection".

I put that forward in the firm hope that no matter what the stand may be of any individual Member of Parliament, whether they intend to vote for a pro-life position, pro-choice position or any other position, they would surely not find that sort of conscientious clause for health care workers offensive in any way. Surely such a proposition could be supported by all Members of the House. I hope that it will be the case, irrespective of the individual Member's stand with respect to the main motion or any other amendments.

Hopefully, when we vote tomorrow we will have support for that amendment so that regardless of what else is passed there will be a provision in the law that will prohibit discrimination against health care workers who do not want to participate in terminating pregnancies based on their personal beliefs and moral values.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, it is with a deep sense of obligation that I rise to join my colleagues in the House who spoke before me in debating the issue of abortion. It is an issue which has always aroused the interests and passions of a people and which does so again today.

While I have personally been disappointed that after six months following the Supreme Court ruling which brought down the previous law governing abortions, the Government managed only to introduce a weak and very vague motion that is void of any serious investment of thought, the motion nonetheless focuses the attention of Canadians on the very delicate principles at stake and offers the opportunity for this Parliament to establish the parameters for subsequent legislation.

I believe it is fitting that while this session of Parliament struggles with the most important of constitutional matters through Meech Lake, and struggles with the most important of economic matters through the economic trade agreement with the United States, this Parliament also struggles as we do now, and as we did in the debate on capital punishment a few months ago, with the most important of moral challenges facing Canadians and our country, namely the question of life or death.

While the labelling of certain positions taken by Members or others on such a fundamentally and complex issue can be both misleading and confusing, I must say at the outset that I am firmly opposed to the answers that are promoted by the pro-choice, free-choice, and abortion on demand supporters. As well, I am troubled and perplexed by the pursuit of the middle ground which, for me, emerges as a frustrating and fuzzy mirage, and which is shaped by numerous and different definitions.

I wonder out loud if we cannot be more honest with our emotions and ask ourselves whether this so-called middle ground does and can exist.

I am opposed to the general, free application of abortion. However, I do believe strongly that there exist three compelling circumstances in which society ought to recognize that terminating a pregnancy, while not pleasant, becomes necessary.

The first is when the mother's life is in danger and seriously threatened. Whether it is cancer of the cervix, whereby chemotherapy treatment would likely cause the death of her unborn child, or ectopic pregnancy, where the child has developed in the Fallopian tubes instead of in the uterus, in which case the child would have to be removed to protect the mother, the onus in such situations must be to ensure the safety and well-being of the mother. For me, one cannot justify losing one, sure life, for a possible new life that may never be. Second, where a pregnancy is the result of rape, and third, where the pregnancy is the result of incest, I believe it would be just for a woman, on her and her family's own choice, not to proceed with the birth.

For me and countless Canadians, of course, both rape and incest are ugly, repugnant and often violent acts which offend the gift of birth and undignifies the beauty of motherhood.

I know that my position will not be shared by many and that it will no doubt frustrate those with opposing viewpoints. But it is a position that eases the very depths of my own conscience and I believe complements the overwhelming and countless discussions, calls, letters and petitions which I have received from my constituents and citizens of York West and from people across the country.

I profoundly believe in the position I am taking this afternoon. Making the decision to have an abortion is a deeply personal feeling and a very troubling and agonizing decision for a woman. It is a matter which ultimately must transcend that individual preference. Yes, abortion is very much a woman's issue, but it is also an issue that involves the men in this society. It is also a family issue. Above all, it is a societal issue. Therefore, inherent in any question on the start and end of life is an obligation to weigh the collective interests. There must be this allowance, otherwise we as a people and as a society will lose our moral compasses and drift aimlessly without moral bearing or direction.

Complicating this is a world which is becoming increasingly more unsettled, where crime, terrorism, drugs, murders, robberies, assaults, vandalism, torture and war contributes to the feeling that the moral bedrock of our society is being slowly but surely and consistently chipped away. The values which should give clarity and purpose to our actions are falling by the wayside.

All of us, both elected and non-elected, should be concerned with the kind of society we want to pass on to our children. Every generation inherits a world it never made. In due course, every generation makes its own accounting to its own children. When our time comes, we all want to be proud to turn over a society which is better, safer and morally richer than the one we inherited. That is the intent in all the affairs of this great nation as it is for all the individual families of our country.

For me, loosening or redefining the sanctity of life would render meaningless all the other values we cherish and hold dear and would create a world and a society which would have no moral benchmarks. If we begin to provide life with a price-tag, everything and anything will be up for sale at a certain price. For me and for many others, that would be a dangerous and precarious corner to turn as a country.

Some would argue that the last six months, during which time there has been no law on abortion in this country, has not been chaotic and, therefore, we should not worry about the future implications. I disagree with that. To allow this present carte blanche to continue would, in my opinion, only establish new and lower forms of attitudes and standards that with time and circumstance would become entrenched and accepted. Surely, the world has seen enough of violence and hate. Surely we have seen enough of the attempts to justify present injustices and we cannot punish an injustice by making the world more unjust. I believe we all know in our hearts, even in great times of personal discomfort and difficulty, that to add to the injustice by not protecting the life of the unborn is to burden our lives and mortgage the soul of our country.

Only a few months ago, our Party, reflecting what I believe is a caring, tolerant temperament, supported the dominance of life in the debate on capital punishment. I was one of those Members who cast my ballot to uphold that principle, as tempting as it was to be repulsed, and, therefore, vindictive by the cruelties of the travesties committed by our fellow men and women in this nation.

In the same vein, if we can draw from that Canadian fabric in Canada which recognizes, respects, values and protects human life under any circumstances, how can we not apply that same prevailing sentiment in protecting the life of the unborn child? Just as sanctioning murder by the state would not have made for a better, more civilized world, the killing of the unborn child will not solve the trying dilemmas which are part of a woman's decision process. As well, we as a society are moved to feed our hungry, house our homeless, care for our sick, reassure our handicapped, give strength to the weak, help the poor and disadvantaged in our communities and respect our senior citizens. Are we not caring and capable enough to protect life and to speak up for the unborn?

How is abortion seen as a solution? What about the hurt, sometimes the guilt, the sense of loss and the sense of sadness that often set in long after an unborn child has been aborted? What about the physical and psychological scars that unexpectedly are inflicted and remain etched in the soul of many of our women, our wives and mothers?

There are all too many women who, unfortunately, live with this innermost feeling of depression. Where are their voices in this debate and, more important, what lessons can we draw from these silent and lonely cries? Sure, there are those in my community who approach me asking: "Mr. Marchi, what should I do if my 14-year old daughter becomes pregnant? Should I let her go ahead and give birth at that young age?" Clearly that is a situation which no parent ever wants to face. Yet it is a dilemma, I suggest, that cuts both ways. Is there not a sense of loss which may set in for that girl and that family if an abortion is performed? Is there not a sense of loss that that 14-year old girl will feel possibly when she becomes a 34 year old woman and mother? Is there not the stigma of having ended the life of an unborn child?

If there is an argument between the stigma of a young girl giving birth or of a young girl having an abortion, then I would suggest that in this day and age a pregnancy at a young age is no longer that evil and outcast issue it was many years ago. While it should, of course, not be encouraged, it does at the very least become tolerable. If that young girl were to support life and give birth to a child that will eventually find a warm and wanted home, that pregnancy not only becomes tolerable but becomes bearable for that girl and that girl's family. Let us not look at abortion as a solution because abortion generates other and more complicated problems.

I am not advocating that a pregnancy should stop or prevent the young girl or young woman from having an academic career, social or recreational pursuits. But who says we cannot advance the rights and interests of both mother and child? Who says we cannot develop a caring and pragmatic adoption program that can find willing and loving parents for that child? Why should 60,000 abortions continue when there are hundreds and hundreds of couples in Canada, thousands in North America, who cannot have children and who are willing and anxious to enjoy the beauty and richness of parenthood through adoption?

Why should a couple in Canada, for instance, have to wait, four, five, six or more years to adopt a child? Why should those very same couples have to travel the globe in order to adopt their first child and even then face years of red tape? Surely if we pride ourselves on being a progressive and technologically advanced society then we can apply those features on a human level whereby the interests of our women, the interests of our unborn children and the interests of the would-be parents who are ready to adopt are all protected and enhanced. Nor do I seek to deprive women of their legitimate and full rights and opportunities. Rather, I am proposing that our laws deal with how to adjudicate and balance the rights of the mother and the rights of the unborn child. In the same breath we cannot argue for the protection of life without displaying more concern and tangible support for women who are experiencing an unplanned and unwanted pregnancy.

To ignore their emotional and human needs would be sheer hypocrisy and self-defeating. It is frustrating for me to know that while some form of abortion services are generally and readily available, resources and support for the birth option are comparatively sparse. All too often there is little support for the individual woman who genuinely desires to give her unborn child that special gift of life.

If there exists a lack of resources and support for that birth alternative, and I believe that to be the reality as we speak today, then how many of the 60,000 abortions were really the result of a free choice? How many of those abortions were a direct, inevitable and desperate result of a futile search for support or counselling or for proper advice? Were there two options or was there only one?

Women should and must be given a real alternative so that an unwanted pregnancy does not have to mean an unwanted baby. We must, as a caring community, provide practical support to the problems of women who contemplate abortion which have for far too long been overlooked. Ironically, sometimes, we tend to stereotype, we tend to assume, for example, that college-educated, career-oriented middle-class women are not the problem because either they know how to avoid the problem or they know how to cope with the situation. Yet our statistics show us the very opposite.

Women who are most apt to have an abortion have earned at least a high school diploma, are between the ages of 20 and 26 and are unmarried. It is in the midst of their education or their careers that many women—not all—view a continued pregnancy as an interruption or as a barrier or as a threat. If we are to overcome the traumatic circumstances of these women in these predicaments, and if we want to encourage and convince women that they can and should give life to their unborn without having to jeopardize their own lives, then we must provide the professional guidance to help them face the many difficult questions that will ensue.

We must provide more effective counselling to help rebuild a woman's self-esteem and confidence that could be threatened or shattered in the process. We must provide nurturing and homes for women whose families do not accept an unwanted pregnancy. We must provide medical assistance to address and meet a sudden new set of physical and medical needs by competent doctors and nurses. We must provide career and educational programs to allow those women to resume their careers or their academic pursuits. Finally, we must provide the financial assistance for the many expenses associated with a pregnancy in our society.

The price for the energy and the efforts for establishing such a human and comprehensive response to women is not only a price worth paying because those women deserve that care and that human outreach, it is also a prerequisite when we compare it to the emotional price that is being paid by those lonely women or the incalculable price of the loss of life.

We should not delude ourselves into believing that a quick fix exists to such a fundamentally important issue. Yes, the issue is divisive in the country. Yes, no clear consensus has yet emerged. Yes, it pits members of the same family, sometimes husband and wife, and sometimes followers and worshippers of the same religion, against each other. Yes, there is nothing more difficult for Parliament to tackle than a matter which truly involves the matter of life or death.

However, I remain firm that there is a humane answer and that this solution is rooted in the indisputable fact that no one likes abortion and that no one looks to it with satisfaction or pleasure. It is this accepted viewpoint, coupled with the recognition and the supremacy of life, that provides us with the foundation upon which a solution can begin to be built.

The challenge before us as a Parliament, as a people and as a country that prides itself in its tolerance and in its progressive views is to embrace an unborn child as a member of the human family, to nurture a mother facing an unwanted pregnancy within an environment of care and protection so that women can give their children a future without giving up their own, to be unified and to respond to a childless couple who is desperate in its desire for parenthood through adoption and, finally, to build and promote a society with the confidence and security of knowing that its moral fibre is strong and unshakeable.

The central premise to these four challenges should and must be the recognition that life is to be cherished, to be loved and to be protected. We recognize all of us and accept that science and technology are indispensable in this day and age. But if they are divorced from the moral values that breathe full meaning into life, then they diminish what we call our civilized society.

I personally believe that no problem of human destiny is beyond human beings. The problem of abortion was created by men and women, and therefore it is the same men and women who can and will have to solve it. The human spirit has displayed repeatedly throughout the greatest chapters of our history that it can often solve what has seemed to be unsolvable. I believe that the crisis and that the problem involving abortion in our generation can and will be overcome.

There must be a better way to abortion. That better way I believe is living in each of us.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to participate in this debate. Initially, I would like to say a few words about the process.

One thing on which I think I can agree with everyone with respect to this topic is that it is a very difficult one for everyone in the House of Commons. I appreciate the fact that Members of Parliament on this difficult issue are allowed to speak and vote according to their conscience. In that regard I would like to commend the efforts of the Deputy House Leader for bringing this motion forward. As well, I would like to compliment our Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney). I believe this is another example of his commitment to parliamentary reform because, certainly, this debate is in the best tradition of British parliamentary democracy.

We are here for a reason. The reason is that in January of 1988 the Supreme Court of Canada struck down Section 251 of the Criminal Code. I believe that there have been some misconceptions about what the Supreme Court of Canada said in that decision.

Many individuals have tried to use that decision, I would suggest, for their own purposes, to back up their own arguments. But I think one thing is clear, and I think that this point has been made by other speakers as well. No one judge spoke for the majority. There are several majority opinions within the Regina v. Morgentaler case, and none is conclusive as to what Parliament can and cannot do on this very sensitive issue. I have heard the arguments of those who say that this prohibits us from passing pro-life legislation. I disagree with that. I believe that this is an improper interpretation. I would suggest that it is taken exclusively from the majority decision of one of the judges in that particular case.

What we have here is a situation where we as Parliament have been given the responsibility, one which this Chamber has had for decades since its inception, to do what we as parliamentarians believe is right and just. I cannot and do not accept the idea that our Constitution in any way prohibits us from passing legislation that would protect unborn children. I would go further and say that our Constitution places responsibility on us to do all we can to protect those who cannot speak for themselves.

I had mixed feelings about the former section being struck down. Since its inception I believed that it was completely inadequate and should not have been introduced in the first place. One of its many problems was lack of enforcement of it provisions. In some jurisdictions in this country no attempt whatsoever was made to enforce even the limited sanctions within that section. In other areas officials gave up. Sometimes there was a half-hearted attempt to enforce the provisions. It was very inadequate.

The fears that I had about Section 251 are the same fears that I have about the present motion before the House. I do not think any Members should be under any illusions about it. There were 60,000 to 80,000 abortions under Section 251, and there will be 60,000 to 80,000 abortions under the motion presented here to the House. In one instance there will be one doctor signing the paper to permit the abortion, and in Dr. Morgentaler's case he will pass it over to his buddy in the later stages and the two of them will sign it. I believe it is inadequate. I oppose it. I hope other Members of Parliament will take the opportunity to defeat the motion tomorrow. I will be supporting a motion that will finally, again, in Canada give complete protection to unborn children from conception to the moment of birth.

You have heard, Mr. Speaker, many emotional and sensitive comments made so far in this debate. All of us bring our own upbringing and experiences to this problem. For me, the issue was not difficult. Since I was a boy in the late 1960s when this became an issue of national discussion, I was always dissatisfied with the arguments made in favour of permitting abortions. One of those arguments which is heard today is the viability question. Somehow after a certain number of weeks in the womb of a mother the unborn child picks up rights that he did not have before that. The idea was that if the child could live outside the mother's womb he should have all those rights that are inherent in all human beings, but if the child is before that period of time, then he has no rights whatsoever.

I am sure you are aware, Mr. Speaker, of the progression in the arguments on this issue. In the late 1960s or early 1970s it was 28 weeks, then we started having children born at 27 weeks, and another dilemma. Gradually in some jurisdictions in Europe it was pushed back. Surely every time it is pushed back it is pointing to the argument, the proposition that was obvious from the beginning, that human life begins at the moment of conception.

I find it distressing when people state that they must have control over their own body. We are not talking about their own body. This is not a tumour or a wart. It is a human being. We have heard medical testimony given by other Members in this Chamber to that effect. It is something that makes common sense to all of us. It is something very different growing inside the womb of a mother.

We have all heard horror stories of the moral dilemmas that this type of issue can cause. In a debate of this import we should remember some of them. I remember one that struck me about 10 years ago. It is a true incident. A woman checked into the hospital, all the papers were signed and sealed for her to have an abortion, and her doctor agreed to perform that abortion. The moment came for the abortion to take place. The operation took place and the child was born alive. How about that for a moral dilemma? This took everyone by surprise. Immediately a decision had to be made. Does this child who was born alive have all the rights, dignity, and worth of a human being, or is it something that can be disposed of because all the papers were signed and it was supposed to be an abortion? There was a hesitation in the operating room. Finally, a nurse stepped forward and said that the child must have oxygen if it was going to have a chance to live. She did that, and the child only had a few hours to live after that.

One of the other arguments that is always used by those who do not want to see us have legislation restricting abortion is what I call the tragic example. The tragic examples have changed a little over the years. When I was at Queen's University in my experience this was the first time that it became an issue. I spoke in favour of protecting unborn children, and this young man said to me: "What about the case where a woman has 11 children and she finds she is pregnant with the twelfth child, and her husband will beat her and leave her if she has any more children? What about that situation? Are you not worried about that woman?" That was one of the examples back in the 1960s when people had larger families. I hear different arguments now, but I always say the same thing. "Yes, my heart goes out to people in those circumstances, but do not compound one unfortunate situation with something else. Do not compound a tragedy by having an abortion permitted on top of that".

That leads me to the next argument that is always thrown out. People say that every child in Canada must be a wanted child. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, without fear of contradiction by anyone in this country that every child is a wanted child in Canada, if not by the natural mother, then by individuals who would give anything to adopt a child. There is no one in this Chamber and no one who would read the debates of this House of Commons who is either a lawyer or social worker who does not know someone who would love to adopt a child.

In my short years of practice of law I remember on at least three different occasions people sitting in my office with tears in their eyes asking what they had to do to adopt a child. The simple answer is 60,000 abortions in Canada every year make their dreams unfulfilled. I say to people who do not want children, "Please put them up for adoption. Turn your unfortunate situation into someone else's joy".

Another argument that I have looked closely at is the one where people state we must provide abortions because women will die in childbirth. In the United Kingdom hundreds of thousands of abortions are performed each year. An analysis was done of those and it was discovered that six were performed to save the life of the mother, six out of approximately 200,000. I would suggest that any amendments before the House should provide for that, but let us be clear on what we are talking about. We are not talking about thousands and thousands of Canadian women who die because they do not have abortion on demand. That is not the case, and it is not the experience in the United Kingdom. I trust and hope that that will never be the experience in this country.

Another argument made to me is when people say: "Of course, you would permit abortions in the case where it was discovered that a child has a handicap". Well, I would suggest this, that any unborn child is no less a child of God because he has a handicap. There cannot be any second-class citizens in this country, one law for those who do not conform to our idea of good health and another law for those who do not. I do not accept that. I hope and pray that Canadians will never accept that.

In this debate there is, as in many of these very sensitive debates, discussion of public opinion and opinion polls. I was very proud and pleased to present to this House a petition signed by over 1,300 constituents in my riding of Niagara Falls, calling on Parliament to pass a law that would protect unborn children from the moment of conception, but I can tell you that I do not stand here because of public opinion polls. I remember being on an open-line radio station not long ago. Someone called in and said, "Mr. Nicholson, don't you realize that the majority of your constituents do not agree with the position that you had consistently taken on the subject of abortion?" All I can say to that is this: Public opinion polls are not a good reason for politicians to make their minds up on these very sensitive subjects. I would suggest to you that that is one of the reasons why politicians very often are held in contempt in this country, because of a suspicion on the part of individuals in Canada and in the United States, as well as throughout the western world, that somehow that is the motivational factor to politicians.

I suggest that this is something that is too sensitive, too important, and it touches the lives of so many of us that it cannot and should never be the subject of public opinion polls, and that no Member of Parliament should make up his or her mind on that basis. Therefore, I hope that I made my own position clear on this.

What we will be voting on tomorrow is advice to the Government. It is not a piece of legislation; it is advice to the Government on the kind of legislation that should be enacted in this House. I want to see that advice given to the Government, that we should enact legislation that will protect children from the moment of conception. A lot is at stake here. It is the lives, I believe, of thousands of unborn children in this country, children who cannot speak for themselves, who need individuals in Canada who will speak up on their behalf, and I am certainly proud to be a small part of that movement for them by speaking on their behalf.

This is a very difficult one, one that I know many Members of Parliament have difficulty with in making up their minds. One thing I would suggest to them: If we accept the arguments that you have heard in the pro-choice lobby, the pro-choice section, we will be on our way to a situation that already takes place in the United States, which I believe is happening here in Canada. The Hon. Member for Kitchener (Mr. Reimer) told me a couple of weeks ago that he was talking with a doctor in Kitchener and trying to discuss with him which of two or three different options was a better pro-life option. He said, "You politicians are talking about which is the best pro-life option. I had a young woman in here who said, 'I would like an abortion.'" He said, "Why would you like an abortion?" "Because I have had tests to tell me that it is a girl. I want an abortion because I have been told that I will have a girl, and I would like to have a boy. My husband and I would like to have a boy." That is what takes place thousands of times in the United States. That is what is going to take place in Canada. It will take place in Canada if this Parliament accepts the arguments of those who favour a pro-choice position.

I am very pleased to lay on the Table an amendment that will protect unborn children. It reads as follows: "That all the words in the motion after the words 'should prohibit the performance of an abortion' be deleted and the following substituted therefor: 'while allowing those medical treatments which are necessary to prevent the death of the mother, or to remedy a condition that, if left untreated, would cause the death of the mother".

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I am quite glad to have an opportunity to speak on this. It is not an easy matter to speak on well, or to vote on, as some of the previous Members have acknowledged, even though there are varying standpoints. I think that debate is necessary. I suppose you could say that it is overdue. I do not think it will be finished today or tomorrow or quickly, but I am glad that we are proceeding with it, because it is needed. I say that, even though

I honestly believe that the Government has based this motion that we are debating on the wrong assumption.

What seems to be implied in the assumption of the Government's motion is that the source of the problem that we have to grapple with here is women, that is, women who need to be controlled. I will come back to that later. I do not share that view. As a husband, as a father of seven children—one of them adopted—as a grandfather of 13, I believe that abortion indeed is sad. It is often injurious and it may possibly be the killing of a person. The problem is that, if the foetus is a person, it is nevertheless inside another person. That seems very obvious. Perhaps it seems too obvious to consider, but I think that it is a very important point that we have to take into account.

We cannot protect the foetus without either having the co-operation of the pregnant woman or else risking injury to her or to the foetus, or both, either by force and violence or by depriving them of adequate medical care. Therefore, I support the motion from the NDP caucus that was recently read by the Hon. Member for Yukon (Ms. McLaughlin). I support it because the government motion fails in what I think is a good, conscious purpose. I think it must fail, because it rests too absolutely on coercion. The words "prohibit the performance of an abortion", subject to the following exceptions, sound mild enough, but they stand against a background of prison. Although the Criminal Code is not mentioned in the motion, I think it is clearly implied. What it does is to continue an unfortunate pattern of focusing, by coercion, on one pregnant woman—or on many pregnant women—but one at a time, a problem that has been generated by society as a whole, and will not be resolved by only attributing it to one individual woman.

Yesterday in the debate, one of our colleagues from the other side of the House made a remark—since Hansard has not been distributed for the day, I cannot quote him exactly. The gist of it was that for those who have no ethical guidance systems left, the only thing remaining is the law. He went on to say further that the law is the last guide-post of morality. He identified morality with the word "ought", or "oughtness". There is no oughtness about the law, so we have to use the law, instead of "ought", for people who do not understand "ought". This is the same Member who last month said—and we find this on page 16348 of Hansard—and I quote: "Canada deserves some protection—we were talking about refugees—from people whose thought forms have changed if they no longer hold to absolute rights and wrongs". In other words, as was pointed out, the Member seemed to want to use our immigration service as a "thought police" to keep bad thoughts out of Canada.

Only a month later he seems to think that many people in Canada have bad thoughts anyway, even if they were born here. He seems to be committed, and I think there are others unfortunately who are committed, to a sort of fixed absolutist faith coercion, whether it is against refugees or against Canadians. That is where the Government's resolution has not been well enough thought out. The Government has not recognized that it continues to make pregnant women the scapegoats of a very complex fault in society as a whole. It is the fault of denying to children who have been born the same rights as some such as the previous speaker has insisted upon for children who have not been born.

The defence of children who have not been born would be more widely supported and would be more successful in a society that was willing to defend the rights of children who have been born. We do not have that. We have a society that sees nothing very wrong with paying women, many of them mothers, only two-thirds of what men are paid often for the very same work. We have a society that has food banks in Toronto whose clients are 40 per cent children. We have a society that supports the exploitation of sex in the multibillion dollar advertising industry and where one child in six lives in poverty and the majority of poor people are single mothers. We have a society that has for years tolerated the battering of women. Perhaps one in eight or one in ten of wives are battered with very little intervention or attention from our society. We have a society that restricts information and instruments of contraception, that restricts research for contraception, as this Government did by cutting grants for research. The Government cut grants for planned parenthood which did a proven useful job of reducing teenage pregnancies through education in sexuality. We have a society that maintains thousands of apartments in a city like Toronto as adult-only apartments where children are outlawed, not unborn children but born children who are told they have no right to live there. This is a society which, having required so many mothers to work in the workforce, has nevertheless neglected to provide enough day care spaces.

When I was in the army in 1945 our army education officer one day said, "We could be demobilized soon. Where will we get jobs? Most of the factory jobs are held by women. How will we get the women out of the factories?" To me it was an academic question literally because I was planning to go back to university and I would not be having to fight a woman for a factory job. I learned later on that there was a practical way of getting women out of the factories. Day care centres were closed that had been built when women were needed for war work. This is a society in other words that scrimps on the health and education needed by our children and mothers and by families in general.

I find this motion lacking in thought. It is particularly inappropriate coming from a Government which cut the family planning funds, a Government which added $1,000 to the tax burden of families and which neglected to provide the means of affordable housing. After all this neglect of born children and mothers, including pregnant mothers, our society cannot really expect to stop abortions just by punishing the pregnant woman or depriving her of good medical care. It won't work. The Government seems to believe that the threat of prison will work that miracle, and yet our own experience in Canada tells us that it did not work before.

We find that Ireland, according to British statistics, has the highest per capita rate of abortion in the western world, yet abortions are banned in Ireland. Brazil bans abortions, yet it has 1 million abortions annually, 100,000 maternal deaths and 10,000 children born with serious abnormalities. The Government's method is based on the wrong understanding of the problem, and its method will not solve the problem.

I believe what we have to explore is something along the lines of the motion presented by the New Democratic Party. I will read it again:

> "That, in the opinion of this House, the Supreme Court of Canada having declared that the provisions of the Criminal Code relating to abortion are inconsistent with the provisions of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and are therefore of no force or effect . . ."

Then it reads:

> "—law and government policy should respect the principle that the decision whether or not to terminate a pregnancy should be that of the woman involved in consultation with a qualified medical practitioner, and that the procedure should be performed by a qualified medical practitioner; and further should ensure that the Canada Health Act and regulations are amended to ensure equality of access throughout Canada."

This does not solve all problems, but I think it is a more hopeful way of proceeding towards solving them. It rests on the assumption that women are not bad, at least by any contrast with men, nor are they weak by contrast with men, nor are they foolish by contrast with men. This is not a joke, Mr. Speaker. It has been an unfortunate error of teaching by some of the greatest theologians in western Europe in past centuries that women were less than men, physically, emotionally, mentally and spiritually. We are outgrowing that. But that is the problem. We are outgrowing thousands of years in which women were regarded more than anything else as breeding animals, thousands of years at least of civilized society.

Whether the uncivilized people, as we call them, treated women that way, I do not know but from my reading of everything from the Egyptians and the Babylonians on in our traditions, including the Bible, it is clear that women have been regarded as predominantly breeding animals.

Now their role and status is changing. I think that is great. I think that having women in the workforce is a necessary step forward to the liberation of women, men and children from a system of domination through the family that has perhaps been necessary in past ages but is not necessary and is harmful now. The point at which this becomes most difficult and critical is the question of the woman's role in childbirth and the woman's participation as an active, intelligent, responsible human being. What men are challenged for is to believe that women may be just as responsible as men. It shakes our egos a little bit but the facts seem to bear it out.

There are questions, such as, what about using foetal tissue for medical research and procuring abortions for that reason, such as was mentioned by the previous speaker, to decide to choose an abortion so as to determine negatively, at least, the sex of a child, such as other unworthy, and I would consider them quite unworthy, reasons for choosing abortion.

From my knowledge of my wife, my three daughters, my four sons, their mates, and their children, I believe that there will be better decisions on those issues if we allow the female half of the race to participate rather than telling them that father knows best.

There is evidence of this, this is not just a stray opinion. For almost 12 years in Quebec there has been no coercive law of the sort for which some people are asking. I hear that the rate of abortion did not zoom to the sky. The rate went up for a little while, as the statistics adjusted to the new law, and then went down. The rate of abortion in the last half year in Canada has been declining without coercion. I understand that there has been a decline in the rate of abortion since the Supreme Court took away coercion. In other words, women did not react mechanically by running to get abortions because there was no more coercion. They are making their decisions.

That is part of the reason for the results of a recent Gallup poll. The previous speaker scorns polls. I would certainly have never been elected had I relied entirely on polls. I had to be a dissident. However, a Gallup poll taken in April of this year tells us that in response to the question of whether the decision to have an abortion should rest with the woman in consultation with her doctor, 68.9 per cent of the people polled said yes. That is not by any means the only poll which points in that direction.

I believe that we have to try the co-operative approach rather than the coercive approach. The evidence shows that there will be fewer abortions and more healthy children, more healthy families, and more moral fibre in our country if we allow the woman the responsibility rather than taking that responsibility away from her.

Something which has been mentioned before and is worth mentioning more than once again is Planned Parenthood's proposed five ways to prevent abortion and one way that will not. The first of their five ways to prevent abortion is to make contraception more easily available. There are problems with contraception and we have to work them out. The second is to provide young people with a better teacher than experience. We must stop the prudery about education and sexuality in our schools at early ages.

The third way is to increase the part of men in this. That is happening at, I believe, a great rate in our country. We should be hopeful that the horror stories such as those to which the previous speaker referred will disappear into the past as we get a better standard of mutuality in family life. The fourth is to create new birth control methods because the existing ones are still unsatisfactory in many ways. For many they have been better than nothing, but they should be better yet. The fifth is to make our country friendlier to children.

I have spoken about the ways in which our country is unfriendly. We all know the things which can be done with our country's wealth of resources to make our country friendly to children. If that is done, I believe we will find that abortion becomes manageable as a result of a co-operative approach rather than a coercive approach.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in support of the amendment proposed by the Hon. Member for Don Valley West (Mr. Bosley) that: "Motion No. 36 be amended as follows: By deleting all the words after paragraph 1 and substituting therefor: 'Such legislation should prohibit the performance of an abortion except when performed by a qualified medical practitioner' ".

I speak to this amendment on behalf of those women who have been faced with bearing a child not of their choosing. Many women who have been faced with this choice have taken the choice to bear a child they did not choose to conceive. They have chosen to bear it, have taken the responsibility, and have taken joy in that decision.

Others have made another choice, consciously, perhaps in desperation, but despite all the words, all the edicts, all the laws, over centuries women have made the choice not to bear a child—rich, poor, ignorant, sophisticated, in every culture, in every epoch, in every religion, by whatever means available.

Let us not be pretentious enough to think that when the debate is over in this Chamber the issue has been resolved. The issue began at the dawn of time and it will end when the earth ceases to circle the sun.

There has been a lot of talk in this Chamber about the morality of abortion. There is no question that it is a moral issue. The question is, who is to make that moral judgment; the court in its red robes and ermine, the church in its silk robes and rings, or politicians in the green Chamber, people like us, men and women of ideals and principle? I do not know one person who has ever run for public office who has done so without a kernel of ideals about why they want to be here.

In a democracy politicians are people of consensus who, with the best of ideals, over time represent the ebb and flow of public opinion. Why are any of us in a position to make this judgment best? Why is the woman who is carrying the child not the person who can make that judgment best? Do we honestly believe that she who has the life within her will make a worse decision than us?

A woman is a whole being. She has a body, an intellect, and a soul or a spirit, whatever the magic is that makes us a unique species. I remind you that frequently the body makes its own choice. The miscarriage of an unborn child is a natural abortion. It is the body saying "no".

Why, if the woman is a whole being, cannot her mind, her intellect, her spirit make that same decision?

In a free society we expect people to make choices, to exercise judgment, and to bear their responsibilities, sometimes at great personal sacrifice whatever that choice may be. We not only expect people to make choices, we must respect their ability to make those choices. Women do that. Women know that there are people who want to adopt a child. Women know that a handicapped child has the same rights as others. Women know that children born in less than perfect circumstances can still have a happy and successful life. They do not make these choices without knowing the things that we in this Chamber know. We cannot make the choice better than they can.

Society and religion, over the centuries, have had differing views on the mores of aborting, of killing an unborn child. Let us not be afraid of the vocabulary. Those views include such things as that the soul enters an unborn baby boy after 40 days and a girl after 80 days, that the soul enters the unborn child at the time of quickening, when the woman feels the foetus moving for the first time.

Many of us in this Chamber have spoken of life from the moment of conception. Tomorrow we may talk of life beginning when the sperm joins the egg in a solution at a certain temperature in a certain plastic container under controlled circumstances. God knows, the human species some day may not reproduce but be produced from elements as yet we know not what. But throughout history to our time and into the future as we can see it, the constant is the woman who carries the child, and despite threat of death and social isolation, castigation and damnation, women have exercised their choice to have the child or not to have it.

As a society and in our time, our epoch, we as parliamentarians and as Canadians can make the choice to bear the child an easier one as opposed to the choice not to have the child. We provide help for child care. We should provide better social and personal support. We provide job-training and housing and medical care when women are faced with this decision, with the terror, with the oppression, of bringing up a child in circumstances of uncertainty or loneliness or poverty. But at the end of the day, even if we provide perfection in all of the above, it is the mother who bears the ultimate responsibility and therefore ultimately must have the choice. And make no mistake, women make the right choice, a far better choice than you or I or all the pageantry of institutions that have been invented by human beings from the beginning of time.

They make the choice and the judgment based on the societal expectations of their time. They do not do this in isolation. They do it based on their own health, on the potential health of the unborn child, on their relationship with the father, on the basis of all their expectations, which may or may not be good ones based on what society and their own circumstances have taught them. They do it based on their ability to deliver on the ongoing responsibility, and of course on their unique and individual caring sense of personal being and the being of their child.

Of course, society as always must make rules about the infringement of the rights of others. Of course, freedom is defined by a collective of what we all believe. Of course, as a nation we must have a view of the circumstances under which any abortion is to be allowed. Of course, we have a view of medical standards. But we must guard against our own ignorance, our own anecdotal evidence of horror stories we have heard, our inheritance of values from other times, and from all the things that make us meddle in other people's ability to judge.

Life is, of course, to this day still a mystery and some mysteries are eternal. Let us strive to understand them but let us not pretend that we do. Most of all, let us not judge those who bear the burden of the gift of child-bearing. Make no mistake, it is not a right, it is a gift. But how that gift is accepted can only be decided by the recipient who will judge best.

I have said before that I am a Minister of the Crown and not a minister of God, but I do have a calling. That is, that women in our society in Canada are contributors, are participants, have values that I respect and care for, and judgment that I bow to. I hear their voices, and these principles come from I know not where, but what they tell me is that my power to decide, like yours as a Member of this Chamber, has its limits. The ability to decide, not the right but the ability to decide, and the sensitivity, and the responsibility that is a part of what I am, not as a Member of Parliament but as a woman, as a part of what every woman is, and as a part of us as Canadians, is to be respected and is to be celebrated.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence I. O'Neil (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, it is with some regret that I rise at this time to speak on this important issue. It is regrettable for a very simple reason. It is regrettable that we at this point in our history, the evolution of civilization as we call it, are still debating a very fundamental question, that of the value we place on life itself. That question has haunted us more in recent times than in the past. For in recent times there has developed a feeling, a viewpoint, that life can be segregated; you can divide life and place a value on it according to its stage of development. That of course is not a view that I share. Today I want to tell my colleagues in this House and all Canadians why I do not share that view.

I do not believe that we as a society can do anything but protect life from the moment of conception. I say this because I, for reasons that perhaps reflect my legal training, know that in other areas of law the unborn is protected from the abuse of alcohol and drugs. In other words, a family court judge in this country can move in to protect an unborn child from the alcohol or drug abuse of the mother. The laws of this country protect the right of the unborn child to inherit property. The laws of this country provide that a child may collect damages for prenatal injuries.

That is the body of law, but at this point in our history there is no law which says that the child is protected from the wilful taking of its life. That is the irony of the body of law in our country today and that is why we are discussing this issue. We must fill that void. To be consistent we must complete the body of law and the protections extended to the unborn child to protect the most fundamental right of all, the right to continue to live.

There are those who will say there is no such right. There are those who will say there is no life before birth. However, it seems to me that those who say that deny the biological and medical reality as we know it today. It is widely known today, when perhaps it was not known 500 years ago, that a few weeks after conception the unborn child exhibits certain patterns of brain activity and other physiological activity. A few months after conception there is movement of the arms and legs.

I was gifted in having had a child born to my family last November 20, a child who was born 10 weeks early. The child was healthy upon birth. The child weighed less than three pounds.

According to the laws of our country today, the mother could have walked into a hospital and said she wanted the unborn child's life terminated. According to the laws in Canada today, the hospitals would have permitted her to do that. There are those who would say she should have been permitted to do that because the child has no rights and is nothing more than a fingernail or hair. It is what I call a collective social denial of a biological and legal reality in our society. Of course, there is precedent for such collective social denial.

Today, we discuss these atrocities of decades gone by with some degree of shame and ask how it could have happened. These atrocities happen as a result of a rationalization and a denial of the biological reality and legal reality. That is shameful.

The motion before the House today is one that I cannot support because it would permit abortion in most circumstances. It does not extend to the many thousands of unborn children who are being aborted today the protection that should be extended to them. There is no justifiable reason for abortion in this country, unless the continuing life of the mother requires some measure to be taken.

It is a falsehood to say today that continuation of a pregnancy in many cases represents a threat to the life of the mother. Our medical technology is far beyond that. The statistics are clear that rarely does such a situation develop.

Why do people rise in this Chamber and elsewhere to say that the mother should decide? They have a view that there is such a thing as an unfettered right to choose, and that we as human beings have the right to choose to do what we like. Of course, we know that that is not true. We cannot break a store window. That is a violation of property rights of another person. We cannot hit another person because that is a violation of the bodily integrity of another person.

We have laws in this country that balance our right to choose to do what we like against the rights of other people to continue life peacefully and productively in our society. There is no unfettered right to choose. Our rights are balanced against the rights of others. That is what law-making is all about.

I cannot choose to go into the public and slander the name of another person because there are laws that say I cannot do that. It is an infringement of the rights of other people. That law represents a limitation on my right to speak freely about what I believe, and we accept that.

Nevertheless, with all that legal precedent there are those who will say that there must be a right to choose on the part of the mother. I say that that is a false assumption. It is a simplistic explanation which, I regret to say, is all too often accepted as a fundamental basis of our society. It is not.

There are those who will also say that we have the right to control our bodies, whether men or women. Do we have that right? Let us take the example of the person who breaks the store window or hits someone else. That person can be arrested. Where is the control over one's body if one can be arrested? One's right to control one's body is limited by the rights of others in this society. That is a fundamental concept of our legal system, our body of law and our social jurisprudence.

It appears that there is widespread acceptance of the notion that a mother should have the right to control her body. There is no such right. The mother cannot control her body, nor can the father control his body. That same mother can be searched internally for narcotics according to many laws in this country.

Today we are talking about a balancing of interest. I agree totally that the issue was one of balancing of rights, but that means that there are rights enjoyed by the unborn child and rights enjoyed by the mother.

The motion before the House discusses balancing the right of a woman to liberty and security of her person and the responsibility of society to protect the unborn. How should that balance be resolved?

I have put forward with the Clerk an amendment to this motion in which I clearly outline how that balance should be dissolved. I make the case in my motion that only if a life-threatening situation exists should any action be taken that would result in the death of the unborn child. I go further and say in my amendment that when the decision is being made about whether or not a life-threatening situation exists, the unborn should be represented by legal counsel.

In the past, under the old Criminal Code, hearings were provided for but they were not bona fide hearings. They were a sham.

The only way to protect the unborn child when determining whether or not a life-threatening situation exists for the mother, is to ensure that the unborn child has independent legal representation so that due process is followed in the interest of protecting the unborn child.

Life is a continuum. It does not start at eight weeks or twelve weeks. There is no artificial time of that nature. Life begins at conception in biological terms. My child of 30 weeks was as complete as if it had gone for another 10 weeks inside its mother. The child weighed under three pounds. The difference is only in weight, not the reality of what is there.

There are those who put forward the premise that there is some logic to arbitrarily draw a point at which we would not allow abortion on demand. It is a response to the philosophy that if one cannot see it or feel it, it does not exist. Is that not why they say the mother should be permitted to kill the child before birth, if she wishes?

However, that same child is solely dependent on the mother one day after its birth. If it is isolated with the mother on an island, that mother is required under our law to ensure that the child continues to live. Whether she is required to breastfeed the child or subject her body to the needs of that child, our Criminal Code requires the mother to do that very thing. Otherwise she will be charged with a variety of offences such as child neglect, perhaps manslaughter. There are all kinds of laws in this country to protect that one-day old child. The Criminal Code requires the mother to provide the necessities of life to her child.

We hear stories every day, and everyone concedes it is scandalous, of a five-year old child abandoned by the mother in an apartment or in the woods or in some isolated place. Our society will not accept that because the child is there and can be seen. There is no umbilical cord. There is no defence after a child is born of control over one's body. These mothers cannot reason that their liberty is infringed upon by the responsibility to look after this one-day old child. There is no argument. I have never heard of one.

This forces the question, where is the logic and the consistency? It is the absence of consistency which is most alarming because it reflects the collective rationalization that a large measure of our society has undergone. As I said earlier, there is a historical precedent for such a collective social denial of biological and legal realities.

It concerns me that a body of law which is evolving in this country to protect the unborn child in many areas, does not, as I speak, extend to the protection of the unborn child from the arbitrary termination of its life. That does not reflect, in my view, the value system of this country

Let me speak for a moment about our value system and the value system I bring to this debate. I am not here simply to regurgitate religious dogma of any denomination. My views on this issue reflect the fundamental belief that human life is something different from and superior to all other forms of life. I believe that life comes from a superior being which we, at least in the Christian religions, call God. So there is that basis, and I happen to accept that. It is fundamental. However, it is not the sole basis upon which I make my argument. If I did not believe in God, I would stand here today and as forcefully make my case because the jurisprudence of this country and of our civilization is there.

There have been other periods in our history when rights were denied. Rights exist out of respect for our fellow man, not necessarily because they are dictated by one religious group or another. There are plenty of laws enacted by people who have no belief in the sanctity of life. They support it and make the case today that the unborn must be protected because they believe that our laws should reflect the realities. There are those who base their case on what I would call secular, philosophical views. In other words, how can we as a society terminate the life of an unborn child?

In closing, I would urge all Members to reject the main motion and to support the amendment I have tabled with the Clerk. I would like to move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Gottselig), that the following amendment to the main motion be made: That all the words in the motion after the words "should prohibit the performance of an abortion" be deleted and the following substituted therefor: While allowing those medical treatments which are necessary to prevent the death of the mother or to remedy a condition that if left untreated would cause the death of the mother, and such legislation shall require the appointment of legal counsel to represent the unborn in any determination process relating to the foregoing.

That is my amendment and I urge all Members to support this amendment when it comes to a vote only 16 hours from now. I urge all Members to stand for the right of the unborn child to live so history will record this period of time as a bright time, as an enlightened time in the evolution of the laws of this country, not for political purposes, but for a solution to a difficult question that is consistent with the values of our country and the laws which have evolved.

Mr. George Henderson (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, this is an extremely important debate we have entered into. At the outset, I want to make my position very clear. I am a pro-life person. I have held this view for many, many years. I have heard the arguments put forward yesterday afternoon and evening in this House from others who do not share my view, and I respect those arguments. But I have not been convinced by those arguments, nor the arguments I have heard over the years from those who support abortion.

My position is based on my belief that life is sacred and that life begins at conception. Earlier this year there was a Private Member's motion which I supported. This motion would have guaranteed rights for the unborn. I must say that I had hoped the Government would have handled this issue in a little better way. First, the Government tried to push through Parliament a multiple choice resolution. This came before the House some time ago. When that fell apart, the Government substituted this motion. To me, neither motion is acceptable. In fact, both of them are unacceptable. I want to read part of the Government's motion:

> "Such legislation would prohibit the performance of an abortion, subject to the following exceptions:
> When, during the earlier stages of pregnancy: a qualified medical practitioner is of the opinion that the continuation of the pregnancy of a woman would, or would be likely to, threaten her physical or mental well-being; when the woman in consultation with a qualified medical practitioner decides to terminate her pregnancy; and when the termination is performed by a qualified medical practitioner; and
> When, during the subsequent stages of pregnancy: the termination of the pregnancy satisfies further conditions, including a condition that after a certain point in time, the termination would only be permitted where, in the opinion of two qualified medical practitioners, the continuation of the pregnancy would, or would be likely to, endanger the woman's life or seriously endanger her health."

I believe that this motion is a thin disguise for abortion on demand. The words in the motion are worthless. For instance, how does one define "the earlier stages of pregnancy"? Furthermore, on what grounds would a qualified practitioner decide that "the pregnancy of a woman would, or would be likely to, threaten her physical or mental well-being"? I reject the motion. I do not like its language. It renders no protection at all for the unborn.

We might ask why the Government would put forward such a motion. In the game of hockey when a player is trying to run out the clock that is called ragging the puck. The Government claims that through this motion people will get a sense of the House. I hope that we get a sense of the House. I hope that we get the right sense of the House. But I believe that the Government is running out the clock. In other words, I hope this is not debate just for the sake of having a debate. This debate, whatever the outcome, will not resolve this very emotional issue. In any case, I will not dwell on why the Government brought this motion forward rather than a piece of legislation at this time. I will be honoured once again to cast my vote for the unborn.

In the last year or so Members of the House have grappled with two very important issues, that of capital punishment and that of abortion. My belief in the sanctity of human life compelled me to oppose the reinstatement of the death penalty. The issue of abortion has now aroused another emotional debate. As I mentioned earlier, I am opposed to the notion of abortion on demand. The issue of capital punishment is very difficult since there is no doubt that we all have to be honest with ourselves in the case of hardened criminals who rape and murder young boys and girls. It is difficult for us to wrestle with the issue. We know that many ex-convicts come back on the streets in too short a time. While I believe that at that time the penalty should be much harsher and much stiffer, I certainly could not support legislation that would have asked someone to push a button or pull a cord to take the life of an individual. If I could not do that myself I could not see myself supporting legislation that would allow others to do it.

Like most of my colleagues, my position is deeply rooted in my community and the values that we share there. Our community is based on family. Those families revolve around their children. We also celebrate and share in the gift, indeed, the miracle, of human life.

In 1973, in my own family my youngest son came to a very untimely death at the age of six years. That presented a difficult time for both my wife and myself. I think that it is only those who go through such an event who believe as strongly as I believe in the sanctity of life. It is not an easy thing. I know what parents have to go through. We read about them in the papers almost daily, whether they deal with the death of children as a result of highway accidents, drownings or if they are the victims of merciless killings. It is difficult to accept. We must have a belief. We must believe that there is someone who is above all this. I believe that these things are meant to be.

It is through that sort of belief that I take the stand that I take here in this House this evening, a stand which I have taken for the last number of years. It is not a political belief. It is from the heart. The life of an unborn child should not be arbitrarily terminated. Human life deserves the full protection of the law. The motion now before the House does not provide that protection.

Other Members have spoken of the various methods of abortion. I will not repeat the graphic details. However, I am convinced that Canadians share my abhorrence of these methods.

Certain Members of the House have argued that man's desire to control woman lies at the heart of this debate. I do not believe that since it is a complete disregard for human life. Most of the letters I have received from my own constituents with respect to this issue have come from women. I would say that 99 per cent of them are against abortion.

I will not speak or dwell long on this issue. I wish to put my position on the record as to why I will vote the way in which I will vote. I believe that the motion is wrong. However, I will certainly support amendments that will help to make it and the ensuing draft legislation correct.

Last night the Hon. Member for Willowdale (Mr. Oostrom) indicated that he would be introducing an amendment to the motion which states that all the words in the motion after the words "should prohibit the performance of an abortion" be deleted and the following substituted therefor: "While allowing those medical treatments which are necessary to prevent the death of the mother or to remedy a condition that, if left untreated, would cause the death of the mother."

I certainly urge all Members to examine their conscience and to support that amendment tomorrow when we vote. I sincerely hope that a majority of Members will reject the Government's resolution and thus protect those who are unable to defend themselves—the unborn.

That is all I have to say on this very emotional issue. I hope that all Members will search their conscience. I believe that if there is one thing that this Parliament can do and do right it is to protect the unborn.

Mr. Reginald Stackhouse (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, from time to time Parliament has the opportunity to address itself to the profound issues of human existence. We have such an opportunity in this debate. I have to say that as a listener I have been impressed by the way in which so many Members even though they hold differing views have spoken from the heart, spoken from the depths of their own experience, their own understanding. In such a debate points are reiterated, and if one comes later in the debate, he or she may well wonder what he or she can say that has not been said over and over.

I want to focus particularly on one dimension of the debate which is of great significance and is included in the motion before us, that is, the need to balance the rights of the mother and the rights of the foetus, a balance that I submit must at least be attempted, for justice is not achieved when any right is made an absolute over all others. Making an absolute of the right to choose is such an example.

For instance, in his classic on the right to choose, the right of the individual to shape his own behaviour, John Stuart Mills asserts, in his essay: On Liberty, that the individual has the right to choose what he will do with his own life as long as his behaviour does not injure another. That philosophy is basic to this debate about abortion. A mother certainly must have the right to choose, but equally society must have the right to limit those choices when the rights of the foetus are threatened, particularly and most profoundly, the right of the foetus to live. What gives society that right?

I have to submit in this debate that it is the common humanity that mother and foetus share. There can be no more significant demand made upon the state than its duty to protect innocent human life. If we believe that the foetus in the womb shares a common humanity with the mother and indeed with the society into which that foetus will ultimately be born, we have to focus some attention in this debate on that common humanity.

Therefore, I raise with you, Mr. Speaker, the question: When does this humanity begin? When can we say that the foetus shares with the mother, shares with you and me, a common humanity that must give to that foetus the same protection that you and I expect to receive from the state, the protection against the threat to our lives? When does this humanity begin?

There are many who profoundly and sincerely believe that it begins at conception with the fertilized ovum in the uterus making its way to the womb, which will be its first family home, and even there the fertilized ovum is a human being, a child, a baby. That belief is widely shared and profoundly held. However, it is not held by all, and it never has been. It has never been shared by all who profess the same common faith. For example, in the 13th century St. Thomas Aquinas, whose teaching is generally recognized as the perennial philosophy of western Catholicism, spoke of the human soul being given to the foetus many weeks after conception. There are now many who suggest that the humanity of the foetus is not identified until sometime later than conception, such as the development of the brain or the achievement of what we now call viability, namely, the competence to survive outside the womb.

I cite the examples of medieval and modern simply to show how there has always been, and there is now, a variety of opinion in response to the question: When does human life begin? I put it to the House that there is no scientific data that establishes when humanity begins. There is data on when life begins, but when we ask the questions when does humanity begin and when is the foetus truly human and sufficiently human to claim on the state the obligation of protection, we have to say that there is no scientific data to answer those questions and no empirical evidence to force on any of us an answer which all reasonable people must accept. There is not even any single religious or theological assertion in which all believers concur. Perhaps they should, but the fact is that they do not. Therefore, we as a Parliament are left with the question when does human life begin and left with the lack of a definitive, final answer supported by universal consensus.

It is for that reason that I find the motion before us very difficult to accept. It implies that Parliament can at some point express in legislation a time in the pre-natal development when the foetus becomes human, becomes sufficiently human that it can make a claim on the state for a more serious, a more demanding protection than would be given to it before.

I submit that when Canada's abortion law is written, it will serve the country better if it treats the pre-natal period as a continuum, as an ongoing development from the time of conception. I ask, Mr. Speaker, which of us can believe himself justified to say that the foetus is human at 26 weeks, but not 25 weeks; at 20 weeks, but not 19 weeks; at 16 weeks, but not at 15 weeks; at 12 weeks, but not 11 weeks?

Should we not recognize that there is a developing humanity within the womb, a development that continues even after birth itself? We believe that part of being a human is what we call personhood. It is recognized widely that such personhood does not issue into the world with birth; personhood is something that develops even after birth during the infant years of interaction with other humans, the mother, the family, and the playmates. I make this point for the following reason. If a newborn infant can be said not to possess the fullness of human personhood, the fullness of self-consciousness, we do not deny that newborn infant is human, and for the same reason we should not deny that the foetus shares with us a humanity which makes a claim upon us as a society and as a Parliament to offer innocent human life the protection that is its due.

There are many who, having accepted that claim, oppose abortion on any ground whatsoever. There have been in time many who have opposed abortion even to save the life of the mother. As recently as the reign of Pius XII the claim could be made that direct abortion was always unacceptable, that the human life of the foetus was so inviolable that even saving the mother's life through a direct abortion could not justify the deliberate taking of the life of the foetus.

There are few Canadians who now support that position. I am aware that there are those who still try to make it palatable by invoking what teachers of ethics have called the law of double effect. This is the belief that an action which is good in itself is justified, even though unintentionally it may cause another action which is evil.

I submit that in the context of abortion terminating a pregnancy in order to save the life of the mother, invoking the law of double effect, is intellectually dishonest. It is much more ethical to assert that no right is absolute, not even the right to life, any more than is the right to choose.

• (1810)

Our society asserts that the right to life is not a valid absolute. It asserts it by accepting the necessity to take human life, under prescribed and legislated conditions. That is how our society justifies the use of armed forces, trained, equipped, ordered, and authorized to take life should the need be there. That is how our society can justify armed police forces within its own borders, whose members can legally take life under prescribed conditions.

As a country we have not made an absolute out of the right to life. In the instance of abortion, surely there are occasions when the right of a mother to live must take priority over the foetus to live, when the right of the mother to choose her life will take priority over the right of the life that is within her.

Our law has generally recognized that, for even in the Criminal Code before 1969 when abortion was prohibited it was also explicitly stated that the penalties against abortion would not be levied against the physician or other attendant who performed an abortion to save the life of the mother. We have always accepted that there can be at times a hierarchy of rights.

We need a law on abortion that will respect the right of the mother to make this kind of a claim. We need as well a law that will respect the right of the mother to a healthy life. Realism reminds us that her role as a mother perhaps of other children makes that right essential not only for herself but for those for whom she is responsible.

I am aware that many Members of the House, as many citizens of the country, are uncertain about a law on abortion including that because of the way in which they believe that the previous law was abused, that very often claims were made on behalf of terminating a pregnancy because of an alleged threat to the health which in reality was not a serious threat; and that the law was used and abused in the interest of what in fact was abortion on demand.

I ask the House to consider the abuse of that law should not prevent us from now providing within the law the right, the moral, the valid claim of a mother to a healthy life; that, rather, we should legislate on our own and in co-operation with other Governments in Canada provide for those steps and procedures which will assure that a law on abortion will be respected and honoured as intended by this Parliament, not abused, distorted, and made a way by which the intent of the law can be circumvented.

There are many people as well who believe that the mother should have a right to choose, in so far as she should not be obliged to carry a foetus to term when she had no responsibility for the pregnancy. Specifically I am referring to the victims of rape. There is some argument that I accept for legalizing the opportunity of a woman to terminate a pregnancy in which she had no say as to its initiation.

As difficult as it is in terms of the law, the rights and the claims of women victimized that way, however few they may be—and there are those who allege that the number is very few—notwithstanding the instance itself are of great concern to the person involved in this situation. She is not a statistic.

I believe that as unacceptable as the motion is it is possible for this Parliament to write a law on abortion which will achieve the balance intended by this motion, a balance between the rights of the mother and the rights of the foetus. I believe that such is intended by one or more amendments that have already been introduced and which the House tomorrow may find more acceptable than the motion on the Order Paper.

I want to devote my remaining minutes to an amendment which I have already submitted to the Clerk. It deals with a dimension apart from whether there should be abortion or whether there should not be, that is, an amendment which recognizes that a mother does not operate within a vacuum, that she is operating within her own life situation, that we do not deal with the question exhaustively just by saying that abortion is right or it is wrong. I want to submit an amendment which will recognize that we are dealing with a very human situation, with a woman who is facing a pregnancy which, for whatever reason, is unwelcomed by her.

Therefore, I believe that it should be mandatory for any medical practitioner advising or recommending that the woman consider or have an abortion and terminate her pregnancy to be required to inform her of available counselling services, to provide her with information and counsel on what services can assist her in continuing the pregnancy and giving birth to the child, finding support in the community and, if she desires, arranging the adoption of that child. It is that we would impose such decisions on her, but that she will be aware of them, that she will also be informed about the possible consequences of having an abortion, the possible psychological and physical harm that can be occasioned by terminating the pregnancy. She may decide anyway to go ahead with it, but she should be aware that it is not as simple and as faultless and as free from injury that she may have assumed.

In other connections, in other work that I did, I have known what such counselling can do, particularly for young, single mothers who may find themselves in a large city without any family, without any connections or personal relationships, who have found themselves for whatever reason engaged in a relationship that has made them pregnant and knowing no one, have wondered where they can find some help and some direction.

Is an abortion the only alternative that is open to them? The fact is that no, it is not. There are communities and institutions where such women can find assistance, where they can find care. There are agencies that will arrange for the adoption and the future well-being of a child that is born under such circumstances. My hope is that when we write a law we will provide for a greater stress upon that kind of counselling so that that need can be met.

The motion on the floor is right in seeking to balance the rights of the mother and the rights of the foetus. I submit that the way it proposes to do that is not the only way. It is not the best way. For many of us it is not an acceptable way, but it is objective to some. I hope that tomorrow there will be an opportunity for the House to vote on amendments that will provide a better way and offer a greater hope to this country.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, thank you for providing me with this opportunity to say a few words in this very, very important debate. I want to begin my remarks by describing one of the disappointing aspects of this debate. It is not that it should not take place, because it is an issue that touches the lives of every one of us and concerns every one of us. When I say "us", I mean Members of Parliament and the people of Canada per se. It is an issue that is considered to be extremely critical for many. It is appropriate that we debate the issue of abortion and how a progressive, thoughtful country ought to deal with the issue.

• (1820)

A certain amount of what we are seeing and hearing in the House of Commons today is an illusion. There is an impression that I think the House of Commons and the Parliament of Canada is giving, namely, an impression that we are dealing with the issue, that leadership is being provided, that a decision is being made, and that the issue is being resolved. As you well know, Mr. Speaker, such is not the case. We are not dealing with a Bill. We are not dealing with legislation. That is how Governments govern. That is what we expect from a prime minister, a cabinet, and a government. We expect them to bring forward legislation to take a position, to provide leadership and pass legislation either in its introduced form or in its amended form through the House of Commons and through the Senate, the Parliament of Canada.

However we are not doing that here today. We are debating a very general motion. I do not need to remind you, Mr. Speaker, because I know your interest in this issue, that immediately following the Supreme Court decision which occurred nearly half a year ago, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn) said that it was incumbent upon the Government of Canada to act immediately, to take decisive action as quickly as possible, and to introduce legislation to deal with the perceived crisis created as a result of the Supreme Court decision. The Minister of Justice said six months ago it was urgent that legislation be brought forward immediately to deal with the situation, but no legislation was brought forward. No legislation has been brought forward and no legislation is before the House of Commons today.

We all recognize that Parliament is in its dying days; in a matter of days or weeks this Parliament will be dissolved and we will be into a general election. In other words, no legislation will be introduced despite the promise of the Minister of Justice and the comments of our Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney). In a sense the Government is playing politics with this very important issue. It is giving the impression to the people of Canada that somehow or other the Government is dealing with an issue about which so many Canadians feel deeply, yet the Government is not doing that at all.

It is allowing Members of Parliament to make speeches on all sides of the issue and to present amendments on all aspects so that they can go back to their constituencies in the pre-election or election period and say: "Look what I tried to do. The Government of Canada did not do anything. The Cabinet did not do anything. The Prime Minister did not do anything, but this is what I tried to do". However, no changes in legislation or changes in government policy have been made. In a sense it is a relatively hollow exercise. I feel the people of Canada are being somewhat betrayed. There is a great deal of hypocrisy demonstrated by the Government's action. After the votes take place, whatever the outcome, nothing will have been resolved. The status quo will be as it is today. Many Canadians want some kind of initiative by the Government. It is a difficult decision, I admit. It is a difficult decision for our Prime Minister to take. It is a difficult decision for the Cabinet to make, but that is what Governments are all about. Making decisions is not easy, particularly on issues such as the one we are debating today. I feel in a sense that the Government has failed to deal with this one, especially for those who felt that legislation ought to be brought forward.

I want to begin my substantive comments by saying that all of us are for life. In a sense, all of us, not to get caught up with the terminology that is so often used, are promoters of life. We are pro-life. We are not anti-life. I become somewhat offended when people suggest that certain Members of Parliament are pro-abortion. That gives the impression that Members of Parliament like the notion that some women will terminate a pregnancy. Obviously such is not the case. There is not a Member of Parliament who is not for life, who would not like to see unwanted pregnancies eliminated 100 per cent.

As we all know, there are realities in this world. Some countries have been taking steps to prohibit abortion and to make abortion illegal. In Brazil where abortions are banned, over one million are illegally performed each year. One hundred thousand women each year die because of unsuccessful attempts to terminate pregnancies. Another 10,000 children each year are born malformed as a result of botched abortions. Simply abolishing abortions in a legal sense does not do away with unwanted pregnancies. Perhaps a little closer to home is Ireland which has taken strong steps to prohibit abortions, yet the number of abortions that take place is not out of line with most other countries where abortions are permitted. The Irish women simply go to England to have their abortions.

Let us set aside the notion that by passing legislation of some kind we can eliminate abortions from taking place. None of us like to see the termination of pregnancy. None of us like to see an unwanted pregnancy. Perhaps that is why so many of us feel a more appropriate initiative would be for Members of Parliament to introduce measures and legislation when necessary that would see the number of unwanted pregnancies in Canada reduced and, indeed, eliminated.

We could do much more to support family planning. As a matter of fact, the Government has cut back on funds to organizations that attempt to assist people planning their families. We could be doing much more in providing for children. Child care is the most obvious example before us. We all recognize that today, as we debate this issue, there are more than one million children in Canada receiving care in unlicensed child care facilities. We would like to see that situation changed. Yet the Government's initiative, while it is a step in the right direction, falls far short of meeting that requirement.

Thousands and thousands of families across this country with children are not adequately cared for because facilities do not exist. We are not doing much to meet that demand. We should be doing much more by providing services to families to enable them to care for their children more appropriately. I do not have to remind you, Sir, that women earn 64 cents for every dollar that men earn. That is plain and simple discrimination against women, in this case against many mothers. Mother led families, almost by definition, live below the poverty line and in inadequate housing. We see children taking advantage of the food banks and soup kitchens. It is a disgrace in a country as rich as Canada that each day thousands and thousands of children have to depend upon these kinds of facilities.

Let me deal with better education and schools. I come from British Columbia. There is movement in B.C. to try to get family planning and sex education out of the schools. We all know that wherever decent programs of sex education have been introduced in schools the level of unwanted pregnancies goes down. There is a direct correlation between the two, yet we see governments taking steps to keep young people ignorant on matters of this kind.

I am very concerned that the motion before us is inadequate. It is very vague at best. It describes early stages when abortion would be allowed and later stages when it would be restricted. What are those stages? There is no mention of that.

Implicit in this motion is the idea that women are having abortions without much thought being attached to the process. Yet the facts are totally at odds with that. I trust women. We all believe, or at least we should believe, that a woman should have the right to make a responsible decision on consultation with her physician, and I am sure in most cases with many others, about abortion. After a thoughtful process of consultations, interviews and discussions reviewing the circumstances surrounding her pregnancy, if in the final analysis the decision is to terminate that pregnancy, who are we to say no to that decision? Surely, if we believe that women have the right to make decisions about day-to-day life, they should certainly have the right to make decisions about their own lives and futures.

I do not think that recriminalizing abortion under the Criminal Code, which for all intents and purposes is what this motion does, is the right thing to do. I do not think that imposing criminal sanctions against women is the answer to the very serious issue we are debating today.

When we consider the evidence, we see that 99.6 per cent of abortions performed in Canada are performed prior to the twentieth week. Perhaps a more appropriate statistic would be that 89 per cent of abortions performed in Canada take place prior to the twelfth week. Again, there is this notion in the motion that so many women have abortions in later stages of pregnancy when in fact the evidence is totally to the contrary.

When I ask why the Government is doing this, it says that it wants to get a sense of the House to assist it in its future decision making on this issue. As I said earlier, this House is about to end and there will be a new Parliament in a matter of weeks or months from now. Using this logic, we will have to go through this process once again to get the sense of the new House in order to give the Government direction.

This is not the place for the Government to conduct Gallup polls on this issue. A Gallup poll has already been conducted. The polls clearly indicate that the overwhelming number of people in Canada believe that the decision to have an abortion or not to have an abortion is a decision that ought to be made by a woman in consultation with her physician.

The statistics are rather overwhelming. On April 13 of this year, Gallup found that virtually 70 per cent of the people of Canada thought that the decision to have an abortion should rest with a woman in consultation with her physician. If the Government wants to get some sense of how the people of Canada feel about this issue, the evidence is clearly there. It does not have to conduct a Gallup poll in the House of Commons.

One thing I believe we are overlooking in this weak government initiative is the whole matter of reproductive technology. For months and months now, there has been much debate in these halls, in the various committees and between Members of Parliament about the changing reproductive technologies that are coming into being in Canada including in vitro fertilization, surrogate motherhood, the use of foetal tissue for scientific experimentation, gender selection, and a whole set of other related issues. These issues ought to be thoroughly examined beyond the partisan work that often takes place in our own committees in the House of Commons, and of course, on those committees the Government has overwhelming numbers.

Why not take this whole matter seriously and have a royal commission into the whole matter of reproductive technology? As we have done over the years on other important issues, let us have a royal commission that would examine these issues carefully, explore the latest information, and hear the best witnesses available, both here and in other countries. It would then advise the Government and Parliament on the most appropriate ways to deal with these extremely serious ethical and moral questions. I suggest that we give serious consideration to a royal commission of inquiry into the changing reproductive technologies.

There are many other issues that ought to be included in this debate. I am proud of the contributions of all of my colleagues. As I have indicated, this initiative by the Government is an illusion. It will result in no change. The government motion itself is very vague.

I would like to suggest an amendment that I think would make much more sense in the realities of Canadian society today. It would read as follows: "That, in the opinion of this House, the Supreme Court of Canada, having declared that the provisions of the Criminal Code relating to abortion are inconsistent with the provisions of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, and are therefore of no force or effect, law and government policy should respect the principle that the decision whether or not to terminate a pregnancy should be that of a woman involved in consultation with a qualified medical practitioner and that the procedure should be performed by a qualified medical practitioner and further, should ensure that the Canada Health Act and regulations are amended to ensure equality of access throughout Canada".

That summarizes my party position and it summarizes my own position.

This is a difficult issue. It touches the heart of every parliamentarian and of every Canadian. I have been impressed with the quality and the level of debate that has surrounded this issue from all sides of the House and from those with various points of view on the issue. I am proud to have been a part of that process.

Let us recognize that this is not a serious initiative by the Government. The Government's first effort was laughable. It tried at that time to be all things to all people. It tried to play politics with this very, very emotional issue. The Government then realized the folly of its ways.

After we in the Opposition tried to explain to the Government that it was not correct to proceed with a motion that took no position, the Government, after some reflection and probably after some consultation with people like yourself, Mr. Speaker, who are wise about parliamentary procedure, decided that that was an inappropriate way to proceed. It decided to take some kind of a position in a motion.

This motion will result in no change to the laws of Canada. It will result in no change to the status quo. In spite of the musings of some government Members who would like to suggest otherwise, next week, next month, and later on this year, the situation regarding abortions in Canada will be the same as it is now. It requires legislation to be changed. It is our job as a Parliament to make changes if they are deemed to be necessary through legislation, not through motions. A motion simply expresses a certain view on a certain issue.

While the situation at the moment seems to me to be meeting the needs of Canadians, the Government has tried to hoodwink us into thinking that it is taking an initiative. If the Government thought changes were required, and I am not certain it really believes that nor do I reflect that view, it would have an obligation to bring forward legislation.

In closing, I want to say that I do think the decision whether or not to terminate a pregnancy ought to be left with a woman in consultation with her doctor. Many people have asked me what would happen if we were to pass a law that prohibited abortions. What kind of penalties would there be for people who break the law, for the thousands and thousands of women who, in their own minds and after thoughtful decisions, decided to terminate pregnancies? How do we deal with that? Do we jail vast numbers of people? Do we impose horrendous fines on people who have had abortions? Of course not.

I call upon my colleagues to show compassion and understanding on this issue. In the final analysis, when we vote, we should ask ourselves if we trust women to make a responsible decision on their behalf and on society's behalf.

Mr. Bill Gottselig (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate, and do so as a parliamentarian representing my constituents in this House and as a husband and father.

We must realize at the outset that all of us feel compassion for people. We recognize that there are times when people feel they are driven to seek abortions when they really should not be. Possibly what we need, at least in part, is to put a stronger support system in place so that people really will get the counselling they need, and the financial assistance if required, to assist women to carry their pregnancy through the full term and give birth to a live child.

We know there is a terrific shortage of children available for adoption. We hear daily of people who wait years for the chance to adopt a child and who ultimately go through life unable to have children.

I want to put on the record some of the scientific information available today dealing with pregnancies, and deal somewhat with abortion methods, and then read into the record some of the thoughts expressed to me by my constituents as a result of the Supreme Court decision last January.

We live in an age of information. We have a wealth of information at our fingertips, and many exciting developments in the new medical field of foetology. During the last decade we have had given to us dramatic evidence of the wondrous process of human growth before birth and have had confirmed that life does begin at conception. Ultrasound imaging and modern medical miracles of treating unborn children are just two of the examples of recent technological developments.

Human conception in a Petri dish through in vitro fertilization clearly proves that human life begins with the union of the man's sperm with the woman's egg. Through the work of Doctors Patrick Steptoe and Robert Edwards, Louise Joy Brown was conceived in a dish ten years ago and later implanted in her mother's uterus successfully. It was just a few days ago that we heard of the joy in the Brown household in England when they celebrated Louise's tenth birthday. They also have a younger daughter, six years old, who was conceived by the same process.

This process of in vitro fertilization has been repeated over a thousand times in various parts of the world, and it is indisputable proof that from the moment of conception a unique human being with years of potential development ahead of him or her comes into existence. At the single cell stage this being is alive, is human, is made up of 46 chromosomes, is sexed, and is complete, and programmed from within. He or she immediately begins a growth process that will be continuous until adulthood.

This is the manner in which the development progresses. Immediately upon fertilization, cellular development begins. The baby's sex is determined already at the single cell stage by the x or y chromosome carried in the father's sperm cells.

In the first week division of cells continues and new life implants itself in the mother's uterus. In the third week the foundation of the nervous system has been established. By the end of the week the heart is beating. In the sixth week brain waves can be measured. The skeleton is complete. Hands and feet are beginning to grow.

In the eighth week the baby responds to pain. Feet and hands with fingerprints are formed. The heartbeat is audible through an office instrument. In the tenth week the baby's body is completely formed. In the twelfth week all organ systems are functioning. The baby continues to grow and mature.

As technology continues to advance and the developing baby matures, potential problems previously unknown and untreated can now be identified and corrected. The medical profession has become more adept at handling the complex surgical demands of operating on the brain and urinary tract of the unborn child.

In the preface to the authoritative textbook Williams Obstetrics, 17th Edition, 1985, the authors make the following observation: "Happily we live and work in an era in which the foetus is established as our second patient with many rights and privileges comparable to those previously achieved only after birth. To interrupt this process at any stage of the pregnancy is referred to as an abortion.

Now, we must ask, is the abortion a simple humane procedure beneficial to motherhood, painless to all? The answer is that it certainly is not. An artificially induced abortion, that is the intentional removal of the foetus from the uterus prematurely before it is viable or capable of sustaining life, and we are not concerned here with the spontaneous abortion, is directly killing a human life that has already begun".

During the first trimester the methods that are commonly used are the suction aspiration where the mouth of the womb is stretched open and a suction curette is inserted into the womb and strong suction tears the body in pieces, drawing it into a container. This is the most common method of abortion and great care must be taken to prevent the womb from being damaged.

Dilation and curettage are similar to the suction method except the sharp loop-shaped knife is used. The knife cuts the baby apart and the pieces are then removed through the cervix.

Various other techniques are used from the third to the ninth month, but the effect is the death of an unborn child. Absolutely no doubt about that. I will not go into all of the other methods but we are convinced, we have seen, and it has been proven by scientific methods, that the child does experience extreme pain during this procedure.

In discussing these procedures, until recently, no mention was made of the baby. However, through the use of real time ultrasound we have now seen the desperate efforts of a 12-week old unborn baby trying to escape the suction apparatus of the abortionist, and the pain.

In a recent book, Doctor Myron K. Denny strongly supports abortion, but he candidly talks about the risks. He says:

> When we consider the complexities of the human body we should not be surprised that abortion can result in complications.

There are many complications which can result from abortion including haemorrhage, infection, damage to cervix, perforation of the uterus, and perforation of the bowel. Following abortion many women are unable to conceive or to carry a child to full term.

I read an interesting editorial recently in one of the daily papers written by Mr. Bastien, a freelance writer in Ottawa. He writes:

> "Pro-choice groups often argue that anti-abortionists are seeking to impose their religious views on society. Defending the life of the unborn child is thus equated with religious intolerance."

He goes on to deal with that argument. His position is that to speak out against abortion is a natural law first developed by the Greeks, not the Christians. He goes on say:

> "The Sumerians condemned abortion about 2000 BC. So did Hammurabi 300 years later. In 500 BC, Hippocrates encased the condemnation into the Hippocratic Oath which, until it was abandoned by most medical schools a few decades ago, compelled all doctors to take every means at their disposal to protect the life of the unborn child. And the Declaration of Geneva, a modernized version of the Hippocratic Oath, adopted by the World Medical Association in 1948, states specifically: "I will maintain the utmost respect for human life, from the time of conception".

In the summer of 1987, only one year ago, I included an abortion questionnaire in one of my householders. We had a larger response to this questionnaire than to any other question we had ever posed to my constituents. There were over 700 responses to the questionnaire in which we asked very direct questions so that people could answer simply yes or no.

The first question we asked was "Should it be the right of every woman to decide, if she wishes, to have an abortion?" Sixty-one per cent of my constituents said no, 38 per cent said yes, and 1 per cent was undecided. We asked further: "Do you support the idea of abortion on demand?" Seventy-one per cent said no, 27 per cent said yes, and 2 per cent were undecided. We asked: "Do you support free-standing abortion clinics?" Sixty-six per cent said no, 32 per cent said yes, and 2 per cent were undecided. We asked: "Do you support the present Criminal Code which does not give any rights to the unborn child?" Sixty-three per cent said no, 32 per cent said yes, and 5 per cent were undecided.

I want to emphasize that the position which I hold, that is, the pro-life position, is supported by a large percentage of my constituents. During the last few months, and particularly earlier this year, I am sure that all parliamentarians received a lot of mail from their constituents.

During the debate which is taking place we often hear that abortion is a woman's issue. I say that yes, it is a woman's issue, but it is also a man's issue and a family issue because it affects the direction our society will take and what we are telling other countries throughout the world about us as Canadians.

Within the first month to six weeks after the Supreme Court decision I received a total of 650 letters. Of these, 324 were from women, 139 were from men, and 187 were from couples, and often from families, and every member of the family down to the smallest child had signed the letter. They all had basically the same message—"abortion is wrong, the Supreme Court is not governing us, you were elected to govern us, you make the rules".

I am sure that my mail would not be unlike that of a Member from eastern Canada or the extreme West. I consider myself to be a westerner although I am told by my British Columbia colleagues that they are the true westerners.

I want to read into the record some of the thoughts of my constituents on this issue. The came from people of a wide variety of stations in life. There were letters from young people, teenagers, university students, senior citizens, doctors, lawyers, farmers, and so on. One reads:

> "I believe it is the duty of government to provide protection for human life. It is totally incongruous that a person be charged with murder if the life of a week-old child is taken, yet the same atrocious act, some say, can be legal if carried out several months earlier. Those who think in this vein should re-read MacBeth's words as he contemplated Duncan's murder:"
> "This even-handed justice commends the ingredients of our poison'd chalice to our own lips."

This individual goes on to say:

> Further, it is utterly unthinkable that individuals who have been lacking in responsibility in sexual behaviour, can claim "rights" that enable them to take life in order to extricate themselves from the result of their actions. Such a course of action becomes all the more offensive when ones who abhor this procedure are asked to finance it through taxation.

Another constituent writes:

> "I have personally seen the pro-choice videotape wherein Dr. Henry Morgentaler, himself, admits that the pregnancy rarely threatens the life of the mother. With medical technology such as we have today, pregnancy is safer today than ever before.
> The argument that women want control and freedom of their own body is totally unfounded! Science and medicine give us evidence that in pregnancy there are two bodies. Regardless of the lack of value they may wish to place on that smaller or newer body, that it exists as a body, may be denied only at the sacrifice of intellectual honesty. The tiny baby at conception has his/her own genetic coding which is different from his/her mother's. This should also answer the question of when "personhood" begins.
> Do women forget that fifty per cent of the babies they choose to abort are female human beings? They clamour for freedom of women but, obviously, not freedom for all women."

Another constituent says:

> "The Supreme Court decision of January 28, 1988 is certainly a very disturbing one. We speak with great intensity against the holocaust of the 1940's in Germany, but now we have legalized the silent holocaust that will only increase in our own country. That is, thousands of unborn children will be killed each year in Canada."

I would like to conclude my remarks with a quote from the New York State Medical Society. They say:

> "—from the first moment of conception, there is a living creature in process of development—and—any interruption to this living process always results in the destruction of life—"

That fits very well with the topic we are discussing today. It could have been written at any time in the past few years, certainly since I became a parliamentarian. That, however, was written in 1867, the year of Confederation. Even then abortion was resulting in the destruction of life.

Germany learned by its mistakes. In a 1976 decision the West German Supreme Court invalidated an abortion on request law stating:

> "Let other nations do as they please. We know from bitter experience the enormities that result from denial of the sanctity of human life; the assumption that some lives are "worthless" and hence disposable at the whim of the individual or the will of the State . . . Human life represents an ultimate value . . . Therefore protection cannot be limited and no distinction can be made between unborn and born life."

I will not be able to support the motion introduced by the Government. I intend to support amendments which have been introduced by various colleagues such as the Hon. Member for Gray—Simcoe (Mr. Mitges) and the Hon. Member for Kitchener (Mr. Reimer). I am on record as seconding the amendment introduced by the Hon. Member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso (Mr. O'Neil).

I ask all Members of the House to consider seriously this question and to consider the sanctity of human life, particularly the lives of the unborn.

The unborn have often been described as our future. They are future Canadians. I urge all Members to examine their consciences carefully and consider all the options. I ask them to look at all the reasoned arguments that have been put forward here and do as I intend, vote for life.

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to participate in the debate with regard to abortion. I approach this debate with a sense of optimism so that we may begin to try to resolve what has become a difficult issue for legislators as well as for Canadians.

There is no law and there are no programs to protect the unborn. I am against abortion on demand and I believe that there ought to be a law to replace the previous enactment.

Having said so, I am reminded of the words of Edmund Burke when he said:

> "Your representative owes you, not his industry alone but his judgment; and he betrays instead of serving you if he sacrifices it to your opinion."

I have come to my judgment, after listening to Canadians across this country and in my constituency, many of whom have been women, medical doctors, nurses, lawyers, clergymen, schoolteachers, fishermen, steelworkers, coal miners, grandmothers, teenagers, and, yes, countless numbers of organizations with varied opinions. I have come to respect the views expressed by all those different groups and I hope they will come to respect my view.

I approach this issue not in a partisan manner but in a manner which I believe represents the best possible course of action in developing good public policy for all Canadians. In doing so, I have asked myself and I am sure countless Canadians have asked: Why has the Government of Canada taken so long to bring forward a piece of legislation to address the issues we are now debating?

It should be remembered that we are not debating a Bill. We are debating a motion, a motion which is merely to test the barometers of views held by Members of Parliament on this particular subject matter.

We will have amendments, and those amendments will also attempt to reflect a particular view, although not a detailed perspective, on the subject matter of abortion.

The motion is a statement of intent, not a detailed piece of legislation. Although Members may not agree with the entire motion or the amendments, we are debating and voting not on precise legal terms but on the intent as to what future legislation may or may not take.

I believe the Government has taken considerable time to introduce this motion because it is not certain of the direction in which it wishes to proceed. It is plagued with the problem of balancing the interest of the woman with the rights of the unborn. In my view—and I am genuinely concerned—for a law to be effective, whether that law be restrictive or permissive, there must be consensus among Canadians in the direction in which the country should proceed. As a result, time has lapsed, misinformation has prevailed, while Canadians anxiously await the Government of Canada to respond.

I say sincerely and humbly that I would have hoped that the Government of Canada would have lived up to its word and presented the Canadian Parliament with a piece of legislation and not a motion. I understand and, yes, I sympathize with the difficulties it is confronted with. Nevertheless, it is the Government's duty, its responsibility to have provided Parliament with legislation.

In responding to the challenge of the Supreme Court of Canada when it determined in its judgment that Section 251 was unconstitutional, let us put aside the rhetoric and focus our attention on how we as legislators can in fact balance the interest of the woman with that of the unborn.

I phrase the question differently, for I attempt to reduce it to its most simplest terms, without of course diluting its effect. The question I pose is as follows: What can the state do to facilitate a person to carry their pregnancy to a full term? In response to that question, I have heard a great deal from a variety of groups and individuals. Notwithstanding their sincerity, which I found in great abundance from all sides on the issue, I believe the state ought to enact federal legislation.

The question for many then becomes whether we have a permissive law or a restrictive law.

For me, as a Catholic, the problem is even more difficult. In approaching this problem I remind the House of the words of Father Raymond Decker, author of various articles on jurisprudence and the relation of religion and law, Assistant Dean at Loyola University School of Law, when he said:

> "In approaching the problem of abortion from a Catholic point of view, a fundamental distinction must be made at the outset. That distinction lies between, one, the norms of a personal conscience developed from deeply held Christian commitments; and, two, the norms that are to function for a society made up of a multiplicity of convictions developed from various religious and philosophical commitments."

These are two quite distinct realities, but it is my contention that a restrictive law will not necessarily adhere to the teachings of one particular church. I have always believed in the separation of church and state, and for some to argue otherwise is, for me, counterproductive.

If we are to be effective in reaching our objective, I suggest it is perhaps time that we have a restrictive law with reasonable exceptions, as opposed to a permissive law regarding abortions. I do not believe there are no circumstances whatsoever in which a person should be denied access to abortion, such as rape or incest. There are probably others, but frankly I cannot nor will I attempt to try to provide all those reasons or situations. I am not a medical doctor.

The significance of a restrictive law, as indicated to me by my own bishop, will over time be educational in value. Although persons holding a different view may argue that to use the law and its public force as a means of compelling others to agree with my view is not fair in this pluralistic society, I respond by saying that in the interest of balancing the right of a woman to liberty and security of her person and the responsibility of society to protect the unborn, it may in fact require a restrictive statute.

Even though a law on the books may merely be educational in value, even though it may be permissive in its substance or restrictive in its content, it is preferable to that of having no law at all. The legislation, however, must be consistent with the provisions of the Constitution and the Charter of Rights and Freedoms which reflect the fundamental value and inherent dignity in each human being and the inherent worth of human life, and which achieve the balance between the right of a woman to liberty and security of her person and the responsibility of society to protect the unborn. That part of the motion that we are debating clearly must be the objective of any new law. I am hopeful that the Supreme Court of Canada will address the issues clearly when the Borowski case is adjudicated later in the year.

I am hopeful that the legislators will be able to enact legislation which addresses both the rights of the woman to liberty and security of her person and the responsibility as a society to protect the unborn. May I remind you, Mr. Speaker, of what Edmund Burke said in the British House of Commons in 1775: "All government, indeed every human benefit and enjoyment, every virtue and every prudent act, is founded on compromise". I am not asking Members to change their views, but if they share the objective that there must be a balance, as indicated in the motion and as indicated by all speakers of all Parties, this must be the cornerstone of a new piece of legislation.

In addition to a restrictive law, I believe the state must also provide financial assistance and programs in order to educate and inform the Canadian population on why we should try to reduce the incidence of abortion. Remember, Sir, a person in the exercise of his or her conscience must have good, factual, and up-to-date information. Presumably those who desire to seek an alternative to abortion must also have similar information, as well as counselling. Therefore, the state should provide financial assistance for both pre- and post-natal care.

If we are to restrict abortions in this country, it logically follows that the state must also bear the responsibility, along with others in caring and providing the necessities of life. It is folly to think that the state will not provide financial assistance for housing, child care, nutritional food, as well as other necessities. In addition, the state should provide counselling and information to parents in order that they may discuss sexual attitudes and information with their children as frankly and fully as necessary. The state should also assist educators, who should be allowed to arrange for comprehensive programs appropriate to the developmental stages of the children such as family life, sex education, contraception information, personality development, relationships, and the development of their own values as responsible sexual partners. Why can the state not provide financial assistance to such institutions as the Family Services of Eastern Nova Scotia in order they many retain individuals to provide information and counselling?

The Badgley report on abortion law concluded that the current abortion rate can be reduced only through effective changes in contraceptive practices. A study of some 37 developed countries released in 1985, revealed that teenage pregnancy rates and abortion rates were lower in countries where there was greater availability of contraceptive services and sex education. Similar effects have been noted in Ontario. Teenage pregnancy, the birth and abortion rates are declining more rapidly in those countries where sex education and family planning services are well established.

Let me say that I share the view that it is important for Parliament to respond to the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in a substantive manner. However, in doing so, let us proceed with care in drafting a new abortion law. Let us also be reminded of our objective, namely, to prepare and introduce legislation consistent with the Constitution of Canada, including the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which reflects the fundamental value and inherent dignity of each human being and the inherent worth of human life, which achieves a balance, as indicated by so many, between the rights of a women to liberty and security of her person and the responsibility of society to protect the unborn.

Tomorrow I will not be here, but I wish to register my vote against the motion as introduced by the Government. I would have hoped, as I said at the outset, that instead of a motion we would be dealing with a piece of legislation. However, for whatever reasons, justified or not, we are dealing with a motion. I cannot support this particular motion.

Mr. Vince Dantzer (Okanagan North): Mr. Speaker, tonight, for the first time since I have been in this House of Commons, I am not particularly pleased to have the opportunity to speak on this resolution. The reason is that I intend to oppose this government motion. I am not one who finds any joy or comfort in opposing motions put forward by my own Party. However, the Government's resolution on abortion is essentially a resolution allowing abortion on demand and that is a position I cannot support. I would hope the majority of this House would not support this resolution.

Under the old rules it took three doctors to approve an abortion. Even then we had between 60,000 and 70,000 abortions a year in this country. If we were to require only one doctor to approve an abortion, there will be many more. This Government's resolution is more like the New Democratic Party policy position. As I understand it, tonight the official NDP policy was put forward, which is certainly one of abortion on demand.

It saddens me that my Party does not show greater moral leadership on this crucial issue. It angers me that my Party presents this motion as a compromise position on this difficult issue. Those who characterize this resolution as a "compromise" must think we are all fools. Certainly, if we support it, we would be knaves. We are discussing this matter today because, as we all know, the Supreme Court of Canada overturned Section 251 of the Criminal Code of Canada. That the Supreme Court of Canada ruled as it did was, I must admit, a surprise. Like many other Members of this House, particularly those Members of the Conservative Party who were here in 1982, I believed the Liberal Government of that day and Prime Minister Trudeau when we were assured that the Charter of Rights and Freedoms would have no affect whatsoever on Parliament's right to deal with abortion and with capital punishment. We were further assured by the notwithstanding clause which gave Parliament the right to override any Supreme Court judgment. As a result, many of us in this House, and on this side of the House in particular, voted for the Charter when all our instincts told us not to do so.

To have voted for the Charter of Rights is a vote I will regret all my life. We now find, of course, that the federal Government—at least this one—is not prepared to use the notwithstanding clause. We know now that the Supreme Court is prepared and, indeed, insists on dealing with abortion and on creating rights where none appear in the Charter. It is now apparent to me from reading the judgments of the majority, that the justices first came to the conclusion that Section 251 was bad and then, and only then, attempted to find reasons to support their beliefs. The reasoning they used, I suggest, is bad, the logic faulty, and the different judgments seem to have more to do with the judges own personal philosophy, be it political or otherwise, than with solid legal arguments. However that may be, we in Canada are now burdened with a Supreme Court that exercises political functions.

Certainly, no one can argue that the issue of whether it is lawful to kill an unborn child must involve political, philosophical and moral considerations as well as legal ones. We have a court that exercises political functions but does not have any political restraints or responsibilities. The court is appointed but not elected. It has no need to answer to anyone, let alone the voters of this country. What this means, of course, in my view, is that we are less of a democracy than we were before the Charter.

It is my view that Parliament should decide the great social and political questions of our time and of our society, not appointed judges.

Earlier I said I had been reluctant to vote for the Charter because I had seen the experience of the American system where its Supreme Court had become the final political arbitrator on moral issues. I was not impressed. What special training do judges have to decide moral issues? What right have judges to impose their moral or political values on Canadian society? In a shorter time we have come as far as the Americans. Our Supreme Court has usurped the legislative power of Parliament and now purports to enact social legislation. The only way they can be stopped is to use without hesitation and with much more frequency the notwithstanding legislation. It has been said that war is too important to be left to the management of generals. I suggest to the House that social policy containing important moral issues is too important to be left to lawyers and judges.

Social legislation belongs to Parliament. If we pass legislation on abortion and the rights of the unborn, and if later that legislation offends the sensibility of the justices of the Supreme Court, then this Government or any government should quickly and forcibly use the notwithstanding legislation to restore the power and responsibility of Parliament.

In my view the solution to the issue we debate today is simple, although the concept may be very complex. An unborn human being has an inherent right to life from the moment of conception. To extinguish the life of that unborn child is to violate and deprive him or her of that right. It is a wrongful act and therefore must be forbidden and made unlawful.

Should there be exceptions? I say only when there is a present, immediate and real danger to the life of the mother. Some, and perhaps many, object to that position. Some abortionists will say that the foetus is not a human being; it is not fully developed; it is only a potential human being; it only has the right to life after it is born. If those people argue that it is not a human being, they have the obligation to say what it is. They have an obligation to give it a meaningful name. Is it a vegetable, an animal, a mineral, or a piece of tissue? What precisely is it in the womb if it is not a human being?

But they cannot do so because the only name for an unborn child is what it is—an unborn human being, a human being with its genetic map in place from the moment of conception, a human being separate, distinct and uniquely different from every other human being, including its mother. It is dependent on her but separate and distinct from her. The best of science recognizes that the human foetus is a human being from conception.

Those who support and promote the so-called semester system for abortion believe, it seems, that an unborn child becomes more human as the months go by. They believe, it seems, that humanness depends on human development. It would make as much sense to suggest a person becomes less human if he or she loses both legs in an auto accident. Would society tolerate a law which allowed the random killing of anyone under 15 years of age but called for the death penalty if anyone over 15 were murdered?

The idea that an unborn child is not a human being results in very strange situations. In British Columbia we have legislation that provides fines up to $500 for the destruction of an egg of a bald-headed eagle. We accept that law. No one argues that the destruction of an egg is not really the destruction of an eagle. However, it does show the distortion of our values. We pay about $300 to kill an unborn child, but we fine anyone $500 if they destroy an unborn eagle.

In Quebec, as in the rest of Canada, women are paying up to $300 to destroy their unborn children. Yet the Government in that province also proposes to pay up to $2,000 for a person not to destroy their unborn child. Surely, we are a society with confused and mixed up values.

Another argument the abortionists use is the slogan espoused by the NDP. In fact, it has a motion before the House. That slogan is: "Abortion is a personal matter between a woman and her doctor". Let us examine the rationality of this slogan. A society exists and survives as a society by reproducing itself by the birth of children. A society would cease to exist if children do not replace those who die.

Consequently, it appears to me that society has a real interest in the number of children born into that society. To say otherwise is nonsense. The birth of a child is therefore not exclusively the interest of the mother; society is also involved in a very real way.

The Supreme Court recognized this. Chief Justice Dickson said: "Like Justices Beetz and Wilson, I agree that protection of the foetal interests by Parliament is also a valid government objective". Aside from the fact of what business the Supreme Court has in defining what are the Government's objectives, and I really do not know, it is a recognition that the Government has that power.

Yet another anomaly is the claim that whether or not an unborn child should be aborted is a matter for a woman and her doctor. Why her doctor? Surely, the question to kill unborn human beings is a philosophical and moral issue. I do not know of any group of people who are less qualified to decide a philosophical or moral issue than the medical profession. By training, by experience, by education, they are probably the least qualified group to decide philosophical questions. I suggest to the House that most medical people could not tell the difference between a philosophical precept and a wet paint sign.

However, I will admit that after a decision to kill or not to kill has been made, then and only then a doctor is competent to carry out that decision. If the decision has been to allow the unborn child to live, a doctor can best ensure this goal. If the decision has been made to kill the unborn child, a doctor will be adept at finding the most efficient method of killing the unborn child, but a doctor has no qualifications whatsoever to assist in making the original decision. To say that abortion involves only the mother and the doctor ignores the unborn child and society and the rights and interests of each—rather a large omission I would say.

It has also been argued that an aborted baby is better than an unwanted child. This is really an argument put forward by those who would use abortion as a method of birth control. There is no such thing as an unwanted child. Presently, in this country there are thousands of married couples eager to adopt children. They wait years and years for this opportunity. There are never enough babies for adoption. Yet our society allows between 60,000 and 70,000 unborn babies to be aborted each year.

We as a nation do not at this time reproduce ourselves. Yet we continue to abort between 60,000 and 70,000 unborn children each year.

There is another argument that is sometimes used to favour abortion, an argument which is to me most horrifying indeed. It is this: "All right, I will agree and admit that an unborn child is a human being, but when you have to choose between the rights and freedoms of a pregnant woman and the rights and freedoms of the unborn child, then the rights of the woman are paramount and more important than those of the unborn child". Some people are more equal than others—horrors of horrors. I actually heard that argument at a hospital board meeting in my constituency.

Today, as I stand in the House of Commons speaking against this philosophy, I cannot but think and say to myself: "How ironic, how very ironic". Some 40 years ago and more I and others in this House of Commons, and a great many fathers and mothers of Members of this place, went to war, the Second World War. Many gave their lives. Others gave their health. They did this to fight against Hitler's idea that some human beings were more equal than others; that some German Jews were less equal than some Germans; that some old people were less equal than some young people; and that some ill or handicapped people were less equal than some healthy people.

Are we then faced today with the same philosophy that some human beings are less equal than others? How ironic. We won that battle and we might lose the war. If the abortionists win this fight, it is my view that the philosophy espoused by Hitler and Nazi Germany in 1939 will prevail today in our times.

Members of this place face a very profound issue. Many are opposed to the use of abortion, particularly abortion on demand, and the use of abortion for birth control. These people will state that they are not in favour of abortion. However, we live in a pluralistic world, and I cannot impose that option on others who do not believe as I do. There is the argument that one cannot legislate morality. Well, perhaps that is true. However, legislators can show moral leadership. Legislation should reflect the highest standards of society, not the lowest. We legislate against theft, murder, and sexual crimes. These are areas in which we legislate on moral issues, and although we cannot legislate morality, and people continue to rob, steal, and rape, it is because we take stands on moral issues and legislate that there are undoubtedly fewer of these acts than there would be if there were no legislation.

It is a proven fact that each time the law is loosened or eased there are more abortions. One can speculate that if during Abe Lincoln's career the abolitionists had used the "pluralistic argument", since at that time many people firmly and sincerely believed in the practice of slavery, then there might still be slaves in the United States.

There is a time for strong leadership and that time is now. A society which is not prepared to defend the safety of its most innocent and defenceless members is a society embarked on its own destruction.

In the summer of 1982 a mother wrote about this type of society. She stated: "The United States and the West are sinking into a narcissistic, self-obsessed society preferring in the poet's words: 'Bondage with ease rather than strenuous liberty'. We consign our old and sick and needy to giant, faceless bureaucracies to ensure our own non-involvement while we indulge in drugs, sex, and electronic diversions. We want to gain access but be protected at all costs from failure. We want to be free but safe, licentious but sterile, married but uncommitted, parents without obligation. We want energy without producing it, money without earning it, freedom without maintaining it, and love without returning it."

I urge Members of the House to show moral leadership and vote to stop abortion on demand, and the use of abortion for birth control. We must vote to protect the life of the unborn child. We must then move to assist the pregnant mother to find other more acceptable solutions, assisting the single mother to keep her child if she wishes, provide adequate long-term support in such areas as housing, companionship, and education.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate today with a certain carefulness that I know other Members share. We in the House are well aware of the diverse views held by Canadians and other elected representatives on the subject of abortion. We know how deeply held those views are. We know that this issue challenges our intellectual resources and it touches our emotions perhaps more profoundly than any other issue. It is for this reason, the very nature of this debate, that many Members would have preferred to avoid the debate.

Yet, its seriousness and, yes, its divisiveness, requires that this debate must be held. It is for this purpose that we in this House are elected, to face difficult national issues and make decisions about them. It is to this sometimes uncomfortable reality that parliamentarians subject themselves. We must stand up and be counted on one side or another on issues about which public opinion is intensely divided.

At the beginning of my comments I wish to be on record as bearing no ill will against those whose views differ from my own. I know full well that personal experience, background, philosophy, and knowledge of one's experiences all shape an individual's final conclusion on the question of abortion. I know that very few, if any, celebrate abortion. Rather, views differ over its acceptability or over the grounds on which it is acceptable. I know also, if my views are to be listened to and considered, that I must be prepared to hear the arguments of others. Nonetheless, I hope the House will come to a firm conclusion to reject the motion before us and adopt an amendment that would support the principle of the sanctity of human life.

It has been suggested that this debate is about competing principles. One competition is between the right to the security of the person of the pregnant woman, and the right to life of the unborn child she carries. Another competition, I suggest, is between the principles of the sanctity of life and quality of life.

As Minister of National Health and Welfare I deal every day with issues of the quality of life. I have sworn to do all I can to improve the quality of life for all Canadians, and in other countries where it is possible for Canada to make a contribution as well. Standing up for the sanctity of human life is missing something essential where a concern for the quality of life is absent, but concern for the quality of life without insistence on the sanctity of life lacks any foundation that will withstand attack.

This debate concerns a fundamental question for our culture and our nation. Will we build our culture on a durable foundation, a foundation that has served humanity for centuries, or will we go into the future hoping to improve quality of life without the security of a bedrock principle that life itself is paramount?

The problem is this: Quality of life is a relative term which by itself cannot be determined too much by persons other than the one involved. Are poor people, disabled people, or dying people totally deprived of the quality of life, or only partially? Are they deprived of the quality of life compared to whom and by what standard? Do we not protect their rights on the grounds that no one else should determine the value of their lives or the quality of their lives? Is it not true that this country has embraced an enthusiastic tradition of human rights in order to protect each one of us from the arbitrary judgments of others? Is it not because, as the poet has said, "no person is an island", that we protect all our rights in order to protect my rights?

If we insist on the sanctity of life then we have somewhere to go as we try to improve the quality of life of people who are unwanted, or who struggle to cope, or who suffer. My great fear, and I do mean my fear, is that if we do not retain this principle of the sanctity of life, we will have no retreat, we will have no refuge when the goal of quality of life becomes arbitrary and abused.

How do we determine the quality of life? I have heard today, not in this debate, but people saying "viability". When is a person viable? Is a person who is suffering from cancer, without the care of our health care system, viable? Yet, we do everything to help that person through his or her last hours, because we base our whole health service on the sanctity of life.

I have heard the words "if a person is disabled". Surely, there should be a different criterion as to whether that potentially disabled person should have the right to live. Who is disabled? Is the person who is blind more disabled than I am, who might not have the intellectual capacity that that person might have? Does the person who is blind or deaf who can make music or be an artist, have less right to the sanctity of life than I do, who might have all my sensory faculties but not have the abilities of that person?

What concerns me about the debate—not in this House, because I think all Members of this House have tried very honestly to wrestle with this question—is that the words I hear in the public become part of the word usage, without looking behind what the words mean and what the words say about our society. Has it been in vain, for the person who is disabled and has worked all of his or her life to try to get legislation passed in the Parliament of Canada and in the legislatures of our provinces, so that there will be legislation protecting and respecting the disabled? Are the disabled not as acceptable before birth to society as those who will not be disabled?

When we speak about the quality of life, that is a very transitory, very arbitrary principle. That is why I believe law must be based on immutable principles which will not only protect society but which will be directional for society.

The Supreme Court has invited Parliament to balance the competing interests of the unborn child and the pregnant woman. I am pleased with the decision of January 28. A number of people in the pro-life movement said that it was a travesty. I personally do not feel that it was, and I will tell the House why. For all the years those of us who have worked so hard to have the rights of the unborn protected, we always had difficulty conveying to the public that there was another competing right, the right of the unborn. It is very intense at this time because we are now in debate on exactly those competing rights.

I think the debate—looking back to 1969, what was happening at that time when the Criminal Code was changed—has with it the essence of the rights of women and the rights of the unborn and how in our own human frailty as Members of the House we come to conclusions that protect both?

As I said, the Supreme Court has invited Parliament to balance the competing interests of the unborn child and the pregnant woman. I believe the motion before us fails to do that. If the primary right is to protection of life before quality of life, then that right must become effective when life begins. Otherwise, the right has not been guaranteed.

Members have been told that the motion is an effective compromise in that it balances those competing interests. It is not a balance; it is a decision not to extend protection of life to the unborn child.

Many people believe that it is outdated and naive to think that life begins at conception. Medical opinion, however, describes life as a continuum, there being no point at which any qualitative change in the foetus would in effect draw a line between no life and life.

George and Sheila Grant, in an essay called Abortion and Rights, and in a paper published on February 16, 1988 by Mr. Iain T. Benson, Chairman of the Civil Liberties Section of the B.C. Branch of the Canadian Bar Association, said, and I quote: "About the unborn child, its genetic individuality remains unchanged from the moment of conception through to death, whenever it occurs. All the changes after conception are of degree, not of kind. The foetus is the weakest stage of all of us at the beginning of the continuum of life. We get stronger and bigger for some period thereafter, but as unique individuals we are the same from conception onwards. To hold otherwise is bad science. The fact that criminal law has said that life begins, as far as murder is concerned, only after the child has proceeded in a living form outside the mother, does not mean that is unworthy of consideration prior to this point. This is precisely why the law has criminalized abortion, due to the realization that the foetus, prior to birth, is in need of protection."

Members may be interested in knowing that the World Health Organization has been quoted on both sides of the issue, but the WHO had no difficulty in defining what so many in our country say cannot be known, namely, "utmost respect for human life is to be from the moment of conception".

No one supporting the motion before the House should take comfort in the thought that it is supported by medical science, nor should anyone think that the motion is good law. We have to ask ourselves: What is the criteria of good law?

First, it must be acceptable in regard to its underlying principles. I have tried to explain that this motion is arbitrary in that it affords protection of life to the unborn, only after an unspecified period of time. This may be convenient for medical practitioners, but it is not sound science. Because there is no scientific basis for drawing a line, there can be no sound legal or ethical basis for drawing a line. If a line is drawn to indicate when life should be protected, it is an arbitrary line. Good law is not arbitrary.

Second, good law should accomplish its objective. The Supreme Court maintained that it is "a legitimate goal for Parliament to seek to protect the foetus". That goal must be balanced with the goal of protecting the security of the person of the pregnant woman. The objective of this law must be to balance these rights at all times. The only way, it seems to me, to balance competing rights is to determine acceptable grounds for the interest of one party taking precedence over the interest of the other party.

The amendment to the motion does what the motion fails to do, namely, establish consistent grounds on which an abortion can be performed. The breadth and generality of the grounds proposed for the first stage of pregnancy make a mockery of the principle of protecting unborn life.

Third, good law must be enforceable law. It is a difficult matter, especially with our history on Section 251 of the Criminal Code, because to make an abortion law work the opinions of physicians must be sought before the procedure can be performed. That requires some specification of the grounds for abortion in the law. Again, the amendment does that. It defines health in a way that preserves the right to security of the person of the pregnant woman. At the same time, it establishes the degree of seriousness required before an abortion can be performed.

The question of abortion is about more than law. It relates to the support we give our young people at home, at school, in our churches, and elsewhere in understanding their sexuality and in handling it in a mature way. It relates to the support we give to pregnant women as a society and as individuals and communities. Abortion is an issue that challenges men to be responsible to their partners and to the children they have fathered. In this debate we must stress that point. It is not only, and I say this not with any prejudice or criticism, a woman's issue. Men have been involved and men should remain involved and take the responsibility for their actions. It is for those reasons that in the last four years I have been able, with the help of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), my colleagues, and other Members of this House, to bring forward programs on child sexual abuse and family violence. Yes, we are using the computers in the Government of Canada to go after those who fathered children and who are not making support payments. I appreciate those programs are not as perfect as any of us in this House would like them to be, but they are a step in the right direction.

This debate has to be more than simply the burden of child bearing on women. I would think there is a commonality, at least on this point, between the two opposing points of view in this House. I hope we can resolve between us as human beings that although we might disagree on the fundamental issues of the debate we agree on this issue. For too long, and I say this with regret to those with whom I have associated over these years, those who have called themselves pro-life, that too often there has been criticism and not enough help. Too often there has been judgment and not enough compassion. Too often there has been a lack of understanding and not enough care. We have an opportunity, through this debate and onward, to take some of those hard questions that I believe are human questions and at least find common ground among all of us on them.

Yet, uncomfortably for us as Members of this House, I repeat that abortion is also a question of law. What we do in this debate and with this motion will say a great deal about the value we place on life itself. That in turn will have a profound effect on how we cope in the future with medical technologies and ethical issues that a few years ago were unthinkable. I have heard the comments of my colleagues in the debate with respect to reproductive technology. I want to say to them tonight that what they have said finds much favour, at least with this Minister. When we have resolved this primary question of abortion law, we must move on, without stopping, at every level, personal, families, groups, churches, local communities, cultural, and national, to prevent unwanted pregnancies and to support women, young people, and families who face difficult choices.

Today, Mr. Speaker, I plead with my colleagues in this House to determine to reinforce, first, principles that life itself is paramount because it is a precious gift to humanity. Only as we go so far as to protect the right of the most defenceless of us will we have the assurance that there exists a strong foundation to protect the rights of all of us, including the unborn, the youngest of us, and will this House have fulfilled its duty.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise to participate in this debate on one of the most important issues to come before this Parliament. I have studied with care both the legal and the moral philosophical implications of the motion before the House. I have particularly listened with care not only to my colleagues, our very eloquent spokesperson on the status of women, the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Ms. Dewar), and the Hon. Member for Vancouver East (Ms. Mitchell), but I have listened as well with care to those who have either supported this motion or those who have proposed amendments to it which would severely restrict the scope of legal abortion in Canada.

I have a particular personal interest in this question, having tabled in the House over the last nine years three different Private Members' Bills which would have the effect of repealing Section 251 of the Criminal Code and allowing this decision on the question of abortion to be made by a woman in consultation with her doctor. It is for that reason especially that I am very pleased with my colleague from Hamilton Mountain who has proposed an amendment speaking on behalf of the New Democratic Party and caucus in this House which states:

> "We believe that law and government policy should respect the principle that the decision whether or not to terminate a pregnancy should be that of the woman involved in consultation with a qualified medical practitioner, and that the procedure should be performed by a qualified medical practitioner; and further should ensure that the Canada Health Act and regulations are amended to ensure equality of access throughout Canada."

I am also interested in this question having during the last election been attacked vigorously by a group which claims to respect life. This group circulated thousands of leaflets throughout my constituency of Burnaby which I personally found deeply offensive and hurtful, a leaflet which says on the cover "Hey, Svend, pick on someone your own size". It has a photograph of a foetus on the cover and inside it states: "Protect all of our children, born and unborn. Defeat Svend Robinson, NDP".

As well, Joe Borowski who currently is before the Supreme Court of Canada, the highest court in the land, marched outside my office with his supporters and accused me of supporting murder.

I want to say that those kinds of attacks, whether they be through a leaflet with a photograph on it or whether they be marching outside one's office, are hurtful and deny the profound respect which not only I but my colleagues have for human life.

• (2000)

I think it is important to take a moment in this debate to examine how it is that we have arrived at this point in the House of Commons and what it is in clear terms that the Government is proposing in its motion. It was some 20 years ago that Parliament adopted legislation which permitted, in certain restrictive circumstances, therapeutic abortions and which allowed birth control devices to be advertised and sold in Canada. That occurred only 20 years ago.

Parliament at that time was made up of 263 men and one woman. That woman was Grace MacInnis, the former Member of Parliament for Vancouver—Kingsway, who argued then as we argue today. She argued with vigour, with force and with eloquence that the law must respect the fundamental decisions of women on this question, made in consultation with a qualified medical practitioner.

Today, some 20 years later, I look around this House and, as my colleague for Vancouver East has pointed out, I see that it does not reflect the mosaic that is Canada. We have not heard in the House of the pain of the single woman who is facing an agonizing decision whether or not to have an abortion, after she had been told, following amniocentesis at 17 weeks, that the child she would bear would be anencephalic, would have no brain, and would die. We have not heard from that woman.

Let us be clear. The motion that is before the House states that that woman, facing that desperate decision, and the doctor who would respond to her despair, to her cry for help, would both be criminals and would be subject to imprisonment, should they make the decision to abort in those circumstances. That is the effect of this motion. I say that that is profoundly unjust and immoral.

We do not hear in this House from the 13-year-old, the teenager who did not even know how to prevent an unwanted pregnancy because no one had ever told her. Her parents would not talk about it and there was no sex education in her school. She has become pregnant and she is afraid and she feels alone. She does not feel that she is ready to be a mother.

Are we in this House prepared to tell that young teenager that if in fact she has an abortion, she is a criminal, and that the doctor who performs that abortion is a criminal as well, and that they should go to jail? I am not prepared to say that, and I believe it would be profoundly wrong for this Parliament to adopt a motion or a law which would brand as criminal women in those circumstances or the doctors who in those circumstances assist them.

Grace MacInnis spoke for choice. Stuart Leggatt, who succeeded her in the House of Commons as the spokesperson on Justice for my Party, spoke out strongly for choice. In doing so, they and I pointed to the obvious weaknesses of Section 251 of the Criminal Code before it was struck down. We pointed to the divisive and draining battles for control of hospital boards which occurred over this issue when the boards should have been concerned about a range of health care questions. We pointed to the fact that lengthy delays resulted in more complications and the fact that less than even 25 per cent of hospitals had therapeutic abortion committees and even fewer actually performed abortions.

The highest court of the land heard a challenge by Dr. Henry Morgentaler, and I for one want to pay tribute to Dr. Henry Morgentaler for the courage he has shown on this question. Following that challenge, the Supreme Court Justices said that this law denies women security of the person.

Chief Justice Brian Dickson said, for example: "Forcing a woman, by threat of criminal sanction, to carry a foetus to term unless she meets certain criteria unrelated to her own priorities and aspirations is a profound interference with a woman's body and thus a violation of security of the person."

Madam Justice Bertha Wilson said in her judgement: "The decision whether or not to terminate a pregnancy is essentially a moral decision and in a free and democratic society, the conscience of the individual must be paramount to that of the state."

[English]

So the Supreme Court struck down that law. Hon. Members will recall that immediately afterward, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn) and other Conservative Ministers stated that it was necessary to move immediately to bring forward new legislation to fill what they said was a legal void. They predicted chaos in Canada. Six months later, their predictions have been proven wrong. I believe that the case has not been made for the recriminalization of abortion.

Canadian women have fought for 20 years for the repeal of Section 251. For us to move back to an era in which this question was one of criminal law rather than of health would, in my view, be to take a giant step backward.

What is it that the Government is proposing in the motion before the House? I believe that the motion before the House represents a fundamental abdication of responsibility by the Government. The motion states that in the opinion of the House, certain actions should be taken. This is political expediency of the worst sort.

If the Government believes that legislation is in fact necessary, why is it that it has not brought forward such legislation? Why is it that it brought forward a motion to test the House, knowing full well that this House will not in fact be making the decision on legislation? What kind of flimflammery, what kind of hypocrisy is that? The Government knows that the speeches made in the House and the votes taken on this motion will make no difference whatsoever because ultimately, it will not be this House that decides this question.

As well, in early October, the Supreme Court of Canada will be hearing an appeal on the Borowski question from the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal. I suggest that if the Government were serious about drafting legislation, it would await the outcome of that appeal, if indeed it believes legislation is necessary, which I do not. So this is an abdication of responsibility.

However, I want to suggest there is a more fundamental question here, which is this. Those who have spoken out in support of an amendment that would restrict access to abortion for Canadian women must surely recognize that such an amendment flies squarely in the face of the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada. In short, it is unconstitutional.

Mr. Stevens: That is not right.

Mr. Robinson: The Hon. Member for York—Peel (Mr. Stevens) said in this House: "No problem; what the Government should do is override the Charter of Rights". What kind of contempt does that display for the women of Canada and the Charter of Rights? The courts have said that the law violates the security of a woman's person and violates freedom of conscience. Well, to hell with the Charter, they say. Ignore it. Override it. We do not like the decision. I say: what kind of position is that to take on a question of fundamental rights? The Minister of Justice has, fortunately, rejected that, but we do not know who will be the Minister of Justice in a future government.

I want to make a prediction, and it is this. Those who support this amendment to deny choice, when their amendment is rejected by this House, as it surely must be, those same Members will abandon their principles and do what? They will stand in their place and vote for the government motion. We heard the Hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm) suggesting that yesterday.

I do not believe there is a need for legislation. Certainly I support the call for a royal commission on reproductive technology to examine a whole range of issues such as the question of gender selection, experimental use of foetal tissue, and other questions. However, the suggestion that we need a law to deal with this question from a criminal perspective ultimately betrays, in my view, a lack of trust and lack of respect in and for the women of this country. The suggestion that Canadian women or their doctors are in some way going to abuse this absence of legislation is refuted by the facts.

Then there is the suggestion of third trimester abortions. Some 99.7 per cent of all abortions in Canada were performed before 20 weeks. Canadian women are not irresponsible. They do not have to be told by a criminal law that this is a decision which is taken only with the most careful thought and is not taken irresponsibly. Indeed, in the province of Quebec, where the law has not been in force for some time, that has not been the case.

I suggest that rather than moving to recriminalize we should be taking steps to prevent unwanted pregnancies and make contraception more easily available. We should ensure that young people are provided with a better teacher than experience. We should increase the involvement of men, making them more responsible. We should look at new birth control methods and make this country friendlier to children. We should deal with child poverty and the desperate need for a comprehensive child care system, and ensure that we respect children and women in this land.

I want to close by quoting from a document.

[Translation]

In a Quebec Catholic monthly published by the Oblates of Mary Immaculate, a religious order, we read: "If we want to minimize the number of abortions, we are convinced that we must put in place the social conditions required for women to have a real choice about motherhood. Such measures however run counter to all governments' neo-conservative policies. Respecting an individual's freedom of choice on abortion does not imply that one would necessarily have an abortion oneself or that one accepts it in principle. It means refusing to impose one's own certainties and moral codes on others. It means accepting and supporting human beings in their complexity and their freedom."

[English]

I support that principle. I am opposed to the motion. Let us recognize the right of Canadian women to make this decision for themselves. Let us truly respect life in this country.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak in this very important debate tonight. Back in 1984, when I was in the process of deciding to run for election as the Member of Parliament for Sarnia—Lambton, I realized the subject of abortion loomed ahead as an issue, as it had been in so many other election campaigns. I believe that I owed my constituents a thoughtful and considered position. It was important that I seek out thoughtful input.

I had never been faced with this issue in my personal life. I have four children, and apart from the usual discomforts of pregnancy my wife had not suffered during them. I have never had to deal personally with the situation of young children at home and the possibility of losing my wife and my children their mother through the continuation of another pregnancy. However, I received important input from people who had experienced some of these things.

In 1984, then, I strongly believed, as I still do, that the health of the woman must be guaranteed and protected during pregnancy. In 1984 the concerns surrounding abortion focused on the definition of the health of the woman and on the existence of abortion clinics. At that time I looked into the existing legislation and after my review I felt that it afforded sufficient protection to the woman while at the same time providing protection for the foetus.

Last January the Supreme Court of Canada struck down that law. The Supreme Court justices were in no way determining that the woman had an unconditional right to abortion under the Charter. Rather, they held that Section 251 of the Criminal Code contravened a pregnant woman's rights under Section 7 of the Charter contrary to the principles of fundamental justice. The focus of the decision, as I understand it, was the determination that the therapeutic abortion committees gave rise to a situation which caused lengthy delays and in some cases precluded abortions entirely because the committees did not exist in all areas of our country.

As a result, access to therapeutic abortions was uneven and inequitable. The entire court agreed that, at some point in the pregnancy, the state interest in protecting the foetus through the criminalization of abortion could be important enough to override the Section 7 rights of the woman. However, the majority decisions were emphatic that the objective of protecting the foetus would not justify the complete removal of provisions protecting the pregnant woman from prosecution. The Justices warned that legislation which carried no exemption for the pregnant woman would be ruled invalid and that the entire process, from qualification decision to abortion, would have to be swift and widely available.

Since the Supreme Court decision I have done considerable in-depth study and analysis of this issue. I have discovered that the subject is far more complex and complicated than my original findings in 1984. The issue no longer involves just the health of the woman and whether or not abortion clinics can operate. We must now concern ourselves with the constitutional rights of the woman and the constitutional rights of the foetus. We must examine issues such as swift and widely available access to abortion as well as examining the issue of foetus viability and striving to find a balance between the rights of the woman and the rights of the foetus.

It has often been said that there is no consensus in this country on abortion. I have read hundreds and hundreds of letters from the people of my riding of Sarnia—Lambton. I have asked advice and opinions from doctors and lawyers. I have spoken to young men, young women, teenagers, new mothers, grandmothers, and anyone else who would speak to me about their feelings on abortion.

I have talked to my family. I have one son, three daughters and a wife and we have had many discussions around the table. I was at a women's curling banquet last winter and sat at a table with 20 women. I asked them their opinions.

I believe that there is indeed a consensus on this subject. It has been my experience that the majority of persons living in my constituency believe that abortion must be available under certain circumstances and at a certain stage in pregnancy. It is in defining and delineating these circumstances and stages that Canadians look to Parliament for guidance and direction.

However, the Government cannot operate in a vacuum. The amendments, suggestions, and input brought forward and discussed during this debate will provide the Government with a sense of the approach Canadians want to see in formulating abortion legislation. I believe that this is a good thing.

The Opposition has continually criticized the Government for the vague wording of its motion. Yet, once again, we have evidence of just how easy it is to criticize and make headlines in the press without coming forward with alternatives. I realize that the deadline for filing amendments to the motion with the Clerk was 6 p.m. tonight.

It is interesting to note that the seven amendments filed yesterday and printed in today's Order Paper were all moved by government Members. These government Members did not throw up their hands and say that the Government is abdicating its responsibility. Government Members recognized that the government was inviting our participation and input, and we responded by giving the Government our proposed amendments.

I am happy with this procedure. Under this procedure I or any Member of Parliament can offer amendments to the main motion and give direction on formulating new regulations and new legislation on this very important issue. I filed an amendment to the motion with the Clerk. I would like to take the time I have left to discuss my stand on this most important issue.

There is a great deal of moral and emotional concern surrounding the subject of abortion. Certainly, I cannot condone or advocate abortion on demand. To my mind, unfettered and totally free access to abortion can be justifiably criticized on moral and emotional grounds. Yet, a total prohibition on abortion is also subject, I believe, to the same charge. The government motion and my amendment deal with abortion with strict medical procedures; abortion, not as a method of birth control, and not as a matter of convenience, but abortion in cases where the life or health of the mother could be jeopardized by the pregnancy.

I agree with the majority of my constituents and, I believe, the majority of Canadians, that abortion is necessary under certain circumstances. I have always believed, and continue to believe, that the life and health, both physical and mental, of the woman must be given priority.

I am a Member of Parliament. My background is in business, marketing, and farming. I am not competent to make medical judgments. I do not believe that I, as a member of the federal Government, have the right to make judgments like that. I do believe, however, that I do have a right, an obligation, and indeed a duty, as a Member of Parliament, to provide guidelines and discipline to the people of Canada and the medical profession to assist them in their decision-making process.

I believe that my position on abortion, as reflected in my amendment, strikes a perfect balance between the competing interests in this issue. In my opinion the termination of a pregnancy must be allowed only in cases where the life and health of the woman is jeopardized. Health must, most definitely, include mental health. I believe that in the first trimester of pregnancy abortions must be less restricted than in subsequent stages. My amendment would substitute "earlier stages" of pregnancy with "first trimester" of pregnancy. That would make the legislation more explicit.

I have too much regard and respect for women to think that an abortion is a choice they enter into lightly or frivolously. This is undeniably one of the most difficult decisions a woman will ever have to make. Canadian women facing the surgical trauma and emotional upheaval of abortion are owed the same quality of medical care that all Canadians have come to expect.

In considering the rights of women we must also not take lightly the rights of the foetus. A balance is essential, and for this reason my amendment proposes more restricted access to abortion after the first trimester of pregnancy than does the government motion. My belief is that only under extraordinary circumstances should the termination of a pregnancy be allowed in the final stages of pregnancy, and only in situations where there is no other medical solution to the health condition.

The second part of my amendment reads: "termination of the pregnancy would only be permitted where two qualified medical practitioners have, in good faith and on reasonable grounds, stated that in their opinion the continuation of the pregnancy would, or would be likely to, endanger the life of the pregnant woman or seriously and substantially endanger her health and there is no other commonly accepted medical procedure for effectively treating the health risk; and when the termination is performed by a qualified medical practitioner."

I want to close by pointing out that abortions will continue and will always be a fact of life. I doubt there are any among us here today who would wish to see a return to the days of backroom abortions in unclean and unsanitary conditions, nor are any of us interested in seeing a time when abortions are performed solely for the convenience of the woman.

A balance of rights must be struck, a balance between the rights of the woman and the rights of the foetus. We must work together to find this balance because no matter how you look at it, the reality of the situation is that there is no legislation in the world which can effectively or capably protect a foetus without the co-operation of the woman.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the debate so far has been a sequence of very interesting speeches and personal reflections, quotations even from philosophers and some thorough soul-searching on the part of those who have preceded me.

In most cases, Members have taken a position of pro-life or pro-choice, some have rejected the motion and some have taken no position yet. I found every speech remarkable, but I must say that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) missed a golden opportunity to give Canadians an insight of what he would do and should be doing in his capacity in formulating and developing programs and services aimed at the prevention of abortion. That was a great disappointment.

What brings me to this debate is the belief that in essence, we are dealing with a social and moral issue on which, instead of a polarization, we have to stake out the common ground, the middle ground for the good of Canadians. It seems to me that Member after Member has said explicitly and implicitly that no one is for abortion and no one wants abortion if it can be prevented. That is the large middle ground on which all of us, even those holding extreme views, can take a stand and begin to build.

The question now is: How do we proceed from here, from a society which reacts to abortion to a society which prevents abortion? We seem to have ideological problems. Some tend to see the interest of the mother and foetus as separate rather than one. For instance, the pro-lifers speak of the sanctity of the life of the foetus, but when it comes to a matter of life or death their concept of sanctity switches to the mother, as several Members indicated last night.

The pro-choicers instead speak of control of destiny and body on the part of the expectant mother who should, in their view, control the destiny of the foetus as well. The pro-lifer, then, does not want abortion but accepts abortion in case of danger to the mother's life. The pro-choicer also seems not to want abortion but wants to give priority to keeping the options open for the expectant woman.

Both groups, it seems to me, would have much more in common than they do now if, in their approach, they would focus on the mother and foetus as belonging to the same unit, so to speak, one dependent on the other.

If this observation is accurate, I submit that we are debating the wrong motion. Rather than a motion about whether and under what condition abortion should be allowed, it should be a motion on the measures we need in Canada to prevent most abortions. With adequate social measures, we would perhaps not eliminate abortions entirely but we would go a long way in reducing their numbers considerably.

What are some of the social measures and programs we need to prevent abortion so it be brought to the level at which it should be in a modern and civilized society such as ours?

I want to refer to the suggestions in the British Columbia Teachers Status of Women Journal of June, 1988. They are quite relevant in our search for answers. First, they suggest that contraception be more easily available. The shocking fact is that 46 per cent of Canadians believe that they do not have access to contraception and family planning services. For many others, they are prohibitively expensive.

The second suggestion is to provide young people with a better teacher than experience. It has been found that a shocking number of teenagers know nothing at all about how reproduction works, how their own bodies work, and how to prevent pregnancy. Their teacher is trial and error, plus television, movies and misinformation from peers.

The third suggestion is to increase the involvement of men. No woman ever made herself pregnant. Men should be helped to recognize their equal responsibility in all aspects of sexuality: Decision-making, obtaining and using contraception, and the handling of any crisis when it occurs.

Fourth, they suggest the development of support services. This is where the Minister of National Health and Welfare could have spoken strongly. Social services and economic assistance should be available for those who are prepared to go through with an unexpected pregnancy.

Poverty has been found to be one of the strongest encouragements for abortion. Therefore, we must make housing, day care, employment and counselling in general available and accessible, as many other Members who spoke before me have stressed.

These four recommendations advanced by the British Columbia Teachers Status of Women Journal in June of this year are aimed at preventing abortions and going to the root of the problem. The British Columbia Teachers' Federation stresses another point very strongly. It is that outlawing abortion would simply drive women underground to seek illegal abortions. Outlawing would not prevent abortions, but rather would put at risk the health of the women unnecessarily.

It seems to me that the polarization of the debate on abortion in the House and, to some extent in the country, should be a matter of serious concern to all parliamentarians and citizens at large.

I submit that we should resist stressing what divides but stress what brings us together in tackling a social issue of such importance.

Politically and socially we must, from now on, work hard at identifying viable solutions. In that search, most of us would be more comfortable if a majority of Members in the House were to consist of women and, outside the House, if the institutions and organizations making statements on abortions were to consist of a majority of women as well.

Finally, in our approach we must establish the grounds for abortion openly, frankly, refraining from hyprocrisy. Many tough questions need to be answered which this motion does not even touch upon. For instance, should a woman have an abortion if the foetus is affected by a disease such as brain cancer? Does society have the right to impose a pregnancy on that woman? Does society have the right to impose a pregnancy on a woman who has been raped? Does society have a right to impose a pregnancy on a teenager who has been the victim of incest? At what point do we draw a line between the rights of the foetus and the rights of the pregnant woman? This is what Madam Justice Bertha Wilson asked Parliament to do. This is what this motion does not address.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, would we not be better off if, in developing a policy, we were to see the pregnant woman and the foetus as one unit, developing in harmony, supported by society? At the same time, if we are honest, we have to face also the painful reality that from time to time, and particularly so in the absence of social support programs, abortion exists in certain circumstances, unless we prefer to hide our collective heads in the sand. The motion before us today is vague, incomplete and lacks social purpose. Instead of producing a Bill accompanied by a strong statement of social measures and programs by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, aimed at preventing abortion not just regulating it, the Government, unfortunately, chose to conduct a poll in the House of Commons.

The motion also lacks precision. It is different in its English and French text at a crucial point. In the French a woman should consult a doctor before making a decision. In the English text, a woman should make a decision in consultation with her doctor. There is quite a difference between the two.

In conclusion, I would say that to drive abortion underground, to drive abortion abroad, to make it a remedy for the well-to-do, is not the way for Canada to go. Canadians deserve better, and I am sure you agree, Mr. Speaker. I hope that after the next election, because we are running short now of days and weeks, we will see presented in this Parliament legislation that will be accompanied by a social policy that will be strong on prevention, inspired by compassion and clear on the realities the men and woman of Canada face from time to time.

In essence, I believe that Canadians want the reassurance on a moral plane that no one really wants abortion if it can be avoided, second, a practical and compassionate set of solutions when it cannot be avoided, third, a substantial emphasis on prevention and, fourth, equal access once a policy on abortion is agreed upon. Unfortunately, the Government has not come forward with ideas. It has not come forward with a Bill. The Government seems incapable of giving leadership on such a difficult yet important issue. I suspect that tonight Canadians are rather disappointed.

Mr. Paul Gagnon (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to add my comments to this debate. I have listened very closely to the articulate and eloquent statements and arguments both from those opposing abortion and from those who are in favour of abortion.

In June, 1987, two of the most contentious moral issues of our day were debated in this House of Commons. We debated capital punishment and abortion. Both debates were vigorous and both of them centered on the sanctity of life. If one considers those two separate issues and takes them together, a person can develop four separate positions. The first position is that a person could say, yes, for capital punishment and, yes, for abortion. The second position could be, no, for capital punishment and, no, for abortion. The third position could be, yes, for capital punishment and, no, for abortion. The fourth position could be, no, for capital punishment and, yes, for abortion.

If one considers those four positions, and takes them in sequence, the first position, yes, for capital punishment and, yes, for abortion, the message is very clear. Life is not particularly sacred and not particularly precious. That message is logical and consistent. The second option would be, no, for capital punishment and, no, for abortion. The message there is life is precious. That is logical and consistent. The third option, yes, for capital punishment—the Clifford Olsons of this world do not deserve to be kept alive—and, no, for abortion. The message there is that life is so precious, those who have abused their rights should forfeit their own. That is logical and consistent.

The fourth and last category, no, for capital punishment and, yes, for abortion has its own message, and the only message I can understand is, kill the babies and save the killers. That is illogical and inconsistent. Yet last June of 1987, 65 Members of Parliament voted that way. I would accuse them of intellectual halitosis. They cannot have it both ways. Either they are for life or they are against life.

Abortion

The Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell (Mr. Boudria) rethought his position on abortion and stood in this House and renounced his previous position. I call upon the other 64 Members to rethink their positions, to be logical, and to vote for life.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I recognize the Hon. Member for Eglinton—Lawrence (Mr. de Corneille), I would like to recognize the Hon. Member for Nipissing (Mr. Mantha) who has a very short speech.

Mr. Moe Mantha (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I just want to take a few moments to state my position on this important matter of abortion. I hold a pro-life view on this issue. I believe that life begins at conception. Some people say this is a woman's issue, but I believe it is a family issue, one that concerns you and me, Mr. Speaker.

• (2050)

I have four children. We adopted two girls some 18 years ago.

I was elected by the people of Nipissing to take a stand on difficult issues. That, Mr. Speaker, is what I am doing in the House today, and what I have done in my riding in the past months.

I have received thousands of letters from my constituents, young and old, male and female. They all say the same thing—abortion is wrong, and we must protect the life of the unborn from the moment of conception.

In closing, I would like to read a letter I received from a little girl in my riding.

> Dear Mr. Mantha:
> I would like to tell you how I feel about abortion. I thank my natural mother that she loved me enough not to abort me. Instead she put me up for adoption. Now I live with a family that loves me and cares for me. Mr. Mantha, abortion is wrong. Please protect the unborn children in Canada!

Just to reiterate, I would like to thank the people of Nipissing who respect the stand that I have taken on this important matter. Also, I would like to thank the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) for allowing us to vote according to our conscience on this difficult issue.

Mr. Roland de Corneille (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, in our efforts to draft legislation on abortion we must, first, take into consideration the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada which struck down Section 251 of the Criminal Code on the basis of Section 7 of the Charter of Rights, to wit, a woman's right to liberty and security of person. Any legislation, no matter how well thought out and carefully worded which does not acknowledge or deal with the Supreme Court's decision vis-à-vis the rights of the pregnant woman is a waste of time as it will only be struck down again with the same or a similar rationale.

Some groups favour having no abortion legislation at all since any legal limitations as to time, circumstances or conditions may be construed as victimizing the woman and downgrading her position in society. That is one point of view. Other groups feel that unlimited access to abortion victimizes the unborn who, they maintain, as potential human beings have an unalterable right to life.

So the debate rages on between those whose views, no matter how well intentioned, would predispose them to draft laws in which either mothers or their unborn children would be victimized. The debate, couched in terms of a woman's right over her own body as opposed to the foetus's right to life, sets up a polarity presupposing that there has to be a victim. Unless the two poles can be, somehow, balanced, no viable legislation is possible. One-sided positions, whether they mirror indifference to the plight of women while trying to save the unborn, or indifference to the cry of the unborn while trying to raise up the status of women, are tragic because they do not even start to address the complexity of human needs which the abortion issue should be making terrifyingly clear.

The Supreme Court decision concentrated on the rights and status of women, at the same time clearly inviting us here in the House of Commons as legislators to consider the rights and status of their unborn children. Since its decision precludes victimization of the mother, and its invitation implies a reverence for the life potential of the unborn, any legislation embodying a polarity of concern wherein either mother or unborn child have to become victims is most undesirable.

Rather than prolong a no-win confrontation between pro-life and pro-choice let us, as legislators, address the issue from another angle, that of reverence for life. Reverence for life implies a reverence for the miracle of reproduction. It embodies an attitude of deep concern that each individual life be able to continue and fulfil its potential, not merely after conception but after birth as well. Lives dominated by poverty, despair and physical abuse signify not reverence for life but indifference and disdain on the part of the society which allows such situations to exist.

In its report to the National Executive Council of the Anglican Church of Canada the Task Force on Abortion gives the following statistics:

> According to the National Council of Welfare, though in the past two decades the over-all poverty rate in Canada has dropped from 23 per cent to 14.9 per cent, 56 per cent of single parent families headed by women are poor.

The resort to abortion for social and economic reasons, usually identified as the overwhelming reason for abortions in Canada today, is a judgment upon society and calls for prompt government action.

No child is born into a vacuum. Rather, every child from conception is readied for life in a complex network of family and community relationships. But many Canadian women today feel that they must resort to abortion as the only way of coping with a society which has no place for pregnant women or their children. Women feel that they must restructure themselves by emptying their wombs, whereas it is really society that must be restructured.

The report of the Task Force on Abortion went on to state: "When women choose to abort it is frequently in coercive, lonely and grief-stricken circumstances in which they feel completely unable to bear their child. Often, the biggest problem facing the woman is her lack of a real social and economic support system. Many women who choose not to bear their child make their decision out of alienation and hopelessness. For us, such despair cannot be left as the motive force. True choice must involve alternatives to despair".

The report went on to state further: "When thinking about abortion, it is important for us to reflect on what it means to be a woman in our society. In the fact of some ugly realities, women have many real needs and legitimate aspirations. Women need to have control over their own lives. They do not want to conceive a child through rape, whether inside or outside of marriage; nor do they want to be victims of coercive sex. They do not want their bodies used as objects of sexual violence through hard-core pornography. They do not want to be battered. They do not want to be dispossessed. The choice to bear children should not result in marginalization and poverty".

The task force report went on to state: "They do want the fathers of their children to nurture them; and when relationships end, they want the fathers of their children to pay support and not abdicate the emotional and economic responsibilities of fatherhood, condemning their estranged wives and families to a life of poverty, marginalized from the mainstream of society, without adequate child care services or retraining programs to enable them to enter the workforce or continue their education".

That, according to the report of the Task Force on Abortion is what women want. What do the unborn want? I suggest that, surely, they want the very same.

I must observe, then, that the resolution before the House and therefore the amendments thereto do not deal with and in fact ignore the issues raised by the Supreme Court to establish whether the foetus is a person and/or at what point the foetus enjoys human life. Nor does this legislation deal with abortion in its context.

The resolution deals with how to limit the mother or limit the unborn, perhaps pitting one against the other, but does not acknowledge or deal with such crucial matters as birth control, counselling, social services, violence, battering, child care, housing or conditions of remorseless poverty.

This resolution by itself is no solution because its effects are unequal. It punishes the poor and thus stalls off the necessity for Parliament to deal with the root causes of the real issues. Ultimately, it will not succeed in preventing or limiting abortions.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, attempting to balance fairly the interests of mothers and those of unborn children approximately 4,000 days before the end of the 20th century is probably the most difficult, divisive issue imaginable for legislators.

The recent decision of a majority of the Supreme Court of Canada in the Morgentaler case to invalidate Section 251 of the Criminal Code, the therapeutic abortion section under which approximately one million abortions have been conducted since 1969 in our country, means that it is currently legal under federal law to do an abortion at any time for any reason whatsoever. At present there is no legal protection from this Parliament for unborn children from conception until their emergence as live births from their mothers. Fortunately, members of the highest court have indicated that it is the responsibility of Parliament to provide a new law for the control of abortion, providing that such complies with the Charter of Rights.

The intense national debate over abortion, to legislate or not, and if so how, is deeply felt on both sides of the issue and on all sides of the House. Many women strongly believe that if their ability to end a pregnancy is restricted it will thwart their personal goals and dreams. They especially resent the participation of men whether as legislators or as decision-makers in any abortion approval process because they know it is their sex which is most directly affected by pregnancy, abortion, and child rearing.

On the other side of the debate are those of us who believe a foetus is a human being whether at conception or at any other point before it becomes viable outside its mother's body. An abortion without a very good reason is wrong to those of us who feel that way, because all religions and all philosophies of life that I respect recognize and assert the sacredness of human life.

My own view of the matter is coloured in part by my limited understanding of Dr. Albert Schweitzer's reverence for life philosophy. The doctor-missionary once summarized his view thus: "The essence of civilization consists in this, that the reverence for life which in my will-to-live is struggling for recognition does get stronger and stronger in individuals and in mankind". Nowhere, to my knowledge, did the missionary-doctor speak specifically about the abortion issue. As all Members know it was only until recently that this issue was a very important one around the world, but there appears to me to be no doubt on which side of the spectrum Dr. Schweitzer would stand if he were alive today.

In an attempt to obtain as many views as possible of residents of southeast Edmonton on this subject, I sent a questionnaire to approximately 50,000 households early in July. There has been a flood of replies. Almost 5,000 have been returned, which is almost five times as many replies as I have ever received in a survey on anything. Many contained thoughtful letters, and I have read all of them with care. I wish to quote from some of the letters on both sides of the issue. No names are used since I was not authorized to do so by anyone who wrote.

Abortion

The following are some excerpts from the pro-life respondents. A constituent who identified herself as a 15-year old female stated:

"A foetus is a human life and a human life should be respected. I just wonder how you, David Kilgour, would like it if your mother at the present moment would come with a knife and stab you in the back because you were a nuisance to her social life."

A female doctor stated:

". . . to destroy a human life because of carelessness is an atrocity. It is just as intolerable of the members of my profession to agree to perform abortions, and that their enthusiasm changes as does the fee schedule and benefits allowed. As a profession, we need to present the other options, all of them, other than abortion to patients."

"As well, we must not neglect the ramifications to the mother (and her health) if an abortion is performed for her . . . I implore you to work toward legislation that will not only drastically reduce, but strictly control and enforce abortions in Canada."

An adult, and I do not know of which sex, stated:

"We need to take into account the effects on society of providing abortion on demand. We are already a disposable society. Are we now to the point of disposing thoughtlessly of future generations?"

A woman wrote:

"If we no longer value human life, our future will be bleak . . . every person is of worth—born or unborn, beautiful or ugly, smart or not so smart. An option I see for the event of an unplanned pregnancy would be service and assistance for the mother, to see her through the pregnancy, leaving her the choice to keep or give up the baby for adoption. This option leaves the mother dignity—she opts for life and opportunity for her child, not destruction."

A constituent, and I do not know the sex, wrote:

"Are you aware that it is illegal to break the egg of the American bald eagle, but legal to kill an unborn child? If the state can "legalize" the murder of some, it can "legalize" the murder of many. Abortion today justifies euthanasia tomorrow."

A woman wrote:

"I've had two abortions due to the RH factor. I'm 36 years old now and I really miss the children I could have had. I know a lot of women who have had abortions because the timing was wrong. I have one son and I wish that he could have had a brother or sister."

And finally a man wrote and stated:

"Is an immature human being any less human because of its immaturity? If an unborn child (at any age) is not human then what is it? . . . Isn't the law supposed to protect the more fundamental rights of human beings (such as the right to live in safety) over the less fundamental rights (such as the right to convenience)? . . . There are alternatives to abortion."

I would now like to quote some letters from constituents who are on the pro-choice side of the issue, and provide some samples of what they had to say. A woman wrote:

"For myself, the only reason I would have an abortion is if the baby was grossly abnormal and would be not able to be an independent living human. But for others, I believe they should have the right to choose for themselves."

A second woman wrote:

"I consider the unborn child to be a precious human being and yet I have marked that a woman under any circumstances should have the right to an abortion . . . Government can help people decide on these issues in providing funding for family planning, better financial support for low-income families, more insight into pros and cons of abortions (which I do not feel people are aware of) and more financial and emotional support to the single mother."

Another woman wrote:

"I feel a greater emphasis should be placed on sexual education and birth control. Research should focus on safe and effective birth control, on the individual's duty to either birth control or abstain if children aren't wanted. With this achieved, abortions would only then be required for active cases of rape, incest, failure of birth control, or danger to the mother."

A man wrote:

"I believe the more legislation there is the greater the loss of freedom—I am not a woman but I wouldn't want to sit in judgment and say, "No, you cannot have an abortion"."

A woman wrote:

"If I became pregnant while on the pill or an IUD I would likely choose abortion despite the fact I would be "sick" about it as we simply could not find the financial resources to raise another child and I would not have the child and give it up; this would be in my mind much worse."

Finally, a pro-choice constituent wrote the following:

"As a single parent who chose not to abort my child, I have strong views . . . I have found that being a single parent is extremely difficult, both financially, emotionally and all other ways. Had my decision not to abort been forced upon me by the Government (instead of my own naiveté), I would be even more resentful. It is extreme cruelty to force women to have unwanted children—better death—"

I take it she means the death of the child.

"—than years of poverty and stress."

In attempting to analyse the responses, I now realize fully that there are some weaknesses in the 11 questions that were asked, the way that they were worded. I also realize that a point of view—my point of view—which is on the pro-life side of the spectrum, comes through in the questionnaire. In doing it again, I would attempt to get agreement on the questions from representatives on both sides of the debate.

There has been far too little time—the letters are still coming in—to do an analysis on all of the questions on the questionnaire, as will be done, but my staff and I have managed to compile the replies to Question No. 10, which asks whether constituents want me to work for legislation that will: "(A) reduce drastically the number of abortions performed in Canada", or "(B) obtain a more liberal law than before so that abortion is made more freely accessible". Out of approximately 5,000 replies received to date, 2,865 or about 60 per cent prefer option (A), and that is the drastically reduced abortions. And 1,960, or about 40 per cent, indicated a preference for (B).

Whether this is representative of the 130,000 people who live in the present constituency of Edmonton—Strathcona is, of course, very difficult to know. Some people, doubtlessly, were away on vacation. Others, including my mother-in-law, were missed by the postman. Others, I am sure, refused to reply because they think that I am definitely on the pro-side of the issue. Certainly, all of the replies that came in appeared to be spontaneous, and there seemed to be no campaign by either side to get people to reply. One of the first replies that came in said that the questions obviously showed that I was on the pro-abortion side of the issue.

A fairly recent opinion survey of 700 Edmontonians, randomly selected, by the Population Laboratory at the University of Alberta evidently found that less than 40 per cent of those surveyed think that abortion on demand is acceptable. I say that it is slightly less than 40 per cent. An Angus Reid opinion survey done across Canada three weeks after the Morgentaler decision indicated, as I am sure you know, that more than 6 in 10 Canadians nationally believe that any new abortion legislation should impose some legal protection for unborn children. In my view, therefore, the results of my survey, while imperfect, are probably fairly representative for the people who live in that part of Edmonton as a whole.

In the moment or so left to me, I would like to indicate how and why I will vote on the various matters before the House tomorrow at roughly noon. First, I will vote for the amendments to the main motion before the House, which in effect would prevent abortions unless the life of the mother is otherwise in danger. Second, I will vote for the amendment of the Hon. Member for Kitchener (Mr. Reimer), which bars abortions, unless a continuation of a pregnancy would seriously endanger a woman's health. I had, by the way, prepared a similar amendment along these lines, but it seems unnecessary to put in a second amendment to vote on which is essentially the same as that of the Member for Kitchener.

Third, I will vote for the amendment which requires counselling before an abortion can be had. With considerable thought, I will vote against the Government's main motion, if that becomes the final vote, because I believe that a Bill enacted consistent with it would legalize abortion on demand for all but the tiny percentage of abortions—I believe it is less than 5 per cent—which do not occur in the first months of pregnancy.

Being personally very concerned about pregnancy caused by rape or incest, I would like to signal now that when a Bill is brought to the House, as I hope it will be—if not in this Parliament, the first thing in the next Parliament—I believe very serious consideration should be given to allowing abortions when two independent doctors are convinced that the pregnancy has occurred from one of those two causes.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I would say at the outset that I am one of those Members who enter this debate not totally sure or confident or secure in exactly what I am going to say. I listened with extraordinary interest to many of the comments of Members, some with passion and fervour and commitment and surety. I am afraid that I cannot bring that same level of certitude to this debate, yet I know that it is one of the real tests of being a Member of Parliament and therefore cannot be evaded or avoided. People expect us to exercise our judgment and to express our point of view, even though it is an issue on which there can be many conflicting feelings and emotions and thoughts at the same time. Partly that is borne out of frustration, but more from what I really believe is a lack of leadership by the Government in not setting forward legislation. That point has been made many times in this House.

The Supreme Court last January gave a strong and abiding message to this Parliament, to this Government, that a decision had to be made, that the buck stopped here, that we could not sit on the fence any longer. Yet, I still feel that there is a lot of skating going on and that this debate is not a resolution to the problem. It is not providing clear direction for the country. It may provide other beneficial outlets of opinions, it may satisfy the requirements to get points of view on the record, but I do not believe it, in a concrete way, satisfies either the obligation put upon us by the Supreme Court or the expectation put upon us by the people of Canada. There will be a great sense of let-down, of failed expectations, that those who may be watching this debate or reading about it will say, after it is over, now it is decided, only to read that it is not decided at all.

What in fact you have is a wide variety of opinions and differing points of view. I cannot predict the results of the vote, but I can sense, at least, that there will not be a clear direction established. Yet, that onus must ultimately be recognized and must ultimately be honoured.

For those of us who have been in elected public life for a number of years, we were able, for a long period of time, to hide behind the decision made back in 1969 when the original decision was made. We all knew that it was unsatisfactory. We all knew that the committee system for making decisions on abortion was not satisfactory on any account, particularly because it was unfair to many. It certainly did not satisfy the requirements of equity or of effectiveness. In that sense, the Supreme Court did part of our job for us. It made a tough decision. It clearly put its finger on the failure of the existing system and set forward at least a standard by which this Parliament should try to measure. It did not make it easy, however, because it said that there has to be a balance, a balance of the fundamental sanctity of rights of women to make choices, and at the same time the equally vital moral requirement of life. I do not know who has the wisdom of Solomon to be able to balance such important values, such important questions of moral judgment, and say which is the preferred one.

As one who is a philosophical Liberal, I value deeply the concept of choice which can be translated into different words, liberty and right to decide. We have fought for 1,000 years, for generations, to get that right to make decisions about ourselves and our society. I consider it to be one of the great principles that a civilized society is able to endow. I know very well that in certain crucial cases, because of reasons of history and evolution, large segments of our population have been denied the right to make these choices. There is no doubt that when you talk to women, not just about the abortion issue but on a whole range of issues, they have been denied those rights. This has been a male dominated society. Things have not been equal.

Women have not been given the full rein of choice. There is no doubt about that, and I do not have to go through the litany of transgressions that have been visited upon women for a long period of time to make the point. Yet we also know that choice is not a licence. It is not totally free. Society has always found it necessary to put certain constraints, certain parameters, around the range of choice. That is what this issue is about. Sitting in the balance is also a deeply held value by people of religious beliefs and personal beliefs that the foetus has a life and it is a question of when does life begin. Does it start at conception or otherwise? Where do you cut that balance in between?

I would have to say that in the past I have certainly been philosophically, theoretically, abstractly a believer in the choice option. I have been convinced by the arguments in a practical way that legislative anti-abortion laws would not work. There is a lot of evidence of the kinds of problems we had in society before 1969. I was struck by the comment made by the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap (Mr. Riis) about the situation in Brazil. That country virtually bans abortion yet one million abortions still take place in Brazil annually. Women are still exercising that choice even though it may be illegal.

The idea of including abortion in the Criminal Code I find abhorrent. I do not think the Criminal Code is the way to set limits or parameters. But at the same time I have a personal experience to relate. A few years ago my wife and I were visited with great joy. We were able to adopt a young son who has brought enormous warmth, happiness and joy to us as a family. I cannot help when I look at my young son thinking that if the natural mother had made a different choice and had an abortion I would not be able to share in the wonderful experience that we have had. It made me think, I have to confess, and made me look at things from a very different perspective. I had to. It made me recognize that the choice being made is a vital one and a whole series of rippling circles affect not the immediate experience of the woman and child but society as a whole.

If I have to come to one possible conclusion from this debate—I have heard speeches from all sides of the House and from all spectrums—it is that we have failed desperately in providing the kind of necessary family support. Federal, provincial and municipal Governments for the last 10 years have been cutting back on social services, the necessary family support systems which allow legitimate choices to be made. When I look at the budgets of this Government, provincial Governments and even the Government to which I belonged, those things tended to take the first cuts. How can you ask women to make a choice on perhaps the most vital matter in one's life when you have denied and restricted, eviscerated, the abilities, to make that choice?

I have heard Member after Member say it is time for proper family planning, counselling, support services, half-way homes, income and all the rest. I have heard the same Members in different debates argue the other way, saying it is time we restricted our social services and cut back. You cannot have it both ways, Mr. Speaker. I have heard Members in this House, and I could go back to their speeches, trying to have things both ways.

If the Government is looking for instruction out of this debate and if it is looking for guidance and wisdom, surely the one thing we can agree on is that we do a lousy job in this country in supporting families, particularly in enabling women to make proper choices. We do not provide the necessary essential ingredients to allow them to make a choice, a choice not dictated by economic necessities.

The Hon. Member for Edmonton—Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour) quoted a letter from a woman who said a single parent was dictated by poverty or poor family circumstances and that affects in a profound and dramatic way the choice that person will make. How can we on the one hand be saying, "Let's deal with this question. Let's make sure that if a choice is to be made it is a choice for life", when we do not provide the proper support and wherewithal for life to exist properly, fairly and effectively in this society? Perhaps out of this whole debate that in itself is a value worth emphasizing.

Maybe this Parliament in its late night debate can send a message to the rest of society that it is time to change and recognize the investments and support needed—I do not like the words social programs—namely, basically annexed family programs. Maybe we should put this decision off until we see what happens if we give families a decent chance and women a decent chance. Right now is not the right time because any decision is not based on the right criteria or evaluation.

I am certainly not satisfied with the Government's resolution. There are too many inconsistencies and vagaries to it. I will certainly take a look at the amendments presented to see if one fits the requirement that fully honours the principle and concept of choice but also carries with it the full investment to make it a worth-while choice, to make it a moral imperative choice not one that is dictated because one lives in desperate or denigrated circumstances.

A year and a half ago with the co-operation of a number of churches and community organizations I sponsored a family study in my riding. I was embarrassed in part by the results. It made me recognize how many things I had not taken into account as a Member of Parliament. I generally consider myself a pretty decent Member of Parliament. There were so many things in those homes I had not been able to touch. People cry out for the kind of support which they can no longer get from their church or extended family which in a large urban society is not there any more.

What about mental health support? Do you know how many people said that they are dealing with mental nervous breakdown and do not know where to turn, Mr. Speaker? We should look at family income programs, family allowances and social assistance. They are not sufficient to allow families to adapt to new circumstances.

What if you find out that your child needs remedial training or has a learning disability? What if there is a death, a divorce or a separation in the family? The way in which we apply and direct our family income programs do not allow families to adapt and respond to those kinds of crisis or circumstances. Is it any wonder people get nervous and anxious about raising a family when they feel so bereft of the important essentials which may have been provided in past generations because of extended families consisting of uncles and aunts? In the past there was also a much closer religious community than there is today. That is part of the reality we face. We have to fill that vacuum.

I can certainly affirm that commitment. On the question itself, I will not give up on my belief that there is a real right to choose, particularly in the case of women making a choice only they can make about the product of their womb. I know men are participants but it is finally a woman's choice. I believe there must also be proper parameters and conditions set by society. Unfortunately, this resolution does not provide that.

We have not been able to hear the kind of expert advice and testimony to complete that kind of calculation, to make a proper judgment. That is why legislation would have been so much more important than this. Therefore, my vote will be dictated by my looking for a still better solution than the ones we have provided, indicating my strong commitment to filling that social vacuum, to trying to maintain a choice with parameters but finding the right wording and telling the Government that it had better do it again because it did not get it right this time. That, I hope, will represent the tremendous variety of views, cross-section of opinions and feelings that I have received from my constituents and the advice I have received from so many people.

My solution is not perfect, it is incomplete and I admit that. But so are the resolutions and the amendments that are on the floor of the House of Commons. All I can hope is that perhaps out of this debate will come some germ or kernel of a new wisdom and maybe some slow building of a consensus in society on an issue that has been so divisive so far.

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, members of the Opposition have said that this debate is based on hypocrisy, on a simulation of virtue or on pretence. If that were true, then the speeches of opposition Members and, for that matter, of government Members, would be pretence through their own participation.

I do not believe that any of the speeches are a pretence. I believe them to be honest expressions of the thoughts and the feelings of the Members with opinions shared by a number of the Members' constituents. That the views of any Member properly reflect the views of all his constituents or of a majority of them is either improbable or indeed impossible.

This debate deals with two very distinct points of view. While the viewpoint of some may approach the viewpoint of others, they do not cross that invisible but insurmountable barrier that separates the two. Bearing this in mind, surely those who would shout hypocrisy fail to understand that apart from the public, there is another body that will be giving careful attention to what is said in this debate. I refer to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Surely the Supreme Court of Canada will seek to find some form of common ground or some measure of uniform concern from what has been said or from what will be said. It may be that it will need the wisdom of Solomon to find evidence of common ground, but to find areas of majority view may be somewhat less challenging.

Since 1974, I have publicly stated that I support the right-to-life movement. I have also stated that my support is not as all-encompassing as they might wish. I cannot support the premise that every foetus should be allowed to go full term when there is clearly demonstrated evidence that the foetus or infant has such profound developmental abnormalities as to be grotesque and/or non-viable; in simple medical terms as defined by Dorland's Medical Dictionary, a monster. Obstetricians could provide us with frightening examples, but surely there is no need to elaborate.

What kind of a person and what kind of a system would insist that a woman had to go through a full-term pregnancy with an anencephalic foetus, a foetus without a brain, or else the medical coverage would not pay for the delivery? That woman, an American citizen, a federal government employee, was interviewed last night on CBC's Journal. That is the kind of cruel and unusual and indeed in my view unethical punishment that has surfaced as a result of an imperious and sweeping abuse of what may have been well-intended policy.

Only very recently have we been made aware of an entirely new baby, sadly a baby whose mother is addicted to crack, that highly refined narcotic that can be smoked. The baby of the crack-addict mother has no sucking reflex, cannot feed on its own, does not and cannot cry, does not freely move and is probably seriously mentally impaired. As well, given the promiscuity that goes with crack, there is a high risk of either syphilis or AIDS or both being passed on to the foetus by the mother. Where lies the moral obligation to the foetus here? Is it abortion or is it a short life in a dark void of misery?

I would like to turn to the issue of the unwed mother and, more particularly, the teenage mother. In spite of the fact that today's teenagers, unlike those of 10 or 20 years ago, are well informed on the subject of sexuality, the facts are that they are still very vulnerable to pregnancy. For them, as for most of us, intercourse is a spontaneous expression, not a pre-planned, pre-programmed event. The pregnant teenager never thought it would happen to her. The day after conception is three months too late to be on the pill and it is too late to have taken other preventive measures.

Society no longer condemns the teenager, or at least the majority does not. Parents no longer order their daughters out of their homes, or at least the vast majority do not. However, to diminish this risk, society must provide for this circumstance.

I have heard so often that society should do this or should do that or that society could offer support. However, there is no more room for wishful thinking, for should do or could do. It is must do. We have to provide the kind of environment that encourages the unwed mother to carry her baby to full term, that provides a system which would allow the continuation of her education and that provides for adoption with a minimum of trauma to both the natural parents and the baby.

I remember well the sad story of an unwed mother, 25 years ago. She related to me that when she discovered she was pregnant, her parents sent her from a small town in British Columbia off to a home for unwed mothers in Manitoba. There she was assigned to menial and hardworking tasks on a daily basis, and also on a daily basis was reminded with lectures of just how sinful she was. Her baby was then taken from her for adoption. How sad that she thereafter remained childless. That is not my view of a caring society.

Let us not revert to that form of criminalization, but rather, if it is the wish of the natural parents, let us encourage adoption, not abortion. Let us add to the sum total of our national talents, and for that matter, the near zero population growth because of the trend to smaller families. Canadians need to be reminded that even with a high birth rate and a high immigration rate, our actual population growth will still be only 1 per cent by the year 2000. That is less than 12 years from now.

As one who supports a pro life position, I was shocked to hear an avowed pro lifer in the U.S. declare last night, again on The Journal, that one of their first federal accomplishments was to deny medical coverage for abortions to those American families receiving federally assisted social assistance or welfare. That same policy may be quite unintentionally inferred in part (2) of the amendments submitted by my colleague from Kitchener. I do not for a moment suggest that it was prompted by the U.S. experience, but I cannot support an amendment that could attack that most defenseless part of our society, those who exist, by circumstance and not by choice, at or below the poverty line. That is, for me, unacceptable and discriminatory. It raises again the issue of what a nation must do, not should do, or could do.

Fecundity among the poor is a world-wide phenomena. In Africa it does not mean another mouth to feed. It means one more child to help gather food and firewood. In North America it means ignorance of birth control methods, or a particular religious belief, or the absence of money to pay for birth control products.

Let me digress for a moment. Surely all of us have at some time, or often, when watching a movie war scene, large or small, real or imagined, past or present, reflected on the talents destroyed, the positive contributions to society that may have been lost forever, destroyed in the blast of a bomb, the thud of a bullet. Reflect then upon the eyes and face of the miracle of a baby. Surely our society has a moral obligation to allow that miracle to happen. Surely we must become a "must do" Canadian community, so that social and economic considerations are no longer just that, considerations.

I would like to make reference as well to the concern I have regarding the subject of those women who are victims of rape or incest. I would make an exception in those cases. Clearly that places on the mother a degree of stress, revulsion, anger, and a host of other emotions that go far beyond the normal experience of those who would normally be able to offer support.

With respect to the motion and amendments before the House, I reserve my position at this point. I will await the termination of the debate and all the amendments have been moved.

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria—Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, I feel it is not only my privilege and honour but my duty to rise today and address this motion and its amendments.

Issues of life affecting conscience must be considered particularly carefully. In my years of service to my constituency there have been several discussions on capital punishment. These have been debated with passion by Members on all sides of the House. No one can argue that that issue has not had tremendous impact on and caused much soul-searching by Members of Parliament.

Similarly, over the years, the Government of Canada has on more than one occasion discussed abortion. Previous governments prepared Bills which, though not perfect, set out a degree of control over access to abortions. The Hon. Member for Grey—Simcoe (Mr. Mitges) introduced a motion, M-37, which would have included the rights of the unborn under the Constitution. It, too, provoked a very heartfelt debate before its defeat. Now, with the recent Supreme Court ruling which declared the existing legislation unconstitutional, we are back to square one. No federal legislation now regulates abortion.

Like other Members, I have been deluged by information, letters, and petitions from across Canada. In June I presented one of those petitions on behalf of some of my constituents who adhere to the pro life side of the argument. The bulk of input from my constituency concurred with this viewpoint. I could quote hundreds of letters from constituents who ask that Parliament enact legislation to restore the restriction on access to abortion. Many thanked me for support of Motion M-37 and asked for my help to continue to protect human life. I might add that I have had a very high proportion of individual, hand-written letters, of a non-form type. There is no doubt of the sincerity of input or strength of feelings of Canadians on both sides of the issue.

Quite often, when asked how I would vote on this issue, I state to my constituents that, of course, it would depend on the exact wording of such a motion. This motion before us is very clear and gives every Member the opportunity to voice their individual opinion and vote according to what they think is right. I congratulate the Minister on his efforts. The motion sets out an intermediate option which respects the desire to see new legislation, but gives a great deal of latitude for adhering to the legislation. A possible paraphrase of the objective of the main motion is to create controlled access to abortion.

In my opinion, and that of most pro-life and pro-choice advocates, the main motion is not perfect. It neither recognizes the mother's complete right to choose, or the belief that life begins at conception. Thus, while it is a legitimate attempt at a compromise, the compromise is acceptable to no one.

In considering what I would say in this debate, I reread the motion introduced by the Hon. Member for Grey—Simcoe on November 21, 1986. Permit me to read it again:

> "That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of amending the Constitution Act, 1982, to include unborn human persons, and that the Governor General issue a proclamation under the Great Seal of Canada to amend Section 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights so that it reads as follows:
> "7. Everyone including a human foetus or unborn being has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice". "

Needless to say, had this motion been accepted, today's debate would not be necessary. Recognition of the unborn as having rights from the moment of creation would make the question of pro life or pro choice a moot point. All life should have a choice.

Private Members' Bill C-312, an Act to provide an interim measure respecting abortion and to amend the Criminal Code, introduced on Monday by the Hon. Member for Halifax West (Mr. Crosby), introduced a positive element into this debate. It requests that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) place an amendment to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, to protect the life of the unborn, on the agenda of a First Ministers Conference. In the interim, this Act would make abortion illegal except for medical reasons.

Such a conference would, I believe, give this discussion a fuller airing and lay the basis for the most comprehensive abortion legislation possible. Canadians deserve this. We have left them in limbo for too many years.

As I said earlier, I have received hundreds of letters from constituents supporting the pro-life position. I want to read you excerpts from just two of them. The first is signed by two women from my constituency. These ladies state:

> Now is the time for you and your colleagues in government to speak for the innocent unborn who have paid a horrendous price for so-called women's rights and health.

They go on:

> "This shameful situation has gone on for over 20 years, the blackest period in our history. Now is the time to stop the killing. We the caring and responsible electorate of Canada demand that you prepare and pass a law which is positive and protective of all life from conception to natural death. Protect Canada's future."

The second letter is from a male constituent. He writes:

> "Human life begins at conception. If we try to establish a time of beginning other than that, the whole matter becomes a relative issue. Does life then begin when the foetus first begins to move in the womb? Does it begin arbitrarily at 20 weeks? Does it begin at birth or perhaps a week later . . . "

Further in that letter the writer appeals for my assistance stating:

> "Mr. Scott, as my representative in Parliament, I ask that you vote against abortion and work towards establishing legislation that would put an end to abortion and stand up constitutionally in the Supreme Court of this country. I trust that our Conservative Government will be conservative on the issue of abortion."

These letters echo all the sentiments of the pro-life letters I have received. They also remind me of my reasons for supporting Motion M-37. As the writer said, who can truthfully say that an unborn baby is not alive? I know that a woman's body should be under her control but what we are talking about here, despite arguments to the contrary, is two lives, the life of the mother and the life of the unborn. Even the mother should not be able to take away a child's life as long as it it not threatening her own. Someone, or some law, must protect all life.

For this reason I want to go on record as supporting the amendment which would only permit abortions in the case of a real and present danger to the life of the mother.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I would like to start my speech by talking about the great joy which I felt, not as a Member of Parliament but as a human being, when I heard this week that my sister-in-law had delivered a baby after long and difficult labour and after going through considerable medical problems before that wonderful event took place. I had a tremendous sense of joy and a sense that a continuing regeneration of the world was taking place. Much more than that, I had simply a sense of happiness and excitement and a feeling of tremendous pleasure that this woman had brought forth a child and that this child would take its place in the community of North America. That is one very real reality for all of us who are parents, uncles, aunts, or grandparents.

We talk about the need for a pro-life position in this society. What we need in Canada is a pro-child policy, a policy which attempts to create the conditions and circumstances which will give the children of our country the best possible opportunities for their future and the very best care which we as a society can provide. It is from faith in a pro-child position which much of my commitment as a social democrat grows.

We must create in this country the situation of equality which will enable each child to have the same possibilities as every other child. Every child must have the same sense of health, the same sense of shelter, the same sense of job opportunities, and the same sense of being able to participate fully in this society.

In order to do that we must ensure that the foetus is given the greatest possible support and security from society. We must have programs of support for single mothers. We must have programs of support for women who are facing difficult choices in today's society. They must have knowledge, not only in areas like birth control, but on subjects like nutrition and ensuring that drug abuse does not damage a foetus. Those must be commitments of a child-centered society.

Those commitments must include commitments to serious and widely available day care facilities, available not only to those who are very poor and cannot afford day care except on a subsidized basis, or to those who are very well off and can afford day care for that reason. We must move to a commitment to day care such as my own children benefited from so tremendously.

We must also recognize some of the realities in attempting to set a policy dealing with the subject that is before us in this debate. One reality is that in my constituency of Essex—Windsor, any woman who wants an abortion can cross the bridge or go through the tunnel to Detroit and immediately obtain an abortion from an abortion clinic without any obstruction whatsoever. That is a reality.

A second reality is that the Supreme Court of Canada, after very careful and agonizing consideration concluded that the Charter of Rights and Freedoms for our society meant that we could not set up a system which would impede women if they chose to have access to an abortion. That too is a reality that we cannot reverse. We cannot pretend that the Supreme Court did not give this subject profound and deep consideration. Our Charter of Rights protects everyone in our society, 52 per cent of whom are women. We cannot, nor should we take that protection away. It would destroy the Charter of Rights that protects us all in our freedom of speech, our freedom of assembly and our freedom to take democratic action as a community in the future.

There is a third reality. There was a time when it was illegal in this country to have an abortion, yet abortions took place. We cannot go back to making abortions illegal because it will not stop abortions from taking place. It will simply force women to seek illegal abortions in unsafe, completely unhealthy ways, that will cause immense damage to the women of our community. Those realities cannot be ignored.

I do not believe Members of Parliament can take a completely pro-life position as a result of pressure from constituents or because of our beliefs, since those realities exist and cannot be overcome in 1988 in Canada.

I have other considerations besides the realities which shape how I will vote tomorrow on these resolutions. The first and most profound consideration that will affect me is my belief in the responsibility of the women of Canada. I do not believe that in our present situation in Canada women will march out and begin killing their foetuses. That is sheer nonsense.

The women of Canada have profound commitment toward their belief in having children and bringing forth a new generation in our society. I do not believe our present circumstances will result in irresponsible women deciding to somehow destroy our future as a society. That is a most patronizing and male supremist perspective that could be adopted by Members of Parliament.

Above all, I will vote tomorrow with a sense of utter and complete faith in the women of this country, that they will make choices in consultation with their doctors, qualified medical practitioners, that will be good for us as a society, good for our children and good for the foetuses for whom so many shout for protection.

I do not believe that protection is needed when the women of this country have responsibility for the next generation, as they always have throughout history. I have faith in our society that it will not suddenly become a place where we do not think about the future of the foetus that a woman is carrying. Our society must begin to make a greater commitment to support for women and on education on reproduction. If our society moves in that direction in the context of the amendment of choice by the Member for Yukon (Ms. McLaughlin), we will see fewer abortions in this country. By putting our faith in the responsibility of women and the commitment of this society to support women and children in a way that has not been done, I think the abortion rate in this country will begin to decline. So I reject this motion because it betrays that freedom and responsibility of women and because it is unenforceable if one looks at it closely. I support instead the amendment which has been moved by my colleague, the Member for Yukon an amendment which does not favour abortion. It does not endorse abortion but says instead it believes in the responsibility and freedom of women to choose, in consultation with their doctors, what is best in the context of a society which cares much more than our society has yet demonstrated with respect to the future, the equality and the potential of its children.

We have to make a commitment to personal and social responsibility in the way we vote tomorrow. My commitment will be to vote against the Government's motion and to vote in favour of the motion moved by my colleague on behalf of our caucus.

[Editor's Note: For continuation of proceedings see Part II.]

Wednesday, July 27, 1988

The House continued its sitting.

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the various positions put forward, particularly to the position put forward by my colleague, the Hon. Member for Essex-Windsor (Mr. Langdon). I must say I am touched by his words and the sincerity in which he makes his plea to this House of Commons with respect to how he will represent himself in the hours to come. He spoke about how we, a legislative body of parliamentarians, should present ourselves to the electorate and the people of this nation. We in this House are all concerned about the unborn, but the unborn is not being taken into consideration in our hearts and souls.

I welcome the opportunity to speak before this House on this particular issue. As a Member of Parliament I have a chance to address the Commons and I know there are a great many people who would also like to have this opportunity and privilege. Last year we had the opportunity to address Parliament on two major issues, capital punishment and abortion. At that time Canadians chose to preserve the life of those who have taken the life of another. Let us work together today to preserve the life of the product of conception. I supported the right to life motion moved by the Hon. Member for Grey-Simcoe (Mr. Mitges) and at that time I urged the Commons to include a provision in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms that would recognize the right to life of the unborn. In 1982, during the Constitution debate, I called upon the Government to include such a right and protection. I am again this day calling upon the Government to implement legislation that would provide protection for the unborn and the unassailable right to life.

My position has always been clear. I cannot accept abortion as a means of birth control. Despite the misinformation given by the Canadian Abortion Right Action League to many of my constituents, I do believe that when a woman's life is in jeopardy, her right to life is paramount. A good many Canadians do not believe abortions can be performed without thought to the consequences of that action. This is a position that is shared by a great many of my constituents, but not all.

I have been told by the pro-abortionists that by taking my position I am imposing my morality on others. That is not my view of this issue. My viewpoint is one for the safeguarding of the rights of those who cannot speak for their own mortality or against their own mortality. In my opinion, which I know is shared by a large segment of our population, the abortion issue is not simply what the pro-abortionists term a "health matter". It is not a clinical issue that many state it to be, but an action that challenges the moral and ethical conscience of each and every Canadian.

We cannot dismiss abortion as strictly a "health matter", with the obvious exception of when a mother's life is at risk, or a medical procedure that discredits the life that is taken. The term "health" has been given an unlimited interpretation, meaning everything from a very real and serious threat to the mother's life to the interruption of a career. As the number of abortions has leapt into the tens of thousands every year, it is readily apparent that some segments of our society are willing to place a greater importance on the social and economic status of one life, at the cost of one life itself for another. Unless we say otherwise, before too long all right and wrong will be measured in social and economic worth.

To limit the argument to a right to choose on behalf of the mother denies the right to choose by that life that cannot speak and cannot defend itself. In this debate, we must remember the need for protection to life, liberty and security that Canadians demand for every living person. What makes this debate so vital is that we have the opportunity to extend those protections to those lives that have no say and require the protection of a caring society.

I believe simply that life begins at conception. I think that when we are in a position to accept that life at conception is just a progression through life itself until death, it will then become very much clearer. As people in a caring society we must accept the fact that we should not be in a position to exorcize a life in the womb anymore than we would exorcize a pimple or hangnail because in the later stages of life we might be able to say that because of senility or dementia and so on, some people are unable to care for themselves, make decisions for themselves and because they are unable to make those decisions so necessary to maintain and sustain life itself, they should be exorcized. How can we suggest that only when birth itself occurs that that is when life begins? That cannot be the situation. I suggest we must accept realistically that life at conception is just one stage of the many apparent stages of life as we proceed through the entire procedure that we refer to as life until death.

We have many, many facets. We have scripture. We have life itself which we are all enjoying. How can we say that one stage or the other is less or more critical than the particular stage that we as fortunate Canadians in this Chamber might be able to accept upon ourselves?

I can sympathize and be compassionate with the fact that when incest or rape takes place that is cause for abortion. The fact of the matter is that we are a generation of people who have suffered tragedy after tragedy. The number of lives that have been snuffed out as a result of incest due to abortion or rape due to abortion are minimal. Unwanted pregnancies as a result of those two tragic situations are even fewer. Although I sympathize completely and totally with that type of situation, I do not believe that we have the right to take that life any more than we have the right to take the life of another through a procedure that might be as a result of what I mentioned before such as senility, dementia or brain stem damage.

Members have heard horrible stories, tragedies surrounding the abortion issue. Many are stories that Canadians do not want to see repeated. Nevertheless, Canadians cannot abrogate their responsibilities to defend and protect innocent life.

I must point out the terrible methods that are utilized. As Members of the House of Commons or as members of a caring society we cannot afford to forget the methods that are used to terminate a life in the womb. For instance, we would not begin to think of terminating a life of an elderly person just because he or she has lost control of their capacity to reason by injecting them with a saline solution, or that we should perhaps carve them up into many different pieces and extract them and throw them into a plastic bag and have them disposed of in something certainly less than most of us as Christians would appreciate is appropriate.

Today, in my opinion, the unborn child has not one legal protection to life. The pro-abortion lobby claims Criminal Code Section 252 provides legal protection to the foetus by providing laws against the supply of a drug, instrument, or other noxious thing to procure an abortion. This section can be used to prosecute back-alley abortionists. It is still inadequate. There are no legal rights to life in the womb.

How can society provide every protection and guarantee to a born life and yet offer the unborn life not one protection? Many Canadians steadfastly believe that existence as an embryo, a foetus, an infant, an adolescent and an adult is a succession in the state of development. For those who believe that life begins at conception, such as I do, the proposal which some are suggesting would be a compromise and is simply not acceptable. That suggestion is that an abortion not be performed after a certain date.

Many Canadians will not be able to accept that a life either in the second or third trimester deserves greater legal protection than a life in the first trimester. On what day does a life go from being of no legal importance to one worthy of society's benevolence?

The physical and mental limitations of the unborn require that a caring society act on their behalf. For almost 20 years Canadians have witnessed the dimming of legal protection for the unborn.

The 1969 amendment to the Criminal Code indicated that decline. The Supreme Court decision in the Morgentaler case swept away all legal rights for those of us in our society who have not yet acquired the opportunity or the ability to speak for ourselves.

Today parliamentarians have the opportunity to install legislation that will provide the necessary protection for the unborn while acknowledging the need to provide for a legitimate threat to a life caused by pregnancy. To allow an abortion for any lesser reason would constitute an abandonment of society's responsibilities to those who cannot defend themselves or speak for themselves.

Education, contraception and comprehension are means of avoiding the birth of millions of unwanted children. I would very much like to see the Government of the country devote more funding to education.

Many pro-abortionists have argued or urged the Government to leave the matter as it now stands with easy legal access for the mother. I am urging the Government to take steps toward legislation that will provide the unborn with legal guarantees.

In the rulings handed down by the Supreme Court there was a definite indication that there must be a recognition of the need to protect the unborn. In its summary the court stated: "There has always been a clear recognition of a public interest in the protection of the unborn and there is no evidence or indication of general acceptance of the concept of abortion at will in our society".

Judge Beetz stated in his finding: "I am of the opinion that the protection of the foetus is, as the Court of Appeal observed, always has been, a valid objective in Canadian criminal law. I think Section 1 of the Charter authorizes reasonable limits to be put on a woman's rights having regard to the state interest in the protection of the foetus".

Chief Justice Dickson stated: "Like Beetz and J. J. Wilson I agree that protection of foetal interests by Parliament is also a valid governmental objective. It follows that balancing these interests, with the lives and health of women a major factor, is clearly an important governmental objective".

It is clear that some members of the highly esteemed and highly regarded Supreme Court of Canada recognize the right to protection of the unborn and caution against the abandonment of these principles. I sincerely hope that the Government takes this perception into account while formulating the decision that will serve as a bench-mark of our society. The recognition of life and the protection of life is fundamental to our laws and to our society. Limiting human life to economic or social equations is the abandonment of these values which Canadians cherish and defend. To diminish the right to life will and would diminish these laws and traditions that guide our consciences and the firmament of the principle upon which all great nations and great religions are built.

I appreciate the opportunity of making my position known. I trust that we will act in wisdom and in the faith in which our constituents have given us the responsibility of acting with tomorrow.

• (2230)

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I regret that we are not rising tonight to speak on an actual piece of legislation as opposed to this motion. The Government has failed to bring forth a Bill after many days, weeks, and months of discussion. Some time ago the Government put three options on the Order Paper and we were supposed to vote on any one of our choice. That is passing the buck of responsibility, and it is passing the buck of responsible government. The Government is here to govern and put forward legislation, which it has failed to do. Tonight we are faced with discussing the motion and not legislation.

This Government has the largest majority in Canadian history, but courage seems to be non-existent when it comes to clearcut decision-making. There might be some feeling on the part of the Government that this debate on a motion will suffice for the next election. I submit that it will not be accepted as a substitute. Our thinking must be longer term than the next election.

First, I reject the motion that the Government has placed before us. The Government has fudged the issue of abortion by attempting to appear to be the proverbial all things to all persons without pleasing anyone very much. This debate is not taking place to please people or to reject them. Surely the foremost aim and objective of this debate should be that of making certain that a happy, young teenager, laughing, enjoying life, studying and planning the future in 16 years time from the date of this debate should have the opportunity to do all those things because he or she had the right to be born, instead of being a 16-year old casualty of abortion or an abortion statistic.

This is a very crucial debate. The feelings that I will put on the record tonight are very sincere and they are certainly the way I feel about this issue. No matter how one looks at the issue of abortion, I feel in all conscience that I have no right, and I do not think that any of us has any right, to unnecessarily destroy life before or after birth. God brings us into this world and He takes us out. Sometimes it is extremely difficult to accept the death of a loved one, but there is a purpose and there must be a faith.

On the other hand, can you imagine the horrible thought, Mr. Speaker, that if the mother and the father of that lost loved one had decided to accept the abortion route rather than the birth route you would have never known that friend or relative in the first place. This begs the question, how many potential friends, potentially great citizens, community leaders, leaders, internationally influential people, professional people, and farmers have never had the opportunity to play their roles in life because they were not allowed the right to be born?

We know that economics plays a great role in today's family. Surely one of the things that could be done is support the family through the tax system of the country and give greater allowances to families raising children. I can remember when I was growing up and family allowances suddenly came in. It was a boon to the family.

It is said that the way a nation treats its native peoples, the way a nation treats its poor and its downtrodden spells out the real character of that nation. May I submit that the way that the Parliament of Canada treats its yet unborn citizens and the mothers says a great deal about our country and displays the real character of this nation not only to the world but to our maker.

The question of abortion is indeed a moral issue. It is indeed a family issue. Some sadly call it an economic issue. It is a matter of rights as opposed to responsibility. It certainly must put the emphasis on education as it relates to birth control. We should have better programs and more money should be put into those programs. As a previous speaker said, sometimes these are the types of programs that are the first to be cut. If we are going to talk about an abortion policy in this nation, then we better get with it and talk seriously about education on birth control and make it more acceptable to society as a whole.

Discussions and communications between parents and family members must be that of a free-flowing and understanding conversation, a real relationship within the home. We have an obligation to educate and to advise. Parents who assist unwed mothers within their family, those who provide love and encouragement and look after the child and accept it as their own, stand tall in my estimation, and I know that they stand tall in the estimation of most Members of this House because they are accepting a social obligation and they are doing it willingly. Those are the type of people whom I like and respect. They have the courage to face up to a difficult problem, and they do it head on. They do it with a joyous outlook and end up feeling a great deal of satisfaction because of it. Therefore, we have to change our prejudices in this country if we are going to talk sincerely about the abortion issue. We have to take a different attitude toward unwed mothers. There are still areas of this country where that is not taking place. We must be aware of the self-righteous, who are the worst enemies of destroying this kind of prejudice, and show love and care for the unwed mother instead of trying to make her an outcast in society.

I feel very strongly about protecting the life of the mother in any legislation that emanates in the future from this motion that we are discussing today. My prejudices in this regard are strongly built in because of a personal experience. For my wife and I, our first child was born on Mother's Day in 1961. After a very serious and long period for my wife, the baby was stillborn, a very difficult situation for a mother going full-time. It turned out later that that baby was one of the first victims of thalidomide.

I do not know how many times I counted every square of concrete on the sidewalk that encircled that hospital during those many hours. It put real emphasis in my mind as to the protection of the mother when it comes to any legislation that we are discussing today. When our second child came along, perfectly healthy, it was a great joy. When the third one came along, it was another great joy. Our only regret is that we do not have six more like them.

I was quite interested this afternoon in listening to a very impassioned speech by the Hon. Member for Hull—Aylmer (Mr. Isabelle), a medical doctor in our Party. We heard him say how he had delivered over the course of his lifetime 8,000 babies. He explained the joy that he has seen on parents' faces time and time again as these births occurred.

It is very important to protect the life and well-being of the mother through all of this. The old law that the Supreme Court struck down on January 28 was brought in with good intent in 1969. I was here for that debate, as was the Hon. Member for Victoria—Haliburton (Mr. Scott). I remember it well. We just spoke a while ago. We were class-mates. However, the good intent of that legislation was not always followed in spirit over the years.

As we discuss this resolution today and the follow-up legislation, whenever it comes, we cannot just talk about our rights; we must also talk about our responsibilities. Who are we to say that we have the right to terminate a pregnancy before or after a certain number of months, as this motion today implies? I submit that we do not. I do not agree with that. To say that life does not begin at conception is simply to defy all of the laws and logic of biology.

Let us be a nation of understanding, let us be a nation of love in the sense of respect and our help to others at all times. Common sense goes a long way in solving difficult problems. I was not born in a hospital; I was born in a farmhouse during the Depression years. If economic considerations had been brought to bear at that time, I would have never been born and would not be here today. I was born into a family that had no money. We could hardly pay our taxes during those years, but there was love, caring and understanding. I look back upon my childhood days and I think of my parents. I consider them to be real martyrs. With no money, they raised a family, with food on the table, good guidance, direction and encouragement. As I well recall, if you did not always accept that guidance, there was always a little bit of additional encouragement to make sure that you did, because discipline was very much a factor in our family.

I can remember when family allowances came in. I was going to high school at the time. What a great thing that was for the family. My gosh, to get a cheque at the end of the month for either $6 or $7—and later on it was $8 a month—was like a gift. We had never witnessed that before. I relate back to a situation where the economics of a family is very important. If we are not going to help them out in that route with family expenses, then we should be helping them out through the tax system at their level of income.

Canada's future is very important. Families are getting smaller in Canada. If we do not increase the size of families, encourage them to grow larger, and if we do not increase immigration, we are going to face a decline in population in Canada after the turn of the century.

This can change the Canadian social and cultural outlet because it means a greater mix of cultures in the world and it means that we are going to have to change with that society, because it will indeed change as it is changing rapidly right now. Do we ever learn from history?

A part of the downfall of the Roman Empire was a total lack of moral life. Abortion was a big issue at that time. They did not want young athletes having children because it interfered with their athletic life, it interfered with their muscular development and so on. We should be taking a lesson from that. Today, when we have greater medical knowledge than they had then, we should be handling these situations with a little more expertise. We should also be looking at the implications of their policies then and wonder if we have not gone complete circle on some of these. Today, we should take a serious look at abortion and abortion laws. I want to see legislation that protects the life of the mother and respects the moral right of the foetus to be born.

I look forward to legislation that will be coming forward in this House and I hope I will have an opportunity to speak on it. While I will be voting against this motion tomorrow because it does not agree with my feelings in any way, I will also be looking at the amendments that will be brought before the House tomorrow and giving serious attention to them when I vote.

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, I will not be voting in favour of the motion that has been tabled in the House. Before I get into my speech, I want to make a few comments about the speech delivered by the New Democratic Party Member, the Hon. Member for Essex-Windsor (Mr. Langdon). Part of his argument was that if abortions are deemed illegal, abortions will continue anyway and this really is no justification for having laws which would outlaw abortion and that abortions would continue in the back alleys of the country and in the back rooms of society. Is that a good enough reason for us not having morally acceptable laws, because they will be broken? Are we to say because citizens break the speed limit with their automobiles that we should have no safe highway laws? Are we to say to the people of Canada because banks are broken into and robbed, we submit and acquiesce as governments and admit that it is acceptable to rob banks? That is sheer nonsense and utter rot to use that kind of logic in the debate such as the one we are having here tonight.

As I indicated, I will not be supporting the motion before us. In my opening remarks I want to make reference to a paper by Dr. Paul De Bellefeuille, formerly associate professor of paediatrics, University of Ottawa. I make reference to just one paragraph as follows:

> «Human? Of course the foetus is human. He is the offspring of our species. From the very first, he possesses a full genetic endowment which will be his, and his alone, until he dies. Development is a continuum; once it is begun, no point in time can be taken as the moment when we become human. We are so from the very start.
> These are not legal concepts. They are scientific facts. But even if some judges do not consider the foetus a person, our jurisprudence recognizes him as a subject of rights: he may inherit, one may sue on his behalf for damages.»

I have not polled my constituents. I am compelled to vote as my conscience dictates to me. We understand and we know that this is an emotional and certainly a divisive debate which has taken place throughout the country and continues here in the House of Commons tonight. I think we need to remind ourselves that we live in a disposable, plastic, instant society which desires and I think even demands instant gratification and espouses, to a large degree, I think situational ethics. However, Mr. Speaker, each of us is a product of his or her environment and heredity. We did not choose our heredity nor our early environment. That which we learned to a large extent determines our value system. It includes our learning from our parents, our educators, teachers, clergy, peers, and through a learning process we establish our own personal beliefs and convictions. The British law system upon which our laws are based flow from the Judaeo-Christian ethics, including the Ten Commandments. Judaeo-Christian ethics have been the basis for guidelines to our moral conduct.

I want to make reference to two passages from the Old Testament. In the Book of Jeremiah 1:5 we read, and this is God speaking about the prophet Jeremiah:

> «Before I formed you in the womb, I knew you. Before you were born I set you apart.»

I knew you. I knew you when you were in your mother's womb. That speaks volumes to me. Then there is another passage which causes me to have the convictions that I have, and for other reasons as well. It is David speaking in Psalm 139. He talks about God knowing him before he was born, when he was in his mother's womb and before all of his parts were formed. He tells us that God knew him and He loved him and knew all about him and formed him even before all the parts of his body were formed. That speaks volumes to me. When I read that, can I now say that the unborn have no value? Could I now support a motion that is before this House and say, indeed, the unborn do not have that intrinsic value? I ask of those in the country who fought to save the seals and are numbered among the pro-choice people who advocate today killing the unborn, what is their value system? On what is that value system based?

Disposable Society, Disposable Babies? That is the title of an article that appeared in a small town newspaper in Brownsburg, Quebec. A letter was written by Edith Clark to her local newspaper. It was on the subject of abortion. Let me quote a few paragraphs:

> «Just think of a six month old baby you know. Supposing his mother were to say, "I'm tired of caring for this child, it's exhausting and time consuming, he's interfering with my career, I'll kill him now before he takes up any more of my time," and then carries through with her plan? We would all be horrified! If I were to demand that this should be against the law, no one would call me a narrow minded bigot trying to impose my moral views on other people.
> Yet if this same mother, one year earlier, made the same decision, for the same reason, about this same child, our government says that's just fine. Why? If it's not right six months after birth why is it all right six months before birth? Because we didn't know then how sweet and beautiful he'd be.
> We seem to have reached the ultimate in a disposable society—disposable babies. What a sad commentary on our times. What does the future hold for a nation that considers its children a burden rather than a blessing?»

Then, Mr. Speaker, I come to a problem which seems to be rarely mentioned in this debate and rarely mentioned across the country. I was glad I had seen this article in The Ottawa Citizen on June 9, 1988. This is written by a reporter in London, Ontario. It reads:

> Abortion is a psychological Vietnam for many women, according to a growing body of evidence.

This article tells about the terrible price that has been paid and will be paid by those women who have abortions. The article goes on:

> «Almost 100 studies in the U.S. and Canada over the past quarter century have found that sometimes more than half of women who have abortions experience similar negative psychological after effects.
> The feelings range from grief, guilt, regret, sadness, shame and depression to crying, insomnia, nightmares, anxiety, feelings of ugliness, drug and alcohol abuse and suicide.
> While short term distress is common, there is also strong evidence of delayed and serious long term effects.
> Because the emotions are often blunted and deeply buried, they might not surface for as many as 20 or more years, similar to Vietnam veterans.
> Dr. Barrie De Veber, a paediatrics professor at the University of Weston, Ontario and the Children's Hospital of Weston, Ontario, said the psychological effects of pregnancy loss are largely ignored.
> He said that while abortion quickly solves an immediate problem, psychological side effects can set in years later. With a miscarriage, grief is most acute when it occurs and moderates with time.»

● (2300)

Before this debate, and indeed during this debate, we have heard that a woman has the right to choose what she wants to do with her body. Why then do we do all in our power to stop people from committing suicide? To pick up on that same theme, an article which appeared in The Globe and Mail of April 26 of this year, written by Richard Bastien, said:

> «Yet, if killing an unborn child is a matter of personal preference, why not also abusing or molesting a born one? And if every woman has the right to control her own body, why should governments require the use of a seat belt in a car, or the wearing of a hard hat on construction sites? And why should they spend money on anti-smoking campaigns?»

I think Mr. Bastien has put forward a good argument for that position.

As the list of reasons for aborting is extended, will it include, and I suspect that with some women it already includes, the reason that the baby is not the right sex? With today's medical technology, what chance would Helen Keller have had? With the ability that now exists to enter a mother's womb and picture the baby that is in a mother's womb, medical technology would discover today that that baby who became Helen Keller was blind and deaf. Yet we know of the tremendous impact she made on society. That woman learned as people who were her patient teachers taught her. What a wonderful contribution she has made to society and what a great deal she has taught us.

Just last weekend as I was returning to my riding, I was listening to the radio in my car. I heard a marvellous radio program, a taped broadcast. A woman who died two years ago of cancer was speaking. Her name was Mary Crowley and she lived in California. She became very fast friends with Ethel Waters, that marvellous black singer who performed so beautifully singing negro spirituals. She had such great artistic qualities and she performed in so many movies. She was loved by many people who are my age. I am sure the younger generation may not have heard of her. What a tremendous contribution she made to the artistic world.

Mary Crowley and Ethel Waters became fast friends. Ethel Waters was Mary's senior in years. As Ethel got older, she asked Mary who would take care of her when she got older. Mary said that she would take care of her because she did not have a mother and Ethel would be her mother. So they became fast friends.

Mary said that one day, Ethel Waters called Mary into the room and said: "Mary, I want you to have this. It is my diamond watch. I had that when I was in my heyday," and she gave it to Mary. Mary was reluctant to take it, but it was a year later that Ethel died.

I thought that the most poignant part of that program was when Mary Crowley said that Ethel Waters was born to a 13 year old girl, the victim of rape. What a loss to society it would have been if that girl had aborted that baby. In today's society, we would have given her every reason to abort that baby. What a tremendous contribution that baby who became Ethel Waters has made to society. One of the songs I loved to hear her sing was His Eye Is On the Sparrow, a song that has moved thousands of people.

As I was looking through the material that I had on this issue, I found a clipping that I had removed from The Ottawa Citizen of April 14, 1986. It is the picture of a baby just 22 weeks old. The caption reads:

> "Tiny James was born 22 weeks premature recently at Edmonton's Royal Alexandra Hospital. James weighed just under a pound-and-a-half, but because of advances in treatment he's expected to grow up to be strong and healthy."

James measures about the length of a person's hand. If he was born 22 weeks premature, that means that he was only 16 weeks old when he was born. What would our pro-choice friends say about a baby born at only 16 weeks old? Is he viable or is he not viable?

What about a baby that is removed from a mother's womb for surgery, replaced in her womb, carried to full term and then born? I want Hon. Members to think about that. What about the baby—though many would refer to it as a foetus—that could legally have been aborted before surgery? If this baby is removed, it is already a baby, not a foetus, and we think enough of it to perform surgery on it so that it can be healthy. Then the baby is returned to the mother's womb, and the baby is a foetus again. Under certain laws, it could probably be aborted. My, what a dangerous web we weave.

This is a life and death issue. About a month ago, I made a statement on this subject in the House of Commons. The headline of The Globe and Mail article of April 26, 1988, reads: "Life and death issue Netherlands expected to approve bill providing euthanasia defence". The article read:

> After 15 years of sometimes bitter public debate, it seems likely the Netherlands will soon become the first Western country to legalize mercy killing.
> Unless there is a new, unexpected outburst of opposition, legislation to permit euthanasia will be approved by the Dutch Parliament within the next few months.

The article went on:

> Although there is no prescribed method of death, the consensus in the Dutch medical community is that it would be carried out by injection of a sedative and curare, ensuring a painless and quick death.

If we liberalize our abortion laws, if we open them up so that it is almost abortion on demand, who will be next? I soon will be a senior citizen. Who knows, in another 10 or 15 years, what will happen to me physically? Will we then say to our seniors: "We will just give you an injection and put you out of your misery. You cannot hear anymore, you cannot see, you really cannot contribute to society"?

In a daily national newspaper, I read this headline: "Ear damage repaired with sound". The article read:

> "The story begins in Paris where an ear specialist, Dr. Alfred Tomatis, was intrigued by the fact that song birds hatched by silent foster mothers can't sing. Tomatis discovered that the human fetus hears its mother's voice at 4 1/2 months and, incredibly, the higher frequency tones of her voice actually nourish the unborn child. From there it was only a step to wondering if, for the damaged or emotionally deprived child, it was not possible to return to that period of nourishment and actually repair the damage—with sound."

Is it not incredible and interesting that a baby will hear its mother's sound at the age of 4.5 months?

May I ask permission of the House to speak for two minutes more?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sure the House will agree.

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fretz: I appreciate that, Mr. Speaker, and I thank all Members who are here.

A paper was distributed to most of us entitled "What Is A Person?" by Edward Bell Smith. It said that a person is not defined by size. A person is not defined by whether or not they have limbs or by any other degree of physical development. A person's worth must not be determined by their degree of mental development. Being a person must not be based on popularity or acceptance by others. Finally, a person must not be defined by whether or not they are on a life support system.

If we say to the unborn that they have no right to exist simply because they do not breathe air on their own or must depend on the built-in support system of the womb, we might as well pull the plug on all who do not exist in the normal way. That is a gross form of prejudice that ends where? With artificial hearts or pacemakers? Are people who use those less valuable than those who do not? It would be absurd to think so. Rather, a person is created by a miracle, a spark of life that man has never created but can so easily destroy. It can only be passed on from generation to generation and I submit must be done so with an ever-increasing sense of awe and wonder that even in its tiniest form it contains the potential of a Michaelangelo or Beethoven.

My last comment is from the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops. Their sixth point is that there can be no quick fix of this complex issue. What is at stake is this country's whole future. Just as the natural resources must be protected for future generations, so human resources must be protected for future generations. Members of the coming generation must have full life enhancing protection and support. Our common future depends on our respect for all the beings of nature.

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to participate in this debate and take a pro choice position, which my Party is taking as well. On the resolution, my Party is taking the position that both law and government policy in the wake of the Supreme Court decision should affirm the right of a woman to make the decision of whether or not to have an abortion in conjunction with her doctor, provided that any abortion is carried out by a licensed medical practitioner. Our resolution also seeks to assure equitable access in all parts of Canada so that women are not denied access to an abortion, if that is what they need and decide in conscience that they should have, because of a lack of facilities in the area of the country in which they live. I have given the issue a great deal of thought and I will vote against the resolution which the Government has proposed and which initiated this debate.

My colleagues have spoken with some concern about the hyprocrisy, and I have to use that word, of the Government in saying this issue was urgent after the Supreme Court decision last January but then waiting until now to move. As well, rather than providing a government position in the form of legislation, even if it decided to allow a free vote on that legislation, it brought forward a resolution with no indication exactly what it means or whether it does or does not express government policy.

If this matter is urgent then, legislation should have been proposed. As it stands, this action will effectively defer any legislation on the issue until the fall, and most unlikely until a new Parliament is elected. In the meantime, any resolution adopted tomorrow, or even a failure to adopt a resolution tomorrow, changes nothing. It just indicates that the Government cannot make up its mind on this very difficult issue.

The Government's resolution has many flaws. I think the most fundamental flaw is the degree to which it subordinates the decision of a woman about whether or not she should have an abortion in the face of an unintended pregnancy, to many other factors. It calls for legislation consistent with the Constitution of Canada and the Charter of Rights. It says that the legislation should reflect the fundamental value and inherent dignity of each human being and the inherent worth of human life. Value judgments, and there are a large number of views as to exactly how that should be interpreted.

The resolution says the legislation should seek to achieve a balance between the right of a woman to liberty and security of her person and the responsibility of society to protect the unborn. Then, having called for a balance, the resolution says the legislation should prohibit abortion except in certain circumstances. One might interpret that as saying that the Government was taking a very hard line and effectively confining abortions to a very limited number of categories.

It requires that there be consultation and the practitioner must be of the view that continuation of the pregnancy would threaten the physical and mental well being of a woman. That, too, makes this provision sound restrictive. In practice, however, we all recognize that were the Government's resolution to be translated into legislation, the preambles, which I find objectionable because they are questionable, would not be in the legislation and not subject to interpretation. In practice, a medical doctor would be making a decision at the request of a woman either seeking an abortion or consulting with a doctor to decide whether or not to have an abortion, and the doctor would be making a decision with the woman or the woman with the doctor based on both medical grounds and the woman's perception of her physical and mental well being.

Since the earlier stages of the pregnancy would be up to 16 or 18 or 20 weeks, then the vast bulk of pregnancies that were sought to be terminated through abortion would be done so by a decision of the woman in consultation with her doctor.

The Government resolution then talks about further conditions during subsequent stages of pregnancy. One of my substantial objections to the Government's resolution is precisely that, although in only limited circumstances, albeit undefined, the Government is seeking to recriminalize abortion after the Supreme Court decision to take abortion effectively out of the Criminal Code. If we are logical in what we are talking about, and if we recriminalized abortions even under certain circumstances, then I would assume that criminal penalties should be applied. That means a woman would be subject to imprisonment as a punishment for having gone through an abortion which was deemed to be illegal because she came to seek it too late and therefore did not come under the earlier part of any law that flowed from the Government's resolution.

I do not think it is right under any circumstances that a woman should be put in prison because she had an abortion which she had decided upon in conscience after, I am sure, a great deal of reflection and anguish and thought. One of the issues in the debate today is precisely the question of whose conscience has to prevail in this particular question.

I note in the debate in the last couple of days that almost all, if not all, of the women who have spoken from all three political parties have taken a pro choice position. There may have been nuances, they may have had some concern, as do I, about the triviality and frivolity involved in a woman choosing an abortion because she found the baby she was carrying was the wrong sex. However, the overwhelming view taken by women in this debate has been a pro choice position and that this has to be a decision made by a woman facing an unintended pregnancy, in consultation with her doctor.

Most of the men from the Progressive Conservative Party who have spoken on this issue have taken a position, in varying degrees, opposed to abortion. Because the Government says that this is an issue of free conscience, it is permitting a free vote by its members and has not proposed a government view as the New Democrats have proposed a caucus position on behalf of the New Democratic Party.

We grant Members of Parliament the right to make a decision in conscience on this difficult issue, but that decision of conscience, made overwhelmingly by male Members of Parliament since 90 per cent of this House is male, could deny freedom of conscience to women, the ones who get pregnant and may face this difficult decision.

If the consequences of pregnancy were shared equally, men expressing a pro-life position may take a different view. Every pregnancy results from conception. No conception takes place without a male partner, yet the consequences of unwanted pregnancy are borne almost entirely by the woman. Under those circumstances it seems to me that the decisions about unintended pregnancies should also be made almost entirely by the woman. If this Parliament was 50 per cent female or 90 per cent female it would have more legitimacy in making this decision.

Perhaps all of us in this House should reflect on how men would feel if a parliament dominated by women decided on a measure which was intrusive into their bodies and lives, i.e. vasectomy, and that for some reason this was to be required of males under certain circumstances. There would be outrage, there would be rebellion, there would be demonstrations in front of the House of Commons.

If the law prevents termination of unwanted pregnancy, it would condemn women who wish to respect the law to carry through with those pregnancies regardless of the consequences. Frankly, the consequences of carrying through a pregnancy, having a baby, and quite possibly maintaining it through 20 years of its life, are a great deal greater than the consequences of a male having a vasectomy which, among other things, is a reversible operation.

The Member who just spoke talked about the loss to our society if Ethel Waters, the singer, had not been born. He pointed out that she was born as a consequence of the rape of a 13-year-old girl. I cannot justify saying to young teenagers, who may be victims of rape or may be sucked in by what society shows about sexuality in advertisements and all the other messages which are given to young people of both sexes who are impressionable, that under no circumstances can they have an abortion or even consider an abortion because by so doing they may prevent another Ethel Waters from coming into this world.

What are the consequences for the thousands of teenagers who might carry children to term and then find it very difficult to give those babies up for adoption? What are the consequences for the lives of those very young women if they do not have even a choice about whether to bear those children?

I have given this issue a great deal of thought. I have met with local groups such as Planned Parenthood and pro-life groups such as Christians For Life. I recognize and respect the points of view which have been expressed on both sides. I believe this is an issue of conscience, and I respect the fact that there are people in our society who are opposed to abortion. I have listened and read the material they have offered. I still remain of the view that this is a decision which must be made by a woman with her doctor.

I do not try to impose my position on those who are opposed to abortion, and I do not believe that people who are opposed to abortion should impose their views on the 70 per cent of Canadians who indicate, through Gallup polls and in other ways, that they believe this is a decision which should be left to a woman in conjunction with her doctor.

I believe that the Conservative Party has thrown this debate open to a poll of sorts among Members of Parliament because the leaders of the Conservative Party do not see their way clear to an easy answer on this one. On the one hand, there are Members such as the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mrs. McDougall) who has given a passionate speech on a pro-choice position. On the other hand, a number of Members who have spoken, mainly male, have taken a strong and passionate position on the pro-life or anti-abortion position.

Perhaps we can all learn a bit of humility from this diversity of views expressed within the government Party, as well as other Parties, and recognize that the Supreme Court was perhaps on the right track when it said that this decision should be made by a woman and that to apply criminal law was contrary to rights.

I believe that the distinction between early and late termination of pregnancy is a false and misleading one. Assuming that the Government's definition of early termination of pregnancy is up to 18 or 20 weeks, I will cite the statistics. In 1985, according to Statistics Canada, 88.9 per cent of abortions took place before the twelfth week of gestation. Another 8 per cent of terminations took place before the sixteenth week of gestation. Another 3 per cent took place before the twentieth week, and only .3 per cent of terminations took place after the twentieth week. Three one-hundredths of one per cent, a total of about 20 out of 60,000 abortions, took place after the twenty-fifth week, that is, after the point at which people tend to feel that the foetus has become viable. Therefore, 97, 98, or 99 per cent of the abortions taking place now would be allowed by the Government's resolution, if the decision were taken by the woman in conjuction with her doctor.

Some call that abortion on demand, but I do not believe it is on demand because I believe that is a very difficult decision. Any woman who is in that position must know from talking to a friend, a counsellor, a nurse, her mother, an aunt, or someone else whom she trusts that she will not recover quickly. She will have a sense of emptiness and loss and wonder what that baby might be. She takes the risk that perhaps she will never again become pregnant and may never bear a child of her own. These are the consequences of unintended pregnancy. However, bear in mind that the men who are responsible for unintended pregnancies bear none of those consequences in our society.

Despite the comments made by the Catholic Bishops of Canada, the Catholic Church, for which I have a great deal of respect, has no ex cathedra teaching on this subject. It has left the question of when life begins to the theologians and to individual judgment. Even the Catholic Church does not have funeral rites for foetuses which are miscarried or aborted and die as a consequence. That is general in all religions prevalent in Canada and indicates that even our great religions have dealt in a somewhat different way with unborn children before they react the age of viability. I do not know whether it is possible to have one coherent abortion policy except for an abortion policy that recognizes the diversity which now exists.

I note that the Government has reduced the funding for family planning in Canada by approximately one-third since it came to power. If we want to reduce unintended pregnancies, we need more funding and more support for family so that men and women of all ages can avoid unintended pregnancies. Currently, according to Planned Parenthood, about half the pregnancies which women experience in Canada are unintended. Of course, many of those result in births because people want the child. A man and woman may decide to have a child although they may not have intended for it to come along.

While education about sexuality is a major means by which we can reduce unintended pregnancies, only half the schools in Canada provided education in sexuality in 1984. Given the time it takes for training, education, and so on, it is generally considered to be undesirable and unwise for women to have babies before they reach the age of 19 or 20. They are adapting to life and learning skills particularly because many women will have to work for most of their lifetime, when previously they could be wives and mothers. That was accepted by women and society not so many years ago.

In Canada, one teenager girl in every five becomes pregnant before she is 20. That pregnancy can have an extraordinarily negative effect on that young woman in terms of her career prospects, her education, her chances of having a decent marriage. Not one male has an unintended pregnancy before the age of 20. We are talking about an issue that largely affects women.

As a parent, I found it very difficult to talk about sexuality with my three sons. I left them to learn much from movies, television, and on the street. That was a common way to learn about sexuality. The schools do not take part and sometimes, as a society, we interfere with the schools and prevent them from talking about sexuality due to a fear that it will encourage young people to become sexually active.

Since the days of the Model T, young people have increasingly had the means and the ability to become sexually active at ages which tend to get younger and younger. A basic element of sex education for young people is for them to know that it is okay to say no. We do not even do that because that kind of education is often not available.

The Planned Parenthood group suggests among other things that there should be an increased involvement by men. It should include an understanding by men that this is an issue that overwhelmingly concerns women. We, as males, have to be prepared to listen to what women say about this subject.

I am satisfied, from the people to whom I have talked in the last months as this issue was coming before us, that a woman who finds that she has become pregnant unintentionally and wants to have that pregnancy terminated very quickly will react that way anyway. They will take a view, which is a common sense view, that in the early stages of pregnancy it is more a matter of the health and well-being for women, while later on the foetus should have greater concern. In the small number of late pregnancies, it concerns someone who was unaware she was pregnant, or where a birth abnormality has been diagnosed in a very severe case like an encephalitic child which is brain damaged. It is where a woman had not access to abortion services earlier for various reasons. I think we must deal with those reasons in conscience and with compassion.

In conclusion, my son, Ben, is 24. He and his partner are expecting a child in November. That foetus is at the stage of four or five months. As it reaches the stage of viability, I recall from our own children that one becomes aware of it. I recognize that people have, in conscience, brought forward all these factors.

We must also recognize that we are talking about trying to make women equal in our society. However, women are the only ones who bear the children in our society. Therefore, they must make these decisions. We cannot leave these decisions to men, and that is why I am supporting the NDP resolution that we will be putting forward tomorrow. That is why I am taking a pro-choice position on this very difficult issue.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I do not support the motion on the Order Paper, so I have amended it.

My amendment will strike out everything after the words "human life" in the main motion and substitute my amendment so that the motion will read: "That, in the opinion of this House, the Supreme Court of Canada having declared that the provisions of the Criminal Code relating to abortion are inconsistent with the provisions of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and are therefore of no force or effect, the Government should prepare and introduce legislation, consistent with the Constitution of Canada, including the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which reflects the fundamental value and inherent dignity of each human being and the inherent worth of human life", continuing with my amendment: "Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and the House of Commons, enacts as follows:

1. Section 251 of the Criminal Code and the heading preceding are repealed and the following substituted therefor: Protection of the Unborn.

251(1) Everyone who, with the intent to cause the death of an unborn human being, uses any means to carry out that intent is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for life.

(2) Everyone who, in doing anything or omitting to do anything that is the duty of that person to do, shows wanton or reckless disregard for the life and safety of an unborn human being and thereby causes the death of that unborn human being is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for five years.

(3) Every pregnant female person who, with intent to cause the death of an unborn human being within her, uses any means to carry out that intent is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for two years.

(4) No one is guilty of an offence under subsection (1) if the life of the unborn human being was ended as a result of medical treatment necessary to prevent the death of the mother of the unborn human being or to remedy a condition that, if left untreated, would cause the death of that mother.

(5) In this section any means includes

(a) the administration of a drug or any other noxious thing,

(b) the use of an instrument, and

(c) manipulation of any kind.

Unborn human being means a human life from the moment of conception until birth, whether conceived naturally or otherwise."

First, let me pay tribute to Senator Stanley Haidasz, who is sponsoring the amended part of this motion in the Senate.

My amended motion uses a motion moved by the Liberal Senator Haidasz, seconded by Progressive Conservative Senator John MacDonald. It sets out precisely what I believe and what many of my constituents believe. It is a pro-life position.

Respect for human life is basic to our way of life and to our society. I believe that life begins the moment that conception takes place. The unborn human being has done no wrong. He or she should not be punished, let alone murdered. To those who do not believe that life begins at conception, I ask: At what moment, then, does life begin? Surely everyone accepts the fact that at some point a fertilized ovum becomes a life. If not at conception, when?

Reverend Father Ken Forster of Fort St. James, British Columbia, said to me in a letter: "If I had difficulty believing that human life began at conception, I certainly would not want to be in a position of deciding whether it began at eight days, one month, three months or at birth". Only God has the right to make that decision. How do those who say that life begins at birth explain the growth, the movement, and beating heart of the unborn child?

My second reason for not supporting abortion, the killing of unborn babies, is that I believe the Bible. I make no apology for believing the Bible as the word of God and make no apology at trying to follow what that scripture says. Genesis 2.7 states that God is the creator and source of the first human life. I quote that section:

> "And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul.

• (2340)

Second, I believe that God quickens the human body to enable conception. To prove that I quote from Genesis 17:19:

> And God said, Sarah thy wife shall bear thee a son indeed; and thou shalt call his name Isaac: and I will establish my covenant with him for an everlasting covenant, and with his seed after him."

Jeremiah 1:5 shows the love of God for the unborn child:

> "Then the word of the Lord came unto me saying, before I formed thee in the belly I knew thee; and before thou camest forth out of the womb I sanctified thee, and I ordained thee a prophet unto the nations."

We have the commandment "thou shalt not kill", and if we disobey we reap the punishment. There are many other reasons I support my motion as amended, as set out by Senator Haidasz, but the reasons I have outlined are the main reasons.

Why can I not support the motion on the Order Paper? It is not a government motion. It is a motion on the Order Paper. First, it opens the door to thousands of abortions. It permits abortion on request in the early stages of pregnancy with some restrictions in the last few months. The law that was struck down by the Supreme Court of Canada had some restrictions that were thought would limit abortions. I was not in the House of Commons at that time. It did not limit abortions, but it did result in the direct killing of some 60,000 unborn babies every year. If this motion on the Order Paper is made the law of Canada, mark my words, there will be more unborn babies murdered in the womb.

The motion on the Order Paper talks about "a balance of the right of a woman to liberty and security and the responsibility of society to protect the unborn". I know of no one who argues that a woman should not have liberty and security, but surely the liberty and security does not carry with it the right to kill another life, the life she carries. I agree also that a woman has the right to control her own body, but that does not carry the right to have a doctor murder another life, the baby she carries. To me, there is no balance between the right of a woman to liberty and security and the right of the unborn baby she carries. That baby has an equal right to liberty and security. More than that, the baby has a right to be born and the right to live. So the very basis of the motion on the Order Paper, in my view, is faulty.

There is another reason I cannot support the motion on the Order Paper. What is it the beginning of? We have the results of the 1969 law that resulted in doctors authorizing thousands of abortions which had nothing whatsoever to do with the health of the mother. Scores of reasons were evident, birth control, economic conditions, mental anguish caused if the baby was born, the baby was unwanted, the baby was unloved, it would interfere with the social life, and so on. These and many other reasons were given as excuses to destroy an innocent baby's life.

If these reasons are ever considered valid enough to murder a baby in the womb, what will we authorize next? The murder of some of the kids in a big family for economic reasons? The murder of a victim of infantile paralysis because of mental anguish? The murder of a crippled aged husband because he can no longer bring home a paycheque? The sick and bedridden people in a auxiliary hospital because they can no longer do the things they did 20 years ago? Heaven forbid. Let us not start down such a road that will lead to such tragedies.

In conclusion, my motion as amended recognizes the sanctity of human life. It is based on Holy Writ. It will be a beginning in bringing this nation back to the scriptural foundations laid by our early pioneers. It will allow thousands of beautiful boys and girls to be born so that they can build a greater Canada.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, I have been sitting in this House since six o'clock this evening and I can assure you that this is an extremely complex and emotional issue, not one that is easy to deal with. As you know, the Supreme Court of Canada rendered a judgment on January 28 of this year striking down the previous Criminal Code provisions with respect to abortion, declaring them unconstitutional. From that time this country has been without a criminal law on abortion. It has been without any law whatsoever on abortion. Despite that fact, it has taken the Government nearly four months to come forward with a replacement measure.

On May 20, the Government presented a multiple choice resolution which was unprecedented in Canadian parliamentary history, and it was clearly out of order. After much argument that such a resolution was not acceptable, the Government discussed it within its caucus, procrastinated, but finally withdrew the resolution. On July 22, only five days ago, the Government presented us with a new resolution.

This new resolution which is now before us deals with a single proposal. It is not a multiple choice question. It is subject to amendment and thus far 21 amendments to that resolution have been put forward. Canadians must understand that no matter what happens to this motion and to its amendments, it will make absolutely no difference to the state of the law on abortion in this country. Nothing will change as a result of this resolution and the votes that will take place tomorrow. That is because this motion is simply a resolution, not a Bill. As you know, Mr. Speaker, it requires a Bill in order to legislate. That is why it is hard to take this motion and this debate too seriously.

We all know that no matter what the outcome of the debate, nothing will change until a Bill is presented and passed. It is unlikely that there will be such a Bill until after the next election. Then the House of Commons will have a different composition. There will be many new Members, and since this is a free vote question, those new Members will not be bound by any advisory vote of this Parliament which will take place tomorrow. That is why this process and this motion are misleading.

We have been without a law on abortion since January 28, and after tomorrow there will still be no law on abortion. Several Members have said there must be responsibility and that it is time for action. I have heard that many times this evening.

• (2350)

This motion will not result in action. The Government has not assumed its responsibility. Since the Government controls this House, we in the Opposition or the Private Members of this House cannot present the kind of motion that we would prefer. It is true that we can present amendments to the motion, but those amendments must be compatible with the principal motion.

It would have been preferable if the Government had stated clearly that it was not yet ready to deal with this issue. There might have been many reasons for making such a statement.

One might have been the Borowski case which is presently before the Supreme Court and will be decided later this year. That case will decide on the legal rights of the foetus, the unborn child. The Government has not said that. It pretends that this resolution and this debate and the vote tomorrow will somehow resolve the question. It will not.

As I said earlier, it is difficult to take this motion seriously, not only because it will not produce action in solving the problem but also because the debate is limited to two days and there is a vote that must immediately follow. The vote must follow tomorrow around noon time.

Furthermore, there have been no committee hearings as there were in 1968 when I was a member of that committee which studied the issue. The committee hearings which were in great depth preceded the legislation which was to follow. It is a pretense to deal with a serious matter without dealing with it properly.

Since the judgment of the Supreme Court in January, I have studied this issue in great depth and intensity. I have met representatives from both sides of the question. I have met the anti-abortion groups. I have met the pro-choice groups. I have considered my position very seriously.

I want to say that I am philosophically opposed to abortion. While I am not a scientist, I believe that human life begins at or soon after conception and that the person develops as months go on until that person is born. Then, the person continues to develop until adulthood.

That having been said, I have serious doubts as to what extent and in what manner abortion should be dealt with or should be covered in the Criminal Code. I have no doubt about my own personal position. That is very clear. I have held that position for a long time. However, I do have doubt as to how this matter should be dealt with in the Criminal Code. I submit that it is a very complex and difficult issue.

To begin with, I doubt whether many of us would argue that everything we believe to be immoral should be the subject of the criminal law. At one time adultery, homosexuality, suicide, drug addiction, and contraception were criminal offences in Canada, but they are not so today.

Second, while many of us believe life starts at conception, we have rarely treated the developing foetus in the same way as a born child. For example, we have always had separate criminal laws for abortion and murder. Some people have said in this debate and elsewhere that abortion is murder, but the two have never been treated the same.

Why is this so? The answer is based in our history and in the history of British criminal law, but it is probably due to the fact that there was a consensus in society which felt that there was a difference between the two. That is why there is some inconsistency by those who oppose different abortion rules for different stages of pregnancy. If there is no difference between a child before birth and a child after birth, then why the two offences? If one can differentiate for criminal law purposes the child just before birth from the child just after birth, why can we not differentiate human life before viability from the human life after viability? They are both different stages in the process of developing human life.

As I have said, over a long period of our history we have distinguished between the crimes of abortion and the crimes of murder, both with different penalties and both with different procedures. One could never plead guilty to murder but one could to abortion. They have different penalties. The penalty for murder has always been more serious. They have been treated differently. It is not therefore inconsistent to suggest that we should have different rules for life, before viability and after viability.

Furthermore, if the quality of life is always the same from the very moment of conception to adult life how can we agree to some exceptions for abortion such as rape and incest but not for other exceptions such as health? Where is the line drawn? On what principle do we draw that line? In both cases the unborn child is equally innocent.

I am further confused by the seeming inconsistency of the Christian church. I say that with great respect because I am a member of the Christian church. If human life is the same at all stages, why can the conceived child not be immediately baptized and therefore capable of eternal life as defined by Christian theology? Since the foetus spontaneously aborted or miscarried, as one would say, in early stages has not been baptized, it is deemed to have a lesser status than the child who dies in the later stages and who has been baptized. In both cases the life is innocent. Why the different treatment? Why is the life in the first month of pregnancy that is spontaneously miscarried, aborted, treated differently from the child that is born and baptized? I must say that I see a glaring double standard with respect to the spontaneously aborted foetus and the deliberately aborted foetus, both in law and in morality.

A woman can, among other things, smoke, drink, and eat junk food during her pregnancy and possibly harm or abort her child but she is not subject to criminal sanctions. This all adds up to demonstrate that in law, both criminal and canon law, we do not and have not treated all stages of foetal development in the same way despite the fact that we might believe that human life starts at conception. This goes back to my original point.

While I am personally opposed to abortion, I find it difficult to determine at what point and to what extent the criminal law should apply. In this respect we must recognize that if the criminal law is to be enforceable there must be a strong consensus with respect to which offences should be criminalized. If there is not a strong consensus, then there will not be enforcement and the law is ridiculed, it is defamed, it is in disrespect.

During the twenties in the United States alcoholic beverages were outlawed. There was prohibition. There was no consensus for that law. It was not respected and was obeyed more in the breach.

Recently in Quebec with respect to the abortion law—and I did not like it—two juries unanimously acquitted an accused who was obviously running an abortion clinic. That is because there was no consensus for the criminal law that was in place and it could not be enforced.

It is my opinion that the only law that will have a strong consensus in Canada is one that will permit abortion for serious reasons in the later stages of pregnancy. Consequently, only such a criminal law will be enforceable. That is not to say that nothing else should be done. I believe that there are too many abortions, both legal and illegal. I think we could reduce a good number of those if we had better education with respect to sex, foetal development, birth control, and better birth control measures. I also think that we could give more support to groups such as Birthright and other preventive measures which might reduce the number of unwanted pregnancies.

Also essential are measures to support mothers and families. If there is to be a true choice, then there must be the support systems for mothers who might wish to keep their babies. Young mothers must not be driven to abortion because they cannot face an unfair and hostile world where there is not proper nutrition, housing, and other measures to help them keep and support their babies.

This resolution before the House will not solve anything and a Bill will be necessary. This is only chapter one of my submission with respect to this extremely serious and important matter. Chapter two will be produced when the Bill is presented to the House, probably not until after the next election.

In the meantime, I will continue to listen, to read, and to study this issue. I am not happy with the principal motion before the House, and I have not yet had time to examine the 21 amendments that have been tabled. No matter what happens, I want to say again that the motion and the process that we have before us will not solve the problem tomorrow afternoon.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with some interest and have been delighted to note that most Members have, over the last couple of days, put forward their individual points of view. The previous speaker was quite correct, this resolution in front of us which is taking the form of an adjournment debate must be followed by government legislation. I think we all anticipate the events tomorrow.

Together with my colleague, the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East (Mr. Allmand) I was also part of the problem some 20 years ago when we did a lot of work in the Harley Commission. Among the things that we did was to acknowledge to ourselves, after two and a half years of extensive and intensive hearings, that we did not have an answer. The problem we face today with the position of the Supreme Court of Canada is understandable and it was certainly predictable over the years that intervened.

Twenty years ago we passed a bad law, and I was part of that. I might say en passant that the suggestion implicit, if not stated, in the Canadian Catholic Conference of Bishops statement that the matter has just begun was in fact begun 20 years ago. We had agreed within the committee that perhaps fundamental to all of us was the necessity of a multi-disciplinary study of this very difficult and complex question. That did not happen. A colleague of Mr. Trudeau and the government of the day, said: No. We will bury it in an omnibus justice Bill, which they would not allow us to separate—and we have had some demonstration of that situation recently. We have a law in Canada, a bad law, unevenly available to people. It has been struck down, as most of us who were involved knew it would eventually be because it was bad law.

Now what do we have? The Government is asking Parliament to give it some direction. At this point in time I do not intend to develop any theories or arguments one way or the other. I am quite prepared to tell the Government where it is I stand and what I would like to see the Government do. I will make my position very clear, as I did 20 years ago, that I am simply against abortion except where it anticipates, through rational and reasoned thought on the part of professional people, that it might jeopardize the life of the mother.

As I said, I was part of the problem 20 years ago. I am delighted to be part of the dialogue that may resolve the problem. I do not believe that this Chamber has the wisdom to ultimately do that, but I do believe that society does have that capacity, and that it is a matter of a will on the part of this Chamber to set out to pursue it. We cannot do it here alone. We do not have the disciplines. We do not have the knowledge. Except in passing comment or reference, there has not been any history of nations such as Japan and their experience with abortion on demand. I would commend anyone who wants to go back and look at the literature. There is no medical history in this country of which I am aware that tells anyone, and particularly the family practitioner, about the physiological impact of an abortion and subsequent abortions on the capacity of a woman to carry to full term subsequent foetuses. These questions must be examined by us, admittedly as laymen, and must be examined very closely. I hope Members have gone back and had a look at the evidence in the Harley Commission report and some of the very difficult questions that were posed with respect to this issue.

Tonight, I only wish to indicate to the Government, as someone who has now spent some 32 years in public life, that we had bad law, the Supreme Court of Canada has told us that, and we have a responsibility to correct it. In response to my friend, the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East, the Government intends to correct it. The Government is not naive in that respect at all.

I reject the gestational approach to the law that is suggested in the resolution and as such will vote against it. I am pleased to state that my friend, the Hon. Member for Grey—Simcoe (Mr. Mitges), and others have expressed my views with respect to this simply and quite eloquently, as well as I could, if not better.

I have five children. Four of them are adopted. I know the value of life. If it were not violating family private matters, I could suggest to you that I know an awful lot about the difficulties that this Chamber faces with respect to this matter. Let me say simply that I reject the gestational theory. I accept and embrace the concept that life begins at conception. I would not want to believe in anything other than that, because to do so would take me back 20 years to the horror of bad decisions made in this Chamber, and I do not want to do that. I want, rather, to be part of the solution. I do not want to abandon what I understand to be a primary function of our responsibility. In that regard, I say to you and to the Government that, as a Catholic, and as a Catholic legislator, I must pay some attention to good law. Good law is very simply explained. I think the Members of the Chamber will agree that it is simply law that people want to obey and will obey. Bad law are laws that we pass that people will not obey. We have, in that context, an enormous task cut out for us.

I expect that the Government will accept its responsibility, and I believe that the Government will place it before us. Indeed, I will urge with all that I have to ensure that it does. I do not want the unborn foetus unprotected for an undue period of time.

I ask the people who are here in this Chamber and those people who are their constituents to thoughtfully—not emotionally, but thoughtfully—consult with us, give us the benefit of their thoughts, help us and, above all, for the love of God pray for us.

Mr. Anthony Roman (York North): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to rise today and to address this motion on abortion which could set the framework for a new law that will govern Canadians in the future. I do not propose to repeat the many good arguments of my colleagues concerning the protection of the unborn child. Canadians look to their Members of Parliament to draft legislation which reflects and respects their rights. One of our main purposes here is to observe rights and protect them through legislation. Canadians do not take these rights casually, and for that reason I am sure my colleagues will agree that we must examine this issue carefully.

Canada's law regarding abortion, the one which the highest court of our land struck down last January 28, was arrived at following lengthy debate in 1969. I am sure that the duly elected legislators of that time made decisions that they felt were right. But in the almost 20 years since then, many concepts of rights have developed, and these concepts became law. It is the obligation of Canada's legislators to respect these laws and use them to guide new legislation that we draft here. Canada's Charter of Rights and Freedoms was Parliament's answer to the need for entrenching rights for Canadians.

Our Charter states: "Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof". Now we have been shown by our Supreme Court that we had created a conflict between our Charter and a law, the former abortion law. Many Canadians feel that we need a new law now. Clearly, having no law is not a protection for those who need it. I believe that the unborn child has the right to life, liberty and security.

An examination of abortion legislation reveals that the unborn are the weakest element in the situation. If abortion affects them, then it holds that the law must include them, as well. If we follow our principle of protecting the weak, we have no choice but to legislate in their favour.

Some people seek a compromise between the rights of the unborn versus the rights for the mother. There may be a conflict between the two, but the route of compromise will not protect the weakest when they need it.

My fellow legislators are facing a major task. We must lead the way into the future based upon established principles and goals. Our long-standing principle of equality, fairness, and protection of rights has been entrenched within our Constitution and now we must always consider these guidelines. Therefore, I maintain without any reservation that to protect the weakest person in the matter of abortion, we need a law which takes this principle into account.

The Government stated its intention to draft abortion legislation from the will of the Commons expressed by this motion an interesting but flawed approach. It is flawed because the Government is putting forth a motion which cannot become a law, which does not protect the weak and which therefore permits the stronger forces of choice to prevail over the weak, unborn children. Why has the Government not introduced a Bill?

The Government maintains that it has a preferred position but is willing to seek the consensus of the House. Considering the majority of the Government in this House, that is, quite seriously, very considerate. Unfortunately, that considerate gesture is not what I, or many Canadians expect from their Government.

That is why this motion is inadequate. It addresses an urgent need, inadequately. This matter must be a Bill and become law soon. Canadians should not be asked to wait while the caucus of their Government presents various options. To delay this legislation is not a responsible government approach.

The absence of a law concerning abortion has left Canada permitting abortions in all circumstances because there is no prohibition. The Government's motion suggested continuing this permissive attitude with some very minor restrictions. Frankly, this is not acceptable.

Over the course of history, the medical profession and science in general have continually increased their accumulated knowledge. Each year more technical advances have permitted more understanding of life in general.

In the 20 years since 1969, medicine has achieved a new understanding of when life begins. These current definitions were not in place 20 years ago. To ignore the best scientific evidence of our times is to fly in the face of ignorance.

We now realize that a division of cells, which occurs shortly after the union of sperm and ovum at conception, can more clearly determine that a life has begun. Any medical procedure which might alter the natural course of events must take this fact into account.

As Members of Parliament, legislators must take seriously their leadership roles. One aspect of leadership is responsibility. Responsibility, in this case, means recognizing that life begins at conception. We must pass laws that protect the sanctity of life, as outlined in our Charter of Rights. Abortion, as an after-the-fact legal/medical remedy, is not a way for legislators to demonstrate leadership and responsibility. The Supreme Court of Canada did not tell Parliament it could not pass laws protecting the rights of the unborn. Nor were we told to pass legislation defining where abortions could be obtained and by whom. Parliament was instructed that rights must be considered and weighed. That is the bottom line of the message in my opinion.

I believe the state has no right to say an innocent life may be ended. Two individuals should not be able to make this decision either. What the state can do is accept valid medical evidence acquired since our last law was drafted. It can permit medical doctors to continue their tradition of upholding their oath namely, "That a medical practitioner's duty is to protect life". Do we want to say that the medical profession should ignore its oath? If, in an emergency, only one of two lives can be saved by a doctor, then the doctor must exercise an appropriate medical judgment.

I have repeatedly told my constituents that it is imperative Parliament move quickly in drafting new legislation which constitutionally guarantees and protects the right to life of the unborn. This motion actually states that abortion is not permitted except in certain circumstances. Yet one of those circumstances is when the pregnant woman chooses to abort. Clearly, Mr. Speaker, this is not a prohibition of abortion but, in my opinion, permission instead. That is not an acceptable state of affairs nor is it a tolerable route, and as a motion intended to lead toward law, I cannot support it. I cannot support anything short of protection of all Canadians, including the unborn, under our laws and our Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I believe that any compromise would allow forces to undermine our fundamental rights and freedoms. Unborn Canadians require the protection of legislation which grants them protection against abortion. I cannot put it more simply, Mr. Speaker.

There are many reasons for protecting the unborn against abortion. However, within the constraints of our debate the most basic reason I believe is that life starts at conception. The unborn child is deserving of the protection afforded under our laws. As a responsible Member of Parliament I believe all Canadians deserve to be treated equally.

I will support amendments to this motion which provide the full, legal protection of our Charter of Rights and Freedoms to unborn Canadian children. I will not support this motion as it now stands before us.

Mr. Bob Pennock (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, in this House tonight we are debating an issue which will have, quite literally, life or death consequences. With this in mind, we must carefully consider every avenue of this subject. In my opinion, it should not be dealt with as a religious debate but rather a sensitive moral and social issue though there are, of course, religious overtones.

We will never reach a consensus on the abortion issue. The scientific and medical communities are unable to reach agreement on many of the key elements of this argument. One example of this division is over the question of when life begins. When does it begin? At conception? When brain waves are detected? When the heart beats? Or at birth? In my opinion, life begins at conception. From that moment on there exists an individual with a genetic make-up that is different from both parents. At conception that individual has the potential to do or become anything.

The abortion debate is not about the miracle of life but rather how society deals with balancing rights. In every case where an abortion is wanted we have a woman with rights and, as the Supreme Court of this country pointed out, with aspirations and goals that may not include having a child. Chief Justice Dickson has said that:

> "Forcing women by threat of criminal sanctions to carry a foetus to term, unless she meets certain criteria unrelated to her own priorities and aspirations, is a profound interference with a woman's body and thus an infringement of security of the person."

Must the pregnant woman forfeit all rights, including in very extreme cases the right to live? If abortions are totally outlawed, as one extreme would have them, women with life threatening health problems would be forced to carry a child to term. I certainly cannot support that. The situation is further complicated by cases of rape and incest. Should an innocent woman impregnated against her will be forced to carry a child? I cannot support that. In any case, does anyone really believe that abortions can be totally eliminated simply because there is a law outlawing them? Has it worked with prostitution? Ask the young ladies working in the market area if they know that their profession, the world's oldest, is illegal? Of course, they know, but that does not stop them from plying their trade.

Our American neighbours outlawed alcohol during the prohibition years. This action simply moved the industry underground. Bathtub gin turned a profit for organized crime but the legislation did not stop Americans from drinking.

Abortions will be done, legally or illegally. I prefer to think of women entering hospitals receiving counselling and being informed of all their options. Education and counselling are the key to preventing abortions. Informing women of the possible psychological effect of having an abortion and letting them know what support services are available to new mothers may convince some about how to deal with the situation in ways other than abortion.

If through legislation we outlaw abortion, will we see a return to the days when desperate women went to unqualified practitioners who worked in unsanitary conditions? Having an abortion was more than emotionally scarring then. It could kill. No one wants to see that situation occur again. I certainly do not. Surely in this day and age we can provide the services needed, whether those services involve setting up adoptions, support groups for new mothers or abortions.

Society has coined a phrase "unwanted children". How can there be unwanted children in a country where childless couples, desperate to adopt, run ads in newspapers? Children can certainly be unplanned, but someone always wants them, though that someone may not be a biological parent.

Education and counselling, in my opinion, will do more to prevent the need for abortion than any restrictive law that any Government can draft. More attention should be spent on these two aspects of the abortion debate. It has been said that "an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure". I feel that education is our ounce of prevention. Preventing unplanned pregnancy is far better than ending it. Canadians of all ages should be encouraged to seek the proper educational tools in order to understand better the positive and negative realities surrounding abortions.

As legislators, we should encourage our provincial counterparts to use the educational system as a place to start informing our youth, tomorrow's leaders and possibly legislators about responsibility. Having said that, I would like to add that I do think that this Government has a duty to the Canadian people to give some direction through legislation and through this debate that we are in now.

As I said in my opening remarks, I feel that life begins at conception. Therefore the foetus has rights that deserve to be protected. Because of my personal belief, my intention is to vote for any reasonable amendment that does this. Should, however, that be defeated, then it would be my intention to vote for a compromise which would balance the rights of both woman and child.

In conclusion, the compromise position is one I can support as well because it would seem acceptable to the Supreme Court. It is my hope through this debate that we will be able to produce a law that will protect the unborn. I think it is very important that we understand that having at least some form of law by going for the compromise does not prevent us from working hard for improvements. A vacuum, though, which is what we would have if we were to defeat the main motion, if that is the one we eventually get to, will virtually mean abortion on demand. We must strive for some form of workable legislation through the debate that is occurring tonight.

We have all heard the critics say that we will not actually achieve anything through this debate or through voting on this motion. I for one do not believe that that is true. We hear people say that we would not be able to produce a law before an election, that we would not be able to draft the legislation. I fervently believe, however, that the direction and initiative that this House can provide the Government through this debate would be one that any new Government, I would hope, would have the gumption to take up from where we left off.

Mr. Barry Turner (Ottawa—Carleton): Mr. Speaker, abortion is wrong. I do not intend to cite in this debate chapter and verse of Canadian statistics or the statistics of other countries. Statistics are for losers. Abortion is wrong.

I will not quote Scripture or what others have said on this issue in recent hours, weeks, months or years. Abortion is wrong.

I will not try to give a scientific interpretation of human life or of foetal viability either. When I was elected to this House of Commons almost four years ago, I brought with me some fundamental Christian principles that I learned from my parents, from my teachers and from my church. One of my basic principles was reinforced during my working experiences in Africa and Central America and in my world travels. That is that life, indeed human life, is precious, is sacred and is what we strive to preserve and protect at all times. Abortion is wrong and no one can make it right.

The Supreme Court Justices have said to Parliament essentially that the old law on abortion is no longer applicable in Canada and that we can either leave well enough alone or make a new law that is acceptable. The state has decided, and rightly so, that Parliament should do something. I therefore commend the Government for allowing this debate to begin all over again, recognizing that as soon as we vote, debate will not end but will merely take a different twist along its endless path toward an impossible solution.

Nurses, doctors, lawyers, judges, parents, grandparents, aunts, uncles and people all over the world face this issue on a daily basis. We face it now as Parliamentarians. I say to our people that abortion is wrong.

We are talking about supporting option (a), option (b) or option (c), Motion 1, Motion 2 or Motion 3. Let me ask this question: what options does a foetus have? It has two only: life or death. If one were to ask a foetus what one he or she would prefer, we can be certain what the answer would be.

As foetal life gets more and more viable, more and more independent and more and more important as it gets older and therefore should be preserved, does the converse apply as we become more and more senior as we age, slow down and become less viable? Should it be destroyed? I think not, Sir, I think not. Can one therefore speak of abortion and euthanasia in the same breath? I think not.

We cannot quantify the quality of life with some arbitrary time frame. Life is life, from conception to natural death. Abortion is wrong, Sir.

The fundamental principle that I learned as a child and as a young man and that I now apply as a Parliamentarian is that the preservation of life is the most important goal of any civilized society. As Dr. Albert Schweitzer said, if a man loses reverence for any part of life, he will lose reverence for all life.

The line we are trying to divide between a woman's right to choose and the unborn's right to live is simply indivisible. As long as it is the normal practice for women to conceive and to deliver children, that unique privilege and those unborn children must be respected and protected. The right to control one's body does not imply the right to destroy another person's body.

Some people may say to me: "Barry, you are out of touch with the times. Women have changed. Economic necessities have changed. Social priorities have changed. Our laws have changed". All this true, Sir, but what has not changed is conception, pregnancy and childbirth. No one can change that and no one ever will. The process of childbirth simply must be protected. Perhaps the times are out of touch with the historical reality that human life, born and unborn, is what we are all about.

Our Charter and our laws have been written by people. They will be rewritten by people. This debate is about what is right and what is wrong. It should not be about what someone thinks he or she should be allowed to do or not to do.

I am not here to condemn anyone. I am here to say and to do what I think is right. Canadians need more people, not fewer. Abortion is wrong, and I will vote accordingly.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of difficulty that I enter into this debate, in part because I think the majority of the Members we have heard from on this issue, while I recognize that they are certainly concerned about human life and about the protection of the unborn, can only speak about abortion in a very theoretical sense. They are men. They cannot get pregnant. They cannot bear children. They cannot know the pain and uncertainty involved in carrying a foetus that may have no brain or may have other problems.

While, unlike some, I do believe that men certainly have a right to participate in this debate, I find it extremely difficult to listen to the over-all tone of the Members who would speak in a very black-and-white fashion on this issue when they themselves will never, ever be faced with the possibility of having to undergo an abortion. That being said, when I thought about my participation in this debate, I thought about what I would like to be able to tell my daughter when she reaches the age at which she will begin to understand the meaning of human life and begin to understand what it means to conceive and to bear a child. I have to say, all theories aside, that I think everyone of us truly believes that human life begins at the moment of conception. I do not think we can pick a time in the second or third or whatever month when somehow human life miraculously takes on a new form. A foetus does represent human life in its very earliest stages.

One of the things that caused me to come to the debate tonight was that I was sitting at home watching some of the participants on television. One Member said all of the women who had spoken were all "pro choice". That provoked me to enter the debate because I think that women, like men, represent the broad range and broad spectrum of opinion on this issue. I do not think there is one homogenous voice speaking out and saying this is what is right or this is what is wrong.

Unlike the previous speaker I do not think this country or the world sees this issue in black and white. I do think, in particular because I have the capacity to bear a child and because I have borne a child, as a woman I have a special responsibility to respect the nature of life and the nature of conception. I know that for myself I could never, I do not believe, undergo an abortion.

We have received admonitions from the Cardinal to examine our consciences. I think most of the admonitions really fell somewhat short of the mark because I think anyone who has participated in this debate has sought counsel. If they are of a religious nature, they have prayed. They have sought guidance. As an individual participating in this debate I certainly believe that I have a responsibility to sanctify and respect the beginning of human life from conception. I also have a point where I have to look at my role as a legislator and my own conscience. I have to ask myself whether, given the moral choice and the moral decision that I make, that I could not undergo an abortion and hope my daughter would never undergo an abortion, that can be translated into an amendment to the Criminal Code or whether it can be translated into some kind of over-all edict for the Canadian people.

I have to tell you that at this point the Government is asking for guidance. I think the Government should take guidance from the fact that notwithstanding the public opinion polls, notwithstanding what I perceive to be in some cases a focus on the choice of the woman without consideration of or specific recognition of the rights of the foetus, we in Parliament should send a message that we must respect life. If we do not, if we say that the lives of the unborn at a certain stage are worth dispensing with and at a certain stage are not worth dispensing with, we are then setting the stage for trivialization of human life in its early stages.

I think about the elderly. I think about other people who may or could be expendable. Someone says if I have an amnio and that baby is retarded do I want to carry it to term? Those are moral choices and moral decisions that we all have to make. I personally have come to terms with that decision but I also think that in a pluralistic Parliament we need to have some recognition that each person in Canada has to make that moral choice for themselves. It cannot be made by someone who cannot bear a child under all circumstances, but certainly a direction and message can be sent to the Government about the kind of legislation we would like to see brought forward.

I do not see that in this resolution. I see a gutless government. I see a Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn) who is not even prepared to speak on the issue, to put his views on the record. I see a resolution, not even introduced in the form of a Bill, which attempts to be all things to all people.

I expect that no matter what views a person puts on the record, whether they be perceived as pro-choice or pro-life or somewhere in the middle, they may not be accepted by all the people. Yet the Canadian people are struggling for some answers and they expect parliamentarians to put their views on the record. I do not think they particularly respect the position of the Government which sat on the issue for six months, leaving us with no abortion law. Unlike some who believe we are better off with no law, I think we should have a law. We should have restrictions and recognitions which balance the rights of the woman and the foetus but which in particular respect the fact that a foetus is an unborn human being.

I think a lot of us would like to put that aside from time to time and step away, but in the over-all scheme of human life, anyone who has conceived will know that once they have a fertilized egg, they have the potential for human life growing within them.

I am not here to come down with the definitive law. I will not support the amendment put forward by a Member who believes abortion should be permitted under no circumstances except where the life of the mother is in danger, because I think there may be other mitigating circumstances. I do not believe that a child or teenager or a women who is raped should necessarily have to carry that foetus to term. I do not believe the fruits of incest should necessarily be carried to term. I think there are other circumstances, and while I would certainly ask the Government to come forward with a Bill that hopefully combines some of the wisdom of the Supreme Court judgment, because I do not think we can totally set that aside, yet it has taken some time to look at one side of the issue and that is the rights of the mother. We have not yet seen the issue of the rights of the foetus.

I think the Bill to be introduced by the Government should strike a balance between those two areas and I do not see that in this resolution. I do not see it in the comments made by many Members who have spoken in support of the Government's position. I see a weak-kneed, gutless, hypocritical approach by a government that does not want to say where it stands and would like to have several positions on the matter.

I urge the Minister of Justice to come forward specifically with a Bill. More than six months have passed since the judgment and there is no law governing abortion in this country. I do not think we can treat abortion simply like any other medical operation. We have to bring forward sanctions, limitations, and it is up to Parliament and its members. This is where I feel the ultimate dilemma lies. It is up to us as Members to strike a balance between our own strongly held views which say that we find abortion morally wrong, that we find the killing of a foetus reprehensible. At the same time, in Parliament I am called upon by the people of my riding to come forward with a piece of legislation which can best reflect the hopes and aspirations of all my constituents and, in particular, which can best reflect the hopes and aspirations of women because women are not particularly being represented in this debate.

That being said, I do not think this is a black and white issue. I do not think we can simply say yes or no. We must send a strong message that we want very specific legislation. We must send a strong message that we want strong recognition of the right of the foetus, recognition that a foetus is an unborn human being.

What I as a parliamentarian say on this issue is not going to be judged by the people in an election. Surely they can make a decision and keep me in or throw me out. Ultimately the decision made by a woman on the issue of abortion, within the limited parameters that should be established by legislation, is a decision between herself and her creator. It is a decision about the moral choices she makes for herself. The Supreme Court said quite clearly that in a pluralistic society we must recognize that a woman may choose the moral option for herself. It is not for Parliament to say specifically that in all cases it is absolutely impossible in the same way as it is not possible, I believe, for Parliament to leave the situation in limbo.

I cannot support the Government's resolution. I have not seen the many amendments. Frankly, the process is ridiculous. We will be seeing the amendments tomorrow morning at eleven o'clock and voting on them an hour later in an issue of this gravity.

I hope that the Minister of Justice will come forward with specific legislation, a Bill which is amendable and can respond to some of the concerns which have been expressed, even by groups like the Canadian Medical Association which asked "What is a qualified medical practitioner?" What about the issue of the other helping professions and the other health professions in terms of the service of delivering an abortion? Do they have the right to say no?

These issues were not addressed in the three-headed resolution which became a one-headed resolution which is a wrong-headed resolution. I hope that the Minister of Justice will come out from behind the curtains, speak to the issue, and show the country the direction in which he would like to take us, bearing in mind that the vast majority of Canadians, recognizing the pluralistic society in which we live, want to have a law brought forward which respects life, respects the foetus, respects the unborn. They want a law which says that our society does not treat human beings as a disposable commodity, that we believe that every human being has value and that that value extends from the moment of conception until the time they are buried.

If we bring forward a law which tries to balance some of the pluralistic moral decisions and moral judgments which have to be made by women specifically on this most difficult issue with the recognition that both men and women have a responsibility to support the sanctity of life in every way possible, including in specific legislative measures, we will all be the better for it. I do not think we will have a perfect law. I do not think that any law we will bring forward will satisfy all sides on the issue. However, I think we will strike a balance and it will be a step toward a greater strengthening of the recognition of the rights of humanity.

I opened by saying that I wanted to speak to my daughter. I was probably influenced even more to speak to my father. My father has been sick for very many years. If you have a notion that that somehow diminishes the value of human life you could say that perhaps a person like my father does not have a need to live. It was determined at one point that he would be a vegetable but he has gradually brought himself away from that. The concern that I have about the recognition of the sanctity of life is that if, as a society, we say on the one hand that we can do away with one part of the human family at one end of the scale, that sets the stage for doing away at the other end of the scale. We then tell our elderly that they are no longer workable and no longer contributing to society.

Even though I recognize that in the context of Parliament those directions have to be decided by Parliament, I believe that we must bring forward a resolution which, in the larger context, respects the continuity of human life. In that context it provides protection, not only for the unborn but for those who are at the end of their lives. In the human continuum the legislation which the Government should be considering should give very strong recognition to the rights of the unborn bearing in mind that the moral decision which a woman takes when she undergoes an abortion is subject, not only to Parliament and the laws of Canada, but to her own conscience and to the laws of her maker.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles-Eugène Marin (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I will keep it short, since a number of previous speakers have for hours now been describing various points of view that I share wholly or in part.

Mr. Speaker, we must begin by remembering that pregnancy is not an illness, and therefore does not automatically require an abortion. As a doctor I know there are high-risk pregnancies that do require medical intervention, after study and after discussion with the parties involved. That having been said, the Supreme Court decision on abortion was for many Canadians including me, a position we find difficult to accept. It is of course obvious that Supreme Court decisions are based on points of law and not just on historical precedent, religious facts or social evolution. If this is fortunate in some cases, it is extremely unfortunate that we must have recourse to the law in matters as important as the life or death of human beings. I do not believe we have the right to deal out death on demand to a human being, especially to a human being without defences, like a foetus.

There may be situations that call for medical intervention in a pregnancy. But I emphasize that it is unacceptable to have a law permitting abortion in demand or as a method of birth control, as is the case in certain countries.

As a doctor who once swore to help human beings and not to destroy them, Mr. Speaker, I will vote against the motion under consideration. It is not sufficiently clear and precise. I will also vote against any proposition that could trap me in one of the two extremist positions, either abortion on demand or the impossibility of obtaining a therapeutic abortion.

Mr. Speaker, I am expressing the opinion of the people of Gaspé, 85 per cent of whom have spoken out against free abortion.

To be here today to uphold this position, I drove 1,400 kilometres in my car. I wanted to demonstrate that people can be both disciplined and courageous. It is obvious that there will be people who will see my action differently. They can say I was foolish, and that it doesn't take any courage to drive for twelve hours.

What I wanted to express here, Mr. Speaker, is that abortion and all the languages we use about abortion are perceived so differently by each and every one of us that before we can reach a decision it is vital that the proposition be clear and precise and that it determine and define its terms.

[English]

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I enter this debate with some hesitancy. I have been here all day listening to my colleagues speak on the resolution before the House. Obviously, in the days leading up to this debate I have been thinking about policies that affect abortion and, of course, this is not the first time I have had to consider this question.

Let me begin by saying that I do not enter this debate with any absolute certainty about my stance on the issue. That is not to say I have not made a decision about how I will vote, because I have, but my attitude is similar to the attitude of the scientist who understands that whatever theory one posits, greater knowledge and testing and awareness may tear that theory apart.

Having listened to what others have said, and having participated in the discussion at my own caucus, I was ready to go home tonight as the clock approached midnight. In fact, I had left the parliamentary precincts, but while I was waiting for my bus I thought about what I would have said if I was here. Since the bus was late, I decided to put my thoughts on the record.

In so doing, I hope I can give some meaning to the vote tomorrow when we will make a decision whether to sit in one's seat or stand to vote. I want to give my constituents and anyone else who cares to take note the meaning I apply to those actions.

The context in which I place this whole debate is about what we value the most, on what we place the greatest emphasis, and what is the greatest need for society today. While I do not often say this in public debates, I believe that we have a real need as a society and individuals for a spiritual awakening. Human beings must be valued more than anything else in the world. That is the fundamental context within which I approach this question.

The Government has failed the challenge that was placed before it by the Supreme Court decision. It has failed to provide real leadership in the House by bringing in legislation and setting a direction. The amendments moved by our Party states that the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "effect" and in the first paragraph substitute therefor: "Law and government policy should respect the principle that the decision whether or not to terminate a pregnancy should be that of the woman involved in consultation with a qualified medical practitioner and that the procedure should be performed by a qualified medical practitioner, and further should ensure that the Canada Health Act and regulations are amended to ensure the quality of access throughout Canada".

There are two elements to this statement. First, the decision about an abortion would be made by a woman in consultation with her doctor. That is our party policy and I want to say up front that I support that party policy.

Second, the amendment talks about legislation. We are not saying that we should throw open the door without regard to how things will be done, but that there will be some law in place to provide guidance and the decision will be made by the woman in consultation with her doctor. Those are fundamentals of the amendment we have moved. The question of abortion is a profound spiritual and moral question.

It is not a legal question or an economic question or a political question. It is a moral question. Usually in moral matters we look to the churches for leadership. However, the churches today will not give us a clear road-map. On the one hand, there is the United Church whose position could be designated as pro-choice and, on the other hand, we have the Catholic Church, of which I am a member, whose position is pro-life. The churches do not provide us with the kind of spiritual and moral leadership, a clarity of direction we need to make these decisions. It falls upon the shoulders of political leaders, therefore, to provide the moral fibre and leadership. Otherwise we are left in a vacuum.

I have said where I stand with respect to the subject before us. However some might like to, we cannot solve the challenge of abortions through legislative means alone. It has been said in this House tonight that in a country like Brazil with very strict laws against abortion a million abortions take place, so strict laws which seek to put an end to abortion do not work. In other countries such as Norway and Sweden, which have education, the number of abortions have dropped. We need some perspective on non-legislative action.

I think it is essential that if we are to minimize the number of abortions we ought to have contraceptive means readily available. There should be very good sex education. Young people approaching the age at which they are capable of reproduction should have the information. They should know the facts so they can appreciate the risks they are facing if they choose to engage in sexual activity. I think that is fundamental.

Beyond that we should make available to our youth education in human relationships. We should teach them how to build intimate human relationships, how to build trust with another human being, how to communicate with another human being so that they do not confuse sexual activity with a need to experience a warm human touch, so that they do not conclude that the only way they can receive the loving warm human touch is through genital sexual activity. I would say we must teach our children how to build intimate human relationships.

A number of non-legislative things could be done to reduce the number of abortions. Other speakers have mentioned that we should have programs for young women who choose to take their pregnancy to term so that they have adequate support.

I want to mention another area of importance. Once we have the laws and programs in place and once we have reduced abortions to a minimum, surely that is not the end of the story. It is only the beginning. What we will be faced with then is children being born who are wanted. What happens to the human being after birth? I think that is a fundamental aspect of what we are faced with today. What do we choose to value? First, the family has to be the first place in which the human is valued above all else—above economic activity, above the hustle and bustle of life, above all the strains modern society puts on parents. We have to put into practice ways of living so that we nurture our children. We must reinforce the positive esteem of our children. The family is the place to start in terms of how we live together, and society has to support the family.

There should be adequate day care. There should be programs that will ensure that families and their children no longer have to live below the poverty line. We should ensure that families and their children no longer have to live without a roof over their heads, which is something that is happening today. We should ensure that families and their children no longer have to go to the Sally Ann to get something to eat, as is the case in the city I represent.

If we really value the human person, if we really think the challenge we are facing is a moral challenge, then we have to support the family. A crucial part of supporting the family is not only social programs and educational programs which are necessary, but the parents who are responsible for these children must have the opportunity to work. They must have decent work which gives them a fair income so they can have a just part of the material rewards of our society. That is part of valuing the human being above all else. The women in these families should be able to work for wages that are equal to that of men, rather than 60 per cent as it is today. That is a part of valuing the human person above the whims of the market.

Valuing the human person means that above all else we want to ensure our environment is not only healthy but beautiful. We want to be able to see the stars and breathe in the fragrance of flowers. The bottom line is that we are in favour of economic growth because we need employment for our families. We want to make new distinctions, that we will no longer pollute this planet and destroy it because we know that pollution is a threat to our very survival and, therefore, it is fundamentally a spiritual question.

If we value the human being above all else, then we will be able to tackle the challenge of how to reduce and eliminate nuclear arms on this planet. Those nuclear arms threaten the survival and the continuation of the human experience. If we really value one another, then we will be in a position to take the steps that will lead to the eradication of the pollution of poverty from this planet which also threatens our very survival.

I wish to sum up by saying that I feel that the challenge we face when asked to address the question of abortion is fundamentally a question which asks us what we value most. I think the answer that has to come from all of us at our best is that what we value most is the human person. If that is what we are willing to state, and if that is what we are willing to live, then what we will have is a spiritual reawakening of our society and our planet. That will give us the wherewithal to make life worth while to live after people are born and to make it possible for them to continue to live on this planet. If we value that, then it means we will take care to see that our children have the education and the assistance they need in order to avoid unwanted pregnancies. It also means that we will have the courage to set a direction on very difficult questions which divide our society, such as what kind of national policy we shall have for abortion.

As I said at the beginning of my remarks, my Party proposes that the decision be made by a woman and her doctor and that there be legislation in this area.

I appreciate having had the opportunity to speak in this debate. I want to say that I only spoke after thinking very deeply about the question before the House.

Mr. John Gormley (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to take part this evening in what is for all Members of Parliament an historic debate. It is worth noting for the record that it is approaching 1.30 a.m. I was fortunate enough to get the last flight out of Saskatchewan earlier tonight, which gave me the opportunity to take part in this debate.

As we speak, and I know that all my colleagues share this view, we speak of a sense of our own conscience and our own view on this issue, as well as our own concern, and attempt to represent the voices and the convictions of our constituents. As a Member of Parliament who has consistently in other votes before the House and in speeches taken what is called a pro-life position, this is an opportunity for me to convey further to the House, and in so doing to my thousands of constituents who have thought so long and so hard on this issue, my views on the resolution before us.

The present status of this issue in Canada stems from a Supreme Court of Canada ruling on January 28 of this year. That ruling found that certain provisions of Section 251 of the Criminal Code violated a woman's right to security of the person. Upon close consideration of the judgment written by the justices of the Supreme Court, and in consultation with people much more learned than I in law, I have come to the conclusion that while the court ruling did, not surprisingly, rule out parts of Section 251, it did not preclude this Parliament or future Parliaments from enacting a law that gives strong protection to the right of life of the unborn.

As a Member of Parliament who is profoundly concerned about this issue, I am faced with three choices in analysing the issue of abortion. They are the ethical consideration, the legal consideration, and the practical consideration. I want to talk about this resolution before us and how it meets the test of the ethical, legal, and practical considerations.

First, this resolution was a sensible way to go about dealing with this issue by Members of the House of Commons. The issue before us was slow in coming because it was debated for some time by members of all three Parties and by the public at large. The resolution before us is a generally worded so-called middle position. It is open to a number of amendments, and it will be amended by members of all three Parties who have a particular view.

I cannot support the basic resolution as it stands. I believe it does not meet the tests of ethical, legal, and practical considerations. What I am concerned about most in this resolution is the provision that abortion would be essentially a matter between a woman and her physician with no legal sanction or no legal concern up until a certain period in the pregnancy, whereafter the issue would then be dealt with if there were certain conditions that stood in the way of the pregnancy coming to its natural term.

In 1988, I am deeply troubled by the legal view that one can draw an arbitrary time-limit on when in fact we should legislate a right to life. The Supreme Court Justices challenged Parliament to provide a law that would deal with a mutual balance between the mother and the unborn. The Supreme Court of Canada challenged Members of Parliament to define the right of life to the unborn. I believe we can rise to that challenge in a better, more specific way than this resolution does.

At this point I want to indicate to members of the public who will be following this issue what this resolution means. The passage of the resolution before us, or the passage of an amended resolution—and I dearly hope it will be amended—will not immediately change the law. The resolution simply adds a direction to Parliament that should be followed in the drafting of a specific piece of legislation regarding abortion. I think it is reasonable to assert that after this debate and after the vote it might be some time before a specific piece of legislation is before this House. That is why it is of fundamental importance to the voters of Canada to examine the record of their Members on this issue and to watch closely how they vote on the resolution. That will be a determination of those citizens and the people they put here who will largely determine this specific piece of legislation when it is to come forward.

How will I vote on this resolution? I do not support the resolution as it stands because I do not believe it specifically enough deals with the question of a right to life for the unborn. I will vote for amendments to the resolution which will more clearly and specifically afford a strong right to life of the unborn person.

I wish to reflect for a few moments on why I came to that decision. What we are debating tonight and what we have been debating for the past day is a question of the inherent value of human life.

Twenty years ago, in the late 1960s before Parliament brought in the last abortion law which was subsequently struck down by the Supreme Court this year, there was some genuine debate on the scientific merits of life in utero. No longer do many of the assumptions of the 1960s stand. We have seen the issue evolve over the years from when does life begin to the current argument of choice and rights. The reason we have seen that happen is that there is clearly no scientific debate any longer on when life begins. It is an unacceptable move for this Parliament or any other arbitrarily to set a gestational period where that life should receive protection. It takes away or derogates from an inherent right to life that all reasonable thinking Canadians accept; there is a right to life and there is a value to human life. When one begins arbitrarily to set a time when the unborn life has sufficient value to protect legally, one may also at some point set an arbitrary time on the other end of the spectrum, when life can still be protected in old age, in infirmity, or disability. To confer upon any Parliament or any group of 295 Canadians the ability to decide when life becomes viable to protect is a power that should not be given to earthly things.

When one starts to talk about the issue of viability and protecting life, one often hears the word "wanted". For example, an unwanted pregnancy and every child a wanted child are two slogans that we have heard at great length tonight. There may be unplanned pregnancies, and there may be inopportune pregnancies, but the question of "wantedness" is not something that should be discussed in a reasonable society when it is concerned with human life. Life is not something that one can want or unwant. The very existence of life merits its protection.

That leads me to the question of legal interpretation of this issue. It should follow that logically we can afford protection to the unborn as a member of the human family, in the same way we afford protection to the chronically ill, the disabled, or those individuals who are innocent, defenceless, and too weak to defend themselves. Why should we not then legally afford the same protection?

I want to address an issue that has often been brought to me as a pro-life Member of Parliament. Sometimes critics ask, how can Members of Parliament vote as they did one year ago for a resolution favouring capital punishment, yet against the issue of abortion. There is no ethical or logical inconsistency in those positions. It is defensible to hold that view from a strictly legal and ethical point of view. In the capital punishment debate we talked about a right to life, about nobody arbitrarily depriving any Canadian of a right to life. However, there is the view held by Members of Parliament that for the greater good of a society or a community, the state in certain circumstances might abrogate that right to life. The state might do that to protect members of society or to deter serious crime. A decision to take away a right to life is a decision that the state undertakes. It is a decision that the state would take in countries where capital punishment is in the legal books, based on aforethought or a knowledge of the individual who has violated those laws.

When one turns one's thoughts to the very sensitive abortion issue we are debating this evening, is the individual who is being deprived of life by a societal decision guilty of an offence that threatens that society? Is that individual guilty of taking away the rights of others in society? Must society be protected from that individual? Clearly the unborn is not in a position to pose that threat to our society, and to take away that right legally by the state saying that there is a greater good simply is not consistent.

I want to reflect on the practical issue of abortion. There has been a great deal of discussion on statistics in this debate, and I want to deal with several quickly. This Government has an admirable record in promoting and encouraging immigration. In the next year 130,000 people will come to Canada as a result of the Government's policies. It is recognized by all thinking Members of this House and of Canadian society that we need new people in Canada in order to enrich the cultural heritage and the value of our country, and to enrich the economic prospects that will enable our country to have the secure type of future that it deserves. We believe there should be 130,000 new people in Canada next year and that number will continue to rise in future years. Last year we aborted half that number.

There were 65,000 abortions performed in Canada last year, in the same country that requires repopulation through immigration, through the opening of our horizons. I am a strong proponent of more immigration, but if we are pursuing certain immigration policies because our population is below zero replacement, I would suggest that perhaps we turn our thoughts to our own population issues, and the most crucial issue of why and how we have a situation that allows 65,000 abortions a year to take place.

Earlier I spoke on the concept of wantedness. In my Province of Saskatchewan there are 1,200 families on the adoption waiting lists. There are 1,200 families out of a small population of one million people. Last year in Saskatchewan more than 1,200 unborn children were aborted. Those children were wanted by at least 1,200 couples who, through no fault of their own, are not able to conceive and have their own children.

I want to impress upon Members in this debate the importance of leadership, leadership in a political and moral sense, and the need not only to deal with this issue in the isolated focus of abortion. It is not acceptable for Canadian people or for Members of Parliament to call themselves pro-life and yet work against the certain necessities in Canadian life that will enhance the lives of all citizens. I often call it a deception where someone may be pro-birth but not pro-life. We have to strive for the type of Canadian society that does not look with scorn on the kid who made a mistake and then made a very brave decision to keep that child. We cannot continue to have the type of society that does not provide the necessary social services for single mothers, day care for young working mothers, or single fathers who go through with the decision not to deprive a child of the right to life.

It is of critical importance that Members work toward promoting the type of Canadian society that is aware of family planning values, that is aware of responsible sexuality, that is aware of the need to support those people who have children. I caution against the view expressed by certain Members in the House tonight that, because we have not yet reached that state, we should simply abdicate our responsibility on the abortion issue. I do not think that is a responsible view.

If we can be aware of the inherent indignity and the right to life of Canadians, if we have to be working and striving continuously to ensure that we have the type of social programs in place to preserve and promote that dignity, that value, and that right to life, is it appropriate to say that we do not have the social safety net as high as we would like it and as strongly woven as we would like it? Do we then just turn our back on the question of protecting the unborn? I do not think that it is a responsible view, with respect to those Members who hold it, to say that it is a matter of choice.

Scientifically and genetically, morally and legally we are aware that Canadian society should have advanced past the view that it is simply a choice.

In conclusion, this vote will lead, as a pattern of guidance, Parliament to draft a new Bill. I have, in my first four years as a Member of Parliament, spoken to thousands of Canadians across this land, and hundreds within my own constituency, on this issue. It is an issue that I feel passionately about and feel that we must address as responsible parliamentarians.

I do not think that I am a zealot or a whacko or a crazy or a narrow-minded bigot. I pulled those words from some publications by those who do not support the view that I take. I think that this issue must be dealt with and it must be dealt with now.

It is my view that in this debate and in future debates, perhaps in future Parliaments when we will deal with the drafting of this Bill or when we will deal with other Supreme Court cases, we should address the issue of protecting a right to life of the unborn.

I hope that in my opportunity to speak this evening I have had a chance to lay out some of my concerns. I want to simply reiterate for my constituents, for the people of The Battlefords—Meadow Lake who have supported me on this issue so strongly in the past four years, that in this vote, in the drafting of a Bill, and in future years of this Parliament, I hope to continue representing them, secure in the knowledge that we shall work together to build a humane Canadian society, a tolerant and a compassionate Canadian society that realizes the value of its weakest, most defenseless members, those people most needing of our protection—the innocents, the unborn.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Aurèle Gervais (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour and a privilege to be given the opportunity to speak on a most sensitive issue, namely, abortion. Abortion is undoubtedly one of the most sensitive and complex moral issues ever brought before the Canadian Parliament. It is one that in one way or another concerns and touches all of us.

First of all I would like to thank my colleagues on the government side for having brought this issue before the House for debate. The easy thing for the Government to do would have been to duck the issue until after the next election, but my colleagues in government chose otherwise. They chose to face the issue squarely and to have it debated in this House. For that I congratulate and thank them. I also commend the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), the Cabinet, and my colleagues for graciously allowing all Members on this side of the House to debate and vote freely on the issue, according to our conscience and without being lobbied or pressured in any way whatsoever.

I will be very brief because the hour is getting late, it being 1.45 a.m. However, I would like to make two points in this debate which are very important to me. They are so important that I chose voluntarily to remain in the House until this later hour to make them and to have them recorded.

First, it has been stated in a very unkind and unfair way by both opposition Parties that this Government abdicated its responsibility by introducing a motion instead of a Bill. By virtue of the wide divergence of viewpoints held by Members in all three caucuses, it would have been an exercise in futility to attempt to introduce a specific Bill on abortion and hope to have it passed by Members of this House.

Bill after Bill might have been introduced and voted down by this House because of a lack of consensus. Imagine the tremendously long period of time that it would have taken to introduce Bill after Bill in attempts to get it approved. Instead, this Government had the good sense to introduce a motion, subject to as many amendments as necessary to accommodate the wishes of all Members of Parliament from all three Parties.

In whichever form the motion or the motion as amended finally receives approval, it will give the Government a definite idea of the position of the House on this issue. It will enable the Government to introduce a Bill which will have an excellent chance of getting quick approval and finally give Canada a law governing abortion.

Second, I wish to state my position on abortion. I have listened with an open mind to all of my constituents who have approached me to discuss the issue, but in the final analysis my concern kept coming back to the unborn child.

The information I received when seeking expert medical and scientific advice is that life begins at conception. I therefore find it my duty as a citizen, as a Member of Parliament, and as a Christian to protect life whenever and wherever it must be protected. This conviction is even stronger in dealing with the unborn child that does not have the opportunity to speak for himself or herself. Therefore, my position—and it is a very strong one—is that an abortion should only be allowed when two independent qualified medical practitioners have, in good faith, on reasonable ground, and in writing, stated that in their opinion the continuation of the pregnancy would or would likely endanger the life of the pregnant woman or when a woman has been impregnated by rape or is a victim of incest.

I have been asked to give my opinion concerning abortion on many occasions since the election campaign of 1984. My answer has always been constant, as previously stated.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, my position is very firm. An abortion should only be performed when two qualified and independent practitioners have stated in good faith and on reasonable grounds, in writing, that in their opinion the pregnancy endangers the life of the pregnant woman, or when the pregnancy is the result of rape or incest.

Mr. Speaker, I have been asked for my opinion on abortion many many times since the 1984 elections. My response has always been the same, it has always been what I have just enunciated.

[English]

I thank you for giving me the opportunity to speak.

Mr. Léo Duguay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, as time approaches two o'clock in the morning, I think all of us will reflect on why we are here and recognize the importance of making a statement on behalf of our constituents on what is a very, very important moral issue.

Having spent nearly 20 years of my life working with young people, I think I have grown to have a sense of feeling for what children mean to us as Canadians. My first principle in discussing abortion has always been that life begins at conception.

Some time ago, while working on the parliamentary task force on child care, I had an opportunity to write part of the preface to that report. In it I tried to describe what we as Canadians felt about our children. Our children deserve care. We owe this to them, not only because they are ours but because they are the expression of our hope for the future. As we strive to make a better world for them so will they direct their efforts to their own children. In this way our children will grow beyond us carrying our memories, our dreams, and our beliefs about how our lives and theirs can be made better. How we allocate our country's resources is a reflection of our faith in the future. How we respond to our children's needs is a measure of our society's integrity. If we do not provide for our children, we will have no future. The foundation of our nation has always been the families to which children belong.

Different kinds of families exist. All require our support, some more than others. The provision of adequate financial and human resources to the family by government and by other institutions in our society is an essential investment in our society. We have always tried to talk about the rights of Canadians and the rights of Canada. In this declaration I was referring to the values and the rights which the country has as distinct from those which individuals want.

Over the course of the last four years I, as many other Members of Parliament, have received numerous letters on the matter of abortion. I have responded to all by saying very clearly that I would not support legislation which promotes abortion. After all, who is it in our society who would consider becoming or getting pregnant in order to have an abortion? No one does that. I have always said that I would propose legislation which enforces the equal responsibility that men share with women for the children they conceive.

Why is it that our society continues to say that men are but sowing their wild oats while women who are promiscuous are said to be loose? We have been allowing a double standard for many generations. It is very clear that women bear the brunt of unwanted pregnancies. I have suggested that our Government should support alternatives, the prevention of unwanted pregnancies, the counselling of women who are pregnant, and adoption. All these things would reduce the demand for abortion. Abortion is a cure to a problem that already exists. The answer for our Government and for Canadians would always lie in making sure that there are as few unwanted pregnancies as possible.

Having said all these things, it is very clear to me that the principle of the resolution being introduced by the Government is one that is consistent with the Constitution of Canada. It includes the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. It reflects the fundamental value and inherent dignity of each human being and the worth of human life. It would achieve a balance between the right of a woman to liberty and security of her person and the responsibility of society to protect the unborn. When one looks as those balances all of us are called upon to make judgments, in this case moral judgments and value judgments. Mine will be reflected in the way in which I cast my vote tomorrow. It will go back to my fundamental principles.

I will not support legislation which promotes abortion. I would propose legislation which enforces the equal responsibility that men share with women for the children they conceive.

I would support alternatives, that is, the prevention of unwanted pregnancies, counselling, and adoption support which reduce the demand for abortion.

With regard to the resolution amendments before us tomorrow, I think the appropriate balance between the right of liberty of a woman and the right of the unborn is that abortion should not be permitted unless the life of the woman is in jeopardy, unless there is a serious health problem, or unless the woman has been the victim of rape or incest. I will tomorrow be casting my vote in the manner consistent with those principles.

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise this morning to speak on a subject matter that concerns myself and many of my constituents. Over the last few months and as late as yesterday, I have spoken to many people with regard to the abortion issue, from doctors to policemen, even to the ticket agent at the London airport on my way to Ottawa. I have found that most everyone has an opinion on this touchy subject.

As I stated in the 1984 election, and my position has not changed, I have never supported the use of abortion as a method of birth control. I am deeply touched by current statistics which I received showing that the overwhelming number of teenage pregnancies and corresponding abortions taking place in London in 1986 rose to 56 per cent. Teenagers represent the largest proportion using abortion of any age group in my city, let alone the country. As a former educator in the London secondary school system I have seen many a teary eyed student who has found herself facing this predicament. It is one that will warrant a decision that ultimately will change the rest of her life.

Preventative medicine in the form of an integrated educational program including parents, doctors, community resources, and all levels of government is the number one goal which our Government should reach. The fruition of this program will prepare Canada for the 21st century. It should give our youth the knowledge for healthy sexuality and also hold values for life. For this reason I have presented an amendment to the government abortion Motion No. 36 which reads: "The Government of Canada is committed to the sponsorship of initiatives which lead to comprehensive programs that foster the development of knowledge for a healthy sexuality for all Canadians. The Minister of National Health and Welfare shall encourage and assist provincial Governments to support and develop programs aimed at both parental and youth levels which will lead to a better understanding of human sexuality and the value of human life".

I have faith in our youth. If they are armed at a young age with a good understanding, indeed are imbibed with a healthy human sexuality, they will not find themselves making forced choices on the beds of the hospitals of Canada. Clearly I have taken a different tact. I feel that a lot of the discussion has been based on the legalities of the motion put forward for us to decide. If we are talking about the liberty of the woman versus the rights of the unborn, we have to establish with the young people not only an understanding of sexuality but also develop their values which they will hold for life. If those values for life are high, well entrenched by the young people of today, as well as by future generations, then the problem with which we are faced today will not have to be met. In other words, abortions will be on the decline.

This is what we are all striving for. We want this problem that besets our society to go away, but it will not go away in the present setting. I feel that we have not, as a Government or a country, addressed the issue. Our young have to have the information. All levels of governments, associations, people, parents, and kids in the communities must become involved in understanding and developing a value for life, together with the actions to carry out that value system. We have fallen far short. It should be addressed as a national priority by the Government, and we have a great opportunity to do this.

Sexuality and the questions surrounding it have been raised recently as a result of AIDS, what that disease has done, and the potential it will have for society. Our society is ready now to grapple with abortion and with questions of sexuality on a wide scale. The future of Canada will manifest itself safely and securely, if we provide the leadership and a constant inflow of information and resources so that young people can make quality decisions, not forced choices. This is my major concern.

Addressing that and knowing the situation today, I look tomorrow to the main motion. I have some reservations about it but I can see support for that motion, knowing full well that abortion is a current practice in Canada. Abortion has been lawful since the Supreme Court's action in January. I find it to be necessary in cases of rape, incest and anomalies caused by genetic defects. As well, with the gaps of information and the misinformation that exist, there is a great deal of pain, aggravation and uncertainty surrounding the decisions that can be made. We have to address that.

I believe that the motion we will be dealing with tomorrow is an opportunity to address this issue. The potential exists for more amendments in addition to mine which provide for mandatory counselling prior to an abortion, something which I think is a very important step.

The occasion is now. This is a good climate for us to show leadership. The people are looking to us to establish a future for Canada. What better way than to provide a basis for the young so that their decisions to perpetuate Canadians through reproduction can be made on an informed basis. All medical judgment and societal judgment should be taken into account so that these people can feel free to make decisions while at the same time have a very high esteem for what life means in our society and for what it will mean in the 21st century.

In summary, I think it is very clear that we are facing a crisis in Canada. I want to make sure that as I speak out this morning to Canadians, they realize that I am speaking for the future of Canada. I am speaking directly to the parents and to the grandparents on behalf of the young people, the ones who are about to reproduce our kind. I want them to be well informed and to have the highest of values they can get from life. They cannot develop those values without this Government deciding on this issue so that we will never have to deal with this conflict to this extent in the future.

We must develop a long-term solution so that in five years, 10 years or 15 years down the line, the number of abortions will be reduced and it will be a practice used only for necessary medical reasons, in fact, at that stage, the value system of all individuals in Canada will be so high that they will cherish life and the development of Canada.

I urge the Government to consider the amendments I have made on behalf of the young people of Canada. It is their future that we are talking about and I very much look forward to hearing from my children and my grandchildren in the future and to seeing the kind of Canada that they carry out.

Mr. Chuck Cook (North Vancouver—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise to participate in this debate on abortion out of some deeply held views, and also out of a sincere respect for many of the people I have heard and for many of the Members who have spoken on the issue.

There is a spectrum. At one end of the spectrum, of course, is absolutely no abortion, the group that perhaps can be classified generally under the heading of right to life. I respect their views very much. I believe that they are deeply held, and in many cases very deeply held religious views. I respect them for what they believe and for how they are attempting to go about it.

If we go to the other end of the spectrum, there are those who are pro-choice and who feel very strongly about the question of choice. They I equally respect. Again, they have deeply held views, many of which have been expressed in this Chamber with great vigour and force.

However, I tend to be very pragmatic. For that reason, I cannot agree with the absolute position of those who favour a right to life, not because it would not be marvellous but because it simply will not work.

I am old enough to remember when Canada had an abortion law which meant that no abortions were performed in Canada. In those days, there were abortion mills in practically every city across Canada, usually operated by a disbarred doctor of one kind or another. There were many abortion mills at cities in the United States which bordered Canada. Good grief, I believe that there was one doctor in Shelby, Montana, who made a fortune with D&C abortions for the young women of Alberta in the time prior to Canadians becoming a little more realistic about the subject.

I do not want to bring the abortion mills back again. I do not want to create a situation in which one has to break the law. Believe me, abortions will continue to take place in Canada, regardless of what the law is and of what is said here.

How can we be realistic about this and how can we be pragmatic? How can we make some moral sense out of the whole dilemma? Let us look at the other end of the spectrum, at those who are pro choice, those who say that a woman has the right to control her own body and that it is up to her what she chooses to do. There is a certain sympathy in my mind for that point of view as well. Who am I to tell any woman that she must carry a pregnancy to full term and produce, if for any number of reasons, valid reasons, she perhaps should not? One end of the spectrum, the other end of the spectrum. It is a dilemma. I honestly do not know what the right answer is, but I do know that there are two or three things that disturb me at each end of the spectrum.

At one end of the spectrum, there is no choice. It is imposed by law. It is imposed by those with their own moral codes, their own standards. At the other end of the spectrum, I think women equally have the right to argue that after all, it is their bodies and their choices as to what is to happen with their bodies. The Supreme Court seems to have gone a long way toward saying that women do have that right.

Quite frankly, I find it very difficult as a man, to say that I will legislate what you, woman, will do. I will never know pregnancy. I will never know the pain of it or the joy of it. I am not sure that as a man, I have the right, if there is such a thing, to interfere with a woman and what her choice may be.

I believe that on the side of the right to life, most of what they say is correct and most of what they wish to happen is correct. However, I think their approach is wrong. It is not done by legislation. It is done by persuasion. It is done by raising the moral tone of the country.

We cannot legislate morality, and I would have thought that most in Canada would have figured that out a long time ago. What we can do, and there are examples of this, is develop society to the point where the whole concept of abortion would become terribly offensive to everyone. I believe it is now to a substantial extent. However, there are those who will never accept a moral code and never understand what we are talking about and they will have an abortion anyway.

I think we offend every right thinking woman in Canada with some of the remarks that have been made in this debate. What we are saying in effect is that women do not have the ability to make the right decision on abortion. If that were true, there would be literally hundreds of thousands more abortions than there are.

There have been excellent points made today at both ends of the spectrum, but where is the middle ground? I honestly do not know but I am not prepared to hold a pregnant woman hostage to society. No, I think she has a good many rights in this matter.

I am also one of those strange people who feels that the putative father should have some rights in this matter. It is his child as well and some way must be found to bring him into the equation.

Having said those things, I think you can see that, given the seven or eight amendments and the main motion itself, I will have to examine my conscience very carefully. I do not feel I have any right to attempt to legislate the morals of others. I have heard strong viewpoints from both sides of this issue, all of them held with great conviction, and all of them totally different. However, my thinking on the subject will be on the basis of what is best for a free society where a citizen has the right to make his or her own choice. I am not quite convinced that life does begin at conception. I am not yet quite convinced that until that child has developed to a certain extent it should have the full protection of society. It is difficult. How do you balance the rights of the unborn child against the rights of the mother? That is why I will be concerned about the amendments and how I will vote tomorrow.

I will close by quoting from a letter similar to one I have used with my constituents over the 10 years I have been in Parliament. It does not satisfy everyone. As a matter of fact, I do not really think it satisfies anyone completely, but it does state clearly the position I have taken and will continue to take on this most vexing and difficult problem.

The letter points out that every day in North America over 4,000 human lives are ended by abortion. Over 11,000 abortions are performed annually in British Columbia where the abortion rate is 50 per cent higher than the national rate. One in every four abortions in British Columbia is a repeat abortion.

I am not in favour of making all abortions illegal. To do this would bring back the backrooms, the kitchen tables and the destruction of many women at the hands of abortion butchers. Nor am I in favour of totally free abortions at any time, under any circumstances. In this I believe I am in some disagreement with the Supreme Court of Canada. This in my view would mean that an abortion would be used even more as a method of birth control than it is now. This must be abhorrent to all thinking human beings.

My real difficulty is in attempting to decide on the rights of a woman to control her own body and the rights of the unborn. It is almost an impossible dilemma. Somewhere between the two absolute viewpoints the truth lies.

I believe there must be a law which will ensure that abortion is not abused in Canada. There must be some requirement for what is considered a necessary abortion. I am in favour of a law that will make it much clearer as to the actual responsibility and circumstances under which an abortion may take place, but I will not accept either end of the spectrum. Somewhere in between there is where most of the Canadian public are and, frankly, I believe it is a position I can comfortably take and still maintain my own moral integrity rather than the violent positions on both sides, much as I admire those who hold them.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as I begin to address this very difficult issue at 2.15 in the morning, I must in all honesty say that I cannot echo the words of some others who have spoken and who began by saying how much they looked forward to having this opportunity to speak. Quite frankly, I found this the most difficult issue with which I have had to contend. It is anything but a black and white situation for me.

I suppose in a way I envy those to whom the answers have come easily on this issue. They have not had to struggle in perhaps the same way I have had to struggle and continue to struggle. Quite frankly, from a perfectly selfish point of view, and as a father, I would much sooner be at home helping to celebrate our youngest daughter's eighteenth birthday today. However, I feel I have a responsibility to be here and it is for that reason I am speaking this morning.

Like all other Members of Parliament I received a great deal of mail on this issue, I would estimate around 1,400 letters to date, the vast bulk of which have come from the so-called pro-life group, of course. I have met with individuals in my office. I have met with medical doctors who represent both sides of the issue. I approach the debate on this issue within a certain context.

Like the Hon. Member who has just spoken, I am well aware that abortion has been part of Canadian history, whether it has been legal or illegal. I am aware of the so-called backroom or kitchen butchers who provided abortions when they were illegal. I am aware, indirectly, of the consequences which women sometimes faced as a result of seeking that remedy.

I am also aware that the legislation which was in place until the recent Supreme Court decision was not as equitable as we would have liked it to have been in that it was enforced in different manners in different provinces and, indeed, in different communities in the same province. I am also conscious that if we, through legislation, banned all or nearly all abortions in Canada there would in a sense still be a two-tiered system, a law for the rich and a law for the poor. If one has the dollars, one can get an abortion in the United States. The law must treat people equitably and I am worried about the inequity which has existed in the past and could continue to exist in the future.

I am also troubled by the fact that this decision is being made by a predominantly male Parliament. I believe that to a significant degree the issue is predominantly a women's issue in that I suspect, without knowing, that many women have to face the decision of whether or not to have an abortion without the support of the father of the child.

Quite frankly, I feel slightly uncomfortable about my role as a male in a largely male Parliament making this type of decision. I am particularly conscious of the fact that the women Members of Parliament who are on record on this issue are predominantly what we would call pro-choice.

By the same token, I am also conscious of the fact that there are many childless couples in Canada today who speak of waiting for several years in order to receive a child to adopt and love. Therefore, I believe that there may not be as many unwanted children born as some people would have us believe.

Where do I stand on this very important issue? First, I have consistently been opposed to abortion on demand because that suggests to me, rightly or wrongly, that under those circumstances abortion, to a significant degree, would be a birth control device and I do not believe it should be such. I believe that we do need a law that regulates the availability of abortion.

For that reason, I was one of the few to recommend, since the Supreme Court decision, the use of Section 33, the override clause, to reinstate Section 251 of the Criminal Code until we had a chance to draft appropriate legislation. The fact that we are not now proposing that legislation but instead dealing with a resolution tends to confirm to me that my views on Section 33 were appropriate, even if they were not heeded.

While I am opposed to abortion on demand, I believe that in certain circumstances women have the right to an abortion and that they and their doctors are better equipped than am I to determine when that abortion is necessary.

Certainly, in my mind, it is easy to say that a woman who is a victim of rape or incest has the right to an abortion. I have no difficulty with that. I can also say that a woman whose health or life is endangered has the right to an abortion. However, I must confess that I find it difficult to define exactly what I mean by "health" when I say that. I know that there are various interpretations.

I believe that a woman's right to abortion must be balanced with the rights of the foetus or the unborn. As I use both of those words I know that I cannot define, in my own mind, exactly when the foetus becomes the unborn. I also know that the decision even to consider having an abortion, let alone the decision to have an abortion, must be an exceedingly difficult one. I cannot believe that very many women would enter into that debate lightly or accept a decision to have an abortion lightly.

I believe that various institutions including government, and I suggest the churches as well, have a responsibility to provide all of the counselling services which would assist the woman and the father, if he is available, to deal with that decision.

Where I am less precise and less certain is in the area of attempting to justify the instances and circumstances in which abortion is warranted. I do not know how to define the health problems to which I have referred earlier. I also am not clear in my own mind, even though I watched with some difficulty the films which the pro-life organizations have provided, when the foetus evolves into the unborn. I recognize that at the point of conception there is a potential for life, but I believe that life itself emerges at some point thereafter as the pregnancy advances closer to the point when the unborn child could live outside the mother's womb. The question of viability has been discussed here earlier tonight.

I do not believe that we can speak of the fertilized egg having the same rights as the unborn child of four, five, or six months. I make a distinction there in terms of the rights of the unborn. We need a law which specifies quite clearly when abortions can be permitted and when they cannot. We need a law which ensures that abortions will not be available on demand.

I will vote against what many would call the pro-choice amendment. I believe that the law we need should attempt to ensure some sort of balance between women's rights as I would define them and the right of the unborn because I believe that the unborn, once it has reached a certain stage in the pregnancy, has rights which must be considered and protected by law.

I also believe that those rights grow in significance and in proportion with the advancing stage of pregnancy. I am conscious that I as a legislator am less able to determine when an abortion is necessary or warranted or desirable than are the medical doctors who are professionally competent to evaluate the mother's physical and mental state.

I hope that any law passed by this Parliament will require medical concurrence, preferably with more than one doctor. I also hope that this law will recognize the difficulty the mother faces, contemplating the unwanted pregnancy. I hope it will provide, as others have said, for mandatory counselling and that there will be several opportunities for such counselling made available, and that the churches will accept what I see as their responsibility in assisting in some form.

The decision will not be easy. I say that as a male who has never had to contend with this type of decision, nor have members of my family, for which I am grateful. There must be an immense amount of self doubt and, I fear, there will be an immense amount of guilt after such a decision is made. It is exceedingly important that such counselling and support programs be available.

In the end, regardless of what the law may say, the woman who chooses to have an abortion must live forever with her conscience and with the judgment of her God. I believe that that judgment will be more lasting, more significant than the judgment which any Parliament or court, or any other human being may render.

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on this important issue of abortion. The motion put forward is totally unacceptable to me and I believe to the vast number of people I have the honour of representing in Hastings, Frontenac, Lennox and Addington.

The right to speak on important issues in this House is very fundamental to our system of government and our very way of life as Canadians. I intend to speak very briefly, only to put on record my position on this important moral issue.

We have heard a great deal about free votes in the House of Commons. I question this term, as it is applied here, because I believe the only free vote here or anywhere else is one by secret ballot. Hopefully, however, this debate will put on the record the views of Members in this Parliament and will influence legislation that will be brought forward.

The gestational approach is scientifically and ethically indefensible because it draws an arbitrary dividing line between life which is worthy of protection and life which is not.

As one who believes that life begins at conception and must be valued, I cannot support the motion before the House. This motion abandons a primary function of the law, the protection of the human life. Furthermore, it does not achieve the socially imperative balance between the rights and the interests of women and the equally important rights and interests of unborn children.

As one who values innocent human life, I feel it is incumbent that I work and pray for legislation which recognizes, values, respects and protects human life from conception to natural death. Any new abortion law must be developed in the context of other laws and social policies which, together, will make Canadian society even more hospitable to all human life at all stages of development.

As my amendment pursuant to the special order under notices of amendments to Government business No. 36 states, any legislation must give pre-eminence to the protection of the foetus, should prohibit the performance of an abortion except when two independent qualified practitioners have, in good faith and on reasonable grounds, stated that in their opinion the continuation of the pregnancy would or would be likely to endanger the life of the pregnant woman, or when the pregnancy is the result of rape or incest.

I believe very strongly that the foetus is life at conception and must be protected.

Mr. Allan Pietz (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on this important motion. I believe the Government should be congratulated for its attempt to deal fairly with this very difficult issue by giving Members the opportunity for a free vote.

The legislation recently struck down by the Supreme Court of Canada was compromise legislation in its day. It did not satisfy all Canadians when it was introduced and we would be naive to think that the legislation to be drafted out of this debate will satisfy all Canadians. I, like every Member of Parliament, have received letters from constituents on all sides of the issue. My vote will not satisfy all of my constituents, but this issue is not just a political one. It is both a legal question and a moral question.

I have been in public life for over 35 years and I have had to express my opinion on this issue before. When I was elected to the House of Commons in 1984, my pro-life position was well known.

Throughout my municipal career on township, county, city and regional councils, I served on the social services committee as well as working as a member of the Children's Aid Society. I have watched society change from the days when children were considered an economic asset, when people had children to ensure there would be someone there to take care of them in their old age.

Nowadays, the picture has changed. Children do not grow up to work in the family business and eventually take over. Moreover, in recent consultations between the Minister of State for Seniors (Mr. Hees) and his national constituency, we learn that independence is one of the things seniors value the most. They do not want to depend on their children to take care of them. But their other main priority was quality of life. As a parent and grandparent I can certainly say that children add greatly to the quality of life.

I am sure you know, as I do, people who would like to be able to have children but cannot. These people are finding it more difficult to find children available for adoption. Recently a former employee of mine and her husband adopted a little boy. This came after more than two years of waiting, and that little boy is a very lucky person.

I do not mean to discount the hardships experienced by women who get pregnant without wanting to be pregnant, but I refuse to see the possibility of new life only as a negative. While it may not be a positive situation for the woman in the short term, it can mean a lifetime of joy for a childless couple. The natural mother's emotions will be affected whether she has the baby or has an abortion, but she will not have to deal with the guilt of having terminated a pregnancy by choosing to have the baby and giving it up for adoption. She could choose to turn a mistake into an opportunity.

It is easy to see an unwanted pregnancy as the end of the world when you are young. As a society, we bear a responsibility for fostering that point of view. But no one said that life was going to be easy. Nine months is a long time when you are young, but in the long run it really is not.

This is not a perfect world. In some cases unmarried pregnant women still get stigmatized. Abortion is a way out of an unpleasant situation. Society needs to change its attitudes and we need to help in that process. There has been much done in the area of providing social services to unwed mothers and, in fact, single parent families are becoming increasingly more common in this age of high divorce rates. People's attitudes are changing. In many ways it is difficult to find family values in this kind of environment. But life is life and respect is fundamental to any value system.

I said earlier that the issue facing us today is a legal matter as well as a moral one. On a question of this nature, I have no hesitation in saying that I am guided in large part by my Lutheran faith. The stance of the Lutheran Church-Canada is that the practice of abortion, its promotion and legal acceptance, are destructive of the moral consciousness and character of the people of any nation and that since abortion takes a human life, abortion is not a moral option except as a tragically unavoidable by-product of medical procedures necessary to prevent the death of another human being, that is, the mother. The Lutheran Church-Canada promotes the idea of community education and the living of responsible sexual lives by men and women. It also offers as an alternative to abortion, supportive understanding, compassion and help to the expectant parents and family, and fosters concern among Lutheran agencies and families to open their hearts and homes for unwanted babies.

I have seconded the motion put by the Hon. Member for Willowdale (Mr. Oostrom) which supports the sanctity of human life. The sanctity of life is something in which I believe and I appreciate the opportunity of saying so.

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, to start with, it is getting pretty late—it is a quarter to three in the morning, which means that as I speak here in Ottawa it is nearly 4:15 a.m. in Newfoundland and not far from midnight in Vancouver. I would like to thank the Chair but also the Clerks and all the staff, the interpreters who make it possible for us as MPs to express our points of view on this fundamental question.

As I came up to Ottawa today I was reading in the papers and listening on the radio to the interpretation by journalists and Canadians generally of the debate we are carrying on at this time. I became aware that people do not understand what is happening, and I can understand that. This is only the second time in the history of Canada that Members of the House of Commons, regardless of their political stripe, have had the chance to influence a bill, to impose or direct one. This is due to the McGrath reforms. It has not been mentioned, but I think it should be, because Canadians have the impression that around noon, not tomorrow but in a few hours, noon today, when we vote, we will be settling the question of abortion once and for all. That is not the situation. The purpose of this debate is to establish guidelines. It is to take the pulse of the House in a non-partisan way. It is to find out how, together, we can establish the guidelines that the people of Canada have asked for following the decision of the Supreme Court, a split decision, 5 against 2. It is not astonishing that here in this House we do not seem to have a consensus. The fairly significant number of amendments that have been moved to the original motion show that a consensus has not yet been reached. Let us hope that by noon tomorrow (sic) we will have managed to arrive at sufficiently clear guidelines.

The Supreme Court decision is based on section 7 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which says, "Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person, and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice."

What is recognized here are the fundamental rights of women.

On the other hand, I have been listening attentively for I do not know how many hours now. For several hours, anyway, I have been listening to debate that is not really about the question. Does a woman have the right to have an abortion or not? Rather the debate has centred on the rights of the foetus. People have been talking about the rights of the foetus. But what is forgotten in this whole question of the foetus is all the technology that now surrounds the conception, the creation, of life. A few years ago life was created through the union of a man and a woman. Today, we have test-tube babies. There is nothing, there are no rules, no guidelines in our society that deal with this question, sperm banks and like, there is nothing that deals with these questions. We have no guidelines in our society.

I also think that when we talk about the rights of the foetus we also have to talk about rules. We have to decide if we should have rules that would regulate the whole systme or principle of conception. But if we want to stay strictly with the question of whether or not a woman has the right to have an abortion, then I ask myself a question: I am not a woman, I will never have the pleasure of bearing a child, I am not made for that, biologically I was not designed for that. By what right, I ask myself, do I as a man say, "You women"—and there are 14 million women in Canada, and what right do I have as a man and a parliamentarian, what fundamental right do I have to say, "You women cannot have an abortion unless your health is really endangered or it is the only way to save your life. That I do not mind allowing you"?

That would be to deny that those 14 million women in Canada are after all as free as I am to make decisions and decisions that affect them, what is more, there are only 29 women in the House, and it will be interesting to see, during tomorrow's vote—and I ask all my colleagues (and it is astonishing to see how many Hon. Members are still here at this late hour), it will be interesting to see how the women vote. I am going to be paying attention when we get to that noon-hour vote, because I think men ought to be cautious about making a decision that affects women. They have fundamental rights.

Of course, the fact that there are no clear guidelines, the fact that the Supreme Court ruled as it did, has broken that fragile consensus, if I can call it that, that we had across Canada, which was that Canadians were operating in a system that was more or less clear. But the fact that the Supreme Court came down firmly on the side of women being in control of their own bodies automatically provoked reaction from the pro-life people, who give the impression that a woman is incapable of making her own decisions, that there absolutely must be legislation, there must be a legal framework for the decision, there must be a criminal framework. But what does that imply? It implies that half the population of Canada are incapable of making logical decisions for themselves. I do not know any women who would enjoy having an abortion, on the contrary!

On the other side we have the pro-choice groups, and I have met with representatives of those groups, who just about suggest convenience outlets for abortions on every corner. Abortions ought to be something you can get with no trouble at all. I do not think that that extreme is realistic, that it reflects what Canadians think. The choice we are making now is a societal choice. What we are being asked to do is make a societal choice by legislating through the criminal law, the Criminal Code. I find that rather absurd, because it seems to me that a societal choice should be made through dialogue, persuasion, information. Societal choices should evolve normally, gradually, they should not be a provocation. This is not a question that should be given a radical solution.

The motion tabled yesterday by the government isn't perfect. It does not answer all the questions, not all my questions, that is for sure! I'm going to read carefully—I've still got several hours during which I intend to read all the amendments that have been moved to the motion; but at first glance the motion seems to me a reasonable one, a motion that represents the silent majority in this country.

Naturally we hear from the people at both the widely-separated extreme, but the silent majority we do not hear from. I have heard from its members, myself, because I have met with a number of people in my riding. There are the pro-life groups, there are the pro-choice groups. Some are more aggressive than others. The pro-life people even took the liberty of sending me a video. They sent me posters, which I would never display in any classroom, which I will never stick up on the walls of my office, because they are not "displayable". I consider that very aggressive, the kind of lobbying that was directed at me, and, I am sure, at others here in this House. But apparently that is all part of the rules of the game, as MPs we have to live with that, and I accept that I have to live with it. But what is really going to influence my decision is my analysis of all the conversations I have had over the past months, with the young and the not-so-young, with women and men, in my riding and elsewhere. And on the whole, among all those people, there is a widespread general agreement that in certain circumstances abortion should be permitted, a woman ought to be able to save her life. I think that is fundamental. But I also think a woman is just as able to make that decision as I am. We must not come up with such a rigid framework, like the ones suggested in certain proposals, where it is asserted that life is present from the moment of conception and so abortion is impossible. I think that flouts the fundamental law set out in the Charter. If those people want the Charter re-written, they should say so, but they will be an unholy row over it in Canada, because I do not think women are going to accept the idea that Parliament is doing away with their rights, denying them the rights they have, denying them their right to be treated as equals with men in this country.

As a man I have to take that into account. I have to be very cautious in the decision I will be making tomorrow, which is not a final decision, I agree, because what we are establishing here are guidelines. We're giving guidelines to the government and the MPs who will have to formulate and analyse any future bill, which will then be considered at first and second reading, in committee, and at third reading. It will not be passed overnight! A lot of water will go under the bridge before it passes, and I hope people will have the time to make us aware of a more general consensus. But the debate we have been having in the House for the past two days really represents what is happening in the community. The community is undecided, it does not quite know which way to go. Should we opt resoundingly for pro-life, resoundingly for pro-choice? No! I think society is much more in the centre, much more in favour of a decision that would lie between the two extremes and would respect the consensus that has been apparent in Canada for a certain number of years, even if it is not perfect, because we're all human beings, we are not perfect and we never will be.

I don't want my part in the debate to drag on any longer, given the time, and since I know there are still Hon. Members waiting to speak. But I just want to say that in a few hours I'll be making a decision. Between now and then I will be reading all the amendments that have been tabled, and I think I will not be far from the position of the original motion. Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, for allowing me to make these few points on so important a subject.

[English]

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with considerable interest to the debate as it has proceeded over the last couple of days. Indeed, I welcome this opportunity to enter into the debate. I believe that the debate boils down to when it is that our society chooses to protect life by law. If we are to be concerned with human rights and life, I suggest that it follows that we must be concerned with the arguments that allow the taking of life. Some will argue, as we have heard in this Chamber, that abortion does not involve the taking of life. I would therefore ask people who hold this view to examine their arguments. This, of course, is the argument of the pro-choice advocates. I believe that their arguments are not sufficient to allow the taking of foetal life.

Let us examine the term "freedom of choice". Choice should in itself not be determinative in moral debates. Certain terms often relied on by pro-choice advocates are unacceptable. What is meant by "pro-choice"? It has taken a very central position in this debate. Some even see the individual choice of the women to have or not to have an abortion as being self-evident justification for an abortion. The phrase "pro-choice" when examined, I submit, is not a valid position to take in any moral debate. This is a phrase, of course, that is preferred today rather than the earlier term, pro-abortion, because it is argued that people who hold this view of freedom of choice are not really in favour of abortion, but favour the right to choose. The argument is if you oppose abortion, then indeed you are anti-choice. The argument, on the basis of choice, is a poor argument, as I have said, and I would submit that the very same people who use that argument would not allow others to use the same argument in other moral debates, because choice is morally neutral and can only be evaluated as a right or wrong in terms of the context in which it is used. For example, do I have freedom of choice to fire my rifle? That can only be evaluated morally in terms of where, when and at what I am going to fire my rifle.

Let us examine freedom of choice on the pornography debate. Are those who restrict the pornography producers' right to produce pornography anti-choice? I guess in one sense they are. Yet, most of those who are pro-choice in the abortion debate are also anti-choice in the pornography debate. They recognize that there are moral factors which are part of the issue of the pornography debate that would be ignored if choice were the only focus.

Another argument that we hear is that those against abortion are seeking to force their moral views on others. This statement, of course, implies that no person should attempt to force their views on what is right or wrong on others. Most of our criminal law is based on moral notions of what is right and wrong, and of course these rules apply regardless of the views that individuals hold.

Those who say that no one should attempt to force their views of what is right or wrong on others do not function this way themselves in society. There are countless issues where advocates of moral issues expect the law to restrict behaviour. I cite sexual abuse, I cite discrimination in various forms, restriction on the production of pornography. In areas of moral debate we must evaluate the rights that are at issue. The abortion debate requires that we evaluate what the foetus is. Does it have an interest to be considered?

Since human rights are the property of those who are alive, and being a member of the human species undeniably begins at conception because that is a scientific fact, it follows, in my view, that the foetus has moral and legal rights and therefore must become a matter of concern which we cannot avoid by the philosophical unsound use of choice.

The real issue in the abortion debate or, indeed, in all debates involving when we should protect life by law, is when and on what basis do we recognize the right to have rights. I submit that those who seek to remove rights must state why the right should be removed. Therefore, it begs the question: What is the morally relevant distinction between the foetus before birth and a child after birth so that we can say one has a right to life and the other does not?

To my knowledge, there has never been a satisfactory answer to this question. Until an answer to this question is given, I submit that we must support presumption in favour of life that is referred to by the Law Reform Commission of Canada in its working paper no. 28, dealing with euthanasia, in their protection of life series.

I would conclude on this point, that choice itself is incapable of providing a satisfactory resolution in the abortion debate. Since this debate involves the most sacred of issues—that is human life itself—we must proceed very carefully and with an honest, philosophical approach. Choice itself will not do in this and in any other area of moral debate.

What is the nature of the foetus? Pro-choice advocates deny foetus rights because they lack some quality necessary to the holding of rights. It is not a person, it is not human. Others suggest that the foetus rights should exist only from a certain point. We have heard the arguments; a developed central nervous system, that it must be viable. The trimesteral approach was used notably in the U.S. Supreme Court, Rowe v Wade.

I submit that two things are ignored in these arguments. First, these arguments ignore the potential of the foetus and, second, the foetus genetic individuality remains unchanged from the moment of conception through to death, whenever this occurs. All the changes after conception are changes of degree, not of kind. The foetus is the weakest stage of all of us at the beginning of the continuum of life. We get bigger, we get stronger, for some time, but as unique individuals we are the same from conception onward. To suggest otherwise is just pure bad science.

I believe that life begins at conception. Later on today I plan to vote consistent with those views.

Mr. Jim Caldwell (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to participate in this debate this morning. It is now 10 minutes after three o'clock in eastern Canada. Out on the West Coast we are on prime time television, I suppose. I have listened very attentively to the debate that has taken place yesterday and also this morning, and certainly to the points raised by Hon. Members from both sides of the issue and both sides of the House. It has certainly given me an opportunity to rethink my position, or to think out as to whether or not I am on the right track.

Many Members have mentioned the fact that it is very difficult for men to be voting on this particular issue, and I tend to agree. None of us are going to get pregnant, none of us are going to carry a baby and none of us are going to give birth. I think it makes it very difficult for men to be voting on an issue such as this when women certainly have a different feeling for birth than men. The fact is that you and I were elected to this House of Commons, and it is the House of the common people. That is why they call it the House of Commons. We are only common people trying to do our best and to make the laws of the land as best we can.

I think most of us wish this debate did not have to take place. It is one of those issues that we as Members of Parliament wish we did not have to face, along with capital punishment, both of which are really a conscience vote where you vote the way that you feel, plus keeping your constituents in mind as to what they might like you to do.

I must say, on behalf of my constituents, that I have received very little pressure to vote one way or the other on this particular issue. The constituents have basically left it up to me and it is my decision to make.

We realize that we try to formulate many laws in this House of Commons having to do with morality. Legislating morality is one of the most difficult things to do. Legislators continue to try to legislate morality and very often fail to legislate in an effective way. We also realize that we can make laws governing prostitution but that there will always be prostitutes. We can make tough drinking laws, but we will continue to have drunk drivers. We can legislate tough punishment for murderers, but we know that there will still be murders. We can ban abortion, but we know that abortions will still be carried out.

When we legislate moral issues sometimes they have an effect. If legislation prevents one drunk driver from getting behind the wheel of a car, it is important. If we can do something about prostitution and it prevents one young girl from becoming a prostitute, that legislation has certainly served its purpose. If we can pass tough laws for murderers and we can stop one murder, maybe we have done our job. If we can pass laws that will prevent abortion, even one, it is important.

One of my concerns in this particular issue is where does abortion stop and where does it start. Once abortion becomes a way of life, can we control it? Under what circumstances can abortion be performed? Is it only for the poor, or if you are poor you cannot have it? Will it be because you are too young that you cannot have an abortion? Will it be because you are too old? Is it because you are not married? If it disrupts your lifestyle should you have an abortion?

I am sure that all of us have heard from our parents from time to time "you cannot afford to get married just now" or "you cannot afford to have children just now". Those of us who are married and have children realize that if you wait until you can afford to have children and can afford to get married, you will probably not get married and you will probably not have kids. I am sure you have also heard that from your mother and father as well, Mr. Speaker.

What kind of society do we want to have? Do we want to have a perfect society where all children are born perfect? When and what is the criteria for having an abortion? We all know that modern medicine can now determine if the foetus is normal or if it is defective. What do we do with the Down's Syndrome child? Do we abort it? What do we do with children who are blind? What do we do with children who are deaf? What do we do about the foetus that might not be the right sex for a particular couple? We have people in our society who would raise those children if they are brought into this world.

These are some of my concerns and the concerns of many of my constituents. I realize that many of my constituents do not particularly agree with my stand on abortion, and I respect their opinions as well, but I must live with myself, Mr. Speaker. For that reason I will be voting in favour of an abortion motion that will control, as much as possible, the abortion of future Canadians. I want to remind everyone that every baby born in Canada whether or not the mother is a Canadian citizen is a Canadian.

Abortion

Mr. William G. Lesick (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to greet you at this early hour of the morning. I know that you are intent on listening to this very heated and impassioned debate on abortion.

The Government's motion is to address the very complex and fundamental issue of abortion. The question of abortion has produced more passionate debate by Canadians than almost any other issue in recent times, possibly other than free trade. The issue has the passion of extreme beliefs, some on one side, some on the other, and many in the middle. Positions by citizens on this issue are very varied, from absolute free choice to the view that abortions should be outlawed completely. In my view neither one is acceptable. The abortion question and ensuing debate have continued vigorously for many years. It is not a new debate. I know that in my City of Edmonton, in front of the largest municipal hospital, we have a big sign which reads "Adoption, not abortion". That is a very simplistic view of abortion.

With this heightened debate and greater passion than ever, especially with the advent of the Supreme Court decision of last January 28, 1988, striking down Section 251 of the Criminal Code which governs abortion, we have had this question thrown wide open to all Canadians. Even though I accept the fact that abortions may have to be performed under stringent guidelines and in special cases, such as when continuing a pregnancy would threaten the life of the mother, I believe that the sanctity of life and ensuring the maximum protection for the unborn is a paramount consideration.

As a pharmacist in the 1950s and 1960s I have known of many instances where abortions were performed in homes with instruments and equipment that did not always protect the pregnant woman from harm. Some of these abortions were successful, but in other instances irreparable damage was done to the woman causing either sterility and in a rare case or two even death. Certainly abortions must be kept out of the kitchens and bathrooms of homes. In our modern society this is not acceptable. The proposed legislation would prohibit the performance of abortion, subject to the exceptions of medical complications as enunciated in the body of the motion.

However, I would like to bring to the attention of the House that the motion before us lacks clarity in its content. The provision that abortion should be prohibited except during the early stages of pregnancy does not provide clarity as to when abortions are permissible. The motion suggests that abortions be performed only by a qualified medical practitioner. This definition is not acceptable as it lacks sufficient clarity as to a practitioner's qualification to perform therapeutic abortions. I see these elements of the motion as being somewhat defective.

The issue of abortion has produced much debate. Several points raised must be seriously considered. In my view greater education of young people, middle aged people, and adults of all ages in Canada is an absolute necessity. It is particularly imperative that unwanted pregnancies among our young people be prevented. This presents a great challenge to all of us. We need greater family dialogue. Mother, father, and child must understand each other. They must speak to each other. They must have dialogue meaningful to the young person especially, not preaching but good honest dialogue and advice always showing love and compassion. Our schools must be more active in this area as well. Abortions are all around us and our students must be made aware of them. I suggest that the churches should possibly do less preaching and more reaching out to women as well as to men. There is also peer pressure to take into account which is sometimes greater than the influence of parents, churches, and schools. Children have to be taught not to be influenced so much by the passion of the moment but to have some restraint.

The dynamics of life are always changing. I believe that greater counselling is essential in order to assist the woman in understanding the implications of her pregnancy. Should she have an abortion? Should she carry the foetus to term? What should be done in light of her needs and her aspirations for her future? We must consider the woman, the mother.

Adoption is an option that must be considered and stressed to the greatest degree possible. Twenty and thirty years ago, adoption was more prevalent. Now, with social assistance and with different values, people say that they will not give up their children for adoption, they will keep them because their mothers, fathers or grandmothers will look after the children while they do whatever they can to start earning a living or getting an education.

I believe that adoption is an extremely valuable way to prevent abortion. Through learning, the pregnant woman who does not want to carry her baby might be convinced that this would be the thing to do because there are virtually thousands of couples who are not able to have children and who would be happy to raise unwanted children in the most loving manner. This option should be stressed to the greatest degree.

The figure of 60,000 abortions performed last year speaks tragic volumes of the heart-wrenching dilemma facing Canadian women and men. Again, I say that education is essential. Let me give Hon. Members a case in point. Almost three years ago, I was the first Member of Parliament who spoke out about AIDS. At that time, there were only two cases of AIDS in my City of Edmonton. I said, based on the evidence of the witnesses who appeared before the Standing Committee of which I was a member, that AIDS is an epidemic. Those words were prophetic. It is considered to be an epidemic.

At that time, I urged the Government to spend more money on education because AIDS will be the death of many of us. AIDS is spreading around the world and we fear it. We are trying to understand it. Our Government is spending over $30 million on the prevention of AIDS. In the heated debate that has gone on, and especially since the Government has proposed this motion, abortion should be considered in the same light.

We have to treat abortion with the same dedication, the same fervour, the same belief that we must help those who want to commit abortion realize that this is not the way to do it.

The National Progressive Conservative Women's Federation met on March 12 and 13 of 1988. The national executive committee stated:

> Be it further resolved that the federal Government be encouraged to do more in the area of birth control research and that the Provinces be encouraged to do more to promote family planning and necessary educational programming within their jurisdictions.

Again, I want to emphasize education.

The motion before us has created this debate in Parliament after consultation with our constituents. I know that I and all Members of Parliament have heard from numerous delegations. People have phoned and written about the position they would like us as Members of Parliament to take in this important debate. The citizens of Canada have written all Members of Parliament because they feel very fervently about this issue. As a result of this impassioned debate, the Government will, in its wisdom, pass legislation reflecting the expressions spoken in this House these two or two and a half days.

I believe that the Government was wise to bring in a motion rather than a Bill. It allows the Government to listen to what we as Members of Parliament representing the people of Canada are expressing.

In essence, I suggest that women must not be compelled to carry out any pregnancy which would or would likely threaten her physical or mental well-being, and I conclude that life begins at conception. I believe in the sanctity of life and in the protection of the unborn.

Mr. Bill Attewell (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I see that it is now 3.26 a.m., and in less than nine hours, Hon. Members will return to this House to make some very difficult decisions on how they will vote. This is a subject that most of us have approached in a very difficult but compassionate way. It is not an easy subject, but it is also not one from which we can run away. We were elected to deal with issues such as this.

I simply want to register my concerns and views on the issue of abortion. Let me say at the outset that I am not comfortable with the main motion. I intend to vote in favour of the amendment submitted by the Hon. Member for Kitchener (Mr. Reimer) which provides that all of the words in the motion after the words "to protect the unborn and" be deleted and the following substituted therefor: such legislation would prohibit the performance of an abortion except when two independent, qualified medical practitioners have, in good faith and on reasonable grounds, in writing, stated that in their opinion, the continuation of the pregnancy would or would be likely to endanger the life of the pregnant woman or seriously and substantially endanger her health and there is no other commonly accepted medical procedure for effectively treating that health risk, but grounds for such an opinion are not to include (1) the effect of stress or anxiety which may accompany an unexpected or unwanted pregnancy or, (2) social or economic considerations.

I am not a lawyer and I am not a doctor, but I am a father and three years ago I became a grandfather and I am a Christian. While we may read a lot on this subject and may hear the views of others, when it comes right down to it, I think our views are substantially affected by our own personal experiences, and I would like to share some of those experiences with you, Mr. Speaker. I have not done any polling but I have had many letters, telephone calls and visits from people with honest, genuine views, and their views range all the way from the pure pro choice to the pure pro-life.

I want to compliment Hon. Members of this House. The quality of the debate has been simply outstanding. I have now been listening for about 10 hours consecutively. The Hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) gave a very moving speech. I can remember several of the comments of the Hon. Member for Scarborough West (Mr. Stackhouse). The Hon. Member for Hamilton East (Ms. Copps) spoke very movingly about the plight of her father and how that has so profoundly affected the sanctity of life in her mind.

I also want to compliment the Government for presenting us with this motion, not a Bill, which allows us to look at the issue independently and to vote on it independently, essentially as our consciences would dictate. Regardless of the outcome, and none of us know what will happen nine or ten hours from now, I think the debate will have been worth while.

With the recent Supreme Court judgment, there is a vacuum. I think we as Members of Parliament must show leadership and fill that vacuum because we simply cannot have ten different laws and ten different provinces tackling this issue on their own. We must supply the leadership.

This debate is about two vital issues: the sanctity of life or the protection of the unborn, and the rights and health of the mother. By the end of this debate we must end up with a balance, a blending of these two vital concerns. These issues are not mutually exclusive and I believe a compromise can be reached, and I mean that in the best sense of that word.

I want to share some personal experiences. By the mid-1960s, Sandy, my wife and I had a family of one son, Howard, and two daughters, Pamela and Leslie. I had a good job. We were very involved at Immanuel Baptist Church. Life was very good to us. I sometimes felt guilty in a way that things were going so well. After a lot of thought and prayer we decided to adopt a son to share our family life, our home, and the blessings that we certainly had enjoyed. In 1968 we adopted a young boy. We were not fussy, so to speak, about the age of the youngster. We adopted John Fraser Attewell who was 11 months old at that time. His mother was young, single, and already had a young child and was just financially incapable of keeping her second child. I often think that if abortions had been easy 21 years ago, then young John Fraser may not have been in this world with us today.

Three years ago Sandy and I became grandparents. On July 18, 1985, Kyle William Strolenberg was born. Our daughter Leslie and her husband John were thrilled. The grandparent stage of life that many in this House now enjoy is a very exciting time. It brings a new awareness just to see the miracle of life unfold, the daily growth, physically, emotionally, and mentally.

On February 18 of this year our second grandchild arrived, Heather Christine Attewell, the daughter of our son Howard and his wife Lynda. However, this was not as happy an event. She was born prematurely, weighing a mere two and a half pounds. Further complications developed. She could not swallow because her oesophagus was not linked to her stomach. She was in an incubator for months and months at Sick Childrens Hospital. We visited her many times and have been so grateful that she is receiving the best medical attention in the world. Heather is now nine pounds and just a few days ago she underwent a four-hour operation to link her oesophagus to her stomach. We visited her yesterday morning at the hospital and this is the first time we had seen this beautiful baby without the tubes running into her nose to drain fluids. There are still some complications and Heather is very much in our prayers. She has never slept in her newly decorated bedroom. She has never seen her home. Her first six months have been spent at Sick Childrens Hospital.

One might wonder why I share these particular details of Heather's young life and struggle. Having visited there several times, I have seen many new babies with various problems surrounding their birth, but I have also heard about the devoted doctors and nurses and other members of medical teams at that first rate world renowned hospital, and these youngsters have many people battling for them. They have many people trying to make them well. Many people are battling for their lives. It made me think in a more profound way about whether we are defending the life of the unborn as much as we should.

Just because we cannot see the unborn, just because we cannot hear them cry, just because we cannot hug them, does not mean they are not every bit as precious. I believe life begins at conception. We must protect the unborn. Our Charter of Rights demands it.

I want to say that I believe I have some empathy and understanding of the anguish a woman goes through when considering an abortion. Obviously we cannot understand that in total, but I think I can empathize somewhat with them. It has to be a very difficult decision. Mother Teresa has said a decision to abort a child can become a haunting nightmare for the rest of the life of a woman.

I respect the women who say that they should have full authority to decide whether or not to abort their child, but I just cannot honestly agree with that position. I believe the adoptive process is part of the answer. My sister Gerry was unable to bear children. She and her husband, Clair, adopted a son, John, and a daughter, Anne. They have done their best to raise their two adopted children in a warm and loving home. We have other friends who have also chosen to share the lives and homes with adopted children. Those children have brought joy and fulfilment to their lives.

In closing, I want to say that I am thankful for the opportunity to speak on this subject. It is a very divisive, very complex issue. Views vary all over the spectrum, but as an MP I have an obligation to participate in the debate and make a decision. I have an obligation to vote in a few hours and, in the final analysis, it will be a vote of conscience. In order to protect the unborn, I intend to vote for the amendment tabled by the Hon. Member for Kitchener.

Mr. Richard Grisé (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour and a privilege to conclude this debate which has lasted for more than two days, and I think it is also appropriate, since the first speaker on this motion was the Minister of State and Parliamentary House Leader (Mr. Lewis), and since I seconded the motion, I think it is no more than fitting that I should speak last, in a debate which I would qualify as having been very civilized, and in which ninety-four Members rose in the House to speak to a very sensitive and controversial motion on the subject of abortion.

Mr. Speaker, during the many hours of debate today . . . it is now twenty minutes to four in the morning, and yesterday morning we finished at quarter to three . . . In the course of this debate, we heard the various views of Hon. Members who expressed their apprehension in referring either to the rights of the fetus or to the right of women to have an abortion, and we also heard an analysis of the various options.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank and congratulate all Members who took part in a debate in which they expressed some very deep convictions.

Speaking on behalf of the government, I would also like to take this opportunity to thank the Chair and all employees of the House, including the translators, official stenographers and all other members of our staff who did their work in a spirit of exceptional co-operation, and especially the Table which has had and still has a great deal of work to do, preparatory to drafting the decision that will be handed down tomorrow by the Chair. That is when the Members of this House will be asked to vote on amendments or groups of amendments, according to the Chair's ruling, and also of course on the main motion, and all this will take place in a few hours' time.

• (0340)

I would also like to include the poeple of the ridings of Chambly and Verchères in my thanks and the thanks of the House which are directed to the Deputy Speaker and Member for the riding of Chambly (Mr. Danis), who presided over the debate during these many hours, and I want to say: Thank you.

Mr. Speaker, I know, as you do, that within a few hours, there will be extremely important votes that, depending on the decision of the Members of this House, of course, could give the Government an indication or sense of direction on the drafting of a future abortion bill. Again, in the riding of Chambly, I have personally been approached by various groups and individuals representing many options on the abortion issue. And tomorrow, of course, when we have the various decisions of the Chair in our hands, I will decide to vote as I choose, based on my conscience and morality, and in closing, Mr. Speaker, I would like to call on all Hon. Members of this House to reflect on the contents of the motion and to elaborate on it. "The Government should prepare and introduce legislation, consistent with the Constitution of Canada, including the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which reflects the fundamental value and inherent dignity of each human being and the inherent worth of human life, and which achieves a balance between the right of a woman to liberty and security of her person and the responsibility of society to protect the unborn."

So, Mr. Speaker, I think that this text really and sincerely reflects the overall debate of the last several hours. It is an extremely difficult choice that each Member will have to make in this House and, once again, I want to thank all employees and the Chair for their diligence and all Hon. Members, of course, for the quality of this debate; I am grateful for the diligent service we have had.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to the Order passed on Tuesday, July 26, 1988, the debate on the motion is adjourned. This House stands adjourned until 11 a.m. today, pursuant to Standing Order 3(1).

The House adjourned at 3.45 a.m.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

AGRICULTURE—NINTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, as Chairman of the Standing Committee on Agriculture, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the ninth report of the Standing Committee on Agriculture relating to the $22 billion problem, options for the restructuring of farm debt.

In accordance with Standing Order 99(2), the committee will request a comprehensive response from the Government.

Very briefly, the report makes recommendations concerning the concept of equity financing and suggests that the Farm Credit Corporation have a dual role, carrying out government credit policy, being compensated for it, while at the same time having a commercial role to supply long-term farm mortgages.

Finally, the committee identified a need to stabilize the real agricultural costs of borrowed money and suggests some innovative measures such as interest stabilization plans and variable rate insured risk mortgages.

I would like to close by thanking members of the committee on all sides of the House for their efforts over the last number of months in arriving at a comprehensive report in which all Members on all sides of the House have been able to concur.

BILL C-123—REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, as Chairman of the Legislative Committee on Bill C-123, an Act to amend the Indian Act (minors' funds and surviving spouse's preferential share), I have the honour to present the report of the legislative committee, in both official languages, with amendments.

PROTECTION OF ROUGE RIVER VALLEY WILDERNESS AREA

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I would like to present to the House today a petition signed by residents of Scarborough, Newmarket, Don Mills, and Thornhill which states that the Rouge River Valley in Scarborough is a unique and precious natural area, and that protecting the endangered wildlife and wilderness areas in the Rouge Valley is in the national interest. They join with the Scarborough City Council, the federal Environment Minister (Mr. McMillan), Save the Rouge Valley System and the Coalition of Scarborough Community Associations and call on the Government to work with the provincial Government of Ontario to establish the Rouge River Valley as a Canadian heritage park or a provincial park.

CANADA-U.S. FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions to present on behalf of a number of constituents. In one petition, which has been certified as correct under Standing Order 106, the petitioners state that they feel that the fabric of Canadian sovereignty has been threatened by the Canada-U.S. trade deal. They believe that the trade deal will integrate Canada further into the North American defence industrial base. Therefore, they call for a general election on this issue.

I have another petition which is completely different. It is from constituents from western Canada. They, too, believe that the federal Government lacks a mandate from the people of Canada to conclude a trade deal with the United States. They believe that the trade deal as negotiated would deny Canada the policy freedom to determine its own economic future and would undermine Canada's ability to build a society distinct from that of the United States.

I could go on and on. It points out all kinds of problems which they perceive attached to this trade deal.

Basically, they are calling upon Parliament to dissolve now to allow the people of Canada an opportunity to accept or reject the proposed trade deal during a national general election.

PROTECTION OF RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Ted Schellenberg (Nanaimo—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty, honour and privilege to present a petition from almost 100 residents of Port Alberni, British Columbia, who call upon Parliament to pass into law legislation that will protect the life of the unborn child from conception and at all stages of development with the exception of the extremely rare situation in which an abortion is performed in order to save the life of the mother.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Etobicoke—Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of 27 men and women of Etobicoke—Lakeshore I am presenting a petition that has been certified correct both as to form and as to content pursuant to Standing Order 106.

The petition calls upon Parliament to pass a law to protect the life, liberty and security of the unborn at every stage of its development.

CANADA-U.S. FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present three petitions signed by residents of Winnipeg who say that the trade agreement negotiated by the Mulroney Government threatens the very fabric of Canadian political and economic sovereignty by removing the power of the Canadian Government to control effectively foreign ownership, to develop Canadian energy resources in the best interests of Canadians, or equalize opportunities between regions.

Therefore, they humbly pray and call upon Parliament to dissolve and allow the people of Canada the opportunity to accept or reject the proposed free trade agreement during a national general election.

RESEARCH INTO PREVENTION AND CURE OF SCHIZOPHRENIA

Mr. Jim Caldwell (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure to present a petition signed by residents of Blenheim, Ridgetown, Morpeth, Chatham and Highgate who humbly pray and call upon Parliament to ensure that research efforts related to schizophrenia will, in the future, be commensurate with the seriousness of this illness in Canada.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, Question No. 360 will be answered today.

[Text]

MEMBERS OF CANADIAN ARMED FORCES RELEASED

Question No. 360—Mr. Robinson:

1. In (a) 1984 (b) 1985 (c) 1986 (d) 1987 (e) 1988 to date, how many members of the Canadian Armed Forces have been released under Canadian Forces Administrative Order (CFAO) 19/20?

2. Is there a new policy in place to replace CFAO 19/20 and, if so, what is it?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Defence): 1. Number of members released from the Canadian Forces by virtue of the application of CFAO 19-20.

Year	Homosexual	Sexual Deviation	Total
1985	19	13	32
1986	12	15	27

2. (a) No. (b) The application of CFAO 19-20 was modified on February 11, 1987 following statement of the Minister of National Defence before the Standing Committee on Human Rights on the matter of sexual orientation as it affects the Canadian Forces. The modifications involved removal of the obligation on the part of members of the Canadian Forces to report suspected homosexuals to Canadian Forces authorities and a change with respect to the basis for ineligibility to serve from "propensity" to "acts". Current policy has been further modified in that the involuntary release, under Item 5(d) of QR&O Chap 15, of serving members actually engaged in the practice of homosexual activities has been suspended pending government consideration of the Canadian Force policy.

ABORTION

The House resumed from Wednesday, July 27, the motion of Mr. Lewis:

That, in the opinion of this House, the Supreme Court of Canada having declared that the provisions of the Criminal Code relating to abortion are inconsistent with the provisions of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and are therefore of no force or effect, the government should prepare and introduce legislation, consistent with the Constitution of Canada, including the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which reflects the fundamental value and inherent dignity of each human being and the inherent worth of human life, and which achieves a balance between the right of a woman to liberty and security of her person and the responsibility of society to protect the unborn; and

Such legislation should prohibit the performance of an abortion, subject to the following exceptions:

When, during the earlier stages of pregnancy: a qualified medical practitioner is of the opinion that the continuation of the pregnancy of a woman would, or would be likely to, threaten her physical or mental well-being; when the woman in consultation with a qualified medical practitioner decides to terminate her pregnancy; and when the termination is performed by a qualified medical practitioner; and

When, during the subsequent stages of pregnancy: the termination of the pregnancy satisfies further conditions, including a condition that after a certain point in time, the termination would only be permitted where, in the opinion of two qualified medical practitioners, the continuation of the pregnancy would, or would be likely to, endanger the woman's life or seriously endanger her health.

Mr. Speaker: I should advise the House before giving my ruling that, in order to assist Hon. Members, a copy of the ruling is now being taken to each desk by the Pages.

I should say that—and perhaps this is a good time to say it in order to relieve any anxieties that Hon. Members may have with respect to the procedure—when the hour of deliberation commences, all Members are then invited, if they feel that there is anything within the ruling that they want clarified, to avail themselves of the services of the Table Officers.

I shall now commence to read the ruling.

Pursuant to the special order of the House adopted on July 26, 1988 it is my duty now to provide the House with my ruling in relation to the proposed amendments to the motion of the Hon. Minister of State (Treasury Board) (Mr. Lewis) on the subject of abortion.

[Translation]

I will begin by dealing with the proposed amendments which I feel are out of order and cannot therefore be put to the House.

Abortion

[English]

Motion No. 5 standing in the name of the Hon. Member for Kitchener (Mr. Reimer) seeks to amend the main motion by introducing the concepts of both the stress and anxiety which may accompany an unexpected pregnancy and also economic considerations. It is my view that such concepts are raising new propositions which were not contemplated in the main motion. I would refer Members to Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, Citation 437(2). I therefore must rule Motion No. 5 out of order.

[Translation]

Motion No. 15 in the name of the Hon. Member for Kent (Mr. Hardey) is virtually identical to Motion No. 5 and is also out of order for the same reasons.

[English]

Motion No. 6 in the name of the Hon. Member for Scarborough East (Mr. Hicks) refers to the possible psychological consequences of obtaining an abortion,the support services available to mothers and the possibilities of adoption. This motion attempts to introduce new concepts into the main motion and is therefore also out of order pursuant to Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, Citation 437(2).

[Translation]

Motion No. 18 in the name of the Hon. Member for Scarborough West (Mr. Stackhouse) is similar to Motion No. 6 and also deals with psychological consequences and counselling and is out of order for the same reasons as Motion No. 6.

[English]

Motion No. 9 standing in the name of the Hon. Member for York—Peel (Mr. Stevens) also attempts to introduce new concepts into the motion in that it specifies giving pre-eminence to the protection of all life and recognizing that the foetus is a human being. This was not envisaged in the main motion. Therefore, for the same reasons as those given for Motions Nos. 5 and 6, Motion No. 9 would also be out of order.

Motion No. 7 in the name of the Hon. Member for Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington (Mr. Vankoughnet) and Motion No. 8 in the name of the Hon. Member for Willowdale (Mr. Oostrom) would introduce into the main motion a contradiction in giving pre-eminence to the life of the foetus, which would be inconsistent with the thrust of the main question. They would both therefore be out of order and I would refer Hon. Members to Beauchesne's Fourth Edition, Citation 203(5).

Motion No. 17 standing in the name of the Hon. Member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso (Mr. O'Neil) and Motion No. 19 standing in the name of the Hon. Member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Nicholson) are virtually identical to Motion No. 8 and are ruled out of order for the same reasons.

• (1120)

Motion No. 11, in the name of the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Ms. Dewar), would introduce a new concept into the main motion by attempting to ensure equality of access throughout the country and through reference to the Canada Health Act. Pursuant to Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, Citation 437, this amendment is out of order.

Motion No. 14, in the name of the Hon. Member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor), attempts to amend the Criminal Code and is therefore out of order. Also Motion No. 16, in the name of the Hon. Member for York East (Mr. Redway), attempts to add to the motion a new proposition not envisaged in the main motion and is therefore out of order. I again refer Members to Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, Citation 437.

Motion No. 21, in the name of the Hon. Member for London—Middlesex (Mr. Clifford), in making reference to programs which would foster better knowledge and understanding, is attempting to introduce concepts foreign to the original proposition and, pursuant to Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, Citation 437(1), this motion is out of order.

In resumé then, Motions Nos. 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 11, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19 and 21 are ruled out of order.

[Translation]

Some of the motions which were submitted are virtually identical to other motions and will not be selected to be put to the House for a vote for that reason. In cases of duplication, the motion submitted first will be the one selected to be put to the House while those submitted later will not be selected.

[English]

Motion No. 4, in the name of the Hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm), is virtually identical to Motion No. 3 and will therefore not be selected. Motion No. 12, in the name of the Hon. Member for London East (Mr. Jepson), is also virtually identical to Motion No. 3 and will not therefore be selected. This is also the case with Motion No. 20 in the name of the Hon. Member for Dartmouth—Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall). It will not be selected as it is virtually identical to Motion No. 3.

In resumé then, Motions Nos. 4, 12 and 20 will not be selected.

This leaves Motions Nos. 1, 2, 3, 10 and 13 which will be put to the House.

In attempting to decide in what order the above mentioned motions should be submitted to the House for decision, the Chair has found itself in a totally unprecedented situation and, as I mentioned to the House the other day, there is little direction or guidance in the special order adopted last Tuesday other than that in paragraph 2 of that order found at page 3277 of the Votes and Proceedings:

> 2. The Speaker, in a manner similar to the practice at the report stage of Bills, will have power to select, group and determine the voting procedure for all such amendments, with his statement and ruling on such selection, grouping and voting (consistent with Part (8) of this Order) to be made to the House when the debate is first resumed . . .

[Translation]

Ruling on the acceptability of certain of the motions is obviously relevant to the practice of report stage motions relating to Bills.

[English]

The selection of motions was therefore made first on the basis of procedural acceptability and, second, they were given priority of selection against other substantially similar motions on the basis of the chronology in which they were received or submitted to the Table. That is also in keeping with the practice of how motions at the report stage are given priority for submission to the House. The voting pattern that I will now list is also strictly in keeping with that same practice and will reflect the chronological order in which the motions were submitted.

Accordingly, the voting procedure on Motions Nos. 1, 2, 3, 10 and 13 will be as follows:

(a) Motion No. 1, in the name of the Hon. Member for Capilano (Mrs. Collins), will be put first and voted on by the House.

If the decision is affirmative, Motions Nos. 2, 3 and 13 will consequently not be put to the House for a vote, since they attempt to amend the same part of the main motion. But Motion No. 10, in the name of the Hon. Member for Calgary South (Mrs. Sparrow), which affects part of the main motion not touched by the adoption of Motion No. 1, will then be put to the House for a vote.

If the decision on Motion No. 1 is negative, Motion No. 2, in the name of the Hon. Member for Sarnia—Lambton (Mr. James), will be put next and voted on by the House.

b) If the decision on Motion No 2 is affirmative, Motion Nos 3, 10 and 13 will consequently not be put to the House for a vote.

If the decision on Motion No 2 is negative, Motion No 3, in the name of the Hon. Member for Grey—Simcoe (Mr. Mitges), will then be put and voted on by the House.

[English]

(c) If the decision on Motion No. 3 is affirmative, Motions Nos. 10 and 13 will consequently not be put to the House for a vote.

If the decision on Motion No. 3 is negative, Motion No. 10, in the name of the Hon. Member for Calgary South (Mrs. Sparrow), will then be put and voted on by the House.

(d) If the decision on Motion No. 10 is affirmative, Motion No. 13, in the name of the Hon. Member for Don Valley West (Mr. Bosley), will consequently not be put to the House for a vote.

If the decision on Motion No. 10 is negative, Motion No. 13 will then be put and voted on by the House.

e) Finally, the main motion, will be put and voted on by the House either in its original from or amended as the case may be.

[English]

I think that it might be appropriate for the Chair to just remark that the Chair has been extremely conscious of a variety of views in the Chamber, and it is the hope of the Chair that the procedure set out in this ruling will, as much as is possible, give Hon. Members a chance to reflect those views in a vote. I know that there has been a sentiment among some Members to proceed in a somewhat different way, whereby we would be voting on each of the motions, no matter what the result of that vote will be. I do want to say that even up to early this morning I have given that further thought than I had over the last number of weeks. I have to say to those Hon. Members that it did not seem appropriate to the Chair to proceed in that way. It would be extremely difficult to justify procedurally, especially in view of the fact that the Chair is bound by the resolution establishing this procedure, and I am in that resolution bound to adhere as closely as I can to the practice at report stage of a Bill.

• (1130)

I thank Hon. Members for their co-operation.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, if I may, I think I am speaking for all Members of the House, I want to thank you and the Table Officers for the time and effort that has been put into the ruling. I appreciate that it is not one where there is a lot of precedent to fall back on, but I believe, Sir, we have been well served by the debate and well served by your efforts in this ruling.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I want to endorse what the Minister said, but I would also like to say a few words of thanks to the staff of the House, to all those who gave us their support and who worked so hard to help Members during the past few days, and we hope they will be able to have a vacation during the next few days and get some well-earned rest.

[English]

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I too want to add my voice to that of the Deputy House Leader regarding your decision. On everyone's behalf may I say that the decision to circulate your ruling in writing and to lay out in precis form how we will proceed is most useful to all Members and will help guide us as we each make up our own decisions.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I note that whether a motion has been declared in order or out of order is based on the resolution on the Order Paper. I feel, and many others felt, that the resolution was very faulty in places and not accurate. Since Motion No. 14, the motion that I presented, ultimately does what we have to do, namely, amends the Criminal Code, why would it be out of order in this consideration?

Mr. Speaker: The Chair has, as the Hon. Member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) knows, a most profound regard for the many years of service of the Hon. Member in this place and for his experience. I do not take the Hon. Member's intervention lightly except to say this, and I must say it. It is not always easy to take the number of motions as there were in this case and put them in what had to be as much as possible a cohesive series of votes that would as much as possible again reflect the thinking in this Chamber.

The Hon. Member's motion, in the view of the Chair, and I regret this, is not acceptable procedurally. It may well be that the resolution itself to which the Hon. Member has referred is not as wide or not as flexible as some Members would have wished. I know the Hon. Member knows that the Chair has to take what is brought to me by the House.

I hope the Hon. Member will be able to bear with me, and I hope he will feel, in the other votes available to him, that he will be in a position to express his views.

I think momentarily we will be going to the other place, but I want to reiterate something. The one hour will run after we come back to the Chamber unless there is dissent, and I do not hear any. Again I reiterate that the services of the Table Officers are here at Members' disposal. I urge Hon. Members, if there is some confusion, to consult them.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, we are content to have the hour start to run from now and that the Royal Assent take place within that time, if it is the wish of the House.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: If that is the wish of the House, that is certainly acceptable. My only concern was to make sure that, because we go to the other place there should be no sense in this Chamber that Hon. Members are losing the full hour of consideration.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, may I just say that in the adopted procedure there was a provision for Royal Assent. I take it we can now proceed with the hour as per the agreement and come back here at 12.30 p.m. or thereabouts to vote.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the exchange. There is agreement.

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, the Honourable Deputy to the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

• (1135)

And being returned.

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that when the House went up to the Senate chamber, the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the Royal Assent to the following bills:

> Bill C-58, an Act to provide for the implementation of treaties for mutual legal assistance in legal matters and to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Immigration Act, 1976—Chapter 37.
> Bill C-72, an Act respecting the status and use of the official languages of Canada—Chapter 38.
> Bill C-73, an Act to provide for the implementation of an agreement respecting Indian lands in Ontario—Chapter 39.
> Bill C-105, an Act to ensure the safe operation of railways and to amend certain other Acts in consequence thereof—Chapter 40.
> Bill C-121, an Act to authorize the reorganization and divestiture of Eldorado Nuclear Limited and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof—Chapter 41.
> Bill C-126, an Act to amend the Bretton Woods and Related Agreements Act—Chapter 42.
> Bill C-308, an Act to change the name of the electoral district of Chapleau—Chapter 43.

SITTING SUSPENDED

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to order made Tuesday, July 26, 1988, the sitting is suspended to the call of the Chair. I should advise Hon. Members that the bell will ring when the House is to be reassembled.

At 11.45 a.m., the sitting of the House was suspended.

• (1240)

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 12.47 p.m.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Minister of State (Mr. Lewis) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I rise to seek the consent of the House for a vote row by row on all questions.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the suggestion of the Hon. Minister of State. Is it agreed?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to the order made on Tuesday, July 26, 1988, the Chair will now proceed to put all questions necessary to dispose of the motion, standing in the name of the Hon. Minister of State for the Treasury Board, in relation to the question on abortion. May I remind Hon. Members that any bell sounded to call in the Members shall ring for not more than 15 minutes.

Accordingly, the first question is on Motion No. 1.

Mrs. Mary Collins (Capilano) moved:

Motion No. 1

That the motion be amended

(a) by deleting in the second paragraph the words "subject to the following exceptions" and substituting the words "except as follows:";

(b) by deleting in the third paragraph the words "a qualified medical practitioner is of the opinion that the continuation of the pregnancy of a woman would, or would be likely to, threaten her physical or mental well-being; when";

(c) by deleting in the fourth paragraph the words "two qualified medical practitioners" and substituting the words "a qualified medical practitioner" and by adding immediately after the words "endanger her" the words "mental and physical".

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

Some Hon. Members: Fifteen-minute bell.

Mr. Speaker: Again?

Some Hon. Members: Dispense.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, the understanding that we had is that we begin the voting about 12.30. I suggest that we are all here, and that we should suspend the ringing of the bells.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Minister of State perhaps would assist the Chair.

Mr. Lewis: I think, Mr. Speaker, while any one Member feels that a bell should be rung, the bell should be rung.

Abortion

Mr. Speaker: Call in the Members. I remind Members that it will be a 15-minute bell.

The House divided on the motion (Mrs. Collins), which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost.

The next question is on Motion No. 2.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services) moved:

Motion No. 2

That the motion be amended

(a) by deleting in the third paragraph the words "earlier stages" and substituting the words "first trimester";

(b) by deleting paragraph four and substituting the following therefor:

"termination of the pregnancy would only be permitted where, two qualified medical practitioners have, in good faith and on reasonable grounds, stated that in their opinion the continuation of the pregnancy would, or would be likely to, endanger the life of the pregnant woman or seriously and substantially endanger her health and there is no other commonly accepted medical procedure for effectively treating the health risk; and when the termination is performed by a qualified medical practitioner."

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Shall I dispense with the bells?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Call in the Members.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. McCrossan: Mr. Speaker, I am rising to record the fact that I abstained on the vote on Motion No. 3, since I will not vote against a pro-life motion. However, since on technical grounds Motions Nos. 5 and 15 were deemed inadmissible and there is no remaining motion which combines the concept of a threat to life in serious or substantial danger to health, I find—

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member, of course, has, as do other Hon. Members, the right to say that they have abstained. I do not think that it is appropriate to go into a speech on the subject matter.

Mr. Duguay: I wish to record that I also abstained, and I think that the Hon. Member has just expressed my point of view as well.

Mr. Speaker: The next question is on Motion No. 10.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary South) moved:

Motion No. 10

That the motion be amended in the third paragraph by deleting the words "during the earlier stages of pregnancy" and substituting therefor the words "up to and including the 18th week of pregnancy".

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

Motion No. 10 (Mrs. Sparrow) negatived.

Mr. Speaker: The next question is on Motion No. 13.

Hon. John W. Bosley moved:

Motion No. 13

That the motion be amended by deleting paragraphs two, three and four and substituting the following therefor:

"Such legislation should prohibit the performance of an abortion except when performed by a qualified medical practitioner."

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Shall I dispense with the ringing of the bells?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, I would like it noted that I was in the House for all of the votes and abstained.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: The next question is on the main motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Yes.

Some Hon. Members: No.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Shall I dispense with the ringing of the bells?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: On division.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Lewis), which was negatived on the following division:

(Division No. 500)

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

[Translation]

Mrs. Bertrand: Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I was in the House and that I abstained from voting on any of the motions, to be consistent with the opinions I expressed in my speech yesterday.

[English]

Mr. Pennock: Mr. Speaker, I erred in my vote on Motion No. 13, paying more attention to the paragraph than to what the deletions would have done.

[Translation]

Mr. Malépart: Mr. Speaker, for two days Parliament has been wasting its time. We haven't accomplished anything with this charade!

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I know that Hon. Members would want to join the Speaker in refreshments in Room 16 and also to thank all of the members of the House of Commons staff who have put in a great deal of hard work, and to wish them well.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: It being 2.30 o'clock p.m., pursuant to order made Tuesday, July 26, 1988, this House stands adjourned until Wednesday, August 10, 1988, at 2 o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 3(1)

At 2.30 p.m., the House adjourned.

HERBICIDES

2,4-D—SUGGESTED BAN FOR NON-ESSENTIAL USES

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, statistics show a steady increase in the occurrence of a form of lymphatic cancer linked to the common weed killer 2,4-D. The frequency of this type of cancer and the number of deaths it causes have doubled, claiming 1,500 lives in 1986, at a time when most other types of cancer have been declining.

About 5,000 tonnes of 2,4-D are sprayed annually on seven million hectares of land including crops, parks, golf courses, lawns, in forests, and under power transmission lines.

We urge the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise), as a first step, to ban all non-essential uses such as municipal and residential spraying, and instruct all federal agencies to stop using 2,4-D immediately. Then, the use should be reduced to a minimum in agriculture and forestry.

At the same time the Government must intensify research on alternatives to 2,4-D instead of cutting research and corners at the expense of public health.

THE LATE FÉLIX LECLERC

Mr. Marcel Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, for the past two days, Quebecers and other Canadians have mourned the loss of our great national poet which filled us with a sense of profound sadness and sorrow. This "Grand Canadien", as the French called him, was the best ambassador we ever had, who not only made his people known but also gained recognition for them as a people.

Mr. Speaker, this man, who was integrity personified, who was both very forthright and extremely sensitive, has left us a treasure that will be a lasting tribute to his memory.

Like Félix Leclerc, let us be proud and stand up for our ideals. Thank you, Félix Leclerc, "le Canadien", we will never forget you!

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CEASE-FIRE IN IRAN-IRAQ WAR—CANADIAN PEACEKEEPING ROLE

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, my Party has always been a strong advocate of the United Nations and its peacekeeping role. That is why I am very happy that Canada is taking part in the peacekeeping force that is on its way to the Persian Gulf. I would like to offer my Party's official support for this action.

We can only enhance Canada's international reputation as a peaceful nation by helping to supervise the cease-fire between Iran and Iraq. We all hope that this will also contribute to the final resolution of this conflict. It might even show other troubled nations that there is a way to resolve their differences peacefully; and it will surely strengthen the role of the United Nations in resolving international disputes.

I wish our troops well. May they have a safe trip and, more important, a speedy return. Of course that depends on Iran and Iraq. They must show the world that they are willing to resolve their differences peacefully. A cease-fire is better than war, but it is not enough. The world needs a lasting peace in this troubled region.

DISASTERS

1987 EDMONTON TORNADO—COMMEMORATIVE PLAQUE

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton North): Mr. Speaker, on July 31 of this year I had the privilege and honour to represent the people of Canada in Edmonton North at a ceremony which paid tribute to those who were lost in the tornado of July 31, 1987.

On their behalf, Sir, they wish me to convey through you their sincere thanks to all Canadians who so generously helped them in their time of need. On their behalf I am presenting you this plaque I hold in order that you can put it in the Hall of Honour.

PORTS

PORT OF CHURCHILL—NON-SHIPMENT OF GRAIN

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw to the attention of the House the very serious circumstances facing the Port of Churchill. That port is an essential part of the grain delivery system for western Canada. At this time of the year it has yet to receive any allocation of any grain shipments whatsoever. In other words, the port is completely dead still and not in operation.

That runs totally contrary to an agreement signed in 1984 with the provincial Government of Manitoba when the Wheat Board offered to make best efforts to ensure that grain shipments would go through the Port of Churchill. What we are experiencing now is not only the loss of jobs in Churchill itself, but the loss of a very vital and essential ingredient in the economic development of western Canada.

I call upon the Government to ensure that there are grain shipments through the Port of Churchill, and that it live up to the commitments made by the previous Government in 1984.

SHIPBUILDING

PROPOSED CONSTRUCTION OF MINESWEEPERS

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, last month the Government announced plans to acquire badly needed minesweepers. In doing so it stated that it hoped to give smaller shipyards with a proven expertise a chance to develop Canadian shipbuilding.

A national consortium of smaller shipyards already exists and is geared up to do the type of work ordered. There are six different yards in four provinces, headed by Canadian Shipbuilders and Engineering Company of St. Catharines. A proposal for design and ship construction has already been made.

It has been stated by people in high places that an unemployed shipbuilder anywhere is still unemployed.

These yards are capable and now available. The Government will be able to close that disgraceful gap in our coastal defence earlier and more economically by negotiating with the CSE consortium without delay.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

WESTERN CANADA PROCUREMENT CONTRACTS

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, according to the most recent government statistics, the four western provinces, which make up 30 per cent of the Canadian population, received only 11 per cent of national contracts handed out by the Department of Supply and Services in Ottawa.

My home province of British Columbia, with 11.4 per cent of the population, received only 3.6 per cent of the contracts from this administration. Incredibly, the Conservative Government has given the West an even smaller share of these contracts than the previous Trudeau Liberals—and you know what the West thought of them, Mr. Speaker! Ontario and Quebec received between them 77 per cent of federal procurement.

It is an attitude. The Government sees the Province of British Columbia mainly as a source of natural resources. The Government does not understand that British Columbia needs funds for research and development. We are not asking for any more than our fair share, but we want our fair share of contracts for our printers, computer programmers, advertising agencies, consulting firms, and research and development.

There is going to be an election. The Conservative MPs from British Columbia will have to answer to the people of the West on why they have let the West down.

IMMIGRATION

BOGUS REFUGEE STATUS CLAIMANTS

Mr. John Oostrom (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, the total number of potential refugee claimants reached an all-time high of 56,237 as of July 22, 1988, thanks to the Liberal controlled other place playing cheap political games. This figure is expected to increase dramatically even with the passage of Bills C-55 and C-84, since their provisions to prevent abuse of our immigration system will not be in effect until January 1, 1989. In the meantime, unscrupulous individuals and so-called consultants will have another four and a half months to create further chaos in Canada.

The Government must create a mechanism to prevent this possible onslaught of bogus claimants until the new regulations take effect. The Canadian people will not forget how the Liberal controlled Senate played politics with the lives of human beings.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

QUEBEC—ASSISTANCE PROGRAMS FOR OUTLYING REGIONS

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, on June 9 the Minister of Regional Economic Development and his Quebec counterpart announced a federal-provincial agreement worth $970 million that would benefit certain outlying areas and Quebec as a whole.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, since then the Canadian Government has been dragging its feet, and none of the regions where announcements were made that several million dollars were forthcoming have been able to benefit from any concrete programs. I personally checked this with all the department's regional offices in Quebec. None of the regions have any programs whatsoever, and no forms are available. Mr. Speaker, this means that at this very moment, developers in Quebec cannot apply to the federal Government for funding.

Again, the Minister is dragging his feet, and Quebec's developers are suffering the consequences. Mr. Speaker, I hope all this was not just a lot of electioneering, that it was not just a smoke screen, and that economic development will take place as promised and that is why it is important to get this program on track as soon as possible.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

NIAGARA PENINSULA UNEMPLOYMENT RATE

Mr. Allan Pietz (Welland): Mr. Speaker, in my area the Government's job strategy is working and its success is reflected in the latest unemployment figures for St. Catharines, Niagara. In the Niagara Peninsula we are experiencing the lowest rate of unemployment in 22 years. For the month of July unemployment was at 3.7 per cent, a figure that we have not seen since the 1960s. We are talking jobs, jobs, jobs.

In another few weeks 132 students will complete their summer jobs under Challenge '88 and return to school. Over the past four years hundreds of students have been able to put what they have learned at school into practice. At the same time, they have increased their chances for jobs after graduation.

The success of Challenge '88 and other federal job-creation strategies is matched by the positive response of private industry to the improved economic climate in the past four years. The record low unemployment figure in Niagara is proof that the Government has delivered on its promises. Canadians are working because this Government's initiatives are working.

SPORTS

"THE GREAT ONE" GOES SOUTH

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, yesterday 99 per cent of Canadian hockey fans across Canada were disappointed to hear that our famous No. 99 will be lost to the Los Angeles Kings and no longer will be playing for the Edmonton Oilers. For all Canadians, especially the youth of Canada, Wayne Gretzky was a model sportsman and a model athlete.

An Hon. Member: He still is. What do you mean was?

Mr. Riis: He was a very special symbol for all Canadians, being not only an outstanding athlete in terms of expertise but also in terms of talent, and he always played fairly and showed great sportsmanship. I simply want to say that we are sad to see him leave Canada and go to Los Angeles. Los Angeles' gain in this case will not only be the Edmonton Oilers' loss but Edmonton's loss and all of Canada's loss.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT—POSITION OF CANADIAN FEDERATION OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture has written an urgent letter to all Members of Parliament. The Federation is demanding a meeting with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) because of its concern about the Prime Minister's trade deal with the United States. Canadian agriculture will be compromised by this deal.

• (1415)

The Federation is concerned that the deal will have a negative impact on marketing boards and our supply management system, on the Canadian Wheat Board's marketing system, on the standards of quality of Canadian agricultural products, and on the sacrifice of the horticultural industry. It is also concerned that our existing marketing system will not be protected because there is no action to put poultry or broiler hatching eggs under import controls; because of failures to consult with industry on the administration of the import control system, and because of the failure of the Government to make a strong public commitment to the Canadian Wheat Board.

The Canadian Federation of Agriculture said that it cannot endorse an agreement which would undermine the Canadian farmers' ability to maintain and implement the necessary structures and programs to assist Canadian agriculture. That is exactly what the Prime Minister's free trade deal does, it undermines Canadian agriculture.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

INAUGURATION OF MISTASSINI ADMINISTRATION OFFICE

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, on August 8, 1988, I attended the inauguration of the administrative office in Mistassini, north of Chibougamau. This is an impressive complex bringing together all the administrative services required by the people of Mistassini.

Chief Henry Mianscum cut the ribbon at the inauguration, accompanied by members of the band and in the presence of Great Chief Matthew Coon-Come and two children.

We then had the opportunity to attend a grand show in pure native tradition put on by the wise men and children of the reserve.

Mr. Speaker, this is an outstanding achievement of the James Bay Cree people and we cannot help admire the way they run their affairs.

THE FRANCHISE

COURT DECISIONS ON VOTING RIGHTS FOR PENITENTIARY INMATES

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, once again a lower court has decided that under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms penitentiary inmates have a right to vote in federal and provincial elections, in this case provincial, and once again Attorneys General, in this case the provincial Attorney General for Ontario—and recently the Attorney General for Canada—have decided not to appeal these decisions.

I want to express my objection to this interpretation of the Charter, and my hope that these decisions will be appealed by some courageous Attorney General somewhere in our country. To me the idea that inmates ought to be able to vote in federal and provincial elections is totally unacceptable. Losing the right to vote is a sanction, like loss of freedom, which ought to be acceptable in a democratic society as reasonably justified.

I regret very much this turn of events and urge Attorneys General to appeal these lower court decisions.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT—GLOBE AND MAIL EDITORIAL

Mr. William C. Winegard (Guelph): Mr. Speaker, during the last several weeks we have heard a lot of rhetoric about how the Opposition would rip up the free trade agreement. The Opposition would be well advised to read today's Globe and Mail, and I quote:

> It is whistling Dixie north of Windsor to suggest that Canada could tear up this agreement now and make another one with the United States soon. No U.S. administration is going to start over to seek essentially the same ends after such a rebuff. Let us not parade our naivety so conspicuously, or offer comforting assurances so disingeniously.
> No one should pretend that rejecting this free trade agreement would not damage Canada's economic prospects and lead to higher unemployment than would otherwise occur. No one should pretend that rejecting this deal would not expose the Auto Pact to early renegotiation in much tougher circumstances.

Let the Opposition deal with reality and let us get on with what is good for Canada, Mr. Speaker.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT—REQUEST FOR GENERAL ELECTION

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in his very first speech to this House of Commons, in the same speech where he mentioned social programs as being a sacred trust, the Prime Minister said that the Canadian Government, and I quote his words, "must honour that fundamental British tradition in this country which calls for an election within four years so that the people can judge".

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An Hon. Member: What about the Senate?

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Those were the Prime Minister's words. That same day the Prime Minister moved a motion of non-confidence saying that the House of Commons, and I use the words of the motion "requires that an election be called in accordance with the Canadian custom, practice and tradition of holding a general election at least every four years".

Mr. Darling: Wait for the four years.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): My question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Does the Prime Minister still believe that? If he does, why hasn't he called an election to be held on or before September 4, 1988, so that the people can decide and pronounce on the trade deal with the United States?

• (1420)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman is a lawyer and he has some expertise in constitutional law, and I think he knows—

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Some.

Mr. Mazankowski: Some. I think he knows that the requirements are that elections be held within a five-year mandate. Every Government is elected for a five-year mandate, and any time after the fourth year expires generally we start thinking about an election. When the fourth year comes upon us, maybe we will start thinking about calling an election.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I suspect that four years or so ago the Deputy Prime Minister and Mr. Erik Nielsen drafted that particular motion, and I would have thought he would have held to it today, conceding that the people do have a right to decide.

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT—
GOVERNMENT POSITION

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister and his Cabinet colleagues told us that no trade agreement with the United States would be signed if the American omnibus trade bill applied to Canada. Furthermore, all the Conservative Members of the House Committee said that it should be abandoned if the American omnibus bill applied to Canada.

The Deputy Prime Minister knows very well that last week, the U.S. Congress officially ratified the omnibus bill. It is ready for the President's signature and this bill applies to Canada.

Can the Deputy Prime Minister explain why the Government persists in going ahead with the Bill to implement the trade agreement with the United States, now that the American omnibus bill applies directly to Canada?

[English]

Mr. John McDermid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I would like to reply to the right hon. gentleman. As he knows, the omnibus trade Bill that was looked at by the Standing Committee of the House of Commons has been drastically changed. It has been watered down rather dramatically. Most of the concerns of Canadians have been taken out of it. Others have been watered down rather dramatically. There is nothing in the U.S. omnibus free trade Bill that we can see at this time that is in contravention of the free trade agreement, so we are satisfied that the free trade agreement should go ahead for the betterment of Canada and all its people.

ACCESS TO AMERICAN MARKET

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would urge the Parliamentary Secretary to read the new, revised, and completed version of the American omnibus trade Bill. He will find that not only does it apply to Canada, despite the unanimous wishes of every member of the trade committee of the House of Commons, it adds a whole new set of unilateral trade remedies available against Canada at the discretion of the President and the Congress of the United States.

In 1983 the Prime Minister of Canada, in a campaign for the leadership of his Party, said he was against free trade. In 1984 the Prime Minister of Canada did not say a word about free trade during a general election. In 1985 the Prime Minister of Canada began bilateral negotiations with the President of the United States on free trade. In 1986 the Prime Minister of Canada said he would not accept a deal unless there was guaranteed access to the American market. In 1987 the Prime Minister of Canada said that U.S. protectionist trade laws should not apply to Canada.

It is now 1988. We have no guaranteed access to the American market under the trade deal, and now new American protectionist trade laws apply to Canada. I ask the Deputy Prime Minister of Canada if it is not time to let the people decide.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, it is rather amusing that the right hon. gentleman would ignore the advice of a $23 million Royal Commission headed by a former colleague of his which came out very strongly in favour of a bilateral trade agreement with the United States of America.

The Royal Commission report said: "The Canadian nation is not a weak and fragile plant doomed to disappearing merely because we trade more freely and securely with our American neighbour. Free trade will reduce regional divisions and enhance Canadian confidence. Canadian nationalism and our collective identity as a people are deeply rooted in more than a century of our evolutionary common existence". I think those were words well spoken.

• (1425)

I find it rather strange that the right hon. gentleman, who sometimes plays a little footloose and fancy free with the truth—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mazankowski: —even as late as October 26, 1987, in this House said, and I quote from page 10359 of Hansard—

Ms. Copps: What page?

Mr. Mazankowski: It is 10359:

> I happen to believe that Canadians can compete with anyone, including the Americans. I believe we can compete without sacrificing our sovereignty and political independence.
> I have faith in this country. I have faith in Canadians and I have faith that we are mature enough, talented enough, confident enough and tough enough to make our own choices in our own way—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: That is exactly what this trade deal does.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for York Centre.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I would like to know what that statement that the Deputy Prime Minister just read has to do with the pathetic agreement which has been signed between Canada and the U.S. on trade.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

APARTHEID

SOUTH AFRICA—ECONOMIC AND DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister and concerns the regrettable continuing economic and diplomatic relations between Canada and South Africa. I want to remind the Minister that on October 23, 1985, speaking at the UN General Assembly the Prime Minister said the following:

> My Government has said to Canadians that if there are not fundamental changes in South Africa we are prepared to invoke total sanctions against that country and its repressive regime.
> If there is no progress in the dismantling of apartheid, our relations with South Africa may have to be severed absolutely.

The situation in South Africa with respect to the black majority has deteriorated. Has the Government taken the Ronald Reagan approach of constructive engagement, or the Margaret Thatcher approach of worrying about the well-being of the South African economy? In other words, when will the Prime Minister be prepared to do what he said he would do in front of the UN in 1985, cut off economic relations and terminate diplomatic relations with South Africa?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, we have not followed the American example or the British example.

Mr. Shields: Or the Liberal example of doing nothing.

Mr. Mazankowski: We have followed a Canadian approach which is thoughtful, and I think the initiatives taken by this Government under the leadership of the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and the very important meeting that took place in Toronto a few days ago, are a clear indication of the work—

Mr. Kaplan: A farce.

Mr. Mazankowski: The Hon. Member says it was a farce. The participants do not share that view. It is clear progress is being made.

Miss MacDonald: The Liberals did nothing.

Mr. Mazankowski: As has been said on previous occasions by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, if you cut off all ties, the opportunity to influence any change in South Africa would be diminished. The Hon. Member may want to engage in tactics, which may not be productive, as a headline seeking game, but the proof is in the pudding. Progress is being made. It is a co-operative—

Some Hon. Members: Where?

• (1430)

Mr. Mazankowski: Progress can only be made through the co-operative efforts of more than Canada alone. It requires the co-operation and inspiration of everyone, and that is the kind of leadership we are providing.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): There is no progress in South Africa. It becomes more of a Fascist state every day, and the Government knows that. Last year, before the Standing Committee on Human Rights, the Secretary of State for External Affairs said he had full authority from Cabinet for comprehensive, economic and diplomatic sanctions against South Africa. Does he still have it? And what is he waiting for to use them?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I can only advise the House that if there are any new initiatives that will be recommended by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, they will be brought forth to Cabinet for consideration, and I am sure they will be announced in the usual manner.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Oshawa.

Mr. Shields: Ladies and gentlemen, Shirley Carr! Give him a hand.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I see, Mr. Speaker, the days of recess have not diminished the lofty intellectual witticisms of the governing Party.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT—WATER RESOURCES

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): My question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister in the absence of the Prime Minister. The Deputy Prime Minister will know that for many weeks the Minister responsible for the trade deal with the United States has denied there was anything to the concerns Canadians had expressed about the possibility of water being included in the agreement.

Some Hon. Members: Come on!

Mr. Broadbent: After many weeks of pressure coming from this side of the House and from the people of Canada, the Government reluctantly agreed to change the wording of the Canadian Bill during the committee stage. The Deputy Prime Minister will know that many Canadian experts—as recently as yesterday another group of them—have said this approach is totally inadequate to protect our water resources.

Since the Minister for International Trade has said that water is not included, and since he has quoted Trade Representative Yeutter of the United States publicly as saying it is not included, will the Government of Canada—since it has ruled out a change to the agreement itself—at least go to the Americans this week and seek agreement to get letters attached as appendices to the agreement making clear in the view of both Governments that water is not included, and so give legal force to our deeply expressed concern to keep water out of the agreement?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the position that has been stated by the Minister for International Trade is indeed the position of the Government. It is still the position of the Government.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): God help us!

Mr. Mazankowski: We believe very much that this is another example of hysteria and falsehoods which have been perpetrated. But in order to clarify the issue—and that is merely what has been done in this particular area—and for the benefit of the Leader of the New Democratic Party who may not be aware the amendment is simply for clarification, it reads as follows:

> For greater certainty, nothing in this Act or the agreement, except Article 401 of the agreement, applies to water. In this section water means natural surface and ground water in liquid, gaseous or solid state but does not include water packaged as a beverage or in tanks.

This has consistently been the position of the Government. It does not provide for any wide-scale diversion of water.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): It's only an amendment to this Bill.

Mr. Mazankowski: It does provide for the export of water in bottles as a beverage. Why would the Hon. Member be opposed to that?

REQUEST FOR UNITED STATES COMMITMENT IN WRITING

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I want to turn the argument of the Deputy Prime Minister around. If the Deputy Prime Minister has said that water is not included, and if Mr. Yeutter in the United States has said water is not included, and since experts who know something, if I can put it this way, in greater detail than either the Deputy Prime Minister or myself about the law involved—

Mr. Mazankowski: Why beat a dead horse, then?

Mr. Broadbent: —and since they have said the amendment is insufficient, why does the Government refuse to go to the United States and ask them to put in writing what they verbally expressed? Why does the Government not do that?

Mr. John McDermid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Well, Mr. Speaker, I am happy to tell the Leader of the New Democratic Party that the United States will be putting that in writing on December 15 when we exchange letters—

Mr. Broadbent: In the agreement?

Mr. McDermid: —and we have put in our Bill implementing the free trade agreement that water is not included. They have to approve in a letter to Canada saying: " We have implemented the free trade agreement". In there it says that water is not part of it. When we exchange letters, they will agree with our implementation and we say it is not part of it. So letters will be exchanged on December 15. Water is out of the agreement.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the Parliamentary Secretary knows that the answer he has just given is not at all equivalent to the letters I am requesting, which should be attached—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: He knows that, if his howling back-benchers do not. He knows that what he has just talked about is entirely different from letters of clear understanding, of common interpretation, coming from our Government and the executive branch of the U.S. Government to be attached to the agreement. They are very different processes, indeed.

REQUEST FOR GENERAL ELECTION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): I want to ask the Parliamentary Secretary or, more correctly, the Deputy Prime Minister, since the Government has said no to our proposal to protect regional development programs, and has said no to proposals to protect Canadian culture, and has said no to protecting Canadian water, and since the people of Canada have said clearly that they are saying yes to an election before we proceed, will the Government do the right thing and have an election now on this deal?

Some Hon. Members: Go, go, go!

Mr. Riis: Don't be afraid of the people, Don.

Mr. McDermid: We should just walk away from the negotiations; that's Broadbent's solution.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I hate to disappoint the Leader of the New Democratic Party—

Mr. Broadbent: You do it every day. It's okay.

Mr. Mazankowski: I hate to disappoint him. I know he would love to see inherent in this legislation something to the effect that there would be a large scale diversion of water. Well, there just isn't, Mr. Speaker, and the Hon. Member should start accepting somebody's word.

He says we have said no to regional development. There could not be another instrument or device that would be more helpful to overcoming regional economic disparities than the free trade agreement which has been negotiated with the United States.

Mr. Broadbent: Every economist says that's hogwash, and you know it.

Mr. Mazankowski: Let the Leader of the New Democratic Party go out West to western Canada and speak to the people—

Mr. Broadbent: I will. We will be there this week, and in Edmonton, fellow, right in Edmonton.

Mr. Mazankowski: —rather than to his own partisan friends.

Mr. Broadbent: We'll see you in Edmonton!

Mr. Riis: Call an election and we will go to the people!

Mr. Mazankowski: I say to the Leader of the New Democratic Party through you, Mr. Speaker, to go out to Atlantic Canada and speak to the people—

Mr. Broadbent: I did last week.

Mr. Mazankowski: —and not to his own partisan supporters, and he will find the real truth, because this is the most important initiative ever undertaken to overcome regional economic disparities.

Mr. Broadbent: Go to the people now.

EXCHANGE OF LETTERS WITH UNITED STATES

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. Even though he is not wearing Gucci shoes, he is certainly dancing around on this issue, particularly when it comes to the question of water.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: We would like a clarification of the statement that was just made by the Parliamentary Secretary when he said we will be getting a confirmed agreement in letter form from the United States on December 15. Specifically, will we be requesting from the United States Government a confirmation in a letter that the agreement, not the legislation, but the agreement itself, Articles 105, 408 and the tariff schedule, will not apply to the transfer of water of any kind between Canada and the United States? Can we get the commitment that you will ask for that letter, and we will send a letter in return?

Mr. John McDermid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, if we followed that principle, the letter would be so long that the Hon. Member would not have time to read it.

Ms. Copps: That's ridiculous!

Mr. McDermid: I can tell the Hon. Member that the exchange of letters is very clear. It says that Canada, the letter from the United States to Canada, has implemented the free trade agreement. Implementing the free trade agreement is Bill C-130, an Act to implement the free trade agreement. In that Act it says that large-scale water exports to the United States are not part of the agreement. They never were. They never were. And the Americans have said that many, many times as well. When that exchange of letters takes place, it will confirm that we have implemented the free trade agreement, and in implementing it Bill C-130 says water is not part of it. That is all that is required. Can the Hon. Member not understand that?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, the Parliamentary Secretary is now backing off from his earlier statement.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss MacDonald: You didn't understand it.

Mr. Dick: He doesn't want to.

Mr. Axworthy: Go back to your submarine, fellow.

The Parliamentary Secretary will know that in testimony before the committee, the ambassador for trade, Mr. Ritchie, clearly said that the trade agreement will give the right to the United States to challenge Canadian water resources in front of the trade commission. He said that is part of the agreement and that agreement will take precedence. The legislation will not affect that right.

• (1440)

I return to my earlier question. Why is the Government afraid to ask the United States for explicit exemption from water by way of an exchange of letters or an amendment to the agreement, or are we simply getting from the Government, as we have had for the last two and a half years, a total and complete smokescreen about the real impact of the trade agreement upon Canadians?

Mr. John McDermid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member sure talks tough when he is in front of the TV cameras, but I noticed that he did not show up for the final vote in the committee on Bill C-130. He just disappeared—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: I was there longer than you were, McDermid. I sat longer than you did.

An Hon. Member: Good old Tory sleaze.

FREE TRADE

POSSIBILITY OF TRADE WAR BETWEEN CANADA AND UNITED STATES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

American politicians yesterday spoke of a trade war if Canadians reject the free trade agreement. Is the Minister prepared to accept such threats, or will he protest? Because this is a decision for us Canadians to make without threats.

[English]

Mr. John McDermid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, first, the statement that was made by Congressman John LaFalce was not a threat. It was not meant to be a threat in any way that I could see. There is probably no greater friend to Canada in the Congress than Congressman John LaFalce. That should be understood.

Second, he has supported free trade negotiations from the beginning because he saw and understood the protectionist problems in the United States and felt that this agreement was necessary. He knows those concerns are still there. He knows those problems still exist. He thinks the free trade agreement goes a very long way to solving a lot of the problems we have had between our two countries. That is why he is supporting it.

He is concerned that if this free trade agreement is not passed, these problems will come again to haunt us and they will be very difficult to solve. That is what he was talking about. It was not meant as a threat in any way, and the Hon. Member knows that full well.

REQUEST FOR GENERAL ELECTION

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I believe that massive vote in the United States was an endorsation of just how well their negotiators had done against us.

My supplementary question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. Will he tell the Americans that this is Canada's decision to make? Will the Government finally call the election that it should have called long ago, to take this legislation to the people, instead of forgetting that it does not have a mandate to take this country into the United States?

Mr. John McDermid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member knows full well that we just spent almost four weeks in committee hearing Canadians in all walks of life. I might say that his union friends walked out of the hearings and would not give testimony because they were afraid of the tough questions they would get. Shirley Carr, Bob White and the rest of them just watched how their times were set, and walked out and would not be heard—these so-called ordinary Canadians.

As far as an election is concerned, the Hon. Member will have his opportunity to debate this on the hustings. I can tell you that this side of the House is really looking forward to it. Be ready.

EFFECT OF AGREEMENT ON NIAGARA PENINSULA INDUSTRIES

Mr. Allan Pietz (Welland): Mr. Speaker, given that grapes and tender fruit are grown on 8 per cent of the land area of regional Niagara, and that major industries in the automotive, paper, chemical, steel, stainless steel, rubber, carbon, and farm machinery production sectors are major employers in the cities of Welland, St. Catharines, and Thorold, with a high dependency on the United States market for the sale of their products, what will be the effect on the workers in these industries if the free trade deal is not passed?

Mr. John McDermid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is absolutely right that there are a number of industries in the Niagara Peninsula that will have a very positive effect from the trade agreement and could have a negative effect if it does not go through.

Grant Wilson, past chairman of the Automotive Parts Manufacturers Association, told the committee studying Bill C-130 that if we had not signed the free trade agreement the Auto Pact was in deep trouble and auto parts manufacturers were in trouble as well.

The Hon. Member knows full well that in his riding and many other ridings in the Niagara Peninsula it could be disastrous if the free trade agreement does not go through. He did not mention the area of ship repair. There is a 50 per cent tariff on ship repairs now, and Port Weller can look forward to that tariff being removed and having its fair share of work at Port Weller.

REGIONAL INDUSTRIAL EXPANSION

REQUEST FOR MORE AID FOR QUEBEC PROMOTERS

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology. The Minister is aware that Quebec has been getting the short end of the stick as far as regional economic development is concerned. Calls were made today to his Department's regional offices, and it seems that as far as regional economic expansion is concerned, no programs are available for Quebec developers. The agreement signed on June 9 has not taken effect, the IRDP expired on June 30, and as far as federal regional industrial expansion programs are concerned, there is nothing on the horizon. I therefore want to ask the Minister how he can be responsible for his Department without having anything available for Quebec entrepreneurs at this point?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, unlike the previous Government to which the Hon. Member belonged, the present Government has done more for regional development in Quebec in the past few years than ever before. Recently, we announced a program worth nearly one billion dollars, in fact more than that, to support regional development, and not a program managed by Ottawa but by the regions themselves.

Mr. Speaker, many requests are still coming in under existing programs and being analyzed for suitability under the new programs, and the final documentation is already at the printers. The money is there. Regional development will take place in the regions or outlying areas—something you never did! For years, you left the regions to fend for themselves.

REQUEST THAT QUÉBEC PROMOTERS RECEIVE EQUALITY OF TREATMENT

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, the Minister doesn't know what he is talking about. I wish he would take the time to call his Department's regional offices. They will tell him there are no programs available and no forms, because the Minister is not making decisions as usual. Consequently, I would like to ask the Minister whether Quebec developers will be treated the same way as developers in the rest of this country. Could the Minister give me the assurance that the program he referred to will be available as soon as possible, and not in a month of Sundays? As you know, construction has to be done before winter starts. Will the Minister wake up and start running his Department the way it should be run?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, contracts are being awarded every single day of the week. We are getting applications every single day of the week. New programs are announced as soon as the forms are available. Mr. Speaker, I can assure you that as far as regional development is concerned, Quebec is much better off with this new program that it was with any of the programs set up by the previous government.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT—CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question also concerns the trade deal. United States government spokespeople and U.S. grain trade officials, as well as some Canadians, have been trying for years to undermine the effectiveness of our Canadian Wheat Board. Will the appropriate Minister tell the House why the Government removed the Wheat Board's power over licensing of imports? Was it at the insistence of the United States, or was it done simply because the Conservatives want to return to the grain exchange system of selling?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, quite frankly the Hon. Member does not know anything of what he speaks. He is a former member of the Advisory Board to the Canadian Wheat Board and should know better than that.

First, nothing in the free trade agreement diminishes the power of the Canadian Wheat Board to sell. In fact, it is the opposite. Both the Canadian Wheat Board lawyers and Canadian Grain Commission lawyers were involved in the drafting process to see that the proper legal authority was there for them to maintain their selling system. The over-all agreement keeps intact our varietal distinction system that lets the Canadian Grain Commission have such a good reputation.

The end use certificates and those kinds of arrangements that are made are actually under the umbrella of the Canadian Wheat Board Act that will be administered by the Canadian Grain Commission to see that our system stays intact.

• (1450)

The Hon. Member should know that and stop raising matters which are absolutely phoney and which have nothing at all to do with the free trade agreement.

PUBLICATION OF WHEAT SALE PRICES

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, perhaps some other time the Minister could tell us why these powers were given to the Department which has imports and exports under its jurisdiction rather than to the Canadian Wheat Board.

Considering the immense pressure from the U.S. Government and U.S. grain interests which are putting pressure on the Canadian Government to have Canada comply with their request to make wheat board sales prices on each shipment of grain available in public—something which the U.S. grain trade does not have to do, yet we have traders in the U.S. and U.S. government officials insisting that this is a requirement for their purposes—will the Minister tell us how Canada is responding to the U.S. on this request since we have not heard a public statement to this date?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, again, what the Hon. Member is referring to is a statement of administrative action by the U.S. Government which talks about how it sees this agreement being implemented. Nothing in either the free trade agreement or the implementing legislation has anything to do but enhance the powers of the Canadian Wheat Board and see it does a good job. How we sell our grain is entirely a Canadian affair, and it remains as such under the free trade agreement.

The Canadian Wheat Board, which I assume the Hon. Member supports, is one of the best selling agencies that we have as a country to sell our grain. What is wrong with giving the Canadian Wheat Board better rules and better certainty of access so it can do a better job of selling on our behalf? That is exactly what the free trade agreement does. It gives the Canadian Wheat Board a better chance to sell on a fair and a predictable basis in the United States, which is good for Canadian farmers, good for the Hon. Member who is a farmer, and good for his neighbours.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

QUALIFYING ELIGIBILITY PERIOD FOR BENEFITS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Westmorland—Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister and concerns the changes to the qualifying period for unemployment insurance in southern New Brunswick. The Minister is certainly aware of the problem. The New Brunswick Labour Minister visited Ottawa to talk about it with the Minister of Employment and Immigration and I have already asked several questions on this subject.

Can the Minister tell the House what has been done to correct the situation and solve this problem? Will the Government distinguish rural areas from urban areas?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I must apologize to the Hon. Member. I do not have an answer to that question at the present time. I will take it up with the Minister and see that either she or I get back to him as soon as possible.

SITUATION IN NEW BRUNSWICK—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Westmorland—Kent): I wish to ask the Deputy Prime Minister a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

I have on hand a document from the Privy Council Office dated July 21, 1988 and published in the Canada Gazette. The Government allowed a distinction to be made between the rural area of Gatineau and the urban area of Hull. According to the document, the reason for this is the much higher unemployment rate in the rural area than in the urban one. But, Mr. Speaker, it is exactly the same problem in southern New Brunswick. I therefore ask the Deputy Prime Minister whether New Brunswickers can expect to receive the same treatment from this Government and whether changes will be made and apply to the people of New Brunswick right away.

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I most certainly will take the Hon. Member's question and representation as notice and see that he is responded to very shortly.

PUBLIC SERVICE

LANGUAGE TEACHERS' STRIKE—RESOLUTION ACHIEVED THROUGH MEDIATION

Mr. Barry Turner (Ottawa—Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the President of the Treasury Board. During the last many months federal language teachers have been on rotating strikes, have been through a sit-in, have had emotional demonstrations on Parliament Hill, and have strongly lobbied the Government to resolve their contract disputes. Can the Minister confirm that a resolution has been reached through the mediation of the Chairman of the Public Service Staff Relations Board?

Hon. Pat Carney (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to confirm that we have reached terms of settlement with the education group of the Public Service Alliance of Canada, which of course includes the language teachers. I think at this time it would be appropriate to thank both negotiating teams, and Mr. Deans who, of course, serves as the Chairman of the Public Service Staff Relations Board. He negotiated for eight straight days to resolve this long-standing dispute.

Ms. Copps: He's a triple dipper, he should be staying up all night.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Ms. Carney: They have agreed to send the key issue of hours of work to binding arbitration. All other issues have been settled. I hope that this will lead to an improved climate for labour-management negotiations in terms of the rest of the contracts.

I am sorry that members of the Opposition consider that this fine achievement is a laughing matter.

HEALTH

IMPORTATION AND SALE OF IRRADIATED PRODUCE FROM THAILAND—CIDA AID—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. CIDA has promised to help Thailand sell irradiated fruit and shrimp to Canada, although it is illegal in this country to import and sell such products. Why is Canada using its international aid program to sell nuclear technology and use the people of Thailand and Canada as guinea pigs?

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for External Relations): Mr. Speaker, I would like to set the record straight, because the Canadian Government certainly has no intention of opening our borders to shrimp or any other products, other than those presently admitted under Canada's irradiation standards. I may also remind the Hon. Member that Canada did not pressure Thailand so it could export its technology. In fact, it was Thailand that asked CIDA about our technology in this respect. Canada has been acting in accordance with the regulations that exist in this country, and we intend to maintain our regulations on irradiation.

[English]

IRRADIATED FOOD—EXPORT OF TECHNOLOGY

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is addressed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Does the Government not recognize that the Canadian people do not want their food irradiated and that they feel it is immoral to be exporting this technology to the developing world? Why does the Minister allow his Department, and why does the Government allow CIDA to become tools of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, rather than fulfilling their own mandates?

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for External Relations): Mr. Speaker, I repeat that the Hon. Member does not seem to understand the process involved in irradiating food. I may remind him that the WHO and the FAO, to name only a few agencies, have said they were in favour of irradiated food because according to them it made the food safer to eat. The Canadian Government has very strict standards in this respect. We are following international standards, and we will continue to do so because some very reliable agencies have said no risk was involved.

ALLEGATIONS OF CRUELTY ABOARD SUBMARINE

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence or the Associate Minister of National Defence.

Many Canadians, especially those who support the Canadian Armed Forces, were shocked by revelations of cruelty and unjustified punishment inflicted on crewmen serving on a submarine, the HMCS Onandaga.

I know the Minister must share the concern so I ask this question. First, has the Ministry investigated the incidents involving Petty Officer Farler leading to his court martial? Second, will the Minister assure the public that the Minister and naval authorities will not tolerate cruel and unjustified actions in the Canadian Forces in any circumstances, thereby preserving the high standards of the Canadian military?

Hon. Paul Dick (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the Hon. Member that I have been very concerned about the reports and the information which I received regarding this incident. I can say that the incident is still appealable at this time and thus there are certain restrictions on what a person can say.

• (1500)

I would like to assure the Hon. Member that it is the intention of the Canadian Forces, the Minister of National Defence, myself, and this Government to maintain the very high standards that Canada has had from the Canadian Armed Forces, standards that we have been extremely proud of over the years, standards that have taken us to being the leading country in peacekeeping operations around the world, with the high regard and respect that other people and countries have for the Canadian Forces. We are going to maintain those high standards.

HERBICIDES

2,4-D—REQUEST THAT MINISTER BAN USE ON FEDERAL LAND

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture, if I could have his attention for a moment.

Statistics just released by the Department of National Health and Welfare show a steady increase in the occurrence of a form of lymphatic cancer linked to the common weed-killer 2,4-D, and also show that the frequency of this type of cancer and the number of deaths it causes have doubled, claiming 1,500 lives in 1986, at a time when most other types of cancer have been declining.

Will the Minister of Agriculture, as a first step, ban the use on federal land, in municipalities, and around the home of the herbicide 2,4-D?

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would have appreciated it very much if the Hon. Member had extended the courtesy of giving me notice of this particular question.

I wish the House and the Hon. Member to know that we are as interested in health and public safety as any Member of the House or any person across the country.

We have a process which we go through to approve pesticides and chemicals of this type. The Hon. Member should know that all the aspects of health and public safety are examined to their fullest.

I will take special interest in the Hon. Member's question, and I would be very happy to supply him with additional information as soon as possible.

REQUEST THAT USE BE PHASED OUT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Minister realizes that any delay would be at the expense of public health. Therefore, I ask him specifically if he will show leadership and initiate an action plan to phase out the use of 2,4-D herbicide from the market-place.

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, again relying on memory, and sometimes memory does not always serve one accurately, I am of the opinion that, at the moment, we do have an ongoing monitoring plan for that specific chemical.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Beaches will have the last question.

HOUSING

ACQUISITION OF HOUSES BY YOUNG PERSONS

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Finance. As the Minister probably knows, a recent Gallup poll has indicated that nearly 50 per cent of Canadians do not believe that young people can buy a home any more, and nearly 60 per cent of those people who live in Ontario do not believe that young people can attain the dream of buying a home either.

Given the total absence of assistance from this Government to those young people, and the fact that the Government axed the only program that was available to assist young people to buy their first home, what plans does the Government have to replace that system it cancelled with some other type of program to assist young people to buy housing in Ontario, and in the rest of Canada?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to tell the Hon. Member that business investment is running at 20 per cent above the previous year. That is part of the answer to employing people and giving them income opportunities in order that they can afford a home.

The economy now is at its strongest phase in the last eight years. There is a program in place for the whole economy to moderate interest rates. All of this works to allow people the opportunity to earn income and thereby buy a home.

SITUATION IN TORONTO

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same Minister. As the Minister knows, in Toronto it now takes an average income of some $60,000 a year even to get into the housing market.

The question I asked the Minister was whether or not he would replace the program that the Government cancelled several years ago. Does the Minister really believe that Canadians want the Government to spend billions of dollars on nuclear submarines yet it cannot afford to extend some assistance to those young families to get into the housing market?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member has a historical memory that is a bit weak. Those programs were put in place to compensate for a weak economy, and to fill a hole that seemed to be developing in a weak economy.

We now have a strong economy. We have strong incomes. We have strong employment. That is the answer to the housing crisis.

TABLING OF ENERGY CONFLUENCE REPORT

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, last week I published the report on energy confluence.

Today, as I promised, I wish to table bilingual copies of the report in the House.

POINT OF ORDER

ATTIRE OF HON. MEMBER

Mr. Fred King (Okanagan—Similkameen): Mr. Speaker, I represent the Okanagan, the prime apple producing area of Canada. I see the Member present from Annapolis Valley—Hants whose attire I envy but which does not meet the criteria of the dress code. I would like to point this out to the House and ask for a ruling.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member referred to is clearly not dressed according to the customs and traditions of the House and, until he is, he will not be recognized.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

BILL C-130—REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, since the advent of legislative committees I have reported many Bills to you; none, however, with as much pride as the one I present this afternoon.

Before I do so, I want to thank publicly the many people who worked so hard on the long hot summer days and hotter evenings. The clerk, Santosh Sirpaul, and researcher Bruce Carson were with me at the table throughout. Thomas Hall, Charles Robert, and literally dozens of others such as translators, recorders, and messengers provided the unseen and unheard but oh so necessary support to us; the many witnesses from the private sector who expressed their viewpoint, and from the public sector the small army headed by Ambassador Ritchie, all co-operated to convenience the committee's rapidly changing schedule; and lastly, my colleagues, the members of the committee who attended conscientiously and represented their constituencies both physical and ideological well and truly. I thank them all.

I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the report of the legislative committee on Bill C-130, an Act to implement the free trade agreement between Canada and the United States of America.

NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE—FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the fourth report of the Standing Committee on National Health and Welfare which deals with the study of food and drug labelling. It also gives recommendations on the proposed changes to Canadian drug labelling regulations under the Food and Drugs Act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion carried.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, it is a question of principle for me. I do not think we should ever vote on first reading, therefore I was present but I did not vote.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, just to summarize the intent of this Bill, its purpose is to establish a senior citizens commission to study and identify the needs of senior citizens in Canada. The commission would also make recommendations to the Governor in Council with respect to the needs of senior citizens.

Mr. Riis moved that the Bill be read the first time and printed.

Mrs. Mailly: Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I abstained because this is not a real vote. It is just a tactic to delay presentation of the day-care bill. To me this is shocking, and that is why I decided not to vote.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, I will not make a speech because it is not according to the rules.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Prud'homme: I have been saying for 24 years that it is a question of principle for me that we should not vote for permission to introduce a Bill. John Diefenbaker taught me that we should not vote for first reading, that we should allow people to discuss freely what they want.

Mr. Winegard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of privilege. I think my privileges as a Member of Parliament are being abused here this afternoon, as are the privileges of all Canadians. We are supposed to be debating child care—

Some Hon. Members: Order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion carried.

Mrs. Mailly: Mr. Speaker, once more I abstained because I protest this waste of time of the House. We are trying to introduce the second reading of a Bill on child care. It is much more important than these tactics by the NDP.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, as you well know, CMHC is exempt from provincial rent review and, more often than not, the rent increases exceed provincial rent increase limits set by the various provinces. Therefore, two-year leases with no increase in this period are required to protect the low and middle income renters from being savaged by CMHC.

The purpose of this Bill is to afford protection to lessees living in low rental housing projects, whose rents are subject to the approval of CMHC. The amendment included in this Bill would require that leases be for a term of at least two years and the rents charged not be increased during that period.

The other point of this is to draw attention to the fact that the initiative that was going to be introduced today, the child care initiative, is woefully inadequate—

Mr. Lewis: Out of order.

Mr. Riis: As opposed to advancing the cause of child care—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order.

Mr. Riis moved that the Bill be read the first time and printed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion carried.

Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I think you would find that there is a disposition in the House, in view of the circumstances, to call it six o'clock.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, again I would like to repeat that I did not vote for the reason I—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Prud'homme: I said it is a question of principle. I have not approved, personally, in my 25 years, of voting for a Bill on first reading and I am not going to start today. Before you do call it six o'clock, I would like, with the permission of the House, to table a petition. I have to be absent tomorrow to be at a function with the two other Parties and I would like to table a very important petition. I am in the hands of the House.

Mrs. Mailly: Mr. Speaker, we have just wasted three hours of the time of the House on these spurious Bills moved by the NDP in order to delay debate on the child care program. I hope the citizens of Canada will realize what happened today.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Does the Hon. Member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme) have unanimous consent to present his petition?

REQUEST FOR INCLUSION OF A SECTOR TO YOUVILLE POSTAL BRANCH

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, 15,000 residents of the north-central part of Saint-Denis in the Ahuntsic area now have to go to an auxiliary office to pick up their parcels and registered mail. A very high proportion of the population consists of elderly people, and that is why today, Mr. Speaker, these people defend their right to receive adequate postal services near the place where they live, and why they want their area to be reconnected to Youville postal station located at 300 Crémazie East in Montreal, where post office staff and letter carriers provide an excellent service. This petition was handed to me by Ms. Martine Blanc, municipal councillor of Octave Crémazie and by municipal councillor Michel Benoit.

REQUEST FOR DESIGNATION OF ROUGE RIVER VALLEY

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Scarborough Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to present a petition on behalf of a number of constituents of Scarborough and residents of Toronto concerning the Rouge River Valley in Scarborough. They join with the Scarborough City Council, the Federal Minister of the Environment, the Save the Rouge Valley System and the Coalition of Scarborough Community Associations to have this area made a Canadian heritage land or provincial park.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Richard Grisé (Parliamentary Secretary to the Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 106(8), I have the honour of tabling, in both official languages, the Government's response to 33 petitions numbered as follows: 332-4910, 332-4911, 332-5113 to 332-5142 inclusive and 332-5152.

RESEARCH, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

TABLING OF THE FOURTH REPORT OF THE STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of tabling, in both official languages, the Fourth Report of the Standing Committee on Research, Science and Technology respecting centres of excellence.

Today, science and technology have an impact on all sectors of the economy and on all spheres of human endeavor. To adapt to the changes stemming from the applications of science and technology, we must concentrate our efforts on providing quality education at all levels. Furthermore, we must establish and maintain ties between universities and the private sector, where research is carried out.

The centres of excellence program was announced earlier this year with these specific objectives in mind. In view of this program's importance as a means of making Canada more competitive on world markets and since it is a new way for the federal government to fund research activities, the Standing Committee on Research, Science and Technology wanted to study its provisions closely. In so doing, it wanted to gauge the reaction of those whose primary concern is the quality of research in Canada and to make recommendations with a view to ensuring that the program becomes a major initiative in our drive to enhance our competitive position.

Among other things, the Committee notes in its report that this initiative will go a long way toward ensuring a pool of trained, highly qualified researchers and quality research projects. However, it also states clearly that the centres of excellence program should not be viewed as a substitute for the invaluable research funding provided by the three grant councils.

The Committee believes that ties must be forged between universities and industry to help the latter develop a more innovative approach. This is precisely the goal of this innovative program and the Committee hopes that this report will contribute to the development of truly excellent and successful scientific networks.

Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 99(2), the Committee asks the government to provide a comprehensive response to this report.

CANADA-U.S. FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 106, it is an honour to present a petition on behalf of a number of constituents who are of the opinion that the federal Government has no mandate from the people of Canada to conclude a trade deal with the people of the United States. That believe that Parliament should dissolve now to allow the people of Canada an opportunity to accept or reject the proposed trade deal during a national general election.

I also have a second petition which contains pages and pages of signatures. They believe that the sovereignty of Canada is being threatened by the proposed trade deal and that the trade deal itself would reduce our country's ability to plan our economic, social and cultural future. They ask Parliament to ensure that a national debate take place on this trade deal and indicate that the debate should result in a national general election before such a trade agreement is signed, in the final analysis.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I, too, have the privilege to rise under Standing Order 106 to present a petition from several of my constituents who are very concerned about the proposed trade deal with the United States, in that it will prevent Canada from being able to determine its own economic and social future and to create a society distinct from that of the United States.

They also call upon the Government to call an election right away so that the people of Canada can vote on this very important issue.

REQUEST FOR EQUITABLE TRUCKING AND FREIGHT RATES TO QUEEN CHARLOTTE ISLANDS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have three petitions to present to the House today. The first one is certified correct pursuant to Standing Order 106 and is from a large number of residents of the Queen Charlotte Islands, from Sandspit, Queen Charlotte City, Masset, Port Clements, and other communities on the Queen Charlotte Islands. They petition Parliament regarding the cost of living on the Queen Charlotte Islands which is already high.

There is a federal subsidy to the ferry to offset its operating costs, but it is not reflected in the freight rates. An example they give is that a 50-pound sack of flour costs $16.50 in Vancouver, whereas once it is shipped to the Queen Charlotte Islands it costs $26.90. Since freight costs have doubled in a year, the petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to ensure, possibly by reallocation of part of the subsidy, equitable trucking and freight rates to the Queen Charlotte Islands.

OPPOSITION TO BILL C-33—SUPERANNUATION

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I also have a petition, which has been certified correct pursuant to Standing Order 106, from residents of the Queen Charlotte Islands and other areas. Since the Government, through Bill C-33, seeks to deindex the pensions of federal public servants which now have complete inflation protection through full linkage to the Consumer Price Index and other points, the petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject Bill C-33 as regressive, unfair, untimely, and against the best interests of public servants and all Canadians, and to affirm full indexing to the Consumer Price Index as the model for inflation protection for all Canadians.

PROTECTION OF RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition, which has been certified correct pursuant to Standing Order 106, with a large number of signatures from Smithers and Telkwa, which, as you would know, Mr. Speaker, is in the Bulkley Valley of British Columbia.

The petitioners point out that since the distinguished justices of the Supreme Court of Canada in striking down Section 251 of the Criminal Code of Canada have left Canadians without any law restricting abortions, they call upon and pray that Parliament will pass into law legislation that will protect the life of the unborn child from conception and in all stages of development, with the exception of the extremely rare situation in which an abortion is performed in order to save the life of the mother.

RESEARCH INTO PREVENTION AND CURE OF SCHIZOPHRENIA

Mr. Bill Gottselig (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour to rise on behalf of a number of constituents to present a petition which has been certified correct under Standing Order 106. The petition concerns the funding for schizophrenia, and it is the wish and the prayer of my constituents that the funding be commensurate with the seriousness of this illness.

REQUEST FOR RETENTION OF TEN-WEEK QUALIFYING PERIOD FOR UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Westmorland—Kent): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty to present a petition. The petitioners are from the communities of Port Elgin, Bayfield, Cape Tormentine, and Murray Corners. It relates to the recent decision by the Department of Employment and Immigration to increase the qualifying period for unemployment insurance, from 10 to 16 weeks.

They say that this decision does not take into account the high unemployment rate and the seasonally short-term nature of employment in the rural areas of the region. They ask that this Parliament to bring justice to the situation by keeping in place the 10-week eligibility period for southeast New Brunswick.

CANADA-U.S. FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present two petitions under the provisions of Standing Order 106. The first one is from residents of Winnipeg, Manitoba and of Kamloops, British Columbia who say that the trade agreement negotiated by the Mulroney Government threatens the very fabric of Canadian political and economical sovereignty by removing the power of the Canadian Government to control foreign ownership effectively, to develop Canadian energy resources in the best interests of Canadians, or to equalize opportunities between the regions.

Therefore they humbly pray and call upon Parliament to dissolve and allow the people of Canada the opportunity to accept or reject the proposed free trade agreement during a national general election.

The second one is signed by a substantial number of residents of Winnipeg. They say that the Conservative Government has no mandate from the Canadian people to conclude a free trade agreement with the United States. Therefore they humbly pray and call upon Parliament to dissolve and allow the people of Canada the opportunity to accept or reject the proposed free trade agreement during a national general election.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I also have a petition from quite a number of people who are objecting to the Canada-U.S. trade agreement, because the Conservative Government had no mandate from the Canadian people to negotiate this deal. They feel that the Mulroney Government threatens the very fabric of Canadian political and economic sovereignty with this deal by removing the power of Government to control foreign ownership effectively, to develop Canadian energy resources in the best interests of Canadians, and to equalize opportunities between the regions. For many other reasons they object to this trade agreement and call for its rescission.

ALLEGED INEQUITY IN TAX SYSTEM

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure for me to introduce a petition that has been certified as correct under Standing Order 106. The petition contains well over 1,600 signatures of construction workers who have been working on the upgrader in Regina.

• (1120)

The petitioners point out the inequity in our tax system, especially as it pertains to construction workers. Construction workers have many unavoidable expenses and yet many of these expenses are not tax exempt. The petitioners also point out that in the construction field it is feast and famine, yet there is no forward and backward averaging.

Therefore the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to create true equity in the tax system by reducing the tax levies to construction workers, by paying interest on taxes to be refunded to construction workers, and by reintroducing forward and backward averaging.

The petitioners are from many parts of Canada, and it is a great pleasure for me to introduce their petition to Parliament today.

CANADA-U.S. FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Jack Harris (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of Canadians from the Province of Alberta, from the cities of Edmonton, Calgary, Red Deer, Leduc, Fort McMurray, Wetaskiwin, and Lethbridge.

The petitioners are concerned that the Government had no mandate from the Canadian people to conclude a free trade agreement with the United States, and that the proposed trade agreement will deny Canada the policy freedoms to determine its own economic future and will undermine our ability to build a society distinct from that of the U.S.

The petitioners pray that Parliament be dissolved and the people of Canada be given the opportunity to accept or reject the proposed trade agreement during a national general election.

RESEARCH INTO PREVENTION AND CURE OF SCHIZOPHRENIA

Mr. Ernie Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure and an honour for me to present a petition on behalf of persons concerned about schizophrenia. They declare that schizophrenia is a major illness in Canada affecting about 1 per cent of the population, causing severe mental anguish and suffering to the patients and their relatives, and costing Canadian society more than $3 billion annually in direct health care and other support costs.

They note that recent research findings, including those obtained in Canada, have shown the illness to be a biochemical brain disorder in part caused by a genetic malfunction, and they hope that a cure might be found or a method of prevention discovered. They also note that research effort in Canada dedicated to schizophrenia is very limited.

They call upon the Parliament of Canada to ensure that research efforts related to schizophrenia in the future will be commensurate with the seriousness of the ailment. The petition is signed by persons from all over Ontario, namely, northern Ontario, the Ottawa Valley, and southern Ontario.

CANADA-U.S. FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Ernie Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, my second petition is from people who are concerned about the trade agreement before the House. They note that the Conservative Government had no mandate from the Canadian people to conclude this free trade agreement with the United States. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) promised in the course of the bilateral trade negotiations that Canadian sovereignty would not be compromised, but in fact it threatens the very fabric of Canadian political and economic sovereignty by removing the power of the Canadian Government to control foreign ownership effectively, to develop Canadian energy resources in the best interests of Canadians, and to equalize opportunities between the regions.

In recognition of these dangers, the petitioners call upon Parliament to dissolve and to allow the people of Canada the opportunity to reject the proposed free trade agreement during a national general election.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and privilege to table a petition that has been certified correct as to form and content pursuant to Standing Order 106. The petition is signed by a number of residents from the Province of Manitoba who express their concern about the Canada-U.S. trade deal. They point out that the proposed trade agreement would deny Canada the policy freedom to determine its own economic future and would undermine our ability to build a society distinct from that of the U.S.

They call upon Parliament to dissolve and to allow the people of Canada the opportunity to accept or reject the proposed trade agreement during a national general election.

CANADA CHILD CARE ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that Bill C-144, an Act to authorize payments by Canada toward the provision of child care services, and to amend the Canada Assistance Plan in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to commence debate on the Canada Child Care Act, legislation necessary to implement agreements with the provinces on the expansion of child care services across the country. As Members are aware, this represents a major element of the national strategy on child care which I announced last December. Before I get into the detailed substance of the Bill, I want to talk briefly about our Government's approach to social issues and how the child care strategy relates to this approach.

As a national Government, we are committed to improving opportunities and the quality of life of all Canadians. After all, that is the reason we have a social support system to help people experiencing difficulties, to ensure a basic equity in Canadian society, and to assist people to realize their fullest potential. For any Government addressing social issues and problems it is always difficult. The problems are often complex. The issues are interrelated and opinions on the appropriate way to proceed are usually very divided and quite firmly held. In a country as diverse as Canada, individual lifestyles and values vary considerably even in the same community, and community values may be quite different from one end of the country to the other.

In contributing to the resolution of a social issue, government must always find the proper balance between direct intervention and a laissez-faire approach. If direct intervention seems to be the right answer, government must still ensure that it encourages participation of individuals involved in order that it does not take over the problem or force people to adopt a single solution to that issue. The Government believes very strongly in achieving a balanced approach. We believe that a caring social policy perspective means developing an environment in which people are encouraged to help themselves and in which differing personal and community values are respected. A caring social policy requires thoughtful planning and expertise in its development and a great deal of flexibility in its implementation. That is not new to the child care policy. That, in fact, has been the hallmark of every social policy issue initiative that has been presented in this House throughout the past.

Those who feel there are easy answers or those who feel there is only one answer deny not only the present reality but our history. It means working closely with individuals and groups most affected by the issue, recognizing that they can make important contributions to both policy development and the operation of resulting programs. I do not believe any Government is in a position to solve all problems and should never attempt to dictate a single solution to a problem that affects people in different ways.

Another important aspect of our approach to social policy is to focus as much as possible on the future direction of society rather than root our solutions in the past. A good example of this approach is the seniors initiative which my colleague, the Minister of State for Seniors (Mr. Hees), and I announced earlier this year. The initiative concentrates on enhancing health and social services for seniors in a manner designed to maintain both independence and choice for this increasingly significant age group within Canadian society. For example, through the seniors independence program will be funding projects aimed at improving the quality of life and dependence of seniors. Priority is being given to projects involving community groups of seniors and to research activities directed to those diseases most affecting the ability of seniors to function independently.

As in other social policy areas, we believe an effective approach is to put the people most concerned with a problem in charge of developing solutions that work rather than impose solutions from outside the community or from social planners in Ottawa. Where the Government can act to increase the independence of the elderly, such as in the area of more economic self-sufficiency, we have acted as a Government. We have extended the spousal allowance benefits, implemented pension reform, and increased the flexibility of the Canada Pension Plan so that Canadians can make choices with respect to their retirement planning.

Consistent with our focus on the future, we are also assisting Canadians to plan much earlier for financial independence in their retirement years. This has included improving the portability of pensions in the federal sector and encouraging pre-retirement savings through higher RRSP contribution levels and more equitable contribution rights. We have also taken steps to ensure that men and women retiring under similar circumstances have equal pensions. We have also provided for the splitting of pension credits earned during marriages in which divorce occurs.

We have also taken the same approach with respect to health care. Until recently, the sole focus or primary focus of our health care system was to deal with injury and disease, to take an unwell person and make him or her well again. While this will always remain a priority, important new challenges to prevent and where this is not possible to enhance the ability of Canadians to cope better with disease, disabilities and stresses of modern living has become the focus of the health care policy of our Government. By promoting more healthy lifestyle choices, we can reduce dependence upon the health care system as well as improve personal quality of life at the same time.

This health promotion strategy also encourages self help and mutual aid practices since it is the community that provides the emotional and practical support to help people make the right choices and to live independently. Over the last few years we have seen the great success of groups addressing alcohol and drug abuse issues. Need I remind Hon. Members who said just a few months ago that there was no drug crisis that they are now seeing the wisdom of the forethought of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) when he made the announcement of a drugs strategy.

We involved ourselves much more deeply in impaired driving programs. We are finding that teens are taking those programs to heart and are now leading in the development of those programs and in the education of their peers. I need only to mention to the House our strategy on smoking as further evidence of this involvement.

While the Government has instituted national public awareness campaigns and tougher legislation in these areas, community based concern and action have really been responsible for the significant change in public attitude across Canada. One of the more difficult challenges we have responded to is, as I have already mentioned, drug and substance abuse.

Drug dependency claims many victims and can have an absolutely devastating impact on young people, their families, and entire communities. Public awareness can help limit the demand for illicit substances and can bring a hidden activity more into the open, but solving the drug abuse problem requires a deliberate, encompassing and co-ordinated strategy at the local, national, and international levels, including support of innovative community based research and self help.

Like substance abuse, child sexual abuse is a hidden social problem. It has a serious and long-lasting impact on our children, children who in most cases are unable to defend themselves. We are trying to bring the problem into the open, to sensitize communities to the issue, and to soften the impact of the judicial process on children who have been caught up in court proceedings. At the same time, we have severely increased penalties under the Criminal Code for people who abuse the trust that children place in them. However, penalties only deal with the problem after the fact. Improved community awareness and action will ensure that our children are better protected.

Under the pressures of modern life, the Canadian family is undergoing unprecedented changes. There are more single parent families than ever before, more families in which both parents work full time in order to meet their economic obligations, and unfortunately we also see more family breakdown in society.

As more women participate in the paid labour force or raise children on their own, the need for adequate child care services has become an increasingly pressing. Before I get into the substance of the Bill, I should make the point that the Government is using its data bases to bring responsibility to men especially those who have not taken the responsibility of child support. In some provinces as high as 85 per cent of court orders are either in arrears, are being partially paid, or are not being paid at all. There are many issues to be dealt with as we try to provide policies to improve the society in which we live.

Over the past four years the Government has made a substantial commitment to policies and programs which help Canadian families to deal with these realities. New divorce legislation, better means of enforcing custody and support orders, and a harmonization of federal and provincial efforts in the area of family law are some of the initiatives that have been taken. Programs to deal more effectively with family violence, including the increasing prevalence of abuse of the elderly, are also being worked on in conjunction and co-operation with the provinces.

The national strategy on child care which I was proud to announce on behalf of the Government seven months ago was designed to increase the number of quality subsidized child care spaces that meet the standards parents demand for the care of their children. As I said earlier, the development of an effective, workable social policy is always a difficult endeavour. As is the case with the development of other social programs, individuals have very definite ideas about the extent of the child care problem and about the most effective way to respond. As with other policies, this Government has attempted to bring sensitivity, understanding, and flexibility to bear on developing what I believe to be a very caring national strategy.

While our goal is to increase the affordability, availability, and quality of child care services, we realized that we had to respect the rights of parents to choose the kind of care they thought best for their children. We also had to respect the existing programs and services which provincial governments had developed in response to their own past needs and circumstances. We have also had the advantage of two major task force reports and extensive consultations with interest groups and individual Canadians across Canada. The result, our national strategy on child care, reflects a proper balance of choice, quality and quantity.

While it is a very expensive program—$6.4 billion is the federal commitment alone over the next seven years—it does not place an undue burden on either federal or provincial taxpayers. These are important considerations in developing a policy that is not only workable today but also does not create new problems or burdens for future generations. In fact, in the development of social policy, governments of the past used a similar approach.

As Hon. Members will recall, our strategy consists of four primary components: enhanced tax assistance for families with young children, a new child care initiatives fund, an initiative to stimulate accredited day care for Indian children, and a new federal-provincial cost-sharing program. The first two components are already in place and operating. The Indian day care initiative is in development, and authority to put the cost-sharing element in place is provided by the legislation we are discussing today.

The details of the components of the strategy have been made public before. Members have had several opportunities to discuss and debate them over the last few months. However, let me reiterate one important point. The supplement to the Child Tax Credit, $100 this year and $200 in subsequent years, is a targeted credit like the child tax credit itself. It goes to low and middle income families where parents remain at home to care for their children or use less formal child care. This tax measure makes up by far the greatest part of the new tax assistance we are making available in the national strategy on child care.

Additionally, it should be remembered that the child tax credit is additional to the increases made in former budgets by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson). Members should also recall the early prepayment of the enhanced child credit when looking at the entire record of child care. As well, the enhanced child care expense deduction is for those families of whatever income who are using receipted child care arrangements. Under our strategy the deduction more accurately reflects the total cost of child care, thereby reducing the financial burden of child care services. These tax initiatives will be effective this tax year.

The $100 million child care initiatives fund has been designed to support innovative research and demonstration projects to improve and expand child care services. We all know there are many needs which are not now being met by current child care services in systems. Parents who work irregular hours or on shifts, parents in remote or rural areas of Canada, parents of children with special needs, all have requirements for child care services of a different nature than that which the mainstream delivery system provides. The fund will help us develop ways of meeting these kinds of needs so that the quality of services may be improved and all Canadians may have better access to the services they need. This fund has already been established, looks to the future as well as to the present, and involves parents, community groups, and non-profit organizations in the effort.

The complicated part of the legislation is the new cost-sharing Bill before us, the Canada Child Care Act, Bill C-144. It is the means through which the federal Government is going to work with the provinces to double the number of child care spaces across Canada over the next seven years. It follows the tradition of consultation that this Government established in working with other levels of government, rather than dictate to them in their own areas of jurisdiction. I can say quite bluntly that when I had my first meeting with social affairs Ministers of the provinces almost four years ago, they clearly stated to me that they felt the federal Government had no role in child care, that it was solely within provincial jurisdiction.

I think it is important for the House and the country to understand the jurisdictional arguments in any social policy development. While I know that Members opposite in their political rhetoric or editorial writers might feel that those are not major considerations, some of us have had enough experience in social policy to know that if we cannot consult and do not work with the provinces on social policy those policies are doomed to failure.

I remind Members as they begin debate not to forget the history of social policy programs. If they were to be effective, they had to be flexible and involve provincial co-operation. I do not say 100 per cent unanimity or consensus, but we need to have provincial co-operation. If people do not believe in flexibility, may I remind my colleagues opposite of 1966. Pensions come under provincial jurisdiction. Canadians wanted a national pension plan. Today we call it the Canada Pension Plan. In Quebec we call it the Quebec Pension Plan. Even at that time we got a national plan with a distinct component for Quebec. It was said at that time that we needed a national plan but that to get it we had to have flexibility. We had to understand the regions. We had to be respectful of that. If that was valid in 1966, and today the Canada Pension Plan and the Quebec Pension Plan have become a major component in pension and retirement planning, then is it not surely valid today, in 1988?

The other point I make to Members opposite, and regrettably I have had too much experience in opposition—

Mr. Keeper: And you are going to get some more.

Mr. Epp (Provencher): I hear the NDP from Manitoba again. I ask them to look at the record in Manitoba and I wish them luck.

Their argument has been: "This is not enough, put in more". What they propose is something Canadians do not want. What they propose is a universal plan. They simply take a statistical model and say there are x number of children under a certain age, and because the NDP has so decided, every parent wants their child in this form of child care. Not true.

In addition, there is the cost factor, in their case $11 billion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Vancouver East rises on a point of order?

Ms. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, since we are listening to a Minister of the Crown, I wonder if he would please make sure his facts are correct.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is a form of debate. The Hon. Member will have an opportunity to debate that.

Mr. Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased I now have their attention.

What they have been saying constantly is that we need more money, more money from the taxpayers. Their program in full bloom is an $11 billion program.

Mr. Gagnon: Per year.

Mr. Epp (Provencher): Annualized. That is the program they have in mind. I say to them that they can criticize, but what they should not be quite so sensitive about is our looking at their proposals, analysing them, and criticizing them. They also must meet certain criteria. Are they acceptable to Canadians? Are they affordable?

This program follows a long-standing tradition with respect to cost-sharing arrangements between the federal and provincial levels of government in addressing social problems, that is, a 50-50 balance in sharing the financial load. At the present time, the provinces are receiving, on average, about 35 per cent from the federal Government. Our strategy calls for a doubling of spaces, that is, 200,000 new and subsidized spaces over the next seven years. The federal Government is committed to providing 75 per cent of provincial capital contributions to develop these new spaces in non-profit facilities, as well as 50 per cent operating subsidies for both existing and new non-profit and commercial spaces.

I say to members of the Opposition that they are opposed to this legislation and they want to delay it as we saw yesterday in the House. They will have to go back to the people, and we will have to let the people decide why they do not have spaces and why the money is not flowing. It is because the NDP and Liberals decided not to approve the legislation.

The "not for profit" spaces which provinces create during this seven-year "boost" period will be eligible for the 75 per cent capital financing. This will substantially reduce the burden on provincial treasuries and help to make our goal a reality. The legislation will also expand eligibility for matching operating funds to both the "not for profit" and commercial sectors, in recognition of the fact that about 40 per cent of the existing number of spaces are in the commercial sector. We would have a great deal of trouble meeting our twin goals of improved quality and availability if we were to ignore almost half the existing system and in some provinces, such as Newfoundland, because of financial considerations, 90 per cent of the system.

Our national strategy and this legislation also recognize that all provinces are not at the same stage in developing their child care services. Some are behind others. That is why the Government has built into the Bill a provision to increase funding for certain provinces based upon the national average entitlement per child. We believe that child care services should be more equally available across the country because Canadian families are facing similar needs no matter where they live. I suggest that if Liberal Members want to criticize that part of the Bill, they should take a look at their own experience in the fifties and sixties and how the medicare formula was used at that time.

I said earlier that both quality and availability are objectives of our national strategy on child care. It is insufficient simply to create new spaces. Those spaces must provide the kind of quality care that parents demand for their children. At the same time, improving the quality of existing spaces without increasing the number of spaces fails to meet the increasing demands of the services.

That is one reason for the increase of $1 billion in our allocation to the federal-provincial program which I announced a few weeks ago. It is also the reason this Act requires that provincial and territorial governments specify child care service standards as part of the agreements between the two levels of government. It is that method by which we can address the standards issue. Provinces will also be required to establish methods to enforce those standards and to ensure that both the standards and enforcement procedures are widely publicized within each province.

The areas in which standards are to be developed are those areas that contribute the most to improving the quality of child care services. These will include child-staff ratios, group sizes, staff qualifications, program content, parental involvement and, of course, health and safety measures.

I am sure that parents, care givers, and professional groups will be working closely with provincial authorities in developing these standards where they do not now exist. The agreements that we will be negotiating with individual provinces will also include a time period within which these standards are to be put in place.

Under this legislation we are giving provinces the option of negotiating agreements consistent with the national child care strategy or remaining within the day care provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan.

I believe the approach we are taking has significantly higher benefits for provinces than the Canada Assistance Plan program. If we examine the recent history of provincial day care expenditures and reimbursements under CAP, it is clear that we are proposing a significant increase in our commitment to child care services across the country. Over the last few years the federal Government, through CAP, shared about 30 per cent of provincial expenditures on day care. As I have mentioned, that figure will be substantially higher under the Canada Child Care Act.

In addition, I remind Members that in the four years the Government has been in office, even under the Canada Assistance Plan we have increased by 100 per cent the amount of money the Canada Assistance Plan has made available to the provinces and child care givers for child care.

When I hear Liberals saying "you haven't done enough" or "you haven't done anything", in relation to what they were doing that is a rather interesting wicket on which to try to build a case.

Under the terms of the new Canada Child Care Act, the federal Government alone will be committing some $4 billion to child care services, or twice the total combined federal and provincial expenditures of the last six years. The federal proportion of expenditures will increase on average to about 50 per cent and could, in some instances in some provinces, be as high as 90 per cent given the funding formula and the top up provisions for certain provinces.

I think those few statistics demonstrate how much better off provinces will be under the Canada Child Care Act and how much more they will be able to do with the stronger financial support being provided by the Government. The point of our strategy is not to reduce what provinces have been doing but to provide the financial incentive for them to be doing more. Our commitment reflects what provinces can realistically achieve over the next seven years.

All agreements signed with provinces prior to April 1, 1990 will be retroactive to April 1, 1988. For the benefit of our viewers, April 1, 1988, is the beginning of this fiscal year. We have said right along that the money would flow in this fiscal year, and the money will flow as of April 1, 1988. All we now need for the money to be available to the provinces is the passage of this Bill in order that we can sign the federal-provincial agreements. This means that the provinces need not fear that their current activities toward expanding child care services will not be covered, despite the fact that this legislation is being given second reading today and needs passage.

I know that some Members opposite hold some strong views on the issue of child care services. I am sure that all Members agree, however, on the need to improve the availability, quality, acceptability, and afffordability of child care services as a necessity for working parents and for healthy, happy families and children.

On this side of the House we have concluded that our national strategy on child care best meets this need in a manner that respects the rights and obligations of parents, addresses the concerns of provincial authorities, and adapts flexibility to differing regions and community values. As I said when I began my remarks, determining the proper balance and flexibility in social policy initiatives is an important although difficult undertaking. In the final analysis, setting realistic objectives and developing a workable means to achieve those objectives is the only way to achieve progress.

I truly believe that this policy represents a substantial step forward in meeting the needs of Canadian families and children. I am looking forward to the passage of this legislation so that we can finalize the arrangements with our provincial counterparts and realize the goals that we have established together. I look forward not only to the debate but to the passage of this legislation.

Mrs. Lucie Pépin (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, I rise today in this House to reply to the Government on Bill C-144, the Canada Child Care Act.

Mr. Speaker, when I read this Bill, I ask myself, while noting that it is a start, where our priorities as a society are and where the priorities of the Mulroney Government are, in view of the fact that a child care system is not a luxury but an urgent necessity.

Our society has changed radically over the past 20 years. Today, less than one Canadian family in six takes the traditional form of the mother working at home and taking care of the childen while the father works outside the home. Moreover, in many families there is only one parent—in most cases a woman raising her children alone. More than half of Canadian women who have pre-school children work outside the home, and in 45 per cent of families with children, both parents have to work outside the home.

However, only 20 per cent of the children have the benefit of licensed day care services. We also know that 57 per cent of children between the ages of 6 and 14 are left alone after school.

Some people say day care is the woman's business. That is false and completely unfair, Mr. Speaker! Day care services are for the couple to choose, for society to choose, and they are a priority the Mulroney Government has already taken too long to get around to.

• (1200)

[English]

It is with great regret that I rise today to discuss the Government's feeble child care legislation. The need for an increase in adequate child care spaces in Canada has been fully explained and documented since the first royal commission on the status of women in 1970. The need for child care is widespread.

[Translation]

Let us recall Katie Cook's task force on child care, which revealed that back in 1985 there were no day care spaces for over 1 million children between the ages of 0 and 12 whose parents worked more than 20 hours a week.

[English]

We deem this to be the core need group. It is not surprising, then, that this need has inspired a consensus among Canadians, a consensus to the effect that the time has come for the Canadian Government to implement a cost-sharing program which will meet the needs of Canadian families.

There are three essential problems with the Canada Child Care Act. First, it is not part of a comprehensive program as far as we can see, as no mention is made of other related legislation, notably full employment, parental leave, fiscal reform, beyond certain inadequate tax credits mentioned in the White Paper.

[Translation]

Second, this Bill in no way meets the needs of the Canadian family. The mere fact that the target or goal of this Bill is to create only 200,000 spaces over a period of seven years is arguable and unacceptable, since one million children currently lack day care spaces. And when we realize that the special needs of low-income families and latchkey children are completely ignored in this bill, we are faced with a very serious problem, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Third, as we have seen over and over again, there is no mention of standards, or even objectives if the Minister prefers that term, criteria supported by the report on the task force on child care, the report of the Senate subcommittee on child care, and virtually every child care advocacy group that has been consulted.

Before I continue, I want to discuss the idea of choice. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) has chosen to present himself as the sole advocate of choice for Canadian families. Let me go on record now in saying that the only way to provide choices for Canadian parents is to provide the necessary funds through a cost-sharing agreement which ensures universal access to child care.

If the Government fails to take this next step, it is denying a number of parents the right to participate in the workforce as well as failing to provide the necessary assistance to single parents and parents of low income families to meet the needs of day-to-day living in a Canadian society. In so doing it will be denying choice, the choice to work in many instances. It will also be preventing Canadians from providing the best possible future for their children.

Living as we are in a time when the birth rate is very low, when poverty afflicts women most, we must face the fact that in Canada today, one child in five is living in poverty and one child in every three is sexually assaulted.

The Government has a responsability to Canadian families, a responsability to our children, and that responsability must be discharged by creating day care spaces and a good child care system. Yet the Mulroney Government says nothing about low—and middle-income families in this bill, and the witnesses who appeared before the child care sub-committees were particularly concerned about this aspect of the new program. They were afraid that the ceiling mentioned in the new program would force the provinces to cut the funding used to subsidize child care for low-income families. I would like to quote a few passages from the Committee's proceedings, as follows:

[English]

I want to talk about the traditional view of child care as a service for low income families under the Canada Assistance Plan. The reality of this new funding program is that provinces such as Ontario will be forced to make hard choices. The Minister said a few minutes ago that the money was flowing. Upon closer examination we can see that it is not flowing that well.

Assuming that there is a limit on the amount of money that provincial Governments will get from this new plan, these Governments will have to choose among subsidies to low income or moderate income families; expansion of the system providing direct funding to improve wages to keep trained people within the system because they leave the system in droves presently; improving the quality of programs which will have to be dealt with in different ways.

The bottom line is to ask what will happen to single parents who are on low income. What will happen to people who, without child care, will be forced out of the labour force, will be unable to enter the labour force, or will be unable to get training? I am not suggesting that this is happening in Ontario. I am suggesting that the possibility of it happening is much greater at present. It is possible for subsidies from the federal Government to flow through to the provinces because CAP is an open-ended program. Under this strategy there is a limitation to the source of the money coming from the federal Government, which presents a whole new ball game.

The report further indicates that witnesses from Quebec and Ontario were concerned that the ceiling in the program might penalize populous provinces with well established programs or plans for expansion. In contrast, witnesses from the Atlantic provinces fear that their provinces will not be able to offer help with the expenditures of a program developed under the more generous cost-sharing formula of the first seven years.

[Translation]

What has the Government done to allay these concerns? It has proposed a cost-sharing program for the creation of 200,000 new day care spaces. Those 200,000 new spaces are only 15 per cent of what is needed. At present, we are meeting only 15 per cent of the demand. That means the remaining 70 per cent of the demand is not being met, and that 70 per cent represents one million children who have no day care spaces. This is based on the assumption that the 200,000 spaces will actually be created. We also wonder whether the 200,000 spaces will be created, since it is stated in the Bill that the Government intends to increase the number of spaces across Canada by 200,000 over a period of seven years. Nowhere in the Bill, Mr. Speaker, does the Government make a firm commitment to create the 200,000 spaces it refers to. It does not say that the spaces will necessarily be created. It hopes to create 200,000 spaces.

[English]

While the Government will attenuate some of the need, and only part of the need as we have seen above, it has from the beginning blocked itself from allowing flexibility and increasing the inadequate amount of spaces in the future. It is thus possible that Canadian parents would have been better off without this Canada Child Care Act despite all the inadequacies of prior cost-sharing agreements under CAP.

• (1210)

[Translation]

For example, if a province pledges to create a certain number of spaces in the first year and fails to reach its goal for that year, it will not be permitted by the federal Government to carry those spaces over to the second year even though in that second year, since the program will be running more smoothly by then, the province could achieve the new goal. Since the bill now before the House will under no circumstances allow the funds equivalent to the undeveloped spaces to be carried over from one year to the next, a province could be penalized and might not reach its goal for the seven-year period, even though with adjustments along the way, it would easily have done so.

There is no flexibility in the carry-over of money from one year to the next.

Furthermore, the Bill provides for a seven-year program. What will happen in the eighth year, Mr. Speaker? When all the programs have been put in place and the provincial governments are relying on the federal Government to share the costs, who will pay? Will the provinces be left to their own devices with regard to capital expenditures and the creation of new spaces? Where will the federal Government be? The Bill does not say a word about that. The provinces are anxious to know whether they will have to assume all the unforeseen risks of the child care program in the eighth year.

[English]

After the Government's national child care strategy was announced, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, pursuant to discussions with various provincial agencies, had to increase the infusion of money in order to meet his original objective of 200,000 spaces. Extra funds were added, but the result is not exactly promising. Although people may think that the $1 billion announced in July is more money which will create more spaces, it is just the amount of money really needed to create the 200,000 spaces announced in December, 1987. The Government only corrected its own error, its miscalculation of December, 1987 with this extra billion dollars.

As we now debate the legislation provincial governments are undoubtedly restructuring their programs, unable to go ahead with plans they had prior to the introduction of this Bill. The projected plan of the Government of Ontario has already been cut by 12,000 spaces. We do not know how all governments are reacting in the restructuring of their own programs, but we know that different provincial Ministries across the country are entertaining reservations. We know that national child care advocacy groups are displeased with the situation, and due to quick and insightful comments made after the fact we know why.

[Translation]

The Mulroney Government has been trying to convince us since 1984 that all is well in the best of all possible worlds with the provinces, but when we look at this bill more closely, we have to wonder if that . . .

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would like to bring to the attention of the Hon. Member that she has mentioned the Mulroney Government three times now. It is the Government; it is not the "Turner" Opposition nor the "Broadbent" NDP Party. I do not like to disturb the Hon. Member's speech or debate, but it is the federal Government. She should not use Members' names nor the Prime Minister's name. He should be referred to as the Prime Minister and not by his name. Thank you.

Mrs. Pépin: Very well, Mr. Speaker. May I continue? May I say the Conservative Government, then?

The Government would like us to believe that is well with the provinces—sorry, I already said that. If we take a closer look at the present Bill, I wonder if that is true! I wonder what the provinces really think of the regulatory powers provided for in the bill, of the definition of child care services, of the definition of funding! All this is very vague, and you would have to ask the provinces that want to achieve their targets for the creation of spaces and related services whether they feel secure with a Bill that is so vague about the federal Government's true commitment. We do not know the federal Government's true commitment.

The Minister recently alluded to the 1966 pension plan Bill and the role of the provincial governments, and I would like to say that the federal Government at that time, with all due respect to the provincial governments, demonstrated some leadership, which I think is missing in this child care Bill.

[English]

We know that while the Government is providing funds "to create new spaces, much of the money to be provided will not be going to the creation of new spaces but rather to the funding of already existing spaces. We do not know how much of this money will be poured into the costs of sustaining programs already in place, but some estimates reach as high as $340 million.

While specific groups are particularly touched by lack of child care, Bill C-144 does not mention the specific needs. Until now, various child care organizations were funded through the Canada Assistance Plan. While demand was not met, it should be noted that CAP was geared specifically to lower income families. We have to guard ourselves against locking any groups out of the national child care plan in a time of increasing poverty for children and women.

While CAP dealt with this problem by adding day care and similar services to welfare services, the Canada Child Care Act, which is destined to replace CAP, does not address the problem of low to middle income families. With an inadequate number of spaces being created and no priority being set, is the Government not failing to meet the needs of the most disadvantaged parents of our society?

[Translation]

But there is more! The Bill completely ignores the problem of latchkey children. We know that 57 per cent of children between 6 and 14 are left alone after school. They clearly have special needs. In order to realize their potential and ensure their future, these children must have adequate services, Mr. Speaker; this would also help reduce delinquency and drug abuse among young people. Not only are they ignored in this Bill, Mr. Speaker, but the Government states in the Bill that it will do nothing for them. It is stated clearly in section 2, and I quote:

> . . . does not include . . . any service relating wholly or substantially to education.

How are we going to take care of latchkey children?

I recently heard the Minister tell us how important it was to have anti-drug programs for teenagers. In my view, a good after-school child care system is one of the best means of prevention. As you know, Quebec is currently the only province that has a school day care program. There are over 30,000 spaces in educational institutions in Quebec. Yet, unfortunately, under the bill we have before us today, there will be no money for all the children between 6 and 14 in Quebec and elsewhere in Canada, from Victoria to Newfoundland, and all the programs for latchkey children will be abandoned. That is unacceptable. We must remember that in all the reports on child care—Katie Cook's report, the report by the three political parties—it was stated that children must be taken care of, that it was a priority.

However, in our opinion, the Bill's major shortcoming is its failure to provide for quality standards. Bill C-144 makes no mention whatsoever of the quality of child care services. We believe in the importance of quality standards in day care centres, such as the space provided for each child, the number of children per child care worker, training, the quality of the staff, nutrition and so forth. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, the Bill is silent on these points. The federal Government should demand that the provinces develop quality standards and that these be incorporated into the federal-provincial agreement before the provinces receive any funding. In so doing, it would avoid creating two classes of children in day care. Unfortunately, a parallel situation has been allowed to develop, perhaps unwittingly, in the case of senior citizens who now fall into two categories, namely those who have the ability to pay for services, and those who do not.

• (1220)

[English]

The Senate committee also found that witnesses want funding to be adequate, but they also want the federal Government to ensure that provinces have standards necessary for good quality care, that care givers are properly trained and adequately paid, and that services are aimed and managed by those who are interested in children rather than profit. The committee responded with its own concerns and asked: "Will provinces be asked to commit themselves to advancing specific objectives regarding standards in the initial period?" The committee asked before the legislation was introduced: "What other assurances will there be that provinces will set and enforce standards?"

[Translation]

Thus, the provinces must develop standards and these must be incorporated into the agreement before the federal Government provides any funding at all.

[English]

But there are no assurances, Mr. Speaker. The legislation states: "An agreement shall specify the aspects of child care services in respect of which standards are required to be implemented in the province and the time within which they are to be implemented". These may not include accessibility to low income families, affordability, or any other specific standard suggested by advocacy groups or task force reports. The result could be substantial disparities from province to province. I submit that the mention of standards and of priorities is essential to any socially just child care program. The federal Government must ask provincial Governments to develop standards before it gives them money.

It is also to be noted that contrary to what the Minister of Health and Welfare stated in the House, it would very definitely be possible for the Government to include various objectives in the legislation, notably accessibility, upon which I commented earlier. Such objectives might also include parental involvement. It is noteworthy that while the Government kept mentioning the rights of parents and the needs of the family, it never addressed parental involvement. Yet, it would have been possible to set such objectives, to set a minimum standard of parental involvement. Precedents already exist. In Saskatchewan, for all centres licensed after October 1, 1982, 50 per cent of board members must be parents. The Government does not seem to have commented on such possibilities, yet it endlessly speaks of parents and choice.

It is strange that on the one hand the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) argues in his tax reform proposals that it is more advantageous to get a tax credit than a deduction, and in this Bill the Minister of Health and Welfare insists on allowing the least advantageous deduction. He would have had here a fine occasion to follow in the footsteps of the Minister of Finance but has failed to do so.

[Translation]

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would be remiss if I failed to mention the issue of parental leave. The Government totally ignored the recommendations of the principal report on child care, as well as those of the Katie Cook and Forget reports, which called for extending the period or parental leave from 16 to 26 weeks. A Liberal Government would never have ignored a recommendation of such great importance to families. The proposed legislation makes no mention at all of parental leave.

The Bill is also silent on the question of child care services in the workplace. It is hard to believe that the government would turn a blind eye to this issue when studies have shown that such services reduce absenteeism and provide better accessibility to both parents.

Mr. Speaker, as it now stands, the Bill is totally inadequate and fails to meet the needs of today's families. In 1984, the Conservative Government dangled the prospect of wonderful legislation before Canadians and raised many expectations which it has failed to fulfill. True, it is going to create 200,000 new spaces over seven years, but what of the one million children on the waiting list? The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that the wait will never be over for them.

Summing up, I wonder what the priorities of Canadians are and I question those of the Conservative Government. Children and families are certainly not number one on its agenda.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to move an amendment, seconded by the Honourable Member for Hamilton-East (Ms. Copps).

[English]

That the motion be amended by deleting all of the words after the word "That" and by substituting the following:

"This House objects to the principle of Bill C-144, an Act to authorize payments by Canada toward the provision of child care services, and to amend the Canada Assistance Plan in consequence thereof, which is to establish a program that does not provide access and services in all provinces and equal access to low and middle income families".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will reserve the decision on this amendment. I recognize the Hon. Member for Vancouver East.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, child care in Canada is in crisis. After waiting four years for the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) to deliver on his campaign promise of an effective national system of child care, Canadian families have been let down once again. The inadequate strategy of the Government will not meet the needs of Canadian families and children. In fact, this fundamentally flawed legislation moves us backwards. There will be fewer child care spaces for our children after the seven years of this government program than would be developed under the existing system.

This Conservative legislation also fails to establish the principles upon which to build an effective national child care system. We should be building the first major national social program since medicare, but the Government has failed to provide leadership and has not set out principles and objectives for quality child care in Canada. Canadian families and their children need greater access to quality child care at lower cost. This Government has not delivered.

• (1230)

We have said and continue to say that the Prime Minister should go back to the drawing-board. He should bring forward a child care program to meet the needs of average Canadian families for child care services, and this should be done now.

Over two million children across Canada under the age of 14 have parents who are in the workforce either full time or part time or perhaps are studying. A great percentage of them are single parents.

Over the past generation there is no doubt at all that families in Canada have changed dramatically. Working parents are now the norm for a variety of reasons, and studies show that this trend will continue. Therefore, it is obvious that every community must have a range of reliable, good quality child care services. Unfortunately we are far from achieving this goal.

It is interesting that for many years in Europe, most western European countries considered child care to be an essential community social service available to all families, but Canada is far behind, and this Bill does not help.

What happens to our children when Mom is at work and there is no reliable child care? This is a constant worry for working parents. Across Canada there are only about 243,000 licensed child care spaces, and almost all these are for 3 to 5-year old children. The care for infants and toddlers is virtually unavailable in most communities or is far too costly. Only 11.5 per cent of children of working parents are assured of good, quality licensed child care. The others are cared for by relatives, neighbours, nannies, and babysitters who very often prove to be unreliable.

Many school children have no care at all and, as my colleague just pointed out, this program of the Government does not provide for school age children who often go home to an empty house. Instead of benefiting from child development programs, many kids are left glued to a TV screen for their pre-school education.

For over 20 years women of Canada have been pressing for adequate, affordable child care. In 1984, the Leaders of all three Parties promised the women of Canada that a national child care program would be a priority. For four years the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) repeated this promise, while plans were delayed, press releases were issued, not one cent was spent, and a generation of pre-schoolers went without care.

One reason for the long delay was the resistance of the Government to accepting the reality of today's changing families and its denial that there is a child care crisis in Canada. We have heard this over and over again from Conservative Members on the child care committee. Because of the Tory philosophy that favoured the traditional family, the Government repeatedly tried to think of ways to persuade working women to return home. A $200 per year child tax credit was one very expensive tax measures that was introduced in the last Budget for home-makers and for those who had no day care receipts.

As I have said before, this is an insult to women and does not recognize the important role of home-makers. It gives no real choice to women. It would have been far better if the Government had reindexed the family allowance or the child tax credit and provided a much needed improved system of parental leave under the unemployment insurance.

Many parents want to be at home during the first year with their infants, and they should have this choice. We should have a decent extended program of parental leave under unemployment insurance, and the Government has done nothing about it.

Another Tory bias was the opinion that quality licensed child care was not really needed. We have heard over and over again that parents could make their own arrangements and did not need government programs.

The Government doubled the child care expense deduction to $4,000 to help compensate parents with higher incomes, not lower income people who cannot afford to pay taxes. Single parents and poor parents, of course, were not covered by tax credits.

At the same time as they were talking about tax reform and tax credits, they introduced a regressive child care expense deduction which took $2.3 billion in child care moneys away from much needed child care services. We have objected to it all along. It does not give parents a choice.

The Tories have also imposed their market-place philosophy on young children. Children are for profit and federal funds are to go for commercial child care, even though several studies have shown that "for profit" day care centres have lower quality care and very minimal standards. To make a profit, care givers are paid lower wages, staff turnover is higher, staff are less qualified, and the ratio of staff to children is often lower. The Tory strategy even tolerates giant child care chains coming into Canada, offering glitzy laid on programs with a minimum of individualized child development.

It is deplorable that the Liberal child care philosophy also supports federal funding for commercial child care operations.

When the Government eventually announced the national child care strategy in late 1987, it proposed spending a total of $5.3 billion over the next seven years. Some of this money was already in the Budget. We felt that this was a generous amount, but we were astounded that this would create only 200,000 new spaces—the same amount that we have now—over a seven-year period. This is only an average of about 30,000 spaces per year, and it is to cover 10 provinces and two territories, all of which desperately need increased and better quality child care. Therefore, two million children of working parents would still have a total of 4,000 spaces after 7 years.

An analysis shows that this increase of 200,000 spaces is less than the growth rate which would occur if we maintained the status quo under the Canada Assistance Plan. This is ridiculous. Under the Canada Assistance Plan the projected growth rate is 15 per cent, while under this new Bill the growth rate of child care spaces will only be 10 per cent. We would be going backwards. It is evident that Tory strategy and Bill C-144 are being used to limit the number of day care spaces that provinces can developed. There is no flexibility. It is an arbitrary plan which makes no attempt to assess the real needs of children and families across Canada. It is no wonder that provinces and territories have serious concerns.

It took the Minister four years to realize what research had documented long ago, that care givers have abominably low salaries, many of them under $10,000 a year. In July, he acknowledged his mistake in calculations by adding $1 billion to cover the real costs of child care and to provide for some Indian child care programs, which I agree are desperately needed. However, as was pointed out by my colleague, there was no increase for the 200,000 spaces to which I am sure provinces must have objected.

The new allocation still caps the number of new spaces at 200,000, which does not recognize real child care needs in Canada. As a result, many child care experts and several provinces feel that it would be better to maintain the status quo temporarily, until we can have an election and a new Government with a more progressive plan and with more flexibility to allow child care services to grow in the future. This program caps everything at the end of seven years.

Now, at long last, we have Bill C-144. It is the culmination of the child care strategy that refuses to deal with the real needs of Canadian parents and children and misuses child care dollars. I gave an example of the tax measures earlier. It offers an inflexible, unrealistic plan with no national objectives and no requirements for provinces to develop quality, affordable non-profit child care.

There will be great disparity in the kind of child care that is developed across Canada, which undermines the whole concept of a national child care program. We have only to look at medicare, a far better model which should have been followed. It leaves to the provinces how they would use federal tax dollars. It almost encourages them to use them for poor quality commercial day care. Because the government child care strategy and this Bill are so seriously and fundamentally flawed, we cannot support them.

The Minister has refused to listen to strong submissions from parents and care givers across this country who have years of commitment, experience, and expertise. He has refused to look at research studies and to follow the recommendations in a number of very important studies.

We agree with these groups that the most important priority should have been to establish those clear principles and objectives in the Bill itself and that federal tax dollars should have been directed first to the establishment of a network of quality, affordable, non-profit child care services across Canada with flexibility to meet the real needs of children. There should be program guidelines to require provinces to develop such services, with a period of time for conversion to non-profit societies for centres that want subsidies. We know that it will take many years to develop an ideal child care program, but surely we should be starting in the right way with clear, progressive objectives and flexibility that would allow this program to grow in the future and not be capped after seven years.

Our great concern and the concern of most Canadians interested in child care is that Bill C-144 limits the number of new spaces to only 200,000 at the end of seven years. Studies show that the present limited inadequate system of subsidizing child care under the Canada Assistance Plan has resulted in a 15 per cent growth rate. This Bill will result in only a 10 per cent growth rate. It just does not make sense. I do not know how the Minister can justify it.

Some provinces, like B.C., should be very concerned that by not using the Canada Assistance Plan in the future they will not have the open-ended kind of coverage for children with special needs. This program of the Minister's has not dealt with these children. In a province like British Columbia almost all spaces could be used by disabled and other children with special needs. There is no provision for the extra cost of such services.

Child care needs are greatest in poorer regions of Canada where few centres exist and workers are grossly underpaid. Bill C-144 does have a very complicated, variable cost-sharing formula. It was interesting that the Minister indicated that this could go up to 90 per cent in Newfoundland, I think he said. I am not sure, though, that people understand this. We feel very strongly that this is important. We are worried that the Northwest Territories, which has a very high birth rate, has warned that it can put no money into child care and must have 100 per cent federal funds.

Another concern with this Bill is that it offers capital funding of up to 70 per cent for building non-profit centres for only seven years. What happens afterward? Incidentally, commercial centres will still be able to get tax breaks for their capital expenses after that time. Since it often takes several years to establish a new centre, particularly in rural communities, this is quite unrealistic. It is another indication that the Bill is designed to limit child care rather than to develop a sound national program for child care which is flexible, meets future needs, and improves as the years go by.

I wish I had time to speak of the special needs and concerns of different regions, but I will have to leave that to my colleagues. I am glad that my hon. friends to the right will join us in opposing this regressive Bill. I am glad my colleague from the special committee on child care has spoken today. I note that none of our Conservative colleagues are here. I must say that the Liberals had over 20 years to take action on child care ever since the royal commission on the status of women—

Mr. Gauthier: We did.

Ms. Mitchell: —but the Liberals did nothing that was effective in meeting child care needs. I wonder why the Liberal child care policy endorses commercial child care when it has been proven over and over that it is poor quality care with minimum standards. Other aspects of Liberal policy are very fuzzy.

A New Democratic child care program would be phased in. We know that we cannot achieve the ideal immediately. We have both a short-term and a long-term plan. We would make provincial funding conditional upon meeting national program objectives. We would recognize the present crisis in child care. We would have done this four years ago by introducing direct grants to provinces to assist with the crisis until all these changes could take place. We would use child care dollars for direct funding of capital and operational grants for licensed child care services as opposed to tax expenditures which are targeted only to the wealthier families. We would aim to have parent fees reduced to 50 per cent of the total costs by the early 1990s, with a longer term goal of eventually reducing costs even further. We would provide up to 80 per cent of all government funding for poorer provinces and territories with underdeveloped services. We would insist on parental and community involvement in the development of child care in Canada. This is only common in non-profit centres. We would improve care giver training and wages.

Most important, and I am glad the Minister is here, we would amend the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act to give all parents a real opportunity to spend some time at home with their infant children. The Minister has not mentioned this very important aspect which our committee also recommended.

Working Canadian women and their families have great needs for reliable quality child care services. They had hoped for a national child care program which would be a model social program and which would develop progressively into the future. This is the first social program we have had since medicare. We should have built it on the lines of medicare with national standards, with equal access, and with quality services across the country. Taxpayers want their child care dollars to be well spent.

The Government is generous in the amount of money that is going in at the first stage. I must admit that our plan had even less money targeted during the first stage. We want the money to go directly into child care services so that parents will have a choice and will be assured that they do not have to use an unreliable babysitter or in fact provide no care but can go to their neighbourhood child care centre or have other forms of family support and in-home services available to them.

This child care legislation is the final straw in a flawed and regressive Conservative child care strategy. It does not even attempt to deal realistically with child care needs of Canada. The Minister has made no attempt to assess the real child care needs. He has taken an arbitrary 200,000 spaces over seven years, laid it on, and, boom, there is nothing after that.

We cannot support this program. We ask the Government, in all sincerity, to withdraw the Bill. Children and women deserve better.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe there is agreement to call it one o'clock.

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

ENERGY

OWNERSHIP OF PETROLEUM INDUSTRY

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, this morning the Petroleum Monitoring Agency released the Canadian petroleum industry 1987 petroleum monitoring report which related some distressing news. In dealing with Canadian control and ownership of the petroleum industry, the status of control of Husky Oil Limited has been changed from the Canadian category as established by Investment Canada to a foreign classification, by Energy, Mines and Resources. The result is a 1.5 per cent reduction in Canadian revenues from the petroleum industry.

This obviously highlights the Government's sell-out of our country's resources. Indeed, Investment Canada has reviewed and approved 443 out of 443 acquisitions, valued at $38,203,721,000. In other words, no foreign acquisitions have been disallowed.

The Conservative Government is misleading Canadians by stating that it wants to maintain 50 per cent Canadian ownership of our energy resources and will not sell a financially healthy Canadian company with assets over $5 million. As stated in the report of the Petroleum Monitoring Agency:

Canadian ownership of the petroleum industry, based on upstream revenues, declined from 46.7 per cent in 1986 to 45.1 per cent in 1987, while Canadian control decreased from 49 per cent in 1986 to 45.2 per cent in 1987.

Why is the Government clandestinely promoting the reduction of Canadian control and ownership of our energy sector?

HUMAN RIGHTS

ROMANIA—PLIGHT OF MINORITY GROUPS

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, 13 years ago, on August 1, 1975, Canada, along with 33 other nations, including the United States and the Soviet Union, signed a landmark agreement which came to be known as the Helsinki Accords. Canada, under the leadership of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark), has given leadership and direction to honour this country's commitment to human rights.

What about elsewhere? Even since glasnost and demokratizatsia, some 300 political prisoners, including 10 Helsinki monitors, still languish in labour camps and exile. The recent decision of Romania to bulldoze 7,000 villages, uprooting and scattering the 2.5 million native Hungarians throughout Romania, is a direct affront to those Accords.

Romania undertook to succour all persons under its jurisdiction without distinction of race, sex, language or religion, just as we did. I would urge the Department of External Affairs to show Canada's displeasure at this ruthless uprooting of defenceless minority groups in Romania today.

NATIVE PEOPLES

NEWFOUNDLAND AND LABRADOR—CALL FOR APPOINTMENT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

Mr. Jack Harris (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, the native people of Newfoundland and Labrador have been the victims of an apparently intentional effort by the Government of Canada to deny them the full rights to which they are entitled under Section 91(24) of the Canadian Constitution and the provisions of the Indian Act. Studies commissioned by me, including an examination of official documents, have revealed that from early after Newfoundland joined Confederation in 1949, a systematic denial of rights has been a fact of our history and continues to affect the lives of native people in Newfoundland and Labrador. It amounts to discrimination against native people because they live in this province. It is time for this hidden history to be fully exposed.

I have therefore called upon the Government of Canada to establish immediately a Royal Commission on Native People in Newfoundland and Labrador. Such a commission would have a mandate to inquire into the treatment of aboriginal peoples since 1949, with specific focus on the rejection by the federal Government of its constitutional responsibilities with respect to the native people in the province. The commission should have the authority to recommend measures to correct the historic and current injustices, and to ensure cultural survival and promote self-government for the native people of Newfoundland and Labrador. This record of official injustice must be exposed and redressed.

TRIBUTE TO WAYNE GRETZKY, CANADIAN

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, today I pay tribute to a great Canadian, Wayne Gretzky. He has lived his life up to now in Canada and for the last nine years has been an Edmonton Oiler. With his tremendous ability as an athlete, the greatest among them all, he won the hearts of every Albertan with his kindness, his courage, his excellence, and his humility. Being the leader in winning four Stanley Cups was a tremendous achievement, but even that was superseded by the honesty of this man who never lost the common touch.

He is and has been Canada's greatest ambassador. He is properly called "The Great One" who, wherever he went, promoted Canadianism, honesty, fair play, decency, and respect for all humans irrespective of race, colour or creed.

We have not lost him; we have gained a great representative. Wherever Wayne Gretzky goes, Canada's best will be on display because in his heart there is a maple leaf. This Parliament applauds "The Great One", Wayne Gretzky.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

THE LATE FÉLIX LECLERC

Mrs. Lucie Pépin (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, today Quebecers are in mourning. Félix Leclerc is being taken to his final rest. A giant is being put to sleep. Félix Leclerc is one of our Québécois and Canadian poets and singers who set the tone for us, who gave us a taste for Quebec, especially in his songs and poems. Who among us has not hummed Moi, mes souliers and C'était un p'tit bonheur? He reminded us of our origins and made us proud to be Quebecers. He was a great-hearted man who gave us not only the desire to be but also, and especially, the desire to be what we are and what we want to be.

I conclude this humble tribute by extending my sincerest condolences to all his family and friends and reminding them that Félix Leclerc will always have a special place in our hearts. I would like to repeat what Félix wrote about death:

"It is better to die on a task that cannot be done than to live resignedly but uneventfully."

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

ACID RAIN—ACTION TAKEN BY UNITED STATES PRESIDENT

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, Canadians across this great country can rejoice at our latest victory in the fight against acid rain. This Government has been pursuing quiet diplomacy. Perhaps it is not the confrontation method the Opposition would have preferred, but we have succeeded.

Last Friday, President Reagan announced that his administration would freeze U.S. emissions of nitrogen oxides at 1987 levels for seven years. Finally, all the hard work of this Government and the Acid Rain Committee is paying off.

No one in Canada doubts that acid rain is a killer and that a great deal of work needs to be done. This summer the information campaign engineered by the Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan) has proven to be highly successful in making the average American aware of our concerns and the damage this problem is creating for both our countries.

This is only the beginning, and every day we are making progress. The Americans realize more and more how critical this problem is and that we must combine our efforts to combat this menace called acid rain. Let us give credit where credit is due and encourage our Minister of the Environment to continue his good work.

THE LATE FÉLIX LECLERC

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, a singer has died but his songs live. For Canada, Félix Leclerc is proof of the benefits of the Canadian mosaic over the American melting pot. For Quebec, he became the spirit, voice and pride of a whole generation. Félix Leclerc: we remember!

MULTICULTURALISM

CULTURES CANADA 88—CEREMONY ON PARLIAMENT HILL

Mr. Bill Gottselig (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, there was a very interesting headline in our local newspaper, The Outlook, this past Monday. "Noisy Jim is on the road again," the headline read, and the article went on to say that Jim Kook was going to Ottawa to participate in Cultures Canada 88 as a result of having previously participated in a similar program at Expo 86.

I was very pleased last night to be with Jim and his wife May on the parliamentary lawn, with the historic Peace Tower in the background, at a very special ceremony in which the Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Weiner) as well as Mrs. Jean Pigott, representing the National Capital Commission, participated.

The various participants in Cultures Canada 88, many displaying costumes from their native lands, were taking part in this very colourful ceremony on Parliament Hill which is the heart of Canada. This once again displayed the colourful mosaic of our country which is greatly enriched by maintaining this heritage. I salute my constituent, Noisy Jim, as well as all participants in this cultural event.

DISASTERS

1985 GANDER AIR CRASH—CALL FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, the investigation into the 1985 Gander Arrow air crash has been plagued with controversy, contradiction, resignations and confusion. Crucial testimony has been neglected, documents have been hidden from the Canadian Aviation Safety Board members, and tentative conclusions have been nothing short of illogical.

Now there are new revelations. Several firemen who worked on extinguishing the fire resulting from this unfortunate crash are ill from what they believe to be the ingestion of toxic gases. What caused those toxic fumes? What caused fire extinguishing equipment to activate prior to the plane crashing? Why is information being withheld from the Canadian Aviation Safety Board? More important, why blame the crash on the pilot of that plane?

We need a public commission of inquiry into the Gander air crash. We must find out the truth about this most unfortunate disaster.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

FEDERAL MEASURES TO ASSIST WESTERN CANADA

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, our Government has made three particularly significant contributions toward the economic health of Canada's West.

First was the Western Accord which started the process, now completed, of dismantling the punitive National Energy Program.

Second was the Western Economic Diversification Program which, in its first year, approved 231 proposals for $44 million in assistance to Alberta businesses as of the end of July. There were 503 proposals in the whole of western Canada for a total investment of $345 million. Twelve Calgary companies received assistance ranging from $20,000 to $720,000. Not only does this assist in broadening our economic base, it also creates jobs.

Last month we had the announcement of the western procurement initiative which will increase the amount of federal procurement carried out in western Canada by more than $600 million over the next four years. That is an increase of 16 per cent. In addition, our Government is committed to sourcing a greater portion of contracts over $100 million from western suppliers.

Who can say that this Government has not responded to the needs of western Canada? No one!

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EAST TIMOR—OCCUPATION BY INDONESIA

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow at the UN, the Special Committee on Decolonization will consider the illegal occupation of East Timor since 1975 by Indonesia. Since that time Indonesia has waged a genocidal war against the people of East Timor.

This is the human rights situation that Canada chooses to ignore. Because of extensive trade links with Indonesia, Canada turns a blind eye to its human rights abuses. Indonesia has been called the most totalitarian country in the world, and its doors are closed to such organizations as Amnesty International and the International Red Cross.

In spite of Canada's pretence that our development assistance is linked to human rights, Indonesia remains one of our largest aid recipients. Our ambassador even went to the extent of accompanying the former Minister of External Affairs, Mr. Mochtar, on a visit to East Timor during a phoney election campaign.

Canada must recognize that it is time to end the double standard and speak up for human rights in East Timor.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT—POSITION OF LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Mr. Speaker, you may recall that on June 29 the Right Hon. Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Turner) made a speech in this House on the subject of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement. Two days ago the Winnipeg Free Press, commenting editorially on that speech and other statements made by the Right Hon. Member, said, and I quote:

> "Mr. Turner took phrases from one part of the agreement and applied them to another; distorted the meaning and intent of other passages, and simply falsified the application of yet others. It is a surprising performance from a man who was once regarded, whatever his political strengths or weaknesses, as a man of integrity."

The editorial went on to say:

> "There is room for honest disagreement over the likely effects of free trade. The point at issue in Mr. Turner's approach to free trade is not one of honest disagreement but of simple deliberate distortion."

The editorial concluded:

> "John Turner these days has a liking for slogans. "Let the people decide" is his latest. Before the people do decide he might direct another slogan to himself, "Tell the people the truth".

Amen, Mr. Speaker.

IMMIGRATION

BACKLOG IN PROCESSING SECURITY CLEARANCES

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I defy the Tories to tell the truth about the immigration mess they created in this country. I speak not only on behalf of hundreds of people in the Hungarian community of the city of Hamilton, but thousands of Hamiltonians who would like to know when the Government is going to clean up the immigration mess it created.

I met this week with a gentleman by the name of Francisc Anghi in my office. He has been waiting for almost two years to get security clearance so he can apply to bring his family from Romania. He is a Hungarian refugee whose family is under political pressure in Romania. In the meantime, one of his sons has died. Another son is suffering a fatal illness. All he wants to know from the Government is how much longer it will take before he gets security clearance so he can apply to bring his family members to Canada. He is desperate, and there are thousands of other Canadians like him.

The Government claimed to be working on a national emergency concerning immigration policy but it created an incredible backlog in security clearances which leaves thousands of frustrated landed immigrants and Canadians waiting for their families to be reunited. What kind of a humane Government will allow a son to die while the father is waiting for his security clearance?

Let us clean up this immigration mess by bringing back a Liberal Government.

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT—POSITION OF LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, on July 21, I told the Leader of the Opposition that the serious Liberal Senators would not agree to submit to his orders. I therefore suggest that he check or inquire with his Senators and Members of Parliament to see whether others are not preparing to imitate the Johnstons and Van Roggens. What you are asking them, Mr. Leader of the Opposition, is to act undemocratically, and they are opposed to that.

All the major newspapers in the country have called your position irresponsible and partisan. In the space of a few weeks, you have contradicted yourself by saying that you were committed to not asking the Liberal Senators to assume your responsibilities for you in the coming weeks.

I hope that you are aware of the gratitude you owe Canadians who will keep the Right Hon. Brian Mulroney as Prime Minister and who may once again give you the chance to be just the Leader of the Opposition, which is already a very big favour in your case.

INTERMENT OF JAPANESE-CANADIANS DURING WORLD WAR II—CALL FOR PAYMENT OF COMPENSATION

Mr. Ernie Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of State for Multiculturalism is touring the country these days celebrating the new Multiculturalism Act. As a result, he is too busy to consider the redress for Japanese-Canadians the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) promised four years ago. Meanwhile, the U.S. House of Representatives followed the U.S. Senate's lead in passing a redress measure for Japanese-Americans. The U.S. President signed a Bill which provides $20,000 U.S. for every Japanese-American survivor.

The Mulroney Government should be ashamed of itself. Successive Ministers have failed to deal properly with the National Association of Japanese-Canadians, and they have refused to consider compensation for individual Japanese-Canadian survivors. It is hypocritical to celebrate high sounding principles while one is refusing to act on those principles. The Prime Minister should hide his face in shame for having failed to act on the promises of June, 1984.

Canadians will remember this broken promise as one of the most shameful in the entire Mulroney record.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT—SUPPORT FOR QUÉBEC INVESTORS AND INDUSTRIES—PRIME MINISTER'S POSITION

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. We all know that members of Cabinet have not even read the trade agreement with the United States. Nevertheless, the official statement or official interpretation by President Reagan says, on page 86, that a province shall grant investors from the other country the same favourable treatment granted investors from that province. President Reagan is saying that the Government of Quebec cannot use special measures to encourage Quebecers to invest in their own province.

What impact does this have on Quebec's stock savings plan? What impact does it have on possible changes in the plan? And what impact will this have on efforts by the Government of Quebec to ensure that Quebec industries are developed and financed by Quebecers?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if I am not mistaken, the Government of Quebec has just issued a statement expressing its satisfaction with the trade agreement, and especially with the provisions relating to investment. Perhaps the Leader of the Opposition should also read the press releases and major documents issued by the Government of Quebec.

• (1420)

SUPPORT FOR INVESTORS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think the Prime Minister of Canada should get in touch with the Premier of Quebec and advise him to read the official U.S. text which makes it quite clear that the Government of Quebec would be prevented from promoting investment by Quebecers in Quebec industries.

Mr. Speaker, I am positive that not a single member of Cabinet read the official statement made by the U.S. President on July 25. I am equally positive that not a single member of Cabinet has read the U.S. bill.

President Reagan also says that no Canadian province may impose local equity provisions. The President also says in his document that no province may give preferential treatment to investors from that province.

What does this mean for a province like Quebec that wants to encourage investment by Quebecers in that province? What does it mean for the Canadian Government, if it wants to encourage Canadians to invest in their own country? I repeat, what are regulations on foreign investment doing in a free trade agreement?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition says not a single member of Cabinet has read the agreement and that not a single member of Cabinet has read President Reagan's statement. He is entitled to his opinion, but I think he is wrong. He is also assuming, since his question directly refers to the powers of Quebec, that the Premier of Quebec and, for that matter, the Leader of the Opposition, Mr. Parizeau, have not read the document. However, Robert Bourassa, Jacques Parizeau and practically all Quebec's economic partners have read the document and approved the free trade agreement with the United States.

SMALL PRINT PROVISIONS OF AGREEMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): The Prime Minister should explain to his Quebec counterpart that President Reagan's statement or official interpretation will prevent the Government of Quebec from using specific preferential measures to promote investment by Quebecers in their own industries.

[English]

No wonder there is uncertainty in the country. No one in the Cabinet appears to have read either the Canadian or the American documents. The President's official statement of July 25 says that no province can give a special break to investors from that province.

What is more, page 58 of the American legislation says that the United States will negotiate, in the words of the American Bill, "the elimination of direct investment screening" by Canada including the elimination of all screening of energy and cultural industries.

Does the Prime Minister not realize that not only are all future investment rules out the window but the United States plans to eliminate any rules at all affecting Canadian investment which are currently on the books? Why has no one in his Government bothered to read the fine print in the documents which the Americans have published?

[Translation]

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is an insult to the Hon. Robert Bourassa, the Premier of Quebec! It is a direct attack on the credibility of Mr. Bourassa, who says he has read and understood the entire free trade agreement and endorses that document on behalf of the Government of Quebec and the people of that province. The Leader of the Opposition has grievously insulted the Premier of Quebec, and I think the Premier and Quebecers will remember this as one more insult to Quebec.

[English]

With regard to the point made by my friend, the Leader of the Opposition—

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): You don't know what is in the Bill, that's the problem.

Mr. Mulroney: He says I do not know what the issue is. Perhaps I could point out to him what the Winnipeg Free Press said yesterday. It said, "the point at issue in Mr. Turner's approach to free trade is not one of honest disagreement but of simple deliberate distortion". That is the opinion of the Winnipeg Free Press and of most Canadians.

VISIBLE MINORITIES

INTERNMENT OF JAPANESE CANADIANS DURING WORLD WAR II—REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT NEGOTIATE WITH ASSOCIATION

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of State for Multiculturalism I will direct my question to the Right Hon. Prime Minister.

Several days ago the staff of the Minister of State for Multiculturalism openly admitted that the Minister was too busy on a Conservative campaign tour across the country to deal with trying to settle the Japanese-Canadian redress issue which has eluded the Government and four different Conservative Ministers of Multiculturalism for four years, despite the personal assurances and promises made by the Prime Minister.

Rather than having the Minister indulge in a self-flattering campaign tour to bolster a very desperate record, why does the Government not first honour the Prime Minister's commitment to the Japanese-Canadian community on this issue, establish serious, ongoing negotiations with the NAJC, and genuinely try to solve a very sensitive and emotional issue which is affecting so many Canadians across the country?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend says that the solution to the very serious problem involving Japanese Canadians has eluded the Government. I think he would recognize that we began the process of trying to resolve the problem. We have not achieved that yet, but we were the first Government to begin the process of attempting to solve a historic injustice.

We began that work in light of the statement of the former Leader of the Liberal Party in this House in June of 1984, who said that the Liberal Party and the Liberal Government had no intention of ever paying compensation to or looking after the problems of the Japanese Canadians. We are in the process of improving a great deal on that. I hope there will be a solution very soon.

PRIME MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has made promises and four of his Ministers have issued dozens of press releases saying that there is progress when there really is not. In the meantime, the American experience of a few days ago has quietly but successfully reached a satisfactory conclusion to the Japanese-American redress issue.

Four different Ministers have failed to come up with a resolution. While the Prime Minister was Leader of the Opposition he gave his very clear undertaking that the matter would be resolved, and he has not involved himself since assuming office.

Therefore, can the Prime Minister now give this Parliament the assurance that he will become personally involved and offer political leadership from the top to try to initiate negotiations for a settlement so that the Government, but more important, Parliament and the country, can successfully close a dark chapter in Canada's history? Will he become involved as he said before the last election that he would?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is very unusual and should be noted that an official spokesman of the Liberal Party is favourably invoking a precedent just signed by President Ronald Reagan. The President will be delighted to hear that.

Mr. Riis: He imposed a minimum corporate tax too, Brian.

Mr. Axworthy: You make Ronald Reagan look good.

Mr. Epp (Provencher): Nobody can make you look good, Lloyd.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Right Hon. Prime Minister.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, my friends from the NDP who were in the House at the time will remember, because I think they shared our view, that we were all quite aghast at the statement by the Leader of the Liberal Party and the lack of sympathy which he evinced for Japanese Canadians. The NDP and Conservatives spoke very strongly in favour of an attempt to resolve this sensitive and important matter.

We have moved to the point where we have agreed upon an official apology to the Japanese Canadians who suffered by this unjust action, the creation of a fund on behalf of the Japanese Canadians to deal with the problem of racism which affected them so tragically, and we have another step to take. I think my hon. friend would agree that another important action taken by the Government was the abolition of the infamous War Measures Act which violated the rights of so many Canadian citizens.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT—AGRICULTURAL INDUSTRY

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. Since last October 5, Canada's major farm groups neither supported nor rejected the free trade agreement with the United States. Instead, they attempted to identify clearly issues which must be addressed to maintain the programs and policies which make Canada's agricultural industry "uniquely Canadian".

Now that groups such as the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, Prairie pools, the Wheat Board Advisory Committee, the Union des Producteurs Agricoles de Québec, the National Farmers' Union, the Maritime Farmers' Council and others say that their concerns over that period of time have been ignored, will the Minister explain why the Government chose to ignore all these important farm groups?

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, if the Hon. Member is fair, I think he would withdraw the final part of that comment. This Government has not in the past and will not in the future ignore Canadian farm problems. I challenge him to examine the record. To date we have taken some 660 initiatives delivering over $10 billion. That is a record that is unchallenged in the past.

I recognize that some general farm organizations have some difficulty with the bilateral trade agreement. However, if we look to see what the commodity organizations are saying about the agreement, we find that there are about 100,000 grain farmers in the country who support the agreement. There are about 80,000 beef farmers in the country who support the agreement. There are about 70,000 hog farmers in Canada who support the agreement.

Supply management is secure. Since we went forward with the amendments to the CAPS Act that the previous Government did not have the courage to proceed with, there are about 25,000 horticultural people who recognize that the bilateral trade agreement is in their interest.

POSITION OF CANADIAN FEDERATION OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Minister seems to have ignored or is perhaps unaware of the fact that the Canadian Federation of Agriculture which speaks for nearly all the groups he just cited said: "The CFA cannot support implementation of the FTA in its present form". That is dated July 30, 1988.

Since this is the position of the CFA and the position of most of the component groups of the CFA, will the Minister tell us what, if any, changes he proposes at the last minute to make this agreement acceptable to the farm groups?

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am very much aware of the recent statement issued by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. I have to take issue with certain of their observations because I think they are false. The future picture of the agri-food marketing systems and supply management in Canada is not in jeopardy at all because they are secure under the bilateral trade agreement.

They also challenge the integrity of the Canadian Wheat Board. I believe that is false. They also made some observations about the quality standards of Canadian agriculture commodities. They are not in jeopardy at all.

They recognize as well that we have to take some action to tie up some loose ends. I recognize that, particularly as it relates to the hatching egg industry. We have given a commitment to that industry and we have fulfilled our commitments to the agricultural industry in the past. We have every intention of fulfilling the commitments in the future, including many that are mentioned here.

PROTECTION OF POULTRY SECTOR—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, what is the Government doing to protect the processing and poultry sectors, as requested by the Union des producteurs agricoles in their meeting with the Senate yesterday?

[English]

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I recognize that there are some loose ends to be tied up. We recall that we were challenged on the fact that we would not proceed to transfer a number of dairy items from the tariff list to the import-export list. We gave a commitment to that industry that we would go forward and do so. Of course, the Opposition Parties should recognize that we have already carried that out.

The other loose ends to which I have referred are the other commodities under the feather industry. We will continue to consult with the industry in order to arrive at a sensible action that will again transfer those items from the tariff list to the import-export list. We have made a commitment on this side to ensure continued day-to-day operation of supply management in Canada. We have full intentions of carrying that out.

UNITED STATES OMNIBUS TRADE BILL

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. He will recall that some three or four months ago a Commons committee unanimously reported to the House a recommendation that with the omnibus Trade Bill in the United States not giving an exemption to Canada we should not proceed with the trade agreement. At the same time, Ambassador Gotlieb, on behalf of the Government of Canada, wrote to the United States administration and Congressional leaders that: "The proposed redefinition of subsidy represents a significant and dangerous departure from generally accepted international norms. If enacted, they would undermine the GATT".

On Section 103 of that same Bill, Ambassador Gotlieb said: "These proposals could lead to U.S. actions inconsistent with the GATT and would exacerbate international trade tensions".

Yesterday the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister for International Trade said the Government of Canada no longer has a problem with that Bill. He said that all of the matters have been dealt with and that there is no problem. Yet the very same concerns and issues raised by Ambassador Gotlieb are still in the Bill.

Is the Parliamentary Secretary speaking for the Government? If so, why has the Government changed its position? Why is the Government abandoning its previous position stated by the full Commons committee? Why is the Government not protesting U.S. trade action that will continue to harass Canadian exporters?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the question by my hon. friend is whether the Parliamentary Secretary, in his response, spoke for the Government. May I say that not only has the Parliamentary Secretary spoken for the Government, he has done so in an eloquent, effective, and tremendous way here in the House of Commons.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Riis: We are talking about McDermid.

Mr. Mulroney: The House Leader of the New Democratic Party insists on naming him. Yes, it was McDermid who did such a wonderful job.

CANADIAN POSITION

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, if it is true that the Parliamentary Secretary in his own fashion is speaking for the Government, then the question stands. Why is the Government retreating from its position? Why has it changed the stated position of the Minister in the House that we would protest those measures in the omnibus Trade Bill which contravene the trade agreement even though those measures are still in the Bill as it has been passed by the Congress? Why has the Government once again lost its backbone when it comes to protecting Canadian interests and has subjected Canadian exporters to further trade harassment?

Why are we perpetrating a joke on the Canadian people by having tougher trade laws?

Mr. John McDermid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, first, the House and the country owe a great deal of gratitude to Ambassador Gotlieb for his work in fighting this omnibus Trade Bill, in having the most severe sections of it removed and other parts watered down. He has done a masterful job of representing our interests in Washington and should be recognized.

• (1440)

Second, we have reviewed the text of the omnibus Trade Bill and we are satisfied there are no provisions in it that would require the administration to take any action which would be inconsistent with the free trade agreement. We have examined that. We have not retreated one iota on this. The free trade agreement is going ahead. We look forward to debating the silly amendments the Hon. Member has brought into the House.

VISIBLE MINORITIES

INTERNMENT OF JAPANESE-CANADIANS DURING WORLD WAR II—ISSUE OF INDIVIDUAL COMPENSATION

Mr. Ernie Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister who has already recognized the long-standing support of the New Democratic Party for redress to Japanese-Canadians and which, of course, remembers his own question that last day in June of 1984, to former Prime Minister Trudeau when he asked for redress.

The Prime Minister knows that the American President has signed a Bill authorizing compensation to individual Japanese-American survivors. Recognizing that the issue of individual compensation has been the sticking point in all the discussions with the National Association of Japanese Canadians, will the Prime Minister now authorize negotiations with the National Association of Japanese Canadians on the issue of individual compensation for Japanese-Canadian survivors?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): I am happy, Mr. Speaker, to refer again to the support of the New Democratic Party for the position I raised in the House of Commons in June of 1984. My hon. friend refers to the fact that compensation was the "sticking point". Compensation was not the sticking point. The sticking point was the refusal of the Liberal Government for 40 years to even acknowledge and apologize for what had taken place.

Mr. Cassidy: What about right now?

Mr. Mulroney: Since this Government has been sworn in, and with the support of my hon. friend in the New Democratic Party, certainly not elsewhere, there has been arranged an agreement whereby there is to be a trust fund with respect to anti-racism. There is to be a formal apology delivered in the House of Commons on behalf of the Government and the people of Canada with respect to this tragedy that took place so many years ago.

Ms. Mitchell: But no negotiations.

Mr. Mulroney: There are ongoing discussions with the representatives of the National Association of Japanese Canadians at this very moment. I know my hon. friend will be happy to learn that those negotiations are moving ahead and they are in the extremely competent hands of the Minister for Multiculturalism.

REQUEST FOR COMMITMENT TO DISCUSSIONS

Mr. Ernie Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, it is imperative that the Prime Minister's word "negotiate" describe a reality that has not been followed since January of 1985. Through you, Mr. Speaker, I ask the Prime Minister to give his word on behalf of this Government that there will be full and fair discussions with the National Association of Japanese Canadians to arrive at an agreement acceptable to the association to provide the kind of redress that is essential if this blot on the national honour is finally to be expunged.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for referring to this matter because it is indeed a very serious blot on Canada's honour and, to me, it is a matter of very considerable regret that for over 40 years this matter was left untouched by the previous series of administrations. We have made some important progress with respect to resolving the matter and, with the support of my hon. friend, hopefully this matter can be brought to a proper and appropriate resolution which will be satisfactory to all concerned.

FINANCE

TAX TREATMENT OF COMPANIES DONATING TO FOOD BANKS

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Are the reports true that the Government intends to give a tax break to food companies which donate surplus food to food banks? Whether this is true or not, would the Minister of Finance not agree that it would make much more sense to address the problem of why the number of food banks is increasing even though we are in a period of relative prosperity, rather than giving tax breaks which will in fact encourage more food banks to be created?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the last part of the Hon. Member's question, but I should point out to him that there is a means now whereby companies which are producers or wholesalers of food are able to provide food to food banks and receive a tax credit which will provide them with the encouragement I think the Hon. Member is seeking.

IMMIGRATION

ADMISSION OF SOUTH AFRICAN IMMIGRANTS TO CANADA

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Employment and Immigration my question is directed to the Prime Minister. It concerns the Government's soft policy on South Africa. There are in Canada a number of white South Africans here as draft resisters, unwilling on conscientious grounds to serve in the Armed Forces to enforce apartheid, who face possible imprisonment if they return home. They are uncertain as to whether they will be allowed to remain in Canada. There are non-white South Africans here in Canada because they oppose living in a racist society and fascist country, who are also uncertain about their future in Canada.

Will the Prime Minister today declare that South Africans will have blanket approval to obtain landed immigrant status in Canada provided they are admissible under the Immigration Act, as did the former Government with its B-I list, including such countries as El Salvador and Lebanon, countries in Eastern Europe and other countries as well?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we will, of course, as a Government, look with care at any question that is raised with respect to Canada and Canada's role, and the succour Canada can provide to refugees or people seeking our assistance. We have done that before and we will do so again in this case.

My friend will understand that I must take exception to his reference to a "soft policy" of this Government on South Africa. The former Ambassador to the United Nations, Stephen Lewis, referred to the tremendous leadership shown by Canada in the United Nations with respect to South Africa. The comments of my hon. friend have been repudiated by President Mugabe, President Kaunda, and Prime Minister Ghandi, all of whom believe that Canada since 1984 has been playing a particular and effective role of international leadership with respect to South Africa.

STATUS OF IMMIGRANTS

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have raised a number of specific measures in the House which my Leader mentioned in his speech last November as the policy of the Official Opposition, the Liberals, and I have asked a very specific question today. The Prime Minister refuses to give a specific answer. Will South Africa be added to the B-I list of the Minister and the Department of Employment and Immigration so that blanket approval will be available to South Africans seeking haven here, and so a signal will be sent to South Africans in their own country who want to resist the official policy of apartheid in that country?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of State (Youth)) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, I will be happy to take notice and transmit the question to the Minister on behalf of the Hon. Member. In the meantime I want to remind the Hon. Member that there is a process now by which people can acquire refugee status, if that is the case, through legislation if they feel compelled to do so because for political reasons their lives may be threatened. That process is there for people who want to make that case and argue it before an adjudicator.

I think it is quite clear that this Government has made its position known on South Africa very forcefully. We have assumed a position of leadership as was demonstrated recently in the sports community. We are very conscious of the role we want to play in the world in this respect.

WESTERN DIVERSIFICATION FUND

ALLOCATION OF GRANTS TO MANITOBA

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for the Western Diversification Program. From information provided by his office a few days ago on all projects released in each of the four western provinces up to July 31 of this year, we see that Manitoba received the smallest amount of any of the provinces, $2,800,000. Saskatchewan with a slightly smaller population received $9,500,000. That is more than three times as much as Manitoba. Alberta received $27.5 million, and British Columbia received almost $50 million.

• (1450)

Some of us suspected that as long as Manitoba had an NDP Government it would be ignored, but since April Manitoba has had a Conservative Government. I would like to ask the Minister what has he got against the people of Manitoba and Premier Filmon so that Manitoba gets grants that are so abysmally small.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to reply to the question of my hon. friend. Over 500 proposals have been approved by Western Diversification in the last 12 months since the Prime Minister established it, totalling some $345 million, to build and strengthen the economy of western Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKnight: I know the Hon. Member has a concern for his home province, as do Members of Parliament from that province on the government side. I would like to inform the Hon. Member that some 40 projects have been approved in Manitoba for $20 million.

Yesterday I had the opportunity to provide over $1 million to Otto Bock. That company is processing and putting in a CAD-CAM prosthetic operation to bring technology from Germany. It is investing $3 million of its money and $1 million from western economic diversification to diversify the economy and to serve Winnipeg and Manitoba.

Yesterday I also had the opportunity to participate in an agreement with Morfee Wheel. This is technology developed in British Columbia and transferred to Manitoba by the company to develop truck wheels. It is the first new development in truck design since the disc brake.

I can tell the Hon. Member that everything is well in Manitoba and well in western Canada.

GRANT TO STEINBACH

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the figures I quoted were not pulled out of the air. They were figures released by the Minister's office as of ten days ago.

Why is it that when the City of Winnipeg has so diversified an economic base that it can produce almost anything in the list which he provided, the only grant for over $1 million was to the town of Steinbach which happens to be in the constituency represented by the Minister of Health and Welfare?

It reminds us Manitobans of the type of things we heard when the Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry was a Minister and his grants were so political.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Steinbach is well known for representing his riding. I would like to inform the Hon. Member of the activities that took place yesterday in Manitoba, and the opportunities to sign prior to that meeting with our colleagues from the Province of Manitoba. My colleague the Minister of Health, the Hon. Member for Provencher, on behalf of the Government of Canada was able to sign an agreement on a health strategy with the newly elected Government in Manitoba. This health strategy agreement will contribute greatly to the economic activities that will take place in Manitoba.

The announcement yesterday with Otto Bock for $1.4 million which created a company—

Some Hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Shefford.

TRADE

SHARE SAVINGS PLAN

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): My question is for the Right Hon. Prime Minister and follows on my leader's. I would ask the Prime Minister not to hide behind Robert Bourassa.

If, for example, the federal Government wanted to match Quebec's stock savings plan, can the Prime Minister tell me how, under the terms requiring certain results and national treatment, we could continue to require something like the head office being located in Quebec or Canada, or at least 50 per cent of the salaries being paid to employees in Quebec? Would such conditions for a stock savings plan be acceptable under the Free Trade Agreement?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when the Leader of the Opposition hears the Member for Shefford speak of his leader with affection, he must be worried when he hears such things.

The question from the Hon. Member for Shefford, who has set the record for hypocrisy... The Hon. Member for Shefford is more or less repeating his leader's question, except that the question from the Leader of the Liberal Party was more precise.

I took the liberty to answer by using not only the arguments in the document but also the arguments made by Premier Bourassa and his Liberal Government in Quebec. He says that the Hon. Member for Shefford need not worry, Quebecers approve of the free trade treaty.

PRIME MINISTER'S POSITION

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, an unsatisfactory answer if there ever was one! I want to ask the Prime Minister, and I am not asking him to repeat Mr. Bourassa's arguments, I want to ask him whether he is prepared to set up a federal stock savings plan and whether, in that case, the free trade agreement wouldn't be an obstacle because of the standards of performance and national treatment provisions. My question is this: Wouldn't all more or less generous stock savings plans be at risk as a result of the free trade agreement?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my understanding of the Hon. Member's question is that there is nothing in the free trade agreement which would affect the ability of the Government of Canada to establish a stock savings plan.

Oral Questions

TRANSPORT

MOVEMENT OF GRAIN THROUGH ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister, in the absence of the Minister of Transport and the Minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. The Deputy Prime Minister will know that those two Ministers met with officials from the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Seaway industry approximately three weeks ago. They offered a plan of action to the Government to deal with the current crisis in the movement of grain and other products from the West through Thunder Bay, the Great Lakes, and the St. Lawrence Seaway.

Is the Deputy Prime Minister prepared to advise the House and the thousands of men and women who are affected along the system what action the Government is now prepared to take?

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, anyone with a knowledge and understanding of the importance of the agri-food industry in Canada would not be surprised by the negative effects on a whole variety of aspects of the Canadian economy.

The Minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board is in Winnipeg today meeting with the provincial Minister of Transport with respect to the Churchill issue. The Department is analyzing the report of the coalition. The Hon. Member will appreciate the fact that any decision that is made will have to be made in the interests of the coalition of the ports in all regions, Canadian farmers, and certainly in the interests of our grain customers.

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. It has now been three weeks, and there are more layoffs every day. At the very least could the Minister indicate when the people of Canada can expect a decision and an announcement by the Government on the actions that it will take to assist those who are suffering because of the lack of movement of grain?

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think the Hon. Member must also appreciate the fact that the federal Government stays out of the day-to-day operations of the Canadian Wheat Board. The Canadian Wheat Board does not tell our grain customers where to buy their grain.

The Hon. Member might take some satisfaction from a copy of a telex I have here. It is signed by the Commissioner of the Canadian Wheat Board. It states: "I can assure you that we are continuing to pursue all possible marketing opportunities".

SECOND FIRING OF IMMIGRATION OFFICER

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. I would like to ask the Prime Minister why the Government continues to wage a campaign of harassment against Canadians and, in particular, government employees who want to tell the truth to Canadians about a number of issues.

I would like to ask specifically why, for the second time, the Government has fired John Quigley, the immigration officer from Toronto who last year had the guts to tell the truth about a bad immigration policy.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, my information is to the effect that Mr. Quigley has been informed that his services are not required any more because of an abuse in telecommunication privileges. Mr. Quigley has all recourses open to him from now on. If he wants to appeal that decision, the law provides for that type of recourse.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

DISMISSAL OF HAGERSVILLE EMPLOYEE

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. I have a case here of a woman who, for 15 years, delivered rural mail. Last month she was terminated by Canada Post allegedly because of a disagreement over air conditioning, but the real reason was because she was a founding member of the Rural Route Mail Carriers of Canada and a founding member of Rural Dignity. Why was Sue Eybel fired from Hagersville? Why was John Quigley fired from Toronto? Why is the Government running a campaign of harassment against employees who are trying to fight for Canadian rights?

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to respond to the question about the alleged firing of the post mistress in the riding referred to by the Hon. Member. Mr. Speaker, I intend to ask for a full investigation of this matter, and I will get back to the Hon. Member with a detailed reply.

BANKS AND BANKING

SERVICE CHARGES APPLIED TO SMALL BUSINESSES

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of State for Finance. The Minister is, of course, aware of the hearings which the Finance Committee held on bank charges. He is also aware of the representations the small business community across Canada has been making to him and to Members of Parliament that many of the same recommendations, made concerning bank service charges to the consumer, by the Finance Committee, be applied to small business. Many small businesses feel captured by the banks and feel that they are unable to object to many unfair charges imposed by the banks.

Is the Minister prepared to act on behalf of the small business community of Canada against the big banks?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Finance)): Of course, Mr. Speaker, the Government is prepared to act. We made this clear a good number of months ago.

First, all the principles which we came up for the consumer: disclosure, advance notice, a complaints mechanism, and abolishment of obnoxious charges, should be applied to the business community as well.

The Hon. Member is very late in coming to this issue. We have a meeting today between the small business organizations and the Bankers' Association. I hope they will be able to resolve the details to make sure that we can have in place a regime just as strong for the small business sector as we have for consumers.

REQUEST FOR INTRODUCTION OF REGULATORY LEGISLATION

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, my second question is for the same Minister.

The Finance Committee has issued a good report dealing with credit card charges, bank services charges, and yet we are afraid that once the public spotlight is removed the banks will revert back to former practices as they are now beginning to do with increases in credit charges. Is the Minister prepared to introduce legislation to regulate the banks to ensure that there will be fair banking practices not only for consumers but for the small business community of the country?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I do not know where the Hon. Member is coming from. His Party wanted a voluntary agreement for bank service charges a month or two months ago. Suddenly the Member and his Party want the Government to do it all. What we have accomplished is that together with legislation and a voluntary approach we have protected the consumers, and improved their relationship with the banks. We will do the same for the small business community as well.

Mr. Speaker: There will be a single question from the Hon. Member for Algoma, followed by a single question from the Hon. Member for London East and that will close Question Period. The Hon. Member for Algoma.

AGRICULTURE

GRAPE ADJUSTMENT PROGRAM

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

Last week he issued a press release announcing the grape adjustment program as a result of the trade deal with the United States. In that press release the Government is committed to a strong and viable grape and wine industry in British Columbia.

Could the Minister explain, since approximately over 2,000 of the 3,400 acres of grape vines are expected to be removed, how you could have a strong and viable grape industry when more than two-thirds of it will be removed? Could the Minister answer even one question for the grape growers? Is the adjustment assistance subject to income tax? The growers have no idea about the program or whether the adjustment assistance will be taxable.

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): We have not reached a final decision on that particular issue, Mr. Speaker.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

VETERANS INDEPENDENCE PROGRAM—EXTENSION OF COVERAGE

Mr. Jim Jepson (London East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

Last June at a Royal Canadian Legion Dominion Command convention the Minister announced that the Veterans Independence Program would be extended to those veterans serving Canada in Canada during wartime. We hear from the Opposition of a very imminent election. Could the Minister tell this House whether this program will be in place prior to the next election?

Hon. George Hees (Minister of Veterans Affairs and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to answer this very good question from a Member who pays particular attention to the welfare of our veterans who deserve our attention so well.

I would like to advise the Member and all Members in this House that we have been working on this matter very, very hard, with good progress, and by about the middle of next month we expect to be able to announce the date when this will actually take place.

PRIVILEGE

REQUEST FOR REFERENCE OF DRESS CODE TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I rise today in deference to the Chair with a tie around my neck and a shirt on my body.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: I rise in deference to the Chair but not in deference to common sense. I did not mean to stimulate a national debate yesterday. I really thought we were going to go on to serious things yesterday. In view of the ungainly, unseemly conduct of the New Democrats on something so fundamental as child care, I suggest today, because of the way the New Democrats treated child care yesterday, that my question of privilege on dress for Members is most relevant indeed. If the legislators of the land cannot be dressed comfortably in the halls that make laws, what hope do we have for child care, Mr. Speaker?

Having said that, I am not trying to impede the progress of the House. I sit on the far right wing of the front bench of the Tory Party, and I am glad to be a member of the Tory Party and/or sit on the right wing. Having raised the question of dress I would like to show to my colleagues and to you, Mr. Speaker, that I am not necessarily right wing totally in most situations. If we are inane and stupid enough to meet here on August 10 in the middle of the summer, then I suggest it is time we got our dress code to conform to the realities of the land.

I wrote a letter to you yesterday, Mr. Speaker, after, with respect, you gave a very impetuous and interesting decision.

To quote your words, you would not recognize me "because he was not dressed according to the customs and traditions of the House and, until he is, he will not be recognized". This was your reply to my hon. friend, the Hon. Member for Okanagan—Similkameen (Mr. King), whose area raises second grade apples.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: Because he prefaced his remarks on the apple industry and you would not recognize me, you did a great disservice to the apple growers of the Annapolis Valley. Because the bells rang yesterday afternoon I did not want to create a constitutional conference and crisis. If I had come in in my garb as I did in the Question Period, I would have put the Table, the Clerk, the Greffier, Mr. Marleau, and you in an unconscionable position as to whether or not to count my vote. Quite frankly, most of the votes yesterday did not matter a gosh darn anyway.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: It could have been that way. I would suggest, Sir, without making a federal issue of the matter—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: —that it is time this matter of dress code was referred at least to the Standing Committee on Management and Members' Services so that we could come up with a rational, reasonable code for the middle of the summer.

• (1510)

I just want to put on record, without taking any more time of the House, my letter to you yesterday:

"Dear Mr. Speaker,

My dear John. With the greatest respect and thoughts to you personally, you made a G.D. ruling. I did not want to create a scene but only to have the matter referred to the Members and Services Committee. For surely if there are summer dress codes everywhere else in the land, ie: messes,—"

That is for the neutral people over there in the NDP. That is armed services messes. It continues:

"—and if we are stupid enough to be here in the summer, then we too should have a summer code.

On the basis of your impetuous and ill-considered ruling, I may come into the House tomorrow in Bermuda shorts and a bikini shirt and reverse the outfit the next day.

Quite frankly, as a Back Bencher, I am not too worried about the recognition from the Chair—that is the perpetual state of all Back Benchers, for I truly am concerned about the health of the Members during the summer.

Yours in the Twentieth Century and no bib and tucker for the eons before.

Yours sincerely,
Pat Nowlan

PS: I know I am being presumptuous, and you of all people know the reason for the tie, for the men of the old world—chasing women with one hand and eating bones of lamb with the other and sometimes slurped gravy on their waistcoats—those days are gone. There is no more dripping gravy, women are free and so should we—be."

I ask for this matter to be referred to the Management and Members' Services Committee.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I know that Hon. Members would want me to thank the Hon. Member from Annapolis Valley—Hants (Mr. Nowlan) for his impetuous and interesting intervention.

Of course, I responded immediately to the communications which the Hon. Member sent to your chairman and left a verbal message. It was an extremely polite message, but it was a direct one. I said, of course, that I would be very pleased to hear the Hon. Member today if he was properly attired according to the customs and traditions of this place.

I must say that the question the Hon. Member raises puts the Speaker in a harrowing position. It is extraordinarily difficult for anyone who is a Member of this place and a colleague of all the others to place greater distinction or prominence on one person's dress as opposed to another. That is why I think perhaps it has always been so easy to ignore dress, whether elegant or something less, provided that there was a tie around the neck.

I am not suggesting that this is the only test. If there was only a tie, there might be some other problem. However, I am always in the hands of Hon. Members as I am your very humble servant, and if it should happen that a committee would wish to give some guidance to the Chair, I would be guided by it and accept it most willingly.

I want the Hon. Member for Annapolis Valley—Hants to know that I knew full well that he had a contribution to make to this important matter yesterday and that given its importance the Hon. Member would at least conform with present standards and approaches and make the intervention that he did as I said, in such an impetuous and interesting way today. I have, out of friendship and a long comradeship that I have enjoyed with the Hon. Member from Annapolis Valley—Hants, put aside and ignored perhaps some of his other remarks, recognizing that all Hon. Members use humour and sometimes shock value to bring attention to the burning issues that they bring to us from all across this land.

The Hon. Member for York South—Weston (Mr. Nunziata) on a point of order.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a non-impetuous submission on the same subject. With the greatest of respect for the Hon. Member for Annapolis Valley—Hants (Mr. Nowlan), the issue is not whether there should be a summer dress code or a winter dress code. I would ask you, Sir, to review the dress code in the House of Commons in view of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Under the Charter one is not permitted to discriminate based on sex. In the House of Commons, our female colleagues are not required to wear ties. Whereas it may be a custom and a tradition here in the House of Commons that men are required to wear ties, I would submit, Sir, that you as the Speaker of the House of Commons and the House of Commons itself should adhere to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and lead by example.

In other words, males should be entitled to the same privileges as female Members in the House. The issue is not whether a male should or would or would not wear a tie. The issue is whether we are required to wear ties. Sir, I would ask you to review your policy and the policy of the House of Commons on that requirement. It is in breach of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms to require a male to wear a tie.

Rather than referring the issue to a committee, I would ask, Sir, that you honour the letter and the spirit of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and allow men the same freedom and rights that you allow women in the House of Commons.

Ms. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, I must say on the same subject that I concur with the statements of the previous Member. I look forward to the day when indeed the Speaker has the privilege of perhaps wearing the kilt in the House. Perhaps even more important is the dress code for pages and clerks who wear very heavy woollen winter clothing because of tradition. I would ask that they have a summer attire of some description.

Mr. Speaker: Before I recognize the Hon. Member for Windsor West, (Mr. Gray) I should respond to the Hon. Member for York South—Weston (Mr. Nunziata) and the Hon. Member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell). Your Speaker has listened very carefully to the important intervention that has been made. I am not sure that it is my place to consider the dress code against the Charter of Rights, but perhaps there is another place where that can be done. Both Hon. Members will note that I confined my remarks strictly to the dress of male Hon. Members. Not even the Speaker would have the nerve to get into the question of dress for Hon. Members who are ladies.

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, this being Thursday, I want to ask the Government House Leader for a statement of business which the Government intends to call over the next several days.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, we will be continuing today with Bill C-144 and hopefully we will conclude that by this evening, and it will be followed by Bill C-130.

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Mazankowski) exactly what are the Government's intentions with respect to Bill C-273, the Bill on political rights. Prior to the brief recess that Parliament took, the Government House Leader and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister made very clear that the Government had no intention to interfere in any way with the private Members' procedure. As a consequence they were not prepared to co-operate with Members from all three Parties, including the Hon. Member for Ottawa West (Mr. Daubney) who proposed the Bill, to accelerate the consideration of Bill C-273, the Bill on political rights.

I have before me the letter which the Government House Leader has sent to my Leader today. It requests support for or co-operation with a series of killer amendments which were put forward by government back-benchers, clearly at the behest of the Government. I understand they were prepared by senior officials of the Government, the Privy Council Office, the Treasury Board, and elsewhere.

• (1520)

Three weeks ago the Government was saying that it would not interfere with Private Members' Business in any way. Now the Deputy Prime Minister is involving himself in it directly. His officials are involved in it. He has had a couple of backbenchers put forward a series of amendments which he knows very well repudiate the commitment made by the Conservatives in 1984 to grant political rights to the vast bulk of people working for the Government of Canada. This also frustrates the private Members' procedure which had led to the unanimous reporting of the Bill from the legislative committee, with support from Members of all three sides and particularly from Members from areas where the Public Service is represented. These Members felt that we had come up with a good Bill, but the Government has now decided to meddle in it.

What is happening? Could the Deputy Prime Minister explain what the devil is going on? He should know that the amendments he has had proposed on behalf of the Government are completely unacceptable to those of us who have been trying to get a reasonable balance between the need for very senior people in government to be politically neutral and the need to give political rights to the vast bulk of people working for the Government, and that was the promise of the Conservatives before they took power back in 1984.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that the Hon. Member is taking such a strident attitude and referring to these as killer amendments and interference. The fact is that there is an NDP caucus and there is a government caucus. This issue was debated in our caucus, and some concerns were raised about it. The amendments that are being proposed are being proposed as a caucus initiative by private Members. I do not know why the Hon. Member would want to take offence with that.

The fact is that we are trying to achieve what the Hon. Member suggests he wants to achieve, except he wants to play politics with the issue. All we are trying to do is strike a reasonable balance, a balance that would maintain the impartiality of public servants while at the same time give public servants political rights. There is a gross over-exaggeration in the Hon. Member's interpretation of the amendments, and I regret that very much.

I think we all recognize that we have been served very well by a Public Service that is impartial. There are concerns in all corners of the House and indeed throughout the country about the need to maintain that kind of impartiality. It was in that spirit that members of caucus on this side of the House have debated the matter somewhat thoroughly and—

Mr. Cassidy: That's not true.

Mr. Mazankowski: The Hon. Member says that that is not right. I do not normally talk about what goes on in our caucus. I certainly do not hear the NDP Members talk about what goes on in their caucus nor do I care.

This in fact is the case, and if it is the case, I would ask the Hon. Member to withdraw his charge that this is government interference. This is a party matter. Certainly Members on this side of the House have the right and indeed the obligation to put forth their views, especially on a Private Member's Bill. I take exception to the Hon. Member.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I would like to—

Mr. Cassidy: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Deputy Prime Minister could stay in the House. On a point of order, the Deputy Prime Minister should stay in the House for this matter. He shouldn't fly away on this issue. What a cop-out.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cassidy: You will not be here next time, Mailly, not after that performance.

Mrs. Mailly: Do not hold your breath.

Mr. Cassidy: You will not be here. How are you going to vote on these amendments?

Mrs. Mailly: I won by 9,000, you won by 64.

Mr. Cassidy: Why are you not getting your Deputy Prime Minister to come back into the House? Why do you not get him here to face the music? Where is he? Go and get him now; show you care about your constituents.

Mrs. Mailly: Show respect for the Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier has the floor.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I—

Mr. Cassidy: Show that you care about your constituents. Do not just sit there like a lump on a log.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): We have had the opportunity to listen to the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre. He has received a reply from the Hon. Deputy Prime Minister. I would now like to hear the Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier.

Mr. Cassidy: I find this totally preposterous, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I would like to address the same question. I am sorry to see that the the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Mazankowski) had to leave. Nevertheless—

Mr. Cassidy: He chose to leave.

Mr. Gauthier: In the spirit of the new rules that apply to this House, the rules we call parliamentary reform, there is indeed a Private Members' Hour tonight at five o'clock, at which time private Members' initiatives are taken up and studied. Tonight, we are taking up Bill C-273 which proposes to extend certain political rights to public servants. I agree with that Bill. I was a member of the committee that studied it and I know that the Bill submitted to the House at report stage, amended by serious consideration of all members of all Parties and in consultation with experts in the field, represented the viewpoint which I supported and endorsed.

At the time I was sorry that the Government did not take the initiative to make the Bill a government order so that we could indeed have sufficient time for all Hon. Members to ensure that the Bill was properly discussed. That was not done. I now find the House in a situation which is very difficult.

There are 25 amendments to this Bill and we have one hour to discuss them. It will be physically impossible. I do not criticize the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Cassidy) for getting quite upset. It is impossible for the House to deal with these amendments by the Government, on the order of the Government, and by government members acting in concert with the government initiative. I therefore take great exception to this whole process.

I would hope that the Hon. Member for Ottawa West (Mr. Daubney) would withdraw his Bill. That is the only decent thing that can be done because the Bill has been absolutely torn up by the Government. As the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre said, killer amendments will not help this Bill in any way.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would hope that the House Leaders would be able to discuss this matter without discussing it now on the floor of the House of Commons because we have Orders of the Day to consider. The House Leaders could discuss the matter and then return to the Chamber and make the agreement. I do not think that this is the time to continue raising these points of order.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader arising out of the Government House Leader's statement.

I would like to know what are the Government's intentions if by ten o'clock this evening or at ten o'clock this evening, Bill C-144, the child care Bill, has not yet reached the point of second reading. Will the Government call Bill C-144 tomorrow, or will it instead proceed to Bill C-130, the Bill to implement the trade deal?

Mr. Richard Grisé (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, as the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Mazankowski) said a few minutes ago, we will now proceed with Bill C-144 and, if we find agreement in this House to conclude the second reading stage tonight, then—

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): In one day?

Mr. Grisé: If we conclude second reading tonight, as the Deputy Prime Minister said, we will deal with Bill C-144 followed by Bill C-130. I think it is very clear that the Deputy Prime Minister said that we will deal with Bill C-144 followed by Bill C-130.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, on the same point, I am just seeking clarification. I appreciate what the Parliamentary Secretary has informed us, but the question is: if Bill C-144 is not completed at second reading stage before 10 o'clock tonight, what will be the business of the day tomorrow?

Mr. Grisé: Mr. Speaker, once again, the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap (Mr. Riis) is putting a hypothetical question. He is asking what will happen if Bill C-144 has not concluded second reading stage tonight. That will depend upon how many speakers rise and how Members of the House will react to that. We will act accordingly.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, this is totally preposterous. I would like to ask a question of the Parliamentary Secretary in simple, clear language. There are 50 amendments dealing with Bill C-130 before the House. We have until six o'clock tonight to table further amendments if members of the Opposition, or government members for that matter, so choose. It will be impossible for us to organize the day tomorrow if the Parliamentary Secretary does not come clean with us. For tomorrow, August 12, at ten o'clock, what does the Government intend to call as the order of business in the House of Commons? Will it be Bill C-144 or Bill C-130?

[Translation]

Mr. Grisé: Mr. Speaker, I will repeat it in French, although I thought I made myself pretty clear. The Deputy Prime Minister said in the House a few moments ago, in his reply to the Liberal House Leader, that today we were considering Bill C-144, and that if we managed to finish second reading this evening, we would then proceed with Bill C-130. I have now said the same thing three times over, and this is the same information the Deputy Prime Minister gave the House a few moments ago.

• (1530)

[English]

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Parliamentary Secretary is playing a game with us. That might indicate to people following these debates why the Government has difficulty getting its business through the House. At the end of the day there are two possibilities. We might be continuing on Bill C-144, not having concluded second reading, or we might have concluded second reading. The difference is very important for this House.

We in our Party, like the NDP, have Members who want to participate in tomorrow's business if it is Bill C-144, and different Members if it is Bill C-130. The purpose of the Thursday question is to settle for the advantage of all Members what the score is, where we will be, who ought to be prepared to speak, and what the government order of business will be. Nothing can be clearer than the position which the Parliamentary Secretary put to us if we conclude second reading of Bill C-144 tonight. He has given a very clear answer to that. However, what if we do not? That is a possibility for which we want to be prepared.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Deputy Prime Minister is in the House and he can answer that.

Mr. Kaplan: We can have an orderly day in the House tomorrow—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Chair is naturally the servant of the House, but I would hope that on a Thursday this type of discussion would take place with House Leaders in House Leaders negotiations.

Mr. Gauthier: They do not. They are playing games.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Deputy Prime Minister is here, and I am sure he will be able to clear it up.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I regret the confusion. I just walked into my office and watched the exchange going on. I can only assume from the comments made that it is the intention of the Opposition to filibuster Bill C-144, the child care Bill. That being the case we will call Bill C-130 tomorrow.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Does the Hon. Member for Kamloops-Shuswap have any further remarks?

Mr. Riis: For clarification, Mr. Speaker, I believe we have heard that if the debate on Bill C-144 is not completed at second reading stage tonight then we will definitely be going to Bill C-130 tomorrow. All we were seeking was clarification so that we can plan. I take some offence at a lot of government Members yelling that we have to wait until tomorrow. We try to operate this place as effectively and efficiently as possible and to do that—

Mr. Turner (Ottawa—Carleton): Oh, yes, of course! What did you do yesterday, you turkey?

Mr. Riis: —we have to have some indication of what is coming up.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Orders of the Day. A point of order?

Mr. Cassidy: Mr. Speaker, I have a question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The NDP House Leader has straightened that out. I will listen to the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre.

Mr. Cassidy: Mr. Speaker, I wanted to put this on the record. The Deputy Prime Minister suggested that the amendments put forward to Bill C-273 were what he called a caucus initiative, indicating that that was somehow different from a government initiative. I was trying to point out that on several occasions the Hon. Member for Ottawa West has raised this issue with his caucus, and while I was not present, I understand his colleagues were quite happy to see that Bill go forward. What has changed—

Some Hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Cassidy: —is that the Government has decided to intervene. The letter to my Leader, if I can continue—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When Bill C-273 comes up for debate I hope the Hon. Member will bring that to my attention.

Mr. Cassidy: This is a matter of government business.

Some Hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Cassidy: Without being announced as such, particularly when the Deputy Prime Minister writes to my Leader about it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CANADA CHILD CARE ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Epp (Provencher) that Bill C-144, an Act to authorize payments by Canada toward the provision of child care services, and to amend the Canada Assistance Plan in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I recognize the Hon. Minister, earlier today during the course of debate on second reading of Bill C-144, the Hon. Member for Outremont proposed to move the following reasoned amendment on which the Chair reserved:

> That the motion be amended by deleting all of the words after the word "That" and by substituting the following:
> "This House objects to the principle of Bill C-144, an Act to authorize payments by Canada toward the provision of child care services, and to amend the Canada Assistance Plan in consequence thereof, which is to establish a program that does not provide access and services in all provinces and equal access to low and middle income families."

After consideration, the Chair finds a major procedural difficulty with the wording of the proposed amendment. As stated in Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, Citation 744(1), a reasoned amendment "must be declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy or provisions of the Bill". In her amendment the Hon. Member simply indicates her objection to the principle of the Bill and, as indicated in Beauchesne's Citation 745(4), "an amendment which amounts to no more than a direct negation of the principle of the Bill is open to objection".

I must therefore rule the amendment out of order as it does not constitute a reasoned amendment and as it amounts, in its form, to an expanded negative.

May I point out to the Hon. Member and the House that the results sought by the amendment can be achieved by simply voting against the principle of the Bill, that is, by voting against the second reading motion. Furthermore, the Chair would like to remind the House that the text of a reasoned amendment should include words indicating that the House does not wish to give a Bill second reading. For that purpose, I refer Hon. Members to page 531 of Erskine May's Twentieth Edition.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism) and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to address Bill C-144, the Canada Child Care Act. As my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp), indicated, this Bill provides for implementation of the most important component of the national strategy on child care. It responds to the child care needs of Canadians with an innovative, flexible policy that is both generous and equitable. It represents a major move forward for children, parents, and families throughout the country.

Child care is probably one of the most pressing social issues facing legislators today. This Bill reflects this Government's strong commitment to improve the quality and quantity of care in all regions of the country. The Government will spend $6.4 billion on child care over the next seven years, and another $1 billion annually after that. This is a significant response to the realities of our society today and lays the foundation for an improved quality of life for the Canadian family in the future.

As Minister of State for Indian Affairs and Northern Development, I am especially pleased that the national strategy on child care has been expanded to recognize the special needs and concerns of Indian people. Indians must be full and productive participants in society if Canada is to go into the 21st century a more mature and stronger nation. Today a wide range of federal programs and services is provided to Indians. For example, CMHC has a rural and native housing program, DRIE's native economic development program, and CEIC's native internship program.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, Indians must also have access to child care, child care that is both flexible and affordable, so that they can concentrate on their jobs and improve their quality of life. As Hon. Members are aware, despite progress made in recent years, economic conditions in Indian communities lag behind the national average. This means that the ability of an Indian family to find good child care for its children while one or both parents work can be essential to that family's well being.

I am very glad to say that as a result of this Government's initiative, some 2,000 child care spaces for Indian children will be created over six years, that is, for children living on reserves.

However, creating child care spaces according to the provincial model will not resolve a specifically Indian problem. Like all Canadians, Indians are very concerned about their children's well being, and anyone who visits Indian families living on reserves will see how important children are to those families. Child care must therefore meet safety and other standards while also respecting the social and cultural traditions of the group in question, in this case the Indians.

Mr. Speaker, Indian child care in Canada is underdeveloped. Most provincial governments have been reluctant to extend their programs to Indian reserves since they are, admittedly, a federal responsibility.

Only the Province of Ontario finances Indian child care through a contribution agreement with the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. On some reserves, bands have set up their own daycare, but such cases are few and far between.

[English]

The Government of Canada has a special relationship with Indian people living on reserves. It was in recognition of this relationship that Health and Welfare Canada, in consultation with the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, developed the special Indian component of the national strategy on child care. This component provides for an expenditure of $60 million over six years to develop and stimulate the growth of accredited child care services on reserves. This is the first time in Canada's history that such funds have been made available specifically to serve the needs of Indian children.

Although the administrative details of this initiative are yet to be worked out, the funding schedule has been set and some basic goals and principles have been established for the program. Beginning April 1, 1989, the Government of Canada will invest $5 million in each of the first two years of the program, $10 million in each of the third and fourth years, and $15 million in each of the final two years of the program. The funds will be administered by Health and Welfare Canada with assistance from Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

This money will be used to fund a number of significant pilot projects designed to determine exactly what is needed in terms of Indian child care and how to deliver that. It is anticipated that the program will create about 2,000 child care spaces over six years. Equally as important, it will help us establish how the Indian child care system should work.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, obviously Indians will be fully consulted on the implementation of this program in their communities, as will the provinces. Since this Government came to power, we have always taken this approach, and we intend to start consultations in the very near future.

Mr. Speaker, we have reason to expect that the program will develop in such a way that Indians will be able to exercise direct control over a child care system that is also in line with our approach to the provision of services to Indians.

Our primary objective will be to create services, with and for Indians, which respect Indians values, traditions and culture. Indian child care should not merely reflect the kind of system established by the provinces. It will be thoroughly Indian, while meeting current standards for health, safety, child-staff ratios, staff accreditation and licensing.

[English]

I want to emphasize that Indians will continue to have access to the $100 million child care initiative fund, another important element of the Government's national strategy on child care. Among other things, the child care initiative fund supports applied research and demonstration projects which address the needs of certain groups in society. Indians have been designated as one of the target groups for this research and plans are already under way for a major study of child care on Indian reserves.

The fund will help child care training institutions develop course materials which are sensitive to Indian culture and Indians will be encouraged to participate in this special training.

The national strategy on child care is more wide ranging and flexible than any such program ever offered by a federal Government. Today's generation of Indian children must become full and productive partners in the Canada of tomorrow. I am sure that Hon. Members of this House can contribute meaningfully to that future by giving this legislation unqualified support and speedy passage.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, for us in the Official Opposition the idea of child care is obviously important. It is an idea whose time has certainly come. How can the Minister possibly consider that his Government has responded to the promise it made in the last election campaign with this program which was not introduced in the four years of its normal mandate and will only create 200,000 additional day care spaces in the coming four-year period when the need, which is recognized by the Government I believe, is for one million additional child care spaces? With the good times which Canada has known in the last four years and the problem which the Government has recognized, how can it say that 200,000 additional spaces to be created over the next four years is an adequate response?

Mr. Valcourt: Mr. Speaker, I am not surprised by the statement made by the spokesman for the Liberal Party. Canadians must find that strange. Kids were not born in this country on September 4, 1984, for the first time. We have had children in Canada for a long, long time. As far as I can recollect no Liberal Government ever even attempted to create such a program as we have for the parents of Canada.

We know where the Liberal Party stands on many issues. On the issue of child care it says that this is not enough. Of course anyone can make that argument. The issue today is whether this Bill provides a good program for Canadian parents and their children.

Liberals and socialists do not consult. They tell people what they need. Our Government has listened to the people. A task force has studied this and spoken to people. There are, of course, certain vocal groups who say that this is not enough. They would rather spend $14 billion and tell Canadians that that is what they will receive. That is not the Conservative way. The Conservative Government respects people and respects what they want.

• (1550)

People want a choice and that is what this Bill does. Canadians will not be forced into anything specific for which they do not have a choice. That is what this program is all about.

Our Government wants to implement this Bill. It is on our agenda. Yesterday, the Hon. Member's leader was in the House telling Canadians and the Prime Minister that we should call an election. We have not even had four years in government. Today they complain that we have not yet adopted child care.

If the Liberals were in government we would not even be discussing child care for Canadians because they would be on vacation or campaigning for an election. I find it very strange that he accuses us of bringing in this measure in the fourth year of our mandate. We have accomplished many things in those four years. We could have done it the Liberal way and ran measures down the throats of Canadians. Instead, we have consulted with Canadians. We have used an approach in which we are sure that Canadians support us.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, thank you for giving me an opportunity to come back to the thin soup served by the Minister in answer to that question.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), three times during Question Period, was content to put forward what he considered to be comparisons between his Government and the former Government. The Minister has done the same thing. I do not think they should hope to be able to continue living in the past. That will not be good enough for Canadians, to hear them criticizing the former Government as a way of seeking applause for their Government's record.

The times have changed and the Official Opposition has changed. An example is the policies we have developed on South Africa in light of events over the last few years. It is ridiculous for the Government to continue living in the past and acting as if Canadians will be satisfied to have comparisons between this terrible Government and the former Government.

There was no answer to my question. Does he really believe the Government has fulfilled its campaign promise by providing in the fourth year of its mandate a program that will only deliver 200,000 additional child care spaces spread out over the next four years when the need today is for a million spaces?

Mr. Valcourt: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member talks about living in the past. He wants Canadians to believe that the Liberal Party is living in the present and the future. Canadians will see for themselves.

I am a Member from the Province of New Brunswick and I remember the past with the Liberal Government almost bankrupting the country. Today we hear that 200,000 spaces is not enough. It means that we would need more money to put into this program. It could require some $10 billion or $14 billion, but the Liberals do not care about the future. They did not mind almost bankrupting the country. We had terrible unemployment rates across Canada. They had a deficit of $38 billion. The Hon. Member believes that Canadians will trust the Liberal Party with the finances of Canada.

The Hon. Member asks whether this measure fulfills our promise to Canadians. Yes, it does.

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Speaker, under the current day care policy we would have produced more day care spaces in six years than this proposal before us will produce in seven years. Will the Minister tell us why the House and Canadians should approve such a retrogressive step? Why should we be pleased with this legislation that will produce less day care spaces than the existing program?

Mr. Valcourt: Mr. Speaker, they would impose on Canadians something they do not want. Socialists do not care what people think; they have all the answers. They have the corner on principles, on virtue, and on truth. We know what they are suggesting with their universal system. It would be to ram through a system on Canadians, without giving them a choice. Canadians have told us otherwise, and we have answered accordingly.

[Translation]

Mrs. Pépin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell the Fisheries Minister that he is spouting fine words, instead of answering and stating the facts correctly. I would like to tell him that twenty years ago, it was difficult to set up day care centres because women had four children on average and worked at home. In the last twenty years, the model of the traditional family has changed.

When the need became apparent, studies were done by Rosie Abella and Katie Cook, but the Conservative Government, when it took power, shelved them and set up another committee, which I was on. However, the Conservative Government has not even answered some of the recommendations made in the report of this all-party committee.

So he says, "What do Canadians want?" Well, I am telling you: they want accessibility for all children from low- and middle-income families and they want quality services.

I would like the Minister to tell us what his Government will do with the new Bill to provide access for all children from low- and middle-income families, when this is not mentioned at all and no priority is given to this kind of family. So what will his Government do for these families in 1988?

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Minister's time has expired, but I will allow him to answer the question.

[Translation]

Mr. Valcourt: I will be brief, Mr. Speaker. The Hon. Member asks me what the Government has done for families in 1988. It introduced Bill C-144 and contributed more than $6 billion for a child care system to be set up in cooperation with the provincial governments throughout Canada. That is what the Government . . .

Look, Mr. Speaker, I understand that the Liberal Party is sorry that it cannot claim authorship for this major social program, but that is what Canadians decided in 1984 when they gave us a mandate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are concluded. Debate. The Hon. Member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan).

[English]

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I enjoyed being able to participate briefly in the question and comment session with the Hon. Minister about this child care program. When he was pressed on the question of whether he considered the program the Government is delivering today to be adequate fulfilment of the Government's promise to Canadians during the last election, he said "yes". This program will create 200,000 additional day care spaces in the Canadian stock of all day care spaces, including private and public, over a seven-year period.

During the last election campaign, Canadians, particularly the millions of women in the Canadian population, were promised an adequate, comprehensive day care program.

• (1600)

In my riding alone, the day care shortfall today is 20,000 spaces. That means that one-tenth of this magnificent program delivered by the Government to the millions of women to whom it promised adequate child care is needed in one small corner of Metropolitan Toronto. This is not an adequate program.

It is very significant that the program is being delivered today. It is very significant that at the beginning of this debate the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) of Canada stood outside in the hall telling the media that the Government had fulfilled its promise to the women of Canada in delivering this child care program. I think the Government saying that our determination to debate this Bill until the end of today constituted a filibuster is also significant. Why is it a filibuster? This is the first day the subject has been debated in this House of Commons. It is a one-day debate about a $6 billion program that the Government claims delivers on one of its major promises. We have been brought back in the middle of the summer with an election call, we hope, coming very soon. This Bill has been put on the menu and we are told we have to finish the debate on second reading by the end of the day or we will be accused of filibustering.

Ms. Mitchell: Filibustering after two hours.

Mr. Kaplan: We will be accused of filibustering after only two hours as my friend from Vancouver observes. I think that is easy to understand. The Government does not want this matter to be fully debated. It does not want the Canadian people to see what I call the thin suit of its day care program in the light of parliamentary debate and examination. The Government wants a one-liner. It wants to be able to say it delivered on a promise to establish a comprehensive day care program in Canada, and the less said about it, the better, because when we look at this program we find it is a pathetic farce and fraud. It is a particular fraud on the women of Canada. They are the ones for whom this program is the most meaningful.

Members opposite like to blame all their shortcomings on the former Government. I was a Minister in the former government and I was proud of it. However, we were not a government that was in a position to deliver the programs required by this country for all time. The need for day care is something that snuck up on the people of Canada and on successive governments. We were not as sensitive as we should have been in the past, and I mean all of us, to the situation of women. We did not recognize until very recently that what we thought was the typical family was very far from the typical family. A typical family, we thought, was one where one of the spouses, the wife, in most cases, was at home looking after the children. If she was not, she was out working to provide fulfilling activity for herself, to enrich her life and to provide some extra spending money to supplement the earnings of the main bread-winner, the husband. But anyone who thinks that is the typical family today has a lot to learn and one can learn it in my riding and in any other riding in our country.

The fact is that there are very few families where there is a spouse living at home and keeping the home fires going as the main occupation. Women are working and in a lot of cases they are the only wage earner in the family. They are the bread-winner. They are working to support their families and we are tying a hand behind their backs by not having an adequate day care program.

Until medicare was established, we caused suffering in Canada by not having such a program. Medicare is now a program equally meaningful to men and women. Day care is not. I think we should be blunt about recognizing that part of the reason for the delay in bringing in day care was the fact that this place was mainly peopled by men with the perspective that did not recognize the actual facts of family life and the terrible burden carried by women in our society. I see this, if not during the rest of the year, in election campaigns, when I make a point of being at bus-stops and subway stations at six-thirty in the morning when people in my riding are going to work on a typical day. I see the women, not the men, leading young children to whatever kind of day care arrangements they have been able to make so they can go out and make a living in order to keep their families going.

The Minister has the nerve to say that Canada cannot afford a better day care program than a measly 200,000 additional spaces to be created over the next five years. That man should be ashamed of himself when he makes such a statement like that about the economic and social needs of our society and about the simple question of social justice in the field of day care. To wait until a hot summer day, probably hours before an election will be called, to try to twist our arms so that we do not have time to tell the Canadian people the truth about this fraudulent effort to validate a campaign promise is too much. I do not think we should let the Bill go through today even though it is an important measure and even though I would rather have 200,000 additional day care spaces than none.

We cannot let this Bill go through without letting the Canadian people hear what is wrong with it. In the last election campaign, three big beautiful promises were made to the Canadian people about day care by each of the national Parties. The Liberals made their promise as well as the New Democratic Party and the Conservatives. Each was different. I was interested in the subject, and I am glad to be able to speak today, because it is the most important issue in my riding, in my opinion.

The issue of day care can bring out on a day's notice a large crowd of people, mainly women, with babies in their arms, with problems they are looking at the legislators of this country to solve. We have seen this in the front pages of the newspapers in Toronto over the last few days as a municipal government tries to cope with the delivery of a social service without adequate help, without comprehensive help, from the federal Government. Yet the municipal government, which mainly draws its revenue from property taxes is continuing to provide the level of service it did in the past, although a low level, at great difficulty to its own tax base.

I am not saying it is easy to finance a day care program for Canada, but it is important. It is essential and the sensible economic development of our country requires that we do it.

The promises of each of the political Parties were different and only one of those Parties won the last election. The Conservatives won with 211 Members of Parliament. That promise was what meant the most in my riding. I think people were expecting that when the Conservatives were elected they would deliver a universal, comprehensive day care program that would solve the problem the way the old age pension has solved the problem of our senior citizens being the poorest Canadians in our society—they were before but they are no longer—and the way in which medicare solved the problem of poor people and people in poor regions not being able to afford proper medical care. Medicare solved that problem. People expected that a strong Conservative Government with a sacred trust to keep would have delivered that program.

• (1610)

Our program, which I hope I will have time to talk about in a moment, was not brought forward because we were not the government. The NDP program, which I do not agree with, but which would have done a lot more than the program delivered by the Government, is on the shelf because the NDP did not form the Government either. The Government frittered away its majority and its claim on five years or four years of control of the House to deliver a comprehensive day care program. In the dying hours of Parliament we have a pathetic attempt by the Government to make the women and the people of the country think that it is fulfilling a campaign promise that we expected would be fulfilled five years since.

[Translation]

I wish to pay tribute to my colleague, the Hon. Member for Outremont (Mrs. Pépin), our child care critic who has worked very hard for the past four years, on all the reviews requested by the Government, all the committees that drafted their reports and were directed by the Government to proceed with a review of the work they had already done. The Hon. Member finally produced a report which we in the Official Opposition have adopted as our own.

[English]

I am proud to have circulated the Official Opposition's proposals on child care. They are comprehensive and they cost a lot more than the ones before us today, but they will work and give us a day care program; not the type of program that the NDP have talked about which is delivered in state-owned institutions to children across the country, and not a program which forces the closure of day care programs run by women in their homes in my riding. As far as we are concerned, for profit types of day care centres are perfectly acceptable. In the Liberal Party we have no objection ideologically to entrepreneurs who believe that they can deliver a good day care program and make money at it. In our view there is absolutely nothing objectionable to that. In fact, we propose to stimulate their activities by providing government funds to them under circumstances that I have described.

Ms. Mitchell: Misuse of tax dollars.

Mr. Kaplan: The NDP consider that a misuse of funds. I hope that we will be talking about that in the next election campaign. Certainly day care will still be an issue in the next election campaign. Perhaps the Conservatives will have nothing more to say about it except to claim that they did what they promised. In my riding, in Toronto, and in places where people have turned their backs on the Conservatives, they will be wanting to know what type of real, serious, effective day care programs will be introduced after the next election when hopefully a Party other than that presently on your right, Mr. Speaker, will have the opportunity to keep some of its promises on the subject of day care.

I have talked about the inadequacy of the day care program delivered by the Government. One other fundamental difficulty with that program is that it does not establish national standards. The Government revels in the concept of consultation and how wonderful it is to consult with the provinces and to consult with the groups in society that are interested in an issue. That is motherhood, and it is easy to agree with. Even the former Government recognized that consultation was desirable. It is not a contradiction of the concept of consultation to also advance the concept of leadership.

Canadians expect the Government to provide leadership, and expect Parliament to provide leadership. They particularly expect it when we are talking about money being spent through the Government that has been raised from the Canadian people. We have taken their money through taxes and we have established a priority. The basic principle of democratic accountability requires us to provide some leadership in the area in which we are turning over that money to be spent, whether by provincial governments, day care agencies, or whatever it is. We must establish some standards. After all, we are using the money received from the voters. We have to be accountable for some type of standard.

This Government does not understand or agree with that fundamental principle. It feels it is enough to say how it feels and then to write cheques across the country and let those who get the money deliver the program or a substitute for the program at whatever level they consider proper. I do not think that Canadians want that type of federal government. In a country with such a diversity as ours in economic standards the Canadian people want Parliament to set objectives or to set standards for the child care program. We want to support a national level in as many areas of Canadian life as possible, and certainly in those areas where we are turning over federal taxpayers' money to keep programs going.

I deplore the feature of this day care program which does not establish any standards. It says to the provinces: "It's your jurisdiction. You may establish programs. Here is some money, we hope that you will spend it wisely". We ought to do better than that, and Canadians expect us to do better than that. Failure to show leadership in this area and in many other areas is a reason why Canadians are turning their backs on the Conservatives and why their standing is as low as it is with the Canadian people.

I want to share with people in the House the dilemma that one has on how to vote on second reading of a measure as bad as this. We support child care. We want to see federal tax dollars and federal standards and objectives established in this area of child care. The Government has brought forward a measure which we feel is a political fraud because it does not deliver an effective universal child care program. Yet the Government will characterize it as such. Therefore, it is a dilemma. We want to indicate to the Canadian people that we support child care. We want to see this $6.4 billion spent in the area of child care. With our recent amendment put forward by the Hon. Member for Outremont (Mrs. Pépin), which was not found to be in order, we wanted to demonstrate that this program is terribly lacking. I hope that in the speeches that will be delivered by members of the Official Opposition we will be able to indicate that we want the $6.4 billion to be spent over the next seven years. We want more to be spent. We do not approve of a program that is so woefully inadequate and so fraudulent in political terms.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments. the Hon. Member for Vancouver East (Ms. Mitchell).

Ms. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, I have a number of questions. I obviously do not have enough time for them, but I would like to, first of all, clarify a couple of points that the Member made. I must say that I am surprised to see this Member, whom I have a great deal of respect for, repeating some of the misinformation that the Minister himself is promoting regarding the NDP policy. First of all, does he not realize that non-profit day care, which is what we advocate, is not the same as government institutions? There could be public day care as well. We have no objection to that. I wish that he would check into that and clarify that non-profit societies are quite a different thing than government institutions. We are saying that we believe that federal money should go to child care that is not for profit. On the other hand, we are not opposed to commercial day care, providing it is self-sustaining. If parents want to use it and pay fees for it, fine. We are not saying that it should not be commercial. We are saying that it should not be supported by tax dollars. I wish he would be more clear about that.

We are also very much in favour of in-home day care. We want women in the home or people in the home to be licensed as family day care homes, so that they will have decent pay in order to have the chance for all the resources and support that they need. They will have money to get fences and everything will be prepared the way it should be. There would be good quality family day care homes, not just baby-sitting with kids plunked in front of a TV set. If parents still want to use casual informal care, that is their right. We should not be paying federal money. I wanted to clarify those points first.

I will now get to my question. The former Minister, who is well informed on matters of justice, mentioned the question of national objectives. I do not agree with what he was saying and what the Liberals keep saying about national standards. It is not the role of the federal Government to establish standards in areas that are provincial jurisdiction. This was analysed over and over again in our committee, with considerable expertise on this.

In both medicare and health and welfare, the question of standards are a provincial jurisdiction, but certainly those standards should be based on principles. I would ask him to clarify a little bit more the significance of not having national objectives. Also, does he feel, as I do, that the Government seems to be trying to push this particular social program—the only new social program that we have had for many, many years—through before Meech Lake is applied, and has deliberately not put in "the national objectives", which would be required under the Meech Lake Accord?

There is no statement of principles on which provinces would be required to base their standards. There is also no enforcement mechanism as we have in medicare. I wonder if he would comment further on that and if he has any suggestions as to how this should be developed in a way that is closer to the medicare model.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the Hon. Member got up and stated the NDP policy in her own way, because she can certainly state it better than I can, and I accept her statement of her own policy. I am glad also that I can emphasize a very important difference that emerges between the NDP and the Liberals on this subject. That is, we do not think that for-profit operations are bad. We think that they may be entitled to receive support from the taxpayers if they are prepared to meet the standard of the programs—

Ms. Mitchell: You better read the studies.

Mr. Kaplan: The Member is indicating that the studies may show that there is something wrong with some of the profit day care centres, but that may be all the more reason why the federal Government ought to turn to them, or to turn to them through the provinces, and encourage them, with tax dollars, to do something. For the life of me, I do not accept as a principle—and I know that the NDP do—that when something is run for profit it is not going to be run as well as something that is non-profit.

Ms. Mitchell: Where does the profit come from?

Mr. Kaplan: I think that profit and the opportunity to make profit assures an efficient operation. Now, efficiency—

Ms. Mitchell: Read the studies. That is not true.

Mr. Kaplan: I did not interrupt the Hon. Member while she was speaking. Efficiency can be a very desirable component of any operation. There is nothing wrong with having an operation more efficient, providing that it is delivering the goods. If day care can be delivered efficiently by entrepreneurs and profit produced at the bottom line, I do not think that we should turn our backs on it. I think in fact it has a lot to commend it. That is the difference between the way that the Liberals look at things and the way that the NDP look at them.

The Hon. Member made a comment about standards. She does not feel—and I am shocked to hear it—that it is the place of the federal Government to set standards. Well, maybe the difference between us is semantic. I do not mean by standard precise definitions, ceiling heights of rooms where day care centres are to be established, or fire regulations or things like that. I recognize that these are matters which are very regionalized across our country. To try to specify construction materials and size and shape, and even hours, can be totally out of whack with local standards in a particular community.

But I insist that it should be the part of the federal Government, wanting to provide leadership, and hopefully a government does want to provide leadership, to set as much of a national standard as it can. We have done this to a degree in medicare, a degree that I think we can be quite proud of. We have not only made sure that high quality medicare is available right across our country, in poor parts of our country and in well-off parts of our country, but that it is accessible, wherever it is found, to poor people and to people who are well off. That is the kind of national standard or national objective that I would like to see.

Finally, the Hon. Member wanted me to comment on the Meech Lake idea about opting out, I suppose, of a shared-cost program. I hope that this would be a program where all the provinces would want to participate. The question of opting out and sharing costs and having different programs and getting compensation for them would not arise. That, after all, is a matter for the federal Government to negotiate. If the federal Government goes about it in a sensible way and has the support of the Canadian people, I do not see why provinces would want to opt out and to provide programs of their own that might be different and lead to the test of whether they meet national objectives or not.

In other words, I would like to see programs rather than references to the Supreme Court of Canada about the interpretation of Meech Lake.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Hon. Member whether, in his assessment of the situation in his own community, the excessive demand in the City of Toronto, for example, where they have more than 1,000 children on a waiting list, trying to get into available spaces, this program will in any way alleviate that incredible demand.

Mr. Kaplan: I am glad that the Hon. Member asked me about Toronto, because she is an expert not only in Toronto but in Hamilton as well. I did my own research on the subject and found that the demand in my riding of York Centre, unfilled, is for 20,000 additional day care spaces. That is just for one riding, one corner, of the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto. Those 20,000 spaces are needed now, not spread out over the next four years.

We have a program that delivers to our whole country 200,000 spaces, and over the next seven years you will see the total inadequacy of it. I do not think that the Government deserves our co-operation in rubber stamping this Bill by ten o'clock tonight so that they can go out to the country and claim that they fulfilled a promise.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate. The Hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Public Works (Mrs. Martin).

Mrs. Shirley Martin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to rise and to take part in this debate about something that is very close to me, having chaired the parliamentary committee on child care, along with the Hon. Member for Vancouver East (Ms. Mitchell) and the Hon. Member for Outremont (Mrs. Pépin), who have already spoken on this subject. As the Hon. Member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan) said, we cannot let this go through without the facts being heard, and without hearing what is wrong with the Bill. I think it is time that some of facts are put on the record to correct what has been said by Members opposite.

• (1630)

The Hon. Member for Vancouver East commented in her speech this morning that I was not present in the House to listen to what she had to say. I can assure her that I was listening to what she had to say through the medium of television which we happen to have in this place. I would like to correct some of the things that she said.

The Hon. Member mentioned that two million children under the age of 14 have parents who are working. She also said this included parents who work not only full time but 20 hours a week or are studying for 20 hours a week. Two million children under the age of 14 do not all need licensed day care spaces. Parents who work 20 hours a week may be working three or four hours a day. One spouse can be working while the other is at home looking after their child. People can also be working when their child is in school. Let us not mislead people by saying two million children under the age of 14 need licensed day care spaces.

Ms. Mitchell: I did not say that.

Mr. Keeper: Do not mislead the people.

Mrs. Martin: I am not misleading people. I am commenting on what was said this morning.

Mr. Orlikow: That is not what the Member for Vancouver East said.

Mrs. Martin: Perhaps when the "blues" come in we can check that—

Mr. Orlikow: You need new glasses.

Mrs. Martin: I am not using glasses—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order. The Hon. Member will have plenty of time to ask questions or make comments. I hope he will show some courtesy to the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary.

Mrs. Martin: Mr. Speaker, it is apparent the New Democrats do not like to hear the truth.

I would like to go on with something else that was mentioned. Only 11.5 per cent of these children can be assured of quality licensed care. I take a little bit of exception to that because the Member said that other children are in the care of relatives, neighbours, nannies, or baby-sitters and are in unreliable care. I do not believe the care of a grandmother, a neighbour or a nanny is necessarily unreliable care.

Ms. Mitchell: I did not say that either.

Mrs. Martin: I come from a single parent family. When I was seven years old my father died and I was raised by a single parent mother. Fortunately, I had a very loving mother who gave me good care. I know what it is like to be a child of a single parent. I also worked when my two children were born. I had to work throughout their upbringing and used care outside of the home as well as within the home. I was fortunate in that my husband shared that care with me. He looked after the children while I was at work and I looked after them when he was at work. I had the help of family and I also had to use outside care. It was licensed care and it was not non-profit care but it was care given by a very loving woman because she cared for children. Yes, she made a profit but that did not mean the care was any less. So I have been involved in some of what we are talking about today.

I really find it difficult when so much is being said that care cannot be good care unless it is non-profit licensed care. Care, and good care, comes from the people giving that care. It does not matter whether people are getting paid for it through a non-profit system or a profit system, they are doing it out of the love of caring for children. They are doing it as a neighbour for maybe minimal dollars. Nobody looks after children because they want an easy job. Nobody looks after children just to make money. You cannot look after children unless you really care about them. If you care about children you care about the quality of the care given to them.

The Hon. Member for Vancouver East went on to say that Tory Members on the child care committee favoured the traditional family. I do not make any apologies for saying that we favoured the traditional family. We recognize that we have traditional families still in this country. Traditional families also have needs as far as raising children are concerned and have to be included in any policy that we set.

Most single parents in this country are in that position by circumstance, not necessarily by choice. They need help in raising children. The legislation before us will continue to give them the help with the care they need. The legislation also recognizes that parents who are at home require help. It also recognizes that where two parents work and are paying for their child care they deserve some recognition for the dollars they pay out. This legislation recognizes the cost of child care and allows parents to make the choice of and how they will care for their children. It also recognizes that when those children are under school age that cost of care is more expensive. They should, therefore, have a higher tax allowance. We have done that.

The Member went on to say that the Tories on the committee said that quality was not needed. That is not true. We all agreed, unanimously, on the committee that quality was very important. Where we disagreed is how that quality could be delivered. I mentioned earlier that quality is delivered by caring people in the child care field whether or not it is for profit. The Hon. Member for Vancouver East and the Hon. Member for Outremont would have to agree that as we crossed this country and visited 31 cities in every province and the territories, in the small towns and large towns, we listened to what the people of Canada wanted as far as the care of their children was concerned. Quality was definitely one of the items they were looking for. Quality came in many different ways and certainly was not synonymous with non-profit licensed care.

The Member also mentioned that we took $2.3 billion away from services. We did not take $2.3 billion away from services. We took $2.3 billion and have directed it to parents to allow them to care for their children and meet their responsibilities in raising them. They can decide how they want to raise their children. While we directed to parents $2.3 billion through the tax system, we also invested some $4 billion to provide additional day care spaces. All I have heard so far in this debate is that we are limiting growth to 200,000 spaces. It needs to be said that we are directing subsidized funding to create 200,000 spaces that we will share with the provinces, spaces to help those who cannot pay for their own child care. That is only growth in the subsidized spaces, not in total child care spaces in this country. For those people who can afford child care and can pay for it out of their own pocket, that space is not one of the 200,000.

As the Hon. Member for York Centre (Mr. Kilgour) said, he sees nothing wrong with the profit side of the picture coming into child care. If the need is there, entrepreneurs will create the spaces for children and supply those spaces. We heard from some excellent people who had turned their homes into child care centres. Some had 10 or 12 children in them and some had as few as 5. They provided good care. The entrepreneurs are not large chain systems which do not care about children. Entrepreneurs are neighbours, friends and relatives who care about children and are willing to go into the market to provide spaces for children.

Then the Member mentioned that there was no provision for latchkey children. The Hon. Member knows better than that. There is nothing in the legislation that restricts the beginning or the continuance of after-school and pre-school programs. It is part of the over-all child care provisions in the provinces.

The Province of Quebec has a system in which the school boards themselves are involved. For other provinces provide the space is provided for child care within the school system but the programs are run by the parents, by non-profit organizations and in some cases by for-profit organizations.

The spaces are there to look after children pre and post-school and they will continue to grow. Under the $100 million initiative fund, which no one on the opposition side has bothered to mention, the total federal dollars that have gone into the care of children, can be used to improve methods for caring for so-called latchkey children. Again, the numbers are inflated in that in many cases, parents may work during school hours but are at home when their children come home from school. We are not dealing with the total number of figures that are being played with in this debate.

The Hon. Member for Vancouver East and the Hon. Member for Outremont would also agree that the committee listened to Canadians, not necessarily to people within the House but to Canadians from coast to coast, people who had a very definite interest in coming to the committee to tell us what they felt. Those people said that they do not want the school system to look after latchkey children, they want space within the school. They did not want a curriculum that continues on after three or three-thirty when the children get out of school. They said they wanted space within the schools so that they could run child care programs that meet the needs of the children when they are finished a day in school.

The last thing a child wants when the bell rings at three o'clock is to go into another regimented curriculum after school. They need to let off steam. If they are anything like my boys, they need to let off an awful lot of steam. It is this type of flexibility, recognizing the differences across the country and the need to meet them, that this Bill addresses.

The strategy provides funding for the provinces to deliver child care services under their jurisdictions. We have not intruded upon their jurisdictions whatsoever. As far as standards are concerned, the Hon. Member for Outremont mentioned that there are no standards in place. The Bill provides that the provinces must have standards in place and that they must publicize these standards as well as the methods for their enforcement. There are arrangements to ensure that standards are put into place by the provinces.

The Hon. Member for Vancouver East also mentioned that the provinces would be encouraged to use the dollars for poor quality care. I do not believe that the governments of the provinces, no matter what Parties they represent, care so little about children that they would bring in services of poor quality. They too have to answer to the electorate. They have to answer to the parents. More than that, they have to answer to their own consciences. I cannot believe that the Government of any province would be encouraged to use dollars for poor quality service.

We are working together with the provinces in providing care for the children of Canada. We know from our many tours across Canada and from the people to whom we have listened that people want flexibility. This legislation has addressed the service side of it by putting $4 billion into additional subsidized care spaces for those parents who cannot provide full payment for child care services.

The strategy provides tax measures that allow parents who can pay for child care to realize some return on those dollars that they are putting into the system, providing wages and dollars toward supplies that are required. We have increased the present $2,000 deduction for child care services to $4,000 for pre-schoolers. After that, the tax deduction continues but it remains at $2,000 unless a child is disabled, in which case it remains at $4,000. We have addressed the concerns of parents who are paying for child care services.

Then we come to the parent at home. We could not do as much for the parent at home as we may have liked to do. The parent at home stays at home out of a desire to be in the home with the child. A woman who has a career may come to the point in her life where she must ask what is more important to her as an individual, can she stay home with her child or must she continue to work? That is a very difficult decision for a parent to make, whether it be a father's, a mother's or a joint family decision that is made.

We have tried to recognize the choice these parents make by offering an additional $200 per child that is at home with his or her parent. It may not be enough in some people's eyes. It is certainly not intended as a replacement for wages that might have been earned, but it is a recognition that parents make a conscious decision to stay home and raise children.

In looking back on my life, I worked when my children were young and I only wish that I had been in a position to spend more time with them. I can honestly say that if I had the chance to do it over again, that is probably what I would do. I admire the women who have to make the decision about being in the workforce or staying at home. It is not an easy decision to make, but with this legislation we are attempting to make that decision a little easier to make.

We cannot help all people in all situations, but we can certainly help by working with parents, with care givers and with provincial Governments to ensure that the children of Canada who are our greatest resource receive the care that they truly deserve. I feel that this legislation will do that. It would be nice to be able to do more. There is still more to be done with parental leave which, as the Hon. Member for Vancouver East mentioned, was something that we were unanimous on during the committee hearings. We need to have changes there.

I think we have made headway. We have shown leadership by forming the committee, the first all-parliamentary committee. We listened to 2,000 people across Canada. Because we listened to the people, we have come up with legislation that we feel meets the majority of the needs. Therefore, I move:

That this question now be put.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Debate, with the Hon. Member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn).

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I find it difficult to trust people around this place sometimes in terms of the length of debate. I have to assume that if a Member is allowed 20 minutes to speak, the Member would want to use the 20 minutes.

Ms. Mitchell: Point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is no necessity for putting the question. We are carrying on with the debate.

Ms. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, I wondered if you had omitted the 10-minute question period of the last speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There are questions and comments. I will recognize the Hon. Member for Edmonton—Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour) for questions and comments and I then I will recognize the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, I thank the Hon. Member for her thoughtful speech. Would she explain how she sees the essential differences between our proposals and those of the two opposition Parties? Perhaps she could explain for my benefit how we will be helping single parents. She understands the matter far better than I do.

Mrs. Martin: Mr. Speaker, under the current child care legislation, the Canada Assistance Plan, single parents who are not able to pay for child care are eligible for assistance on a dollar basis and in some cases 100 per cent care. Sometimes it is on a percentage of income basis. To give you an example, we visited a child care centre here in Ottawa which had 44 children in its care. The care of only four of those children was paid for by the parents. The other 40 were subsidized by the Government.

I might mention that as we crossed the country one of the things we heard from parents, advocates, and specialists in the field, was that they wanted to see child care taken out of the Canada Assistance Plan and governed by its own Act. That is exactly what this Government has done. Child care is covered by its own Act so we can be sure the money goes toward child care.

Under this legislation subsidies will still exist. If you have a single parent who cannot afford to pay for the care of her child and she wants to get back into the workforce to improve herself and provide an income to support her children, the Government can still assist her with the cost of child care through local social service agencies in her community. That has not changed. In fact, it is improved by the fact that not only can the dollars be provided, the federal Government is willing to pay 75 per cent of the cost of creating new child care spaces. That does not exist under CAP. I might explain that a bit further. This does not involve simply creating a brand new child care centre in a building. It means that if you have a child care centre which can perhaps accommodate only 12 children, and it wants to expand, then 75 per cent of the cost of improving that centre and creating additional spaces can be paid.

It also means that if a parent wants to spend her time with her child and has decided that she can help other mothers by taking children in, in other words an unlicensed facility, which the Hon. Member for Vancouver East has some concern about, that parent could apply to become a licensed centre and receive capital funding to add whatever is necessary to her home to turn it into a licensed child care facility. That is going one step further in that as a licensed facility she can provide receipts to the parent who will then be entitled to a tax deduction. It may mean putting a fence around the facility. It may mean adding an extra washroom in order to meet standards. Standards do exist. There has been discussion about whether standards exist. They do. In short, 75 per cent of the capital cost for expanding or creating facilities is available to the small entrepreneur, not necessarily just for the large child care centre.

By the same token, if someone comes forward and says they want to put in a 35 space child care centre they can draw up a business plan and under this legislation we could provide 75 per cent of the capital cost. I think that is very important to creating additional spaces.

Single parents are being looked after in a different way, too. A lot of parents, primarily single parents need assistance with parenting skills. In many cases they need someone to talk to. Under the $100 million initiative fund there are plans to help groups that can offer help in parenting skills.

Another thing that the capital dollars can be used for is toys. Many of these children come from single parent homes which do not have the funding and the children do not have toys. They need toys, including educational toys, to help develop their learning skills. The money can be spent to make sure there is a proper kind of educational toys not only in the larger centres but in the smaller family centres as well.

There is a lot there for the single parent and I am glad the Hon. Member asked me that question because I think it is important that it be clarified.

Mr. Keeper: Mr. Speaker, I am in a bit of a dilemma and I seek your guidance. I have a specific question I want to ask but I know that my colleague, our day care critic, also has a question for the Hon. Member and she would like to go first. Is it possible to accommodate us?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would be more than delighted to let her ask her question. We have only a couple of minutes left so you can split it up the way you want. Is the Hon. Member giving up his time?

Ms. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, I will be as quick as I can.

I would ask my hon. friend, who I shared many hours with on the day care trail, to read the "blues" because she did misunderstand some of the things I was saying. For example, I said it was baby-sitters who may be unreliable. I certainly was not referring to the other categories, although it maybe came through that way.

As to the question of profit and non-profit, I would ask if she has had a chance to read a study completed recently in Toronto with reference to compliance with the Day Nursery Act. Its findings were very similar to a research study done for our committee. She will recall that that study's conclusion was that generally speaking, and there are exceptions, the for-profit day care centres tend to have minimum standards with lower salaries and other criteria which are not as high quality. The Toronto study found that for-profit commercial centres are less likely to meet the requirements of the Day Nursery Act. They are likely to be bigger. They are more likely to have spaces which they are not licensed for. There are more complaints launched with regard to this sector. They are likely to have a higher staff-child ratio violation and differences in the numbers of supervisors. Non-profit tend to have less supervisor turnover and hence more stability in care given.

There are many other criteria but those are the conclusions of that study and they are similar to the study we did. I am glad the Hon. Member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan) is here because this concerns his riding and he should read the information from Toronto.

Mrs. Martin: Mr. Speaker, I agree with my hon. colleague that we spent many hours crossing the country on this particular subject and I am sure that is why she is as anxious as I am to see this Bill get speedy passage so that we can start to create an additional 200,000 spaces.

Some of the problems she raises were well handled by the Hon. Member for York Centre when he said he sees nothing wrong with funds going to help those centres improve the quality of their service and the wages of care givers. However, I will also bring to the Hon. Member's attention that, if she is honest, she will remember that we heard as many complaints from parents about the quality of non-profit day care as we did about for profit day care.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Point of order, Mr. Speaker. You recognized me but then I sat down very quickly and I want to know if I will be recognized for the floor at 6 p.m.?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Yes, I will recognize the Hon. Member at six o'clock for debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's order paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS—BILLS

PUBLIC EMPLOYEES POLITICAL RIGHTS ACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-273, an Act respecting political rights of public servants, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

Mr. Daubney: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. As the sponsor of this Bill, I rise on a point of order. I have reviewed the amendments which have appeared in the Order Paper today. Many of them are sensible modifications which clarify parts of the draft Bill and in fact improve it. However, I have grave reservations about a number of others which will fundamentally alter the Bill. I also have some concerns about the process which has led to the motion before us today. In light of that, and in light of the recent decision in the Federal Court of Appeal on the Osborne case which recently struck down Section 32 of the Public Service Employment Act for all but Deputy Ministers, I cannot acquiesce in a process which would allow this Bill, standing in my name, to become a vehicle for the imposition of more, what I would consider to be, unreasonable restrictions on my constituents and on public servants in Canada. I, therefore, withdraw Bill C-273 standing in my name.

• (1700)

Mr. Speaker: I have to advise the Hon. Member for Ottawa West (Mr. Daubney) that under the rules of the House it will be necessary to have the unanimous consent of the House. The House has heard the proposal of the Hon. Member for Ottawa West that he withdraw his Bill. Is there unanimous consent for it?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Accordingly, the order is discharged and the Bill withdrawn.

Order discharged and Bill withdrawn.

Mr. Speaker: Under the circumstances, there being no business before the House, the sitting is suspended until 6 o'clock p.m.

Before leaving, out of courtesy I wish to remark that the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Cassidy) sent the Chair a thorough and helpful note with respect to certain amendments. I want to assure the Hon. Member that I read it with very great interest and I thank the Hon. Member for taking the trouble to do that.

Mr. Cassidy: Mr. Speaker, I want to express sympathy to the Member for Ottawa West (Mr. Daubney) and also want to express on the record, on behalf of some of my constituents, gratitude to him. His Bill happened to have the luck of the draw and was brought forward whereas a similar Bill standing in my name was not brought forward. The Member persisted in bringing it forward and I regret with him the fact that the Government chose to bring forward amendments which would have so weakened or undermined the principle of the Bill that they could honestly be called killer amendments. They have led to the situation in which the Member had no choice but to feel that the Bill should be withdrawn.

As it stands, in the forthcoming election public employees will have the right to participate fully because of the Federal Court of Appeal decision in which I was involved. I am glad of that but am sorry that this House has proved incapable of legislating, as we were responsible to try to do, because of the intervention of the Deputy Minister and the Government.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a very short statement. I join with my friend from Ottawa West (Mr. Daubney) and tell him how disappointed I am that the Government intervened at this time. The Government had an entire process before it at report stage. We brought forward a Bill which we thought was a result of serious study by the committee.

The Government never even made an appearance before that committee to help with the drafting of this Bill. At the last minute, today, it came forward with a series of amendments which, as the Member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Cassidy) said, are killer amendments which would have the effect of neutralizing this Bill or making it absolutely impossible.

I thank all those who worked with us and gave a lot of their time, energy, and good advice toward the drafting of this Bill. I regret exceedingly that the Government intervened and am very saddened by the fact that after four years the Government did not have the courage to come forward with a Bill of its own.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa—Carleton): Mr. Speaker, killer or no killer, I, too, would have found some of the amendments to be very unreasonable restrictions applying to many of my constituents in Ottawa—Carleton. At this point in the process I would not have supported some of the amendments which were brought in last night. I want to congratulate my colleague, the Member for Ottawa West (Mr. Daubney), and everyone else who worked so long and hard to bring us this far in the process to enhance full legal rights for public servants. We were awfully close.

[Translation]

Mrs. Claudy Mailly (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member has my sympathy. I think it is really too bad this had to happen, because the Bill tabled by the Hon. Member was a very praiseworthy initiative, and the Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) was right when he said we had worked very hard and were happy with the results of our work. I realize some Members expressed certain reservations because they thought the Bill gave public servants too much freedom. There were even public servants who made some very serious representations which some of my colleagues also took very seriously. However, I am sorry to see it all end this way, because I believe this Bill should have been allowed to pass and that it reflected most honourably on the Hon. Member for Ottawa West (Mr. Daubney).

Mr. Richard Grisé (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I simply want to provide some clarification, especially with respect to the comments made by the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Cassidy) and the Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier (Mr. Gauthier). I would of course like to start by congratulating all Members who took part in this debate, especially the Hon. Member for Ottawa West (Mr. Daubney). I agree with my colleague, the Hon. Member for Gatineau (Mrs. Mailly), the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue, who said that some Members of this House made certain comments on the substance of the Bill and suggested a number of amendments.

I would like to make it quite clear there was no Government interference. There was no meddling by the Government in a Bill . . .

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Grisé: I listened to you and you can listen to me. A number of amendments were made.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Grisé: Go ahead and laugh.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is important to clarify the situation, and the fact is that, today, the Hon. Member for Ottawa West decided to withdraw his bill. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that this was in no way the result of any direct intervention by the Government.

CANADA CHILD CARE ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Epp (Provencher) that Bill C-144, an Act to authorize payments by Canada toward the provision of child care services, and to amend the Canada Assistance Plan in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee; and the motion of Mrs. Martin (p. 18222).

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate at second reading of Bill C-144, principally because it is the most important piece of social legislation to come from the Government since it came to power in 1984. I am sorry that there is so much disagreement in this debate over a national child care program. All joking aside, this really should be a motherhood issue.

We all agree on the need for such a program. Using Health and Welfare Canada's own figures, there are over 850,000 children in this country under the age of six who have parents working more than 20 hours a week or who are studying full time. That enormous number of children are being served by just over 220,000 child care spaces at the present time. That is clearly inadequate.

Anyone just taking a cursory look at these figures can see that there is a crying need for child care right across the country. This problem is national in scope. Our children need care and their parents need our assistance. It is up to the federal Government to provide national leadership in dealing with this problem.

What has been the Government's response? It has come up with a program designed to create about 200,000 new spaces over a period of seven years. Clearly this will never meet the needs of over 850,000 children and their families. In fact, doubling the number of child care spaces over a period of seven years is a lower rate of growth than has been achieved without a national program. Child care spaces have doubled in just two years, from 1984 to 1986.

This raises a very relevant question. Why is the Government creating a program which is designed to fall far short of demand? Why start a program doomed to fail? If we are going to spend over $5 billion on child care, let us get it right the first time.

Let me touch me briefly on a few of the problems I see with the Government's proposal. In the first place, almost half the money for this proposal will not create new child care spaces. It is earmarked for tax expenditures. I thought we had realized in this country that tax expenditures are, in most cases, less efficient than direct capital spending. It is hard to target a tax expenditure specifically.

Most of this $2.4 billion in tax expenditures will be used to double the child care tax deduction. This is clearly a regressive move. It does nothing to help the poor single parent. If one does not have enough income, one cannot take advantage of a tax deduction.

This measure flies in the face of tax reform as well. We are supposed to be moving from tax deductions to tax credits. Credits are also part of this patchwork quilt that the Government is calling a national program. Less well off families will get an increase of $100 in the child tax credit in each of the first two years. This is hopelessly inadequate. First, one cannot use this money to get child care if no spaces are available. One cannot break the cycle of poverty and dependence with a mere $200.

Conservatives are always saying that they want people to be self-reliant. But how can you get a single parent off welfare and into the workforce if the solution is to hand out $100 per year to hire a babysitter?

The real weakness of this measure can be seen when we compare it to the de indexing of things like family allowance that the Government has pushed through. It turns out that this measure will give back to Canadian families less than the $1.5 billion they will lose through de indexation. Inflation will eat up more than the Government is handing out.

What is most troubling about the Government's proposal is the lack of a set of national objectives and standards. There are no minimum standards of care established anywhere in this program.

We are discussing the needs of our children. They deserve adequate care. However, even this is not guaranteed by the Government's program.

We do not have to dictate terms to parents. We just simply must assure families that they can expect certain minimum standards of care for their children.

We just went through the debate on the Meech Lake Accord. It clearly says that national objectives can be set in such programs. Here is the perfect opportunity to demonstrate how our system of Confederation can work. We can establish a truly national program in an area of provincial jurisdiction.

Here is the perfect opportunity, moreover, for a federal Government to show some leadership. I see no leadership in this proposal. Instead, I am struck by the Government's curious lack of vision. Everyone can see the crying need for a national program. I have already outlined the figures. Where is the program that will meet the needs of our society?

It has been estimated that if all of the money used for things like tax expenditures had been used to create new child care spaces, we could create about 170,000 more spaces. That would at least be an add-on start.

We have the opportunity to show that we understand the needs of average Canadian families. The Government could have shown that it understood their desire for quality affordable child care. Instead, we are fighting the same kind of battle we fought over deindexation. We have to show the Government that we have as much concern for the care of our children as we have for the security of our seniors.

This should also be a time to show our commitment to equality for women. We know that there are a lot of single parent families. Many of those families are headed by women. We know that single parents need affordable child care in order to work. We should be encouraging women to increase their participation in the labour force. We should show them that we want them to reach their full potential in society, but we should also realize that they will never achieve that potential if they are deprived of the opportunity to work because there are not enough child care spaces in Canada.

This proposal will not give them any choice, and the Government is simply not being open and honest about that. This program will not meet their needs.

Just as it fails in quantity, it also fails in quality. Instead of an affordable national program of quality child care with minimum standards, the Government is offering this patchwork, piecemeal approach. Instead of demonstrating a commitment to fairness for Canadian families, the Government is offering a program which is not even designed to meet their needs.

Instead of showing a vision of Canada where all its citizens can reach their full potential, the Government is content to throw money at the problem in a pre-election period. Incidentally, the fact that the Government wants to move with what I would call indecent haste, in trying to get this Bill through second reading after we have been debating it for just three hours at most, is totally unacceptable. As I said at the outset, this is the most important single piece of social legislation to come forward from the Government after it has been in power for almost exactly four years. Yet, in four hours, it wants to get this through second reading, out of the House, and into committee. There is absolutely no justification for this kind of haste at this time, election or no election on the horizon.

Canadians are not going to be fooled. They know this program is inadequate and should be rejected in its present form. It is a dilemma for all Members of Parliament who are opposed in principle to the mechanics of this Bill, or to its technical aspects, in view of the fact that child care and money for child care is very important. Nevertheless, there is no point in starting out on a national program unless we have the very best program we can put into place at the outset. If we do not have a good program with national standards and objectives, we may very well be wasting a lot of that $6.4 billion.

What should be put in its place? Canadian families should have access to a comprehensive, flexible and affordable system of child care. They need to know their children are safe and secure while they are out earning a living. Children should not have to stay at home watching television all day with some well-intentioned teenager who is simply not qualified to assist, train, educate or care for those children. That means we have to put money into creating spaces in non-profit community organizations, not tax expenditures. This would give parents a voice in the kind of care their children receive. It would also allow us to guarantee quality. We should make funding to the provinces conditional on compliance with a set of minimum national standards and objectives.

I realize that such a system cannot be set up overnight, but in the meantime we should provide a series of good faith grants to the provinces. That way we can get started on the road to meeting the needs of Canadian families while we negotiate cost sharing with the provincial Governments. We must also be flexible. We have to realize that not everyone will have access to this type of child care. This is of particular concern to our remote or rural communities.

Parents should have the choice of going to licensed home care. That is why the Government should also fund home services which meet national standards. In that way it can ensure that facilities in these homes are adequate. This would give Canadian families real choices. They would no longer have to worry about the level of care their children receive. Canadian families need a comprehensive system of child care. They want a system that is fair for all families regardless of where they live or how much money they earn. They need to know their children will be safe and secure in the child care system. We should, therefore, reject the Government's proposal and get on with the job of meeting the real needs of Canadian families.

Let us show Canadian families that we understand their needs and have the vision to meet them. We are not opposed to the private sector being involved in child care. However, we argue that public funding should not be used to assist the private sector. If it wants to be in the business community and its job is child care, then let the market determine, through profit and loss, the quality of care for the children of its clients. We are not opposed to that. But we are opposed to, on the one hand, a lack of national standards and, on the other hand, giving money to private sector child care homes or institutions, which we feel is not fair to the taxpaying public of Canada. If the private sector wants to run a private operation, this is a free country, let it do so.

Also, based on the evidence that came before the committee, I would argue that non-profit child care is much more efficient and is of a higher quality of child care, generally speaking—and there are exceptions—across Canada.

In closing, I want to cast my mind back to some of the other great battles that have been fought in this Chamber in terms of bringing forward progressive social legislation. I can recall the critics, and most of them were either large C Conservative or small c conservative, when Tommy Douglas and Woodrow Lloyd brought in OHIP and medicare in the Province of Saskatchewan. They said it could not be done. They said it would be wasteful. They said the Government had no business being in the medical care delivery system. They said it would be a great encroachment upon the private sector in what, in those days, was a market-driven medical care system. I do not think there is a Conservative or Liberal left in this country today who would want to go back to the pre-medicare system.

We are the envy of many progressive-thinking U.S. Senators and Members of the House of Representatives. I do not think I am quoting Michael Dukakis out of context when I repeat what I heard him say a couple of weeks ago in Atlanta. They would dearly love to have our medicare system in the United States, and one thing he said that night with respect to medicare was that 38 million Americans have no medical coverage at all and that he would initiate and bring in a medical care system similar to ours to cover those 38 million.

Those of us who fought the medicare battle some 25 years ago were considered radicals, unacceptable to the so-called market-driven medical care delivery system we had in those days, but today, I would argue, there are very few Canadians, rich, middle-income or low-income, who would want to get rid of that system.

I can recall a time, towards the end of the Diefenbaker period, when a professor of my university was called upon to head a commission of Mr. Diefenbaker's Conservative Government to find out whether or not it was financially viable to bring in a Canada pension system. After several months of hearings here in Ottawa and across the country, the conclusion was, no, this country could not afford a Canada Pension Plan as was being put forward at that time by the New Democratic Party and the Liberals. They said the country could not afford it and it would infringe upon the Great West Lifes of this country, the insurance companies that had it all wrapped up in their tidy little hands. We all know that when it comes to life insurance companies, if one reads the fine print one will find that the exclusionary language in almost every life insurance policy is appalling, to say nothing of the fact it is downright misleading. We fought that battle and finally got the Canada Pension Plan. Now we come to a national child care program.

I am arguing this evening that perhaps for some old fashioned thinkers in this House we are being a little too progressive or aggressive. I want Members in the House to think back to the medicare fight and the Canada pension fight, just those two issues, before we proceed much further with this Bill. Members will find that what we are arguing for and promoting is not perfect by any means, but we are moving in the right direction. There is no more precious commodity—if I can put it in those crass words—than our young people. Regardless of background, education or family income, unless they are all give an equal start in life, an equal opportunity to develop, the waste that will continue in this country will be inestimable. All one has to do is to look at those countries where child care and day care are virtually tied up in the private sector, where there are very few, if any, public programs. You will find that if one is born in a black ghetto, or a hispanic ghetto in the United States, or a poor white ghetto, one does not have nearly the opportunity to develop as a young human being that one would have if one were born into a middle-income family or upper-income family.

We do not want that type of society in this country. We want to give all our kids an equal start in life and an equal opportunity. They may not all have equal qualities or capabilities, but the very least we can do is to provide them with an equal chance to get started.

Ms. Mitchell: I would like to congratulate my colleague on his remarks. He mentioned early in his remarks that, in his view, rather than having tax measures that were regressive and would take money that was very much needed for child care services, having regressive tax measures, and also having a tax credit of $100 for the first year and $200 thereafter for families not using licensed care, it would have been better for the Government to have reindexed the family allowance. Would the Hon. Member elaborate on that a little? Does the Hon. Member consider that the Government should have reindexed the child tax credit which would have targeted lower income families and, as the years went on, would also have increased upward the income range eligible for the child tax credit? These are two things that have been detrimental to families that have put particular economic pressure on low and average income families and contradict any family policy goals that the Government espouses.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): In response to my colleague, the Hon. Member for Vancouver East (Ms. Mitchell), this is an extremely important aspect of this Bill. A tax deduction favours a few, or favours those who are earning higher incomes. To a considerable extent those on lower incomes are excluded, and those not paying any income tax at all because their incomes are so low are entirely neglected.

In order to make a policy or program like this fair and equitable, in my view there is only one way to do it, and that is by direct funding and making whatever the program is directly accessible to those individuals and their children. The minute tax policy is used in order to pay in part for any social program, literally hundreds of thousands of Canadians are excluded, or those with higher incomes are favoured.

In terms of raising the income cap, it is a well known fact that the heaviest portion of the tax burden in our country falls not on the rich, not on the poor, but on those in the middle-income area from $25,000 up to $40,000 a year. Those people in our society are becoming terribly fed up with having to bear a substantial burden, more than their fair share of taxation. These are very important aspects of this Bill. We feel that we have to reject those aspects of the funding as being unfair, inequitable, and not working in the best interests of all Canadians.

Mr. Skelly: Could the Hon. Member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn) outline how the Conservative Government has completely misled the people of Canada on this particular legislation, and how it has limited the number of day care spaces that will be created? I appreciate the speech made by the Hon. Member for Brant, and I know he can outline how the people of Canada have been misled on the number of spaces that have been created for young people in this country.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): I appreciate that question very much. I am very happy that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) has come in to listen to my speech this evening. It is the first opportunity I have had to stand across from him and deliver a speech, although I have heard his speeches on many occasions.

Referring to what is misleading, when people take a look at the total sum that the Government is talking about they think that that is a total cash outlay of some $6.4 billion almost overnight as it were. Second, somehow this will automatically jump up the number of child care places to accommodate the total need. We all know that that is not the case.

I am not prepared to say that the Government is deliberately misleading the people in this regard. I leave it to the people to read the legislation, to read what is in the Bill, and to come to their own conclusion. I am quite sure that they will come to the same conclusion as my hon. friend from Comox—Powell River has come to.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my friend the Hon. Member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn) expressed gratitude that I would be down to listen to his speech. When I heard the Member for Brant was speaking on child care I immediately rushed to the House. I was up in my office working and I rushed to the House, because when I saw the astounding miracle that he had worked on the NDP defence policy, I could hardly wait to see what was going to happen on child care.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Both make a lot of sense too.

Mr. Mulroney: I thank my distinguished friend for his welcome. I am always delighted to listen to his contributions to an important matter.

I rise, Mr. Speaker, with great pride to join in this historic debate on the Canada Child Care Act. In government we all have two general goals: to try to build a productive economy, and to try to build a caring society. These objectives are by no means mutually exclusive. Indeed, in many ways they are complementary and result in a nation hopefully that is more civilized and more prosperous.

First, I know that all Members of the House, irrespective of political Party, will join with me in saluting the tremendous leadership role of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) for bringing forward child care and fostering a national consensus on a very important matter.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: I gather the NDP is holding its applause for a little later.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): A lot later.

Mr. Mulroney: I think that the national consensus engendered by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and by the Minister responsible for the Status of Women on the four principal objectives of availability, accessibility, affordability, and above all, quality, has been a commendable achievement, and on behalf of all Members of the House I want to underline his tremendous contribution to our national well-being.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: As a result of this initiative we will be allocating $6.4 billion over seven years, creating 200,000 new quality spaces and virtually doubling the number of spaces available today. That strikes me, irrespective of Party, of being a major contribution to the national well-being of Canada, and I would think that all parliamentarians would want to celebrate that fact.

In so doing we are honouring an important commitment that I made on behalf of my Party during the last election campaign. At the First Ministers' Conference in Vancouver in 1986 I said that one of the most important factors contributing to the persistent and persisting inequality of women in this country is the lack of affordable, flexible, quality child care. We have been determined from the beginning of our mandate to seek to create and implement a national child care program worthy of the name. With this Bill I believe that we are in the process of doing just that.

[Translation]

And in the process, Mr. Speaker, we are preparing Canada for the social and economic challenges of a new decade and a new century. Consider the following: Today, more than half of Canadian mothers with young children are in the work force. The Canada child Care Act, with its emphasis on flexibility, will help facilitate choices in child care. We want parents, and this is something you tend to forget, we want parents to be able to choose the kind of child care best suited to their values and their requirements. We recognize that there are different needs in each family just as there are different needs in various regions, from British Columbia to Newfoundland and Labrador.

• (1830)

[English]

The demands of adequate child care, say in Williams Lake, British Columbia, clearly differ from those required in Burlington, Ontario, or in Rimouski, Québec. But the fundamental objective, we believe, is the same everywhere, to give all Canadian mothers the possibility of going to work, secure in the knowledge that their children are in clean, safe and supportive surroundings. The Canada Child Care Act is about protecting children, about helping parents, about strengthening the Canadian family. Most of all, we want the best of care for our future generations.

We are living in an era of remarkable economic and social change. These are challenging times, but they can be rewarding for Canadians individually and for our society as a whole. Some 56 per cent of Canadian women are in the workforce today, as compared with 45 per cent in 1976, and 35 per cent a decade earlier, in 1966.

It is a matter of particular pride for me that of the nearly 1,300,000 new jobs created since I had the honour of being sworn in as Prime Minister, fully 728,000, or 56 per cent of all of those jobs, have gone to women in Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: That is a spectacular growth rate of 15.5 per cent in women's employment in less than four years, as compared, for example, to 8.8 per cent for men. That means that the number of women's jobs has been growing almost twice as fast as the number of new jobs for men. That is catch-up. There has been a growing demand and an historic injustice, and the policies of the Government are important economically. I am proud to be associated with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) in this. The economic policies of the Government have made an important social statement, and these figures indicate that Canadian women, having been left behind for so many years, are now playing catch-up and getting their fair share of economic jobs and equality of opportunity in Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Of that growth in women's jobs, 78 per cent, more than three-quarters, have been full-time jobs, reversing almost completely the trend under the previous Government, where employment for women was essentially part-time. The unemployment rate for women has declined from 12 per cent to 8.4 per cent, a decline of nearly one-third in less than four years. I think that all Members of the House would agree that this is a happy development for all Canadians.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: The number of women employed in managerial and administrative positions has grown by 36 per cent between 1984 and 1987.

These are strong indicators, not perfect, but strong and vigorous indicators, that we are moving in the right direction as a country, that we are moving towards fairness and equity for women. We are guided by these principles of fairness and equity as we prepare for the societal changes of the next decade.

If you look anywhere across Canada, at our universities, you can see the dimensions of the winds of change that are about to sweep across this country. Women account for nearly half, and in some areas more than half, of the enrolment in our faculties of medicine and law and business.

[Translation]

In Quebec, especially in business administration and international trade, more and more women are outdistancing men in so-called traditional jobs or careers.

[English]

This is a major development. Women have moved as well into small business in a very big way. Women accounted for 95 per cent of the net increase in unincorporated small businesses between 1980 and 1985. The number of self-employed women grew by 118 per cent between 1975 and 1986.

With these changes to the face of our economy, there has been a strong and positive evolution in attitudes during the present decade. What used to be known primarily as women's issues are now called, quite properly—and I think the Hon. Member for Outremont (Mrs. Pépin) will agree—society's issues.

Child care is such an issue. It is about social justice, but it is equally about economic justice. In terms of social justice, we want Canadian mothers to be able to participate in the work force if they choose, to the degree they wish to do so, to expand their own horizons, to develop their own capacities, to enhance their own prosperity and to pursue their own dreams. At the same time, we also want to respect the decision of those mothers who choose to remain at home to raise their children.

That is why this important and historic initiative is based on the fundamental principle of choice.

[English]

Freedom of choice, this is what this is all about. This is not a unitary, uniform, homogenized society. There are different people with different dreams and different options, and this gives Canadian women freedom of choice.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: This initiative recognizes the needs of both women with children who work outside the house and women with children who choose to work at home with their children.

Canada has long been a world leader in promoting social justice for its citizens. From the time of the baby bonus in the 1940s and Old Age Security in the fifties, down to the Canada-Quebec Pension Plans and medicare in the sixties, Canada has been well regarded in the international community for its by and large generous and civilized approach to social programs across the country.

I believe and I hope that Members of the House from all sides will agree with me. I hope that perhaps a decade from now, a generation hence, the Canada Child Care Act will be regarded as perhaps the most important social innovation in the 1980s.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Our critics—and there are a few here in the House—say that the child care program is—

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Very few.

Mr. Mulroney: Well, the Member from Brant is saying very few. He is very right.

An Hon. Member: Sixty-six per cent of Canadians.

Mr. Mulroney: I think, measured by any standard, all Members would agree that $6.4 billion is a substantial sum of money. By contrast, and to put it into some perspective, consider the debate, for example, on child care in the United States of America, in the general election that will soon take place. Vice-President George Bush, the Republican nominee for President, has proposed a $2.2 billion package of tax credits for low-income families. Governor Michael Dukakis, the Democratic nominee, has proposed a $2.5 billion program for the children of working parents.

An Hon. Member: Jesse Jackson.

Mr. Mulroney: That is in a country with 10 times our population.

An Hon. Member: Don't use them as an example. They have the worst child care program in the world.

Mr. Mulroney: We are proposing for Canadians a $6.4 billion program over seven years, and I think that that is a great tribute to Canada and its notion of justice for working women.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An Hon. Member: How about comparing it to Sweden, Holland, Norway, Denmark, France, Italy, Germany?

Mr. Mulroney: I believe that those figures tend to put the debate in a different and, I think, quite interesting perspective. We are doing this, which is very important, within the fiscal framework of responsibility that the Minister of Finance introduced in November, 1984, and which—may I say to his great credit and because of his very, very significant leadership—this Government has respected ever since and will in the future.

• (1840)

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: There is a very important economic and social reason for this, Mr. Speaker. It is not being hung on a given concept of deficit reduction. There is a very important reason of social justice associated with this. The notions of deficit reduction and social programs are not at variance one with the other.

[Translation]

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, our program of financial restraint and our economic policies have encouraged sufficient growth in the economy that we are able to afford this important, most historic initiative. It must not be forgotten that when we assumed office, the deficit was at $38 billion and ticking like a time bomb. We have defused that. Less than four years later, the deficit has been reduced by nearly $10 billion a year, and we are right on target for reducing our borrowing requirements by half over five years. I think this is a most significant achievement for any Government of Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: We began, Mr. Speaker, from the premise that Canadians needed more work. We began from the principle that governments don't create wealth, people do.

[English]

Governments do not create wealth. Governments can, however, create conditions within which new wealth can be generated by Canadian citizens, by the genius of the entrepreneurial spirit, by the risk-takers who create jobs, by those who have vision and believe in job creation. Governments cannot create those themselves but they can create conditions conducive to that kind of economic growth if they get their spending down, as we have, if they get their deficits down, as we have done, if they encourage, not discourage, investment if they attract investment and in the process attract jobs, and if they reduce regulatory constraint to economic growth, as we have tried to do from the very beginning of our mandate. The result of this, Mr. Speaker, has been lower interest rates, which has produced sustained growth in a climate-controlled inflation.

The 1.3 million new participants in our economy today resulting from new jobs created are paying into our envelope of social programs rather than drawing from it.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Canadians are now themselves with their own hard earned money, rather than with borrowed money that does not last and is shoved on to the backs of our young and new generation, creating a broader and a deeper national pool of new wealth. It is based on that new wealth that the Government and the people of Canada provide the kinds of programs and social justice, such as the national child care program that is before the House of Commons today.

I think that by creating an additional 200,000 quality child care spaces many more mothers will have an opportunity to participate in the labour force.

While this is very much about social justice, it is equally about economic justice.

[Translation]

And in the strictest economic terms, we cannot hope to achieve our economic potential in the 1990s wihtout the full and fully engaged participation of as many Canadians as possible who wish to enter the job market.

In the coming decade, we will have to make some real economic and social choices for this country. We will need, for example, more qualified immigrants, not fewer, if we are to sustain our economic growth. We will need a more literate labour force. It is, in both human and economic terms, a terribly sad fact that one Canadian adult in four is functionally illiterate. In the coming era of technological change, in a time when research and development must be a national hallmark of excellence, we must have a work force whose skills are fully developed and whose potential is fully realized. I think those are some of the dimensions of the economic and social challenges that we will face in the coming decade.

[English]

And so, Mr. Speaker, in a very special way the constant challenge for a civilized and tolerant Government is to be, as best it can, formed, as any Government is, of human beings with their own imperfections, both competent and caring. For without the prudent management of our nation's fiscal resources we cannot free up new resources on the social side to meet the increasing demands of an increasingly complex society. We all know that it requires that kind of growth and new wealth to meet the constant demand of society. So it is a matter of some pride to the members of this Government that we have been able to expand our social framework within a fiscal framework of some considerable restraint.

Many of these issues are of special concern to women and to working mothers, but not exclusively. They affect all of us. In a very special way, they have a particular effect on women and working mothers. We have sought to respond to a number of them in constructive ways, for example, the spousal allowances. One of our first acts in government was to extend spousal allowances to all low-income widows and widowers aged 60 to 64. This increased income protection to about 50,000 widows and provided some $200 million in additional benefits. We introduced improvements to the Canada Pension Plan with an improved benefits package, including an early retirement option, increased disability benefits and improved pension benefits for women, which benefited about 230,000 Canadian women. We have increased fourfold our assistance to disabled persons' organizations. The tax changes from the first Budget changing the definition of disability have resulted in increased benefits for another 85,000 Canadians.

On drug abuse, which affects us all but in a special way affects mothers who are charged with the responsibility and the heartache that comes from the impact of this situation, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) has brought in a $200 million five-year strategy to curb this tragic situation which afflicts not only our youth but all professional and income levels of our society.

In a major CBC news report a few weeks ago Dr. Ivan Porosko, director of a cocaine treatment program in Toronto, described cocaine abuse in Canada as an epidemic, a most interesting choice of words, with which most mothers in Canada would agree. They are asking the Government of Canada to get rid of this savage problem which weakens our family and debilitates our country.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: In the very sad and tragic area of battered women, we are creating 500 new shelter units which can accommodate an additional 25,000 women and children per year.

On child abuse, the Government has enacted Bill C-115 which addresses in a substantive manner the sexual abuse and exploitation of children.

With regard to native women, about which demands have been made in this House of Commons year after year, and many members of the NDP raised this with Conservatives when we were together in the Opposition, I am honoured to say and to point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that we introduced amendments to the Indian Act which replaced discriminatory elements and gave back aboriginal women both status and band membership, thereby benefiting 10,000 native women in Canada.

An Hon. Member: No money to house them.

Ms. Mitchell: No resources.

[Translation]

Mr. Mulroney: We have introduced amendments to the Criminal Code to ensure that victims of crime are given increased attention in the criminal courts, and we have secured agreement from the provinces and territories on a statement of principles for victims.

Regarding the proceeds of crime, we have instituted procedures to seize, freeze and forfeit the proceeds of crime. At the request of all Members of this House, we have imposed stiffer penalties for impaired driving and established new provisions for mandatory blood testing.

• (1850)

[English]

In a very important social problem area, the question of AIDS research, we have introduced a $129-million initiative for research, public awareness and education and community services. Perhaps we cannot reduce the pain and suffering of AIDS victims, but we can remove the social stigma which is attached to it and we can concentrate and ensure that more and more resources go to the research so that we can find a cure for this debilitating and unfair disease which affects so many people in Canada.

This, I think, is a solid record of achievement of which all Members of this Parliament can be proud. It indicates that this Government has provided strong and improved social programs that go hand in hand with economic renewal, and the child care program is but the most recent illustration of that.

There are those who argue that this can be done in a vacuum, that this can be done with borrowed money, that this can be done overnight while raising the deficit and driving up interest rates. There are even those who argue that Canada's social, cultural and environmental programs will, for example, be adversely affected by a free trade agreement with the United States of America. However, in the final analysis, action speaks louder than unfounded fears.

In the last nine months, our Government has, among other things, passed a tough new Environmental Protection Act, the most comprehensive environmental legislation among the leading industrialized nations—

Some Hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. Mulroney: We have renewed the Official Languages Act for the first time in 17 years. We have acted to provide copyright protection to Canadian artists and musicians. We have established the first ever legislative recognition of Canada's multicultural heritage—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: And if you don't like to hear it, we're going to repeat it again.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Rossi: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Bourassa (Mr. Rossi), on a point of order.

Mr. Rossi: Mr. Speaker, instead of talking about day care, the Prime Minister gave an overview of the four years of this Parliament. He talked about crime, he talked about everything but day care. So it might be . . . This is a point of order. I think that he should talk about something to do with day care, not crime, drinking, pensions, etc. He is out of order.

Mr. Speaker: I accept the Hon. Member's intervention.

[English]

Perhaps I can just say that I know that the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) would know that during some parts of his speech, there seemed to be some agitation on the other side, I think aimed at the question of relevance. I would ask the Right Hon. Prime Minister to keep that in mind.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I apologize to my hon. friend who takes offence at some of the important questions that we are discussing. I have always thought that the Canadian family and the needs of the Canadian family involved day care, but also all of the other important matters that were unaddressed for 20 years and that this Government has now dealt with.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, among other things, we have introduced the $6.4-billion child care program that we are debating today. These are the actions of a Government determined to strengthen Canada's social, environmental and cultural programs, and in our judgment they are all linked together. They cannot be cut off one from the other. They go to the well-being of families, they go to the well-being of working mothers, they go to the well-being of Canadian who need jobs, and all of them must be considered together. Only a Liberal would believe that you could cut off one from the other. There must be a program but there must be a way to pay for it, and that is why we believe in a strong economy.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: They are the actions of a Government determined to lead in implementing coherent national programs.

[Translation]

These actions clearly illustrate that this Government is committed to social justice for all Canadians. Child care is the centrepiece of that commitment. We embark on this initiative with pride and with confidence. We have every reason to believe that this program will work well and respond to the needs and aspirations of a vibrant, modern Canada. Years from now, when historians are assessing our stewardship of the country, I hope that they will say that this initiative in particular provided substantial benefits for Canadian women.

[English]

I hope it will be said that we in this Parliament developed the right social and economic initiatives for the times. I hope it will be recorded that we strengthened the social future of Canada and that our years were marked by a certain generosity of spirit, that all of us worked together on the fundamental issues to build a more tolerant society.

I have been somewhat taken with the fact that members of the Opposition seem to believe that Canada, Canadian women and Canadian families do operate in a vacuum, that child care can be segregated from drug abuse, from drunken driving, from the absence of jobs. I am being asked whether this fits together and whether we have done something.

I stand today before a Party that for 20 years had the pleasure and the privilege of sitting here talking about child care but which never once fulfilled its responsibilities to the family. I stand before you, Mr. Speaker, and say that the women of Canada understand that with the creation of 1.3 million new jobs, 56 per cent of those jobs have gone to working women, and that is a tremendous contribution to social justice for all the women of Canada.

Most of all, I think it will be recorded that the child care initiative that has been brought forward today, representing billions of dollars, recognizes and understands a commitment to justice, fairness and equality for Canadian women. This is what the Parliament of Canada is all about.

There are cheers from the children in the gallery.

Mr. Rossi: You're making the kids cry.

Mr. Mulroney: A seven-month-old baby understands, but the Liberals don't. I could say that that was a loud and ringing endorsement from one of the principal beneficiaries of the child care program.

I think all of us can take pride in the fact that for the first time a national child care program has been brought forward which will double in a period of years the number of spaces available to women and their children, thereby strengthening the most important element of our society, which is the Canadian family.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1900)

Mr. Speaker: I should advise Hon. Members that under the rules there are no questions or comments after the Right Hon. Prime Minister's speech.

Mr. Gauthier: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In the spirit of reform, and given that this is the Prime Minister's first speech on any Bill in this House—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gauthier: —in four years—

Some Hon. Members: Sit down!

Mr. Gauthier: It is the first time he has participated in anything and we cannot ask him questions.

Some Hon. Members: Sit down!

Mr. Grisé: That is not true, and you know it!

Mr. de Jong: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. While I recognize that under the Standing Orders the Prime Minister need not necessarily answer questions after an address to the House, surely, with his consent and that of the House—

Some Hon. Members: No!

Mr. de Jong: —he might want to take some questions. Surely he should have the opportunity.

Mr. Speaker: The House can of course do anything by consent. But I do not see that there is consent to depart from the rules. The Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) has the floor in debate.

Some Hon. Members: Stick around, Brian.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would ask the co-operation of Hon. Members. The Hon. Member for Davenport has the floor in debate.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, with fewer than 40 Members on the Tory side, the Prime Minister has delivered tonight what is obviously—

Mr. Keeper: How many Liberal Members?

Mrs. Mailly: There are only four of you!

Mr. Caccia: —going to be described by historians as his swan swong, his last speech in this Chamber as Prime Minister of Canada. It is very revealing to notice that his own back-benchers do not have enough confidence in him to subject him to a question period, which would have been the natural thing according to the rules that apply to everybody.

Mr. Redway: When was the last time Turner answered questions in this House?

Mr. Caccia: Evidently our belief in democracy is so weak that we believe the Prime Minister as an elected Member should not be subjected, as everyone else is, to a question period. Why should the rules be different? Why should the back-benchers of the Tory Party be afraid and lack enough confidence in their own Leader to see him subjected to a few questions? This is a real indication of weakness and fear on the part of the supporters of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Malone: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I believe the Hon. Member is out of order. The rules of this House are well known. They are written. The rule that the Hon. Member objects to was a rule of this House—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would hope there would be a little more decorum this evening. I am listening to a point of order by the Hon. Member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone) and I hope he can complete it so we can carry on with debate.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, thank you for helping me admonish the Liberals. The rules of this House on the point that the Hon. Member for Davenport is raising were the rules which applied when his Party was in government. The practice of this House is the same as it was when his former Leader was Prime Minister of Canada. For the Hon. Member to come here today and use the media and the medium to try to impress upon Canadians that there is somehow something inappropriate or wrong or unusual or different from past practices is inappropriate and wrong.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is not a point of order, but I appreciate what the Hon. Member is saying. I hope other Hon. Members will not raise points of order if they are not a point of order. I would love to listen to them in debate, but otherwise I will recognize the Hon. Member for Davenport. Does the Hon. Member for Gatineau (Mrs. Mailly) have a point of order?

[Translation]

Mrs. Mailly: Mr. Speaker, this is really a point of order. A few minutes ago, during the Prime Minister's speech, the Speaker of the House rose to comment because a Member of the Liberal Party objected to the content of the speech, saying that it was not relevant.

So I rise on the same point of order. I believe that the speech by the Member who just spoke is not relevant either. He is talking about . . .

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is not a point of order either. I would like the debate to begin with the Hon. Member for Davenport.

[Translation]

Mr. Rossi: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Davenport started his speech at 7.02 or 7.03. It is 7.09 p.m.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I know what time he began. The Hon. Member for Davenport has the floor.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, the fact of the matter is that unanimous consent was sought and denied. That is a rule that everyone understands.

Mrs. Mailly: It happens all the time.

An Hon. Member: When was the last time Turner answered a question?

Mr. Caccia: The fact is that the Prime Minister did not respect the rules of relevance and the Speaker got up to remind him of that fact. For a good half of his speech he did not speak on the Bill before us.

As I said, he had his swan song and I hope historians will record it as such, as his last speech in this House, and that he will be remembered, unfortunately, by Canadian historians as the Prime Minister who weakened Canadian federalism and virtually sold Canada to the Americans. That will be the sad legacy he leaves behind.

He also raised a number of rhetorical balloons, so to say, and they must be punctured one by one, because this is a place for debate and a rebuttal is perfectly in order.

The fact is that the Prime Minister got carried away in his rhetoric. He seemed to imply that only as of 1984 have women entered the labour force in increasing numbers. That is not true. That trend was set in place long before the election of 1984. Certainly no one will take that theology as a fact.

After four years in power women are still earning 65 cents for every dollar men earn. The Government has done nothing to correct that imbalance. The Prime Minister implied that enrolment of women in universities has been increasing under the present regime. We know very well that the enrolment of our female population in universities has been increasing for a number of years. It has nothing to do with who is in power.

The Prime Minister would like the public to believe that the number of self-employed women and women owners of unincorporated businesses is on the increase as a result of the Tory Government. That is sheer nonsense. This trend has taken place for a number of reasons and certainly not because a particular Party is in power in Ottawa. That development has nothing to do with what happened in September of 1984.

The Prime Minister made a big item of freedom of choice, which is a codified manner of excusing to the public the fact that the Bill which we are debating tonight will not set national standards for child care. That is what he means when he speaks about freedom of choice, and the public ought to know that. The Prime Minister referred several times to the fact that over the next seven years $6.4 billion will be made available for child care. In reality it is $4 billion, and I will return to that later.

The Prime Minister compared the Canadian measure to what Vice-President Bush is proposing in the United States, which is $2.2 billion, and to what democratic presidential candidate Dukakis has proposed, which is $2.5 billion. Well, so what? Since when does Canada take its lead from the Americans on social policy? Is that now becoming the bench-mark for the quality and standard that we want for Canadians? Is that where the Prime Minister takes his inspiration for what Canadians should be given?

The Prime Minister referred to the time bomb of the deficit. Those are his own words. Well, the time bomb imposed by the deficit was conveniently forgotten in the weeks and days preceding the last by-election. At that time the deficit did not exist. Why is it that when we approach a by-election and a general election, as we now are, the Government spends like a drunken sailor? It has been estimated that in the time leading up to the by-election and in subsequent weeks the Government spent $14 billion in commitments and promises leading to the fall of 1988.

The Prime Minister made reference to the prudent management of our nation's resources. He is very proud that he is capable, therefore, to offer this measure. I would like the Prime Minister and each Tory Member to address themselves to the estimated expenses of projects proposed in the White Paper on defence as compared to what the Government is proposing for child care. The Prime Minister should do that before he has the nerve to talk about the prudent management of our national resources. I will return to that in a moment.

The fact is that in the four years of the Government's mandate, low-income families earning up to $25,000 a year have seen their taxes increased by 22 per cent. That is what the Tory Government has done in the last four years. The fact is that the Government attempted to deindex senior citizens' pensions. It was stopped but it tried in 1985, didn't it? The fact is that the Government was successful, unfortunately, in deindexing family allowances. It was successful in deindexing the child tax credit. Is that the prudent management to which the Prime Minister referred? Does the Parliamentary Secretary agree with that?

Mr. McDermid: Yes.

Mr. Caccia: The fact is that, as a result of Bill C-22, there has been an increase in the cost of drugs which will mainly affect senior citizens. Is that prudent management by the Tory Government? The fact is that, with regard to the production of social and co-operative housing, the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation has virtually been put on ice. Those are the facts in reply to the rhetoric of the Prime Minister.

Contrary to the impression the Prime Minister has attempted to create in this House, we have had fine legislation by the name of the Canada Assistance Plan since 1966. That was introduced in the Pearson years. The Prime Minister seems never to have heard of that. Under the Canada Assistance Plan we laid the foundation for all the fine social measures which exist today, including the measure which makes it possible today to have the basic minimum in child care.

That brings me to the substance of this Bill which is, in a way, a deathbed repentance by the Government in its fourth year in government. I intend to make eight points which will make the life of the Parliamentary Secretary rather unpleasant.

First, the measure before us provides for only one-seventh of the child care spaces which are being requested by the provinces over the next seven years. It is estimated that 1.4 million child care spaces are required in our society. This Bill provides for 200,000 only. That fact is established by the projections of the provinces.

Mr. McDermid: What nonsense. You are totally wrong.

Mr. Caccia: The Parliamentary Secretary's ignorance is so visible. He need only do his homework. Having offered one-seventh of the requirement for the next seven years as proposed by the provinces and the two Territories, the Government has imposed a ceiling on each province. I will use as an example the Province of Ontario from which both the Parliamentary Secretary and I come. The imposition of the ceiling under this Bill in Ontario will mean a reduction in Ontario's plan for child care by some 12,000 spaces. That is my second point.

Third, this measure would build fewer child care spaces in Canada over the next seven years than would be possible under the existing legislation because of the ceiling to which I made reference a moment ago.

Fourth, it was very revealing that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp), in his speech this morning, avoided committing the Government to the establishment of national standards in child care. This measure would allow for the balkanization of this important social program and will prove right those who oppose the Meech Lake agreement and said that there would never be another national social program. Bill C-144 proves that. We will have different standards in each province. That is the net effect of the wording of the legislation.

The Minister carefully avoided the words "national standards" in his speech because he knows very well that that is the fact. Each province will go its own way and there will be no national standards on child care. The Government has no guts and no political will to set national standards. We saw the same situation with Bill C-74, the Environmental Protection Act. This is the same pattern and it is what I call the Meech Lake virus.

Fifth, this Bill does not set priorities. The net effect will be that the needs of the most disadvantaged parents will not be taken into account as a result of lack of priority. As my colleague, the Member for Outrement (Mrs. Pépin), pointed out in her excellent speech earlier today, this Bill will make things more difficult for needy parents.

Sixth, this Bill completely ignores the existence of latchkey kids. I hope the Parliamentary Secretary knows what latchkey kids are. He has a limited knowledge of social affairs. I will explain to him what latchkey kids are. They are the kids who go to school with a key around their neck. He has probably never seen them. They do exist in large numbers in west Toronto where I come from. This Bill ignores completely the fact that after a certain hour kids come home to an empty house. A measure like that in this Bill would have been the ideal vehicle to address that particular social need.

• (1920)

Mr. McDermid: Day care kids do not go to school yet.

Mr. Caccia: If the Parliamentary Secretary has something interesting to say, he can speak tonight, tomorrow or next week. We will hold our breath and listen to his wisdom with great interest.

Mr. McDermid: Three-year olds do not go to school.

Mr. Caccia: The Parliamentary Secretary's lack of sense of humour is becoming a bit too strident.

Mr. McDermid: Your lack of knowledge is becoming evident in your debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. I would hope Hon. Members would give the Member the courtesy of completing his speech. There will be questions and comments.

Mr. Caccia: My next point deals with the situation in Davenport where we have consulted a number of day care centres this morning. I was given some interesting statistical background. For instance, we were informed that the average waiting list at the Dovercourt Boys and Girls Club is some 15 people. This is one of many day care centres in Toronto. There is a great potential for expansion, which this Bill will hardly be able to meet.

The waiting list is one and a half years at the Dovercourt International Day Care Service. The average waiting list at the Harmony Day Nursery is 100 to 120 children. The waiting list for special needs children at the MacAulay child development centre is 30 names. The average waiting list is 20 children in the case of the Old Davenport Child Centre. At the Sister Regina Mass Day Nursery, the average waiting list is 35 to 36 children. The waiting period can be fairly long. In the case of St. Chad's Day Nursery, the average waiting list is at least 20 names. Time does not permit me to cover them all.

Let me conclude with the comparison of the Government's priorities. This measure offers $4 billion over the next seven years plus a total of $2.3 billion in tax credits.

Let us compare the priority the Government gives to kids with its priority on defence equipment projects over the next 10 years.

Mr. McDermid: It is 27 years.

Mr. Caccia: I will make it 10 years to make it easier for the Parliamentary Secretary to understand. On the one hand, the Government is offering our kids in direct funds, $4 billion over the next seven years, while on the other hand, there is the following breakdown in Tory defence equipment projects over the next 10 years: $8 billion for nuclear powered submarines; $12 billion for ship borne helicopters over five years; $2.7 billion for a second set of patrol frigates over nine years; $750 million for minesweepers over 10 years; $420 million over 10 years for all terrain troop carriers; $250 million for heavy trucks over approximately four years. The funding for tripling of reserve forces is $9.2 billion over 15 years. The battletanks yet to be announced will cost some $1.8 billion to $2.8 billion over the next five years.

The comparison is $4 billion toward a social program on child care versus that $25 billion. That is the priority and the prudent management, to which the Prime Minister referred a few minutes ago, of this so-called Progressive Conservative Government. What a sham.

What a disgrace that the Government would see less value in preparing the young generation under 14 years of age to grow up in our urban centres and in rural Canada by allocating $4 billion in the next seven years compared to $25 billion to be allocated to defence equipment projects. The Government believes that defence projects must have greater importance, because of our NATO commitment, than the value of our next generation. I find that a form of pornography of power and reverse priority that one could ever see in the history of our country. It is disgraceful and shameful.

If the Minister of National Health and Welfare said today that his measure takes into account all of the requirements of the provinces and the 1.4 million kids for the next seven years, my comparison would have lost its meaning and its impact. I would be the first to admit it. Such a measure would have taken into account the requirements of the provinces and the Territories. Instead, the Minister came in with a measure that meets the needs of only one-seventh of our youth and their respective families. The conclusion is that this measure shows the bankruptcy in terms of social values and priorities of the Government, whose days are numbered. The sooner an election is called, the better.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, we know quite clearly that the Member who spoke is very much against the Bill that has been proposed. However, his Party is opposed to everything the Government has proposed, except Meech Lake. I think the Member himself opposes Meech Lake and therefore opposes everything the Government introduces. Perhaps that is a fault in our system.

We know what his Party opposes. We know that it supports the Senate and the unfettered rule of the Senate. Will he, without any personal attack, tell us what he would like to see in a day care plan and how much it would cost?

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, it is regrettable that the Hon. Member, for whom I have great respect, was not in the House when the Member for Outremont (Mrs. Pepin) made the position of our Party quite clear. She established our Party's position point by point. She analysed for every aspect, and in much greater depth than I, what are the shortcomings and the alternatives that the Liberal Party of Canada would produce. That would take me much longer than the few minutes available to me.

However, they are on the record for everyone to see tomorrow in Hansard. They are also outlined in great detail in a document entitled Choices for Child Care: Now and the Future. I would be glad to supply the Hon. Member with a copy of this document which sets out a very positive Liberal approach to this matter. I know of his sincere interest in these matters.

Our basic position in principle is that we want to focus on the needy first. We would want to take into account the requirements of the low income and middle-income Canadians first as a major priority, to ensure that there is fairness built into the system. That has been the Liberal position on every social measure that has been adopted over the decades. That has been our guiding principle. This is what probably differs from the approach of the Progressive Conservative Government.

• (1930)

As I mentioned in my speech, this measure fails to take into account those youngsters who go home after school to an empty house because their parent or parents work. That is a very serious vacuum which we addressed in our interventions here today.

We also indicated that the requirements of Canadian society in 1988, because of the evolution in the family structure, particularly with respect to single parent families, are such that a much larger number of families must be addressed. I think we have been pretty positive in our criticisms and in defining alternatives. In addition, I took the liberty of comparing the priorities of this Government in the over-all picture by addressing the amount of money that is being made available for this badly needed social measure compared to the Tory defence equipment projects over a parallel period of time.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) about his new-found interest in day care. He has been a Member of this House for a number of years. He was in a previous Cabinet but I have never heard him talk about day care before. This is a revelation. Here is an individual who was in the Liberal Cabinet of Pierre Elliott Trudeau. He was, I must say, a less than effective Minister of the Environment. I never heard him talk about day care. I never heard him advocate day care. I did not see any day care programs whatsoever come out of that administration. I am glad the Hon. Member for Outremont (Mrs. Pépin) is sitting beside him, dropping, I am sure, some hints in his ear, because she understands the problem. I will give her full marks for that.

Great hypocrisy has been shown in the House tonight by the Hon. Member who talks about day care as if he has been an advocate in Davenport for years and years. He has never discussed it before. He has never debated it before. This is the first time he has ever stood up in the House of Commons and talked about day care. What a show of hypocrisy!

I might also point out that the statistics the Hon. Member talked about, comparing day care help and defence expenditures, was playing loose with the truth, and he knows it. The statistics he was giving were all selected figures, some spread over 20 years and some spread over 10 years. He knows full well that the submarine program this Government is talking about will cost the taxpayers of this country one-half of 1 per cent of the social spending in this country. For him to stand up and try to compare the day care figures with defence spending is a total fallacy, and he knows it. He is playing very loose with the truth.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, I am so glad I have touched a raw nerve. I am delighted to see the Parliamentary Secretary angry at being put into a corner to such an extent that all he can say about my intervention is to use the word "hypocrisy". He has run out of steam. He has no other argument. Out of sheer desperation he has to refer to my record as the Minister of the Environment. This is one of the most pathetic arguments I have heard because the record can be seen by anyone. It is just another example of Tory bankruptcy. When one has good ideas, one does not refer to hyprocrisy or former performances, but to the subject matter at hand. We are debating day care tonight.

I am sorry the Parliamentary Secretary did not like former Prime Minister Trudeau. He was a great Prime Minister. I am sorry the Parliamentary Secretary has no positive words to say about him. I served under him and I am proud of that fact. I know there are millions of Canadians who would love to see Mr. Trudeau as Prime Minister of this country any time, any day, to replace the present, weak leader—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret to interrupt. I have given a little more time than necessary, but I would like to cut it off right now. Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate.

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it was, of course, time to cut things off. When the spokesperson for the Liberal Party is hearkening back to the Trudeau era and is making it quite clear that he has no confidence in his present Leader, I think it is time to move on. I did have a question for him but I will ask it another day.

I want to zero in on this whole question of day care, I must say, quite in contrast to what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) did in this House. He covered the waterfront. He talked about things that affect families, but he did not say a great deal about the legislation before us. His speech sounded very much like an election speech. I am surprised that at the end of his speech he did not announce he was going to see the Governor General. Perhaps he is on his way there now.

Day care has been in and out of the headlines of the newspapers for the last couple of years. When the Prime Minister was campaigning before the last election, he made big promises with respect to day care. We then had a couple of commissions and studies which took a look at day care, but the Government's program on day care kept being put off and put off. Finally the program was unveiled and made public. What stands out in my mind, and I am sure it stands out in the minds of most Canadians who observe what is going on in politics, is the headline which stated that the Government was going to spend $6.4 billion on day care. Coming from a Conservative Government this was a surprise because at first glance we had the impression that here was a Government doing something substantial, that here was a Government taking a step forward in the day care field, because $6.4 billion is a lot of money. It sounds like a lot of money and when it is spread across the headlines, one has to be impressed. The time for day care has arrived.

So I am not surprised if many Canadians, at least at this moment, think that the Government is doing something substantial in the area of day care. But if we step back a little from those headlines, from those billion dollar figures, and examine what the Government is doing, perhaps we will get a little perspective on the situation.

The first thing I want to point out is that, of course, it is necessary to make real advances in the area of day care in order to meet the kinds of needs which have emerged over the last couple of decades. We must first begin by comparing the Government's program for day care with the need in the community. If we accept at face value the Government's indication that its program over seven years will produce some 200,000 new day care spaces, clearly that will be an improvement. However, my understanding is that there will still be a couple of million children who will require day care spaces. In other words, the amount of day care spaces being provided is nowhere near what is needed. We can debate the amount of need that exists in the community. We can debate whether all children should be in day care centres. We can debate whether most mothers would prefer to stay home and take care of their children rather than working and having to send their children to day care.

When we use statistics to point out the size of the need in the country some government Members accuse us of being social engineers, or of wanting to regiment society and shove every child into day care. However, in spite of those political points that are being made, and even though those political points may be effective in some quarters, or perhaps are persuasive to some people, it does not erase the reality that the amount of spaces that will be created by the day care program of the Government in no way matches the need.

Over the last two decades increasing numbers of women and increasing numbers of mothers have entered the labour force. Therefore, there is a social revolution. Rather than things being as they once were where the father would be in the workforce and the mother would be at home with the children, this situation has changed radically. If one looks at the statistics, it can be seen that the number of families in which the mother stays home rather than works as well as takes care of the children is in the minority today. For the majority of families the social reality is that both parents are working.

When both parents work we as a society must ask the fundamental questions: "How do we take care of our children? How do we take care of young Canadians? How do we assure ourselves that young children receive the loving, adequate, and competent care that they require in order that they will grow up to be good people, competent, mature individuals, and good citizens?" That is what the day care question is about. It is about the making of mature and responsible human beings.

It is important to note that there are many families in which both parents are working and there is a need for quality care for those children. Those children should not be cared for as a happenstance. The Government has stated that it is spending $6.4 billion on day care. While that makes a big splash and a big impression, the impact on the social reality is a fraction of what is needed. First, that is over seven years, therefore, there is less than $1 billion a year. This is a fast emerging social need that demands a radical restructuring of our spending priorities so that we can find the resources necessary in order to provide the services.

If we put the day care program of the Government in the light of what is required and needed then it falls short of the mark. Some people might say that that is okay because we are making some progress and while some people would like to go faster, we are going as fast as we can.

If we compare what the Government is doing with what is needed, we might accept that as a perspective and as a way of looking at and evaluating the day care program of the Government. If a much more thorough analysis is conducted of the Government's day care program, for example, a budgetary analysis, and we compared the program against what is needed and what was in place already, if we compared the budget for day care that exists today under the Canada Assistance Plan, which has present legislation, budgets, and a track record, with the program the Government is bringing forward now, the Epp program, and if we looked behind the headlines, we would find out something that is quite shocking because it radically changes our perspective on this program. If the present program for day care were left in place, the Canada Assistance Plan, there would be more day care spaces created over the next seven years than there will be under the initiative of the Government.

When I first heard that stated I was short of breath and knocked back. I could not believe it, because I had been reading the headlines and they gave me the impression that the Government was taking a bold initiative. However, when someone took the time to study the details of the program and its budget, they found out that the Government is replacing an existing day care program with a new program that will produce fewer day care spaces than the old program would have. We have a retreat on day care and a cut-back. There is a diminished commitment on day care. In fact, it begins to make a lot of sense. While it would be surprising to see a Conservative Government take bold action on day care, it makes a lot more sense when we understand that it is replacing a program that is in place with a new program that will cost less and produce fewer spaces. That fits much more with our experience of the Government.

When the Government has changed social policies over the last four years it has always meant a lower priority on the scale of social programs, and it has meant fewer dollars for social programs. For example, when the Government decided to do something about old age pensions, what did it do? When government Members spoke in the House they spoke of improvements, but what they attempted to foist on people was a deindexation of the old age pensions and removing the annual cost of living raises that go up with inflation. Over a period of years that would have destroyed the pensions. That is much more typical of the actions of the Government. The point that we must realize is that the Government is introducing a program that will have a less positive impact when it comes to day care than the program that is presently in place.

I wish to return to the question of day care from a different angle. What are the elements that make up a good day care program? I want to take some advice from people who have studied this very closely, particularly the women's organization, the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women. It was established in 1973 as an independent organization funded by the federal Government. The Council's mandate is to advise the Government and inform the public on matters of concern to women.

• (1950)

This is what the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women, who is there to advise Government on day care, says about child care. It ends up with a question, but it says this, that almost two million pre-school children across Canada need child care services because their parents work or study more than 20 hours a week. But there are only 244,000 licensed child care spaces to meet their needs. The federal Government's national child care strategy for the next seven years will do little to address the child care crisis. By 1995, at the end of the seven-year period, only 25 per cent of current need for licence spaces will be met. More than half of the funds allocated by the federal Government to child care during that time will give tax breaks to higher-income parents.

The proposed program will do little to make quality child care services available to all children and families who need it. It does not adequately recognize the contributions of parents who care for children at home.

That is the comment of the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women on the Government's child care strategy. It ends up with a question that it would like to ask Members of Parliament and candidates in the next election, and that is: What steps will your Party take to ensure that publicly-funded, non-profit quality child care services are universally available to all families who need them in the same way that health and education now are?

That is the question that we have to ask the Government. What is it prepared to do to see that there are publicly-funded non-profit quality child care services, universally accessible, in the same manner as health and education? In other words, we would not tolerate a situation in which the vast majority of Canadian children did not have access to health care or did not have access to education, to schools. So why do we tolerate it when it comes to child care? Each of these elements is necessary in order for a child to get a fair chance in our society, to grow up to be a healthy, mature, responsible citizen.

So this Government has failed the challenge of child care. It has failed to bring in a program that is adequate to the need. Not only that, but it has brought in a program that will be producing fewer day care spaces than the existing program. So what it has produced is a fraud, a deception, a sleight of hand. It gives the impression through the headlines that it is taking bold action because you could read figures like $6.4 billion. But if you do a budgetary analysis, you will find it is in fact going to be spending less and creating fewer spaces than if it left things as they were.

The status quo is better than the Tory initiative. That is the sad reality of this day care package that is before this House. That is a tragedy for the children of this society. We would not tolerate a situation in which children did not have a school to go to. We would not tolerate a situation in which children did not have the health care that they needed. Why does this Government ask Canadians to tolerate a situation in which children that need care do not have a child care program available for them? That is the question that this Government has to answer.

I want to sum up by saying that the Government has been shrewd and clever in its management of the news, in its management of the headlines. But when it comes down to the substance, when it comes down to meeting the human needs, it has failed. It has failed to meet the need. In fact, it has done less than what would have been done if it had left things alone. That is a sad commentary but an understandable one.

We know that it is the objective of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) to cut back on social spending. He has indicated that in so many ways in so many areas of social policy. So this day care initiative fits with the objectives of the Minister of Finance, but it does not fit with the children of Canada, with the families of Canada. It fails abysmally, because it does not provide for what is needed. Not only that, but it reduces the commitment of the federal Government in the area of child care.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions or comments.

Mr. Charest: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make some very brief comments and put a question to my colleague. First of all, I would just like to comment slightly by saying that I think people listening tonight will find it a bit incredible that the Hon. Member would even indicate that what the Government is proposing today in terms of a day care policy is worse than the status quo when in fact it is investing $6.7 billion.

It does not require me to yell or to use great rhetoric to put that point across. Canadians listening to us tonight must know that any Government who spends $6.7 billion over a seven-year period, whether it is day care or anything else, is spending a lot of money—taxpayers' money.

An Hon. Member: It could be less.

Mr. Charest: To just discard the policy, whether it is on day care or anything else, on such an issue is a challenge to the mind. How anybody could get up in the House of Commons and so blatantly push away such a policy is just incredible, it is a challenge to the mind. But then again, I guess if you are from the NDP, such challenges once in a while creep up and occur.

The question I want to put to the Hon. Member is of great interest to provincial governments, and to the provincial Government of the Province of Quebec. I know it is of some concern and I know also that the Members and their Party as well as the official critic have been saying that this legislation lacks in specifics on national norms, and it is their position that the legislation should include something very precise on that very issue. I want to know from the New Democratic Party of Canada how far they are ready to go in implementing what they thing should be national norms. The provincial Governments would certainly like to know.

Mr. Keeper: Mr. Speaker, I must say I welcome my colleague's question. He makes the point that I made when I opened my speech. He said it is incredible that a Government that spends $6.4 billion is worse than the status quo. Well, on first blush, he makes sense in what he is saying. That is where the challenge comes in. The thing is, you just do not take a look at $6.4 billion in a vacuum. You have to compare it to what present government expenditures are and what are present government plans and programs for spending in the future. When you compare it on that level, what is revealed, once you pull away this curtain, is that in fact the new program will produce fewer day care spaces than the existing federal government programs. That is the interesting reality. People should get a chance to understand those facts.

I think that the Government's play for the headlines is not going to work as a political gambit. This is the first thing. The second thing was how far we would go with regard to national mores, which is what I think the Member said. Well, what we believe in this Party is that, when you establish a national social program such as day care, you must have national objectives. A responsible Government will say that this is the kind of program that we want, this is the kind of program that will provide for the day care needs and the child care needs of the nation. Then, of course, provinces can buy into the program and become involved.

First of all, you have to have the political leadership out of this Chamber and you have to have some accountability for those funds, accountability in terms of a national objective. The sad part of this program is that it is a program that gives no national direction. It turns over a pot of money to the provinces. It gives a global funding arrangement by which provinces can do whatever they want with the money, obviously in the day care field, but they can still do whatever they want. It is a hands-off approach, Mr. Speaker. It is the nightmare of Meech Lake. Rather than use the opportunity for political leadership and the opportunity to provide some direction, it takes a hands-off approach and says that the provinces can do whatever they want.

I disagree with our Liberal colleague who spoke earlier and who blamed this on the Meech Lake Accord. I would not blame it on the Meech Lake Accord. Given the Meech Lake Accord, you must have political leadership at the national level in order to provide direction so that you can have good national programs. If the federal Government had taken this approach when it came to the establishment of medicare, we would not have medicare in this country. I say to my colleague that we need to have national objectives. Then we will have set standards whereby the provincial Governments and the federal administration can be held accountable for the expenditures of those moneys according to the national objectives.

Mr. Charest: I have a very short supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I think Canadians from the Province of Quebec will find it of particular interest that the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Keeper) from the New Democratic Party would describe this piece of legislation—if I heard him correctly—as the nightmare of Meech Lake. I want to know from him whether he intends, along with the Leader of his Party, because we are approaching a federal election in the next few months to a year, to enter the Province of Quebec and campaign specifically on that issue with regard to this legislation.

Mr. Keeper: Mr. Speaker, all I would say is that you can have a Meech Lake nightmare and you can also have a Meech Lake dream. This Government has chosen the nightmare. It has chosen not to provide political leadership. If you want to have a dream, you have to provide leadership and direction. That is possible under our Constitution. The nightmare in this situation is that the Government has abdicated its responsibility to provide political leadership. The Government is abusing the Meech Lake Accord in that way. It is saying: "Okay, we will leave direction for day care to the provinces and we will provide no national leadership".

Mr. Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to comment. The Minister of State for Youth and for Fitness and Amateur Sport (Mr. Charest) works within the ambit of the Department of National Health and Welfare. We understand why he is putting in a good word for his boss, the Minister. I must say that my colleague labelled this the "Epp plan" and then later on called it a fraud and deception. Members will appreciate that I might have felt those observations rather keenly.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): If you allow me a moment or two, Mr. Speaker, to get precisely to the point, I would like to remind Canadians that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) in early 1985 published a paper on child benefits in which he promised that there would not be a reduction in child benefits and if there were in any part of that, the money would stay within the envelope, in the jargon of the federal Government, so it would not be lost to families. The same Minister was forced by September, 1985, to concede that there would be through deindexation of the family allowance, a reduction in child benefits which would be a loss to families because he would not, in fact, keep the money in his area of spending. He made no particular apology for having taken up the imperatives of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) and, in the process, broke his word to Canadian families.

Though I might at first be inclined to feeling a little piqued at this harsh description of the "Epp plan" on child care, those Canadians who are watching and wondering whether my friend is telling the truth about a plan that can represent over the next seven years less spending if it is put into effect than would occur if the existing arrangements under the Canada Assistance Plan, dating from the mid-1960s remain in effect, and if provinces take up the opportunity to provide child care under that joint funding arrangement between Ottawa and the provincial Governments of this country, it is possible.

My colleague says that this could be less spending, even if the Minister who has been commenting cannot believe that and finds it too much for his mind, but I must say that in working with youth he should be capable of understanding almost anything. The possibility that a Minister in the Conservative Government, as my friend has said very rightly, might be involved in just this kind of fraudulent game on the Canadian public seems to me quite possible, given the record of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. He has yielded to Tuxedo and River Heights before against the interest of Steinbach and Ste. Anne, and he has done it one more time.

Mr. Keeper: Mr. Speaker, when I spoke about the "Epp plan", obviously I was thinking more of Jake than of Ernie. When I said that it was a deception, I really was not trying to say that it was a "dis-Epp-tion". I was trying to say that it seemed to me to be misleading. I hope that I have not insulted my colleague. I certainly stand by my critique of the day care program of the Government.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Charest (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your customary generosity. The Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) wants me to go easy on the compliments, Mr. Speaker, but I warn you I will ignore his advice. I intend to express my appreciation of your excellent work in the Chair and your immense patience as well. We all know it is not an easy job, Mr. Speaker, because every single day, and even at night, because we are working overtime . . . This is not just the usual extended hours. We are working on extended hours during the summer, Mr. Speaker, and during all that time you have to listen to speeches by the New Democratic Party.

An Hon. Member: It is not easy.

Mr. Charest: I think we may have to review your income supplement because the job is worth more. It is worth . . . I do not know if we could ever pay you enough . . .

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Charest: . . . in return for what you have to endure in the course of a single evening.

An Hon. Member: The father of multiculturalism.

Mr. Charest: Mr. Speaker, earlier I said to my colleague from the New Democratic Party that we had trouble sitting here listening to one of their speeches that contained, substantially, the following statement. The New Democratic Party tells us that this program worth $6 . . .

Mr. Della Noce: . . . $6.4 billion . . .

Mr. Charest: . . . $6.4 billion which will be spent over a period of about seven years is peanuts. They would prefer to keep the status quo. They would rather turn back the clock. They would rather not spend $6.4 billion in taxpayer's money.

If that is any indication of what we can expect during the next election campaign, there will not be much to fear. This is what is referred to in Quebec as the "Capitaine Bonhomme" technique. "Capitaine Bonhomme" used to say, and we even heard it said by the Hon. Member for Terrebonne (Mr. Toupin) when he was sitting with the NPD, when he shouted from the other side of the House that "les sceptiques seraient confondus"... Well, "Capitaine Bonhomme" seems to be in charge of the New Democratic Party's campaign committee.

Mr. Speaker, there are a number of reasons why the Government decided to introduce this Bill and this policy. Today, we are specifically considering the Bill, but there is also a general strategy of which this Bill is a part. In recent years, there were a number of developments in our society that made our Government decide to react. These are developments that in fact all political parties are able to recongnize. We agree on that. There is for instance the fact, and this has already been mentioned, that women are entering the labour market in increasing numbers. It is not for us to judge whether it is a good or a bad thing. It is a fact of life. I think it is a good thing. I think women have the right to do so just as men did before. People no longer question their right to enter the labour market, and if they make that choice, just as men make the same choice, they should be allowed to do so.

So this is one factor making child care services increasingly important. There are other factors besides, Mr. Speaker. Family structure in our society has changed, for all sorts of reasons, good or bad; again, we are not to judge that today, but, for example, there are more and more single-parent families. So there are more and more women who are single mothers with children and who have to take care of them and at the same time earn their living; they must work. The children must still be cared for. These women, like so many others, do not make much money and child care services are important—that is another important factor.

Mr. Champagne (Champlain): The NDP does not understand that.

Mr. Charest: My colleague from Champlain (Mr. Champagne) says that the New Democratic Party does not understand that. I would not have said that, Mr. Speaker, but I tend to agree with him. I did not say it.

So, Mr. Speaker, added to that, and I think that we have not talked much about the changes within the labour market itself . . . We tend to think these days that in this modern era, investment, modernization and all that will bring jobs. Whenever we announce subsidies, for example, we try to help companies in the regions through regional economic development. From time to time, we automatically think that this means jobs. That is not always true, Mr. Speaker. You know, investing and modernizing sometimes mean loss of employment and it is difficult to put that in context. But we modernize to be more competitive.

Canada is an exporting country, and it is probably one of the few countries in the world that depends to such a great extent on exports as a percentage of its gross domestic product. There is also West Germany, and in fact we are both very close. Since Canada is an exporting country, we have to invest and we have to be competitive as a country, and sometimes that means losing jobs. All that to reach a simple conclusion! This means that changes in the labour market are important. For instance, the number of jobs in the service sector in Canada is increasing. In the forties, about 40 per cent of jobs were in the service industry in this country, while by 1986, it was 75 per cent. What this means? Well traditionally, women are more highly represented in the service sector than they are in any other industry. Ironically, and I say ironically in referring to the last two years, women have performed well on the labour market because of shifts in the kind of jobs available. Such shifts are not unique to Canada. They are a worldwide phenomenon. It means more and more part-time work, sometimes temporary work, which is another facet of the situation of women on the labour market and in fact of whole families.

Mr. Speaker, one aspect that has not been discussed today is the role played by men, because in recent years, the emphasis has been on discussing what the role of women should be in the family, on the labour market and so forth, but men are also changing the way they live. Men enter the labour market, their jobs change, they are displaced by new technology, and they are asked to play an increasingly important role in terms of society's values with respect to men. I noticed in the course of this debate that there have been very few references to the changing roles of men, and I know something about the subject. The Hon. Member for Champlain (Mr. Champagne) knows about this and the Hon. Member for Chambly (Mr. Grisé) as well. We have young families, we have young children and all that, and our roles are changing as well. There is another person who is knowledgeable on the subject, Mr. Speaker, and I am proud to refer to our Prime Minister.

An Hon. Member: He changes diapers.

Mr. Charest: He is very close to his family, and Members on both sides of the House have seen for themselves that he is very much attached to his family and his wife. It is a marvelous sight. People think he is promoting certain values, but he is also keenly aware, and I have discussed the matter with him, of the fact that men have to change their attitudes within the family unit. It's all very well to put all the mechanisms in place, but men will have to do more. They will have to redefine and share to a greater extent the responsibilities within the family unit.

That being said, it is clear, Mr. Speaker, that we need more day care. We need more day care so that these people can live, can develop and participate fully in the labour market and in Canadian society, because that is what we mean by participation in our society.

I see the Hon. Member for Outremont (Mrs. Pépin) who is joining us. Please sit down and join us! It's nice to see you again. So the Hon. Member for Outremont is with us again, and I am delighted to see her, because I have some comments and questions. However, we all agree that these needs exist and that these changes are taking place. We are probably more sensitive to the changing roles of men in our Party, since the other parties never even mentioned the subject. We decided to talk about it this evening. There is a problem, however, when we talk about the means for bringing about these changes.

Members of the New Democratic Party have already told us what they thought of our approach. We intend to spend $6.7 billion, and their answer was that it was peanuts, did not mean a thing and was regressive. I would like to know how many people are sitting in Sherbrooke this evening in that beautiful riding of mine who are going to believe that. These are people who already pay taxes every Thursday. Just imagine, their paycheck arrives, part of it is taken away, and the New Democratic Party tells them that $6.7 billion is peanuts! They want to take the rest of your paycheck as well! What really worries me is that they are going to deduct so much income tax from my constituents' paychecks in the riding of Sherbrooke that they will not be able to afford the day care the Government wants to give them. In any case, that is another problem.

As far as the practical side is concerned, the Government wanted to establish a policy that would respect the jurisdiction of the provinces, because after all we are in Canada and not in the United States or Great Britain. Policies are not developed in a vacuum. They evolve within the constitutional reality of this country which provides that the provinces have certain jurisdictions. And the Province of Quebec, and this should be of interest to the Hon. Member for Outremont, also has its own jurisdiction. If we discuss the matter with our counterparts in Quebec, I am sure they would be interested to talk to you about their jurisdiction.

In the Bill before the House today, Mr. Speaker, we appreciate that reality and we want to make certain adjustments. The New Democratic Party and the federal Liberal Party of Canada do not recognize that reality. I know that. I have already heard what they had to say in the House. They claim, for instance, that we are not setting national standards and are not showing any leadership.

Mr. Speaker, let's be honest. What they are saying is totally false.

An Hon. Member: They did nothing for twenty years!

Mr. Charest: We have to call a spade a spade. It's just not true.

The Bill contains some very clear indications in that respect. The standards that we ask the provinces to develop and implement include (1) the child:care-giver ratio; (2) the qualifications of the day care staff; (3) the size of the groups by age and type of care; (4) health and safety measures; and the nature of parental participation, Mr. Speaker. What we plan to enforce those standards, Mr. Speaker, is specific agreements with the provinces recognizing, for example, that Quebec may be more advanced than the other provinces. Are you going to deny that? You see, they almost agree with us. I am sure that the Hon. Member for Outremont will vote for the Bill at this rate.

Are Quebec and Ontario, for example, as advanced as other provinces like New Brunswick, for example? Are they as advanced in New Brunswick as in Ontario, Mr. Speaker? To ask the question is to answer it. Basically, what is wrong with a Bill that recognizes these realities? Do we always have to act as if that were not the case or must we, the federal Government, always impose our will on everything? It is not necessary, Mr. Speaker, when you want to do things that work, practical things out in the field. When the time comes to act, when choices have to be made, when you have to implement what was discussed, be it in 15 or 20 years when they were in power or in our case, in the space of one mandate, the reasonable time we took to put this together, when that time comes, these realities must be recognized. Something must be done for those people. That is exactly what this Bill does.

There are three main objectives. Our national policy can also be divided into three parts, more or less. First, what we are trying to do, looking at the objectives as a whole, is to develop a flexible strategy, one that respects the parents' right to choose. Imagine, Mr. Speaker, we as a party—this may surprise you because I know . . . Not you, excuse me, it will not surprise you. We have great respect for your intelligence, Mr. Speaker, but it surprises the people on the other side, both in the federal Liberal Party and in the New Democratic Party. Imagine that—we want to let parents choose. What a sin! What a scandal to presume that Canadians can have the intelligence to choose what to do with their own tax money! We will have a choice soon, Mr. Speaker, you see, because another Government would take their money and tell them that is the way it is. Not only will they take your money, they will take twice as much. We will take twice as much, as the New Democratic Party would say, and we will give you no choice because we know what is good for you.

Mr. Speaker, we believe we are past that stage. Because people are intelligent. Earlier they referred to the fact I am Minister of State (Youth). True, I am the Minister of State (Youth), but I do not claim I know our young people very well, in the sense that I do not know each choice of each individual. But I know them well enough to know that they want to have a choice, they want to make their own choice. They want to be treated as full partners in our Canadian society.

The legislation recognizes that reality.

We also want to ensure that child care is accessible, affordable, and of better quality. This is what we are aiming at.

So this Government uses three major approaches. There is increased tax assistance to families, Mr. Speaker—this is the first approach, an important approach that will put some money into their pockets through the tax system. The second approach is the new fund for child care project implementation, and there you will see a certain diversity in the approaches taken, recognizing the fact there is no magic solution, no uniform solution for everyone, and what we aim to do through that new fund, Mr. Speaker, is for instance to give an opportunity to those who want to offer specialized services, to submit project proposals.

As I am speaking, Mr. Speaker, this Government is accepting projects, examining them through National Health and Welfare, in order that a group wanting to have a project for handicapped children in a child care centre can do so. It is important to be able to recognize those differences. This is what we mean when we refer to the right of choice. Because not all people are alike. We cannot have a ready-made system that will fit everyone because there are for instance ethnic groups, and they can chose to submit a special project.

Groups with handicapped children for instance can make that choice. There are all kinds of reasons, all kinds of differences that make our society richer in all kinds of ways, and this we would like to recognize through that program.

Through the legislation indeed. Of course, the legislation now before us.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me offer a remark that goes a little beyond the subject at hand this evening, but that is directly linked to the legislation and the result expected from this legislation. The question we must ask now as we sit in this House, after the decision taken by the Leader of the Liberal Party of Canada (Mr. Turner) is this: Will he or will he not instruct the Senate to block this legislation?

Because as you see, Mr. Speaker, the votes of Canadian men and women is not good enough any more. Because if today you are a federal Liberal, Mr. Speaker, you can decide what is good or what is bad, no matter how the people voted. The vote of each Canadian man and woman has been reduced, diminished that very day the Leader of the Liberal Party of Canada (Mr. Turner) stooped himself to block Government legislation in the Senate, on free trade of course. That is what I am talking about. Even though he promised to tear up the deal as soon as he would be elected leader of this country, he changes his mind, he turns around, and claims that no, a non-elected Senate does have the right and will be asked to show its expertise in filibustering.

In other words, in order to protect, and it is a real challenge to understand the reasoning behind this whole thing, Mr. Speaker, in order to protect democracy, John Turner decides to deny democracy. That is the new philosophy of the federal Liberal Party. You've got to see it to believe it! A few months ago, this same man, Mr. Speaker, while being stabbed in the back by half the members of his own caucus, was referring to the democratic process by which he was elected. In 1986, more than half the members of his caucus told him to quit and leave his Party and stabbed him in the back. And where was he during all this time? We know! He was going through a very difficult time, a very painful family ordeal, while half of his caucus, more than half of his caucus were democratically stabbing him in the back and telling him to quit. And what did John Turner say? Democracy, my friends! In November 1986, 76 per cent of our delegates elected me leader of the Party. I have the right to retain my position, based on the democratic fundamental principle of our country. Now, a few months later, he changes his mind and says: Let us forget about democracy! The non-elected Liberal Senate can now start filibustering.

Mr. Speaker, I only mention this because in a few months Canadians will have the opportunity to vote, and, in fact, to make a big decision. They will have to determine the value of their vote for all subsequent elections. If the strategy used by the Canadian Senate, and by the federal Liberal Party of Canada, ever succeeds, from that time on, the value of the voting right of each and every Canadian will be diminished, and a Bill like this one would be jeopardized by a leader as weak as John Turner, and a party as weak and as undemocratic as the federal Liberal Party of Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments. The Hon. Member for Outremont (Mrs. Pépin).

Mrs. Pépin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of State for Youth who seems to know everything about day care centres . . . in fact, he seems to know a lot of things. He made a case for day care centres by referring to the Senate and the Liberal Party.

I wish he would give me more details because the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) has had a lot to say about the war his Governement is waging against drugs and cocaine. As it happens, one preventive program against juvenile delinquency would involve extracurricular day care centres for children aged 6 to 14. We also know that 57 per cent of these children are alone after school hours.

Since he mentioned the Province of Quebec I am telling him that it is one of the crucial problems facing Quebec—I mean extracurricular centres—because it is the only province which makes grants to support this kind of day care centres.

So what does his Government intend to do to promote day care centres, because there is no reference to them in the legislation? Clause 2 even excludes services relating to education.

Mr. Charest: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the Hon. Member for Outremont (Mrs. Pepin) should ask me that question, particularly as it relates to Quebec and fields of jurisdiction.

We on this side are somewhat taken aback by the statements made by the federal Liberal Party of Canada, especially by her colleague the Hon. Member for Hamilton East (Ms. Copps) and by herself, the Hon. Member for Outremont, to the effect that the legislation fails to give a clear definition of the standards, that the standards are not clear enough.

What I would like to know is just how far the federal Liberal Party of Canada is prepared to go to impose these standards and how far it is prepared to go to impose them within the Province of Quebec.

Can the Hon. Member for Outremont tell us whether she knows the answer to that question, because I would like to know. I would like to know what they will tell Quebecers about the standards.

Mr. Speaker, in response to her question, she knows full well that the legislation provides for agreements. I can tell you that our objective is to be as flexible as possible so that we will be able to acknowledge the legitimate options of the provinces while taking into consideration their needs and, if you will, how far they have progressed in the day care sector.

Still the Hon. Member for Outremont ought to be able to tell us whether or not the Liberal Party of Quebec is at one with the federal Liberal Party of Canada when it comes to the question of standards. Do they agree with them, yes or no?

[English]

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I have a comment and I want to direct a question to the Minister. My comment is that his speech was excellent in its rhetoric but a failure in its substance. He seemed afraid to answer questions. He was afraid to answer the question of the Hon. Member for Outremont (Mrs. Pépin). Therefore, I want to ask him a question.

As I understand it, the Meech Lake Accord permits establishment of national objectives for new social programs which the federal Government funds. Child care is a new social program which the federal Government is funding. Why did the Government not put in place standards for the provinces? The provinces are getting all this money and are essentially going to set up child care.

I have a further question for the Minister and I would ask him to answer it. Does he believe that the federal Government should set up standards when it gives money like this to the provinces?

• (2030)

Mr. Charest: Mr. Speaker, we are witnessing at this time the old school of thought of the NDP, the New Democratic Party of the late 1980s versus the early 1980s New Democratic Party of Canada, the one that voted with the federal Liberal Party to repatriate the Constitution even though the Quebec National Assembly had voted unanimously against that. There are two schools of thought in the New Democratic Party. We heard one of them tonight and at this point in time are witnessing the other school of thought.

The Hon. Member for Vancouver—Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) has expressed his opposition to the Meech Lake Accord with some conviction and has paid a price for that. He is asking us, in the context of his personal opposition, which is not consistent with the position of his own Party, for our answer on the question of national norms.

The first answer is obvious although it may not be obvious to the Hon. Member. I say that respectfully because the Hon. Member operates on a centralized premise. He sees Canada as having a centralized government. The fact is that there are different jurisdictions in Canada. This legislation recognizes those different jurisdictions. There should be nothing surprising about the fact that the provinces have jurisdiction in this.

Through this legislation we recognize the specific areas in which the federal Government, with the provinces, wants to establish some norms including the ratio between children and those who keep them; the qualifications of the personnel; the sizes of the groups, their ages and types; regulations on health and security; and the nature of parental participation. These are all things provided for in the legislation and they should be consistent with the way in which Canada operates.

[Translation]

Mr. Hamelin: Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to my colleague, of course. The Opposition speaks a lot about national standards... Here is my question: Would my colleague consider, as the Opposition no doubt does, that the government of Alberta and the parents in that province have lower standards concerning the security and safety of buildings? In Newfoundland or British Columbia, for example, are people less concerned about employee qualifications? Are we to consider, and this is the question I ask my colleague, that some Canadian parents and some provincial governments are less responsible than others towards the children of this country?

Mr. Charest: Mr. Speaker, that is a very good question from my colleague from Charlevoix (Mr. Hamelin), whom I recognize...

An Hon. Member: You have to make it easy for him!

Mr. Charest: ... as a great advocate of the people and whom I commend for the excellent work he has done on Bill C-72, for example. He will no doubt go down in the history of our Party as someone who has made a substantial contribution.

Actually, what he is telling me a little ironically, I must say, is that the Opposition thinks that everybody should be the same, that everybody should be in the same boat. Their vision of the country is that everybody should be put on the same conveyor belt, should be stamped and approved from above...

Do you know to what extent, Mr. Speaker, this is true? Just yesterday, as Wayne Gretzky was being traded because he had decided to join his wife... That's the way it is, Mr. Speaker, where the wife goes, the husband must follow! He decided to join his wife in Los Angeles. The New Democratic Party suggested that the transaction be stopped, that the marriage of Mrs. Wilson and Mr. Gretzky be cancelled immediately and that a warrant for the arrest of Wayne Gretzky be issued so that he can be put in jail when he returns to Canada. How scandalous! They will soon have the choice. Theirs would be kind of government where everybody and everything would be the same. One need only go out a bit in the world to realize that things are not the same everywhere.

Mr. Speaker, we must not be afraid to live in a world where people are different. It is not because they are different that we must be afraid. Differences make us richer. They make for a varied world. We must not be afraid to recognize differences among people.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now over. On debate, the Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) has the floor.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the Minister is delighted to see that the question and comment period is over. He has nearly lost his voice from so much shouting. It is to be feared that if he should continue like this, he could choke again, Mr. Speaker.

I do not think there is a single Member in this House who is now fully aware of just how important this debate on Bill C-144 is. I am one of those who would like to emphasize the impact this Bill is likely to have on their ridings and, if I may, I should like to refer to a survey which was carried out not so long ago on this issue in my own riding and share with my colleagues its findings.

But before coming to the heart of the matter, I should like first of all to state unequivocally that the needs do exist. It is a well established fact. Several commissions of inquiry have already made a number of recommendations, the issue has been thorougly examined, so that the time now is for action and not for further studies.

[English]

I do not think there is any argument on the need for an increase in adequate child care spaces in Canada. That has been fully explained and documented over the years, as far back as the Royal Commission on the Status of Women in 1970.

I want to put on the record a statement made by my leader on October 26, 1986. At that time he stated on The Nation's Business:

> "We in the Liberal Party believe that any child care system must be based on two principles: 1) sharing the burden and 2) providing choices.
> Our proposal is that parents, the private sector, and provincial and federal governments will share the costs. It will be a mixed program, with more facilities and help for those who do not have access to the facilities—particularly in rural areas."

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, several Members of this House have clearly demonstrated today that child care has become a social issue. Canadian families have experienced dramatic changes over the past twenty years as a result of an increasing shift in population towards urban areas in an effort to adapt to a more modern way of life. Things have changed gradually so that now traditional families with only one bread winner are now a minority and we see more and more the advent of new families structures. Take, for instance, the case of single parent families. They represent 20 per cent of all the families in my riding; in other words, one in every five families is a single parent family and 90 per cent of them with children. Nowadays, there are childless couples, families with two bread winners, families which are entirely different from those which existed 25 or 30 years ago, and we must create the social structures to meet the important challenge we are faced with in 1988, namely, how to deal with the children, and especially those who need day care because both their parents are part of the labour force.

Thanks to a questionnaire which I circulated in my riding a few months ago, I came to the realization that a great many of my constituents are very much interested in this issue.

According to Statistics Canada's most recent report, there are 19,265 families in my constituency. Of that number, 8,180 do not have children at home and 3,635 are single-parent families, including 3,075 headed by women. There is a total of 18,520 children at home, including 4,325 aged six years or less. They are the ones needing day care services.

Besides the changes I was talking about earlier, there is a large increase in the number of women in the workforce, particularly those with children under six. In 1967, 16 per cent of those women were in the workforce whereas now, 20 years later, that number is 56 per cent among women with children aged three years or less and 63 per cent among those with children between three and five. It is a radical change.

Therefore, we see right away that something must be done to help those women and families take care of their children because it is the next generation of Canadians that is at stake.

Mr. Speaker, it is essentially the economic conditions which caused the changes I was talking about. Since 1960, the purchasing power of single-income families has not stopped decreasing. That has put more and more pressure on those families and forced many of their members to work outside the home. The reality is that 44 per cent of Canadian families now rely on both spouses to bring home the money required to support the household. It is a reality that we, as responsible lawmakers, must take into account.

For millions of children currently needing day care services because both their parents are in the workforce, there are only 250,000 spaces in public child care centres, which barely meet 15 per cent of the demand. It is not enough, we know it, something must be done.

Because there are not enough spaces in day care centres children must put up with day care services of lesser quality, constantly change sitters or, worse, be kept under the care of persons whose qualifications are doubtful if not inexistent. That, Mr. Speaker, is not what we consider as adequate in many cases.

Parents who have been able to find acceptable day care services still have a problem: professional services cost a great deal. One must be ready to pay between $4,000 and $6,000 a year per child.

As an example, I was discussing this problem some time ago with my parliamentary assistant whose wife works outside the home. They have two children. They are among those in my riding who have been able to find a quality day care centre. They are satisfied with the quality of service provided at the centres their two children go to.

However, that couple must pay $500 a month for the four-year old child and more than $800 a month for the one-year-old. That amounts to more than $1,300 a month for the two children, or $15,600 a year for the assistant of a Member of Parliament who is not paid a high salary. Unfortunately, we cannot pay our assistants as much as we would like to, we are on a tight budget, but I know that in order to pay $15,600 a year of family income for day care this individual is making sacrifices. Mr. Speaker, those parents tried for a while to answer their need for day care but economic conditions are getting too much for them. Considering the amounts I have just cited, we can see how much more difficult to solve my assistant's problem can be for other low or middle income Canadian families.

Day care services will therefore be restricted more and more to an elite who can afford to pay what they cost. That is not what we mean when we talk about reforming the system, giving Canadians the day care services they need.

We can see it is urgent to solve the problem. But the need to act does not mean forsaking the opportunity to review the problems to be solved and the ways to solve them.

Mr. Speaker, I think that there are two ways that the Government tries to help families with children and we know that for many years, billions of dollars have been spent to help Canadian families meet their needs.

Mr. Speaker, we now spend $5 billion a year through the tax system to help Canadian families with children. First, there are government benefits for families with children. These families enjoy several programs collectively known as the Child Benefits Plan. They are family allowances, the child tax credit and the tax exemption for dependent children.

In 1984-85, net expenditures for the Child Benefits Plan were $4.09 billion and it is estimated that in 1986, $4.82 billion was spent on this budget item.

The other aspect is child care services. In addition to government financial support for child care, this service takes four forms: (1) the income tax deduction for child care expenses; (2) sharing the cost of subsidized child care services for low-income families with the provinces under the Canada Assistance Plan, which has existed for many years, as we know.

When I hear my colleagues from the Government side say that the previous Government never did anything... They cannot be serious, because for many years, there have been both tax programs and direct assistance programs to help Canadian families meet their needs to raise children.

Third are the training allowances for parents taking courses sponsored by Employment and Immigration Canada.

It is well known today that training programs are available to Canadian men and women and that if they need child care services, the federal Government provides financial contributions to that end.

Fourth, there are contributions by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development for child care services and Day care services in Indian reserves. Those four measures have cost about 224 millions dollars in 1984, according to the last figures available.

Those amounts seem high at first, but one must not forget that the deduction for child care expenses benefits primarily high revenue families and only if they can provide receipts. That as is very important!

As we have seen earlier, those who can afford to pay more than 1,000 $ a month in child care expenses are entitled to a tax break, but not those who have inadequate or almost non-existent revenues.

Assistance is provided to low revenue families through the Cost Sharing Program of the Public Assistance Program of Canada, but less than 20 per cent of eligible children six years old or less have benefited from this program up to now.

Furthermore, some measures allow families to raise their children. There are the family allowances which have been in existence for many years, as well as the child tax credit, the tax deduction for children. Unfortunately, all those have been reduced, Mr. Speaker. They have been reduced by the Mulroney Government through desindexation.

This has had a serious impact on poor and low income families. According to figures available to us, every family will lose ground in 1990 with the deindexation of those tax measures.

The situation is therefore urgent. It has to be dealt with. We, in the Liberal party, believe in the major principles which must underlie this reform of assistance to child care services. So, before dealing with the Government Bill, that is C-144, I want to recall the principles stated in several reports, but more recently in the minority report presented to the committee by my colleague, the Hon. Member for Outremont (Mrs. Pépin), entitled Choices for Child Care: Now and in the Future, dated March 1987. Mr. Speaker, this document has to be read, for it represents a serious approach and gives an alternative which could in my opinion provide us with a good solution.

First of all, we believe in the value of the parents' role. In order for them to be able to care for their children, we have to create programs of parental leave, flexible working hours, work sharing, etc. It is difficult, I grant you that, but it is not impossible. We will have to use our imagination, innovate a little, but that is the challenge we are facing in the workplace today. As we know, more and more businesses and industries provide and must continue to provide day care services, because that may be the solution to some of the problems.

Second, we need quality services which will guarantee the full development of the children. Child care is not a mere physical surveillance. These children are the next generation of citizens and the services we provide must prepare them to achieve their full development. In that respect, the school system is the most elaborate and valued child care system we have. The youngest should not, because of their age, be neglected. Young children are young human beings and they have the right to be treated as such. To that end, we will have to set and enforce basic standards dealing with accommodation, programs and staff training to ensure a good emotional, intellectual and social development of our children.

The third main principle is the development of institutions to implement over the years a comprehensive child care system of good quality, everywhere in Canada.

Fourth, there is the important principle of justice and equity. What does it mean? It means that assistance must go to the families most in need and that all families in the same situation must share the same opportunities.

The fifth objective is social justice, which means that the cost of child care must be shared equally among beneficiaries, namely governments, parents and employers.

The sixth objective is the harmonization of programs between provinces. I touched on a similar aspect a few minutes ago when I talked about the principle of equity between families. We think that all Canadians must have access to the same or a comparable level of service throughout the country, regardless of their province of residence. We will always object to a double or triple standard within Canada. There must be national standards for child care services as there are for health services. It is absolutely essential.

Lastly, there is the question of fiscal accountability. We saw that the amounts involved are very substantial. We are talking several billion dollars. Therefore, it is essential that there be some kind of accountability to ensure that the funds provided to provinces are used according to the objectives set by the federal government. I believe in the sharing of powers between the various jurisdictions. However, since child care services is a federal initiative funded by the federal Government, it seems to me that it is just common sense that there be some kind of accountability for those programs.

Mr. Speaker, those were the objectives that we, Liberals, want to have included in any legislation on child care. And not only the Liberals favour them, Mr. Speaker, but Canadian people do too. As I said earlier, I polled the constituents in my riding of Ottawa—Vanier on this issue. The responses I got confirm what I just said. Out of 1,404 people who answered, 1,192 or 85 per cent think that the parents should pay all or part of the child care expenses, which brings forward the matter of social responsibility that I mentioned earlier.

As well, 33 per cent believe that the system should be universal and 56 per cent stated that such a program should only be offered to families in need. Moreover 59 per cent of the people in my riding of Ottawa—Vanier favor a system of funding based on revenues supplemented by some form of government assistance. This is what I was talking about when speaking of new trends in the workplace. Fifty per cent of the respondents favour child care services at the workplace.

In my riding, people agree with the establishment of child care services, but they remain realistic and believe in family responsibility, in a fair funding of child care and in helping families in need. As for us, we endorse those objectives and believe furthermore that any family in need should have access to the best child care services which should be offered according to the paying capacity of theses families.

Mr. Speaker, when looking at the Government proposal to solve this problem, we realize that the Tories have once again missed the boat. As I have said, the main problem is the lack of spaces since only 15 per cent of the needs are presently fulfilled. Some two millions additionnal places ought to be created. However, the government wishes to respond to the problem mainly with tax credits.

With a $6.4 billion budget over seven years, they intend to allocate a little less than $4 billion in cost-sharing programs with the provinces towards the creation of additional spaces.

Mr. Speaker, a refundable tax credit is contrary to the principle of a fair family treatment since every family will be getting $200 more over two years, going from $500 to $700, no matter what their needs are and whether they in fact spend that sum on child care. Tax credit will in no way contribute to the creation of new spaces, while funds targetted for the creation of new spaces will be too scarce to allow for a universal access to child care services.

The number of profitable child care services will increase as a result of Bill C-144 which will provide families with more money for day care while not contributing the necessary funds to create additional spaces in public or non profit organizations.

Mr. Speaker, this is the kind of approach the Governement has chosen to take. I doubt it is the right one, but it is its choice having been elected to govern. The Government has failed to show leadership in that area. I blame it for that. But is not the first time it surrenders its national responsibilities.

The issue of national standards which was mentionned earlier and discussed on many occasions before, is a fondamental issue since the federal Government must maintain some kind of parity between various programs under different jurisdictions as a result of its constitutionnal or financial involvment.

Canadians are entitled to the same services wherever they live in Canada. That is a fundamental point, a matter of justice and fairness, and the Government is to be blamed for not having established national standards in this legislation. He is introducing a bill on child care . . .

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Are there questions or comments for the Hon. Member? The Hon. Member for York South—Weston on a question or comment.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, I was very interested in my colleague's speech, and I noted you cut him off in mid-sentence. I would like to ask my colleague what he was about to say before his time expired.

Mr. Gauthier: Well, Mr. Speaker, I was just about to terminate my speech by saying that we of the Liberal Party would like to see Bill C-144 contain some substantive and national standards so that Canadians could have pure, unobstructed access to quality day care on a universal basis. I would like to tell Hon. Members in closing that in my view, the Government, once again, has missed the boat. It has not taken up the challenge before us, that is, to cope with the demand for spaces in day care centres, and I regret that very much.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a couple of questions, if I may, to the Hon. Member for Ottawa Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) who has just spoken. I have been a Member of this House since 1979 and I recall that it was his Party which was in Government from 1980 to 1984. I recall there were many groups from my constituency of Burnaby and, indeed, from British Columbia and across Canada, who urged the then Liberal Government to move forward and deal with the very serious concerns in the area of child care. There was a desperate need for more spaces, a desperate need for quality child care.

I also remember that those pleas for assistance in the area of child care fell on deaf ears because for that four year period the Liberals were in power, they did nothing whatsoever to expand the quality of child care in this country. Why is it and how is it that the Liberal Member can now stand in his place and suggest that this is an inadequate program—which, of course, it is—when in fact his Party was in Government from 1980 to 1984 and did absolutely nothing to expand the quality of child care in Canada?

I would like to ask a broader question about credibility. Why should we believe Liberals when they speak about the types of programs that they would implement. I remember hearing from the Leader of the Official Opposition, the Hon. Member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Turner), talking about democratizing the Liberal Party. Credibility! Is this the same Party that said to a potential Liberal candidate in the riding of St. Laurent in Montreal, who had signed up 1,400 members, that he could not run. "We will not let you run", Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On a point of order the Hon. Member for York South—Weston (Mr. Nunziata).

Mr. Nunziata: I would simply request, Mr. Speaker, that you enforce the rule of relevance with respect to the Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my 20 years here I have never seen anything that was relevant. The Hon. Minister of State on a point of order.

Mr. Charest: I was just going to point out that if we were to listen to the Hon. Member for York South—Weston (Mr. Nunziata) apply the rule of relevancy, neither he nor the Hon. Member for Hamilton East (Ms. Copps) could ever talk.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) has finished. I will give him another 30 seconds.

Mr. Gauthier: I rise on the same point of order, Mr. Speaker. I hope that it is not taken off my time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would not dare.

Mr. Robinson: I will conclude my remarks, but I would ask the Hon. Member to explain how it is that there are certain ridings in Quebec that are reserved for the special stars. Why is it that we should believe for one minute this Party when it talks about child care, but when it talks about democracy it is obviously misleading the people of Canada?

Mr. Rossi: Quebecers don't want the NDP.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Hamilton East (Ms. Copps) has a point of order.

Ms. Copps: I could be totally irrelevant and point out how the NDP Members must be licking their wounds after the provincial leader in Quebec garnered a total of 2 per cent of the popular vote in a recent by-election, but I will not. First, I would only like to point out that the NDP Members do not even have nominating conventions in Quebec; they appoint their so-called representatives. Second, we are supposed to be discussing child care.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will defer the Hon. Member's question and comment and let the Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) answer, and then I will come back.

Mr. Gauthier: I can well understand members of the NDP not wanting to talk about child care and talking about everything else. When it comes to credibility, they are the experts in non-credibility. They have lost absolutely any confidence that any Canadian may have had in them, and I could go back to NATO, to the banks and the nationalizing of banks, or I could talk about serious problems that they have. However, since the debate is on Bill C-144 and day care, I would like to take the occasion to tell the Member, who has been here since 1979, that he has certainly heard of the CAP program which was brought in by a good Liberal Government. It gave 50 per cent contributions to Canadians in helping them to have day care. I remember the then Minister of Health bringing in a tax credit for children, which was a Liberal initiative. There were many good fiscal measures put forward which probably the Member missed because, being an NDP Member, he never sees the realities. He lives somewhere in the beyond, in the dream world of the arm chair socialists, as we call them in my riding.

To answer the question of the Hon. Member, I would recommend that he read the report on child care, that he read the minority report of the Liberal Member of that committee, the Hon. Member for Outremont (Mrs. Pépin). It is entitled: Choices for Children Now and in the Future. It is a very good minority report. If the Hon. Member reads the report he will have the answers to all of his questions.

Mr. Jepson: I have a point of clarification. Did I hear the Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) state that he and his Party were for universal day care? If he said that, I would like to know what he anticipates the cost per annum would be for universal day care, and what that would relate to on an individual taxpayer basis.

Mr. Gauthier: I would like to point out to the Member that it is a good question. What I am talking about is universal accessibility. That means that Canadians wherever they live in this country should have universal access to day care. I did not talk about a universal program, I said universality of access.

Ms. Mitchell: First, I think I should point out to my Liberal friend that my understanding is that the Canada Assistance Plan was in force since 1966.

Ms. Copps: Who brought it in?

Ms. Mitchell: The Hon. Member should learn about the inadequacy of some of the child care programs, at least in my experience, under that program. However, this Bill is worse than what we would have under the Canada Assistance Plan. The growth rate for new spaces would be higher under the Canada Assistance Plan than under this new Bill.

In his remarks the Hon. Member referred to standards. We preferred the term "objectives" from a national point of view. I would like the Hon. Member to outline what a Liberal Government would see as national standards in its terminology. Would it include commercial day care as one of the goals that it would seek and, if so, why?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member has one minute to complete his questions or comments.

Mr. Gauthier: I did say that the CAP program was available and accessible to all Canadians, but it did have its faults.

Ms. Mitchell: Only low-income Canadians.

Mr. Gauthier: It was a program basically directed to those of low income and those who were in need. What we are talking about here is a two earner family which is in need of child care. In my speech I made it clear that, in my riding, I was talking about those people who, because of a changing society, have to cope with a two-earner family but with children who are in need of child care. That is indeed a problem we will have to answer. I did not say that CAP was the solution and the end-all to all of the problems. I know it was a solution at the time, but now we have to go beyond the CAP program. As a general response at that time I think that it was a good response.

As far as the other question is concerned as to where I stand, the Hon. Member can read my speech tomorrow. I am sure that she will have in there all the answers to her questions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. On debate the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary for Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mrs. Bourgault).

• (2110)

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I also am pleased to take part in this debate this evening and to speak on child care on behalf of my constituents of Argenteuil—Papineau. I would like to remind certain Hon. Members that the national child care strategy must meet the needs both of urban and rural families, and of course native ones. As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, I represent a constituency that meets those three criteria because, as you know, my constituency includes the municipality of Oka, Kenesatake. There is a crying child care problem in Kenesatake.

Mr. Speaker, when I listen to the New Democratic Party and certain Liberals, including their critics, I am inclined to wonder if they understand the nature of rural Canada? I wonder, because if we were to rely on what we heard since the legislation was tabled, the need would be almost exclusively in urban centres. Do not worry about public, non-profit child care centres 100 per cent funded by the state, governments, without any financial accountability towards parents or users because the Government has money, we will pay for everything!

Mr. Speaker, in Argenteuil—Papineau this evening, I am sure that when we tell them: We will inject $6,4 billion, I am certain that to people in Argenteuil—Papineau this is a substantial, an exceptional amount. People in a rural constituency do not refer every day to billions of dollars. This is not a frequent occurance.

But on the other hand, Mr. Speaker, I hear some dreamers opposite speak of nationalizing child care services. Not to worry about money, Canadians have a lot of it, even if we are only a small number to pay for that—not to worry. We will find the money somewhere, and anyway we will get more taxes from Canadians. I wonder where they would get that money, but at any rate they are referring to nationalizing child care just as they are referring to nationalizing health care. As if those two were comparable!

I will speak in practical terms about what happened in Argenteuil—Papineau since we referred to the national strategy, since my citizens feel that from now on they will get increased help, of course with a contribution from Quebec. One example: There is a citizen in Morin Heights, Mrs. Berverley Mehlamed, an extraordinary woman who created a private child care service in an area that is not exactly a fringe area because it is near Saint-Sauveur, in our beautiful Laurentians, but anyway she developed an exceptional child care centre that draws on the parents as well as brothers and sisters of the children who finish school at 4 p.m., as mentioned earlier by the Hon. Member for Outremont (Mrs. Pépin). This woman wishes to expand. She has already told me of a very remarkable project, and we were eagerly awaiting the introduction of this Bill as well as the accord signed with Quebec to see how she would be able to get the financial aid she needs to double the spaces in her day care centre. So, you see, in my riding, we already have projects in place.

Let me tell you about another project dear to me. Since we, the Conservative Government, have been in office, it is a well-known fact, recognized by all, that the economy is doing so well that the population of the Saint-Janvier area in Mirabel, a municipality known for its dramatic development, has become aware of the serious problem of day care. So, nowadays, Mr. Speaker, companies such as, to name a few, Bell Hélicoptère, Nationair, Transat, Canpak, the Mirabel town council, and so on, have been meeting with concerned citizens and day care directors to discuss the issue of day care centres in the workplace, an issue which concerns companies, parents, and governments alike, and not exclusively governments.

From now on, private firms will have to get involved financially in the creation of day care centres.

For the time being, we are waiting for the result of an application we have made to the Department of National Health and Welfare concerning a new Project Assistance Fund which is part of the national day care strategy to create in Saint-Janvier a unique day care centre in a working area which, I hope, will become a reality, in view of the interest shown so far by my constituents and the women working in these plans.

Mr. Speaker, I dare say that this is the result of the national day care strategy because we are aware again of the fact that the federal Government is determined to get involved in it.

Like a great many of my colleagues both on the Government and the Opposition sides, Mr. Speaker, I have met many mothers in my riding and most of them are definitely in favour of family type day care centres.

It is quite a chore for the mother of one, two or several children to dress them in the morning and take them to one of the public day care centres which have set such strict conditions as to the time of arrival, time of departure, etc. I can tell you that people in increasing number prefer family type day care centres because families are smaller.

Mr. Speaker, the Government has met the needs of these parents who wanted to choose their own type of care through the national strategy, and it has done so within the framework of the tax reform.

Let me remind you for instance that the maximum day care deduction for children six years of age or under will double from $2,000 to $4,000. Parents with children six years of age or under who have no child care receipts—and Heaven knows that there are many in our ridings who don't—will be entitled to a refundable child tax credit supplement of $100 for 1988 and $200 for every year there-after. That is a need we have met, Mr. Speaker!

When we hear NPD Members, Mr. Speaker, we get the impression that we are in Russia or some other socialist dictatorship, because they want to nationalize child care services.

Opposition critics say that the federal Government has to make sure that the provinces will indeed use the money we will give them under the national strategy.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest it is an expression of lack of confidence in the legitimately elected provincial governments. I am convinced that, with respect to the Government of Quebec and the governments of the other provinces, day care centres are a basic need and I fail to see how a provincial administration would dare expend these funds for purposes other than those specified in the legislation.

As well, Mr. Speaker, it seems unrealistic to me to claim that the federal Government ought to know what Nova Scotia, the Northwest Territories—the reserves, for instance—require in terms of day care centres.

I think that the social services of the provinces are much better suited and much better structured to define just what kind of day care services each province needs. It seems to me that the federal Government is showing leadership today. It has been said on many occasions but still not often enough, Mr. Speaker, if anyone is showing leadership when it comes to day care it has to be our Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney). There is a reason why we are here today, August 11, when we should be on holidays: the Prime Minister has been insisting that day care legislation being so important it must be passed before we can go! It goes to show that we have a Prime Minister who knows where he is going, Mr. Speaker.

Let us be realistic about day care. I read the report of the committee so ably chaired by our colleague from Lincoln (Mr. Martin) and during the proceedings I saw for myself to what extent opinions differed in the positions expressed by women from rural or urban environment and by the various groups which appeared before the committee. I suggest that the committee was realistic in its approach when it tabled its report, an approach which should represent a consensus concerning day care services.

Mr. Speaker, it was very difficult for me to hear all day long, both in my office and here in the House, the comments of my opposition colleagues. I suggest that to oppose for the sake of it is wrong. Come on. Although the Government is spending $6.4 billion on this program, they are against it because they feel it is regressive and do not meet the needs of Canadians. Mr. Speaker, I suggest it would be commendable on the part of the opposition to recognize for once that the Government has made a great step in the right direction and to work with us and the provinces in the future to improve this program.

We should emphasize the fact that the purpose of Bill C-144 is to improve the quantity, quality and accessibility of day care services as well as to make them more affordable.

I understood the Hon. Member for Outremont (Mrs. Pépin), as official critic of the opposition, when she mentioned all these children who do not know where to go when they leave school with keys around their necks. I want to tell her this: In several areas of my Argenteuil—Papineau riding, parent committees in various school addressed this problem and, with the national strategy and the Novative Project Assistant Fund, it is possible to get money which was not available before to help schools set up day care centres to meet the needs of young teenagers after school. We are very fortunate indeed in our ridings to have block parent committees to look after these children. It is our responsibility and also the responsibility of the provinces to look into it.

I met recently my Quebec counterpart, Mr. Claude Ryan, a man whom I hold in high estime and who is well known to the House; as Minister of Education, he is quite willing to work with his colleague, Mrs. Lavoie-Roux, the Quebec Minister Responsible for Women's Issues, to find within the framework of the national strategy which will be signed—I do not know if it has been signed already . . . He will do everything in his power to keep schools open after hours to offer these children shelter between the time classes ends and the time their parents get home.

What a great day it will be, Mr. Speaker, when every school in Canada will be able to help children and their parents who face these special problems.

As well, our Government recognizes that child care is the key to women's economic equality and represents a need and an essential welfare program. Nevertheless, we are once again committing substantial amounts in order to offer and contribute to the creation of new and good quality spaces. I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that a unique child care centre will soon be opened in Saint-Janvier de Mirabel, since a few businesses have already confirmed their readiness to make the move and partly fund it for the enjoyment of their employees. I met the previous Bell Helicopter human ressources manager who told me a number of times about this serious problem. As you know, more and more businesses have these work shifts where men unfortunately come to realize that their fellow women workers have to leave work at a quarter to five because they must pick up their children at the day care centre before it closes at six o'clock.

There is thus a growing need to establish child care services at the workplace and I think that it is towards that objective that we should direct our initiatives and energies.

Mr. Speaker, day care services are no longer the exclusive concern of women. More and more men are responsible for looking after their children and since they have this added responsibility it seems that all of a sudden the issue has become more urgent. For years now women have been asking for better day care services but now the issue seems to have a higher priority, and I am very pleased to acknowledge this new development.

Of course I am glad for women and I think that in the future, when families take part in the collective effort concerning the equality of women, why would the father not drive his two children to the day care centre and take them out to lunch and promote better family understanding, better family unity! I think day care services at work are the answer to the problem.

Mr. Speaker, need I remind you that over the last 20 years the Canadian traditional family—the wage-earning father, the mother at home with one or more children—has become the exception rather than the rule. It has become obvious. Nowadays 54 per cent of all Canadian women are on the labour market, and the figure is higher still in the case of women in the 24-to-64 age bracket. Sixty-five per cent of them work outside the home. Sixty-two per cent of Canadian mothers with children under 16 belong to the labour force.

Mr. Speaker, speaking personally as Member for Argenteuil—Papineau, I think there is another measure which the Government is interested in looking into, and I am referring the need to extend maternity leave in a significant manner. Women want to keep their children longer, Mr. Speaker, and I really think that three months is not enough for a very young baby.

Again I suggest that if we want to promote the family status and urge families and women to have more children, one way to achieve this is to give them more assistance and extend maternity leave.

Also, Mr. Speaker, we must say there is an increasing number of Canadian mothers who are raising their children alone. At the present time, 83 per cent of single-parent families are headed by women. In the riding of Argenteuil—Papineau, that is mostly rural, I can tell you that has become a problem. First, there is the distance from urban centres. Transportation services are almost non-existent. Those women at the poverty level who are bringing up their children alone need to go out from time to time, even only for shopping, they need some leisure time, to belong to some social organization, except they have a problem. In remote rural communities no day care services are available to them and, of course, we have to face facts. It would be financially impossible to open day care centres everywhere, for instance, in all 53 municipalities in my riding.

Here again, I think we must reflect on that particular problem of women, of families, I should say, who live in remote rural communities, to be able to give them the more satisfactory day care service to which they are entitled as first-class citizens and which we have an obligation to make available to them.

Mr. Speaker, we have often talked about the famous problem of women who hire babysitters but do not get receipts for income tax purposes. Listen, we must see things as they are. Some have no other income but welfare. Those women help each other out. You know, there is no better social network than that of women. They help each other. They take turns staying with one another's children in the evening. But they sometimes need sitters who unfortunately are below the poverty line and cannot afford to report the money they earn this way. It is almost that ridiculous. Do you think that a woman . . . It seems as if the income tax services are preying on those poor women who make a little extra money every week by baby-sitting a few hours at one or several neighbours' houses, and I think we should stop harassing those people.

With the increased tax deduction and the possibility for families taking their children to child care services to deduct day care costs without necessarily having official receipts, this will still be a measure that will be of assistance to these women.

Mr. Speaker, 200,000 new subsidized spaces in child care services may not ne enough, there might still be other things to be done, but between 200,000 new spaces and nothing, I think a major progress has been made. Why always criticize? Women have always shown moderation, they told me several times they were aware of the fact that the Government had nevertheless limited resources, but they generally welcome this effort, they have hope, and in the future they will see to it that this program be improved. In the years to come, Mr. Speaker, I think we will be able to build on this basis and increase once again the number of day care spaces available.

Mrs. Pépin: I would like to ask the following question to the Hon. Member for Argenteuil—Papineau (Mrs. Bourgault). She mentionned earlier the problem relating to the latch-key kid. Being a Member from Quebec, she said that Quebec Education Minister, Mr. Ryan has indicated his willingness to do everything in his power to solve this problem. Consequently, I only want to remind my colleague that schools in her province now have 30,000 spaces, which is unique to Quebec. I also want to draw to her attention the fact that the present Bill, introduced by the Government, contains a clause where it is said that none of this money will in fact go to education . . . funds will not be cut? So, I want to know how she will be able, with her Government and this Bill, to help, or let us say bypass . . . I don't know if we would have to amend the Bill, to continue to offer help to those children. We heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) tell us how important it is to fight the drug problem. But we know too well that the teenagers mainly facing this problem are the same children who are alone at home after school, and actually, one of the problems with this Bill is that it does not do anything for the latch-key kid. Secondly, it says in the Bill that the funds allocated for education will be cut. I do not see then how the Hon. Member will be able to solve this problem.

Mrs. Bourgault: Mr. Speaker, that is quite obvious. The provinces will first establish their standards with respect to this program. When I referred to Mr. Ryan a while ago, I was saying that there are 30 000 day care spaces, but that that is not enough in the schools. And we must not forget that parent and community groups are involved in this. There is a lot of volunteer work in this field. But I think that the Member from Outremont is stuck with her party's decision. She cannot state she agrees with the bill. But I understand her very well. If I were in her place . . .

An Hon. Member: In her heart, she is.

Mrs. Bourgault: In her heart, she must be and I thank my colleague for informing me of that. But I am sure that, being an Opposition Member, her job is to oppose. However, she has participated in the committee's work and she has heard the testimony of families, parents and day care workers. She is, I think, satisfied with the effort the Government is making in the field of day care. Once again, I thank her for her support.

Mr. Keeper: I would like my colleague to tell me if she is aware that the existing program, the Canada Assistance Program, does not put a limit on day care expenses. And because of that, the rate of increase was 15 per cent this year. The amounts spent on day care have increased by 15 per cent a year under the Canada Assistance Program. But, with her government's new program, the rate of increase will be brought down to 10 per cent a year. Why has this government decided to postpone the day where we will have an adequate day care program for the children of this country? Has it put a limit on day care expenses because it also wants to spend 8 billion dollars on submarines? Is that the reason why the government has come up with a program which limits day care expenses?

Mrs. Bourgault: Mr. Speaker, once again, the New Democratic Member is obviously mixing apples and oranges. He talked about the Canada Assistance Plan. I just want to point out to him that, under the basic calculation, the federal Government will pay to the provinces 50 per cent of operating costs of commercial or not-for-profit child care agencies as well as 75 per cent of their capital costs during the seven-year period ending on March 31, 1995.

Mr. Speaker, I know why the New Democratic Party is against this initiative. It's because it wants to nationalize child care services like we did for medical care. But you cannot compare the two. Come on!

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Member for Argenteuil—Papineau (Mrs. Bourgault) if she thinks it fair that, under the Conservative policy, the Government offers less tax rebates to low- and middle-income families. Why has the Government not introduced a system giving tax credits instead of deductions to help, for example, a woman working as a baby sitter in her constituency and earning the minimum wage who will get a lot less in terms of income deductions than a female Member of Parliament?

Mrs. Bourgault: Mr. Speaker, here is a question I am tremendously pleased to answer. In the first place, I suggest Liberals have become masters at distorting figures. This is quite clear. It must be remembered, Mr. Speaker, that Paris was not built in one day. What we were left with was a financial mess. And when a country finds itself in such a financial mess as the one we inherited from the Liberals, we cannot remedy overnight all the calamities left by the Liberals. For that reason I feel that our record over those four years is still exceptional, and I for one will quite confidently defend that performance before my constituents, with the conviction that the next four years of Conservative Government will build on the first four ones. And then Canadian men and women will realize the Conservative Party is the Party that should be governing the country, for the benefit of everyone.

[English]

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Waddell: I thank my colleagues very much for that round of applause. As a matter of fact, I just heard them telling the story of one of their distinguished colleagues—no doubt not from our Party—who spoke on the abortion debate and said that he was not intending to speak on the abortion debate but he had missed his bus so he thought he would take the opportunity to speak.

Ms. Copps: That is one of your colleagues there, he's sitting right beside you.

Mr. Waddell: I find that extraordinary. I am rising tonight because I really want to speak in this debate. It is a real privilege to speak in this debate. I did not miss my plane to British Columbia nor did I miss the boat or the bus.

I will have the privilege, I hope, after the next election, of representing a new riding—

Some Hon. Members: Which riding?

Mr. Waddell: A few people have asked which riding it is. It is the riding of Port Moody—Coquitlam.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (2140)

Mr. Waddell: Just in case anyone missed it, that was Port Moody—Coquitlam. In that riding, if I might be somewhat more serious for the moment, the constituents are vitally interested in the issue of child care. The reason is that Port Moody—Coquitlam is like many new and growing areas in Canada, a suburban area with young families. Indeed, I think only 8 per cent of the people are senior citizens, a very low figure. A large percentage of the population is made up of young families with children and they have been hit hard by the Conservative Government. For example, they are paying high interest rates on their mortgages for the new houses they have bought. That is partly a result of government policy which is trying to squeeze down the boom in the Toronto area by keeping interest rates high.

These people are also paying higher taxes than they did in 1984, about $1,000 more per family. They are also being hit in other ways. For example, they drive from the city to the suburbs and they get hit at the pump by higher gasoline prices, again enacted by the Government. As a result, this group of people really want the Government to deliver something good for a change. They have looked at child care as one thing they really need.

There is another reason I am vitally interested in child care and that has to do with equality. I fervently believe, as do my colleagues in the NDP, in the principle of equality. I think full equality of women hinges to a large extent on meeting day care needs. In our society it is still the woman who is left for the most part to look after the children. At the same time, as many Members on all sides have pointed out, women are continually moving into the work force. They have, as I see it, a double job. They are part of the work force, and then in the morning before going to work or in the evening when they come home from work they have to provide the best care they can for their children. During the day they often have inadequate child care and they worry about their children, or they cannot afford to be sick and they have to go to work sick, or they have problems when they are at work and their child is at home sick.

We do not have adequate child care in this country and I think all Parties agree with that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. There is a great debate going on and I would like to hear it.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Waddell: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I thought I heard you say earlier tonight that you had been in the House for 20 years and you have not heard anything relevant. I am glad we established a precedent tonight.

Mr. Redway: He is hoping.

Mr. Waddell: The next time you will not intervene? I know, I will be careful.

I see the Minister of State for Youth (Mr. Charest) is in the House. Earlier tonight he accused me of being a centralist, an old guard socialist, I think he said. I do not apologize for that.

Ms. Copps: You used to be a Liberal.

Mr. Waddell: My colleagues say, coming from British Columbia, that I am practically a separatist.

Ms. Copps: That is not what Bob Nixon said.

Mr. Waddell: The reason he called me that was with reference to my question on Meech Lake and the question of setting objectives for social programs. That is a crucial question.

To be honest, I think the jury is still out on Meech Lake. It may be that national objectives can be set under the new Meech Lake provisions, but this Bill is the first example since Meech Lake of a major national social program and it does not attempt in any way to set out national objectives. That is the great weakness. Whether or not another government of a different political stripe, more committed to national objectives, can set them out we will have to wait and see.

I was going to quote Marjorie Nichols who wrote in The Ottawa Citizen today some very perceptive remarks. She said:

> "The bottom line is that this bill will provide the money to build fewer child-care spaces in Canada over the next seven years than would have been built without it, based on current construction performance under existing legislation."

I think she is referring to the fact that the Bill will create fewer child care spaces than would have been created under CAP. She went on to say:

> "The terrible shame of this legislation is, however, that it represents an abandonment by the federal government of its responsibility to be accountable for the collection and expenditure of other people's money."

The Minister stood up a few minutes ago and asked how the NDP can object because the Government is spending $6.4 billion. It is tough to object to the expenditure of $6.4 billion. You do not easily stand up and oppose a child care Bill, it has to be pretty bad, but indeed we are doing that because we believe it is irresponsible to just give $6.4 billion to the provinces without national objectives and accountability. We in British Columbia, with Premier Bill Vander Zalm, do not know where the money is liable to go if you give it to him. It might go to Fantasy Gardens, who knows.

My colleague, the Hon. Member for Vancouver East (Ms. Mitchell), our distinguished critic in this area, received a number of telegrams on this issue and I want to read a couple of them to show that it is not just the NDP who feels this way. Other people with a particular interest in this field feel the same. There is a telegram from Sharon Hope Irwin, a child care consultant:

"Child care Bill very dangerous. Respectfully request your efforts to block Bill on second reading. It lacks national objectives, encourages commercialization to the detriment of child care, and does not deliver the promised spaces. Please promote quality child care—accessible, affordable, with high standards."

That is what my future constituents in Port Moody—Coquitlam want. That is what my present constituents in Vancouver—Kingsway want. They want child care which is accessible, affordable, and with high standards. I have another telegram from Carol Christian, President of the White Horse Day Care Association, and Joanne Oberg, Secretary of the Yukon Day Care Association. It says:

"We urge you and your colleagues to speak against the Childcare Act in the House. It is devoid of national objectives, limits spending on child care, funds the commercial sector and does not satisfy the need for spaces, it does not create a day care system but is a government spending program, this waste of public funds will set back day care to the dark ages."

Those telegrams are worth paying attention to.

We in the NDP believe child care in Canada is in a crisis. We have been waiting for four years for the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) to deliver on his campaign promise. You will recall what that was: an effective national system of child care. We think Canadian families have been let down again. In other words, another broken promise by the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister thinks you can just throw money at the problem—build a road to James Bay, buy a constituency, build a prison or whatever. That is not the way to tackle child care.

• (2150)

Neither before, during or after the passage of the Conservatives' inadequate, flawed strategy will our families and our children's needs be met. In fact, this fundamentally flawed legislation moves us backwards. There will be fewer child care spaces for our children after the seven years of the Government's program than under the existing system, even after the expenditure of the money.

Furthermore, this Conservative legislation fails to establish the principles on which to build an effective national system of child care. We should be building the first major national social program since medicare was established, but the Government has failed to provide leadership and set out the principles for quality child care in Canada.

We in the NDP believe that Canadian families and their children need greater access to quality child care at lower cost. This Bill does not deliver that. We have said and will continue to say that the Prime Minister should go back to the drawing board and bring forward a child care program to meet the needs of average Canadian parents and their children for child care services now.

It is not only the members of the NDP who have said this. There is an editorial in The Globe and Mail today which criticizes this particular Bill. That is not exactly a New Democratic policy paper. This position comes from all angles of the political spectrum. I have here a letter from the National Anti-Poverty Organization, part of which I will read into the record. It is addressed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) and says:

"Dear Mr. Minister:

I am writing to express, briefly, the concerns of the National Anti-Poverty Organization with Bill C-144, and to urge you to schedule public hearings on the Bill prior to its passage in the House of Commons.

As we told you in past meetings, we were concerned with the expected absence of targeting of funded spaces to low-income Canadians, and with the expected failure of the legislation to require public accountability by public or community-based management of funded centres. In addition, NAPO has historically opposed the use of public dollars to subsidize for-profit operations, particularly in areas of basic social need like child care.

Bill C-144 fails to establish national objectives, much less the federal standards we would have liked to see contained in the legislation. Even the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord permits the establishment of national objectives for new social programs, yet your government has chosen not to include them in the Bill. We believe this Bill permits the expenditure of very large sums of public money without establishing what the government hopes to accomplish through this expenditure. Canadians have a right to know what your objectives are with child care, and we would urge you to include these in amendments to the legislation.

We have been concerned about the targetting of spaces since your announcement that a good portion of the funding for this "new" program would be transferred from the Canada Assistance Plan.

Under CAP, at least spaces could be subsidized only if they were provided to those in need or likely to be in need without the space. While this permitted subsidization of middle-income Canadians, it did not allow for subsidies to the wealthy. Under this legislation, there is no such assurance or guarantee. Both you and your officials have assured us that operating subsidies will go only to targetted spaces. This is not clearly stated in the Bill, and should appear as an amendment to the legislation.

In addition, removing this funding from CAP will allow dollars previously used only for operating and capital costs for not-for-profit child care centres, or for operating costs only in for-profit centres, to be applied to both operating and capital costs of for-profit centres, if so wished by provincial Governments.

There is evidence that has been submitted by specialists in the field that for-profit centres, in the aggregate, offer lower quality service, minimum required staff/child ratios, lower wages to staff, and lower educational requirements for staff. In addition, we believe that public dollars should not subsidize private profits, and should not subsidize operations that are not accountable to the public paying the subsidy, however indirectly. This Bill does not meet these concerns."

That is what I meant by an inadequate system of child care as set out in this Bill.

I heard the Prime Minister speak in the House today about child care. Some of us thought he might use the occasion to announce the election, but he did not. He was really speaking about women's issues. He was addressing women's issues because he is weak, according to the polls, on women's issues. He has a gender gap like George Bush. Women do not trust our Prime Minister and do not agree with his policies. In his speech he never asked why that is, and I would like to take a minute now to suggest to the Prime Minister why that is and I will return to child care after that.

There are a number of reasons why women distrust the Prime Minister. The Government is spending $8 billion on nuclear submarines when there is poverty, there are food banks, and there is a housing crisis in the country. Young families cannot afford to buy a home and the Government is spending $8 billion on nuclear submarines. In the new neighbourhoods of Port Moody, Coquitlam, and Port Coquitlam, British Columbia, you cannot get door to door postal service, yet the Government is spending $8 billion on nuclear submarines. In this country farmers and rural people are suffering, but the Government is spending $8 billion on submarines. The Government is militarizing our economy and women instinctively know this, object to it, and will not stand for it.

The second thing the Prime Minister should consider is his free trade deal with the Americans. That affects the service sector for the first time in any trade deal in the world. Not even in the Israeli-American trade deal is the service sector included. The service sector is the fastest growing job creation sector around, and who works in that sector but women? When you consider how vulnerable to American competition our growing young service sector will be, including data processing, insurance, and computers, you will see that the Americans will take jobs from our service sector in the free trade deal. That will affect women.

Returning to day care, the same families and women who want quality day care want the Government to do something about drugs and impaired driving rather than only making political speeches about them as the present Prime Minister does.

Where was the Prime Minister on abortion? He was not even in the House. The Government's policy on abortion was a mess. It did not even have the guts to introduce a proper Bill on abortion, and Canadians have noticed that. When the Prime Minister wonders why he is not getting the votes of women he should consider what a big phoney he is on these issues and he should tackle them.

To summarize our position on this Bill, it is a flawed Bill on one of the most important subjects. It does not set out national objectives and will not increase the number of day care spaces. It will not benefit the average Canadian family which continues to be overtaxed and underserviced by the Government.

I challenge the Prime Minister and his Party to call an election. We will deal with these issues in the election. We will deal with child care on the hustings. We will deal with the notion of selling out this country to the United States. We will deal with the average family paying $1,000 a month more in taxes as a result of the Government's initiatives. We will deal with the fact that motorists have once again been hosed by the Government. We will deal with all the broken promises of the Prime Minister. We will deal with the fact that the average Canadian family loses under this Government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please! It being 10 p.m., pursuant to order adopted on Monday, June 20, 1988, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 3(1).

At 10 p.m. the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, August 12, 1988

The House met at 10 a.m.

Prayers

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if I could have the attention of the House for just a moment before we proceed. As Hon. Members will know, following the calling of Orders of the Day I will be making a ruling as to at least some of the amendments that were filed. I want to delay for just a moment until a copy of that can be delivered to the House Leaders. I think that we have copies at this moment. I will just wait a moment. Orders of the Day.

The French version will be available soon.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT IMPLEMENTATION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-130, an Act to implement the Free Trade Agreement between Canada and the United States of America, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

Mr. Speaker: I want to make several preliminary remarks.

[Translation]

I am very sorry, but we still do not have the French version and the problem is due to translation, because last night, the Speaker and the Clerks of the House had to work very late; this was necessary considering the number of amendments submitted. I hope that Hon. Members will understand the situation.

The Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) has the floor.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): On a matter of fundamental principle, I recognize that the Clerks of the House worked very late because there were amendments, some one hundred tabled by Members, but I believe that it is right for this Parliament to work with documents in both official languages. Besides, we recently passed Bill C-72, which requires of the Government that any document tabled in the House be in both official languages. It is hard for some unilingual Members to follow the debate. I understand that we have simultaneous translation, but it is still unfair for these Members to have to deal with a document that is only in English, when we know very well that they would understand better and perhaps follow the proceedings better if the material were in French.

I suggest that the Chair wait a few more minutes for a translation to be available for all Members so that here in this House, we can maintain the fundamental principle and work in English or in French with documents available to all.

• (1010)

[English]

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I want to lend my voice to that of the Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier (Mr. Gauthier). This is an important debate, and your ruling will be of utmost importance in the way the deliberations of this House will transpire over the next few days. I think it is only appropriate that we have the document before us in both of Canada's official languages.

May I suggest, since you indicated the translated version will be here shortly, that we recess for a few moments while awaiting the document so that we can begin properly and appropriately, reading from the transcript of your ruling in either of Canada's official languages.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I am naturally in your hands, as are other Members. The provision of draft rulings in both official languages is a convenience for the House. I think it would be in order for you simply to have read your ruling into the record without the provision of draft copies.

We can, however, do one of two things. One might suggest that you read the first two paragraphs of your ruling. I think the essence is that Motions Nos. 1, 61 and 65 are in order and will be debated together, and go from there.

Mr. Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the Hon. Minister of State but until the Chair gives a ruling I do not think we should be discussing the copy which has been extended to House Leaders, of course, as a matter of courtesy. I will hear the Hon. Minister further.

Mr. Lewis: In that case, Mr. Speaker, I suggest we recess the House until a copy of the provisional ruling in both official languages, as far as the Table has got, is available to all Members.

Mr. Speaker: I think I told the Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) that copies would be available soon. It might not be quite as soon as I thought a few moments ago. Would the House allow me to consult with my officers for just a moment?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There have been discussions among the House Leaders and we think in view of the circumstances and in view of the importance of the matter before the Chair, and our wish to have every Member of the House in a position to understand your ruling in both official languages, that it would be appropriate to suspend the sitting until 11 a.m. and then commence the normal Statements by Members followed by Question Period. If the ruling is ready, once Orders of the Day are called after Routine Proceedings we could perhaps be in a position then to receive your ruling in both official languages.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate very much the co-operation of Members. First, let me say this. There are 102 motions that were received by six o'clock last night. I repeat, 102 motions. I also point out that a great many people worked well beyond midnight last night to prepare at least part of the ruling on these amendments in order to try to meet the exigencies of today.

I also point out that it was not possible to have in place translators after midnight last night. This is nobody's fault. It is just a fact of life. I have to say that until early this morning the document was not completely finished in any event.

I should also add that I will have to make a further ruling on other amendments which we have not been able to consider. I see some sympathy expressed by House Leaders and I appreciate that also.

I thank the Hon. Minister of State (Mr. Lewis) after consultation with the House Leaders for his suggestion. I think that perhaps is an appropriate way to deal with the matter. We may not by noon have the entire ruling fully translated, but we will have enough of it translated to get started on the debate.

[Translation]

I want to say that I greatly appreciate the statement by the Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier (Mr. Gauthier). There is a problem, but the principle is not at issue today, not at all. So I would ask for the cooperation of all Members, especially the francophones.

SITTING SUSPENDED

Mr. Speaker: The sitting is adjourned until eleven o'clock. We will resume for Question Period at that time, followed by Routine Proceedings. I will then return with the ruling.

At 10.19 a.m. the sitting of the House was suspended.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 11 a.m.

TOURISM

EFFECT OF OLDMAN RIVER DAM ON ALBERTA TOURIST INDUSTRY

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, last week the Friends of the Oldman River laid charges against the Province of Alberta for violating Section 33 of the federal Fisheries Act because construction of a dam on the Oldman River would destroy habitat for brown, brook and cutthroat trout. These fish are of great value to Alberta's tourism and recreation industry.

In addition, the proposed reservoir would flood Indian burial sites, ancient inscriptions carved in stone and ceremonial grounds of the Peigan Indians. Damming one of the only undammed rivers left in southern Alberta would destroy the ecology and native lifestyle of the area for the sake of irrigation for some 300 land owners. It simply does not make sense.

We urge the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Siddon) to prosecute the Government of Alberta on the charges laid by the Friends of the Oldman River, and to subject the Oldman Dam project to the federal environmental assessment and review process. The Oldman River is a treasure worth saving in its pristine beauty.

HUMAN RIGHTS

VISIT OF POLISH SOLIDARITY LEADER TO CANADA

Mr. Andrew Witer (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, Andrzej Gwiazda, Vice-Chairman of the Polish trade union movement Solidarity, and his spouse Joanna, are presently visiting Canada. Mr. and Mrs. Gwiazda, along with other Solidarity leaders such as Lech Walesa, Anna Walentynowicz, Alina Pinkowsa and Bohdan Lis, began a heroic struggle for the advancement of fundamental human rights in Poland which resulted in the establishment in 1980 of Solidarity, the first free and democratic trade union behind the Iron Curtain.

Despite years of imprisonment, Andrzej and Joanna Gwiazda carry on their courageous work for Solidarity's goal; that the state should serve man and not rule over him, and remind us that the struggle for justice and freedom continues in Poland. I call upon all Members of the House to join with me in welcoming Mr. and Mrs. Gwiazda to Canada and in expressing our admiration for their tremendous contribution to the cause of freedom and fundamental human rights.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

CRITICISM OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, the aboriginal peoples of Canada have good reason to be suspicious of the Conservative Party's agenda. Buffalo Jump of the 1980s is without doubt the political agenda of this Government.

Add to this the press release of August 2, from the Minister of Indian Affairs (Mr. McKnight). The headline reads: "Amendment to Indian Act Removes 'Death Rule' ". That statement is false. There is no Bill before Parliament and no such amendment has been passed. In fact, even today the Minister's office refuses to provide a copy of the proposal.

This same Minister has Bill C-122 before the legislative committee. This is legislation designed to cut the statutory powers of Indian by-laws. This legislation is unanimously opposed by the chiefs of the First Nations.

Add to this the illegitimate withholding of Bill C-123 on minors' trusts and estates, a Bill completed and to have been reported to Parliament over two weeks ago from the legislative committee. Add to this the improper and illegitimate withholding of the report of the Standing Committee on Bill C-31, a report required by statute to be reported forthwith, and still withheld by the Conservatives from Parliament and the public, a report completed some two months ago. The Minister and his minions abuse the truth, this House, and the First Nations by such actions.

NATIONAL ART GALLERY

VIDEO SHOWING HOMOSEXUAL INTERCOURSE

Mr. Jim Jepson (London East): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I read on the front page of The Ottawa Citizen that, believe it or not, pornographic videos were being shown under the guise of so-called art at the new National Art Gallery. One video, according to the article, showed a close-up of male genitals and intercourse between males as well as other homosexual acts.

The assistant curator of film and video was quoted as saying that the work being shown is unquestionably art. The curator says they explore the difficult questions of our time: sexual identity and the role of the media in our lives.

With such comments as this, is it any wonder some people in the art community have successfully persuaded the Justice Department officials to deep-six the Government's pornography Bill, Bill C-54, in spite of overwhelming public support and mail to the Justice Department? How much garbage such as these videos is society to tolerate in the name of so-called art?

FAMILY VIOLENCE

NEED FOR SECOND-STAGE HOUSING

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I almost gagged when I read the comments made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) in his maiden speech to Parliament on a Bill before the House. He took credit for everything. The things he took credit for were incredible.

What the Prime Minister did not tell the Canadian people and particularly the women of Canada is why it is that under his Government in 1986, we saw for the first time the wage gap between men and women actually getting wider. Why is it that he has introduced a program to assist victims of family violence which will not create a single second-stage house across Canada?

Why is it that in my own community of Hamilton the women's organizations are actually going begging for funds to keep five apartments open for women who have been battered? A woman with five children who will be homeless and out on the street cannot qualify for that program because the Government does not believe in second-stage housing.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) himself said that he could not philosophically support second-stage housing. The women of Canada will not be bought by these ridiculous statements.

INCOME TAX

ENVIRONMENTAL MEDICAL PRESCRIPTIONS—TAX TREATMENT

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Mr. Speaker, environmental hypersensitivity is a condition resulting from the inability of the immune system to cope with everyday normal exposure to such things as food, water, mould or dust. The medical treatment for this condition often requires expensive home modifications, and changes in diet and lifestyle.

The Income Tax Act allows only prescriptions dispensed by a licensed pharmacist to be deducted as medical expenses. Special environmental prescriptions are usually not available in a pharmacy. It is time that the Government amended the Income Tax Act to provide equal tax treatment for Canadians who require environmental medical prescriptions.

AGRICULTURE

DIFFICULTIES FACED BY FARMERS

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, farming is a gamble and a worry. If it is not the grasshoppers, it is the stink bugs; if it is not drought, it is early frost; if the crops are good, the price is low; if the yields are high, the elevators are jammed; when the granaries are empty, the prices go up; when the grain bins are full, there is a strike at the coast and demurrage costs eat up the profits; when a bountiful crop ready for harvest brings hope, there is a sudden hail storm.

If a farmer trades in an old tractor for a new one, he is taxed because the machine company paid him "too much" for the used machine; when prospects look good and land is purchased with a loan, interest rates rise; when the farmer cannot pay back the loan, the financiers take his land; when he crawls from the soil he loves, Revenue Canada charges him taxes on a capital gain. Is it not a wonder that we have any farmers at all left on the land?

SECOND FIRING OF IMMIGRATION OFFICIAL

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, the Government's vendetta against John Quigley continues with full vengeance. Last year the Government fired him because he advised me and other Members of Parliament that the Immigration Department was inviting known criminals to apply for refugee asylum. He was subsequently reinstated following an order by the Public Service Staff Relations Board.

Now, after failing to learn from this lesson, the Government again fired Mr. Quigley, who is the president of his union local, on the allegation that he used a government telephone for union business. This latest move is nothing more than a thinly veiled attempt to get Mr. Quigley at any cost, over any possible excuse.

Rather than utilizing its energies to carry on a petty, vindictive and needless battle with one employee, the Minister should concentrate on vastly improving her Government's management of Canada's immigration policy. The Government looked bad the first time it fired Mr. Quigley and now it looks pathetic. It has opted for the gutter when the high road was clearly available.

I call upon the Minister of Immigration (Mrs. McDougall) and the Government to bring this sad affair to a satisfactory end by reinstating Mr. Quigley.

BANKS AND BANKING

CHARTERED BANKS—REPORTED PRESSURE ON AUTOMOBILE DEALERSHIPS

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make the House aware of yet another set of financial pressures being placed on rural communities. The banks are now telling rural automobile dealerships to get bigger or get out. Most banks are beginning a policy of providing credit for floor stock only if it exceeds $2 million. Smaller inventories are apparently of little or no interest to the banks. Some banks even have a policy of not financing dealerships at all if they are located in rural communities.

Banks do not seem to realize that cutting car and truck dealerships in small towns means the demise of a very necessary transportation service for all rural residents. New vehicles and repairs to older ones are a necessary part of viable communities.

Cutting back on dealerships by imposing preconceived size and volume requirements on credit eligibility reduces the investment potential for all aspects of the small-town rural community and only adds to the devaluation of existing rural assets and loans. I call on the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Hockin) to make that point with Canada's banking system.

CARTOGRAPHY

COMPUTERIZED MAPPING PROGRAM

Mr. Bill Tupper (Nepean—Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I enjoyed being present yesterday when the Minister of State for Forestry and Mines (Mr. Merrithew) announced a $16-million program to computerize mapping in Canada. Known as the Geographic Information Systems, or GIS, the computerized maps will not only revolutionize the way in which geographic information is produced and stored, they will revolutionize the uses to which maps can be applied.

Canada has taken the lead in developing state-of-the-art computerized mapping techniques. By becoming leaders in GIS technology, we can also service and train customers around the world. It will provide us with enormous advantages in managing and developing our own natural resources.

This is a first step in a national program that will result in GIS expertise becoming world-class. It will mean high-technology jobs for Canadians. It will mean the development of key industries. It will mean increased trade in goods and services. We are poised to make our Geographic Information Services the most advanced in the world.

EMPLOYMENT

REQUEST FOR JOB CREATION PROGRAMS FOR ELDERLY

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of the House some of the findings of a recent survey of the population over 65.

Sixty-one per cent of senior citizens are physically fit and are not under any functional constraints. This means they do not require more than the usual health care and social services. In Quebec, 90 per cent of senior citizens stated they preferred to live on their own instead of moving to a senior citizens' home.

Eighty-five per cent of Quebecers think that governments and employers should take advantage of the knowledge and skills of senior citizens who are able to work, and 42 per cent think they should receive a salary in that case.

Mr. Speaker, I therefore invite governments to set aside more money in their budgets to promote the independence of our senior citizens and set up job creation programs that would take advantage of the experience and skills of senior citizens.

THE PRIME MINISTER

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, when is the king of patronage going to muster the courage to call a general election? It seems the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) is getting cold feet. He knows, given the opportunity, the people of Canada will reject free trade, reject the Conservative Party, and reject the Prime Minister.

Four years ago, during the 1984 election campaign, the Prime Minister made a lot of promises. Over the last four years we have seen a lot of broken promises. The people of Canada want an opportunity to turf out the Government. They know they were lied to and hoodwinked in that election campaign.

The Prime Minister does not have the courage to call an election because he has personality problems. As a headline said yesterday, "PC grass roots jittery about PM's credibility". This is what a Conservative riding president had to say about the Prime Minister:

> Probably the most prevalent issue I hear is "I don't like Mulroney".

The people of Canada do not like Mulroney.

Some Hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Nunziata: They want to defeat him. Let us go to the polls.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT—SUPPORT FROM THERMOS BOTTLE INDUSTRY

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I recently received a letter from a company in my riding which I would like to share with Members of the House of Commons:

> "Dear Mrs. Browes
> As one of the original Golden Mile industries, Canadian Thermos Products has been manufacturing in Scarborough since 1950.
> In August, we will be producing for the United States market all of their Thermos glass vacuum bottles, coffee carafes and workers' lunch kits. The result will be a nearly 100 per cent increase in our Scarborough production.
> More importantly, this will create at least 60 new permanent jobs in addition to the current 102.
> Although Thermos is committed to moving production to Canada, Free Trade is nevertheless important to our company. The duty on our products entering the United States is 9 per cent, equal to or higher than that on competing products from Europe, Brazil and the Far East. The elimination of this duty under the Free Trade Agreement would lead to a larger market share for our Canadian-made products in the U.S., and consequently increased employment.
> We applaud the reasoned approach that the Government of Canada has pursued in both the Free Trade Agreement and the GATT negotiations."

Mr. Speaker, this is good news for the people of Scarborough.

TRANSPORT

EFFECT OF DROUGHT ON GRAIN TRANSPORTATION WORKERS

Mr. Ernie Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, the head of the grain handlers' union in Thunder Bay has called the grain scene there the worst since the 1960s. The drought, which will reduce farmers' income on the Prairies, threatens long lay-offs for grain handlers, railway workers, seafarers, and grain commission employees in Thunder Bay and other ports on the St. Lawrence Seaway.

Those involved in the grain trade in Thunder Bay and throughout the Seaway need action from the federal Government. I call on the Government to take the following actions: to ensure that a fair share of wheat exports moves through Thunder Bay and the Seaway; reduce the variable entrance requirements for persons laid off in the grain trade so they are eligible for unemployment insurance after ten weeks of employment; review operations under the Western Grain Transportation Act in order to make them more sensitive to the actual cost of moving grain to export ports.

Workers in the grain trade need action from the federal Government and I call on it to take that action now.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

CONSTRUCTION OF BRIDGE—BUILDING OF AUTOROUTE 30 ON MONTREAL SOUTH SHORE

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, about two weeks ago, the federal Minister of Transport (Mr. Bouchard) announced in Valleyfield that he would build a bridge so that construction could start on Highway 30 on Montreal's south shore.

Mr. Speaker, for twenty years, business people, mayors and MPs have been asking for this highway which is vital to the development of the south shore. Only a Progressive Conservative Government could understand, being prepared to do everything in its power to strengthen the economy and increase employment. Highway 30 is vital to the development of Montreal's south shore, and I am proud I helped to make this dream come true.

HOUSING

SITUATION IN TORONTO—CALL FOR FEDERAL ACTION

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, a poll released this week indicates that only 38 per cent of Ontarians believe that it is possible for young couples to own a home. This is indeed a sad indicator. Under the false guise of Tory economic recovery, the dreams of so many young Canadians have disappeared. One in two Canadians favour a return to the RHOSP program which was eliminated by Tory cut-backs. Two in three Canadians want a mortgage deduction policy to help finance a new home. Yet the Conservative Government has not shown any leadership on these initiatives.

Other solutions to the Toronto housing crisis have fallen on deaf ears as the Government has ignored many proposals. It is readily evident that during the past four years Conservative economic policy has benefited the haves while leaving the have nots at the wayside on the road to prosperity.

With respect to the housing crisis gripping Metropolitan Toronto, the Tories' answer has been a tale of two cities. It is time the Government moves on the affordable housing crisis facing Metropolitan Toronto and other major urban centres before they become the exclusive backyard of the well-to-do.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

OWNERSHIP OF PETROLEUM INDUSTRY

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Petroleum Monitoring Agency issued a very disturbing report on the declining state of Canadian ownership of the oil and gas industry. It points out that since 1987, there has been a more than 5 per cent drop in Canadian ownership. In contradiction to the Government's stated policy of achieving 50 per cent Canadian ownership, the figures are going the other way.

In light of these very alarming figures from its own agency, which basically say the Government is presiding over the sell-off of Canadian companies, assets and resources in the energy sector, what is the Government going to do finally to put some teeth in its control and protection of Canadian assets and resources?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member's allegations are unfounded and untrue. Investment Canada has a different view of the situation. It really depends upon the classification of Husky. Clearly, Investment Canada considers Husky a canadian controlled public company. When that is considered, the Hon. Member's figures are blown out of the water.

The Petroleum Monitoring Agency uses a potential control test, whereas Investment Canada uses a present control test. I think the two different agencies come at this from different ends and I would prefer to rely upon the approach taken by Investment Canada.

Given that, what has happened during the course of the last few years since this Government has taken office is that we have seen a strengthening of the petroleum industry. We overcame the devastation inflicted upon the industry as a result of the National Energy Program.

I think the Hon. Member would clearly recognize the difficulties that Dome became involved in as a direct result of the policies of the previous Government. He should not take any solace from that.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, we know how credible Investment Canada is. It has received applications for 443 acquisitions and takeovers and has approved 443 acquisitions and takeovers. This amounts to a sell-off of $36 billion worth of Canadian assets since the agency came into being.

PROPOSED SALE OF TEXACO CANADA

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, it is no wonder that the Deputy Prime Minister repudiates his own Government's Petroleum Monitoring Agency. It is telling the truth and describing the way things are. That is the problem. Therefore, I want to ask the Minister this question.

Texaco Canada is now up for sale. The Petroleum Monitoring Agency says Bow Valley, which is foreign controlled, and Husky which is foreign controlled, are now major bidders for that company. Given that, what steps is the Government going to take to ensure that Texaco Canada will not add further to the decline in Canadian ownership by being sold to foreign owned companies?

Mr. McDermid: Who owns it now?

• (1120)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I do not need any lectures from the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry about telling the truth. I refer to the Winnipeg Free Press article of August 9 which outlines the reasons why his Leader and himself should start telling the truth when it comes to talking about the trade deal. The Member may want to read that because it is very good food for thought.

If the Hon. Member is asking the Government to reinstitute the Foreign Investment Review Agency, which contributed to the devastation of the energy sector, the answer is no. We have been encouraging investment—

Ms. Copps: Stand up for Canada.

Mr. Mazankowski: I know the Hon. Member from Winnipeg does not really give a hoot about the energy sector, but there are some Members in this House who do.

As I said earlier, there has been a strengthening in this sector and that has been good for the creation of jobs and good for the stimulation of the economy in all regions of Canada. The Texaco issue will be examined in due course if an application is made to Investment Canada. It will be considered in the appropriate manner consistent with the policies and guidelines laid down by Investment Canada.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, if the Deputy Prime Minister wants to place so much faith in the Free Press editorial he should take note of what is in the paper today, that is, that the Liberals are leading in the city of Winnipeg at 45 per cent and his own Party is at 24 per cent. Under those circumstances the Free Press can keep writing all the editorials it wants because our percentages keep going up and the Conservatives' keep going down.

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct another serious question to the Deputy Prime Minister and would like to get a serious answer in response.

Under the proposed trade agreement the Government has changed the threshold to weaken further the control over foreign investment. The U.S. legislation carries with it new negotiating directions to the United States administration to reduce further the grandfathering of investment in energy and other forms of resources.

Is the Government not basically covertly endorsing, not the sale of Canada's resources but the sale of Canada's ownership of its resources? Are we not really selling the country out by your policies in energy, oil, gas and resources? Are we not seeing the sell-out of Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would ask Hon. Members to put their questions through the Chair. The Hon. Minister.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this is another indication of why the Winnipeg Free Press titled its editorial "Tell the people the truth". The editorial writer said, "John Turner should tell the people the truth".

Mr. Axworthy: That's why we are at 45 per cent in the city of Winnipeg. That's why you will not have a Tory Member left in the city of Winnipeg.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry should be telling the people the truth and not distorting the truth as he has done in this question and many other questions in relation to investment.

The Hon. Member should understand that the purpose of the free trade agreement—

Mr. Boudria: Where are you going to run, Mike?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The Hon. Members do not want an answer to the question. The Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry has said time and time again that we should not be proceeding with the free trade deal but should be working through the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. He should understand that GATT is addressing the question of investment and the question of trade in services. The things we have done in the free trade agreement with the United States are very consistent with the things he is going to be proposing that we do with the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. The Member should get a bit more consistency and less distortion into his questions.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT—TARIFF REDUCTIONS

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister. Speaking of telling the truth, for the past year the Government has been telling Canadians that they as consumers will benefit from the full reduction in tariffs with the United States which the Government says will come from its trade deal with that country.

Yet for the past year the Government has had in its possession a secret Finance Department study which makes clear that Canadian consumers would not benefit from reductions in tariffs unless wholesalers and retailers passed along those reductions and lower prices, something which has not necessarily happened at all.

Mr. Mazankowski: That is really startling.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Why has the Government been telling Canadians that the benefits of these tariff reductions will definitely go to them when it knew that this was not necessarily going to be the case? Why will the Government not call an election right away to give Canadians a chance to decide whether they want to have a trade deal from which they will not benefit in spite of the claims of the Government that they will?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the light has gone on.

An Hon. Member: But nobody is home.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The House Leader of the Liberal Party has suddenly realized that there is a market-place, that retailers and wholesalers are allowed—can you believe it—to set their own prices in this country.

Some Hon. Members: No!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The Finance Department study is not a secret study, it has been made public. The Finance Department study says that on a conservative basis there will be a reduction in prices of a certain amount. I do not have that figure off the top of my head but I think it is something in the order of 4 or 5 per cent.

There will be a reduction in prices of 4 to 5 per cent assuming that the market-place does not pass on the full amount of the reduction. However, if the wholesalers and retailers do pass on the full amount there will be an even greater reduction in prices over and above the 4 or 5 per cent about which I have just spoken.

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, why does the Government not confirm that it can give Canadian consumers no guarantees whatsoever that they will benefit one bit from any reduction of tariffs that will come about from its trade deal? Is the Government not, through the Minister of Finance, admitting today that it is leaving what will happen to consumers up to the wholesale and retail sectors and that the Government does not care about what they do?

Why does the Government not admit this right now and confirm that as far as the Government is concerned there will really be no benefit for consumers and that the Government does not really care about that because it cannot guarantee consumers one cent of benefit from its trade deal?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that anyone in this world can guarantee things for Canadians, whether prices or even whether the Member for Windsor West is going to get re-elected. We cannot guarantee that. We are going to work like hell to make sure it does not happen.

Mr. Gauthier: You know what is going to happen to him, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Axworthy: We will not see you at next year's Christmas party.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, since I answered the first question I have received a copy of the Economic Assessment. This is the so-called secret study to which the Member for Windsor West referred. If he would read the material that comes out from the Government he might be able to ask more reasonable questions.

In this document it says quite clearly that the cost of consumer goods imported from the United States could be reduced by about 5 per cent on average. I have said that that is based on conservative assumptions.

Mr. Boudria: That is what is wrong with them.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): If the retailers and wholesalers pass on the full savings we will see those cost savings increase more than the 5 per cent indicated there.

As a final point, Mr. Speaker, I cannot quite understand all this fear, this horror, of free trade. Seventy-five per cent of the goods which are imported into Canada from the United States now are free of tariffs.

EFFECT ON CONSUMERS

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pursue this question with the Minister further. He suggested that his report is the secret study. Of course what we are talking about is the memo of December 16 that was released to Canadian Press under Freedom of Information.

• (1130)

That memorandum said that consumers would not get the full benefit of tariff reductions. Why has the Minister not let Canadians know of this conclusion? Why has he kept it secret? Why has he misled consumers about the gains they might get?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not quite understand why the Hon. Member is so upset about this point. We have made a conservative judgment of some economic analysis. We could have put in that the full reduction of prices would be passed on to the consumer. Then the Hon. Member would be standing up to say that we exaggerated the impact of the free trade agreement, that we were leading the consumer down the garden path. That is not the case. We are saying that this is the conservative judgment we have made, that only 5 per cent will be there. It could be more.

I want to point out to the Hon. Member that if there is a greater degree of competition, as will come from the free trade agreement, possibly we will see a greater increase in the price reductions as a result of the free trade agreement. Nothing is hidden whatsoever.

DEPARTMENT'S STUDY

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): In fact, Mr. Speaker, it is precisely that misleading approach which the Government has taken in another one of its propaganda documents, the one talking about Canadian consumers and the benefits they will get from the trade deal. It says precisely: "Retailers will pass on to consumers the price reductions resulting from the elimination of tariffs under the agreement". That comes directly from the Consumer and Corporate Affairs Ministry's study which was issued after that December 16 memorandum.

Why is the Government, at taxpayers' expense, putting out misleading propaganda which is telling consumers something that is not true?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, quite frankly I think this is total distortion of what we are trying to do. In the analysis that we have provided on the free trade agreement we have said that there will be a reduction, in our judgment, of 5 per cent on the price of consumer goods. That takes into account a judgment that we have made that the full savings would not be passed on to consumers. However, if the full savings are passed on to consumers, then that 5 per cent will be a larger number. Surely that is not distorting or misleading the consumer.

As I said in my previous answer, if we had not made that more conservative assumption the Hon. Member would be standing up and saying, in a voice of feigned outrage, that we have been exaggerating the impact of the free trade agreement. This has been a conservative, realistic approach to the effects of the free trade agreement.

Mr. Langdon: Yes, but it is not the approach that was taken by the Government's own study from another Department, which was misleading and classifies absolutely as false propaganda.

POSITION OF NATIONAL FEDERATION OF CONSUMERS' ASSOCIATIONS OF QUÉBEC

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

Does the Government now agree with the National Federation of Consumers' Associations of Québec that there will be very few benefits for consumers as a result of this agreement?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker—

Ms. Copps: Read Steven's householder for a change.

An Hon. Member: Why do you not shut up for a change, Sheila?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Yes, now for Steven's householder.

Mr. Speaker: I would ask that Hon. Members refrain from remarks when questions are being asked—

Some Hon. Members: Table the householder.

Mr. Speaker: I would ask that both sides exercise the courtesies that are expected.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member has just made references to statements of the Government being misleading. Let me read from his householder in which there is a statement that I think is totally misleading. Referring to the free trade agreement it says: "it will let American companies turn our health care system in a for-profit direction that will hurt patients and nurses". That is absolutely false. It is garbage.

Some Hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for York—South Weston.

PAROLE

INQUESTS INTO TORONTO DEATHS

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. It concerns the operation of half-way houses in Canada, particularly in Metro Toronto.

Recently two innocent people, Tema Conter and William Woods, were murdered by two inmates released to Montgomery House, a privately run half-way house in Toronto.

Provincial inquests are scheduled to begin in late September, early October. It now appears that the federal Government intends to challenge the jurisdiction of these inquests. Why does the Government intend to obstruct and delay these investigations? Is it not because they will embarrass the Government right in the middle of a general election campaign?

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Hon. Member knows, as he indicated, that these inquests have been scheduled for September 21 and October 6. The federal Government is committed to full co-operation with both of these inquests. There is no intention whatsoever to interfere in the operation of these inquests.

REFORM OF PAROLE SYSTEM LEGISLATION—TIMING OF INTRODUCTION

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the Government does not intend to challenge the jurisdiction of the coroner. Canadians generally are fed up with the present parole system. They are afraid of dangerous inmates being released to half-way houses without proper supervision.

Two months ago the Solicitor General announced proposals to reform the parole system in Canada. He promised us legislation within a matter of weeks. That was two months ago. When does the Government intend to follow through on the commitment of the Solicitor General to introduce legislation to reform the criminal justice system, in particular the parole system in Canada?

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General has taken the initiative of making changes to the parole system. He went across the country and listened to various groups. It is a position that is taking time to have public input. We hope to have a Bill prepared and presented to the House very soon.

VISIBLE MINORITIES

INTERNMENT OF JAPANESE-CANADIANS DURING WORLD WAR II—DISCUSSIONS WITH NATIONAL ASSOCIATION

Mr. Ernie Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. It concerns the issue of redress for Japanese-Canadians which the Deputy Prime Minister knows very well is a matter of honour, national and personal.

In his answers to my questions yesterday the Prime Minister suggested that the Government is dealing with the National Association of Japanese Canadians. However, the President of the NAJC tells me this morning that there are no meetings scheduled to discuss redress.

Does the Deputy Prime Minister, who is managing the politics of multiculturalism for the Government, have any plans to arrange serious and substantial discussions on redress with the National Association of Japanese Canadians?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I do not have to manage the politics of multiculturalism. It is being handled very well by the Minister responsible for multiculturalism. I think he is doing an excellent job.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: I can assure the Hon. Member that he is seized with this very sensitive and important issue and I think the Prime Minister indicated yesterday the sincerity of the Government in trying to deal with this issue. I can tell the Hon. Member, as the Prime Minister indicated yesterday, that we hope to have a resolution to this matter in the very near future.

• (1140)

REQUEST FOR ACTION ON INDIVIDUAL COMPENSATION

Mr. Ernie Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same Minister who is certainly involved in trying to recognize the needs of multiculturalism. Will the Deputy Prime Minister take the kind of action this Government has not seen anyone else take to break the log-jam and get action on individual compensation for Japanese-Canadian survivors? There has to be action of that sort if there is going to be any kind of resolution.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I think the Prime Minister's personal commitment and involvement in this matter are pretty clear from the answers he gave in the House yesterday. The Minister for Multiculturalism has met on occasions with the leaders of the Japanese community. I am not aware if there has been any further meeting scheduled, but there are recommendations that are currently being considered. I can say that to the Hon. Member. I am sure when those recommendations will be considered and acted upon, further discussions will take place, but I can assure the Hon. Member that progress is being made.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT—STOCK SAVINGS PLANS

Mr. Jim Jepson (London East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. I am concerned about an issue raised yesterday by the Leader of the Official Opposition concerning the ability of the Quebec Government or, indeed, any provincial Government, to operate or establish new stock savings plans once the free trade agreement is in force. Could the Minister tell the House whether the free trade agreement prevents—

Ms. Copps: Who wrote that, Jim?

Mr. Jepson: —Quebec, or, indeed, any province from encouraging people to invest in their economy through stock savings plans, or from implementing other professional measures?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think my response yesterday was specifically related to stock savings plans by the federal Government, but I can broaden that answer to say that the free trade agreement does not—

Ms. Copps: Fontana has the answer.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The Member for Hamilton East does not want to listen to an answer to clarify a complete misunderstanding of her Leader on this issue.

Ms. Copps: Fontana will give you the answer.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Her Leader yesterday had not read, had not understood the free trade agreement—

Mr. Nunziata: Ask John Crosbie.

Ms. Copps: Ask Crosbie.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): If he had, he would have known that the free trade agreement does not apply in any way to portfolio investments as set out in Section 1601(2)(b), Section 1609(1) or Section 1602, all of which restrict the free trade agreement. It does not apply in any way to portfolio investments, which is the focus of stock savings plans that have been introduced by the provincial governments in our country.

POLITICAL RIGHTS OF PUBLIC SERVANTS

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. The Prime Minister promised in the last election campaign that he would propose a Bill giving public servants certain political rights. Why did the Government yesterday not keep its promise? Why did it scuttle a very reasonable Bill which was agreed to by all members of a legislative committee of this House? Why did the Prime Minister not keep his commitment to public servants by clarifying the situation, by placing a Bill before this House? What is the Government doing about this? Why did the Prime Minister not keep his promise?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is keeping his promise. He is prepared to fulfil his promise. The Government is prepared to act on this issue as was indicated in the House yesterday. I know the Hon. Member is very responsible on this particular issue. I think he recognizes very clearly the delicate balance which has to be maintained between political freedom and the importance of maintaining an impartial Public Service. It is within that context that we would want to see a measure proceed.

What was attempted by Members on this side of the House was to clarify some areas of the Private Member's Bill that required clarification. I regret that we were not able to deal with this more fully, but I can assure the Hon. Member of our commitment to provide the kind of political freedom and justice that was alluded to during the course of the last election campaign, but also bearing in mind—

Ms. Copps: Why do not you keep your promise?

Mr. Mazankowski: —the decision of the Federal Court of Appeal which has to be taken into consideration as well. I would hope that the Hon. Member would take that into consideration. I can advise him that we will be drafting a Bill and it will be accompanied by a statement which will, hopefully, clarify this issue.

BILL C-273—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Government, letting a few Members do its dirty work, literally strangled a Private Member's Bill that was intended to confirm and specify the political rights of public employees.

Why did the Government table amendments in the House yesterday which had the effect of killing Bill C-273? Why is the Government now hurriedly telling us it will keep its promise, when it failed to table any legislation in the past four years? Backbenchers had to do it instead. Why did the Government not have the courage to stand up and keep its promise to federal public servants?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, if the Hon. Member were fair, and I think he is a fair individual and I have a tremendous amount of respect for him, and if he had looked at the amendments and examined them closely—

Mr. Gauthier: Sixteen was not allowed.

Mr. Mazankowski: —he would have found that most of them were technical in nature and most of them would have made the Bill more workable and would have, I think, achieved the purpose which all of us in this House want to achieve.

Mr. Gauthier: I will write you a letter.

Mr. Mazankowski: It is really unfortunate the Hon. Member wants to make this a partisan issue.

Ms. Copps: False. Always falsehoods.

Mr. Gauthier: You made it a partisan issue. You did it.

Mr. Mazankowski: I would have hoped that through the co-operation, good will and understanding of all Members of this House, we could have reached a workable compromise which would have maintained that delicate balance which I think we all want to achieve in order to ensure the impartiality of the Public Service is preserved. That is precisely what Members on this side were attempting to do. I would hope that the Hon. Member might reconsider that.

Oral Questions

REVENUE CANADA

CALCULATION OF FARM MACHINERY TRADE IN PRICES

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance who, during Question Period, outlined what seems to me to be a new government policy. He said: "This Government permits wholesalers and retailers to set their own prices".

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the Hon. Member can put his question.

Mr. Althouse: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Now that this is government policy—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: Isn't that NDP policy, too?

Mr. Althouse: Now that this is the government's new policy—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An Hon. Member: Wait for it!

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member.

An Hon. Member: Try again!

Mr. Althouse: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Now that this seems to be the Government's new policy, with respect to Revenue Canada's attempts to set trade-in values on farm tractors and combines three or four years after the deal, to re-write the contract, to set the trade-in price for the retailer, does this mean that the Government is going to drop that stupid, regressive policy and allow those deals to stand?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the NDP to the real world.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): They have never understood the workings of the market-place. But I think the Hon. Member, if he reflects on where he buys his gasoline, sometimes might be able to get it at a penny or two less a litre somewhere else.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Not much less!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Sometimes there is a clearance sale around the end of the year. Sometimes even where he buys his tractor or his combines, maybe he would see there would be a little bit of competition there.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Come off it!

Mr. Manly: Answer the question.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I know the NDP does not like this. I know that the NDP would like to be able to control all the big levers of pricing, but there is this thing called the market-place which operates very well and very effectively.

Mr. Angus: You missed the point, Mike.

Ms. Mitchell: Why do you not listen?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I hope the NDP would adopt this in their thinking.

REQUEST THAT DEPARTMENT CEASE PRACTICE

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question would be to inform the Minister that his Department, under his ministry, the Revenue Department, has been doing precisely what he is claiming the NDP does, and it is his Government that has been doing it. We have been asking for the last six months for the Government to cease and desist. Will he now do that?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): You would not know a farm tractor if it ran over you.

Mr. Epp (Provencher): And you look like one did!

An Hon. Member: Would you know one?

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): We used to make them in Brantford until you came to power.

Mr. Althouse: Let us hear the answer.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Sometime, Mr. Speaker, I am going to invite the Member for Brant up to my little farm north of Toronto.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): What are you raising, fish?

• (1150)

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The Hon. Member has asked a serious question in relation to trade-in values on tractors, combines and other implements. He knows full well that the Department of National Revenue is looking at them on an individual, case-by-case basis. In the case of substantial write-ups, the Department has taken action. But it is being done on a case-by-case basis where there are instances of some shading in the tax rules.

DISASTERS

1985 GANDER AIR CRASH—HEALTH OF PERSONS WHO WORKED AT SITE OF ACCIDENT

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question concerns the Gander air crash. I will ask my first question of the Minister of National Health And Welfare.

The Minister of Health will know of the problems experienced by a number of Transport Canada workers, search and rescue workers, members of the Canadian Armed Forces, and members of the RCMP who responded to the crash of the Arrow jet in December of 1985 which killed 256 people all of whom were American.

Will the Minister initiate immediately an independent medical examination of each person who worked at the crash site in order to determine what kind of health problems they have been suffering? We know of at least 24 workers who are suffering from various diseases such as rare blood disorders which are usually caused by the ingestion of toxic fumes.

Will the Minister order an independent medical inquiry? Will he do it now in the way the Public Service Alliance of Canada has been asking since yesterday?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, in response to the Hon. Member's question, and just for the record, I should indicate to the Hon. Member that staff members of the Department of National Health and Welfare—and I have the names of the doctors and officials if Members of the House would like to know them—did work with employees who had been at the crash site immediately after the crash took place. The examinations were completed within two months after the incident. As well, instructions were given to medical staff for further follow-up.

I would say to the Hon. Member as well that National Health and Welfare is prepared to do whatever further testing or work is required. What we need is a formal request which might have taken place already—

Mr. Boudria: From whom?

Mr. Epp (Provencher): I said that it might have taken place as of yesterday. If we have not received a formal request, then obviously the testing cannot take place. As soon as there is a formal request we will take that action.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I take it that that formal request the Minister is talking about would be from the Public Service Alliance. I hope that that is the case.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL—HEALTH TESTS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is addressed to the Associate Minister of National Defence. He will know that there were health tests done on Armed Forces personnel who participated in the work at the crash site and not on the other personnel who were there. Could the Associate Minister tell us what prompted his Department to carry out these tests? Why were only Armed Forces personnel involved? Why were the other people who worked at the crash site not tested as well?

Will the Minister and the Government order an independent commission of inquiry into the whole mess concerning the Gander air crash?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member should know that Transport Canada and the Department of National Health and Welfare have primary responsibility in respect to any action or any testing to be done. The Department of National Defence has been co-operating fully.

What I say to the Hon. Member is what I said in my first answer. We have done testing. We have had people working with both medical staffs and the people involved.

Additionally, in view of the new allegations, statements or claims made yesterday, we are fully prepared to do further testing and to do whatever is medically necessary. The Department of National Defence, Transport Canada, the Department of National Health and Welfare or other agencies would be involved and willing to do that work.

As I said, when the Hon. Member talked about a formal request I meant a formal request from the public service union or from other bodies such as that.

MUNICIPAL AFFAIRS

REBUILDING OF CITY INFRASTRUCTURES

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. It is obvious from the analysis done by Angus Reid that people who live in our cities are less than enamoured with the current Government of Canada.

In the House on a number of occasions I have asked the Minister of Finance if he would be prepared to enter into a program with the provinces and the municipalities to rebuild our crumbling cities. I want to ask it once again. Will the Government now consider assisting the municipalities in a very expensive proposition to rebuild our sewers, roads, our bridges and parks? Will he consider that?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is ignoring the responsibility for this particular issue. What we have been doing in our four years in office was rebuilding the economy, putting it into a stronger and more solid position.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): That is reflected by our ability to create the environment for the jobs that have been generated in the private sector. We will continue to do that. However, we still have some very serious financial problems which we are continuing to deal with, ones to which we are committed.

I know that members of the NDP could not care less about that element of government policy. All they want to do is spend, spend, spend—

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Thunder Bay.

REQUEST FOR FEDERAL ACTION

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, the Minister must recognize that his Government is making some financial decisions for expenditures such as on nuclear submarines. That money could be better used assisting our municipalities, as the Government has assisted Halifax in terms of its sewage treatment facility, to give our cities the financial ability to clean up the environmental problems that are created by poor sewer systems, leaded pipes, and crumbling roads.

Will the Minister and the Government reconsider and agree to work with the Canadian Federation of Municipalities, the provinces, and the cities to rebuild our communities?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this is another question of half truths and things that are bordering on dishonesty.

Some Hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Minister's response is also bordering on what is acceptable. I would ask the Minister to give his answer.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, let me just remove the rhetoric and talk facts. The NDP's proposals on defence call for a $1.9 billion increase in spending over and above what has been talked about in the nuclear submarine proposal.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Nonsense.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The Hon. Member for Brant knows that that is the truth because that is the statement that he himself has made.

It is not a question of nuclear subs versus infrastructure. It is a question of who is responsible for doing the job.

I have said many, many times that I would like to see this work done but those responsible for it are the provinces and the municipalities. If they feel as strongly about it as the Hon. Member implies they do, then they should start getting on with the job themselves. That is where the responsibility lies. If we start spending money in all sorts of areas of provincial and municipal responsibility they will not like that. They will also see the deficit go up. That will lead to higher interest rates and a slow-down in economic activity. That is precisely the direction that we are trying to avoid as a government.

HOUSING

METROPOLITAN TORONTO—FEDERAL LANDS

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for the Treasury Board. Back on June 2, the President of the Treasury Board stated in this House that the Department and, in particular, the Bureau of Real Property Management in the Department, was giving serious consideration to releasing federally owned surplus lands for badly needed affordable housing in the Metropolitan Toronto area.

Now, some two and a half months have passed. When are we going to have a decision on this? Is everybody in the Department away on vacation? When can we expect some action?

An Hon. Member: When the election gets called.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of State and Minister of State (Treasury Board)): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the Hon. Member on June 27, there is an ongoing study with respect to surplus lands in the city of Toronto. My friend, as I have indicated to him on that date, will know that this Government has a policy of selling off surplus lands and making the best use of the land that the Government owns.

In keeping with that policy and in keeping with the efforts of the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, we are reviewing the land, and as soon as we have a comprehensive plan in place, that will be announced.

CHILD CARE

PRIME MINISTER'S SPEECH

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister, and it concerns the speech given yesterday by the Prime Minister, parading his social policy, which contained a number of mistruths and fabrications.

Some Hon. Members: Order!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I think that my admonition of a few minutes ago has to apply to both sides. The Hon. Member for Hamilton East.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, in his maiden speech on a Bill the Prime Minister said, and I quote, "The Child Care Act is about protecting children". The Prime Minister should know that there is absolutely nothing in this Act that protects children, because there are no national standards and no national objectives. I would like to ask who wrote this speech and why does the Prime Minister insist on being a phoney before the women of Canada.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister's intervention in the debate on child care was timely. He put forward the views of the Government on child care. He put forward a national strategy on child care. He talked about the 200,000 new spaces for the children of Canada. He talked about the tax breaks for parents, which obviously the Liberals and the NDP are against.

An Hon. Member: He talked about everything.

Mr. Epp (Provencher): He also put on the record the Government's advances on family violence. He put on the record what the Government had done about child sexual abuse. He put on the record the drug strategy. Do you remember when the Liberals said that there was no problem? He put on the record the issue of drinking and driving, especially for teens. He put on the record the policies—

Some Hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Hamilton East.

PROTECTION OF CHILDREN

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the record speaks for itself, and the women of Canada—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Members: Order!

Ms. Copps: The women of Canada know a phoney—

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member.

Ms. Copps: It was a phoney statement.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An Hon. Member: Sit down!

Mr. Speaker: I will ask the Hon. Member to put her question.

Ms. Copps: My question is this. Can the Minister or any Member on the government side show me a single section of the Act which deals with protecting children? It is not there. That is a national responsibility, and I would like to ask the Minister why the national Government refuses to protect children in the national Child Care Act?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the national Child Care Act does protect children. It provides 200,000 spaces. It doubles the number of spaces. The Liberals spent, at best, $40 million to $50 million a year on child care. They did not protect children. They did not care. They are great on rhetoric, but they do not care.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I might comment that both the question and the answer were probably anticipated debate, but I was very generous with both the Minister and the Hon. Member. The Hon. Member for Burnaby. These will be the last two questions.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

LIBERAL NOMINATION IN SAINT-LAURENT

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Privy Council, who is responsible for the operations of Elections Canada. It concerns the ruthless and dictatorial attempts by the Liberal Party of Canada to deny a Mr. William Dery an opportunity to be nominated as a Liberal candidate in the riding of Saint-Laurent, Quebec, where he lives. Will the President of the Privy Council look into whether or not the statement by the Member for Laval-des-Rapides, saying "he will not get any nomination in this particular riding I will assure you" could in any way be in breach of the—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Ms. Copps: The NDP do not even have conventions. Pope Broadbent anoints his NDP candidates.

Mr. Speaker: I know that that question may or may not be welcomed by some Members in the Chamber, but I think that I have to apply the procedural stricture, that unless the Hon. Member can show that the question has something to do with the administration of Government, it is out of order. I will give the Hon. Member another chance.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, I know that the President of the Privy Council is concerned that elections be conducted in a democratic manner. I want to ask him whether in fact he is prepared to look into this question and determine whether this attempt to muzzle and deny access to the electoral process is in fact in breach of either the Charter of Rights or the Canada Elections Act.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I find this to be a very serious situation particularly when it is occurring in a Party which has as its slogan "Let the people decide".

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I have to advise that that terminates Question Period. I wish to advise Hon. Members that at this time I wish to give a ruling with respect to a question of privilege that was raised some days ago. I want also to indicate to the Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) that I will hear the Hon. Member on a question of privilege, and the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap (Mr. Riis). We will then go to Routine Proceedings.

PRIVILEGE

ALLEGED INTIMIDATION ATTEMPT WITH REGARD TO THE HON. MEMBER FOR GATINEAU—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: On Thursday, July 14, 1988 the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue claimed that her privileges as a member had been breached in relation to a press release prepared by the Public Service Alliance of Canada, the contents of which were subsequently published in the weekly newspaper "le Dimanche Outaouais". The press release, dated July 6, 1988, which was delivered to the Hon. Member's office on July 7, 1988, dealt with the strike of the federal Government language teachers and a demonstration in support of the teachers organized to take place on the 6th of July, 1988 at the Hon. Member's riding office. The press release, copies of which have been supplied to the Chair, states that the Hon. Member has not supported the teachers in their negotiations with the Treasury Board.

The Hon. Member explained that she had indeed supported the teachers' cause and had told them that she would intervene on their behalf with the President of the Treasury Board regarding their demands for preparation time and language of negotiations. The Hon. Member went on to assert that the information contained in the press release is false and that its distribution and subsequent publication in a local newspaper constitute an attempt to intimidate her as a Member of Parliament in the exercise of her duties and as such represents a breach of privilege.

The Hon. Member may indeed have a legitimate grievance and can certainly dispute the facts as they are reported. The issue which the Chair must precisely decide is whether the preparation and publication of this information about a Member of Parliament constitutes a prima facie question of privilege in the traditional sense. Past precedents are highly restrictive in this regard and generally require that clear evidence of obstruction of interference with Member in the exercise of his or her duty be demonstrated in order to form the basis for a claim of a breach of privilege.

Speaker Jerome, in dealing with a similar case on June 23, 1977 ruled that "... the protection of an elected person against unwarranted or intemperate publicity, even abuses or defamatory publicity, is precisely that which is enjoyed by every citizen before our courts". He went on to add that "As elected people we can and do expect to be the targets of attack. "When those attacks seem offensive I think it is appropriate the Hon. Member is offered the courtesy of the House to extend to his hon. colleagues an explanation of the circumstances". He concluded that "... when these matters do take place, if they go beyond the point of being offensive to the point of being defamatory in a legal sense, certainly members ought to and will I am sure pursue matters through the courts."

Past Speakers have consistently argued that freedom of the press is one of the fundamental rights of our society which ought to be interfered with only if it is clearly in contempt of the House. Members who have complaints about reporting of their positions or activities should seek remedy in the courts.

In the case raised by the Hon. Member for Gatineau (Mme Mailly), I must rule that the matter does not constitute a question of privilege but that she may avail herself of the appropriate legal procedures if she feels that her personal reputation has suffered damage. I thank the Honourable Member for raising this issue and trust that this ruling has been helpful to her and to other Honourable Members.

• (1210)

Mrs. Claudy Mailly (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you for your customary kindness and competence and also for pointing out that, although this was not a question of privilege in the traditional sense because my privileges were not breached, the former Speaker Jérôme said that when statements were made that might damage the reputation of a Member, the Member in question ought to pursue the matter through the courts. I think that is an indication this matter was serious and important enough to warrant your attention.

I deplore the fact that the Public Service Alliance acted so irresponsibly in this campaign, but I am also very glad, Mr. Speaker, that the agreement was finally signed and that the teachers obtained the guarantees they sought for course preparation time. I am simply very sorry the union resorted to methods that are unacceptable in a civilized society like ours.

PRESS RELEASE OF MINISTER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege in relation to a statement dated August 2, 1988, by and over the name of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. McKnight). The statement I bring to your attention and to the attention of the House as a question of privilege is that at the top of the communique, a press release, we find:

> Amendment to Indian Act removes death rule.

If you give me a moment, Mr. Speaker, I will explain to you why I do not think this is simply a matter of literary latitude by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and why it is unacceptable and constitutes a question of privilege.

First, the statement is false. There is no Bill before the House. There is no Bill in the hands of the opposition Parties. The first line of the statement states:

> Bill McKnight, Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, has received all-Party support to amend a section of the Indian Act referred to as the death rule.

This morning I again got in touch with the Minister's office and was denied once more the opportunity to see the wording proposed to amend the Indian Act. This is crucial because this House gave the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs a statutory responsibility, not just a reference but a statutory responsibility, to produce for Parliament a report on the impact of Bill C-31, which came as a result of the Lovelace case at the United Nations. This was a reference that placed certain pressures on Canada and on this Parliament to act. The Minister in this press release describes the death rule as a technical error found in the 1985 Indian Act amendments known as Bill C-31.

Over the last 10 days I have been contacted by a number of groups and individuals who believed as a result of this press release that an amendment, a change, had in fact occurred. There are thousands of women and their children who are presently denied reinstatement as status Indians in Canada as a result of this so-called technical error. They, Mr. Speaker, are being denied certain rights and privileges provided by Bill C-31. For example, medical and dental care, educational benefits, the right to be on band membership codes and to live at home in their own home communities. There are thousands of them. If this were simply a communique that had gone out which had had broad literary latitude, I would not have raised the matter. The fact is that the opening line is simply false. It says, "Amendment to Indian Act removes death rule". There is no Bill. No Bill has been passed.

Mr. Lewis: There is certainly no privilege here.

Mr. Fulton: Since I am the spokesperson for my Party on aboriginal matters in Canada and since a false impression has been created right across Canada by this press release, I believe it affects my privileges both as the spokesperson on aboriginal affairs and as a Member of Parliament who deals with this issue on a regular basis. If you find there is a prima facie case of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to move the necessary motion to have it dealt with.

The Minister of State (Mr. Lewis) does not seem to think this is particularly serious. I think it is when a Minister of the Crown puts out a press release that is false. Anyone who can read knows that this press release is false. First, the headline is false. Second, the statement made within it that the opposition Parties had given all-Party support to an amendment we have never seen is categorically false. For him to imply to the First Nations, the first citizens and to the media of this country that what he has obtained is factual when it is not is false. The Minister has abused my privileges and he has abused the First Nations.

Mr. Speaker: I have listened with care to the Hon. Member for Skeena. I will reserve and ask him if he could assist the Chair by sending a copy of the press release to my office.

OFFICIAL REPORT—DELAY IN PUBLICATION

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege on behalf of all Members of the House. We all appreciate the tremendous job which the Hansard reporters do and all of the people involved in preparing Hansard for Members of Parliament and for all those interested in being aware of the proceedings of the House of Commons.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Riis: My comments in no way are to be a reflection on the tremendous work done by all of those participating in the Hansard process.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Riis: I particularly appreciate the fact that the House of Commons sits until ten o'clock in the evenings now as a result of extended hours. At about noon today we received yesterday's Hansard, which I think is quite a remarkable feat when you consider these sittings have been going on day after day all summer long. I simply draw to your attention a very serious problem. One of the uses Hansard is put to, particularly by Members of Parliament both in opposition and in government, is that in the late evening we review thoroughly what has gone on in the House of Commons and review carefully statements made by individual Members as well as statements made, perhaps more important, by members of the Cabinet. This enables us to raise, if necessary and appropriate, responsible questions in Question Period.

• (1220)

I simply want to draw to the attention of the House the difficulty this poses on Fridays. When we do not receive Hansard for obvious reasons until noon on Friday, recognizing that Question Period begins at eleven o'clock on Friday, it is impossible for Members of Parliament to be aware of comments made by people like the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) or Cabinet Ministers during the previous day's proceedings. That therefore makes it difficult or impossible for us to use the appropriate quotes in questioning.

I read with interest, as have other Members, the speech made by the Prime Minister. A whole set of questions ought to have been raised today in Question Period, but without the transcript of the proceedings being available prior to Question Period, it was impossible to ask those questions.

I wanted to raise this matter, focusing on the comments of the Prime Minister yesterday, at the first and earliest opportunity. It affects the privileges of all Members of the House in that it hinders our ability to do our jobs effectively. If Question Period is the time of the day when the Government is to be held accountable, and if we have an obligation under the traditions of this House to ask appropriate questions at the earliest opportunity, we must have an earlier reading of Hansard on Friday. I am simply flagging this issue in the hopes that one way or another, this can be remedied in the future.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap (Mr. Riis) for his intervention. I am not sure that it is a question of privilege. However, I see by indications from other Hon. Members in the Chamber that it is a problem.

The Chair has heard the Hon. Member with considerable concern and I will take some steps to see if there is something that can be done to get Hansard available for all Hon. Members on both sides of the House a little earlier. However, I do thank the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap for his very generous acknowledgement that our Hansard team is working pretty hard these days. I thank the Hon. Member for raising the matter, and I will see if there is something that can be done to correct the situation.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, on the same point, is it not possible, given the time constraints of Hansard and the difficulties involved, for Members who are really interested to go up and review the audio tapes? I think that that is available to Hon. Members, and in fact I have done that in the past.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the Hon. Member for Hamilton East. I do not think that the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap was suggesting that there are not other ways to possibly cover the debates of the day before. There are, of course. The Hon. Member's suggestion is one, and I would invite Hon. Members to see what arrangements might be made. However, before I indicate that all Hon. Members can avail themselves of the "blues" of statements by other Hon. Members, I think some consideration should be given to what is the policy of Hansard there.

As well, it is obvious that with the electronic recordings and television recordings, it is possible, if there is some specific matter, to draw back through the Oasis system the actual television review. However, I do not think that that is what the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap was getting at. In those cases that can be done, but the Hon. Member was talking about the fundamental convenience of having Hansard in time for Hon. Members to use it as a reference for the work they have to do.

I thank the Hon. Member for Hamilton East. I do not want to make a blanket ruling on what is available to Hon. Members, but Hon. Members might make inquiries of the Hansard office.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if I might take this opportunity to address a question to the Minister of State for the Treasury Board (Mr. Lewis) concerning Government business. It is a matter which relates to legislation which has been promised for some time in the area of—

Mr. Speaker: I have a bit of difficulty with this. If the Hon. Minister wishes to respond, he can indicate so, but there is a time for these kinds of questions and it is Thursday afternoon. I am in the hands of the House, of course, but I think the Hon. Member is out of order. I have to say to the Hon. Member for Burnaby that there is no consent.

PETITIONS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of State and Minister of State (Treasury Board)): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 106(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the Government's response to Petitions Nos. 332-5100 to 332-5102 inclusive, 332-5104 to 332-5110 inclusive, 332-5151, 332-5157, 332-5184 to 332-5186 inclusive, 332-5188 to 332-5207 inclusive, 332-5211, 332-5214, 332-5221, 332-5223, 332-5224, 332-5228, 332-5230, 332-5231, 332-5240 and 332-5245 to 332-5248 inclusive.

While I have the floor, I move:

That this House do now proceed to Orders of the Day.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the Members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

CANADA-U.S. FREE TRADE AGREEMENT IMPLEMENTATION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-130, an Act to implement the free trade agreement between Canada and the United States of America, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

Mr. Speaker: I should advise the House that, through no fault of anyone's, we are still without full translation of the ruling I would have preferred to have given earlier today. However, I have adjusted the ruling and I am now prepared to proceed with some of the amendments.

[Translation]

As I said in the House this morning, I had the opportunity to review in part most of the hundred motions entered on the Order Paper. In view of what the Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) said, I decided to postpone my final decision. In the mean time, for the purposes of the debate, the House can proceed to consider Motions Nos. 1, 61 and 65 together. Then the House can debate Motions Nos. 5, 6 and 8 together, followed by Motions Nos. 9, 10, 11, 12, 13 and 14. I hope to be able to provide a final decision early next week.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry) moved:

That Clause 2 be amended by adding immediately after line 21 at page 2 the following:

"Canada" means the territory to which Canadian customs laws apply, including any areas beyond the territorial seas of Canada within which, in accordance with international law and its domestic laws, Canada may exercise rights with respect to the seabed and subsoil and their natural resources;"

That Bill C-130 be amended in Clause 60 by adding immediately after line 28 at page 52 the following:

""Canada"means the territory to which Canadian customs laws apply, including any areas beyond the territorial seas of Canada within which, in accordance with international law and its domestic laws, Canada may exercise rights with respect to the seabed and subsoil and their natural resources;"

That Bill C-130 be amended in Clause 76 by adding immediately after line 3 at page 62 the following:

"and "Canada" means the territory to which Canadian customs laws apply, including any areas beyond the territorial seas of Canada within which, in accordance with international law and its domestic laws, Canada may exercise rights with respect to the seabed and subsoil and their natural resources."

He said: Mr. Speaker, Bill C-130 in its interpretation clause tells a very interesting story. The Government has been careful and precise in giving a definition of what is the United States, its territory and its rights and its powers. However, it has forgotten Canada. That tells one something. I do not think that in this respect we can refer to Freudian slips or slight sins of omission. The fact of the matter is that this Bill which introduces a very important and historic agreement is very careful to give a definition of what United States jurisdiction and territory may be but it has neglected to deal with our own country. I am afraid that that in itself leaves a very large story to be told.

Why is it important in a practical sense? If one reads the interpretation clause one will see that it states that "the United States" means the customs territory of the United States, including the 50 states, foreign trade zones located in the United States and Puerto Rico, and "any areas beyond the territorial sea of the United States within which, in accordance with international law and its domestic laws, the United States may exercise rights with respect to the seabed and subsoil and the natural resources thereof."

I hearken Hon. Members back to the very famous Polar Sea incident when the United States refused to recognize the Canadian right to exercise territorial jurisdictions in those areas. It said that that is an international area and not ours. I would also point to the present dispute in the Beaufort Sea in which the Department of the Interior of the United States is in fact giving out at the present time licences to U.S. companies to start drilling in territory which Canada claims to be its own. Therefore it is very important that Canada ensure that the assertion of our right to exercise jurisdiction in these territories is clear, unmistakable and beyond challenge, at least in order to defend our position. In Bill C-130 the Government of Canada has been very clear to ensure that the rights of the United States be recognized but it does not give any credence or even acknowledge that Canada exists in that sense.

What are the reasons? We spoke to officials of the trade negotiating office which put the Bill together. They said: "Everyone knows what Canada is anyway". The Americans do not know. The Americans do not know because they challenged us in the Polar Sea incident. They are challenging us again today in the Beaufort Sea. The French do not know because they are challenging our fishing rights off Newfoundland. We are still under harassment by the U.S. Government in the famous Georges Bank case even though there was a court case which gave us clear jurisdiction. This demonstrates that many other countries either will not see or are not prepared to acknowledge our rights in these areas. Thus it is not fair to say that everyone knows what is Canada. It is very important that Canada assert what is our position.

We were then told: "We did not have to do that because the term Canada is not used in the Bill". I thought that that was an interesting comment so I went in and did a little checking. In fact, I found out that on virtually every page—for example, page 2, line 13; page 2, line 15; page 2, line 19; page 2, line 22—the word "Canada" is used. It is used on almost every page of the Bill. It would seem to me that under those circumstances we must define it because it has a very precise and important legal definition.

We were told that we do not have to recognize it because there is a definition of Canada in the agreement. That is correct. If there was a reason for putting a definition of the United States in our Bill, then why did we forget Canada? Why was it important to ensure that the full jurisdictional rights of the United States be recognized in our Bill but we glossed over in a cavalier fashion—perhaps it was an honest mistake—what our territory, jurisdictions and rights will be? That creates a major problem since the United States still refuses to formally recognize laws made by other countries with respect to extraterritorial jurisdiction beyond its own territorial seas. That has been a clear statement of U.S. policy for decades.

With respect to the Polar Sea incident the Americans said: "We are moving through international waters and not Canadian waters". By accepting this definition can Hon. Members imagine what will happen when we get into questions of allocating resources? What would happen if under energy provisions a claim were made by Canada with respect to where the proper sharing of oil and gas should occur and the Americans were to say: "From which territory?". We would say: "Will it be from the Beaufort Sea which the United States claims is theirs?" Will we say no, that area belongs to us?, The Americans would come back to say: "We are sorry, in your own legislation you have given us that jurisdiction but you have not given it to yourself".

I submit to the House that this is an important amendment, and one I expect the Government to accept. Even if it believes that it is an omission, then surely to goodness it is crucial that we clarify that point and not make ourselves vulnerable to future challenges over disputed territories and have our own case weakened substantially. In an area in which we are defining these particular rights vis-à-vis the United States we have forgotten a very important component—our own country. It will be interesting to hear from representatives of the Government with respect to why it was more important for the Government to recognize U.S. jurisdiction over extraterritorial seas and seabeds and not recognize Canadian rights in the same respect.

One could interpret it to mean this. The Government did not want to incorporate language that might engage it in a dispute with the United States. Once again, as we have seen with respect to every step and stage of the Bill, the Government is trying to pacify, trying to downplay and to cover up, not get our American friends mad at us. That has been the standard operating procedure in this agreement. The consequence that we have seen time and time again is that we end up selling ourselves short. We end up surrendering certain parts of our sovereignty, certain parts of our rights and our jurisdiction.

I submit that this amendment to the interpretation part of the Bill plays an important role. It will have a very significant impact on the interpretation of the agreement if and when or ever it comes about. Surely, if the precedent set within this very important international statement by the Government that we are forgoing our own clear assertion of our extraterritorial rights in key areas of the Arctic, fishing rights, and others, is not corrected I believe it could become a legal precedent to be used against us not just by the United States but by many other countries. If we are not prepared to assert those rights in this crucial document, does that mean in fact that we are not prepared to defend those rights? That is the reason for this amendment.

• (1320)

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I would like to start in this historic debate by first saying that I think the amendments which have been brought forward by my friend from Winnipeg—Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy) are sensible and straightforward. It is something that I hope the Government will look at with care and will accept.

I think, at the start of this discussion, at the report stage of the Bill and on this first amendment, that one should also put certain points on the record. One should, for instance, impress heavily on the record the fact that in the legislative committee, where where this and other amendments were considered, a major fight was fought to see to it that across this country people would have a chance to be able to make presentations to this committee. I found it unfortunate that that was not accepted by the committee itself. I found, too, as I looked at the legislation which was in front of us, that the more groups we heard from, the more groups that spoke to us, the more the gaps came out in this Bill. We saw areas, from water to environmental concerns, to our territorial concerns, which had been considered but were not considered in this Bill.

We also felt that there was a certain degree within the committee itself of avoiding what was the major question which came before us again and again as groups called, and still call, for an election in this country, to see to it that they have a say in what happens to them and to their country in the future. Therefore, we have put forward a number of amendments. We have put forward amendments which take, for instance, the United States law and recognize some of the points which are made within that law, which make the United States law supreme over the agreement itself. We were not prepared, in our discussions in committee, to do that, and I deeply regret that because it means that United States law will dominate this agreement.

We were not prepared to respond to United States moves which have been put before us in their legislation, as to how they were prepared to move on subsidies. We felt that it was necessary, in a Bill from this House, to take the same position. We felt that provincial rights should be discussed, protected and safeguarded in this Bill.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Langdon: Concerning auto performance requirements, automobiles are very important to my constituency, but they have been desperately important to the whole revival of the economy of Canada throughout this past five years. That revival, I think, requires us to keep our freedom of action with respect to the auto sector.

It is also crucial that we maintain our concern and our control with respect to energy policy. There are parts of this Bill which are before us, to which we will be moving amendments which will very clearly take away the power of Canada to shape its energy policy in the future, while leaving the United States with the power to do so through its federal energy regulatory commission.

We also have a desperate need to look into the human casualties of this trade Bill, and there will be human casualties. The Government likes to talk of human casualties being very minimal. I guess, as one who has looked at adjustment restructuring throughout the world, this kind of major industrial restructuring, agricultural restructuring, social restructuring, services restructuring, is going to bring us, as a country, a lot of human casualties, who will have to be something that we respond to with humanity, with care, with passion.

So I am pleased to see this debate start today. I am pleased to see it start with this particular set of amendments, which set out for all of us to recognize that where we should start from is our definition of Canada, our territorial definition, of course, but also our definition of what we want to see for the future of Canada. Do we want to see a direction which takes us into closer and closer integration with the United States? Do we want to see a future where our children consider themselves essentially Americans? Is that what we want to see? I do not think so. I do not think so and I do not think that this House of Commons should therefore support great parts of this Bill.

An Hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Langdon: That is why we have moved these amendments. I also feel—and I say this with the greatest possible sincerity that I can muster—that it is absolutely ludicrous to make a major change in the future of our country, a fundamental shift which Canadians have fought in my constituency since the war of 1812, without their being able to have a say through an election, to see to it that there is a chance for them to shape the future of this country.

An Hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Langdon: We, therefore, will support these amendments. We will support other amendments, but above all, we will fight as hard as we possibly can fight to see to it that this Bill does not go through this House of Commons, that it is stopped, and that this Government is forced to go to the people and to let the people have their say, to let the people of Canada make the final decision on this crucial issue to the future of our country.

• (1330)

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to second the set of amendments moved by my colleague, our trade critic, the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy).

When you ask Canadians, as many polls have attempted to do over the course of the last few months, about whether you are in favour or opposed to free trade or whether Canadians ought to have a decision before this deal becomes officially ratified, one of the areas of concern that crosses over provincial and regional lines, economic and social lines, is the question of sovereignty. It is the question of the ability of the people of this youthful, energetic and dynamic country to decide for themselves what directions and aspirations they want to set forth.

As we start off this very important and historic debate for all Canadians, these amendments speak to a fundamental deficiency that I think is symbolic of the Government's entire initiative on the free trade front. When you stop and read Bill C-130, you find that the Government set forth to define what is meant in clear terms by this agreement. It defined what is meant by the word "commission", it defined what is meant by the word "Minister", and it defined what is meant by the word "prescribe", and finally it defined what "the United States" means. As was outlined very ably and articulately by our trade spokesperson, our Canadian Government forgot to define what it means to live in this country through the omission of stating very categorically and clearly what it is we define our Canadian territory to be. It would seem to me that, in a Bill of this magnitude, the Government would at least start from a point of strength, from a point of departure that would put clearly on paper and in writing our undisputed rights and territory as a nation, rather than allowing those very definitions to be interpreted by the Americans, or any other country, as they see fit.

Is it any wonder when you talk about sovereignty that Canadians begin to worry, that they begin to think of themselves as second-class citizens in the face of the Americans? Is it any wonder, when you ask Canadians, who do you think got the better end of the deal, who do you think the better negotiators were, who do you think gave up the most, or who do you think wanted this deal the most, they answer that across the bargaining table the Americans were clearly the victors?

This trade deal starts off by not defining and not recognizing what we as a country and as Canadians have every right to put on the record categorically and clearly, what we think this territory is all about that speaks to the sovereignty of this nation.

The Member from Winnipeg—Fort Garry moments ago pointed out the whole question and experience of the Polar Sea incident, the ridicule that Canadians felt as the American vessel went through our waters. Then, to add insult to injury, the Americans said they did not have to check with us and they did not have to get prior approval. What did we do about it? What about the insult Newfoundlanders felt when the Canadian Government put out a colour-coded map for our young students and had the Province of Newfoundland coloured under the United States of America. Those are the symbolic gestures that raise the concern and aspirations of Canadians.

Every Canadian wants to have a brighter economic future. Every Canadian is worried about future generations enjoying a lifestyle that we in this Chamber and our ridings are fortunate to share. They are not willing to do that at the cost of the inherent value of being Canadian and the inherent feeling of being in control of one's own destiny, in feeling the pride that comes with being the architects of our own decisions and ultimately in designing our future as we see fit. Therefore, it is very appropriate indeed that the Liberal Party, in the first seconds of this very important debate, in the opening lines of the free trade legislation that we are studying, is trying to amend and encourage the Government of Canada to recognize what is ours.

Let us recognize in the opening lines of our free trade legislation, or the Mulroney-Reagan trade legislation, what is indeed ours in a proud, profound and categorical manner. That is what our amendments strive to do. They do not strive to do the impossible, but what is expected of any national, sovereign government of the people. If the Conservative Government cannot muster the fortitude to send a signal to the Americans and to the world stating what is clearly ours, then they really do not deserve the opportunity of being at the head of the ship of state. They ought to stand up and be pro-Canadian. They ought to stand up and define what is ours, discuss the vision for those two countries, and then let the people decide which vision they want to embrace.

Very fundamentally and very early on, the Government has taken the time to define everything else, but it has left out our own country, Canada. We think that is very symbolic of what is troubling in this legislation. We are asking the House and, more important, the Government to recognize that deficiency, to recognize that fallacy, to recognize the ridicule and the embarrassment for any Canadian who happens to pick up this piece of legislation and recognizes that the Government has taken the time to define what is the United States of America but has forgotten to define, promote and defend what is clearly ours and what makes up this country.

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to say a few words on the first grouping of these amendments, which I am very happy to support.

In this first grouping we are dealing with the fact that the Tories lack any definition of Canada. When I say that, I do not simply refer to Bill C-130. The Conservative Party today, unlike the traditional Conservative Party, does not seem to have a very clear understanding of what Canada is all about. If it did have, it would not have entered into this trade agreement in the first place. The Conservative Party does not recognize that historically Canada has had a different tradition of government involvement in the economy, in culture and in social affairs than has the United States. The United States generally has followed the dictum, I believe, of Thomas Jefferson, a great American. He said that government is best which governs least. Canadians, because of our history and geography, have had to take a different approach. It has resulted in a different kind of society, a more caring kind of society, and now that is all being jettisoned.

• (1340)

Being a member of the legislative committee on Bill C-130 was instructive of the refusal of the Conservative members to look at this situation in any kind of total way. Instead, they focused very narrowly on the Bill itself. There was no possibility for the committee to travel to hear Canadians in their local settings saying how they saw this agreement changing their lives for the worse or how they saw the selling out of the future for their children and their grandchildren. Any hearings held had to be in the rather ornate setting of the Railway Committee Room, pretty far removed from the everyday lives of most Canadians.

Hundreds of organizations and groups from across Canada had wanted to be heard, but because of the time constraints the Government put on this legislation in trying to ram it through, they were not heard. Those who were heard were not able to be heard on the substance of the issue itself. They could not talk about the agreement with any hope of having the Government listen to them.

Mr. McDermid: Come on, Jim.

Mr. Manly: Not with any hope of having the Government listen to them. The agreement was not a part of the hearings. People could make representations on the agreement, but the agreement was closed. It was not possible to make any amendments to the agreement, and the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary knows that because he emphasized that time after time in the hearings.

The agreement was something that we could talk about, but it was not something that could be changed. It was cast in stone. The point that needs to be recognized is that when committee hearings—

Mr. McDermid: Be honest.

Mr. Manly: I am being honest. Why does the Hon. Member not be honest?

When the committee travelled across Canada for a very brief whistle-stop tour last fall, it dealt only with the principles of the agreement. The text was not yet available. The final agreement was signed on January 2 without the Canadian people having had an opportunity to deal with it.

Mr. Dick: Two and a half years.

Mr. Manly: Not with the text. Now all we are able to deal with is this Bill that implements the agreement, not the agreement itself.

I think it is important that we should pay some attention to what some of the witnesses said, not just those witnesses who were opposed to the agreement but some of those who supported it as well. For example, Mr. Powe, the Vice President of the Canadian Life and Health Insurance Association, said before the committee:

> "—they must always look at how favourable a climate there is between the two countries in terms of the legislative framework and the tax structure, which is extremely important."

I stated:

> "It would be important for Canada to keep its tax measures somewhat in line with those of the United States."

Mr. Powe answered:

> "Very much so."

It is this kind of concern we have. We are concerned that Canadian tax policies will be harmonized with those of the United States. This is something that the Canadian Life and Health Insurance Association agreed would have to take place if we were going to be able to compete. It is this sort of thing that will make it very difficult for us to maintain our social programs such as medicare. It will make it almost impossible for us to introduce new social programs.

When the Hon. Donald Macdonald appeared before the committee, we were talking about services. I see that Mr. Macdonald, a prominent Liberal who is supporting the trade agreement, has gone to his reward. At the committee, I said:

> "But the right of establishment is the key to this whole issue."

He said:

> "It is certainly one of the keys. The right of establishment, and you are established there, the right to be treated in exactly the same way as the local business. This is the concept of national treatment in article III of GATT. Traditionally, of course, this has been applied to products; it is now also going to be applied to the service sector."

I asked:

> "Would it be fair to say that the United States is much more of a service-exporting economy at present than Canada?"

He said:

> "There is no doubt that they regard this as one of their advantages. On the other hand, there are Canadian service industries that have had very considerable success in their market."

I asked:

> "Which Canadian service industries?"

Listen to the answer, Mr. Speaker. He said:

> "The Reichmann family, for example, has engaged in major developments on Manhattan Island.
> They are not taking down Canadian money, they are not taking down Canadian blocks of cement; they are taking down the ability as developers. They are taking those services into that market."

Our new High Commissioner to Great Britain has said that this agreement is basically designed for people like the Reichmanns. It is not designed to be of benefit to the average Canadian and it will not be of benefit to the average American. It will be of benefit to multinational corporations on both sides of the border.

We need a definition of Canada that is not only written into this legislation but is one that members of the Conservative Party have in their hearts and minds. We need a definition of Canada that will look at Canada as a nation that has developed in a distinct, separate way from that of the United States, a nation that has a contribution to make to our world and that is being foreclosed by this trade agreement.

I urge all Hon. Members to support this grouping of amendments moved by the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy). Even more than that, I think we have to move to give the people of Canada a chance to make their voices heard in this issue and to decide whether they want Canada to remain as a distinct society, or do they want to see our tax laws and eventually our social programs merged with those of the United States so that we will in fact become the 52nd or the 53rd state.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, it is very peculiar that on a Friday afternoon, when dealing with such an important amendment, the Government would be silent. There have already been four speakers, and I am the fifth, who have spoken on this amendment, which is of significance for reasons that have been explained and which I will explain as well. However, the Government is silent, and that is very peculiar.

Has the Government decided that it has a sufficient majority and that it is so drunk with arrogance that it does not have to reply?

Mr. Dick: We know what a filibuster is.

Mr. Caccia: If the Government had replied to the first speaker, perhaps we would have already moved to another amendment. However, we are still waiting to be enlightened by the Government on this matter.

It might be interesting for those who do not have the text of the Bill before them to know that in the interpretation of Bill C-130, there is a very thorough definition of the United States. It reads:

> "United States" means
> (a) the customs territory of the United States, including the fifty states of the United States, the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico,
> (b) the foreign trade zones located in the United States and Puerto Rico, and
> (c) any areas beyond the territorial sea of the United States within which, in accordance with international law and its domestic laws, the United States may exercise rights with respect to the seabed and subsoil and the natural resources thereof."

One would then want to know where Canada fits into this agreement. This amendment is being put forward because the United States is mentioned many times in the Bill and is defined. Canada, however, is mentioned many times in the Bill but is not defined. Therefore, it a very legitimate amendment put forward by the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy). He is asking the Government and the backbenchers on the government side why it is that Canada is not included in the interpretation of this Bill. Why is there this imbalance? This is what we cannot understand.

I am the fifth speaker on this amendment. The Government has been silent. I would hope that the Government would find the courage and the intellectual pride to give us an explanation as to why a definition of Canada is missing. This is an international trade agreement, with emphasis on the word "international". This is why in the interpretation there is a definition of one of the two parties to the agreement. Why is the other missing? We invite the Government to reply. Give us an explanation. Why does the Bill go on at great length defining the United States but not Canada? Not at all.

These are not rhetorical questions. They relate to the very substance of the Bill. They refer to the international incidents the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry referred to some 40 minutes ago. Yet all we have is silence.

Evidently the Government is embarrassed. Evidently it does not have a good answer. Evidently it feels that when it comes to the vote, it has the majority to steamroller us regardless of whether or not it gives us an answer. That would be most unfortunate. I hope the Government has enough pride in and respect for this institution to get up very soon today and give us an answer.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I cannot believe that no Member on the government side has an answer to the fundamental question posed here today. Where is the Parliamentary Secretary with respect to the definition of Canada? I would be very happy to allow Members on the government side, so few in number though they may be, who are interested in this issue—

Mr. McDermid: Look around you.

Ms. Copps: —tell us as to why it is there is no definition of Canada.

Mr. McDermid: Sit down and I will tell you.

Ms. Copps: The Minister responsible, who never even read the document, would probably stand up and say "trust me". We heard that before. We heard that about senior citizens' pensions.

As was pointed out by the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy), what happened there in the first year of the Government's mandate when sovereignty was threatened by the Polar Sea was that you had the Prime Minister on the one hand saying it was not an incursion, and on the other hand you had the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) saying it was. They were playing ping pong on the issue. The American Congress must have been laughing. They must have had a big chuckle because they know that if Canada brings forward enabling legislation which does not define what Canada is, then obviously the territorial dispute over the Beaufort, the George's Bank, and the dispute involving the Polar Sea in the Arctic will all go in their favour.

The legislation defines the United States but it does not define what is Canada. I would like to put forward the proposition, bizarre though it may seem, that the reason the Government failed to include a definition of Canada is that it does not understand the fundamentals of this country, territorially, geographically or spiritually.

What happened when the Americans came into Canadian waters on the Polar Sea, uninvited? Did the Prime Minister stand up and fight for Canada? Did the Secretary of State for External Affairs say to the U.S. President that you are uninvited, unwelcome, and you had better clear out of our territory? The only person who was charged as a result of that incident was the pilot of a small Canadian plane hired by the Council of Canadians who actually flew over the Polar Sea and dropped a Canadian flag on the deck. He did that so the Americans would know that in this country we understand what a territorial border means and we respect that.

The Prime Minister of Canada, kneeling as he usually does, to the President, did not say a thing to the Americans. Neither did the Secretary of State for External Affairs. However, a charge of dropping a dangerous object was laid against the pilot who flew that plane. That dangerous object was a Canadian flag. That pilot was charged with dropping a dangerous object on a boat which should not have been in Canadian waters in the first place.

That is why, in the context of this enabling legislation, we do not take the words of the Parliamentary Secretary who says "trust me", or the words of the Prime Minister who said that seniors citizens' pensions will never be touched. They are a sacred trust. We know what the words of the Government mean. They mean very little, and that is why we need a definition in law so our resources are protected both onshore and offshore. We will then be able to tell future trespassers on Canadian territory that by our law they have violated the agreement.

Yet the Canadian Government, in an obtuse, maniacal way, is trying to thrust a Bill on the Canadian people that will do nothing more than attempt to save the Prime Minister's political hide. Let's face it, the article in yesterday's Citizen was quite true. His own Party thinks the Prime Minister has a severe image problem with the public. He has a personality problem. People do not trust him. How is he going to be able to pull this one out of the bag? He has only one hope. He has to convince the Canadian public that somehow the trade deal is more important than his own character flaws. Unfortunately, he is afraid to see the trade deal illuminated in all its pieces, including a very fundamental lack of a definition of Canada. He is afraid to let the Canadian public see the details of the Bill and the agreement.

Today we saw the secret memorandum which was kept in the Ministry of Finance which basically told consumers that the people who may benefit from these—

Mr. McDermid: When are you going to start telling the truth for a change?

Ms. Copps: —alleged tariff reductions, 20 per cent though they may be, may be the retailers or wholesalers but it will not flow through to consumers. The Parliamentary Secretary is very anxious to speak from his seat, but unfortunately he has refused to give the Canadian people an opportunity to review this document in detail.

We believe this amendment is fundamental. We believe the definition of Canada with respect to asserting its territorial sovereignty is critical. That is why we feel this is a very supportable amendment. Certainly it will at least begin to put some flesh on the bones of legislation which is literally on the way to selling out Canada.

I hope the Hon. Member stands up and speaks, but I do not take the word of a Government and Prime Minister which has given us four years of broken promises. I want to see it in law. Any person in this Chamber who has practised law will know—

Mr. McDermid: Have you?

Ms. Copps: —that if it is not in the law, all the alleged good intentions of politicians and others mean absolutely nothing.

Mr. Dick: That is not true.

Ms. Copps: Why would the Government bring forward legislation that defines U.S. territory but not Canada? It is because the Government does not understand what Canada is all about. It does not understand what Canadians are all about. It is up to the Opposition through the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry to move this amendment in order finally to put a definition of Canada in this Bill.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Lewis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. There have been discussions between the Parties, and we appreciate their co-operation on this matter. I think you will find there is unanimous consent to the Government calling Bill C-145 and dealing with it in all stages without debate today and then immediately proceeding to Private Members' Hour.

• (1400)

Bill C-145 is an Act to amend various Acts to give effect to the reconstitution of the Quebec Provincial Court, Court of the Sessions of the Peace and Youth Court as the Court of Quebec. The Bill stands in the name of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent for the Hon. Member's proposal?

Court of Québec

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that the Official Opposition was indeed consulted and that we have given our approval to the proposed procedure and that we will join the Government in passing Bill C-145.

[English]

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, speaking on behalf of the New Democratic Party, we, too, agree to this process and believe that this legislation will in fact improve the administration of justice in Quebec. For that reason we are prepared to facilitate passage of the Bill.

QUÉBEC COURTS AMENDMENT ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Doug Lewis (for the Minister of Justice) moved that Bill C-145, an Act to amend various Acts to give effect to the reconstitution of the Quebec Provincial Court, Court of the Sessions of the Peace and Youth Court as the Court of Quebec, be read the second time and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Paproski in the Chair.

Clauses 2 and 3 agreed to.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Schedule agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being two o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS--BILLS

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-264, an Act to amend the Criminal Code (instruments and literature for illicit drug use), as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga North) moved:

That Bill C-264 be amended in Clause 1 by striking out lines 11 to 15 at page 1 and lines 1 to 5 at page 2 and substituting the following therefor:

"ited pursuant to the Narcotic Control Act, controlled pursuant to Part III of the Food and Drugs Act or restricted pursuant to Part IV of the Food and Drugs Act;

"illicit drug use" means the importation, exportation, cultivation, sale or possession of a narcotic, drug or other substance contrary to the Narcotic Control Act or Part III or IV of the Food and Drugs Act or a regulation made thereunder;

"instrument for illicit drug use" means anything designed primarily or intended under the circumstances for consuming or to facilitate the consumption of an illicit drug, but does not include a "device" as that term is defined in section 2 of the Food and Drugs Act";

He said: Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to rise to speak briefly on this very important Bill and the amendment which I tabled two days ago. I want to explain some of the reasons why this amendment was tabled and why this Bill is very important.

We debate things like child care in this House. We speak about doubling the number of spaces to look after the needs of the young people in our nation. Since 1984 we have reduced youth unemployment by six points. We have just debated for an hour the free trade agreement to ensure continued prosperity for the youth of the nation.

However, we abdicate our responsibility and duty by allowing contradictory messages to be sent to the youth of the nation by allowing head shops or drug paraphernalia outlets to sell their products, such as hookah pipes to the youth, the most important resource that we have in Canada.

A couple of associations objected to the Bill as it was worded and that is why I tabled amendments. The Canadian Pharmaceutical Association was concerned that under this Bill, as it was reported from committee, drug stores could be convicted of selling or giving hypodermic needles and syringes to diabetics. The Canadian Medical Association was concerned that if these hypodermic needles and syringes were obtained by someone claiming to be a diabetic who was actually a drug addict, it could promote the spread of AIDS.

Therefore, I believed it was necessary to move an amendment covering illicit drugs, illicit drug use, and instruments for illicit drug use. The first section of the amendment would add to the definition of illicit drug the category of controlled drugs regulated under Part III of the Food and Drugs Act. Controlled drugs include amphetamines and barbiturates. The Bill reported out of committee would have dealt only with narcotic drugs and restricted drugs. Any drug paraphernalia associated with controlled drugs would not have been regulated.

The second part of the amendment is technical in nature. On June 23 the legislative committee amended the definition of "illicit drugs" by adding the phrase "used in a manner contradictory to the provisions of the Narcotic Control Act". The committee accepted this amendment to respond to concerns from the Canadian Pharmaceutical Association regarding the application of the Bill to needles and syringes.

There were drafting problems, and this brought about the second part of the amendment.

The third part of the amendment has to do with instruments for illicit drug use. This amendment is designed to exempt medical devices which are subject to control by Health and Welfare under the Food and Drug Act from inclusion in this Bill. There was no evidence offered during meetings of the legislative committee to support the contention that medical devices such as needles and syringes are a problem in promoting illegal drug use. The Bill as reported by the committee would make it an offence for any group, which would include public health offices, to operate needle exchange programs to prevent the spread of AIDS. I have, therefore, submitted these amendments.

I went to the library and got the Act respecting food, drugs, cosmetics, therapeutics and so on. "Device" is defined as:

> "Any article, instrument, apparatus or contrivance, including any component, part or accessory thereof, manufactured, sold or represented for use in
> (a) the diagnosis, treatment, mitigation or prevention of a disease, disorder or abnormal physical state, or the symptoms thereof, in man or animal,
> (b) restoring, correcting or modifying a body function or the body structure of man or animal,
> (c) the diagnosis of pregnancy in humans or animals, or
> (d) the care of humans or animals during pregnancy and at and after birth of the offspring, including care of the offspring, > and includes a contraceptive device but does not include a drug;"

These are worth-while amendments and I request that every Member of the House support the Bill, not because I have brought it forward, but because we are sending a contradictory message to the youth of today. There are approximately 1,000 head shops across Canada, 27 on Yonge Street alone. These unscrupulous people set up head shops next to video arcades, where many youth of our nation tend to congregate, and sell this drug apparatus.

• (1410)

Cocaine is an illegal substance in Canada today yet the youth of our nation can walk in and buy a cocaine free-basing kit to make crack. It seems absolutely ridiculous.

I have asked for a legal opinion on the constitutionality of Bill C-264. I will willing to table a report to Charles Robert. It states:

> This opinion has been discussed with Marcel Pelletier who agrees that Bill C-264 could probably withstand a constitutional challenge.

It also states:

> "I trust that this opinion is satisfactory for the committee's purposes. While Bill C-264 would appear to be constitutionally valid for the reasons given herein, I cannot guarantee that a court would not come to a different conclusion based on a particular set of facts before it. Still, having taken into account what I believe to be the relevant considerations, the committee should feel sufficiently secure on the constitutional question to proceed as it wishes."

I have been given the assurance that the Liberal Party would support a Bill such as this. I believe any thinking Member would support a Bill such as this.

Many statements have been made in debate on this Bill to the effect that we might have to eliminate the writings of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle about Sherlock Holmes because Sherlock Holmes was a cocaine addict. Nothing could be further from the truth.

We are talking about eliminating magazines like High Times, a magazine which promotes the use of drugs to the youth of our nation. Why should we be sitting in the House debating child care, free trade agreements and trying to make opportunities for the youth of this nation when the moral fibre of our youth is being decayed? I urge speedy passage of this Bill and look for the co-operation of every Member of the House.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to make some brief submissions with regard to this piece of this legislation. As a representative of the Liberal Party I participated in the committee deliberations with regard to this Bill. I indicated at committee that the Liberal Party is prepared to support this private Member's initiative. I hope that the Hon. Member has the support and endorsation of his colleagues on the government side.

This legislation is a small step in the right direction. In my view, drug abuse is a national tragedy deserving of national consideration. It is not a problem that is unique to metropolitan Toronto, Montreal or any major urban centre in Canada. Drug abuse is a problem in every community in the country.

The people who are harmed the most are young people. They are exposed to drugs at a very early age. We as parliamentarians have a responsibility to do what we can to try to curb and eliminate to the largest extent possible illicit drugs in Canada.

One has to recognize that it is not the young people who import narcotics into Canada. It is not the young people who are primarily responsible for the trafficking of narcotics in Canada. They are adults. Any national drug strategy ought to include very serious and strict measures to curb the importation and distribution of narcotics.

This legislation would deal with drug paraphernalia which, as the Hon. Member indicated, is sold in head shops across the country. He indicated that there were approximately 1,000 of these outlets in Canada. We heard evidence from representatives of different police forces. We heard evidence from the drug enforcement section of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. They indicated as well that it was a step in the right direction. They feel that this legislation will at least stop the promotion of the use of illicit drugs in Canada.

As I was indicating, this is only a small step. There was a study done by the Standing Committee on National Health and Welfare which reported to the House. The committee looked into the problem of drug abuse in Canada. It concluded that alcohol is also a drug that ought to be considered in dealing with substance abuse. Many recommendations were made in that particular report, one of which particularly addressed drug paraphernalia.

In my view, what is also needed is a government initiative similar to the initiative taken in the United States, where they refer to it as zero tolerance. In other words, no amount of illicit narcotics, however small, will be an excuse before some very serious and far-reaching penalties are imposed. For example, if a single marijuana cigarette is found in a vehicle attempting to cross the border, then that particular vehicle ought to be impounded.

It seems to me that if we are truly serious about combating drug abuse in Canada, we can talk all we want as politicians and parliamentarians, but we in Canada should adopt a similar strategy of zero tolerance. In other words, if narcotics are found in a vehicle, then that vehicle ought to be impounded.

It seems strange that in the Province of Ontario, if one fishes out of season or hunts out of season and is caught, one is required to forfeit fishing gear, the trailer and all the fishing equipment that is used. There is public harm done when one fishes or hunts out of season, but it does not compare to the public harm that is done when people distribute and are in possession of narcotics.

Another major step that should be taken by this Parliament is the implementation of criminal legislation that will come down heavy on those who choose as a profession or as a way of making money the importation, distribution and trafficking of illicit drugs. If drugs are found on their person or in their possession, if they are convicted of a criminal offence, there should be forfeiture.

This Government has taken certain initiatives with respect to the profits of crime. In other words, those who profit from crime, those who profit from the drug trade, should not be allowed to reap the benefits of their illegal activity. If someone is convicted of trafficking in narcotics, why should the profits made as a result of that particular criminal activity not be seized and forfeited to the Crown? However, in my view, the initiative taken by the Government does not go far enough.

I believe the New Democratic Party expressed reservations about this particular government initiative in terms of the requirement of the major banks to report large transactions. In the United States there is a more stringent requirement. Banks and other financial institutions are required to report transactions, to track down and trace, as the Hon. Member put it, "black" money, that is money obtained by criminal activity. However, here in Canada, for some reason, the banks objected to this particular proposal. They felt it was an invasion of one's privacy. They thought it should be done voluntarily and they should not be required to report to the Government the unusual movement of money within their institutions. So if the Government is serious, it should move in that direction as well.

Let me conclude in the same way that I began. Drug abuse in Canada is a national problem. It is a national tragedy. The Government must take unequivocal and specific action to ensure that we do as much as humanly possible to eliminate the illicit use of drugs in Canada.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in debate on the amendment before the House. We are now at report stage of Bill C-264, presented in the name of the Hon. Member for Mississauga North (Mr. Horner). I want to make it very clear that we support the amendment, which would in fact ensure that concerns expressed both by the Canadian Medical Association and the Canadian Pharmaceutical Association are addressed.

In the Bill, as originally presented to the House, the sale of needles and syringes would be illegal. The Canadian Medical Association pointed out that this would cause major problems for diabetics and other patients requiring needles and syringes for self or home treatment. They also noted that the restricted access resulting from this legislation would result in more extensive sharing of syringes and needles among drug abusers, thereby increasing their risk of both hepatitis and AIDS infection. So to the extent it deals with this concern of the Canadian Medical Association and the Canadian Pharmaceutical Association, we support the amendment.

I just have a few brief words on the legislation itself. Members will know that the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs reported to this House in September of 1987 on the whole question of booze, pills and dope. It made a number of recommendations in this respect. One of the recommendations was in the area of drug paraphernalia and so-called "head shops". I think it is important to read into the record the recommendation that was made by the standing committee. It recommended that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn), in co-operative efforts with his provincial counterparts, develop legislation to close head shops, commercial enterprises whose principal business is the sale of drug paraphernalia and items which describe their use and which advocate the use of illicit drugs.

Following that recommendation, the Government responded officially and announced the establishment of an interdepartmental working group to look into all aspects of this problem. Officials from the Department of Justice, the Department of the Solicitor General and the Department of National Health and Welfare were included in this interdepartmental working group. The mandate of the group was to consult with interested parties, including provincial Governments, and to review developments in the United States and other jurisdictions.

The mandate of this interdepartmental working committee is very important. I would suggest that its consultation with parties interested in this area and, particularly, its consultation with provincial Governments, is very important. Its examination of the history of similar legislation in the United States and elsewhere is also very important.

I suggest it is only appropriate that this House respect the work of that important interdepartmental working committee. For that reason, I suggest that to move ahead at this point, today, with the legislation, improved though it may be by passage of the amendment which is now before the House, would in fact preclude the very important study which is being done by the interdepartmental working group. I believe we should recognize the important work that is being done. This is a sensitive and important question. There are a number of areas of concern with respect to the whole question of drug abuse and the very serious inadequacies of the Government's response in the area of alcohol and drug abuse, particularly in terms of rehabilitation and education programs. That is an area about which we, as New Democrats, feel very strongly.

We believe as well that there has to be a careful examination of the legislation to ensure that it does in fact comply in all respects with the provisions of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I note in particular the provisions with respect to literature. I know this will not be the only opportunity in which this House will have the occasion to discuss this legislation. As I understand it, it will in fact, under the rules, come back before the House. Let us hope that the interdepartmental working committee which is addressing this question seriously will examine the important issues surrounding it and will report back to the Government and that following that report, we can then examine the legislation, giving it the care it obviously deserves.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak strongly in favour of passing the Bill today and to say that I think we owe an enormous vote of thanks to parents, legislators, store owners, victims of all manner of crimes, Canadians generally, and to the Member for Mississauga North (Mr. Horner) for bringing this measure along. As you will recall, Mr. Speaker, between 1980 and 1983 I tried to get a similar Bill through but was not successful. I can only pay the utmost respect to my colleague for having persevered and pushed this Bill through to the point at which it is now.

I understand that Assistant Commissioner Heaton of the RCMP told the Standing Committee on National Health and Welfare that closing head shops—and we heard earlier there were thousands of them across Canada—would be the single biggest factor in combating the drug trade. I understand that head shops have been abolished in approximately 40 States in the United States and that young people are now coming to Canada where the paraphernalia can be bought freely and taking it back to the United States.

I was extremely disappointed to hear the spokesman for the New Democratic Party indicate that those Members will attempt to talk the Bill out today. I very much hope that this will not be done by other Members in the House for many reasons. I would indicate to Members of the New Democratic Party that if they do talk the Bill out, everyone watching this debate or reading about it, will know—

Mr. Robinson: Let's have the question now.

Mr. Keeper: Why do you raise that prospect?

• (1430)

Mr. Kilgour: At 3 p.m. we will know whether or not members of the New Democratic Party will talk this Bill out. If they do I can assure them I will do everything I can to make it an election issue in the upcoming election.

Mr. Keeper: Why do you not deal with the substance of the Bill instead of throwing around accusations?

Mr. Kilgour: My friend from Burnaby objects to the possible censorship aspects of the Bill. The Hon. Member for Mississauga North dealt with that. If my friend from the NDP is suggesting that magazines such as "High Times", "How to Cheat Your Drug Dealer", and "How to Make Money in Dealing in Drugs" are the kind of titles he is worried about, then I do not think his constituents share his view.

The Bill has had amendments made to it which will make it a better Bill. It deserves the support of all Members from all sides of the House. I give full credit to the Hon. Member for York South—Weston (Mr. Nunziata) for his contribution to the debate. I believe his Party has indicated that it will support the Bill.

The drug problem has been called an epidemic in this country. I know that Hon. Members will say that the Hon. Member for Edmonton—Strathcona used to be a drug prosecutor. I also indicate that I have defended people charged with drug offences. I would like to give an example of a client that I once defended on a heroin charge. This is a matter of public record since he said it in court. He began his day every morning at 8 a.m. or 9 a.m. by getting up and going around and breaking into apartments. In this case it was in Winnipeg. He did that until 2 p.m., by which time he would have raised enough money to buy his two caps of heroin. He would arrange to deliver the money to his dealer. He would take his two caps of heroin and get high, have dinner and go to bed. He would wake up the next day and do the same thing. He would do this seven days a week.

A study done in Philadelphia showed that about 200 drug addicts—that few—over a 10-year period committed something in the order of half a million crimes in the City of Philadelphia. If that is the type of thing that the Hon. Member for Burnaby—

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Let us make it abundantly clear that the New Democratic Party does not advocate that. Possibly the Hon. Member for Edmonton—Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour) does. The absolutely misleading presentation by this Member is completely—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would say that that is a point of debate. If the Hon. Member wishes to express it in debate, that is fine. The Hon. Member for Edmonton—Strathcona has the floor.

Mr. Skelly: If he would use it properly maybe we would all benefit from it.

Mr. Kilgour: The people of Canada will know and judge whether Members opposite calling for more study and for more interdepartmental committees—

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The previous speaker's information and presentation is absolutely incorrect. The Government is calling for more study and wishes to present that study—

Mr. Horner: That's wrong!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That, too, is debate. The Hon. Member for Edmonton—Strathcona has the floor.

Mr. Skelly: You are full of hops.

Mr. Kilgour: The Hon. Member for sunglasses tells me that I am full of hops.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. My riding is Comox—Powell River.

Mr. Kilgour: The point in this debate is not hops. It is coke, crack and heroin. It is all manner of narcotic drugs which, as I was indicating, have caused in one city alone half a million crimes in a 10-year period. As someone who used to be a prosecutor in Vancouver, I assure the Hon. Member that they have caused a great many crimes of violence, crimes of property—all kinds of tragic crimes in the Lower Mainland of British Columbia.

Mr. Skelly: Maybe we are talking about the quality of prosecution and not the relevant issues of this particular Bill.

Mr. Kilgour: Let me say to you, Sir, or to anyone who might be watching this debate or reporting on it that if the five other members of the New Democratic Party who are sitting in the House when I sit down talk about this Bill beyond the next 25 minutes—

Mr. Keeper: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to know why the Hon. Member does not deal with the substance of the Bill. Why does he not tell us what he thinks about the issue?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is not a point of order. The Hon. Member will have an opportunity to speak this afternoon. There will still be plenty of time.

Mr. Keeper: Restrain this man and tell him to stick to the truth.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Edmonton—Strathcona has the floor.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, let the people of Thunder Bay, Winnipeg, Vancouver and Regina note if these Members get up to talk this Bill out. If this Bill is not passed today—

Mr. Keeper: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The Member continues to accuse us of doing things which we have no intention of doing. He is not dealing with the substance of the amendment. What is wrong with him?

Mr. Skelly: He is talking the Bill out.

Mr. Kilgour: Let the people know that we have 20 minutes and if the four of them get up to talk this Bill out it will drop to the bottom of the list. There will then be 11 matters ahead of it before we can vote on it.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have two points to raise. First, at this point, as I understand it, we are debating an amendment. I would ask the Speaker to restrict the scope of debate to the substance of the amendment. Second, we are prepared to vote now on this amendment. It is the Hon. Member for Edmonton—Strathcona who appears to want to continue the debate. Let us get on with the vote.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is not a point of order. The Hon. Member for Edmonton—Strathcona knows what the amendment is. I would appreciate very much if he would carry on with his debate.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, I would be delighted to sit down and vote on the amendment. I hope very much that I am in error when I am told that the New Democratic Party will talk this Bill out. I am delighted to say that I support the amendment. The reasons have been given very capably by the Hon. Member for Mississauga North. I will now sit down.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today in support of the Bill proposed by my colleague from Mississauga North. I am also pleased to support the amendment that is offered to the Bill. I want to indicate that I would have supported this Bill with or without the amendment that has been proposed.

If this Bill can, and I believe it can, in some small measure contribute toward the lowering of drug abuse in our society, then we should congratulate the Hon. Member for Mississauga North and all others who support it. I know that my colleague from York South—Weston (Mr. Nunziata) was the only opposition Member who participated in the committee process on this Bill. As a matter of fact, one Party did not participate in the debate at the committee level at all.

Mr. Della Noce: What was the Party?

Mr. Boudria: An Hon. Member asks me what is the name of that Party.

Mr. Nunziata: The NDP boycotted the committee.

Mr. Boudria: I have to say that it was the New Democratic Party.

Nevertheless, without prolonging this debate any further, I want to indicate to the House that on behalf of my colleague from York South—Weston and myself we are prepared, if it is required, not only to adopt the Bill now but to give unanimous consent to move immediately to third reading so that we can pass it in all stages and so that it can be sent to the Senate this very afternoon.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question is on the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 13(5), the recorded division stands deferred until 6 p.m., Monday, August 15, 1988.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I want to make it abundantly clear for the record that it was members of the New Democratic Party who stopped this Bill from becoming law. They could have given their consent to this Bill to become law this afternoon.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 3 p.m., pursuant to Order made Monday, June 20, 1988, this House stands adjourned until Monday next at 11 a.m. pursuant to Standing Order 3(1).

The House adjourned at 2.40 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion carried.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, in anticipation that later today the Government will likely indicate its intention to invoke closure and muzzle Parliament, I thought this would be an appropriate Bill to introduce.

The purpose of the Bill is to afford Canadians, as beneficiaries of the gradual development of representative parliamentary democracy, the opportunity to commemorate, with the appropriate ceremonies in schools and other public places, the signing of the Magna Carta on June 15, 1215, an act which marked the beginning of the decline of arbitrary power and the emergence in Britain of responsible government from which the entire democratic world has benefited.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion carried.

Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point or order. I have been awake here all morning. As far as the House of Commons is concerned and the work it has done, it might as well be in a sleep walk. I was here with a tie, still with my open-toed sandals, but that is the compromise and that is not the point. I did not vote, although I was here, and I do not intend to vote on any more of these facetious delaying tactics.

I abstained because I believe a Member has the right to bring in a Bill, but obviously what is being done is being done for many other reasons than to introduce a Private Member's Bill. It is a perversion of the parliamentary process.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I was present in the House when the vote was taken. I did not vote because I refuse to take part in this foolish waste of time.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, I voted against the motion, not because I am against the Magna Carta but because the New Democratic Party is using this process as a delaying tactic. New Democrats do not want to discuss the substance of the trade Bill.

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, I would like to rise on the same point of order. I am not against the principle of introducing motions. I am against the principle of the New Democratic Party that with closure will be unable to—

HERBICIDES

BAN ON USE OF 2,4-D ADVOCATED

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the pesticide 2,4-D prompted two studies in the United States, each suggesting that there is a link between a form of lymphatic cancer and this common weed killer. A recent Canadian study has shown that the frequency of this type of cancer and the number of deaths it causes have doubled, claiming 1,500 lives in 1986. Yet most other types of cancer have been declining in Canada.

Because the effects of 2,4-D occur over a long time, it is unlikely that we can accurately determine how many Canadians are at risk today. But evidence is mounting that the pesticide 2,4-D is a threat to public health. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp), who has a clear responsibility to protect the health of Canadians, must fulfil his mandate and ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) to suspend the use of 2,4-D in Canada until we know for certain that public health is not threatened.

NATIVE PEOPLES

NEEDS OF SASKATCHEWAN INDIAN AND MÉTIS SENIOR CITIZENS

Mr. Don Ravis (Saskatoon East): Mr. Speaker, Saskatchewan has the second highest proportion of its residents which are of native ancestry. Unfortunately, as a recent study points out, Indian and Métis elderly are experiencing a great deal of hardship in obtaining quality housing. There are problems with inadequate sanitation and other amenities which seniors require on a day-to-day basis. This situation will require that the needs and concerns of the Métis and Indian elderly are dealt with urgently.

These are only several examples of the problems facing Indians and Métis senior citizens. It is apparent that CMHC and Indian Affairs must respond to improve the quality of housing and social services that are made available to this group of Canadians.

FISHERIES

BRITISH COLUMBIA SALMON FISHERY

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, the present Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Siddon) has managed to enrage commercial fishermen, native fishermen, sports fishermen, community groups and even the general public in British Columbia.

The fisheries resource—in particular salmon—is highly prized for food as a source of income and for recreation. The Minister does nothing when his friend, Bob Wright, publishes false and misleading ads in the Vancouver Sun, encouraging people to come to the Queen Charlottes for "unlimited salmon fishing". The Minister in fact supports this by suggesting that when the commercial sports catch increases, there will be a reduction in the quota for the commercial troll fleet, and obviously further closures for native and sport fisheries.

At a time when there needs to be a serious and clear-headed approach to negotiating and settling the issue of aboriginal rights to fish, the Minister supports litigation to halt all negotiations.

At a time when there needs to be a serious development of user group watershed management boards, to assist in developing plans to protect our endangered runs, the Minister doles $6 million to study why pollution is killing the belugas in the St. Lawrence but does nothing to stop the pollution or to protect our B.C. salmon and steelhead. Canada needs a Minister of Fisheries and Oceans who finds solutions, not one who creates problems.

FREE TRADE

LOSS OF NUMEROUS JOBS IN GRANBY

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to report to this House today that 131 people have already lost from free trade. Last Friday, Mr. Speaker, the Simonds Company of Granby announced that it was laying off 131 workers and told the local press that it was moving all its operations back to the United States in order to serve the North American market from its base in Massachusetts.

Mr. Speaker, Simonds has just given the people of Granby, Quebec and Canada a bitter foretaste of free trade. And unfortunately, at this time, there is no adjustment or early retirement program for these workers, who are already in their fifties, and even if Canadian interests wanted to take back this factory, there is no industry adjustment program for businesses.

So in the coming days and weeks, we will ask the Government to assume its responsibilities and to act on this free trade issue for which 131 families have already paid the price.

Mr. Speaker, Quebecers and Canadians care about this issue and I am convinced that the Simonds example shows us how the Government intends to treat Canadian workers in future.

IRAN-IRAQ CEASE-FIRE—CANADIAN PEACEKEEPING FORCE

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, the senseless war between Iran and Iraq had gone on for too long, and the world welcomes the cease-fire arranged through the auspices of the United Nations.

Canada, with its expertise in peacekeeping operations, has been asked by the United Nations to help monitor the cease-fire and re-establish peace in this beleaguered region.

Our good wishes go with the 500 Canadian troops who will be involved with this difficult and dangerous work. May their efforts be crowned with success.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

WESTERN CANADA—FEDERAL CONTRACTS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, for decades westerners have known that they have not received their fair share of attention from the federal Government. Whether it was regional development programs, industrial grants, CIDA contracts, or orders from Supply and Services, the West never received its fair share.

Have things improved with the Mulroney Government? No. In 1985, 6.5 per cent of federal Supply and Services spending was in British Columbia. In 1986 that figure fell to 5.3 per cent; and in 1987 Supply and Services spending plummeted to account for only 4.1 per cent of federal spending. B.C.'s share of Supply and Services contracts has fallen by 37 per cent since the Mulroney Government assumed office.

B.C. has 11.4 per cent of Canada's population, yet last year received only 4.1 per cent of Supply and Services contracts for various goods and services. This is a disgrace. It is high time that British Columbia and the West got their fair share of the federal Government's support. Westerners are not prepared any longer to accept being second-class citizens of Canada.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

GREAT LAKES—POLLUTION OF SEVERN SOUND

Mr. John Oostrom (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, Severn Sound, a shallow bay which is the entrance to the Trent Severn Waterway, has been classified by the International Joint Commission as one of 17 toxic hot spots on the Canadian side of the Great Lakes.

The study has found that this area, noted for its fine sports fishing, is experiencing a decline in such species as bass and pickerel. Mercury contamination has been found in large pickerel.

It is clear that this area, one of the province's best both visually and economically, is facing a crisis if action is not taken soon. Regulations must be brought forward which will control the amount of phosphates presently entering the water from boats, farms, and towns. Phosphates, like acid rain, are threatening to take away Canada's beautiful environment. I urge federal and provincial agencies to take action before it is too late.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT—NIAGARA GRAPE GROWERS

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, farmers in the Niagara Peninsula are literally dying on the vine while the Government does nothing about an alleged promise to buy them out on the basis of the sell-out of the free trade deal. Last week I met with grape growers in my riding and they will be forced to come to Ottawa to dump sour grapes on the desk of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) if they are going to get any action. They do not want the grape buy-out to be simply another election promise. They need action now.

There are farmers who cannot get operating loans. There are farmers who want to move into other commodities. They are unable to do so because the Government has failed again in its promise to help those grape growers who were sold out as a result of this trade deal.

There are seven seats in the Niagara Peninsula. There is not a single Conservative who will be re-elected in that area because they have not spoken out to fight for their people. They have forced the farmers on to the streets of Ottawa to fight for justice.

I urge the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) to follow through on his promise at least to provide financial compensation for the Niagara grape growers.

S. O. 21

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT—NORTHERN ONTARIO BUSINESSES

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, having had the opportunity over the last number of weeks to sit as the representative from northern Ontario on Bill C-130 in the legislative committee on trade, may I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to those in the House who have a tendency not to believe in the trade deal and how important it is for regions of the country such as northern Ontario, that the President of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, Roger Hamel, came out strongly in support of the free trade agreement which will benefit small and medium-sized businesses in northern Ontario, as has the Canadian steel industry which is vital to northern Ontario, my riding, and the mining community.

• (1410)

The C.D. Howe Institute has stated that Canada should establish and maintain the attitude that we should have a free trade agreement with the United States.

When one listens to members of the Opposition and the negative approach that they have, one cannot help but conclude they are not interested in building a strong future for Canada and Canadians. They are more interested in destroying something that will be good for each and every one of us.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

CRITICISM OF GOVERNMENT POLICIES

Ms. Marion Dewar (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, it has been reported that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) has been very generous to the people of his home riding of Manicouagan. Over $288 million has been spent in that riding, confirming what we already know about the Conservatives' tactics. When a region matters in terms of electoral politics, it can be assured of financial attention from the Prime Minister. This was true of Lac-Saint-Jean, and it is true of Manicouagan.

But what about the rest of the country? Some areas are not as well served. In Newfoundland, in Nova Scotia, and in the interior of British Columbia, people are struggling with high rates of unemployment and few job opportunities. Where are the hand-outs there? In my riding of Hamilton Mountain many older workers were laid off last January and they are still waiting for a federal government program to help them cope until they can collect their pensions. But they do not live in an important riding for the Conservatives, so they will have to continue waiting.

The Conservatives have made regional disparities in this country worse, because they can only see where their interests lie, and not the importance of all Canadians' interests.

AGRICULTURE

EFFECT OF DROUGHT ON FARMERS IN SOUTHERN ONTARIO

Mr. Jim Caldwell (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, while some parts of Ontario have received adequate rainfall over the past few weeks—and it rains here in Ottawa today—the drought and its effects continue in my riding of Essex—Kent. Above normal temperatures and lack of rain have devastated many of the earlier processing crops, many of which have had to be by-passed or ploughed down because of poor quality.

Corn and soybean crops have not matured properly, and yields are expected to be reduced dramatically. Fruit crops, such as apples and tomatoes, have not fared well from the extreme heat and lack of rainfall.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) indicated earlier that assistance would be forthcoming for Ontario farmers.

The farmers in my riding have been thankful for the assistance the Government has provided in the past, but they do not want to be forgotten as conditions improve in other areas of the province. The drought is still a reality in the deep south of Ontario, and its effects continue to take their toll on crops and on the financial position of farmers.

POLITICAL PARTIES

FREE TRADE DEBATE—POSITION OF LIBERAL PARTY

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, the Mulroney-Reagan trade deal is currently at report stage in the House of Commons. Because the agreement seriously compromises the integrity and sovereignty of our nation, it is absolutely vital that Members are permitted the opportunity to debate a host of important amendments proposed by our Party's trade critic which seek to correct a piece of legislation that will drastically alter the fabric of Canada.

Yet, for the last several days, between the Government's threat of imposing closure, which would prematurely choke off any debate, and the daily, useless delay tactics of the NDP, which prevent the debate from continuing, the principle of conducting a mature and frank discussion is being sabotaged.

While the Liberal Party is firmly opposed to this deal, it is not afraid and indeed wishes to discuss the issues freely and fully. By threatening to close debate, the Tories are revealing their undemocratic streak, while the NDP's delay tactics are clearly non-democratic.

We Liberals not only demand that the Government should let the people decide, but we are also asking, for the peoples' benefit, that the Conservatives and members of the NDP should let the Members speak.

FREE TRADE

NEGATIVE EFFECTS ON AGRICULTURE—NEED FOR GENERAL ELECTION

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, on July 30, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture issued a press release expressing its concern about Bill C-130, the Bill to implement the Prime Minister's trade agreement.

According to the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the Bill contains harmful measures for many agricultural sectors. For example, this group mentions that the marketing system and the future of quotas are in danger; that the whole Canadian Wheat Board marketing system is threatened; that the quality standards for Canadian agricultural products are seriously affected and finally that Canada's horticultural industry is in danger.

Considering this alarming situation, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister must ask Canadians for their consent before final passage of this Bill.

The Prime Minister received a mandate against free trade. If he changed his mind in favour of such an agreement, he certainly did not consult the public and above all, he does not have the right to impose this agreement without the approval of the Canadian people. The final decision belongs to the people.

POLITICAL PARTIES

FREE TRADE DEBATE—POSITION OF NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I would like to state just for the record that what the New Democratic Party is doing is to try to use this democratic House to see to it that there is sufficient opposition placed before the Government in its attempt to push through a trade deal for which this country has not given it a mandate. For the Liberal Party to criticize us for trying to use this democratic House is absolute idiocy of the highest order.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CENTRAL AMERICA—SUGGESTED ROLE FOR CANADA

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I think this weekend all Canadians were encouraged by the sight of troops of our Armed Forces going to join a UN peacekeeping mission in the Middle East. We all applaud the reinvigoration of the United Nations as a way of resolving conflict.

I hope this initiative will not deflect our attention from major conflicts in our own hemisphere. The situation in Central America is deteriorating rapidly. There have been new calls by the Reagan administration for support for military aid for the Contras. President Arias in Costa Rica is once again appealing for outside countries to provide some support.

Six weeks ago a Commons committee unanimously put forward a series of recommendations as to how the Government of Canada could provide important and constructive recommendations, proposals and initiatives to help the peace initiative along. We have heard nothing from the Government since then. This is where Canada could provide a major contribution to an area of conflict in our own hemisphere and demonstrate our capacity and maturity as a country to help resolve conflicts.

I hope this House will call upon the Government to take some action and show the kind of initiative for peacekeeping that we can provide in Central America.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FISHERIES

NEWFOUNDLAND AND LABRADOR—INSHORE FISHERY

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. It concerns the disastrous failure of the inshore fishery in the Province of Newfoundland and Labrador this year. Indeed, the fishery has suffered through all of Atlantic Canada. The fishing season has been under way now for 13 weeks and many fishermen, particularly those on the great northern peninsula of Newfoundland, during that 13 week period have only been able to earn an income for a maximum of two or three weeks. Incomes are so low that fishermen and their families are no longer just frustrated or angry. For the first time ever, they are hungry. They are simply not earning enough to feed their families.

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Tobin: Fishermen are primary producers just as the farmers of Canada are primary producers. They deserve assistance from their Government in times of natural disaster.

My question is a straightforward one. Is the Government prepared, given the natural disaster that is happening and the human tragedy that is unfolding, to provide direct financial compensation to fishermen and their families throughout Newfoundland and Labrador and, indeed, those fishermen and their families who are affected throughout Atlantic Canada?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, this Government, whenever it has been shown that an additional program is needed to assist inshore fishermen, has instituted such programs.

I noticed, listening to the hon. gentleman with care, that he did not cite any facts whatever to establish the point that he is attempting to suggest, namely, that there has been a disastrous failure in the inshore fishery in Newfoundland and Labrador this year. He cited no facts because the facts do not support that statement.

There is no evidence, Mr. Speaker, of a disastrous inshore fishery about the coast of Newfoundland and Labrador this year. In certain locations fish may or may not have come in, as happens from time to time. Generally and by and large, the inshore fishery in Newfoundland has been a good and reasonable fishery this year. If there are areas where fishing disasters occur locally, where special assistance might be needed, certainly we would consider that.

• (1420)

I might point out to the hon. gentleman that we have invigorated and added funds to the Small Craft Harbours Program. For example, I announced last week the awarding of a contract in Bauline for a $2.2 million breakwater for the fishermen of Bauline, as well as a $2 million contract in Flat Rock for the same purpose, all of which assists our inshore fishery.

PROPOSED MEETING OF FISHERMEN

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I have been a Member of Parliament going on nine years now, and in those nine years I have met fishermen many times. I have often seen them angry. I have sometimes seen them frustrated and sometimes seen them happy, but I have never seen fishermen whose spirits were broken and who had tears in their eyes. If the Hon. Member for St. John's West were in his riding, he would know what the evidence is. It is human tragedy right on the wharf. That is the evidence.

There is also the evidence of a telegram from the President of the Fishermen's Union of Newfoundland and Labrador which says that there is mounting evidence of a failure of disastrous proportions of the inshore fishery in the Straits of Belle Isle and along the West Coast of Newfoundland. If the Hon. Member for St. John's West were less concerned about pork-barrelling in St. John's West and more concerned about—

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the Hon. Member to put his question.

Mr. Tobin: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Fishermen and their families, wives and children, cannot wait for an election campaign for assistance.

If the Hon. Member for St. John's West wants evidence of what is happening out there in the inshore fishery, will he accompany me, or will he have one of his colleagues accompany me to a public meeting to be held in St. Anthony, Newfoundland, Saturday night, where many hundreds of inshore fishermen who are hungry and whose families are hungry will turn out in the hope that someone is listening and someone will give them the same kind of consideration rightly given to the farmers of Canada when they needed help?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I repeat, we have yet to hear one solid fact, any fact, that shows, in the hon. gentleman's words, that there has been a disastrous failure of the inshore fishery in Newfoundland and Labrador this year. I can vouch for the fact that in the areas that I have visited which are in my own district, Peter's River, St. Mary's Bay and other places on the Avalon Peninsula, there has been quite a good inshore fishery this year.

There are some spots where the fishery is bad, like Lawn and the St. Lawrence area. There may be some areas in White Bay where the fishery has been bad, but the spirits of the fishermen are not broken. There has not been a disastrous inshore fishery in Newfoundland.

As a matter of fact, the cod fishery on the Labrador coast, particularly in the Black Tickle-Batteau area, has improved tremendously in the recent several weeks. The complaint there is that there is glut that cannot be handled. There is so much fish being caught that they cannot all be properly disposed of.

With reference to the mention of St. Anthony, I know that St. Anthony has recently come within the boundaries of the hon. gentleman's district, because this is the first time I have ever heard him mention St. Anthony in this House.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, we just heard from the Minister representing Newfoundland in the House of Commons that, providing there is no problem in St. John's West, there is no problem in Newfoundland and Labrador. That is exactly the problem with that kind of parochial, pompous mentality of this Minister.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER SEND REPRESENTATIVE TO MEETING

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, the Minister obviously takes his cue from the Prime Minister who said: "I gave you $261 million". What kind of morality has a Government that has a quarter of a billion dollars to help the re-election of a single Member, even the Hon. Member for Manicouagan, and no money for inshore fishermen who are hungry right now?

I ask the Minister again, if he cannot make it because he cannot find his way outside St. John's West, will he send representatives to St. Anthony to talk to real inshore fishermen in real difficulty who want real help, not more clichés in the run up to an election campaign, and who want help now?

• (1425)

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I do not need to travel to St. Anthony. If St. Anthony had a credible representative in this House he could report to this House on the situation in St. Anthony, not this ridiculous posturing that there has been a disastrous inshore fishery in Newfoundland this year. That is not a true statement and no facts are given to back it up.

With reference to Newfoundland, this Government is trying to spend $1 billion in Newfoundland and the other four Atlantic provinces under the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency and it was voted against in this House by the hon. gentleman, and stopped in the Senate by the Liberal Party of Canada. Despite that, there have been 132 projects and an expenditure of something like $40-odd million under that program in Newfoundland and Labrador alone this year. It is the Liberal Party that is the enemy of the people of Newfoundland and Labrador.

Why does the hon. gentleman not announce what district he is going to run in? He does not even have the guts to say he is going to run in his own district. He is getting ready to make a strategic move.

Ms. Copps: Stick to cucumbers, Crosbie.

FREE TRADE

CLOSURE OF SIMONDS COMPANY IN GRANBY—LOSS OF JOBS FOR NUMEROUS EMPLOYEES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister for International Trade, who challenged my colleague to find a genuine case of human suffering.

Mr. Speaker, last Friday 131 workers at Simonds in Grandby were advised that their plant would be closing because Simonds was transferring all its operations to the United States—all in the spirit of free trade—to take advantage of the economies of scale, and that North America would be covered from Pittsburgh, Massachusetts.

I want to ask the Minister for International Trade what kind of program and what kind of reply he has in mind for these 131 workers who are the first 131 victims of free trade.

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, there are no victims of free trade, nor are there likely to be any, particularly if the free trade agreement is passed by this Parliament and goes into effect. There will be no victims. There will be 26 million Canadian beneficiaries if this agreement goes through.

How can the hon. gentleman get up and ask me a question about victims of free trade when the U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement is not even in effect, and when the hon. gentlemen opposite say they are going to see that it is not passed, that they are calling on the Senate to forestall the legislation being passed? They are going to forget the conventions of the Constitution. Next they will call on the Governor General to dismiss the Government and act in the Government's place. That is just as democratic a procedure. Perhaps they will ask the United Kingdom to have the Queen take over there as well.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. Just imagine, you are a man with a family who just got his lay-off notice and you are listening to the Minister's asinine statements . . .

Mr. Speaker, even supporters of free trade . . .

Mr. Speaker: Would the Hon. Member please ask his question?

Mr. Lapierre: My supplementary to the Minister for International Trade is this: What kind of answer does he have for 131 heads of families who, as of November, will no longer have their jobs because their U.S. company has decided to close its branch, in line with the principles of free trade, to take advantage of the economies of scale, the economies of greater volume, and centralize its operations at a simple plant in the United States? What does he have to say to these men who are in their fifties and who have mouths to feed?

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to look at, and it would be interesting to establish, the exact facts with respect to the establishment to which the hon. gentleman is referring. A plant is not closing in Granby or anywhere else because of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement. There is no agreement in effect. There might be some employer attempting to use this as an excuse, because blaming somebody else for your own actions, of course, when you are being criticized is always very easy.

I imagine this is a situation comparable to a letter we had from Robert White of the Canadian Auto Workers alleging that a plant in Lindsay, Ontario, was being closed because of the free trade agreement. It turns out that it had nothing at all to do with the free trade agreement and that all 86 employees were being transferred to another plant in Ontario by the same company. That is the kind of despicable tactic that the hon. gentlemen opposite and the NDP are too fond of using.

HOUSING

PROPOSED NATIONAL SALES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. He will be well aware that at this moment tens of thousands of young Canadian families are struggling to achieve what used to be an attainable dream in Canada, that is, home ownership. The Minister will remember that two years ago he eliminated the Registered Home Ownership Savings Plan.

The Canadian Homebuilders Association indicates that Part II of tax reform, which the Minister does not take much time to mention to Canadians these days, means that the new national sales tax, which is stage 2 of tax reform, will add on average 9 per cent to the cost of a new home in Canada. In Metro Toronto that means, of course, that the average price of a house will be increased by at least $20,000.

At a time when an increasing number of Canadians are finding it difficult to qualify for a mortgage and afford their first home, why is it that the Minister's tax reform proposal will result in at least $20,000 added to the price of a home in Metro Toronto as suggested by the Canadian Homebuilders Association?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, first, I should point out to the Hon. Member that we have had an extended period of housing starts. There have been over 200,000 annually with the rate sustained practically on a monthly basis for the last year and a half or two years. There are clearly a lot of homes being built and those homes are being sold to end purchasers.

I do not deny for a minute that we have had a significant increase in the price of housing in the Metropolitan Toronto area. That is obviously of concern. I have commented on that in the House prior to this.

With regard to the specific question the Hon. Member has raised, I think it is too early to draw the conclusion which the Homebuilders Association has drawn. We are working closely with that Association in order to assess its view of the impacts of Phase 2 tax reform.

We must also recognize that there is a significant amount of tax in the price of a home now, whether federal sales tax or retail sales tax. That must be taken into account because in any new sales tax reform existing sales taxes will be replaced.

LEVEL OF PROPOSED TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of Finance respond to the suggestion by the Canadian Homebuilders Association that the 9 per cent which they predict will be the actual federal sales tax which will be introduced, likely next year, will make it impossible for about 60,000 young families to own their own homes? The Minister of Finance may deny that figure.

However, since Phase 2 of tax reform is coming in, likely next year, what percentage will the national sales tax be? Will it be 5 per cent, 8 per cent or, as the Canadian Homebuilders Association has suggested, about 9 per cent? Will he at least come clean and tell us what the percentage will be?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in the White Paper on Tax Reform brought out a little over a year ago we were pretty clear on a number of elements of tax reform as we knew them at that time and were able to assess them at that time. Since then we have had considerable consultations with provinces and industries including, as I said, the homebuilding industry, in order to assess how Phase 2 of tax reform should be implemented in the fairest possible way. Those discussions are continuing.

We have had a number of meetings with the Homebuilders Association, as I said, and a number of meetings with provincial government representatives. Those consultations are continuing. Once we have had a chance to pull all of this together there will be further statements on behalf of the Government setting out the answers to some of the questions the Hon. Member may have in his mind.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, is the Minister of Finance prepared to accept the fact that when the national sales tax is introduced next year it will result in a massive tax grab by the Government and that the average family will be losing hundreds of dollars through new taxes that the federal Government will be imposing on the average Canadian family? That will result in a significant increase in the rate of inflation which will obviously drive interest rates up.

The Minister of Finance ought to come clean on this whole scenario before the general election. However, if he does not respond to those questions, perhaps he could at least give us a commitment now that the new national sales tax will be no more than 10 per cent.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, any new sales tax proposal will not be the massive tax grab that the Hon. Member said it will be. That might be the case should the New Democratic Party, God help us, form the Government. That is not going to be the case with tax reform.

Canadians will remember that I said, in the lead-up to the personal income tax changes, that 85 per cent of Canadians would see an increase in their take-home pay as a result of tax reform. That is happening. If Canadians reflect on what happened in July they will see that what I said before was correct. They will see that their take-home pay has gone up.

Tax reform is a tax-neutral exercise. We are not attempting to gain new revenues as a part of tax reform. We did not in Phase 1, we have said we will not in Phase 2, and we are going to hold ourselves to that commitment.

REGIONAL INDUSTRIAL EXPANSION

PROPOSED QUÉBEC AND MANITOBA ALUMINUM SMELTER PROJECTS

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister. This weekend the Prime Minister announced the federal Government's endorsement of a proposed aluminum smelter plant in Sept-Îles in his riding in Quebec.

Is the Government aware that Alumax, another consortium, is presently examining the possibility of an aluminum smelter in the Province of Manitoba? The Prime Minister's announcement this weekend will severely prejudice the decision being made on that aluminum smelter, by indicating support for one region of the country and not for another.

Why did the Prime Minister make this announcement before the Government has had a chance to undertake the proper feasibility studies, to announce a policy related to the support for aluminum smelters, and to ensure that there was a proper regional balance of support and resources for those kinds of initiatives all across Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, with reference to the proposal for setting up an aluminum smelter plant in Sept-Îles, of course the Government is quite favourable to having this plant in Sept-Îles, a region that was severely affected during the last recession. However, this does not mean we will not consider other regions in Canada. It does not mean a decision has been made. It means that the Government looks very favourably on the proposal made by members of an international consortium that wants to set up operations in Sept-Îles. If they want to go ahead, the Government will support such action, but we intend to support other proposals along the same lines in many other regions in this country.

[English]

MANITOBA PROJECT—REQUEST FOR FEDERAL SUPPORT

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I am asking a serious question about whether the Government is prepared to support two massive aluminum smelters in Canada for an export market which has already virtually reached capacity.

My supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion. The Conservative Government of Manitoba has already asked the federal Government for support and endorsement for the project in Manitoba but has yet to receive any kind of acknowledgement, support, or promise of any resources for that project. Therefore, in order to ensure a proper balance, fairness, and equity, is the Government prepared to support the project in Manitoba as equal to that in Sept-Îles?

[Translation]

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I fail to understand why the Hon. Member is apparently opposed to job creation and economic development across Canada. The Government has always said it was in favour of creating jobs. And that is exactly what we are trying to do. We are trying to create jobs where there is genuine potential for doing so, and we intend to support projects as they are submitted, in all regions across the country, as we have been doing for the last four years.

THE ECONOMY

EFFECT OF INTEREST RATES ON EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. An analysis by the Economic Council shows that a 1 per cent drop in interest rates in the U.S. and Canada would increase jobs in Canada by 84,000 jobs by 1990. Could the Minister tell us the job losses that Canada will suffer from last week's large interest rate increases in the United States and Canada?

• (1440)

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if the Hon. Member is honest with himself and the people of Canada, he will read much more from that study by the Economic Council where they point out to the Hon. Member a number of aspects of such a study that they probably sensed the Hon. Member would ignore.

If the Hon. Member wanted to put the total question to the House he would also say that if we do not address the problem of inflation now we will see interest rates rise on a much more permanent basis, with a far more deleterious effect on pricing levels in this country, on the competitiveness of this country, and therefore on our job creating capacity.

I have said in the House on many occasions that we are trying to avoid that with the interest rate policy that the Bank of Canada is following today.

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, this is a case of interest rate increases in both Canada and the United States. How much will that cost across Canada in terms of lost jobs, compared to what we would otherwise have? How many jobs is his policy costing this country?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this line of questioning takes me back to November, 1984, and May and June of 1985, when his Leader said the policies being proposed by this Government through the economic statement and the Budgets would cost this country 100,000 to 200,000 jobs. Since that time we have created somewhere between 1.2 million and 1.3 million jobs.

That is the fundamental point that I am making.

Mr. Riis: Look what kind of jobs they are.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): They are permanent jobs. The Hon. Member asks what kind of jobs they are. They are permanent jobs, 85 per cent full-time jobs, unlike the previous four years under the Liberal Government when they were 85 per cent part-time jobs.

Let me get back to the point raised by the Hon. Member. You cannot isolate one element from economic policy and ask the simplistic question that the Hon. Member just asked. You have to look at the full range of economic policy, including controlling inflation. It was back in the 1970s and early 1980s that we let inflation get out of control in this country, beginning under the regime of the Leader of the Opposition when he was Minister of Finance, when they allowed inflation to get out of control. That led to interest rates in excess of 20 per cent—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

FEDERAL SPENDING IN MANICOUAGAN

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. It concerns the shameful performance of his boss over the weekend. During the weekend the Prime Minister bragged about pouring millions of taxpayers' dollars into his own riding. The largess of these hundreds of millions of dollars is reported to be somewhere between $261 million and $500 million.

How can the Prime Minister justify favouring his own constituency while ignoring the needs of millions of other Canadians? How can he justify the use of government jets to do what he himself qualified as campaigning?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member might be more specific. I would like to know precisely what he is against. He talks about the $200 million, but in that figure is included $110 million to clean up the St. Lawrence River. Is the Hon. Member against that? If that is the position of his Party, let him so state.

Mr. Boudria: I am for equity, that is what I am for.

[Translation]

QUERY WHY PRIME MINISTER DOES NOT FAVOUR OTHER CONSTITUENCIES AS MUCH AS HIS OWN

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): I would like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister, and I may remind him that it was his Government that put an end to regional development programs and made it harder for people on unemployment insurance to receive their benefits, to explain the Prime Minister's largesse in his own backyard and the fact that by the same token he is neglecting other Canadians.

The Prime Minister said yesterday that his constituents had sent their taxes to Ottawa for forty or fifty years, but if that is a prerequisite for receiving federal funding, why doesn't the Prime Minister make the same funding available to the 281 other ridings in this country? And why is the Prime Minister showing favouritism to his own riding instead of trying to help all Canadians from coast to coast?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I realize that the Hon. Member had his question written out before he heard the answer provided by the Minister of Finance to another Member with regard to the economic performance of this Government, particularly in the area of job creation throughout Canada. Some 1.267 million jobs have been created across the country because of sound economic policy, with sound regional development policy.

If the Hon. Member is arguing against a $65 million program for regional development in that particular area which has had significant amounts of high unemployment there, if he is against the fact that this Government zeroes in on pockets of high unemployment, let him so state.

The fact is that the performance of this Government in terms of job creation, economic growth, and in terms of addressing regional development problems has been 1,000 per cent better than the administration of which he was a member.

MANITOBA ALUMINUM SMELTER PROJECT

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg—Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, my question relates to a previous question in which the Minister who responded said that he did not understand the nature of the question and the concern that Manitobans had about the Prime Minister's promises respecting an aluminum smelter in Quebec. That tells me that the Minister and his colleague still do not understand the sensitivity of Manitobans about how they have been treated by the Government on the CF-18 decision and a host of other matters.

Perhaps the Minister in charge of Manitoba, the Member for Provencher, can state why Manitoba had to be treated to this spectacle of hearing over the news that the Prime Minister was responding with respect to an aluminum smelter in Quebec, when the Government and people of Manitoba have yet to have their request in that respect even acknowledged?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member asks a valid question that deserves an answer. I believe that in Quebec there is a concrete proposal that has been discussed by companies, which has been put forward, and which received support in the initial form. In Manitoba there is not a proposal. There are two companies in Manitoba that are presently discussing with the Government of Manitoba the opportunities that can be provided there. The Government of Canada is familiar with that, and when something concrete comes forward the Government of Canada will react.

Mr. Blaikie: It is ironic that the Conservative Government is always talking against the notion of a planned economy but it seems it has nothing against an economy that is planned according to the election agenda of the Government.

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg—Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to whomever is responding for the Government next on this issue. What is the Government's plan with respect to aluminum smelter development in Canada? When will the people and the Government of Manitoba know what is the policy, or is there only a policy that relates to the electoral agenda of the Prime Minister as he sees fit from weekend to weekend?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification): Mr. Speaker, as the Hon. Member should know, back in 1982-83 there was a proposal for an aluminum smelter in Manitoba when the NDP Government happened to be in power at that time. There was a concrete proposal at that time in 1982-83, and nothing came forward in Manitoba on an aluminum smelter in 1982-83.

Mr. Axworthy: The offer was made.

Mr. McKnight: There was not an offer made.

Mr. Axworthy: Yes there was.

Mr. McKnight: It was rejected if there had been one, because it did not take place. There is not an aluminum smelter in Manitoba.

There are two companies discussing opportunities with the Government of Manitoba. When those opportunities are further developed, the Government will explore them with the Province of Manitoba, as we would with any other Government.

HEALTH

PESTICIDE ALLEGEDLY USED BY CALIFORNIA GRAPE GROWERS

Mr. John Oostrom (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The United Farm Workers of America have accused California grape producers of using a pesticide which may cause cancer and birth defects. A nerve gas type agent is being used which has not undergone any testing at all with regard to long-term health effects.

Will the Minister investigate these allegations? If indeed the grapes have been sprayed with this pesticide which may affect an individual's health, will he ban the importation of grapes from California?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Department of Agriculture, as the Hon. Member will know, conduct regular examinations and tests of fruit imports, in this case California grapes, for pesticide residue on those grapes.

It is interesting to note that members of the California Department of Food and Agriculture have also spoken on this issue claiming that the grapes are safe. The CLC has stated that one of the pesticides, dinoseb, is a residue on the grapes. Dinoseb has not been used since 1986, but it still claims that they were using it. Perhaps it is an old briefing note that it had.

From National Health and Welfare's point of view, our officials are continuing to test. Obviously, if there is any pesticide residue, those grapes would not be allowed in under regulations that are in place.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

PERIOD REQUIRED TO QUALIFY FOR BENEFITS—
DISADVANTAGED REGIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Westmorland—Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State (Employment and Immigration). The people in southern New Brunswick are still unsure of their status with respect to the period of eligibility for unemployment insurance. The change-over from ten to sixteen weeks applies to all rural areas, which are bearing the brunt of a change that was meant for urban centres. In July, the Minister allowed for separate treatment for the Outaouais area, because the urban area of Hull did not reflect the situation of the rural population. The situation is exactly the same in New Brunswick. Furthermore, the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration stated in its unanimous report, right at the beginning, and I quote:

> Your Committee believes that there should be no tightening of entrance requirements nor reductions in either the level or duration of benefits in high unemployment regions. At the same time, your Committee supports the principle that the same treatment should be afforded claimants in all regions.

My question is this: Can the people of New Brunswick expect to receive the same treatment as the people in the Outaouais, and will the fair treatment the Prime Minister demanded for the people in his riding and for people in disadvantaged areas also apply to the people of New Brunswick?

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration)): Mr. Speaker, I am familiar with the situation in our so-called disadvantaged areas because I come from a region where as far as I am concerned, the unemployment rate is still far too high. So I can assure the Hon. Member that I am concerned about these regions.

The House is also aware that regional unemployment is used to determine the number of weeks required to meet the criteria: between ten and fourteen weeks. It is also true that when the economy improves, which happened, because we are an excellent Government, in certain regions, the criteria must be changed as well. So I can say that I am concerned. I have ordered a study, and in the weeks to come, I should be delighted to provide the requisite response.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member has the floor to ask a very short supplementary question, please.

SITUATION IN NEW BRUNSWICK—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Westmorland—Kent): Mr. Speaker, the answer is completely unacceptable. For people in some regions, they act right away. For New Brunswickers, they take the time to conduct studies. The Minister has all the information at hand, namely the unemployment rate for all regions of New Brunswick. So will the Minister act now to give New Brunswickers justice?

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration)): Mr. Speaker, this Government treats Canadians of whatever region fairly. We worked hard with an employment strategy and a healthy economy. Economic conditions are excellent and as I was saying, we are putting in place mechanisms tailored to workers in New Brunswick as elsewhere.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

WALPOLE ISLAND—PROPOSED WATER PIPELINE FROM LAKE HURON

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Finance. Since the dramatization of the blob in the St. Clair River by my colleague from Essex—Windsor the communities of Wallaceburg and Walpole Island Indian Reserve have experienced 247 spills and five water cut-offs. The Province of Ontario has promised 75 per cent of the funding for a pipeline from Lake Huron.

My question to the Government is this. When will the Government respond to the requests of the Hon. Member for Kent and the people of Walpole Island and Wallaceburg and kick in its share so that that pipeline can be completed?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to inform the Hon. Member that members from the Government side have already brought this matter to our attention. There have been meetings held by the regional office in Ontario to discuss with the Walpole Band and other concerned citizens the opportunities that can be realized by joining together with the Province of Ontario and the Government of Canada to provide the service. The Hon. Member must recognize, and so should the Province of Ontario, that Indian people who happen to live on Walpole Island also have an opportunity to secure drinking water from that pipeline without additional costs being provided.

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, I have no idea what the Minister was trying to say. The question is very simple. Some $288 million was provided for the Prime Minister's riding. Only a couple of million are necessary here to provide clean water for Walpole Island, which is a federal responsibility, and Wallaceburg. You have a Member there who is being hung out to dry.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification): Mr. Speaker, my colleague is not being hung out to dry. He has been very active in acquiring an opportunity that has been provided because of an expenditure by the Government of Ontario so that we can join with the Government of Ontario to provide access to drinking water to Walpole Island. There are discussions going forward now between the regional district in Ontario and Walpole Island.

The Hon. Member talks about spills and clean water and refers to the Prime Minister's riding. Some $110 million were spent on the St. Lawrence, which goes beyond the Prime Minister's riding. If the NDP and the Hon. Member are against the clean-up of the St. Lawrence, then please say so.

HERBICIDES

2,4-D—REQUEST FOR SUSPENSION OF USE

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare who undoubtedly knows that a study has been completed in his Department by Dr. Morrison showing that there is a steady increase in the occurrence of a form of lymphatic cancer linked to the common weed-killer 2,4-D.

The study by Dr. Morrison also establishes that the frequency and the number of deaths have doubled at a time when most other types of cancer have been declining. He suggested that there is a link with the 2,4-D weed-killer.

My question is simply this. Will the Minister ask the Minister of Agriculture to suspend the use of this weed-killer until there is a clear demonstration that such a weed-killer is not a threat to human health?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, this question or a similar one was asked of the Minister of Agriculture last week. The Hon. Member knows what the reply was.

I should indicate to the Hon. Member that there is an ongoing study of the issue, as well as a working committee. I will check with them again in terms of that work and in terms of any recommendations. The answer that the Hon. Member and the House received last week on 2,4-D is still the same this week.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Davenport on a short supplementary, please.

REQUEST FOR MINISTERIAL COMMITMENT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, because the answer was inconclusive it is important for the sake of public health to ask this question of the Minister himself. He has a mandate to protect Canadians from a threat to their health.

Therefore, I need to know from the Minister whether he will take it upon himself not to launch another study and put at risk the health of Canadians, but urge the Minister of Agriculture to suspend the use of 2,4-D until it is proven that there is no such threat as demonstrated by the study by Dr. Morrison. Will he give us that commitment today?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, in my first answer I was not suggesting another study. I was outlining for the Hon. Member and the House the work that is ongoing and that is being done with respect to 2,4-D.

• (1500)

Additionally, the Hon. Member should know that information and very strong recommendations in terms of the application of 2,4-D and how those who apply 2,4-D can protect themselves have also been part of the ongoing work of the Department of Agriculture and of my Department. For example, much of the damage was done by people who were not taking proper precautions in the application of 2,4-D. That work has been done.

In the remainder of that answer, Mr. Speaker, I was not suggesting another study.

FORESTRY

REQUEST THAT SEPARATE MINISTRY BE ESTABLISHED

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. During the 1984 election campaign the Prime Minister promised time and again that there would be a full Ministry of Forests and a full Minister appointed at the federal level, and that was restated in the PC Campaign Handbook on page 105.

I would like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister if, before the next election is called, there will be a full Minister of Forestry and a full Department at the federal level.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I think that everyone in the House would realize that the current incumbent who is responsible for forestry is doing an excellent job and has made a tremendous impact upon the forestry industry.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: Success is what we are after here, and there has been a tremendous amount of success in terms of promoting the forestry industry in Canada, and particularly recognizing the jurisdictional responsibility in the hands of the provinces.

Clearly the federal Government has accepted its role and responsibility in this regard, and will continue to do so.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FORESTRY AGREEMENTS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I take it that the answer is no, that there will not be a full Minister of Forestry in Canada under a Conservative Government.

My supplementary question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister or to the Minister of Finance. Has the Government decided in principle whether or not to sign new five-year forest renewal agreements with the provinces?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, those agreements are currently under consideration by Cabinet colleagues. When a decision is reached with regard to them, and the other ERDA agreements are completed, an announcement will probably be made.

Vacancy

Mr. Speaker: I want to advise that there will be a single question from the Hon. Member for Hamilton East, and a single question from the Hon. Member for Yorkton—Melville.

COMPOSITION OF IRAN-IRAQ PEACEKEEPING CONTINGENT

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Defence I would like to direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister. I am sure all Canadians are praying for the safety of the 500 person contingent that is being sent over on the peacekeeping mission.

I would like to ask the Government, why Canada, without any advice or suggestion from the United Nations, has unilaterally decided to send a contingent which excludes women, excludes people of Jewish and Arabic origin, and which is contrary to the Canadian Human Rights code.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can answer that question as Acting Minister of Defence and indicate that I am not able to provide an answer to the question of the Hon. Member at this time. I will have to seek to establish whether those are the facts of the situation.

I am sure that the Hon. Member will appreciate that this is a dangerous situation into which Canadian troops are being sent. There is a great deal of evident danger that might be more perilous for certain persons than for others, and that may well be part of the consideration in taking this into account.

Nevertheless, I will determine the facts and make sure the Hon. Member receives a complete answer.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

NORTHERN HIGHWAY EXPENDITURES

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. A few days ago his boss was in his riding of Manicouagan, Québec, and he announced that some $288 million was being spent in that riding. In addition, some $40 to $50 million was committed during the Lac-Saint-Jean by-election to build a road from Lac-Saint-Jean to Baie James.

In the name of regional fairness, I would like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister why the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has cut back on northern highway spending by $25 million in the last three years, and why it has cut back spending on the Alaska Highway by some $13 million between 1983 and 1987. In the name of regional fairness, why is that happening?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I can only draw from the criticism of the New Democratic Party the fact that it is against the clean up of the St. Lawrence River, because $110 million of the funds the Hon. Member has referred to is included in that.

If the position of members of the New Democratic Party is that we should not support the clean up of the St. Lawrence River, let them so state. If it is also the position of the members of the New Democratic Party that we should not be extending regional development programs in areas of high unemployment, let them so state. This is precisely what is being done.

We are attacking the problems of high unemployment in certain areas of the country where the rate of unemployment is unduly high. We are attacking pollution. This Government has one of the best environmental records in the history of any Government in Canada. If Hon. Members are not supporting that, let them so state.

VACANCY

EGMONT—GEORGE HENDERSON, BY RESIGNATION

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received a communication notifying me that a vacancy has occurred in the representation, namely, George R. Henderson, Esquire, Member for the electoral district of Egmont, by resignation. Accordingly, I have addressed my warrant to the Chief Electoral Officer for the issue of a new writ of election to the said electoral district.

The Hon. Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development on a question of privilege.

PRIVILEGE

PRESS RELEASE OF MINISTER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the question of privilege which was initiated on Friday in my absence by the Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton). The Hon. Member for Skeena suggested that a press release put out by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development was not accurate. In reading that press release it could lead one to believe that legislation had already been passed.

I would like to draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, the discussions that had taken place in the standing committee in March, May, and June where it was my understanding, in looking at Hansard, that all Parties supported a change in the death rule.

I had forwarded to the clerk of the committee on aboriginal affairs, and the two spokesmen from the opposition Parties, draft comments on the legislation regarding the remedial action needed to correct this inadequacy in Bill C-31. I received support from the Hon. Member for Cochrane—Superior (Mr. Penner). I believe that the actions we have taken and will take will correct the problem.

In referring to the press release, Mr. Speaker, if it is read in pieces, it does lead one to infer that action has already been taken. I am sorry if that is the way the press release was presented, but in no way has the ability of the standing committee on aboriginal affairs been impinged to reply on Bill C-31.

If the Hon. Member for Skeena suggests that there is not all-Party support for the changing of the death rule as it applies to Bill C-31, I can correct that and state that I believe I have the support of the Hon. Member for Cochrane—Superior and his Party and of the Government to change that.

Mr. Speaker: This matter refers to a question of privilege raised by the Hon. Member for Skeena several days ago. The Chair has not decided whether or not it is a question of privilege. Listening carefully to the Hon. Minister's remarks, I take it he concedes that at least part of the press release was inaccurate; am I correct in understanding that?

Mr. McKnight: It could be viewed as misleading.

Mr. Speaker: From what the Hon. Minister has said, I take it that he is expressing his regret, and that may well end the issue. However, naturally there may be some debate between the Hon. Member for Skeena and the Minister about what may or may not flow from that. However, I will hear the Hon. Member for Skeena in response.

• (1510)

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Minister. I think his remarks were kind, useful, and helpful to those people who did misunderstand the intent of the press release. It was widely carried in the media, quite often as a letter to the editor, and a great deal of confusion was caused in many areas of the country where the death rule has been a problem.

With respect to all-Party support in the way it was worded there is no doubt in principle that all three Parties want the death rule amended. When I raised the matter on Friday the way I did, I wanted to make it clear to the Minister that I had contacted his office and was refused the opportunity of being provided with what I thought might be another draft.

There is an earlier draft of some months ago which I think the Minister, a member of the Liberal Party, and myself have seen, but following the press release I thought some other action might have been taken and I wanted to peruse the new amendment. If it is the same amendment as before, perhaps the Minister could indicate that that is still the case.

I thank the Minister for having cleared on the record the problem with the misunderstanding right across the country.

Mr. Speaker: As I indicated, there may be some question that both the Hon. Member and the Hon. Minister may want to discuss and that might be a very convenient thing to do.

First, I want to say that the complaint brought to the House by the Hon. Member for Skeena was clearly a justifiable complaint. It may not have been a question of privilege but it was certainly a complaint.

I want to thank the Hon. Minister for coming into the House at the first opportunity and very clearly acknowledging that perhaps at least in some particulars the press release was not as carefully drafted as it should have been. I think that ends the issue.

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Friday, August 12, consideration of Bill C-130, an Act to implement the free trade agreement between Canada and the United States of America, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee; and the amendments of Mr. Axworthy:

Motion No. 1

That Bill C-130 be amended in Clause 2 by adding immediately after line 21 at page 2 the following:

"Canada" means the territory to which Canadian customs laws apply, including any areas beyond the territorial seas of Canada within which, in accordance with international law and its domestic laws, Canada may exercise rights with respect to the seabed and subsoil and their natural resources;"

Motion No. 61

That Bill C-130 be amended in Clause 60 by adding immediately after line 28 at page 52 the following:

"Canada" means the territory to which Canadian customs laws apply, including any areas beyond the territorial seas of Canada within which, in accordance with international law and its domestic laws, Canada may exercise rights with respect to the seabed and subsoil and their natural resources;"

Motion No. 65

That Bill C-130 be amended in Clause 76 by adding immediately after line 3 at page 62 the following:

"and "Canada" means the territory to which Canadian customs laws apply, including any areas beyond the territorial seas of Canada within which, in accordance with international law and its domestic laws, Canada may exercise rights with respect to the seabed and subsoil and their natural resources."

Mr. Speaker: Before trespassing into the difficult ground of this ruling on amendments, I am informed, and I hope that this is so, that copies of my ruling, in both official languages, have been distributed. This may well be because we had a few extra days to task the translators with what has been for them a difficult time, which I know all Hon. Members understand. I am sure Members would want me to indicate to our translators that we do sympathize with their difficulties and appreciate what they do for us so much of the time.

I am now ready to give a final ruling on the motions in amendment to Bill C-130, an Act to implement the free trade agreement between Canada and the United States of America.

There are 102 motions in amendment set down on the Notice Paper in relation to Bill C-130, an Act to implement the free trade agreement between Canada and the United States of America. As Hon. Members know, I gave a preliminary ruling Friday last on the first three groupings. Members will thus bear with me, I am sure, as I go over all the motions in this final ruling as I wish them to be as complete as is possible.

[Translation]

Motions Nos. 1, 61 and 65 are in order and will be debated together and a vote on Motion No. 1 will apply to Motions Nos. 61 and 65.

On Motion No. 2, I have serious reservations because the intent of the amendment is to add a definition of cultural industries to the Bill. This is a substantive amendement as there is no mention at all of cultural industries in the Bill.

I would refer the Hon. Member to Paragraph (10) of Citation 773 of Beauchesne's 5th edition, on page 233:

> A substantive amendment may not be introduced by way of a modification to the interpretation clause of a bill.

The reference is to the Journals of May 21, 1970, page 835. Consequently the motion is out of order.

[English]

I have misgivings with respect to Motion No. 3. The Member's intention is to amend the agreement as published in the Canada Treaty Series under subsection 2 to exclude explicitly the large scale export of fresh water. I wish to remind the Member that treaty-making power is within the prerogative of the Crown and, therefore, the agreement itself cannot be amended. In Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, Citation 778, it is stated:

> When a Bill is introduced to give effect to an Agreement and the Agreement is scheduled to the Bill as a completed document, amendments cannot be made to the schedule. An amendment to the clauses of the Bill for the purposes of withholding legislative effect from the document contained in the schedule is in order; also as are amendments to those clauses which deal with matters not determined by the document contained in the schedule.

Consequently, I have to rule the amendment out of order.

[Translation]

I also have misgiving with respect to the admissibility of Motion No. 4. This motion seeks to amend Clause 3 which stipulates the purpose of the Bill and sets out the objectives of the Agreement in terms identical to those found in Article 102 of the Agreement. The Chair is of the opinion that this motion changes the intent of the objectives as stated in the Agreement and, therefore, rules it out of order.

Motions Nos. 5, 6 and 8 are in order and will be grouped for debate but will be voted upon separately.

[English]

Motions Nos. 7, 18, 26, 27, and 34 were moved in committee. Motions Nos. 26 and 27 were ruled out of order and Motions Nos. 7, 18, and 34 were moved, debated, and negatived in committee. Slight variation in the wording does not affect the intent of the motions. Therefore, according to Standing Order 114(10), I will not select them for debate.

I also have misgivings with regard to Motions Nos. 9, 10, 12, 13, and 14. There is nothing mentioned in the Bill or the agreement concerning aboriginal claims and the various programs referred in these motions. However, the intent of these motions is to limit the operation of this Act with respect to these matters. I would, therefore, give the benefit of the doubt to the Hon. Member and allow these motions to be put to the House. In addition, the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry after consultation has convinced me that Motion No. 11, which was debated and negatived in committee, is of enough importance that it warrants further consideration.

[Translation]

Thus Motions Nos. 9, 10, 11, 12, 13 and 14 will be grouped together for debate and a vote on Motion No. 9 will apply to Motions Nos. 10, 11, 12, 13 and 14.

Motion No. 7A which is similar to Motion No. 10 will not be selected.

[English]

I also have reservations with regard to Motions Nos. 15 and 35. These Motions seek to ensure that the provincial Governments are free to exercise certain powers notwithstanding the provisions of the agreement. There is, however, no reference in the Bill to any restrictions or obligations on the provinces in the matters stated in the motions. Both the Bill and the agreement place the responsibility for implementation on the Government of Canada. These motions go beyond the scope of the Bill and are thus out of order.

Motion No. 16 causes me concern because the intent is to restrict the powers granted to the federal Government to proceed with legislation in the future with regard to this agreement as set out in Clause 6. This, in my opinion, goes beyond the scope of the Bill because it is introducing a new concept which is inconsistent with Clause 6. Therefore, I must rule it out of order.

[Translation]

Motions Nos. 17, 19, 21, 22, 23 and 25 will be grouped for debate and voted upon separately.

Motion No. 20, in accordance with paragraph 3 of Citation 773 of Beauchesne's Fifth edition, is out of order.

Motions Nos. 24, 33, 42 and 82 will be grouped for debate. A vote on Motion No. 24 will also apply to Motions Nos. 33, 42 and 82.

• (1520)

[English]

Motions Nos. 28 and 29 infringe upon the financial prerogative of the Crown since the creation of such a commission or an inquiry board would require the expenditure or disbursement of public funds, and I refer Hon. Members to Citations 540 and 773(7) of Beauchesne's Fifth Edition. Thus, these motions in amendment are out of order.

Motion No. 31 is in order and will be debated and voted on separately. Motions Nos. 30, 32, 38, 41, 43, 44, 50, 56, and 58 are in order and will be grouped together for debate. A vote on Motion No. 30 will also apply to Motions Nos. 30 to 38, 41, 43, 44, 50, 56, and 58.

Motion No. 36 causes the Chair concern because of its notwithstanding provision which regard to the right to require performance commitments from auto makers. It appears that the purpose of this motion is to ensure that Canada can set its own rules, regardless of any commitment under the agreement. Since the purpose of this Bill is to implement the agreement and Chapter Ten incorporates trade in automotive goods, I must rule the motion out of order.

[Translation]

I have serious reservations with respect to Motions Nos. 37 and 49A for two reasons. Motion No. 37 does not fit under part II, "Procurement Review Board", and the intent is to amend the Agreement. I would also refer Hon. Members to the reasons given in earlier Motion No. 3 out of order. Motion No. 49A is also an attempt to amend the Agreement. For the above reasons, I must rule the Motions out of order.

Motions Nos. 39 and 93 are in order and will be grouped for debate and a vote on 39 will apply to Motion No. 93.

[English]

I have reservations with regard to Motion No. 40. The Hon. Member is attempting to change the definition of a panel as set out in Annex 1901.2 in the agreement. All such panels are clearly stated to be binational. Therefore, Motion No. 40 is out of order.

Motions Nos. 45, 46, 47 and 48 under Part III, amendments to the Special Import Measures Act, will be grouped together for debate. A vote on Motion No. 45 will also apply to Motions Nos. 46, 47, and 48.

Motion No. 49 is in order. It will be debated and voted upon separately.

[Translation]

Motions Nos. 51, 80, 90 and 91 are in order and will be grouped together for debate. A vote on Motion No. 51 will also apply to Motion No. 80 and a vote on Motion No. 90 will apply to Motion No. 91.

Motions Nos. 52 and 70 are in order and will be grouped for debate. A vote on Motion No. 52 will also apply to Motion No. 70.

Motions Nos. 53, 54 and 55 under Part IV, "Related and Consequential Amendments to Implement the Agreement ", are in order and will be grouped together for debate but voted upon separately.

Motions Nos. 57, 59 and 60 are in order and will be grouped for debate and voted on separately.

[English]

Motions Nos. 62 and 63 are in order and will be grouped for debate and voted upon separately. Motion No. 64 is out of order because it attempts to amend the agreement. I refer Hon. Members to the many citations I have quoted earlier in this regard.

The Chair has some misgivings with respect to Motion No. 66. The intent of this motion is to reserve to the Governor in Council the power to make certain orders more than once within a stipulated period. However, the agreement specifies that each party shall exercise such powers no more than once within that period. Since the Hon. Member is being permissive in his motion, I am going to give him the benefit of the doubt and allow the motion. It will be debated and voted upon separately.

[Translation]

Motions Nos. 67 and 68 will be grouped together for debate and will be voted upon separately.

Motion No. 69 causes the Chair concern because of its notwithstanding provision with regard to Canada's right to exercise certain powers. It appears that the purpose of this motion is to ensure that Canada can continue to set its own rules in these matters regardless of any commitment under the Agreement. Since the purpose of the Bill is to implement the Agreement, I must rule the motion out of order.

Motions Nos. 71 and 72 are in order and will be debated separately and voted on separately.

[English]

Motions Nos. 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, and 79 will be grouped together for debate and will be voted upon separately. Motions Nos. 81, 83, and 84 are in order and will be grouped together for debate. A vote on Motion No. 81 will apply to Motion No. 83, but Motion No. 84 will be voted upon separately.

Motions Nos. 85, 86, and 87 will be grouped together for debate. A vote on Motion No. 86 will also apply to Motion No. 87. An affirmative vote on Motions Nos. 86 and 87 will obviate the need for a vote on Motion No. 85, but a negative vote on Motions Nos. 86 and 87 requires that the question be put on Motion No. 85.

[Translation]

Motions Nos. 88 and 89 will be grouped for debate. An affirmative vote on Motion No. 88 obviates the necessity of a vote on Motion No. 89. However, a negative vote on Motion No. 88 necessitates the question being put on Motion No. 89.

Motions Nos. 92, 95 and 96 are in order and will be debated separately and voted upon separately.

Motion No. 94 is beyond the scope of the clause and is thus ruled out of order. The clause deals with the Western Grain Transportation Act and West Coast ports and this amendment attempts to introduce East Coast ports. This is not in order.

[English]

Motions Nos. 97 and 98 are ruled out of order because they seek to make the coming into force provisions of this Bill subject to conditions outside the legislative process. In this connection, I would refer Hon. Members to Erskine May, Twentieth Edition, paragraph 10, on page 557.

Motion No. 99 is out of order because it seeks directly to amend the agreement. Again I refer Hon. Members to Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, Citation 778.

Motion No. 100 is in order and will be debated and voted upon separately.

To recapitulate briefly, the following motions have been ruled out of order: 2, 3, 4, 15, 16, 20, 28, 29, 35, 36, 37, 40, 49(a), 64, 69, 94, 97, 98, and 99. The following motions were not selected: 7, 7(a), 18, 26, 27 and 34.

I think I might add, for the benefit of Hon. Members and the public watching, as I have said, the Bill we have before us is a Bill the object of which is to implement the agreement between Canada and the United States and, as a consequence, much of it is taken up with amending existing public laws, but there are additional paragraphs as well which of course are of some importance.

• (1530)

Hon. Members will realize that under the rules amendments aimed at altering the actual terms of the agreement are not acceptable, but other amendments aimed at the provisions of the Bill itself, under certain circumstances, have been acceptable and are of course set out in this ruling. I might just indicate to Hon. Members and the public that as of the end of Thursday, the Chair had received 102 amendments and 77 of those have been accepted for debate. I think Members will find that they are presently in 26 groupings.

I want to thank all Hon. Members who submitted amendments for their co-operation with the table officers. This, as all Hon. Members will know, was no easy task given the number of amendments, and I hope Hon. Members will feel that they have been carefully and properly dealt with.

Mr. Axworthy: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. First let me say that I echo your words in closing. I want to compliment the Chair and table officers for a monumental and effective task and to say that I for one, who was responsible for some of your late evenings last week, appreciate the judgment and the fairness with which it was completed. I think it points out how realistic and relevant the amendments were which have been accepted.

I am not challenging the ruling, but I wonder if you would be in a position to provide some elaboration. During the course of the hearings the committee chairman cited a ruling by Erskine May which indicated that those items included in the annex could be amended through the legislation. That would include in this case both the agreement itself and the tariff schedules. I have noticed again in several of the rulings made by the Chair that those particular matters were ruled out of order.

I think it is an important matter and for that reason we submitted amendments that would seek to alter the agreement, particularly on crucial matters like water, because of that Erskine May citation. I wonder if the Speaker would be kind enough to elaborate on the reasoning behind that because that was the understanding we drew from the ruling made in committee.

Mr. Speaker: First, I want to thank the Hon. Member for his courteous and kind remarks. Any Speaker, I think, ventures with some trepidation into explanations of a ruling and I am not so sure I am going to do that to any great extent.

I do want to clarify one thing. I think the Hon. Member said that the chairman of the committee, apparently following the citation from Erskine May, indicated that the annex could be included in the legislation. That seems as though it would be in error, and I can say to the Hon. Member I assume he meant "could be included in an amendment".

Mr. Axworthy: Amendment, yes.

Mr. Speaker: All right, I have that straightened out.

I, of course, have not considered the remarks of the chairman of the committee. I know the Hon. Member would not mind if I took a moment or two to do that. The basic principle upon which I have been operating and upon which I am compelled to operate under the rules is that, strictly speaking, the terms of the agreement cannot be amended. It may be that by the ingenious use of superior intellect the Chair can be persuaded to allow amendments which to some degree may clarify or give some certainty to parts of the legislation, but they have to be aimed at amending one of the clauses of the statute itself.

However, I will take under consideration the comment that the Hon. Member has very properly brought before the Chair, and report back as quickly as possible, perhaps having one of the officers of the table discuss the matter with him.

In any event, I think that gives sufficient information to the House for the debate to continue.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, I would first very much like to add my voice to that of the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy). I think to try and work one's way through 102 amendments is an extremely daunting task.

As with all Speaker's rulings, there will be some that one will feel surprised about and some that one will feel pleased about. I do not want to get into those kinds of questions at all, but I did want to raise with you a matter which I wondered if you could perhaps interpret for me a little more fully.

I am especially concerned with Motions Nos. 26 and 18. With respect to Motion No. 26, as you note in your ruling, this was ruled out of order in committee because of where it was put in the Bill. Therefore, the motion I brought to the floor of the House put it in a general part of the Bill which, from the ruling made in committee, seemed to be the place it belonged. I would appreciate some sense of whether such a shift of that sort to take account of a ruling made in committee is proper and acceptable, or whether once ruled out of order one cannot bring the same subject matter back, even if the reason for ruling it out of order was the place that one had originally moved it in the Bill.

With respect to Motion No. 18, your judgment quite correctly notes that quite a similar motion was moved, debated, and negatived in committee. At that time the debate revolved to a significant degree around the fact that this motion dealt with the concerns of Canadian wine growers and whether they could be subject to government action as the clause in question makes clear. People who voted against the motion suggested that its formulation would allow action to be taken despite the fact that both major provinces in which grape growing and wine production takes place would be opposed. It was for that reason that there was what I thought was a significant change made from 50 per cent to 65 per cent in the proportion of population which would have to be involved in those provinces approving of action with respect to this clause. Again, I wondered, with respect to your comments, whether slight variations in the wording does not affect the intent of the motions.

My concern, as the person drafting the amendment, was that I did not see this as slight but instead as responding to the concerns which had been expressed in the committee. I wondered if, for that reason, there might not be some logic to giving at least the benefit of the doubt to that particular motion.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the Hon. Member for Essex—Windsor for his kind remarks which I know will be appreciated by all of those who have worked hard on this matter.

We have had a practice for some time now which is working very well, that is, because of extensive consultations at the time amendments are tabled, the Chair has felt that for the most part it has not been necessary to hear further discussion on them. However, I am aware, as are other Hon. Members in this Chamber, that this is a matter of some importance. All matters here are important, but this is one of some magnitude in the number of amendments that the Chair had to consider. I have, therefore, extended to the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry and the Hon. Member for Essex—Windsor the courtesy of listening carefully to what they have said. I appreciate their additional assistance to the Chair.

With respect to the two motions which the Hon. Member for Essex—Windsor has raised with me, I will look again at Motion No. 26 and discuss it with the table officers who will communicate with the Hon. Member. However, I think I can dispose of Motion No. 18 at this time. I remember this very distinctly and have asked the Clerk to bring me Motion No. 18.

While I understand perfectly the Hon. Member's substantive reason for putting this forward, I am bound by the procedural law. Even the change to which the Hon. Member refers does not get around the fact that, at least in the opinion of the Chair, it is out of order. Although I do understand the reasons behind the amendment, I regret that I cannot assist the Hon. Member further.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I wish to join with my colleagues in thanking you and the table officers for your effort and the speed with which your ruling has been brought down in this matter. The Government moved ahead with report stage using the 48-hour time limit, and I appreciate that this puts an extra burden on the Table. We do appreciate the effort.

I wish to advise the House that earlier today I approached the House Leaders of the Official Opposition and New Democratic Parties in a bona fide effort to determine the amount of time required by the two Parties at report stage and third reading. This request was made in good faith to my colleagues. I received in reply the following letter addressed to myself:

> Dear Mr. Lewis,
> Pursuant to your inquiries earlier today regarding an allocation of time to the report stage and third reading stage of Bill C-130, we wish to inform you that our respective parties are prepared to agree to an allocation of a further 150 days to the report stage and 200 days to the third reading stage of this bill.
> Should your party agree to this allocation, the requirements of Standing Order 115 will have been met. If, however, your party cannot accept this proposed allocation, it remains that the majority of the parties have agreed, pursuant to Standing Order 116, to the allocation of a further 150 days to the report stage and 200 days to the third reading stage of the bill.

That letter is not on what one might call coalition letterhead but is signed by the House Leader of the New Democratic Party and the House Leader of the Liberal Party.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, this makes a mockery of negotiations in good faith. I regret that we could not have had some sort of reasonable suggestion from the other side. This is also confusing because we understood that the Liberal Party had rejected a coalition with the New Democratic Party but now find that the coalition is back on.

Therefore, I wish to advise that an agreement could not be reached under the provisions of Standing Order 115 or 116 with respect to an allocation of time to the report stage and third reading stage of Bill C-130, an Act to implement the free trade agreement between Canada and the United States of America and, under the provisions of Standing Order 117, I give notice of my intention to move a time allocation motion at the next sitting of the House for the purpose of allocating a specified number of days for the consideration and disposal of proceedings at those stages of the Bill.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Windsor West rises on a point of order. If the Hon. Member is going to enter into a long argument, I have some doubt whether this is the appropriate time to do so. The Hon. Minister of State has given notice but what will happen after this is still, of course, speculation. I will hear the Hon. Member subject to my caveats.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, thank you for recognizing me. I think I understand what you have in mind. You may feel that a point of order is more timely if and when a motion is actually moved. However, since what I have to say deals with the whole procedure for the use of Standing Order 117, I hope you will allow me at least to put briefly some points on the record. At any time that you feel I am going beyond what you think is acceptable, in at least a preliminary way, I know you will call me to order.

Mr. Speaker: I certainly do not want to restrict the Hon. House Leader of the Official Opposition from raising a point of order if he so wishes. At the moment, however, all the Chair has before it is a notice. If the Hon. Member for Windsor West feels there is some error in having heard the Minister or some error in the way the Minister has given the notice, I will hear him. However, I am anxious not to have arguments before the Chair which may well be premature. We have been through this before. I think that in at least one instance, if I can put this very gently, it may be that the wisdom of the Chair proved to be right in delaying an argument which ultimately did not have to take place.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I first want to say something about the notice itself which has supposedly just been given with respect to Standing Order 117. I understand that previously notice has always specified the precise number of days to which debate is to be limited. As I heard the Hon. Deputy Government House Leader, he simply indicated that pursuant to Standing Order 117 he was giving notice that a motion would be made to allocate time within which the remaining stage or stages of debate must take place. Therefore, I respectfully submit that the notice just given is defective and not what is required under Standing Order 117 because it does not specify the precise number of days within which the Government wishes to limit debate.

Finally, it is my view on behalf of the Official Opposition that since it was possible for a majority of Parties in this House to reach an agreement with respect to allocation of time under Standing Order 116, the Government cannot proceed with a motion pursuant to Standing Order 117. I will reserve further comments on that point if and when the motion is argued.

I also want to point out that since some 77 amendments offered by the Official Opposition have been ruled by yourself to be in order, it cannot be said that the number of days referred to in the letter signed by myself and the New Democratic Party House Leader is an excessive number for the debate of 77 amendments.

Furthermore, contrary to the insinuation or innuendo of the Deputy Government House Leader, the letter itself bearing the signatures of myself and the House Leader of the New Democratic Party has been presented as it has to meet our understanding of the requirements of Standing Order 116. I find it deplorable that the Deputy Government House Leader, who has a mandate to uphold and take seriously the rules of this House, is reflecting in this way on a serious attempt to make use of Standing Order 116.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I want to add my comments to those of the House Leader of the Official Opposition. He indicated that the Deputy Government House Leader stated in his notice that he was referring to Standing Order 117, which states that an agreement could not be reached under the provisions of Standing Order 115 or 116.

Standing Order 116 refers to a majority of the representatives of the several Parties coming to an agreement in respect of a proposed allotment of days or hours for the proceedings at any stage of the passing of a public Bill. That is exactly what we have done. There has been considerable consultation between the Opposition Parties. The feeling was that considering this is the most important trade deal in world history, if I recall the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), it would not be inappropriate to set aside a further 150 days at report stage to deal effectively with all the concerns raised by the opposition amendments. Of course, another 200 days at third reading stage would enable us properly to flesh out the most important trade deal in world history.

After consultation between the two Opposition Parties, we have come to an agreement in terms of the appropriate allocated time to complete this debate.

Mr. Speaker: I listened carefully to Hon. Members. I just want to point out that at the moment the Chair's reading of Standing Order 116 is very clear:

> When a Minister of the Crown, from his or her place in the House, states that a majority of the representatives of the several parties—

It is not a majority of the Parties. However, I have the other points.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest to the arguments of the coalition Party. Let me point out that Standing Order 117, as I read it, contains no specification that the notice itself specify the number of days. There are some comments with respect to how little time has to be given in the actual motion that is moved. I submit that I have met the requirements of Standing Order 117 by way of negotiation and notice.

I listened with interest to the coalition Party's comments that a majority of the Parties has come to an agreement on what is appropriate. I will leave it to the people of Canada to decide whether they are actually serious about 150 days at report stage and 200 days at third reading. I would point out that a majority of the Parties represents 25 per cent of the Members of the House. I am not denigrating the efforts of that 25 per cent but pointing out that the use of the word "majority" is not correct on that point.

I return to Standing Order 117 to indicate to the Chair that it only requires that the point be made that an agreement could not be reached and therefore the Government is moving under that Standing Order. It is our intention to do so tomorrow.

I regret this very much. We wanted a debate on the substance of the amendments and the substance at third reading. The delaying tactics of the Opposition which wasted all of last Wednesday and two hours this morning, without any effort to debate the substance, is the reason, along with the fact that we could not reach any agreement, the Government is taking this position.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to clarify a point made by the Deputy Government House Leader. Earlier today the two Opposition Parties negotiated, discussed, and through consultation came forward with what we thought was a reasoned approach. If the polls of the day are to reflect the standings, then the two Opposition Parties have reflected the view of 65 per cent of the people of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: I think the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap is an experienced procedural advocate and knows that it is not the place of the Chair to get into debate on what the polls mean or what they do not mean.

In any event, I have the point raised and I will give it some careful consideration and return to the Chamber shortly.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, in order to assist you in your deliberations, I want to clarify a factual point. The consultations in question did in fact involve the representatives of the three Parties in this House. When I spoke of a majority of the Parties, I should have made it clear that I was talking about a majority of the representatives of the Parties in the sense that the agreement in the letter read out by the Deputy Government House Leader was made between myself as representative of the Liberal Party, the Official Opposition, and the Member for Kamloops—Shuswap (Mr. Riis) as representative of the New Democratic Party.

Contrary to what my hon. friend, the Deputy Government House Leader, has been saying about coalitions, let me stress that we are simply carrying out what we understand to be the requirements to put into place the operations of Standing Order 116, which has nothing to do with coalitions or lack of coalitions.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate the comments of the Hon. Member for Windsor West. Of course I will consider his comments.

I think that is sufficient discussion on that point. I will return as quickly as possible to give the House the benefit of my considerations.

• (1600)

Mr. Speaker: Resuming debate. The Hon. Parliamentary Secretary.

Mr. John McDermid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair, I just want to thank you and those of the table for the work that you have done over the last couple of days. It has been a very difficult task for you. I might say that a number of the amendments that have been introduced in the House were either introduced or voted down at committee stage. They have been changed somewhat so that they can be reintroduced at the report stage. We understand the reasoning behind these amendments from the opposition Parties. It is interesting to note that both of them are going to tear up the agreement, yet they have all these amendments that they want to introduce to Bill C-130. If you would pass on our word of thanks to all those who were involved in putting in those extra hours, I would appreciate it on behalf of the Government.

The Government has examined the amendments proposed by Hon. Members opposite, and it has found them to be unacceptable for a variety of reasons. Indeed, many of these amendments are an affront to Parliament and show just how irresponsibly the Opposition has approached this whole debate.

When he appeared before the legislative committee on August 2, the Minister for International Trade (Mr. Crosbie) stated that he could not accept amendments proposed by the Opposition at that time, for three reasons.

First, a number of them conflicted directly with the free trade agreement itself, an international agreement entered into by Canada. It is not the role of Parliament to pick and choose among the pieces. Many in fact were ruled out of order.

Second, a number of amendments purported to exempt from the legislation and agreement matters which are already covered.

Finally, a number were downright silly and frivolous. That was on August 2. Now, we have before us today much the same assortment of inappropriate, unnecessary and even frivolous amendments. They were not made in an attempt to improve the legislation, but rather to score political points.

Recognizing that there were amendments tabled in committee that would be buried in the obscurity that they so richly deserve, my hon. friends opposite chose not to move many of them in that forum but instead sought to inflict them upon this House. Of course, the difference between committee and this House is that they have television, so they can play to the crowds.

You will have noticed that what has been taken here is a destructive—not a constructive—approach. The Liberal Party, for example, has proposed a number of amendments that would simply delete large chunks of the legislation—without proposing substitute language—thus rendering it a meaningless patchwork. They have repeated the same baseless and tired old arguments about the alleged impact of the free trade agreement on native land claims, the environment, social programs and so on. Why do they not propose an amendment saying that nothing in this Act shall affect the flow of air between Canada and the United States? That would make about as much sense as most of the amendments that we have before us today.

I find it sad—but not surprising—that the best that my friends opposite could come up with in this package of obstructionist, irrelevant and even silly amendments has been ruled out of order in large numbers. I am looking forward to debating these amendments on the floor of the House of Commons, because I believe that we can conclusively show why these amendments should be defeated.

The first group of amendments that you have put together, Nos. 1, 65 and 66, was debated at some length on Friday afternoon by the two opposition Parties. They went on and on and waxed eloquently all afternoon about why the boundaries of Canada are not under the interpretation of the Act. We heard great claims that the Government has forgotten Canada and that we do not care about Canada. Then we had my colleague, the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy) stand up. Let me quote what he said in the House of Commons. I think that this shows the type of misleading information that is presented to the House of Commons. At page 18276 of Hansard he said:

> We spoke to officials of the trade negotiating office which put the Bill together. They said: "Everyone knows what Canada is anyway".

An Hon. Member: That is right. That is what they said.

Mr. McDermid: That is a total untruth. That is factually incorrect. Totally.

Mr. Axworthy: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry on a point of order.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member has just said that he is calling me a liar, and he knows that it is against the rules of the House. If he wants to get the evidence, we are prepared to call the official whom we spoke to and who in fact made that kind of utterance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not believe the Hon. Member said that. I think that he said there were some untruths, but I may be wrong. I was trying to read the free trade Bill and if the Hon. Member has said it, I know that he will retract the statement.

Mr. Axworthy: We will call the official. We have his name. We will call him in front of the committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would like the Hon. Member—I cannot very well address the Hon. Member if he is not going to allow me to address him.

Mr. Axworthy: I am listening.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Parliamentary Secretary has the floor.

Mr. McDermid: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I did not accuse him. I said that the statement was wrong. I have read the statement and have said that the statement was wrong.

Mr. Axworthy: You said that it was untrue.

Mr. McDermid: Now, if he feels, by inference, that I am calling him a liar, I did not say that at all. I said that that statement was incorrect. I will tell you why it is incorrect.

Mr. Axworthy: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is part of the rules of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On a point of order, the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry.

Mr. Axworthy: The Member for Brampton has said that what we have said in the speech was untrue. Now he is changing his tune. If he wants to challenge it, that is fine. But he said it was untrue, and now he is changing his tune. I think that that is against the rules of the House.

Mr. Andre: He can say it is untrue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will decide whether the person should withdraw or not. The Hon. Parliamentary Secretary has the floor.

Mr. McDermid: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. If I may proceed, the statement is untrue. I have checked with the officials of the TNO, and none of them have claimed to say that. Had the Hon. Member called TNO and asked their opinion on that particular thing, he would have got these facts.

Mr. Axworthy: We did call him.

Mr. McDermid: First of all, the reason for defining the United States in this particular part of the Act, in the second section under "interpretation", is because we had to define their customs territory. That was very important, because we are dealing in customs matters. That is why they are defined in there. Under the free trade agreement, we amend many different Acts that pertain to United States goods and services, and to those of other countries. So, the United States is mentioned in those amendments, and we had to define their customs territory, and that is what we have done here. That is very important to understand why that definition is here.

As far as Canada is concerned, Canada and its areas beyond the territorial seas are already defined. This may come as a surprise to the Hon. Member, but they are already defined for the purpose of laws relating to customs as follows. There are three areas that he should be aware of.

Mr. Axworthy: Where is it defined in the agreement?

Mr. Riis: Show us in the Bill.

Mr. McDermid: In the Customs Act, Canada is defined to include the land mass of Canada. That shows the ignorance of the Hon. Member in not understanding the free trade agreement. There is somebody that has not even opened the first page. He does not even know what he is talking about. I would advise him just to sit still.

Mr. Riis: We will wait for five minutes and then you can sit down.

Mr. McDermid: Canada is defined in the Customs Act to include the land mass of Canada, the internal waters and the territorial sea. Definitions in the Customs Act—a surprise for the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy)—apply to the Customs Tariff. Therefore, Canada is defined for the purpose of the Act. As well, the Customs and Excise Offshore Application Act, which applies Canadian laws relating to customs and excise to designated goods within the limits of the Continental Shelf, defines the Continental Shelf to mean the seabed and sub-soil beyond the territorial seas of Canada. Canada is totally covered under the free trade agreement and defined under the Customs Act.

• (1610)

Clearly, that is what we are talking about. We are talking about customs' areas. If the Hon. Member had called the Trade Negotiations Office and asked, that would have been the explanation he would have received. For him to say that negotiators from the Trade Negotiations Office said that everybody knows where Canada is and it is not necessary is totally wrong. It is a totally false statement.

Therefore Motions Nos. 1, 61 and 65 are totally unnecessary and should be defeated.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, first, I think that the Parliamentary Secretary should be questioned as to why he began his remarks reflecting on the Chair. I can say nothing else but that he reflected on the Chair in a totally mean-spirited and unnecessary fashion.

Mr. Riis: Shameful.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): The Parliamentary Secretary, after going through some compliments addressed to the people who worked on the Speaker's ruling, in effect through his language verbally trashed the ruling. He said that the amendments which the Speaker ruled in order were trivial and unnecessary amendments which had already been rejected at committee. I think this is quite improper. If the Speaker uses the authority given him by this House to say that amendments are in order and acceptable for debate in this House then it is not for the Parliamentary Secretary, in spite of his arrogance and that of the Government's, to tell the Speaker that he was wrong, and because the Government considers the amendments in question to be trivial and unnecessary they are not to be accepted and not to be debated in this House.

Mr. McDermid: There you go telling untruths again.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): I also want to say that I think that it was quite wrong for the Parliamentary Secretary to reflect on the actions of Members of this House in putting down moved in committee. This is something provided for by the rules, the rules adopted by all Members of this House. The Members of this House have a perfect right to put down amendments which were not moved in committee. I think it is wrong for the Parliamentary Secretary to reflect as he did on the intentions and motives of those Members of the House who tabled amendments which had not first been put forward in committee.

What the Parliamentary Secretary was saying is illustrative of the whole approach of the Government to this matter. The approach of members of the Government is: "We know what we are doing. We are right. Everyone else should yield to us without question or debate because if they do not do that we will steamroller them out of the way. We will push them aside". They may be able to use their majority in this House for that purpose up to a point. However, it is not yet clear how far they can go. I say this. They are not yet in a position to tell the Speaker, much less Members of the House, that the Speaker was wrong in accepting amendments and it was his authority to do so and that Members of the House were going beyond their right and their duty in tabling amendments which they thought appropriate to put before the House.

I also say this to you, Mr. Speaker. The public is increasingly aware of the blind arrogance of the Government and they will make their judgment on that arrogance when they vote in an election. I say that no matter what use is made, what abuse is made by the Government of its majority on this matter in the House it will still not prevail before the will of the people of this country who do not want to see this deal imposed on them because they think it is an absolute sell-out of what they have accomplished now and what they have yet to accomplish as a country.

In his vain efforts to cast aside the rights of Members to present and debate amendments, the Parliamentary Secretary was even unable to put forward an argument that was not contradictory and conflicting within the very words that were used. First, he complained that all the amendments offered by the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy) simply struck language from the Bill. He then rose to speak about an amendment which specifically wanted to add language to repair one of the very serious omissions in the Bill. I refer to a definition of "Canada" for the purpose of this Bill.

I want to say that I have just been informed by the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry that Maurice Rosenberg at the Trade Negotiations Office was the person with whom the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry spoke on the matter—

Mr. Axworthy: The research bureau.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Rosenberg was not spoken to by the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—For Garry but a representative of the Liberal Research Bureau as to why there was not a definition in Bill C-130 of "Canada".

Mr. Caldwell: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am becoming somewhat confused as to who said what to whom. I think the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry has said he talked directly to the person who gave him that message. Now we understand that it was the Liberal Party Research Office who spoke. Who spoke to whom? The Hon. Member told the Parliamentary Secretary that he spoke directly to the person.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is a point of debate and not a point of order. Once Hon. Members get their messages straight, I would appreciate knowing about it. The Hon. Member for Windsor West has the floor.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): This matter can be settled very easily. Our rules provide for the summoning of a witness to the bar of the House to answer questions. I would be quite prepared to move the appropriate motion so that Mr. Rosenberg can be summoned to the bar of the House and questioned about the conversation he had on this matter.

I want to conclude by saying it is illustrative of what is wrong with the approach of the Conservative Government to this whole matter of our dealings with the United States when the Parliamentary Secretary attempts rather vainly to argue that it is more important in this Bill to define "United States" and not to define "Canada" for the purpose of the trade deal. As far as the Parliamentary Secretary is concerned the Customs Act and the definition in it is sufficient even though it is very clear from the terms of the Bill that it and the trade deal to which it refers supersedes and prevails over any legislation that may have anything to do with this trade deal.

If this matter is important to the Government, and the Parliamentary Secretary was rather weakly trying to get that across, then one could ask why as a matter of certainty the Government did not put a definition of Canada in the Act in the first place and why for the purposes of certainty it is not willing to accept the amendment now before the House offered by the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry.

• (1620)

There are all sorts of definitions in the Bill, and there are all sorts of definitions in the trade deal; all sorts of things are put in there for reasons of certainty. For example, there is an exclusion from the deal of beer and logs, and a number of other things that I could come up with. If it is made clear that logs and beer are not supposed to be covered by the deal, surely it would be a very limited and minor concession by way of certainty to agree to this amendment and have in Bill C-130 a definition of Canada, in order that if this deal ever comes into effect the lack of a definition of Canada in this legislation would not give the United States the opportunity to have more Polar Sea incidents, to take over the resources of our sea bed, and do all sorts of things which the administrative statements—

Mr. McDermid: It gives teenagers acne, too.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): I say to my hon. friend if there is any problem with teenage acne it must be on the inside of his head.

I am sorry that the Canadian people have to see a matter of this seriousness treated in this manner by the Parliamentary Secretary. I am making serious arguments. It shows what is wrong with the whole approach of the Conservative Government that it is not willing to accept, as a matter of good faith and good will, that we who do not agree with this measure do so out of deep conviction and deep seriousness. This amendment is a serious amendment. The Government is showing what is wrong with its approach to this deal, and what is wrong with its approach to the future of this country in not being willing to accept this amendment which simply wants to put into the deal a definition of Canada.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, this is a very important amendment that we are debating at the moment regarding the trade deal with the United States. To put it in some context, one could simply raise the question: "Was this left out inadvertently?" Did the Government consciously decide that it did not want to define what Canada was in the trade deal? Why should this come as a surprise?

When our Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) was a little boy he took a great deal of pride when the big American corporate leaders would come to Baie Comeau. He would play the piano and sing songs for quarters, and they would cheer and say what a nice boy he was. A little time passed and the Prime Minister decided to work for an American subsidiary in Canada, the Iron Ore Company of Canada. Part of the work that he was asked to do was to shut down Schefferville, which he did with a great deal of satisfaction. This was his job and he had no hesitation. Then he was arm in arm with Ronald Reagan in Québec City singing When Irish Eyes are Smiling.

Then it came to negotiate the trade deal, which some people have called the sell-out of Canada. It is not the sell-out of Canada. When someone sells something they receive something in return. This is a giveaway of Canada. There was no selling. We got nothing. We have lost it all.

When one looks at the trade deal it carefully describes at some length what the United States is. It states:

> (a) the customs territory of the United States, including the fifty states of the United States, the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico,
> (b) the foreign trade zones located in the United States and Puerto Rico, and
> (c) any areas beyond the territorial sea of the United States within which, in accordance with international law and domestic laws, the United States may exercise rights with respect to the seabed and subsoil and the natural resources thereof.

That is a very precise definition of what the United States is. When one looks through the pages and pages of the deal, there is no definition of Canada. There are two equal players in this negotiation, the Americans and the Canadians. The United States went through a great deal—

Mr. McDermid: Read the Customs Act, that's exactly where it is.

Mr. Riis: I ask the Parliamentary Secretary, why was the definition of Canada left out of this document? Perhaps the Government did not care about Canada. I do not think that it cares about Canada—

Mr. McDermid: It is in the Customs Act, and you know it.

Mr. Langdon: It is not part of this Bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would hope that there would be some courtesy on both sides of the House. The Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap has the floor.

Mr. Riis: I find it odd, and the people of Canada will find it surprising that in the Canada-U.S. trade deal the Government went to a great deal of pains to describe what is meant by the United States, but forgot to describe and define Canada. The Parliamentary Secretary probably says that the Americans know where Canada is and know what our boundaries are. They do not know where our boundaries are on the west coast.

Time and time again the Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) has raised the question of the A-B line where the Americans want to get critical fishing and resource grounds off our west coast. They do not accept the definition of the boundary between Canada and the United States on the west coast.

We all remember Georges Bank on the east coast where year after year American and Canadian fishermen were arguing what part of the fishing grounds is part of the United States and what is part of Canada. There is no recognition by the United States there. As a matter of fact, when the Americans look under the polar ice cap, which is obviously part of Canada, they state that these are international waters and it is not part of Canada.

You may remember, Mr. Speaker, when the Americans were issuing drilling licences in the Beaufort Sea they stated that that was part of the United States. Whether it is the North, the East, or the West, the Americans have proven time and again that they do not understand where Canada is. Therefore, I find it absolutely incredible that the Government did not include a definition of Canada after going to so many pains to establish a precise definition of what the United States was all about.

This is simply one of the many reasons why Canadians from coast to coast, as they learn more about this deal and what it does to their country, are rejecting it. Seven out of ten Canadians have said time and again that they want an election on this issue. The Government is jamming and rushing this issue through. Earlier today it gave notice that it was going to announce closure to muzzle the debate and jam and rush this legislation through before an election. Seven out of ten Canadians will be offended and feel affronted if they do not have an opportunity to register whether or not they support this deal. The Government ignores them and ignores the parliamentary process and the process of democracy.

I do not understand how Hon. Members on the government side can sit there day after day, hunkered down, not say anything, and accept this incredible abuse of the democratic parliamentary system. Yet they do. They are mute as they sit in their seats hour after hour.

I see the Hon. Member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone) is present. I hope he will stand up and explain to the House why he feels we do not need a definition of Canada in the trade deal. I also hope that others will. The Government went to a great deal of pain to get the definition of the United States of America, but Canada, forget it. We do not need a definition of Canada, the Americans understand it. The Americans do not accept our west coast borders, our east coast borders, or our northern borders of Canada.

This Government stated that it did not want to travel across Canada and hold hearings so that the people of Canada can express their views. It curtailed what is obviously the most democratic thing to do when talking about such an important trade deal. It should be taken to the people and let the people have an opportunity to decide. At least let the people have an opportunity to express their views. Members of the Government said absolutely not. They did not want to hear from Canadians. They were not going to tour. We suggested televising the hearings so at least people could sit in their livingrooms and listen to the debate and the witnesses, but no the Government was not going to televise the debate. It did not want the people of Canada to learn any more than they already know about this deal, because government Members know that every day as Canadians learn more and more about what this does in terms of the ultimate sell-out and give away of this country that they are rejecting it.

My constituency butts against the grapegrowing areas of British Columbia. Hundreds and hundreds of growers who have struggled for years, some have struggled for decades, to develop the vineyards and the small wineries of the Okanagan Valley have all of a sudden had the rug pulled out from under them as this Government says: "We don't care about you. We don't care about your industry. We are going to finish you in a number of months". Those are the first obvious victims of this trade deal. The vineyards are gone. The cottage wineries are gone. The small, medium-sized wineries are gone.

Mr. McDermid: You are totally wrong.

Mr. Riis: When the Prime Minister was in the Okanagan Valley trying to explain the trade deal he was laughed out of the Valley. People said: "You have guts to come here and tell us that this is good for us. Look at our hillsides in Vernon and Kelowna. The vineyards are withering because we cannot go to the banks to get operating loans, and you are telling us this is good for us?" The Prime Minister was the laughing stock of the entire central valleys of British Columbia. I do not think he has the courage to go back there again. With the kind of response that he got, I know I would not be going back if I were the Prime Minister trying to pull this fast one on Canadians.

What we are saying in this very serious motion is that Canada be defined as meaning the territory to which Canadian customs laws apply, including any areas beyond the territorial seas of Canada within which, in accordance with international law and its domestic laws, Canada may exercise rights with respect to the seabed and subsoil and their natural resources. Is that an unreasonable request to define in Clause 1 of the agreement what Canada is all about? This particular motion before us is an appropriate motion that ought to be debated. I will be listening carefully this afternoon as Government Members explain to Canadians why they do not want to define what Canada means in this trade deal.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have this opportunity to speak on Motions Nos. 1, 61 and 65 which are definition clauses of Canada. It might be interesting to analyse why a definition clause is not in the Bill to start with. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister suggested that the definition is in another Act. Maybe the definition is not in this Bill because the definition that we have of Canada is not acceptable to the United States. Because the Americans would not accept it Canada acquiesced and said: "We will not put in a definition. You make your own." When the panel deals with issues brought before it, it will put into the agreement its own definition. Still it is necessary to see why this particular definition is not there. Maybe we have been missing the point.

Every area and industry will be affected by this Bill, not just areas which we have a tendency to think of as being the borders of Canada, nor those industries that we feel are the most common ones. Every area and every industry will be affected by this definition and Bill. We are not opposed to the liberalization of trade. Maybe I should not use that word because President Reagan suggested that the word liberalization is a dirty word and therefore should not be used. Maybe that is another reason that liberalization of trade is a little bit of a problem. We are not opposed to more liberal trade laws. We are opposed to the agreement where all the generosity and liberal treatment is on the Canadian side and we get nothing in return. We are against the particular Reagan-Mulroney trade deal put before the House and that we are in the process of implementing through Bill C-130.

We got very little from this agreement, but we gave away a lot. The Government is spending $30 million to $50 million, depending upon who you are talking to, to brainwash the people of Canada about how good a deal this is. If this deal were as good as the Government says it is, the Government would not have to sell it. It would sell itself. The Government would not have to waste $30 million to $50 million of the taxpayers hard-earned money, trying to buy people with their own money. The Government is having a hard time selling the deal and we could go on for a long time saying why. Let me touch on a couple of reasons.

First are the foreign investment possibilities that are established. Foreign investment is unlimited after this deal is put into place. Any American company can buy any Canadian company with no limitations, no monetary structure and no way of looking it over. Most people consider that we already have too much foreign ownership. Fifty per cent of the profits made in Canada go out of the country already. Those profits are being used to buy other companies and corporations in Canada. In other words, not only is this Government using the taxpayers money to sell a deal that is bad for Canada and bad for the Canadian taxpayers, but the Government is saying with this unlimited, unmonitored investment policy eventually every penny of profit in Canada will be used to buy further corporations in Canada until our ownership level is less than today, and it is bad enough now.

Sweden has approximately 7 per cent foreign ownership. When that foreign ownership went up to 7.75 per cent or 8 per cent, Sweden looked very hard at the possibility of using legislation to limit the amount of foreign investment. Sweden has foreign investments all over the world and depends to a great extent on its own investments in other parts of the world. But Sweden recognized, as do most countries in the western world, that if you give away the ownership of your industries, you are giving away control of your economy.

That is exactly what is being done in this case. This is only one of the objectionable clauses to the people of Canada which is being used to make this deal more palatable to Canadians.

I have another example. We are giving away in this Bill—

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. My point has to do with relevancy. The Hon. Member is delivering a prepared speech, I believe, from the NDP fact sheets. He is not referring in any way, shape or form to Motions Nos. 1, 61 or 65. I wish he would get to addressing the motions.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point or order. This is astounding. Here we have a Member rising in his place who just took the floor a few moments ago and took about seven minutes to put a diatribe to the House which had nothing to do with Motions Nos. 1, 61 or 65, and who then has the gall to call another Member to order on relevancy. This is a fraud.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I know the Hon. Member will be getting on in the debate and explaining Motions Nos. 1, 61 and 65. The Hon. Member for Prince Albert has the floor.

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, if you are defining the boundaries of Canada, you are defining the areas which this free trade deal affects. The elements in the free trade—and I do not have any notes here except the ones I wrote a few moments ago—

Mr. Gauthier: And what is wrong with notes?

• (1640)

Mr. Hovdebo: If this trade deal is made for Canada, it is made for every part of Canada. Therefore, we should define what Canada means.

I suggest there is a second area in which we are selling out Canada. We are giving away our natural advantage of resources, the natural advantage that has made it possible for us to develop industries all across Canada. Those resources have been used to help our economy, to pay for social services and to make Canada the country it is. Now, through this Bill, we will be selling those natural resources to the United States at the same price at which they will be sold to Canadian industries. Under this Bill, we cannot sell resources at a price higher than that at which we sell them to our own industries.

We can stop doing that. We do not have to sell our resources to the States, but if the U.S. uses 50 per cent of our gas now and we get short of gas in a couple of years, we will still have to give the Americans 50 per cent of our short supply. We cannot sell that gas to our industries at a price which would give them an advantage over the United States industries.

Those are the kinds of decisions in this Bill that affect all Canadians. There has been a great neglect in the whole approach to this Bill. At every stage, we have given the United States the little advantage for which it asked and without which it would not sign the agreement. Whenever United States politicians talk about this Bill, they say: "We really gave it to Canada that time". The Americans are getting all the best advantages—

Mr. McDermid: What about the wheat farmers?

Mr. Hovdebo: The Wheat Board is something I want to talk about but I will not talk about it at this time. The Wheat Board will be in trouble. It is already in trouble because of the free trade Bill and it will be in further trouble. We need to look at all of these things in the context of the boundaries of Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that the Hon. Member's time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment briefly on motions numbered 1, 61 and 65, moved by the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy). The purpose of these motions is to amend Bill C-130 at Clauses 2, 60 and 76 by adding the following:

> "Canada" means the territory to which Canadian customs laws apply, including any areas beyond the territorial seas of Canada within which, in accordance with international law and its domestic laws, Canada may exercise rights with respect to the seabed and subsoil and their natural resources;".

Mr. Speaker, I think it stands to reason we should define our terms and the purpose of this agreement.

Bill C-130 includes a definition of the United States under the section "Interpretation"on page 2, which reads as follows:

> Interpretation
> "United States" means
> (a) the customs territory of the United States, including the fifty states of the United States, the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico,
> (b) the foreign trade zones located in the United States and Puerto Rico, and
> (c) any areas beyond the territorial sea of the United States within which, in accordance with international law and its domestic laws, the United States may exercise rights with respect to the seabed and subsoil and the natural resources thereof.

Mr. Speaker, why does the Government refuse to define Canada, when it provides a clear and specific definition of the United States?

Mr. Speaker, Canada's experience with the United States has not been all sweetness and light with respect to our Canadian territory in the North. I am reminded of the Polar Sea incident. Did the Americans agree that the Arctic—our Canadian water, let's face it,—where this big ship wanted to go for a cruise, was within our territorial waters? No, they did not. It took a lot of pushing and persuading on the part of the Official Opposition to make the Government take a clear and definite position. And today we are not sure whether this response was sufficient. Since the Government is going to build a super ice-breaker to patrol Canada's territorial waters in the North, why not define our territorial limits, once and for all?

In the debate we had with the United States—and I can name several incidents in the past few years when it was necessary to state in no uncertain terms exactly what Canada is, and I think this is particularly necessary when we are negotiating a trade agreement that will change Canada's way of trading with the world for many years to come . . . and yet, the Government refuses to tell us exactly what Canada is. They refuse to provide a clear and precise definition, but they have no trouble including a definition of the United States, including Puerto Rico, and so forth.

Mr. Speaker, my point is that if the Government is prepared to define the territory, rights and powers of the United States, we should be just as willing and just as convinced of the need to define what the territory, rights and powers of Canadians are.

Mr. Speaker, that is the purpose of amendments 1, 61 and 65, and that should be the focus of this debate.

Mr. Speaker, in the Polar Sea incident and the dispute about coastal fishing between Newfoundland and the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon, the Americans and the French refused to go along with Canadian demands. We must therefore provide a clear definition of what constitutes our Canadian territory. In a treaty of this magnitude, I think it is extremely important to clearly define our position with respect to our territory.

Mr. Speaker, I simply want to say that the history of the Mulroney-Reagan trade agreement is somewhat perplexing to the Official Opposition, because as you know, this Government has been negotiating with the Americans since 1985. And I hardly think I would be divulging a State secret if I said that today, we have a situation where 80 per cent of the goods that cross our borders do so duty-free, and that while 25 per cent of U.S. foreign trade depends on the Canadian consumer, here in Canada 75 per cent of our trade is dependent on the Americans. I do not think that I am saying anything new there. Everyone knows that in this country. They know that 25 cents of every dollar we spend comes from our skill as traders; we want to trade with the world and we want to increase trade by lowering barriers and customs duties imposed as protectionist measures.

Like many people, we have recognized that the United States have trade problems. We know that. Their deficit is increasing every year. If my figures are correct, the trade deficit went from $9.1 billion in 1982 to $140.6 billion in 1986, Mr. Speaker. So the Americans are becoming protectionist! They say that they have to protect their interests.

And that is why they want an agreement that will bind Canada forever. But that is no reason to accept blindly an agreement that was negotiated very often in secret, very often out of public view and which finally resulted in a bad agreement, Mr. Speaker. I am sorry to say so, but the agreement is bad for Canada.

I am not against free trade, Mr. Speaker; I am for free trade, but not the kind of free trade negotiated by this Government with the Americans. What does this whole business of giving away our natural resources have to do with free trade? What does it have to do with giving away our oil, our natural resources, our water, control of our financial institutions? What does this have to do with a free trade agreement? Nothing! Except that the Americans asked for it and Canada gave in.

But they did not have the courage to define what Canada is in the Bill, but the United States are defined, for example. Mr. Speaker, I tell you that it is not right to proceed this way. We should at least define our terms, define our territory, define our rights and what powers we want to keep and then proceed to negotiate seriously, Mr. Speaker.

• (1650)

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, this free trade debate began with a commission. I think Canadians sometimes do not understand that we are at about the six year mark in a process. Six years ago the then Prime Minister started the process because the Canadian economy was in trouble as a result of too many consecutive years of Liberal-NDP policy which had ruined the economy of the country. In four short years, after some 17 years of bad policy, we have been able piece by piece to put good policy in place. Canadians are employed, our standard of living is starting to rise again, yet at the end what do we run into? A filibuster.

Earlier this day the coalition of the NDP and Liberal Party suggested that the report stage debate on this specific legislation go on for 150 sitting days, followed by 200 sitting days for third reading debate. Two more years of debate during which Parliament could do nothing else about pensions, nothing about widows, nothing about children, nothing about pornography. Just stay on the free trade debate for two more years. That is absurd.

We moved from that absurdity to the absurdity of the proposition in this amendment, that we have to define in this Bill what Canada is. This House passed some 225 pieces of legislation and sent them to the Senate, and did we feel compelled to take the word "Canada" out of those Bills? No, it is in every single one of them. In fact, on many pages in every single one of them. Yet do we have a definition of Canada in any of that legislation? No.

Did the Opposition lay these amendments down for members of the committee and the witnesses to consider? Was there wisdom in this definition? Is this the best definition of Canada for the Broadcasting Act? Is it the best definition of Canada for the Companies Act? Is it the best definition of Canada for the Customs Act? All those Acts are amended by this Bill. In fact, some 27 different Acts of Parliament are amended by this Bill. Is this definition of Canada, laid out here at the eleventh hour, the best? No, it is a filibuster tactic, not a serious suggestion.

My hon. friend, the Whip for the Liberal Party, laughs. I served with him for hours and hours in committee on the importance to this country of a new language Bill and respect for English and French. I have helped provide budgetary money to the opposition Parties for researchers and staff and translators. Yet they brought in 102 amendments, every single one of them in

. . . in one official language only. All the amendments put forward by the Opposition on this legislation were in only one language, English, in English only.

[English]

Is that the Liberal view of Canada? Is that part of their definition, that Canada is a country of one language? Or is it two languages?

Mr. Gauthier: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. I know the Parliamentary Secretary is a fair-minded individual. The Standing Orders require that any document circulated to Members be in both official languages. Any Member of this House, be it a unilingual Anglophone or a unilingual Francophone, can table a document in his or her language. Before it is circulated it has to be translated. That is the rule. If the hon. gentleman is trying to promote disunity by saying all Members must work in both official languages, he is full of nonsense.

Mr. Hopkins: So there.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): This is only Monday, the beginning of the week. The Hon. Parliamentary Secretary has the floor, and he has a minute before Private Members' Hour.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I am acquainted with the rules but as Members of this chamber and citizens of this country we know what Canada is. It is not a limited proposition like the one the Opposition is putting forward in this amendment. That is a very narrow definition of Canada. That is a definition for the Customs Act because for custom purposes you need to have a geographic definition. However, do we need a geographic sense of Canada for company policy and our laws dealing with companies? Do we need a geographic sense of Canada for our laws dealing with broadcasting policy or our cultural industries? Is a customs definition of Canada the definition we want to live with across those 27 Acts? I suggest it is not.

The only reason we have this amendment before us is to filibuster. It is nonsense and would be damaging to the country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member will have three minutes in his debate when we recommence.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

BLUE WATER BRIDGE AUTHORITY ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. John Oostrom (for Mr. Hardey) moved that Bill C-210, an Act to amend the Blue Water Bridge Authority Act, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee, be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Oostrom (for Mr. Hardey) moved that the Bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to have an opportunity to speak on this Bill this afternoon. As my hon. colleagues are aware, I introduced Bill C-210 in this House in October of 1986. The Bill was drawn and brought forward for second reading in April of this year.

Coincidentally, a few hours before the time scheduled for debate on second reading of this Bill I had been sworn in as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Supply and Services. Due to this position I had discussions with my colleague, the Member for Kent (Mr. Hardey), whose constituency is right down the road from mine who agreed to take over sponsorship of this very important Bill. Unfortunately, the Hon. Member has pressing business in his constituency today, and he has asked me to speak on his behalf on this Bill.

I would like to take a moment to thank the many people who have contributed to this very important Bill. First, I would like to thank the Blue Water Bridge Authority for calling this problem to my attention and assisting me in detailing for my colleagues in the House the need for this amendment.

I want to thank my hon. colleague, the Member from Kent, for his efforts on behalf of this Bill. It goes without saying that we would not be debating it at third reading without his assistance and co-operation. As well, my colleagues who sat and heard testimony at the legislative committee hearing on this Bill get my thanks for their interest, input, and assistance. An amendment to the Bill was passed in legislative committee which clarified the intent of the legislation.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Thacker) has been of invaluable help on this Bill, both in his advice and in the time he has spent liaising with the Transport Department.

Last, but certainly not least, I want to thank all Members opposite for their co-operation and interest in this Bill. I want especially to thank Members opposite for their support for the motion to move this Bill ahead to third reading. I would now like to thank them in advance for their support at the final vote.

Over the past few months I have had some experience with Private Members' Bills. I had the privilege of being appointed chairman of the legislative committee studying Bill C-204. All Members of that committee were very aware that we were entering new and uncharted waters. We have had Private Members' Bills passed in the House of Commons in the past, but they were few and far between.

In the past private Members were given one hour to debate their Bills. A Bill of any substance could not be handled properly in one hour and consequently Bills were virtually always talked out. On occasion a very persistent private Member could have a Bill passed dealing with a pet project if he or she were extremely persistent and re-introduced the Bill year after year.

There are many Hon. Members in this House who are more familiar with this subject than I. Members are aware that in recent Parliaments the only Private Members' Bills which were passed dealt in the main with the changing of the name of a Member's constituency. There were no Members in past Parliaments who attempted, as did my colleague, the Member for Broadview—Greenwood (Ms. McDonald), to introduce legislation as important and necessary as Bill C-204. In the past any Member who attempted this would be virtually wasting his or her time.

As well, Bill C-210 would probably never have been passed in a previous Parliament. Bill C-210 needed to go to a legislative committee and be amended to provide the essential protection to members of the Bridge Authority who are trying to provide their services free. I have little doubt that Bill C-210 would not have passed without the reform of the House of Commons.

That I am standing here today speaking at third reading of this Bill is proof that House reform is working, concrete evidence that private Members are somebodies and that we can have an impact and make a difference in the Government of Canada. It is proof that a private Member can recognize a fault or a wrinkle, if you will, and address it through a Private Members' Bill. We now have optimism that Private Members' Bills can be fully debated and accepted by a majority of Members of this House.

I have no doubt that all Hon. Members will join me in recognizing the efforts of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) to make this possible for private Members. I would like to applaud and thank our Prime Minister on behalf of all Members of this House for his commitment to House reform and his continuing efforts to give all Members the opportunity to make important and timely decisions in the House of Commons.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the Blue Water Bridge is a very important international crossing. On behalf of the Official Opposition I would like to say that we are pleased to support the adoption of Bill C-210. We have facilitated the consideration and progress of this Bill in earlier stages.

There is no doubt that the current rules, which were adopted not as an initiative of one Party but as a joint effort of all Parties, do facilitate somewhat the consideration and disposition of Private Members' Business. However, the adoption of Private Members' Bills and resolutions is not quite as rare as my hon. friend suggested in his remarks. I can recall, for example, that a Private Members' Bill of a Liberal Member of Parliament in the early sixties brought about the adoption of the current name of our national airline. It was changed from Trans-Canada Air Lines to Air Canada. The Member of Parliament who introduced the Bill went on to have a very distinguished career in public life. He was none other than the Hon. Jean Chrétien.

I repeat that there is no doubt that it is easier for Private Members' Business to be considered and disposed of under the current rules, but the acceptance of a Bill offered by a private Member is not quite as rare as my hon. friend has suggested. Praise for this move forward should be shared equally by all Members of this House. Parliamentary reform should not be a partisan issue as it has not been in the past. To the extent that our present rules are working the praise, or for that matter the blame if there are problems, must be shared by all Members.

I would like to conclude by saying once again that on behalf of the Official Opposition I am pleased to accept the request of the commissioners of the Blue Water Bridge for the extra protection that this Bill will give them and to support third reading of this Bill.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the New Democrats in the House of Commons I, too, want to lend my voice in support for Bill C-210. As we all know, this is an extremely important crossing in Canada. There are a number of individuals who unselfishly devote their time, talents, and energies to this crossing. This Bill would remove any liability from these individuals. This is an appropriate initiative and it is encouraging, as my hon. friend has indicated, that a private Member was able to initiate this legislative change to provide this element of security to the people who devote their time to making our country a better place.

One of the highlights of this Parliament has been the fact that we have been experimenting with the variety of forms of parliamentary reform. The role given to back-benchers through the private Members' initiatives has been one of the major initiatives. We have a long way to go.

• (1710)

We have made progress with an important initiative in terms of recognizing the rights, obligations and responsibilities of those on the back-benches. We have provided an opportunity for private Members to initiate such actions as this. It will provide an element of security to those commissioners which they do not believe exists at this time. I believe they are probably protected legislatively, but if it provides them with more protection, security and encouragement to continue serving Canadians as they do, this is an appropriate private Members' initiative.

On behalf of New Democrats I am pleased to lend our enthusiastic support.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in support of Bill C-210, the Blue Water Bridge Authority Act. I served on the legislative committee on this Bill and listened to the presentations made by the board members who came forward to endorse what the Hon. Member for Sarnia—Lambton (Mr. James) has asked us to do. I was impressed with these people who have been asked to serve on the board, without renumeration as has been mentioned already.

I want to compliment the Member for Sarnia—Lambton for sponsoring this Bill and bringing it to this point today. I want to thank the Minister of Transport (Mr. Bouchard) and his officials for allowing us to put this piece of important legislation before the House this afternoon.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the Blue Water Bridge Authority carries liability insurance coverage. Given the frequent use of this bridge to transport hazardous materials and the large liability judgments given by courts, the members of that authority were concerned that with a serious accident there was some possibility they could be held personally liable. That was never the intention of Parliament in passing that originally, but there was the possibility with the wording of the Bill.

Second, let me commend the Member for Sarnia—Lambton (Mr. James). As a new Member in 1984, it is amazing that already in his short career he has had a Bill passed by this Parliament. The last major Bill was passed in the early 1960s, over 20 years ago. Not many Bills were accepted over the years until the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) accepted the recommendation of all Parties.

The Prime Minister wanted to have parliamentary reform so that private Members could bring forward Bills irrespective of the fact that they might be highly embarrassing to a Prime Minister or the Cabinet of the day. Private Members in the House can have Bills come forward for a forced vote at least six times in each session. That is tremendous parliamentary reform and all Parties should preserve that power with a passion. Indeed, it should be expanded.

I want to thank the Member for Sarnia—Lambton for carrying on with this Bill. It is not easy to become a new Member of Parliament and learn all of these processes, in light of the demands we all have from our ridings with such matters as passport problems, immigration problems, income tax problems. There are many demands on our time, without arranging to have a Bill drafted, or even figure out the Notice Paper. With the able help of the Clerks, who do admirable service to all of us, we are able to do so.

The credit goes to the Member for Sarnia—Lambton. He had to be here for up to five hours. He had to arrange for Members to speak in support of the Bill and arrange for Members to show up at committee to ensure there was a quorum. That is a problem in itself, given the demands on Members' time to appear at other committees. He had to arrange for witnesses to be here and for the Bill to be returned to the House and have Members available to speak. It takes dedicated effort by Members to make that happen.

I am sure the electorate of my friend and colleague, the Member for Sarnia—Lambton, will realize the major legislative accomplishment he has achieved here today. I am glad the House will give it third reading.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time provided for consideration of Private Members' Business is now expired.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. From the Government's perspective, the remaining time could be profitably spent on continuation of report stage of Bill C-130. There are some 102 amendments to be dealt with.

Under ordinary circumstances we might indeed suspend the sitting until six o'clock, but given the pressure in the Chamber for additional time and the Government's notice today that we will be moving time allocation, perhaps there could be unanimous consent to continue with report stage.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. Gauthier: No.

Sitting Suspended

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not hear unanimous consent.

SITTING SUSPENDED

Mr. Speaker: It being 5.17 p.m., the House will suspend sitting until 6 p.m.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Friday, August 12, consideration of Bill C-264, an Act to amend the Criminal Code (instruments and literature for illicit drug use), as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee; and the amendment of Mr. Horner:

That Bill C-264 be amended in Clause 1 by striking out lines 11 to 15 at page 1 and lines 1 to 5 at page 2 and substituting the following therefor:

"ited pursuant to the Narcotic Control Act, controlled pursuant to Part III of the Food and Drugs Act or restricted pursuant to Part IV of the Food and Drugs Act;

"illicit drug use" means the importation, exportation, cultivation, sale or possession of a narcotic, drug or other substance contrary to the Narcotic Control Act or Part III or IV of the Food and Drugs Act or a regulation made thereunder;

"instrument for illicit drug use" means anything designed primarily or intended under the circumstances for consuming or to facilitate the consumption of an illicit drug, but does not include a "device" as that term is defined in section 2 of the Food and Drugs Act";

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being six o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 13(5), the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division at the report stage of Bill C-264.

Call in the Members.

• (1810)

And the division bells having rung:

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. May I recommend that, in the spirit of reform once again, now that we are dealing with a Private Member's item here and contrary to our usual practice when we have a deferred division and a vote by Party lines, that on this matter we take a vote row by row instead of by Party lines.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it agreed?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Once again I should like to remind Hon. Members that the voting will begin with those Members who are in favour of the motion in the rows to my right rising by row and then Members in the rows to my left rising. Later, I will ask those Members who are opposed to the motion in the rows to my right to rise, and end with Members opposed to the motion in the rows to my left.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Horner) which was agreed to on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion carried.

Mr. Horner moved that the Bill as amended be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When shall the Bill be read the third time? At the next sitting of the House?

Some Hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Horner: In view of the unanimous vote on this motion, would it be possible to move, without debate, to third reading at this time?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to our moving to third reading, but I would hope that there would be no debate and that we will proceed to the vote right now.

Mr. Riis: I hate to bring up this point, but had I known that there would be a request to move directly to third reading debate, we would have been pleased to. However, our critic is not with us today and would like to participate in third reading debate. I am afraid that we will have to wait until the next opportunity to participate in the third reading debate.

CANADA-U.S. FREE TRADE AGREEMENT IMPLEMENTATION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-130, an Act to implement the free trade agreement between Canada and the United States of America, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee; and the amendments of Mr. Axworthy (p. 18275).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Deputy Prime Minister has three minutes left in his debate.

Mr. Hawkes: Merci, Monsieur le Président, trois minutes, ça suffit.

Prior to breaking for Private Members' hour I had seven minutes left and one final point that I wished to make. In the arguments that we have heard from the other side in support of the amendment to define Canada in three places in the Bill, the Opposition has failed to tell Canadians, and Members of the House, when they draw the analogy of the need for defining the United States in the Bill, what we are defining is the customs territory of the United States. What the members of the NDP ignore is that the Canadian Customs Act today and in the future must define Canada's customs territory.

In terms of the implementation of the free trade agreement, what we are dealing with in this Bill is the need to define what we mean by the United States. Surely in each of our individual Acts where we feel it is necessary in some way to define Canada or the Canadian interest that is done Act by Act.

I wonder if those who are such strong proponents of these amendments have thought through the reality that any definition provides clarity, but it provides clarity through limitation. In proposing this amendment at this place in this particular piece of legislation there is a very limited view of Canada. It is a limited view that is appropriate because it has a geographic base, therefore it is appropriate to customs issues. However, is that view the appropriate view for broadcast issues? Is that view the appropriate view for cultural issues? Is that point of view and that definition appropriate for the 27 existing Acts of Parliament which are being amended by this piece of legislation?

I suggest to Members opposite that, upon a little more consideration of this issue, and if they had brought that forward to committee where it could have been thoroughly examined by Members whose task it was over several weeks to look at it, and by witnesses who came to testify, they might find that they are less happy with what they are proposing than might appear to them on the surface. Let us deal with the Customs Act and the necessary definition in the Customs Act, but let us not impose a Customs Act definition on all the other statutes that are involved in this.

I would urge Members simply to reject those amendments and quickly and, hopefully, on a voice vote, move on to others.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain on debate.

Ms. Marion Dewar (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member has defined some of the things about which we have great concerns. When we are talking about not defining Canada and hearing that the United States is defined within the territory of the Customs Act, we believe that surely it would not have been too difficult for Canada to be defined in the same way within this Act that, as the Hon. Member has so clearly stated, amends 27 existing Acts of Parliament. It seems to me we should at least be explicit about what Canada is.

Certainly the Government has a very limited view of Canada. That is the very reason we are participating in this type of debate. When we are looking at amending 27 Acts that affect not only the economy but the whole sovereignty and identity of Canada, it seems to me that we should not be talking about closure, but that is what we have been talking about today. I heard a lot of criticism that the opposition Parties are asking for an extraordinary amount of time to discuss this Bill. If this is the Holy Grail which the Government keeps talking about with the future of Canada in sight, the Government should not begrudge the amount of time this House takes. The Government should have been willing to go to the Canadian people across the country to hear what they have to say.

Mr. McDermid: We did, three times.

Ms. Dewar: Instead of that, we got a limited amount of hearings. The Government went across the country before we had the Bill. We were talking in abstracts. The Government was saying that this is what might be there. But we did not have the specifics. We were told, "Don't worry. Trust us". That is a great way for a government to operate when this will be a totally new direction for neon years.

It gives me great concern when I see the Government is not only objecting totally to the amendments but to the kind of debate we want. We should be taking time in the House of Commons to look at the substantive issue of what the deal is all about. We need to take the Bill section by section and look very clearly at it. We want Canadians to understand what we are getting into. It would be a good exercise for Members of this House to get a good sense of what we are getting into.

When we talk about defining Canada, we are defining in this agreement the whole erosion of the Canadian identity. What will the Canadian economy be all about? We recognize that within this agreement now there are no limits to the kind of foreign investment we are getting into. People can holus-bolus buy our economy.

We know we have a branch plant economy, but we know that parent companies adjust prices and decide what kind of manufacturing takes place for their subsidiaries. Parent companies call the shots. Exports of branch plants go mainly to parent companies which control what kind of imports the subsidiaries have the ability to purchase. That is occurring in Canada now without this agreement. We are tying ourselves more deeply into that foreign-owned kind of economy where we will become totally dependent as far as our economy is concerned.

I hear Hon. Members telling me every day that 75 per cent of our trade takes place with the United States now. If we are doing so well, why do we have to give away any of the leverage we already have? But the Government is saying, "Welcome to Canada. We are open for business. Take our resources. Take any of our economy and have a ball with it. We are open and we do not care what you do with us." That is what we have been hearing consistently from the Government.

I think Canadians want to know more about this deal and understand it. As they start to understand this deal, questions come and they realize that this is not such a good deal. You hear government Members saying, "If you are not with us, you must be narrow-minded nationalists who want the status quo." If being a nationalist is saying you want to have some control over your own trade and you want to know in what directions your own economy will take, I do not apologize for being a nationalist. I think that is just fine. That is what being a citizen of a country is.

Look at what we had been doing before. We had so much foreign ownership that many times when Canadians could be adventurous and take risks, they could not always do it because the parent company would not allow it. Look at the number of deals that were struck at the World Bank. We know that we got very few contracts, not because we were not capable of getting contracts or competing with what was coming out of Third World countries and what the World Bank was financing, but because very often we were not able to bid on some of the contracts that were put forward because a parent company was not allowing it.

Mr. Kilgour: That is absolute nonsense.

Ms. Dewar: That is not nonsense. The statistics are there and you can look at them.

Mr. McDermid: Name one.

Ms. Dewar: You can see the amount of bidding that Japan did to get the bids it wanted.

Mr. McDermid: Name one.

Ms. Dewar: On the bids we made we got about 80 per cent on what we bid and we bid on about 5 per cent of the contracts. I have described that in detail.

If you look at what is happening in other countries, and I use Japan as an example because it is always being quoted, Japan might bid on 80 per cent or 90 per cent of contracts and might win about 25 per cent of that. Japan's share is greater than ours because Japan is constantly putting in bids and being adventurous. Canadian manufacturers and workers are quite capable of doing the same because any time they have been able to bid they have been successful.

Mr. McDermid: This is what this is all about.

Ms. Dewar: We are looking at this agreement. It says that we want to have more and more foreign control over our economy, that we want to make sure Canadians in the future, our sons, daughters and grandchildren, will no longer be able to take a direction in the economy that might be good for the Canada of the future. The Government says that there are two different visions of Canada. I hope there are. There is a vision of Canada that I have and I know my Party has where people count more than just the bottom line. People are not treated as commodities but with dignity as human beings. They are allowed to develop in their culture and environment in their own communities with a value system that is one of their choice and not one imposed upon them where they are not allowed to work because the jobs are not there and the economy is foreign owned, where the direction of the economy is not necessarily one they would choose but one that is directed south of the border.

I think Canada at this point, as we are maturing and growing up, is beginning to get its roots, is comfortable with its identity of two languages, and is comfortable with where we come from and who we are. It is not a time for us to fix ourselves so firmly economically only to one partner. I think it is time to branch out. It is time to be part of the actors who are going to the Pacific Rim. We can be part of that whole international liberalization of trade among countries. This kind of agreement does not do itself any good in the eyes of the Third World, and certainly ties us firmly to the foreign policies of the United States.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member who has just spoken knows that I have a great deal of respect for her. When she argued that Canada was not getting its share of the World Bank contracts because somehow foreign-owned companies were preventing Lavalin, Montreal engineers or engineering companies across Canada or other consultants from bidding on them, in my respectful submission she was giving us NDP whimsy rather than fact.

Mr. McDermid: She cannot even name one contact.

• (1840)

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, some of the great engineering companies in Canada have done business all over the world. In my experience, I have found that there are not enough companies bidding, and I agree with the Hon. Member that there should be more. But somehow to tie that to free trade is not serious debate. In my view, she is not dealing candidly with Canadians, unless she has better evidence than that which she offered today.

The reason that eight out of 10 provincial Governments, the Consumers' Association of Canada, medium-sized, small and large business people and young people, including the Quebec Young Liberals who just voted for the agreement yesterday, are in favour of the agreement is not that they want to see Canada downtrodden or lose its identity. The reason is that we know we are strong, capable and intelligent. We know that we can compete and create jobs and a better future for our children and our grandchildren.

Both opposition Parties are taking the view that somehow we are giving away our national soul. That is simply nonsense. A friend of mine recently came back from Ireland. He told me that the airwaves are full of talk about 1992 when Europe will have a fully integrated market. This deal does not provide for a fully integrated market. Opposition Members should know that. It simply tries to put some discipline into the trading relationship which is bigger than that between any two countries in history.

Let me take an example from my region. When a petrochemical product goes across the border at Coutts, Alberta, a 15 per cent or 16 per cent tariff is paid. We are trying to get rid of that tariff so that we can have the value-added jobs in Edmonton, Calgary or Windsor. Now those jobs tend to be in the United States because of that tariff. We are simply trying to recognize that we need to have some protection from the protectionism which is always present in the United States. I believe it was Congressman La Falce who said the other day that if this agreement does not get through, there will be a trade war such as we have not seen since the 1930s.

How can we put a bag over our heads and pretend that the world does not have regional trading blocs? Something like 40 or 50 countries are now involved in trading blocs, the Common Market of course being the best known. How can we pretend that 25 million Canadians, a population slightly smaller than that of California, need no protection or discipline in trading relationships? We can do that if we believe in a fully socialized economy, an economy with someone sitting in a building in Ottawa saying how many widgets will be produced in Windsor, how many chemicals will be produced in Edmonton. However, I believe that the vast majority of Canadians do not share that vision of Canada. That is a vision that would create the kind of unemployment that we have had in parts of Canada and one that we are now trying to get away from. I give the Government enormous credit for creating jobs across Canada, though I wish there were more jobs in my part of the country. I wish that fewer Albertans had to move to Toronto or Hamilton to find employment.

Two NDP Members from the Windsor area are here today. I suppose they will say that that is managed trade. Since 1968, the production minimums under the Auto Pact have never been applied, as I understand it, except for a few months in 1980 or 1981 when Chrysler was in trouble.

Mr. Langdon: That's false.

Mr. Kilgour: Let the Hon. Member give us the facts and figures on that because I have never seen it contradicted anywhere. We have had, for all intents and purposes, free trade in the auto industry since 1968 except for a brief period in 1981.

The Leader of the NDP (Mr. Broadbent) is from Oshawa. I believe Oshawa has one of the lowest rates of unemployment in Canada. We in western Canada, Atlantic Canada and northern Canada are simply saying that we want to have a little bit of the misery that the people of Oshawa are suffering from. We want to have a few of the advantages that the good people of Oshawa have been enjoying for many years, as have the people from Toronto, St. Catharines and parts of Quebec. Let us see if we cannot have a trading relationship which will create more jobs.

The Canada West Foundation has studied industries in western Canada on an industry-by-industry basis. It has said that these industries will benefit from free trade. It will be overwhelmingly favourable to people in our region. It is true that some will suffer. There will have to be adjustment and transition programs. No one will support those more strongly than you or I, Mr. Speaker.

We have to recognize that we are not living in the 1920s any longer. I remind NDP Members that back in the 1920s, Argentina and Canada had economies and standards of living that were roughly comparable. Argentina turned inward with protectionism and all kinds of regulations and controls. Now, as I am sure Hon. Members know, Argentina has something less than economic prosperity.

Canada has to look outward. Western Canada has always looked outward because our region was founded on trade with Europe. We cannot pretend that the world that exists in some textbook that the Hon. Members from Windsor have read still exists. It does not.

Those who prosper in the world are the Japanese, the Swiss, the West Germans—

Mr. McCurdy: Real free trade economy is in Japan.

Mr. Kilgour: These are the people who know that producing high-quality goods with service to customers and intelligence is the way of the future. I remind Hon. Members that the average people in those countries are doing very well. As I think Canadians will show in the next election, Canadians know that that is the route we have to take.

The Hon. Member said a moment ago that Japan is not in a trade group. That is true, but which of the other OECD countries is not in a trade group except for Japan, Canada and the United States?

Mr. McCurdy: How much foreign ownership is there in Japan?

Mr. Kilgour: If we complete this agreement, as I very much hope we will, then Canada will be part of the largest, most prosperous trading community on earth, though some could argue that the Common Market is stronger. At least we will then be able to tell the people of Windsor, Edmonton, Toronto and St. Catharines to tool up because they can now sell to the entire North American market.

I will give an example of this. Unfortunately it is not an example from Edmonton but from Montreal. A man who makes children's winter garments in Montreal has to pay a 42 per cent tariff on costumes with ornaments on them when he ships them South. He is in favour of this agreement.

Mr. Langdon: He still will.

Mr. Kilgour: He will not. It will be phased out over 10 years, as the Hon. Member knows.

Mr. Langdon: Not for clothing.

Mr. Kilgour: If we can get rid of those tariffs and the non-tariff barriers, Canadians, whether they live in Newfoundland, northern Nova Scotia, northern Ontario, northern Quebec or western Canada, will have the same sort of benefits the people of southern Ontario have had, deserve to have and, I hope, will continue to have. That is why I very much hope that this agreement will go ahead.

I personally am looking forward to fighting an election on this issue. I think the Members who are asking us to look back 30 years will find that Canadians are not backward looking people. They believe in the future. They believe we can compete in North America. Once we have started to do that, they believe that we will be able to compete better in the Pacific Rim, in Europe and in other parts of the world.

I trust that allocation of time will be applied shortly and that before very long we will all be out looking our voters in the eyes, telling them, as The Globe and Mail has said, that if the deal is scuttled, the grass may not grow in Windsor but there are a lot of places where the grass will grow. I remind Hon. Members from Windsor that the agreement will enshrine the Auto Pact in it, and if the Americans want to rescind the Auto Pact, which they can do now very readily and quickly, they will have to rescind the entire trade agreement.

I appeal to the people of Canada who have benefited most from free trade in automobiles to let the rest of the Canadian people enjoy some of the things they have enjoyed.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, the amazing thing about this debate this evening is that very few Members opposite are speaking to the amendment. We just heard a speech that was so totally off the amendment that the Hon. Member should have been called to order.

• (1850)

We heard the Parliamentary Secretary telling the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy) that he should have moved his amendment in committee and discussed it there. What is the sense in moving amendments in a parliamentary committee where the Government, in the form of Members opposite, is totally dedicated to voting down those amendments?

Mr. McDermid: Not true.

Mr. Hopkins: Members opposite are talking in circles. They are trying to mislead the Canadian public into thinking that the committee was very meaningful. It was a good discussion but they certainly did not accept amendments.

Mr. McDermid: That is wrong.

Mr. Hopkins: You can look at any other piece of legislation that has gone through this House and you will see that the amendments which have been made would compare very favourably to the way this legislation, involving the greatest issue which has faced Parliament in decades, was handled. It was handled badly by the Government of Canada and its members who sat on that committee.

Mr. McDermid: You were not there, how would you know?

Mr. Hopkins: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member from Brampton always has his say, but I am used to that when I am up here speaking because I know that things I say get him very upset.

Let us get back to the amendments and the real issue here, which is the fact that in this Bill the geographic boundaries of the U.S. are outlined clearly—

Mr. McDermid: Why?

Mr. Hopkins: —but the boundaries of Canada are not.

Mr. McDermid: Why?

Mr. Hopkins: So the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry simply brings in the following amendment:

> That Bill C-130 be amended in Clause 2 by adding immediately after line 21 at page 2 the following:
> "Canada" means the territory to which Canadian customs laws apply, including areas beyond the territorial seas of Canada within which, in accordance with international law and its domestic laws, Canada may exercise rights with respect to the seabed and subsoil and their natural resources".

What is wrong with a government that would deny an amendment like this which adds clarity to a Bill? Is it afraid that something is going to happen down the road that will irritate Washington? Does it not have enough confidence in the future of Canada to put in its boundaries? The Government should be ashamed of itself.

What is it really thinking about here? It is so anxious to get a deal that it does not want to go back and clarify anything. It wants a deal at any price.

Mr. Kilgour: It cannot be changed.

Mr. Hopkins: You did not speak on the amendment so you do not really have a right to shout over here. I am on the business of today, you were not.

This is one simple amendment to Bill C-130.

Mr. McDermid: "Simple" is a good word.

Mr. Hopkins: The Parliamentary Secretary stood up and said Bill C-130 amends 27 pieces of legislation. If you are going to amend 27 pieces of legislation why can you not allow a simple amendment that speaks about the territorial boundaries of Canada?

Mr. McDermid: Because it is already there.

Mr. Hopkins: I know what is bothering Members opposite. The U.S. sent the Polar Sea through the North and they said they were doing it because it was international waters. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) visited Washington and had a meeting with the State Department and they simply told him he might as well go back home and forget it, they were going to go through anyway.

Mr. McDermid: Do you think your amendment would have stopped the Polar Sea from going through?

Mr. Hopkins: The Government did not raise the issue until it was raised by the Official Opposition. Then Canadians woke up suddenly to find the Americans were passing through waters we claimed to be our own and there was nothing done to inhibit them. The Government, with the largest majority in Canada's history, did not stand up and speak for Canada. Today it is not standing up and speaking for Canada because it will not put the boundaries of Canada in the most major piece of legislation that has passed through this House in decades.

Mr. McDermid: It is already there.

Mr. Hopkins: Mr. Speaker, let us go back to another day here that relates to this. Canada argued in 1903 that we owned the headlands on the West Coast. The U.S. was claiming we did not. Britain was brought into the picture and it supported the U.S. in its case and we lost. That is why today you have the American Panhandle down Canada's West Coast. What is going to happen in the future if the Americans claim certain waters in the Arctic to be international waters, send their ships through on that basis, and we say they are not international waters? If this amendment goes on to outline the clear-cut boundaries of Canada for the future—

Mr. McDermid: It stops that?

Mr. Hopkins: —it gives strength to our position when it comes to international law and future court cases dealing with the boundaries of Canada because it is there.

Mr. McDermid: It is already there.

Mr. Hopkins: It is already there? Why did you not put it in and clarify it?

Mr. McDermid: It is in the Customs Act, that is what we are talking about.

Mr. Hopkins: He says it is in the Customs Act. Why not put it directly into Bill C-130, because Bill C-130 takes precedence over many pieces of Canadian legislation. He knows that.

Mr. McDermid: That is wrong, too. That section was taken out of the Bill.

Mr. Hopkins: I talked about Britain and the U.S. ganging up on Canada in 1903, and it is happening in 1988. Here we have a trade Bill that is slanted towards the U.S. The boundaries of the U.S. are outlined in the Bill, the Government will not outline the boundaries of Canada because it is afraid of irritating Washington and it might lose its trade Bill. You know, you must not interfere with poor Uncle Sam. Yet we have the British Prime Minister, not sitting down at a table in this case, but walking into the Canadian House of Commons and supporting this trade agreement. It was totally out of order, but she did it anyway. Here you have Britain moving into this debate between Canada and the U.S., taking the part of the Tory Government in Canada, which already has an overwhelming majority in this House, and trying to convince Canadians that this is indeed the route to go.

We heard the Hon. Member for Edmonton—Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour) saying that Switzerland and Japan were successful by themselves in the world market simply because of high quality products.

Mr. McDermid: And protectionism.

Mr. Hopkins: He also mentioned intelligence. Is the Hon. Member saying that Canadian goods are not of high quality?

Is he saying that Canadian manufacturers do not go about things in an intelligent manner? He is not saying that his Government has been so intent on getting this trade agreement with the U.S.—and I refuse to call it a free trade agreement—that it has put all its eggs in one basket, and our international trade percentages with other countries have been going down drastically since the Government started these negotiations with the U.S. The facts will show it.

• (1900)

I do not trust the Government to carry Canadian concerns. I do not trust the Government to say that Canadian boundaries should not be in Bill C-130, the trade deal. I say they should be in there in explicit form. If the Government of Canada had confidence in its own legislation and in the agreement it made, it would put that amendment in and clarify it once and for all. I do not trust the Government because it is refusing to do so.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—Walkerville): I cannot describe my entry into this debate as a particular pleasure, particularly considering the substance of the debate which strikes me as being nearly trivial. It is fairly obvious to me that this long harangue could be reduced to a few minutes simply by the Government conceding what seems to me to be an obvious point. Unfortunately, we have had what has been described by my colleague from Windsor as a reduction of the debate to a level of plain meanness. Moments ago we listened to the Member for Edmonton—Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour) reduce the debate to a level of what must be described as intellectual dishonesty in the interests of regional bigotry.

First, as has so often happened in this debate, the Auto Pact has been referred to as one example of free trade by which southern Ontario, in an exploitative way—which is the implication of all that has been said—has benefited at the expense of the rest of the country. They ask why free trade should not be extended to the entire country.

First, the Auto Pact did not involve giving away the country. That is a minor observation at this stage of the debate. However, the Auto Pact is not a free trade deal of the sort that this deal between Mulroney and Reagan represents. It is not free trade, and anyone who suggests that it is is, as I said before, intellectually dishonest or absolutely committed to regional divisions in an unnecessary and exploitative way. The Auto Pact is an agreement by which ensured levels of production commensurate with sales in Canada were reached with the help of tariffs which represented the barrier that had to be overcome on the basis of which the Auto Pact was made to function.

It is true that the Auto Pact did provide jobs in southern Ontario. We are thankful for that. However, let us pause for a moment to consider what kinds of jobs were produced in southern Ontario. Yes, Windsor has benefited from a great many people working on the assembly lines in the plants there. However, with the Auto Pact, engineering went south. With the Auto Pact, management went south. To suggest that this negotiated trade agreement between Reagan and Mulroney does not at all affect the Auto Pact is just plain nonsense.

Mr. McDermid: Are you against the Auto Pact?

Mr. McCurdy: I find it really offensive that ignorance or mean-spiritedness continues to operate in this debate.

Mr. McDermid: Are you for it or against it?

Mr. McCurdy: The Auto Pact, even to the Parliamentary Secretary, should be recognized as a managed trade agreement and not a free trade agreement.

Mr. McDermid: Are you for it or against it?

Mr. McCurdy: Of course we are for it.

Mr. McDermid: What are you complaining about?

Mr. McCurdy: We are complaining about the attack on the Auto Pact in the interests of an agreement that has no relationship to the Auto Pact at all.

Second, the Hon. Member for Edmonton—Strathcona upbraided my colleague, the Member for Hamilton Mountain (Ms. Dewar), on the issue of Canadian contracts to the World Bank. She pointed out that we bid on about 3 per cent of such opportunities. The Member for Edmonton—Strathcona contested this suggesting that this was not in any way an argument that would portray Canada as being in a situation where its inability to bid is determined by foreign ownership.

I will give you one fact that my hon. colleague from Hamilton Mountain was unable to give, that is, that all of that 3 per cent represented companies that were Canadian-owned. None of them represented American-owned or foreign-owned companies. That may not send a clear message to the Member for Edmonton—Strathcona, but he is so totally committed to defending this deal on the basis of regional differences that he is completely unable to understand the argument in which we are supposed to be engaged right now, that being the question of whether or not this legislation should include a territorial definition of Canada.

We have heard a great deal of talk and nonsense, but the only thing we have heard in opposition to the acceptance of this amendment is that it already exists in the Customs Act. I cannot understand why that is a sufficient argument to involve us in two hours of debate when it would be very easy to include that definition in the legislation. If it is such a big deal and is so offensive, why does the Government include a definition of the territory of Canada in the agreement itself? There is a definition of United States territory and Canadian territory in the agreement. Why then do we have only a definition of that of the United States in the Act itself?

Mr. McDermid: To describe the customs area.

Mr. McCurdy: Well then why not also Canada?

Mr. McDermid: We have it in our Customs Act.

Mr. McCurdy: But why not in the legislation itself? That is not a sufficient argument to reject this amendment and to waste the time of the House in this fashion. One has to become just a little suspicious of all this haranguing, this pettiness, this meanness, and this intellectual dishonesty over a trivial amendment which, as the Parliamentary Secretary says, would change not a thing. One must get suspicious. Is it that there is a danger that providing a definition of Canada might somehow offend the Americans? Certainly this deal has been contrived in most ways not to offend the Americans.

This definition is not really what is at issue here. The definition suggested in the amendment comes essentially from the agreement which says: "—Canada, the territory to which its customs laws apply, including any areas beyond the territorial seas of Canada within which, in accordance with international law and its domestic laws, Canada may exercise rights with respect to the seabed and subsoil and their natural resources—".

This definition of Canada is not what is at issue here. There is a definition of Canada which, it seems to me, we ought to attend. Even this territorial definition draws attention to the fact that this agreement is an attack on the very definition of Canada as the people of this country understand. At issue here is not this customs definition of Canada but a definition of Canada as the most civilized, humane, and generous country in the world, a country that is not devoted to the market forces as the motivator of what we are and what we shall be but a country that recognizes that social justice is the very meat of our existence.

Nobody ever said that violence in Canada is as Canadian as maple sugar. We are a different country. We have vast resources that this deal would sell off. We have the highest percentage of foreign ownership which we would expand. We have considerable comparable advantages which we could exploit, but by this deal will not be able to. We are a country that can mobilize its financial resources to build a new future but we give even the control of our financial resources away.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would love to listen to the Hon. Member but his time has expired.

• (1910)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question is on Motion No. 1 standing in the name of the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion, the nays have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 114(11), the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

The next grouping is on Motions Nos. 5, 6 and 8.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry) moved:

Motion No. 5

That Bill C-130 be amended by deleting Clause 3.

Motion No. 6

That Bill C-130 be amended by deleting Clause 4.

Motion No. 8

That Bill C-130 be amended by deleting Clause 6.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the 10 minutes which we are allowed at report stage is not sufficient time to do justice to these very important amendments on critical clauses of the Bill. I will use the 10 minutes to make two very crucial points.

The first concerns the stated purpose of the Bill.

The purpose we see in the legislation and the reason we are asking for its deletion has nothing to do with the Bill itself. The purpose outlined in Bill C-130 is not the reason why the Bill was introduced or why the trade agreement was started, and certainly has nothing to do with the kind of legislation before us.

This afternoon, the Member from Calgary said that this got started with a royal commission. Of course, that is not true. When one looks at the record, the proposal for the free trade agreement began in 1983 with some private meetings with the Ambassador from the United States in Ottawa, Mr. Robinson, and key members of the business community. They began to discuss why Canada should no longer be allowed to introduce such things as a National Energy Program or provide for policies that would conserve our own resources for our own purposes.

The real purpose of this Bill has very little to do with trade and is much more concerned with the economic agenda of the coalition of neo-conservative forces in this country who do not like the idea that Government itself can be a constructive contributor to making policies on behalf of Canadians.

What we are debating is the agenda of the republican party of the north. We are seeing the swan song of President Reagan tonight in New Orleans. We are seeing the swan song of the neo-conservatives around the world. However, they want to leave a legacy of prohibition for any future progressive forces to introduce initiatives or policies on behalf of government that would overtake the kind of mean-spirited actions that we have seen so much of in the last five or six years.

When we recognize that this legislation limits the right of Canadians to make choices about the kind of investment they will have in Canada, we see that it has nothing to do with trade. It concerns the free flow of capital of the large companies and large corporations that do not want to recognize nationality or citizenship of Canadians. They simply want free rein to invest where and how they wish.

That is the real purpose of the Bill. It is to ensure that there will be this kind of open door investment policy. We have seen what will happen as a result. Last week, the Petroleum Monitoring Agency, an agency of the Government itself, indicated that the level of ownership in the energy field is falling drastically. Canadians are far less able to own their own energy resources this year than they were the year before or the year before that. The reason is the immense number of takeovers and acquisitions, $33 billion worth in the last four years under the Tory Government. There were 433 applications, not one of which was turned down. Yet the Government will loosen the rules even further. That is the purpose of the legislation.

It is stated that the purpose is somehow to try to use this agreement and the legislation as a way of encouraging more multilateral trade. That is bunkum. This legislation is creating a preferential North American discriminatory trade bloc that breaks every precedent and historical rule this country has attempted to follow in order to establish an international trading system that treats all nations the same and does not discriminate against nations, large or small. We have fought for that since 1948 and the inception of GATT. Various Liberal Governments have seen that the real interest of Canada lies in a system that is fair and equitable. This agreement does the opposite. It implements an agreement that discriminates against other countries.

Mr. Crofton: What about the Auto Pact?

Mr. Axworthy: Let us talk about the Auto Pact. According to the Auto Pact that we signed, other countries can join in. Under the agreement, they keep other countries out. A Korean or Japanese automobile manufacturer is grandfathered out of this agreement. They cannot get in under these tariff rearrangements. They are locking it up to preserve the status quo.

Members of the Conservative Party say that this represents great, open competition, except that an automobile manufacturer from Asia will not be allowed to have the same rules as those that apply to an automobile manufacturer owned by an American company.

This kind of discriminatory system is being created in North America in energy. We are giving the Americans full access to our resources, which is what they want. If we refer back to 1952 in President Eisenhower's days, and the Paley Commission report, the No. 1 strategic objective of the United States was to get secure access to Canadian resources. It took until 1988 and the Government of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) to get that. They had to wait until the election of 1984 of a republican Party in Canada to get that security of access. That is the hidden agenda and underlying objective of the Bill. It has nothing to do with opening up markets.

The fact is that it closes down markets in areas and allows that kind of discrimination. It will certainly be one of the most serious roadblocks on the way to important international development in making Canada an effective international trader. That is one reason for my amendment.

The second reason deals with the important Clause 6. It concerns the unilateral assertion by the Government to take over powers in provincial jurisdiction as a consequence of the trade agreement. We know that the Americans have made conditional on accepting the agreement with the letters they want to exchange on December 15, that the Government of Canada ensure that it can provide compliance with all parts of the agreement. In order to do that the Government needs a clause in the Bill that will give it a big stick against the provinces. That is the reason for Clause 6.

Clause 6 runs against the nature of federal-provincial relations as they have evolved since the mid 1930s. At that time there was an important decision in an international labour case whereby the judicial council decided that in any international agreement that affects a provincial jurisdiction, the provincial government has the right to ratify in those jurisdictions. That decision has been followed since that time. There have been countless Acts of the United Nations, charters, covenants on women's rights and labour rights in which provincial rights were affected and the provinces had the right to ratify. They did not become agreements until the provinces did so.

The present Government is asserting that that is no longer necessary. It is changing the fundamental premise of federal-provincial relations unilaterally. If that is what the Government wants to do, that is its business. Perhaps we could evolve constitutionally. But it should not be done as a consequence of a trade agreement with the United States. It should not be done simply by asserting so in federal legislation. It should be done by the proper Canadian means of consultation and discussion and negotiation with the province. In fact, what Clause 6 does is to provide a third partner at the constitutional table; the provinces, the federal Government of Canada, and the Government of the United States. That is what it really does.

• (1920)

An Hon. Member: What nonsense.

Mr. Axworthy: All of a sudden we are now being required, under Clause 6, to ensure compliance. As a result, we break those precedents.

That is why we believe that this is a clause which fundamentally undermines the basic kind of Canadian identity and integrity. When we argue that this is a debate about Canadian independence, Canadian integrity, Canadian rights-to-choose-for-themselves, there is no clearer case of this Government kowtowing, getting on its knees to the sacrifice of this agreement, than Clause 6, because they are prepared to overturn 50 years of precedent, to go against all the sacred precedents that the Prime Minister talked about, that we are going to have better relations with the provinces, that it is going to be cordial conciliation, time and to make this kind of assertion. That is why we think it is wrong.

We do not believe that the federal Government has the right, in legislation such as this, to make that kind of unilateral assertion of new power. If they want to make the case, fine. Go to a federal-provincial meeting, put your case out. Let us have it debated and discussed. Let us see what kind of reaction we get. Let us get an open kind of examination of these requirements. But let us not do it on the basis that simply because the federal Government says so, it is right. That is the full arrogance of the majority, the full arrogance of the abuse of power. It is the reason why we have a federal system, to provide some checks and balances in Canada.

This Government has compromised, appeased, in so many ways, at so many times, in so many essential ingredients of Canada, for the sake of getting this God-forsaken Bill through, it is impossible to count how many times. What it adds up to is once again the kind of fundamental surrender of Canadians' rights of ways of doing things the way we want to do them.

We are allowing ourselves to be taken over, to be guided by a whole new set of principles that may be acceptable to Americans—and that is their business—to make those choices, but they should not be incorporated, insinuated into Canada by this kind of legislation.

When Hon. Members say, "Well, this is just a little trade agreement, commercial arrangement", we point to Clauses 6 and 7. That is not a commercial arrangement. That is a whole new declaration of federal-provincial relations. It has no place in this Bill. If it is going to be done, it should be done in the proper, honourable, respectable, responsible way, and that is to do it in concert, in communion with provinces. That is the Canadian way of doing things, not the republican Party way of doing things. But unfortunately, we have the republican Party of the north in power for a short time. They do not understand the difference.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I want to say first to this House that these are useful amendments which have been put before us, because they permit us to debate what the purpose of this whole exercise actually is. The first motion, Motion No. 5, would attempt to delete the clause in which the purpose of this Bill is outlined. It is exactly the same purpose which is in the free trade agreement itself. It is an outline of purposes which includes within it the falsehoods and statements which take us in a direction which this Government, before its election, never committed itself to, which this Government, in its own legislation, never committed this country to, and yet, these are the purposes for which this Bill is moved, that this agreement is entered into.

The first purpose is an easy one; it is to eliminate barriers to trade and goods and services between Canada and the United States, to get rid of tariffs, non-tariff barriers, if possible. But notice that it deals with services for the first time that any significant trade agreement has dealt with services. Notice, too, that the United States is far and away the most dominant and powerful exporter and monopolizer of the service sector in the world, so much so that in fact within GATT many Third World countries have very strongly resisted the United States push to make services part of the GATT arrangements among trade in the countries. But not us. We do not hesitate, despite a massive deficit with respect to services, despite the fact that the United States does far, far better exporting services to us than we do exporting services to them. We say, "No, open sesame, we are going to provide you free entry to the service sector of our country".

The second purpose is to believe that we are not facilitating conditions of fair competition within the free trade area established by the agreement, fair competition between a country which, on the one side, has committed itself to a social safety net which will protect its people, has committed itself to a broadening of that social safety net, as recently as the announcements made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp), with respect to day care, and yet, on the other side, we have a country where things that we take completely for granted, like medicare, are considered by the present President of the United States to be so out of bounds that they make the advocacy of medicare by Michael Dukakis a danger to the future of the United States.

At the same time, this country with which we are entering into fair competition has dozens of states with right-to-work laws, laws that, under that label, effectively make it almost impossible for trade unions to operate effectively; a country in which it is possible to import goods duty free, from the Maquiladora free trade zone in Mexico in which people receive as wages under a dollar a day, and to have those included as part of the American product which is sold throughout the United States, that is the fair competition which we will face. Minimum wages, far, far lower than the minimum wages that we have here in our country, that is the fair competition that we will face.

It is no wonder that the workers, the companies, the communities in my constituency look at this trade deal and say: "We will be hosed in that kind of unfair competition".

Thus in fact the purpose of this measure is not to establish conditions of fair competition.

At least the next clause is honest. It states that we will liberalize significantly conditions for investment in that free trade area. I say to Hon. Members, watch here, too, that we are not talking just about trade. We are not talking just about tariffs, as the Government likes to pretend. We are talking here about investment, investment which not we but the Conservative Government felt in its Investment Canada Act had to be protected from takeover by American companies. Any Canadian company which has assets over $5 million has to go through a review process. In that review process it can be asked to make a commitment to the community in which it is taking over a company.

I warn Conservative back-benchers what they will face. What will happen under this trade deal is what has begun to happen already in various towns and cities which are starting to gear up for the trade deal. Canadian companies will be taken over. They will be shut down. Jobs will be lost. We in Canada will be served as a market by the United States parent company which will buy out the Canadian firm and shut it down. It has begun to happen already. It will happen on a far broader basis in the future. The consequence for Canadians will be catastrophic.

Finally, there is the suggestion that this measure will lay the foundation for multilateral co-operation to expand and enhance the benefits of the agreement. I have to say to Members of the House that those people to whom I talked at the start of this GATT round in Punta del Este, Uruguay, in 1986 were, without exception when they could speak off the record, terrified of what was happening in North America. They were terrified by the fact that we are leading ourselves in the direction of yet another powerful trade bloc which would discriminate against the rest of the world.

I think that the motion on purposes should be rejected. I think, too, that the motion with respect to the unilateral right of the federal Government to take action to enforce its commitment to the agreement on the provinces should be eliminated, otherwise we will not have a federal system. We will have a system in which the provinces and the federal Government will have a fair share in this country of ours.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to Motion No. 6 which would delete Clause 4 one is guided by a number of observations and conclusions that have been made in the course of the last few months, particularly those made in committee. In choosing between the wealth of analyses and studies that have been conducted, very few documents have struck me so much for their relevance and precision as well as their objective source as the document which I will use in the next few minutes. I refer to the one produced by the Attorney General for Ontario dated May, 1988. It is entitled: "The Impact of the Canada-U.S. Trade Agreement, a Legal Analysis". This is the kind of document which will require a thorough study also on the part of the Tory back-benchers as they approach the next election because they will have to do some pretty hard homework to defend this agreement when they are on the hustings throughout Ontario.

This is what in essence and in very short terms the analysis states. I read from this paper. This paper was not prepared by a member of the Opposition. It was prepared by one of the 10 provincial Governments of Canada, evidently one that has its industrial and economic future at heart, as it should.

It states that under the agreement the United States becomes a third party at the constitutional bargaining table empowered to influence a wide range of vital public policies. This point was made earlier by the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy) when he said that there is a third party, a comment which was ridiculed by a member opposite. This is a very important observation that comes from a government body. Thus we will have now a third party at the constitutional table from the moment this agreement comes into effect.

Second, the analysis goes on to state that the new role of the United States in the making of Canadian public policy threatens the traditional patterns of compromise that have characterized Canadian federalism. This point does not need to be elaborated upon. We all know what has been the nature until now of federal-provincial relations and how it will be affected from now on after this agreement comes into effect. We will see its impact in future federal-provincial gatherings.

Third, the analysis concludes that the agreement will significantly alter the ability of the provinces to shape their economic and social policies. This is a corner-stone point because it affects not just Ontario but every province in the country. It is central to the nature and the evolution of the country until now. After the agreement comes into effect this alteration and the ability of the provinces to shape their economic and social policies will be felt. We do not know yet to what extent and in what way but we certainly know that it is coming.

Fourth, the analysis observes that the impairment of the policy flexibility of the provinces is so profound that it gives the agreement a constitutional dimension. This is the assessment that was made by the Attorney General for Ontario in May of this year.

Fifth, this analysis observes that provincial matters can be subjected to review and ultimately to United States retaliation without any certain right under the agreement for provinces or private sector interests to be heard or to participate in any way. This also explains why in recent weeks and months we have heard what was originally a very weak and feeble voice. We have heard more and more the voice of small business. This explains why we have heard that voice becoming stronger. It is because somehow the word has gone around. Somehow small business has realized that the agreement has a potential impact on their capacity to continue to survive.

The next point that is being made is to the effect that the agreement impairs provincial policy-making through the undertaking of the federal Government to ensure that all necessary measures are taken to ensure the observance of the agreement, including by the provinces and the municipalities. Enough has been said on that point by colleagues in my Party who have stressed this very point in an eloquent manner.

Following that point, reference is made to the national treatment rule. In general, that rule requires that American business interests be accorded treatment equivalent to that granted to Canadians. Many things are likely to change under this national treatment rule. When there is such a difference in the proportion and relation of strength and size between the United States and Canada, evidently the national treatment rule will go to the advantage of the economy that can muster the largest economic units and the largest economic corporations and, therefore, will be able to enter the neighbouring market with a much greater impact and success than we will be able. We all know of this relationship of roughly one to ten.

The analysis by the Attorney General of Ontario is also interesting because it also goes into the study of the most severe effects on provincial activity. It concludes that provincial activities—and I submit that this will not only be the case for Ontario—will ultimately be felt in a number of areas. The first one raised here is energy. The point is made very briefly. The scope of two-price energy policies as a provincial tool for economic development will be restricted.

We have been saying this, we have heard this from witnesses in committee, and here we see it confirmed through an analysis by the office of the provincial Attorney General. It means the restriction of advantages that we have enjoyed until now as a nation to use the edge that we have through energy prices whereby in the 1970s and until recently we used lower prices for our own domestic purposes. Therefore, we will lose this advantage which was understandably one that we had to use considering the geographic disadvantages in trying to keep an economy such as ours together over such a large geographic area, and also climatically. Sooner or later we were bound to initiate a policy of price differentials on energy. All of a sudden as a result of the weak, short-sighted attitude of the Government we are giving up the natural, highly desirable, and almost essential tool that we have been able to utilize until now.

Second, the impact on provincial activities will be felt on natural resources which, under the agreement, are subject to compulsory sharing. I repeat the word "compulsory" sharing. This is something that has somehow become lost in the perception on the part of the public. They are subject to compulsory sharing with the United States in times of shortage and for which licensing for commercial use and access must be accorded equally to Canadians and Americans. No comment is needed since this is self-explanatory. The fact is that now we are going to share. We will be forced to share regardless of our long-term interests and regardless of our environmental approach to our natural resources which we may want to have, keeping in mind not only the next generation, but the second or third generation. This will be a very serious restriction on our ability to move.

I notice that you are becoming impatient with my time allocation, Mr. Speaker, and I thank you.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am never impatient with the Hon. Member, but his time has expired.

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, this is the most abhorrent piece of legislation that I have ever had the misfortune to have to speak on in the House. The three amendments before us are very fundamental ones. If these amendments were passed, they would take out the guts of Bill C-130, the Act to implement the free trade deal with the United States. I have no hope whatsoever that Members of the Government who are supporting the trade deal will accept these very reasonable amendments. They are reasonable in the sense of the life of our country and in the sense of what we need to be doing. I do not have much optimism, and I am directing my remarks through you, Mr. Speaker, to the Canadian people.

Here we are in August. We are debating late at night at a time when the House is normally suspended in order that we can spend time in our constituencies. We are debating an issue which the Government has no mandate to be dealing with, an issue which is complex, which is disturbing Canadians, which Canadians want to have an election on, and which Canadians want to understand. Some Canadians are very open to the idea. They are very open to the principles of the trade deal because they want to see lower tariffs and what they consider to be economic rationality.

However, the actual details of the Bill and the substance of the agreement are not well known because the Government has deceived the people of Canada by putting out a glossy PR approach on the subject and by making it look a purely economic matter when in fact it is a constitutional change that will change the life of our country forever if it is allowed to go through. It is a constitutional amendment because it is binding on future Governments. Some of the very clauses that are up for amendment are binding on the future.

First, I wish to deal with Clause 3. The purpose of the amendment is that the whole clause be deleted. It is the general purpose clause of the Bill and it states:

> 3. The purpose of this Act is to implement the Agreement, the objectives of which are to
> (a) eliminate barriers to trade in goods and services between Canada and the United States;

Precious little study was done of services before the deal was hastily rushed through by a government with no mandate whatsoever. We have not seen any Conservative bolting on this issue. People who, before the last election, were against trade, people who never said a word against their Prime Minister

(Mr. Mulroney) when he was against trade, are suddenly standing up in the House and defending a deal on which they never talked to the voters of Canada and for which they did not get elected themselves.

Clause 3(b) states:

> (b) facilitate conditions of fair competition within the free-trade area established by the Agreement;

What is fair competition? This is absolutely central to the whole issue. What is fair and what is unfair, and to what extent will Canada be exempt? We know that Canada will not be exempt from unfair trade practice complaints in the United States. What is fair in terms of our social programs? Constantly we have been told that social programs were not on the bargaining table, and yet there is a section in the deal that states that subsidies are one thing that will be negotiated in the next five to seven years. We could then find out, far too late, that our social programs have been negotiated away because they are going to be treated as unfair subsidies.

This clause talks about "fair competition". What about our programs to promote regional development and create jobs in any particular region? We talk about facilitating conditions of fair competition, but we do not have definitions as to what is fair competition. It is not clear whether or not regional programs will be included. That has been left for negotiations later.

The Government is selling out the country, and some of the worst aspects of the deal are the unknown aspects. It is being left up to a process in which we have very little chance to be successful, and leaving it up to a process where two countries will be negotiating, one ten times the size of the other. At a later stage it would be very hard to pull out of it if there is going to be retaliation after we get well into this deal.

• (1950)

We have these crucial decisions left until later. There is talk about fair competition, Mr. Speaker. But there is no definition as to what constitutes fair competition. The question as to what competition will be fair is begged entirely in this deal. What is fair when you have a system with large multinational corporations in the United States that are well established, for whom it would be a very simple matter to extend their production to fill the entire Canadian market? They already have established brand names and dealerships. It will be very easy for them to add a night shift on Tuesday night through which they could fill the entire Canadian market. Our Conservative colleagues say, "Canadians can do the same thing. Canadian corporations will have fair competition and can enter the United States". But you have a company that is very much smaller that does not have a well known international brand name, that does not have a system of dealerships, that would require enormous capital to begin to advertise and do the kind of research and development necessary to hit that new market. This is totally naive.

Mr. McDermid: What a wimpish attitude. You are knocking Canadian entrepreneurs.

Ms. McDonald: This is a Government that does not look at how these decisions are made. Canadian entrepreneurship is not being knocked here. What is being knocked is a deal that is a sell-out. If the Hon. Member were a real believer in the trade deal, why didn't he say so in the last election? Why wasn't he honest about all the aspects of this deal? Why didn't he admit to Canadians that water was in the deal?

Mr. McDermid: It is not in the deal, that is why.

Ms. McDonald: What about our cultural independence? We all know that water is in the deal by virtue of being a good under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. The Government itself is beginning to admit that it has deceived Canadians by raising this totally false statement that it is only bottled water that is in the deal and not our fresh water. We are committed in this deal to share our most precious natural resource, water.

Mr. McDermid: That is not true. Tell the truth.

Ms. McDonald: It is indeed true.

Mrs. Sparrow: It is not true.

Ms. McDonald: It is very clear in the agreement that water is a good under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, and all goods are included in the requirement to export.

Mr. McDermid: Totally wrong.

Ms. McDonald: This is a totally new kind of agreement. Nothing in the world gives away that much in any kind of arrangement which is sold as being a trading arrangement.

Mr. McDermid: Your credibility is falling.

Ms. McDonald: This is not a trading arrangement but a sell-out of our most precious natural resources, including water and our non-renewable resources of oil and gas. This is a shameful sell out of Canadian sovereignty and Canadian natural resources by a Government and a Party that is looking at the cheapest of short-term advantages, advantages from corporations that are making money off the top but are not interested in the long-term development of the country and not interested in long-term job creation or stewardship of the environment or in keeping any of these resources for ongoing use for other people.

In clause 3(d), we read:

> establish effective procedures for the joint administration of the Agreement and the resolution of disputes

What a laugh those effective procedures are! There will be a dispute settlement mechanism. Ultimately a dispute will go to a commission which is made up of the United States and Canada trade ministers. They will work on the basis of consensus. What kind of consensus will it be when there are two partners, one of which is ten times the size of the other? What a preposterous suggestion that we will have any kind of fair or effective dispute settlement mechanism.

I have one minute in which to finish dealing with the substance of an extremely important matter, a matter on which Canadians want the Government to level with them, want to understand and want to know what is happening.

Let me refer to clause 3(e) which reads:

> lay the foundation for further bilateral and multilateral co-operation to expand and enhance the benefits of the Agreement

The benefits for whom? This is a one-sided agreement. It is a sell-out agreement. The Government wants further co-operation to sell out the few areas which have so far not been exempted, the cultural area, the investment area and so forth. This is a travesty, Mr. Speaker. The Government ought to be ashamed of itself. I can assure you that we will continue to be speaking to these amendments to this trade deal which is a sell-out of our country.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to speak on these three amendments, Motions Nos. 5, 6 and 8. I want to concentrate especially on Motion No. 8 which proposes to eliminate Clause 6 in the Bill.

The Tories when they were in opposition always talked about the importance of respecting the rights and responsibility of provincial Governments. They waxed eloquent about it in the 1980 and 1984 elections and about how the resources belonged to the provinces. Yet clause 6 in the Bill is designed for the federal Government to override all kinds of provincial jurisdiction. The Government will have a chance to do this with legislation which has been brought into the Ontario Legislature which will be passed and which provides for adjustment for the wine industry over a twelve-year period. We will see if this Bill is ever implemented, and I do not believe it will be—but if it were to be implemented at some time in the future, the Government of Canada will have to write regulations to override the power of the provincial Government to implement its schedules, costs and pricing of provincial wines. We will see Clause 6 eventually before the Supreme Court of Canada if this Bill ever becomes the law of the land.

If we look at what the Government has done to the grape and wine industry, it is so typical of the whole trade deal because the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) said in 1983 that he was not in favour of free trade, that you would hear no more from him about it, yet here we have the most massive sell-out of our country in this trade deal in 100 years. It is interesting that about three weeks before the deal was signed in early October, 1987, the then Minister of International Trade—we have been through about three of them and I understand we are getting ready for another one fairly soon because the current Minister is not impressing anybody with his lack of knowledge of the deal—sent a letter to the grape producers in British Columbia saying that the Government realized the grape and wine industry, if it were ever to be brought under the purview of this Prime Minister's trade deal, would require a 10 or 12 year adjustment period. Yet three weeks after that letter was sent, a deal was signed. Essentially the industry is put out of business because 50 per cent of the advantageous pricing is wiped out in the first 12 months of the deal, that is, January 1, 1989 to January 1, 1990.

This comes only three or four months after the Minister had given us a pledge and signed a letter that she realized there would have to be a 10 or 12 year adjustment period. The Ontario Government is providing an adjustment period. However, the B.C. Government has jumped on the bandwagon. Its Premier loves to jump on any bandwagon that is going through town, and B.C. is wiping out the advantages to B.C. wine growers almost immediately.

We have Clause 6 which will eventually, if this agreement is ever implemented, result in regulations being written against the Province of Ontario and against any other province. We hear some of the western Tory Premiers saying, "It is okay. We want the deal in". It is interesting to hear the Premier of Saskatchewan say that. Most of his province does not want the deal. He has spent millions of dollars running around the Province saying what a wonderful deal this is and holding public information meetings. Yet the recent Environics poll showed that Saskatchewan has the strongest opposition of any province in the country to the deal.

Some 50 per cent are opposed and very strongly opposed to it. Less than 30 per cent are in favour of the deal. I predict that if Clause 6 were ever implemented and regulations were written to override provincial jurisdictions, whether in the service sector, the energy sector or any other sector the Government would negotiate during the five or six-year negotiation period, then we would hear the screams, yells and catcalls from people like the Premier of Saskatchewan and the Premier of Alberta.

This is a very Draconian measure. The Government wanted to go ahead with this. Obviously it was a deal made at the Québec summit between the Prime Minister and the President. The President of the United States had made a deal with the grape growers and wine producers of California to allow their low priced grapes into Canada.

The Prime Minister seems to delight in pleasing the President of the United States, whether by sacrificing the grape growers and wine producers or by satisfying rich bagmen in the drug industry. He says: "If you want our energy, come and get it. We will guarantee it to you for all times, in perpetuity, and at our prices. We will guarantee you the share you have had for the last three years, so get your share up to 50 per cent. Regardless of what happens, if we have shortages, we will tough it out because that is what the deal says". It is a deal made in heaven for the United States. It has been trying to get our resources for years and years.

We believe in selling resources on a trade basis. We have lumber to sell, although we have to put an export tax on it. That is another cave-in the Government agreed to. That one almost slipped my mind. Why can we not do this on a trade basis? We will process resources to their highest limit and then sell them at an agreed on price. However, under this deal, we do not agree to sell electricity to New York at New York prices. We agree to sell electricity to New York at the Canadian price. It is an incredible arrangement.

I hope there will be an election so that we can talk to the Canadian people. There has been no opportunity for public hearings. I had the opportunity to go across the country for five days and to visit five provinces last December before the deal was signed, and I do not think Canadians will buy it. As a matter of fact, the most recent Environics poll showed that some 40 per cent were opposed to it and only 38 per cent in favour. Of those who are in favour of it, only 8 per cent or 10 per cent are strongly in favour of it, whereas those who are opposed are strongly opposed to it because it is a bad deal.

I do not think anyone in the House is opposed to reducing tariffs. That has been happening for the last 40 years. That is what will happen during the Uruguay Round in Geneva or through other arrangements. It is the giving away of resources and of control over foreign investment that is so repulsive about this deal.

Clause 6 provides the hammer that will make sure that provincial Governments comply with the deal and with the federal Government's wishes, whether they want to or not. That is why we propose to eliminate it.

Ms. Marion Dewar (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, these amendments go to the heart of what this agreement is all about. These amendments, if passed, would give us some control over what will happen in the future.

National treatment and its implications could be the real sleeper in this agreement. If we read the agreement carefully, we will recognize that it has gone further than the European Common Market has been able to go in the past 28 years. From now on, Canadians will have to treat Americans the same way they treat each other, and vice versa. In many ways, that can be a positive thing and I would like to take a moment to see what is positive about it and what is negative about it.

It is good to attempt to treat each other in the same way we would like to be treated, but I do not think it is good that another country would force its value system on us. That is where my concerns lie.

For many years, we have made major investments to attempt to focus on an east-west country. Certainly most of our population resides in a strip along the southern part of Canada. We have worked against natural forces to develop our trade and our two founding cultures. We have struggled hard in a geographically northern society to make a country that I would like to think we are all proud of.

If we limit our ability to have provincial and national economic strategies, as this agreement does, we would weaken our ability to strengthen ourselves from the East to the West. I have been involved in economic development committees over the years that have looked at increasing Canadian content with conditions we felt were good for the communities in which we were working. We did this with some success right across Canada. This Bill is now giving the federal Government the power to override many of the things the provinces would choose to do, things that the provinces, with their knowledge of their own communities, will not be able to do any longer. I think that is a real tragedy.

Going into the 21st century, we should not attempt to do things individually. I do not think that Government, labour or business should attempt to go it alone. We need to have a collective of co-operation if we really want to strengthen the economy and the future of Canada.

I do not think we have done a particularly good job in economic planning, but more and more, as we have matured, we have recognized that there are certain things we do well on which we want to build and there are certain skills we want to develop. As the Hon. Member who spoke previously said, we have these riches which are God-given riches. We have done nothing to obtain them, they happen to be part of the country in which we live. We should use those resources with respect to ecology and without using them as a trading element. Our resources are not things another country can help itself to.

Something many people have not said in the debate on the trade agreement is that the stronger we become as a country, the stronger our friendship with the United States will be. The resentments will not grow. With Clause 8, we will be able to pass laws that will tell the provinces what they cannot do if it is not in concert with the trade agreement with the United States. What you do is build up an awful lot of resentment.

A lot of people feel if only they had some power to take control over their own economy, their own future, they would be able to do things differently. This is not necessarily always right. Sometimes it is perception rather than reality. However, as soon as you take from people the ability to make their own decisions, then their creativity and productivity, all those things that bring people together to make for a strong community, are diminished. I have not heard people discussing that but it is very real.

We have heard about the polarization of the East and West and the centre of Canada. If you want to see polarization in the future, get this agreement on its way. I think some of the Premiers are swallowing hard as they say we have to do this to get the agreement. It seems to me that agreements made on these terms are not good agreements. If we want a good agreement, it has to be discussed, not rushed through. We need to have a sense of confidence in our nationhood, where we are going and what we are doing. Certainly that is not happening here.

People on the street are saying they would like to know more about it. Certainly the politicians have diverse views about it. They have very different concepts of what it will do to this country. Most of all, there is a lack of trust out there. I think it is a real disgrace that the American people have had an opportunity to discuss and go through this agreement in its final form but we have not. I do not think that is the kind of agreement that we want to enter into.

The amendments in front of us now would help get rid of many of the things in this agreement which make us subservient to another nation.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this amendment because it is a very crucial one with respect to federal-provincial relations. Motion No. 8 would eliminate Clause 6 in the Bill which says:

> For greater certainty, nothing in this Act, by specific mention or omission, limits in any manner the right of Parliament to enact legislation to implement any provision of the Agreement or fulfil any of the obligations of the Government of Canada under the Agreement.

What this really means is that the Conservative Government is attempting to grab all present and future federal authority necessary to carry out this agreement. That would upset, and this is the key, the traditional federal-provincial government balance deliberately developed in Canada.

I want to put a little bit of history on the record tonight because I think it is important at this time that Members opposite understand what happened prior to the 1926 election. There was a great debate at that time because the King Government brought in a Bill which would have put in place the first old age pension. The Bill passed this House under the Liberal Government and went to the Senate. It is rather interesting to learn what happened to it in the Senate in view of the great cries and screams from Conservative Members of Parliament across this country about the Senate and its interference with Bill C-130.

Do you know what happened to that Bill after passing this House of elected Members representing people across the country? The Conservative dominated Senate of the day defeated the first old age pension Bill ever introduced in Parliament. Today they are saying what a horrendous thing it is that the Senate should interfere with the trade Bill. The Senate is not interfering with it. It is not going to defeat it as the Tory dominated Senate defeated the first old age pension Bill prior to the 1926 election. The Senate will pass it on to the people of Canada and let them decide in a national election.

There is a big difference, but all we heard is this bleating and crying from the government benches about what a horrendous thing it is that the Senate is even thinking about not passing this Bill. They should remember history. It was a Tory dominated Senate at that time and they did not let it go to the people to decide. They defeated the first old age pension Bill ever introduced and passed by this House.

Mr. McDermid: What scoundrels.

Mr. Hopkins: Let the Tory Members opposite remember that as they travel around the country bleating and crying about what may very well happen to their trade Bill.

Just imagine, isn't it terrible that the people of Canada are going to have a say in the future of their country? Isn't it terrible to think that this trade Bill should go to the people of Canada where they can decide because they have lost confidence in the Government to decide for them?

At the time that old age pension Bill was introduced the cry in the Senate was, number one, the country could not afford it. Interesting enough, they also said it interfered with provincial jurisdiction. What we are doing here in eliminating Clause 6 is eliminating the interference with provincial jurisdiction. I say to my Tory friends across the way, if it was right for your Tory friends to say that about federal-provincial jurisdiction in 1926, how come you are denying the Senate that right today? How come you are denying the provinces their jurisdiction today by passing this Bill?

Mr. McDermid: We are not.

Mr. Hopkins: You are doing it in tax measures with respect to the wine growers in various provinces.

Mr. McDermid: That is wrong, too.

Mr. Hopkins: In addition, the U.S. wants our resources. There is no question about that. The Government is willing to give away anything to get an agreement, but everyone in this House and across the country fully realizes that many of our resources are under the jurisdiction of the provinces. That does not bother the Government. It will trample over federal-provincial relations. As the Hon. Member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) said a few minutes ago, we well remember when we were sitting in government listening to the screaming and shouting from the opposition benches, from the very Members who are sitting over in the Government today, saying that the Government of the day was interfering with provincial jurisdiction. Well, people change their minds when they cross the floor.

• (2020)

They are not only interested in giving away our resources. They are giving away our sovereignty through this legislation. They are giving away our energy, a major resource of this country, and giving away foreign investment. There is no question that the Government is giving away foreign investment rights. In fact, it gave them away before it even introduced this legislation because it destroyed the foreign investment review legislation.

The Government is not worrying about provincial jurisdiction. It is going to try to buy off the provinces in the best way it can, but many of the provinces are not going to go along with that. Tory Governments are more interested in dollars than they are in Canadians.

It is very revealing that the Government wants to ram this legislation through both Houses of Parliament. It will make every effort possible to do so but never wants this trade package to go to the Canadian people for a vote. What is wrong with the Government? Is it afraid of democracy? Why all the crying and worrying about the Senate not passing the Bill? If the Senate does not pass it, it will go the country and we will have an election on it.

Government Members ask how we can do that when dealing with provincial jurisdiction. That is very easy for Tory mentality. Do you know what happened after Mackenzie King won the 1926 election?

Mr. McDermid: Remind us.

Mr. Hopkins: I am not reminding the Member, I am teaching him because he obviously does not know what he is talking about. The fact is that for some strange reason it suddenly did not become provincial jurisdiction and the Tory-dominated Senate voted in favour of the old age pension Bill after 1926. It was introduced again by Mackenzie King and went through the House of Commons and the Senate. If that was a constitutional inaccuracy in 1925 why was it not so in 1926? That is so because we have Tory governments that are only interested in their interests of the moment. They do not look at the long-term interests of the country. As my friend, the Hon. Member for Algoma said, they are interested in giving the country away.

They do not want to do anything to make any disturbance in Washington. My goodness, that would be terrible, that would ruin the Prime Minister's (Mr. Mulroney) record. His friend is about to leave the American scene and he is about to leave the Canadian scene, so what is the difference? We will then be back to a state of sanity. In that situation the true democracy of this country will come forward and the Canadian people will have an opportunity to vote on issues. Let the people decide.

Mrs. Sparrow: How much voting did we do on the energy Bill?

Mr. McDermid: Remember wage and price controls.

Mr. Hopkins: I love this, Mr. Speaker. I am getting my message across. The Prime Minister was so much against this deal in 1983. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) laughed at the present Minister for International Trade (Mr. Crosbie) because the Minister for International Trade was in favour of this in 1983. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance laughed at him during the leadership race, but he was the only one who was telling the truth. The only thing is that not only Tories but every Canadian in the country is now laughing at the Minister for International Trade. He never read the agreement to start with.

Let us start protecting the Constitution of Canada and recognizing that this legislation does in fact affect provincial jurisdiction. Let the old age pension Bill prior to the 1926 election and after be a history lesson to my hon. friends opposite. They defeated the first old age pension Bill in Canada. They are now saying that they were elected to do this. They were not elected to bring in a trade deal such as this because it was not in their platform during the last election campaign. They do not have a mandate from the Canadian people to do this.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the chance to participate at this stage of the debate. We are now debating Motion No. 5 which identifies a number of clauses in the trade deal which we believe ought to be abandoned. At the top of the list is the fact that this trade deal allows almost unrestricted foreign investment from the United States in Canada.

I want to begin by posing a couple of questions. Do Members realize that the western industrialized nation with more foreign ownership and more foreign control of its economy than virtually any other is Canada? Canada has more foreign ownership and more foreign control of its economy than any western industrialized nation with the exception of Belgium.

To what extent does that foreign ownership exist? Fifty per cent of the industrial sector of our economy is foreign controlled or foreign owned. If you take out the financial sector, Canadian banks, you find that 35 per cent of our economy is foreign owned and foreign controlled. Should that cause us any concern?

We know that the Japanese are worried about the amount of foreign ownership of their economy. Three per cent of the Japanese economy is foreign owned and that causes them concern in a number of sectors. They believe that it is bad to have too much foreign investment because there are then people outside the country making decisions about their future.

More and more decisions regarding the future of our children and our children's children are being made not in Vancouver, Toronto, Calgary, or Montreal, but in Tokyo, Dallas, Amarillo, Los Angeles, New York, Chicago, and Hamburg. That must cause Canadians some concern.

What about our friends in the United States on the other side of the trade equation we are debating tonight? Four per cent of the American economy is foreign owned. The United States Congress had a special debate a few weeks ago about the serious concerns in the United States because foreign ownership has reached 4 per cent. If there was 35 per cent foreign ownership of the economy of the United States there would be a major revolt in the country.

Yet the response of the Government of Canada, realizing that 50 per cent of our industrial sector is foreign owned and 35 per cent of our entire economy is foreign owned, is to ask for more foreign ownership. In fact, the Government wants to open the floodgates and tell the United States that Canada is open season, that Americans can come into Canada and buy anything they want. As a matter of fact, the Government will only ask questions when the deal is worth more than $150 million.

Investment Canada is supposed to be keeping an eye on foreign investment coming into Canada. Yet, the Government has not turned down a single request for investment. People say that a country needs foreign investment. However, what has foreign investment done in the four years that this Government has been in power? Has it developed new plants, new factories, new mines, or new mills? No, 95 per cent of all the foreign investment that has come into Canada in the last four years has been to take over existing Canadian companies. Over 3,000 companies that were Canadian companies before the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) came into office are now owned and operated by foreigners.

• (2030)

That must be of concern to us. Yet the Conservatives want even more foreign ownership of our economy and more foreign ownership of Canadian companies. Ninety-five per cent of the takeovers were not for new plant or new jobs. Let us talk about new jobs.

Mr. McDermid: Tell us about Oshawa.

Mr. Riis: A recent study by Statistics Canada asked how many jobs are created from a billion dollars in profits by Canadian companies versus American companies. The results are absolutely staggering. After a billion dollars in profits from Canadian corporations, the number of jobs created on average are 5,700. How about American companies? With a billion dollars in profits generated by American companies, 17 jobs are created. That is 17 jobs versus 5,700, and we wonder why there are still problems with unemployment in our country.

The Government wants more foreign control and foreign ownership. It wants more and more of the decisions about our future in Canada to be made in Dallas, Texas. I say that is wrong for the best interests of our country.

It has also been stated that this agreement will be good for consumers. According to the Canadian Consumer magazine, the price of a Plymouth Caravel four-door basic car in Canada is $13,740. In the United States, that same car is priced at $10,659. If the exchange rate of $1.20 is added, it adds $2,132 to the price. When one adds the 12 per cent federal sales tax, it comes to $1,535. The U.S. car now costs $14,326 in Canadian funds. That same car, north of the border compared to south of the border, is actually more expensive when one factors in the exchange rate and 12 per cent federal tax. Yet I have heard cabinet Ministers state that consumers will benefit from this deal. There is the evidence, and anyone can stand up to refute it, if they want, but it is plain that in terms of benefits coming to consumers, the Government is again in error.

This is a good motion because we must provide some limitation to the amount of foreign control of our economy. Our country, with the exception of Belgium, has more foreign control and ownership of its economy than any other in the industrialized world. We should be doing something about that.

We should be doing something to build in more Canadian ownership so that Canadians make the decisions about our country's future, not foreigners. But the Government's answer to the amount of foreign ownership is to open the floodgates and tell American investors that they can come into Canada to buy any Canadian business they want with no questions asked, no expectations, no requirements, nothing. That is not what we want in Canada's future. That is not we want in this trade deal. That is why we have offered Motion No. 5 as a way to deal with the situation.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, we are dealing with debate on Motions Nos. 5, 6 and 8, which will be all the object of separate votes.

Motion No. 5 seeks to delete Clause 3, which states the purpose of the Bill. That is particularly interesting because it misstates the purpose of the Bill completely. I will deal with clause 3(a)(b)(c)(d) and (e) separately, but 3(d) and 3(e) are especially inaccurate and misleading. The agreement would not establish effective bilateral dispute resolution and administrative procedures and does not lay the foundation for further bilateral and multilateral co-operation. Instead, it will perpetuate the creation of regional trading blocs around the world, which will only reduce over-all world trade.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I would like to take each of these arguments in turn. Starting with clause 3 of the Bill, I read:

> The purpose of this Act is to implement the Agreement, the objectives of which are to
> (a) eliminate barriers to trade in goods and services between Canada and the United States;

Mr. Speaker, we know that we gave a lot to get very little. The dual objective that the Mulroney Government set of facilitating Canadian access to the American market in future will be reached, if at all, at the cost of Canada's sovereignty over its own institutions. I have in front of me a quote from former Finance and External Affairs Minister Mitchell Sharp, who said, and I quote, "By signing this bilateral agreement, we would be telling the whole world that we no longer intend to resist this continental attraction and we would thereby bring about the Americanization of Canada."

Mr. Speaker, paragraph (a) says > eliminate barriers to trade in goods and services . . .

Mr. Speaker, for both goods and services, I tell you that it is misleading to claim that the purpose of the Bill is to eliminate barriers, because nothing in it guarantees that they will be eliminated. As for services, I did a little research and this may be one of the biggest concessions that could have been made, the long-term consequences of which may have been the most overlooked in this debate. No studies were ever done on this aspect, either by the Macdonald Commission on the Canadian Economy or by the present Government, at least studies that it would have made public and that we could have gone over. And since the service sector is the most important in our economy—70 per cent of jobs and two thirds of our gross national product come from Canadian services sold abroad—leaving our services in this Agreement is disastrous, as I said before, because it is inconceivable that the Government went ahead without knowing what might happen, without knowing the consequences of this.

The whole data processing sector, for example, is involved. According to the Independent Computer Services Association of Canada, this major Canadian organization, 360,000 jobs in data processing could be affected and maybe even eliminated by American competition which, as it knows, will have a free hand here in Canada. So in the service sectors, Mr. Speaker, we will lose, and in trade in goods, we will also lose.

I come back to paragraph (b):

> facilitate conditions of fair competition within the free-trade area established by the Agreement;

Mr. Speaker, that presupposes that appropriate dispute-settlement mechanisms will be in place. No, U.S. law will still be ever-present to prevent us from being able to compete in that market and the only purpose of the dispute-settlement mechanism is to see that American law has been properly applied. There is nothing there to benefit us. Americans will still have the right to impose excessive tariffs on goods exported to the U.S. market and they will also see to it that tariff provisions are in place to encourage their own industries and discourage ours.

Mr. Speaker, I fail to see how we can convince Canadians that the purpose of this agreement is to:

> b) facilitate conditions of fair competition within the free-trade area established by the Agreement;

Liberalize significantly conditions for investment within that free-trade area.

I read carefully what they say about investment. We are told there will be a free flow of investment. Furthermore, Canada has agreed not to introduce policies requiring companies that are the subject of foreign takeovers to remain Canadian-owned. We spoke earlier about the screening mechanism we have in this country to control foreign takeovers in our industry, trade and services.

Mr. Speaker, we all know the Tories got rid of FIRA, the Foreign Investment Review Agency. We have no more room to manoeuvre, we have no more control, and on top of that, this Government welcomes foreign takeovers in the financial sector. Foreigners can buy whatever they want in this country, including our advanced energy sectors, like any other industry in this country.

Mr. Speaker, the same rights and privileges enjoyed by Canadian companies will therefore be available or more readily available to American companies. American banks will have full access to Canada, while Canadian banks will be subject to State banking laws, and as we know, Mr. Speaker, all fifty States have their own legislation in this area. It will be practically impossible or at least very difficult for our banks to break into the U.S. market, while Americans will be able to come to Canada with no difficulty whatsoever and do as they please in the banking sector. A double standard if there ever was one! We will be hard pressed to break into the American market, and meanwhile, they get the red carpet treatment!

Mr. Speaker, the clause goes on:

> d) establish effective procedures for the joint administration of the Agreement and the resolution of disputes;

Mr. Speaker, I referred to this earlier, and I don't think we can take this seriously. As far as I can see, the dispute settlement procedure will not consider or protect our Canadian interests.

Mr. Speaker, finally, Clause 3 says, and I quote:

> e) lay the foundations for further bilateral and multilateral cooperation to expand and enhance the benefits of the Agreement;

Mr. Speaker, what did we get? Not much, as I said before. Just that from now on, Americans may find it easier to come here than they did under the previous Government, to take advantage of our immense resources, our financial sector and our industries . . . When all is said and done, Mr. Speaker, we caved in, and we are about to pass legislation that will literally sell out this country for a pittance. If we analyse the situation, it is clear that very little in the way of trade is involved. Today, only 20 per cent of our goods are not traded freely. Today, 80 per cent of the goods between our two countries are duty free. To reduce the duty on the remaining 20 per cent, and we agree with the decision to reduce customs duty on these goods, this Government has sold out our industry, our energy sector, our mines, our resources and it may have compromised what constitutes the foundation of this country, the future of Canadians and handed over our sovereignty to another country. To me, Mr. Speaker, that is not a good thing.

• (2040)

[English]

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, this series of amendments is very important to those people who have concerns about the authority and the ability which they have to control their own destiny in Canada. Clause 3 states the objectives of the agreement, and I will speak about those a little later. Clause 4 makes the legislation binding on Her Majesty's Government. Clause 6 gives the federal Government authority to pass legislation that it thinks is required to implement this Bill, legislation very much like Bill C-130.

It is amazing that the same provincial Premiers who supported and applauded the Meech Lake Accord, because it gave them more autonomy and more provincial power, are in many cases from provinces like Saskatchewan, British Columbia and Québec. Those who applauded and supported the Meech Lake approach are from the same provinces which are supporting the free trade deal.

It is ironic, because what they do in this particular case is give up some of the sovereignty which they had before, as well as any possible sovereignty that they might have gained in the Meech Lake Accord. I am talking about provincial sovereignty this time. I know that, federally, the sovereignty is being given up as well. It is being given up to the panel that is going to make the decisions as far as trade problems are concerned between Canada and the United States, if this agreement is accepted and this law is passed.

The federal Government gives up sovereignty to U.S. laws. What this agreement does is guarantee that the U.S. laws will be the laws which govern trade as far as they are concerned. We cannot be sure that the Canadian laws are going to govern trade as far as we are concerned. That is not part of the deal. U.S. laws are guaranteed, but ours are not. The federal Government gives up a certain amount of sovereignty just by signing this agreement, by saying that they will do the things which they have committed themselves to do in this agreement. That is the sovereignty that the federal Government is giving up in this Bill. Provincial Governments as well are giving up a considerable amount of sovereignty. They are giving it up in every way that the federal Government gives it up, and they are giving it up in other ways as well.

Many years ago—1934, I think it was—the provincial Governments in the West, Alberta and Saskatchewan, were given control over their resources. That was when the gas and oil and other resources in the western provinces—in the two prairie provinces anyway—became the responsibility of the provincial Government. Now, under this agreement, these provinces, as well as the other provinces which had those mineral and natural resources controls before that time, are being asked or being told or being required to give that control back. At this time, it is not necessarily back to the federal Government where it came from originally, but back to a panel that is going to make decisions, back to an agreement which is going to decide how much you can charge for these natural resources.

These natural resources are oil and gas and water. They make up the basic strength and power of the economy of the western provinces. Under this agreement, partially under Clause 6 in particular, we are being told that we must give up that authority because when we sell our resources we cannot establish a price provincially that is higher than the price at which we would sell those resources to other people. That is the type of sovereignty that the provinces are giving up. They are not only giving up the rights they had under their control of natural resources but they are giving up rights with respect to the amount that they can expect to get back from those natural resources.

Part of that particular clause and a couple of others which we will be coming to later will have a tremendous effect on the type of control that the provincial Governments have on their own economies, the control which some of them were so happy to get under the Meech Lake Accord. That of course is Motion No. 8 which would delete Clause 6.

Besides that there is a general clause, Clause 3, some parts of which I will read. It is very important that we know exactly what this agreement is supposed to do and then recognize what it does and what it does not do. It states:

> The purpose of this Act is to implement the Agreement, the objectives of which are to
> (a) eliminate barriers to trade in goods and services between Canada and the United States;

Over the years we have eliminated 80 per cent of these barriers. I suppose in another seven years with or without the trade deal we would probably eliminate another 17 per cent or so. But that is one of the directions of the Bill. The barriers were put into place for a particular reason. In many cases they were put in place to protect jobs in Canada. What we might possibly do by eliminating these barriers—although if we look at many of the effects of the trade agreement we cannot see a great deal of saving for consumers—is we might save a little bit in consumer goods, we are told. However, the barriers will move those jobs to the places where those goods can be produced the cheapest, which is not always in Canada. In fact, not very often are those jobs in Canada because through our social structure we provide services which the United States does not accept or recognize as services. I refer to services such as medicare, old age pensions and UIC. Those are services which we have in Canada which increase the cost of our products to some extent.

Therefore those barriers were put in place to allow us to have the type of social services that we need. Once we eliminate those social services we become a country very much like the United States where 36 million people do not have any medical coverage at all.

The clause goes on to state:

> (b) facilitate conditions of fair competition within the free-trade area established by the Agreement;
> (c) liberalize significantly conditions for investment within that free-trade area;
> (d) establish effective procedures for the joint administration of the Agreement and the resolution of disputes; and
> (e) lay the foundation for further bilateral and multilateral co-operation to expand and enhance the benefits of the Agreement.

I could spend a bit of time on each of these but I will make just one comment about the last one. Our other trading partners in the world have a great concern that this bilateral agreement will make us fortress North America and that they will not be able to be a part of our trading economy as they have been in the past.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, I want to address the three motions which are presently before the House which would attempt to show Canadians exactly what this so-called free trade deal is all about. As you know, Mr. Speaker, Motion No. 5 would strike out the stated purpose in the Bill, which is in Clause 3. It would strike out that clause because it is patently misleading. It states that the objectives of the agreement are to eliminate barriers to trade in goods and services between Canada and the United States.

Anybody who makes a close reading of the agreement will see that it does not do that. To begin with you should know, Mr. Speaker, that at the present time without this agreement 80 per cent of all goods and services between Canada and the United States are without tariff. That situation has been brought about as a result of liberal policies for freer trade in the multilateral arena under GATT and under other arrangements since the end of the Second World War. By pursuing those types of policies, we have been able to bring Canada to a situation in which 80 per cent of all trade in goods and services between Canada and the United States is without tariff.

In addition, through those types of policies, the remaining tariff on the balance of 20 per cent is about 5 per cent whereas it was in the range of 30 per cent to 40 per cent when the multilateral process started in the 1940s.

Clause 3 of the Bill states that the purpose of the agreement is to eliminate barriers to trade in goods and services between Canada and the United States. Some 80 per cent of that had been accomplished already with respect to tariffs. With respect to the rate of tariff, that had declined substantially as well. Why this clause is misleading is because it gives the impression that the agreement assures access for Canadian businesses to the U.S. market. That is not the case.

The principal barriers to trade between the United States and Canada are countervail and anti-dumping. These are the procedures used by Americans against our softwood lumber, or east coast fish, our potash, our steel and our shakes and shingles, cases with which all Canadians are familiar. This agreement between the United States and Canada does not deal with those barriers at all. That is despite the fact that when the Conservative Government started its negotiations with the United States its principal goal was to get an agreement on countervail and anti-dumping. It was not able to do that. The only accomplishment that it had as a result of these negotiations as enshrined in this agreement was to eliminate the small tariffs which are left on 20 per cent of the goods and services which are still subject to any kind of tariff with the United States.

It achieved that, but in return it sold out Canadian independence and sovereignty with respect to energy, investment policy, financial institutions, services, agriculture, regional development policy and a large number of other things. This is the price that the Conservative Government paid to eliminate the tariffs on 20 per cent of goods and services between Canada and the United States but with nothing done whatsoever with respect to anti-dumping and countervail.

• (2100)

We would argue as Liberals that we have an alternative. The alternative is to pursue freer trade through the same processes that we have been pursuing since the Second World War. Anyone who is honest and examines the record of that period will see that we had prosperous times during that period. Trade increased between Canada and the United States without sacrificing our independence, sovereignty, and identity. When it states in this Bill that "the purpose of this Act is to . . . eliminate barriers to trade in goods and services between Canada and the United States", that is not true. The agreement does not eliminate barriers to trade in goods and services: to wit it accepts the barriers that I have just mentioned, barriers that are a result of anti-dumping and countervail, the biggest type of harassment that presently exists for Canadian businesses attempting to carry on commerce in the United States. We have moved to eliminate that article because it is misleading and it gives a false impression of what the so-called free trade agreement is attempting to accomplish.

Clause 3 of the Bill also states:

> (c) liberalize significantly conditions for investment within that free-trade area;

The agreement eliminates all possibility of Canada screening investments from the United States and screening takeovers of Canadian cultural, manufacturing, and service industries. As a result of the agreement between Canada and the United States Americans will be free to come in and buy out any industry that pleases them. American businesses will be given national status in Canada. That means that they will be treated just like Canadian businesses.

Here we are a country of 25 million people concluding a bilateral trade agreement with the United States, a country of 250 million people, a country ten times larger than Canada, the most powerful economic nation in the world, and one of the most powerful industrialized nations in the world. We are putting ourselves into a bilateral trade agreement and giving national status to American businesses in Canada. That means that they should be treated in Canada just like a Canadian business.

It means that we cannot give any advantage to Canadian business, we cannot have a "buy Canada" policy, we cannot favour small Canadian businesses, and for all intents and purposes it means our programs of regional development are through because under those programs we try to assist and encourage small Canadian businesses in those parts of the country that were slow-growth regions, for example, Atlantic Canada, parts of the North, the north and east of Quebec, and so on. This agreement will prevent us from favouring those Canadian businesses at the expense of American businesses. We say that that should be eliminated and that it is not a proper purpose for a trade agreement between Canada and the United States. We are moving to eliminate that and provide for a more honest situation with respect to this agreement.

Motion No. 8 has been grouped with Motions Nos. 5 and 6. Those motions would eliminate Clause 6 of the Bill which allows the federal Government to intervene into provincial areas of jurisdiction in order that the federal Government can implement this agreement and this Bill despite the feelings of provincial Governments.

The Conservative Government came to power boasting that it was going to improve federal-provincial relations. As a matter of fact, in some areas it has made some headway. It has put a clause in this Bill which will allow the federal Government to run rough-shod over provincial jurisdiction to implement the terms of this agreement and the terms of this Bill.

Unfortunately, not enough provincial Governments have given serious enough attention to this issue, particularly the long-term effect of a clause such as this. When the Bill was first tabled several provincial Governments, including those provincial Governments in favour of the agreement, were extremely upset with this clause and indicated that they were going to attack it in the courts.

We are moving that this clause be struck from the Bill. We hope that good sense will prevail and the Government will finally take this clause out of the Bill as it finally took out Clause 8. For weeks we stated that the original Clause 8 was wrong and that it gave powers that should never be given in Canada. Finally, the Minister, after denying those accusations for weeks withdrew that clause. Let us hope that he sees good sense and also withdraws Clause 6.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak on Motions Nos. 5, 6, and 8 which have been grouped for debate this evening. As some Members know, Motion No. 5 aims to delete Clause 3 which sets out the broad purpose of the Bill. Motion No. 6 will delete Clause 4 which makes the Bill binding on Canada. Motion No. 8 will delete Clause 6 which is the clause that gives the federal Government the right to pass laws implementing various parts of the agreement.

In dealing with these rather broad motions and the clauses to which they apply, one cannot overlook recent Canadian history and how we got to where we are today. We cannot forget that, a scant four years ago, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) took the opportunity to tell Canadians that he was flatly opposed to a free trade agreement with the United States and would never—

Mr. McDermid: It's over five years ago.

Mr. Fulton: I am corrected from across the floor, between four and five years ago he was flatly opposed, and there was no attempt by the Prime Minister, or by anyone sitting on the front benches, to push for a so-called free trade agreement with the United States during the last election campaign.

We must ask where this thing came from. I represent a constituency that is more than one-quarter of British Columbia. I campaigned when there was a Conservative running in that seat, there was the PC Campaign Handbook, all types of information was available, and journalists came through the constituency. No one in my constituency from Prince Rupert, the Queen Charlottes, Terrace, Kitimat, Smithers, Hazelton, Atlin, or Telegraph Creek came to me, the Tory candidate, the Liberal candidate, or the media and said: "We need some type of broad, far-reaching trade agreement with the United States".

I have asked my colleagues, the Hon. Member for Essex—Windsor (Mr. Langdon), the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap (Mr. Riis), the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy), and Members from around the House, and I have not been able to find any Member in the House who was promoting a free trade agreement with the United States during the 1984 campaign. We must ask ourselves: "Where did this come from?" I look up to the gallery. Did anyone in the gallery hear of a free trade agreement while the campaign was going on? One person in the whole gallery heard about the free trade agreement during the 1984 election campaign. Therefore, we must ask ourselves: "Where did it come from?" We find our first clue when we look and see who Mr. Mulroney asked to be the negotiator.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. The Hon. Member knows that it is the Prime Minister, or the Right Hon. the Prime Minister, and he should call him the Right Hon. Prime Minister.

Mr. Fulton: Where has the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) been in this debate? This is the most fundamental and most important part of an election campaign and the Prime Minister is nowhere to be seen. As we were reminded only last Friday, the Prime Minister gave his maiden speech on a Bill in Parliament, four years into a Parliament. That is a preposterous state of affairs.

Let us do a little more investigation. Who is selling the free trade deal? The Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). Let us scamper back into history. When Newfoundland was joining Canada, although this happened just before I was born, but I studied it in school, the Crosbie family was trying to lead Newfoundlanders into joining the United States rather than Canada. They all wore black arm bands on the day Newfoundland joined Canada rather than joining the United States. Here we have a little piece of history pulling itself together. We have the same person, the Minister for International Trade, flying across Canada. This is the fellow who has not read the deal. Everyone in the gallery knows that. He used to sell encyclopaedias. He didn't read them either. He used to sell vacuum cleaners and couldn't make them run. He was trying to read the instructions.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fulton: Let us look for more clues. This is a game of Clue to find out where the FTA came from. And what do we find? We find Simon Reisman. What was Simon doing just prior to being asked to be the negotiator? Mr. Reisman was working to flog the Grand Canal to build this mud dam across the bottom of Hudson Bay. You know what Hudson Bay looks like, Mr. Speaker. It is a big hoop with James Bay at the bottom. They were going to build this mud dam across the bottom of James Bay and make that a big pond, then put a bunch of nuclear reactors in to pump the water into the United States. I am coming to Motions Nos. 5, 6 and 8, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would appreciate that.

Mr. Fulton: I knew you had a feeling, Mr. Speaker. I know you enjoy my speeches. And you wanted to know how my remarks related to Motions Nos. 5, 6 and 8. I am just about to tell you. Motions Nos. 5, 6 and 8 are the secret Reisman clauses. I spent a week with Mr. Reisman in his lovely condominium down in Miami.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fulton: I knew that would get your attention, Mr. Speaker. He thought he could convert me into selling Canadian water to the United States, but I would have none of it so I moved out quickly.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fulton: The secret ingredient to this whole deal is water. Water on golf courses, I hear someone say. There will be none left. Water is the secret ingredient in this deal. Many Members in this House are aware of that. As a fellow who met with us and who is very knowledgeable in these affairs pointed out, it is the covert underpinnings that are in the deal that are the problem. Everyone was told the Parliamentary Secretary, the Minister and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) said, "Don't let water out of the bag. Don't let Canadians know that water is the secret deal."

I was interested. I thought to myself it was not too long ago that the head of the Department of the Interior of Water Management in the United States went public and pointed out that the United States has lots of water. Some of the aquifers are down, the Mississippi is low, but they have lots of water. The problem is rivers like the Hudson catch fire, they are so polluted. Did you know that, Mr. Speaker? From Edmonton, you probably didn't know that. If someone drives across the Hudson and flips a cigarette butt—he or she shouldn't have been smoking—out of the side of the car which lands in the river, the river catches fire because there is so much toxic butyl material, petroleum waste, on the surface of the river.

The Americans have long wanted water. They are looking at B.C. We have not forgotten the NAWAPA scheme and all of the other ones. We know that is the hidden agenda.

Let me tell you how this pathetic Government got dragged into something it was opposed to before and during the election. No Canadians were pushing for it but we had the gang of 500, Alcan, American Express and all these corporations saying, "Come on, John. Come on, Brian. We have to have this deal". What is the deal? Let us take a look inside. Let us not forget wood. I am a little biased because I come from the great western kingdom of British Columbia where we grow a lot of good wood, cedar and spruce.

An Hon. Member: There is a lot of wood between the ears of the Premier.

Mr. Fulton: There is a lot of wood between the ears of the Premier, that is true, but let us not forget that a scant five years ago, count them, there was a diminimus finding from the United States. The Americans wanted to bring a countervail against Canada based on the same forest laws we have right now. All of a sudden we have the Hon. Member for Vancouver Centre, now the President of the Treasury Board (Miss Carney), scampering to Washington saying, "I will make you a 10 per cent one-time only offer. Penalize us. Give us a $600 million a year fine." This is the big, tough Tory Government with the biggest majority in Canadian history saying to the biggest industry, "Penalize us, penalize us." We could have won the case, and we should have. On water there are the covert underpinnings to the deal. That is what it is secretly all about, giving over our social services and medicare.

Some Hon. Members: Not true!

Mr. Fulton: Oh, oh, oh! Members over there say that cannot be true. But 36 million Americans have no medical coverage. Who here wants to take out their medicare card and tear it up tonight? Under the FTA you have to tear it up.

Mr. McDermid: So I suppose free trade will cause haemorrhoids as well!

Mr. Fulton: What about fish? What kind of negotiators did we have? There is a little bit of wording supposedly to protect Newfoundland, supposedly to protect P.E.I., supposedly to protect Nova Scotia, supposedly to protect New Brunswick. You would not cut me off, Mr. Speaker, I am just getting rolling.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fulton: And Québec, supposedly. What about British Columbia? It was taken to the cleaners on wood and taken to the cleaners on fish.

Let me tell you about GATT. I have to tell you how GATT figures in the fish ruling. It is very important for Canadians to understand why when B.C. falls on fish the other five provinces tumble one after the other. I think there is unanimous consent for me to carry on.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I don't see unanimous consent, neither do I hear unanimous consent. The Hon. Member is a great debater and we appreciate him very much. I must, however, recognize the Hon. Member for Humber—Port-au-Port—St. Barbe (Mr. Tobin) on debate.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I have to confess that I was enjoying the speech as much as I know particular Conservative Members have, and if colleagues are willing to give unanimous consent, I will surely allow my colleague from Skeena to continue his comments and finish them with respect to the fishery.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Tobin: Is there unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. McDermid: No. I want to hear you.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Tobin: You see what happens, Mr. Speaker. Even to discuss the economic union agreement, we already have the Hon. Member for Brampton (Mr. McDermid) doing a pale imitation of Uncle Sam by saying, "I want to hear you".

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Tobin: Give him a stovepipe hat, the stars and stripes and let him grow a set of whiskers and we would have a real Yankee Doodle Dandy.

I hope as Members sit here this evening discussing this historic Bill, and those few Canadians who have managed to sit long enough to watch this important debate on television networks across the country will stop and remind themselves where this whole process began. It really began just about four years ago when a brand new Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), with the biggest majority in the history of Canadian politics, brand new to the job, stood up and spoke of the American protectionist sentiment that was beginning to boil and fester in Washington and of the new angry mood that was directed primarily at Japan. I can remember his words, "You can bet your bottom dollar that when the winds of protectionism blow out of Congress they won't be blowing at Canada because we have a special relationship with the United States".

That was the profound, marked in stone, etched for all time, for all Canadians to see and the beginning of our modern day discussion of our trading relationship with the United States. A brand of cocky assurance that we had no problem because we had a Prime Minister with a big majority.

Ms. McDonald: What about Bourassa?

Mr. Tobin: "We are good friends," he said. What happened? We woke up to cedar shakes and shingles because of that special relationship attitude built on the role of Butch and Spike rather than two mature nations with respect for each other's boundaries. We woke up to trade action on B.C. lumber, Atlantic fish, pork, steel and other products. All of the time that trade action was being taken, Canada was giving, giving and giving some more.

• (2120)

Mr. Benjamin: Even on raspberries.

Mr. Tobin: Yes, even on raspberries. Canada was giving on investment policy long in advance of any discussion of trade. We were giving on film policy and in a dozen other areas long before any discussions on trade.

Uncle Sam understood that there was a very pliant, placid, passive Government north of the border in the Conservative administration. So the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) said, "Well, I made a mistake, so the protectionist winds are blowing at us and being Mr. Nice Guy doesn't help, but don't worry, I've got a solution. We're going to negotiate free trade. When I'm finished negotiating free trade, we're going to have an exemption. U.S. trade law won't apply to Canada".

In fact, the Prime Minister told The New York Times, when the negotiations began, that U.S. trade law cannot apply to Canada, period. No problem. The Prime Minister set the bottom line. We have to remind ourselves of that as we look at this document tonight.

The bottom line was that we would have a relationship in which they would be free to come to our country with their products and we in Canada would be guaranteed access to their country's market with our products. That is what free trade means, is it not?

Tonight we are contemplating a Bill that enshrines in a treaty the right of the U.S. Congress forever to make existing trade law, past trade law and future trade law including retaliation measures and negative, harmful trade action against Canada apply. We have co-signed the right of the United States to take that kind of action.

The Prime Minister's bottom line, not our bottom line, not the New Democratic Party's bottom line, but the Prime Minister's bottom line was guaranteed access. What we have guaranteed in writing and have put our signature to is the right of the United States, with whatever future trade law that might be conjured up in Congress in whatever mood exists on whatever day in whatever political environment, to continue forever to take trade action against Canada. That is the bottom line.

That is the bottom line of the trade deal we have signed in exchange for a dispute mechanism. It almost sounds like "sacred trust". We have a dispute tribunal that will look at U.S. trade actions to see if they are consistent with U.S. law. The Americans can pass a new law tomorrow that is contrary to the spirit of the so-called free trade agreement.

This is not free trade, this is an economic union. The President of the United States said that we now have an economic constitution for North America and that this is the first step in binding our nations together.

I am a democrat. I believe in democratic institutions and I believe in democracy. If we put in place an economic union agreement between Canada and the United States, it is as sure as night follows day that in time, the people who live in this part of North America will say that if decisions will be made that affect their lives, they want to vote for the people who make those decisions. In this agreement, the decisions being made that will affect Canada in future will be made in Washington.

Mr. McDermid: What a crock.

Mr. Tobin: That is not a crock, my friend. It may be enough for the Tory mentality to sell your soul, your sovereignty, your right to set your own course and your right to captain your own ship to the United States, but it is not enough for a democrat. It is not enough for someone who believes in democratic institutions or for someone who believes in Canada and in the right of self-determination.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Tobin: There is a philosophy opposite that is so driven and blinded by the notion of the market-place and the free movement of capital, no matter for what purpose, that it sees the northern half of this continent, that part we call Canada and that part that is a reflection of the collective wisdom, blood, sweat, tears and history of Canada, that sense of Canadian sovereignty, that fabric that has been woven together into the country we call Canada, as nothing more than an irritant to free market forces. Suddenly we have an agreement that sets up, from the point of view of those who are the biggest players in the North American market-place, those who occupy the boardrooms in the glass, steel and concrete towers of the major financial centres south of the border, something called free trade.

There is no free trade here. What we have is economic union, a sell-out of Canada.

What does Clause 6, the clause we want deleted, do? Clause 6 provides that the treaty we have signed with the United States, forever and a day, will take precedence over any act of a provincial legislature anywhere in Canada.

Mr. McDermid: No, that's wrong.

Mr. Tobin: No provincial Government in Canada will ever again be able to take measures within its own jurisdiction and within its own right as defined under the British North America Act, the Constitution of Canada, to set priorities, policies or programs for that province if, in any way, shape or form, Washington determines that the programs are inconsistent with the treaty signed between the United States and the Government of Canada.

Mr. McDermid: That's a lie.

Mr. Tobin: That isn't a lie, that's the truth. Obviously it bites right to the Hon. Member's marrow.

As I stand here in the Parliament of Canada, that Chamber that represents the voice and the views of all of the people of Canada who are concerned about the national interest and not just the narrow interests of any one of our constituencies, I find it passing strange that all those great champions of provincial rights, those Premiers who have talked so often about the rights of provinces to independence, about this being a Confederation, an association of various jurisdictions, have been muted. The Premier of Newfoundland, Mr. Brian Peckford, the fighting Newfoundlander, has found himself muted and swallowed up under the weight of the patronage and pork-barrelling tactics of the Hon. Member for St. John's West. His nose is so deep in the spout that he cannot see that the fundamental interests of Newfoundland, the newest Province of Canada, the proudest Province of Canada, are being sold out by a piece of legislation and by a Government that would sacrifice nationhood on the altar of unbridled capitalism. This Bill is a shame.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg—Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, much has been said tonight about the origins of the free trade agreement. Quite rightly, the Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) pointed out the biographical detail that a great many Canadians perhaps do not know but that is pertinent to the Minister for International Trade (Mr. Crosbie). He pointed out the fact that the Minister and his family, going all the way back to 1949, have sought to become a part of the United States. Our only wish is that the Crosbie family would have found a way to become a part of the United States without taking the rest of Canada with them.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blaikie: Perhaps it has something to do with the rather selective nature of American immigration laws that the Minister for International Trade has never been admitted to what he obviously regards as the promised land.

The Hon. Member also spoke of the origins of the clauses in the agreement which have to do with what the Hon. Member said were the secret underpinnings of the agreement. That, of course, is the whole question of Canadian water, something which the trade negotiator, Mr. Reisman himself, referred to once as Canada's ace in the hole with respect to any agreement with the United States of the sort that he then went on to negotiate. It would be a mistake to imagine that Mr. Reisman either exists now or existed then in a political vacuum.

The fact is, and this is something that some Liberals may find uncomfortable, that the Grand Canal project has its origins amidst a group of very high-powered Liberals in Canada. I speak, for example, of the Desmarais brothers. I know that when Lou Desmarais was a Member of Parliament prior to the election of 1984 he actively lobbied Members of Parliament to give their support to the Grand Canal project. That project involved the export of Canadian water to the U.S. As the Hon. Member for Skeena pointed out, it was a ridiculous and environmentally disastrous megaproject that would have James Bay dammed and turned into a freshwater lake from which water would be pumped to the American Midwest using something in the neighbourhood of 11 nuclear reactors.

This is not something that exists only in the mind of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney). We know he was also a backer of the project at one point until he learned the value of silence with respect to these things. It was backed by the Liberal Premier of Quebec, Mr. Bourassa. We have no reason to believe he ever repudiated his support of that project. He is an active supporter of the free trade agreement, again an embarrassment, I am sure, to many Liberals.

For those reasons, we need to see this water issue and the rhetorical extravaganza that we are sometimes treated to by certain Liberal Members with respect to the export of Canadian water as ambiguous on their part because we know there were a number of very high powered Liberals behind this project long before the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement was negotiated. That is something Canadians should know about because they might have the impression, if they were to take words at their face value, that the Liberal Party was united in its opposition to massive water exports and diversions to the U.S. when in fact they are not. Some of the biggest movers and shakers in the Liberal Party of Canada have actually been active backers of the scheme. Let that be on the record for those Canadians who may be listening tonight and who may have a genuine concern about exporting Canadian water to the U.S. Let them know that they cannot rely on the Liberal Party of Canada to oppose that kind of diversion of Canadian water to the U.S.

With respect to the origins, the momentum, shall we say, for free trade and its counterpart deregulation, we must look to the Liberal Party of Canada and a Liberal Government. It was begun in fact by a Liberal Government. Early conversations about negotiating some kind of free trade agreement with the U.S., albeit sometimes the talk had to do with sectoral arrangements, go back to the presence here in Canada of the former American ambassador, Mr. Robinson. This is where these kinds of talks had their origin.

It is no coincidence that we then had a royal commission on economic development in Canada chaired by the now High Commissioner to London, Donald Macdonald, a high profile Liberal who went on to recommend free trade as a leap of faith with the U.S. I would say a leap of blind faith. To be fair to Mr. Macdonald, he did not recommend all the things now in this agreement. In fact, one of the things he did not recommend at all was the section with respect to services. The Macdonald Commission did not even do a study on services, so when it comes to services it is not just a leap of faith, it is a leap of blind faith. No work has been done on this at all and Canada is asked to be a guinea pig in a completely asymmetric relationship that will make us, when we look back, the laughing stock of the world with respect to what this Government has led us into on free trade in services.

There has been a lot of what I would call anxious reflection on the part of Canadians who are against this agreement. They are asking themselves how they should vote. Who should they trust with respect to actually getting rid of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement? I submit to them that, in spite of the sincerity of some members of the Liberal caucus with respect to the agreement, Canadians who are opposed to this agreement, who see it as a threat to the kind of Canada we have already built and to the kind of Canada we could build in the future, the only choice in this respect, the only Party that has been on record from day one as being against this kind of arrangement, has been the New Democratic Party. That is the message we will be taking out to the people of Canada in the election when the Prime Minister gets up his nerve and calls it.

If there is one thing that all Canadians are unanimous about, I think even some who are for this agreement, it is that this kind of thing can only be done by a government which has sought a mandate to make such a significant historical change in the destiny of Canada. So we hope at some point the Prime Minister, the Hon. Member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister for International Trade (Mr. McDermid), will have an attack of democratic ethics and call an election. They will say, "This is not the kind of thing we can do in the fourth year of our mandate, especially given the fact that when we sought that mandate we never even mentioned the fact we were about to negotiate such an agreement. In fact, we gave the impression we would not negotiate such a thing at all."

Mr. John McDermid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, this has been a rather interesting and amusing evening sitting listening to the political rhetoric and the clown-like method with which it was presented by some Hon. Members opposite. There were many points raised tonight too numerous to talk about in the ten minutes allotted me in this particular period, but I would like to touch on a few of the subjects raised.

First, my friend, the Hon. Member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis), stood up and talked about how terrible foreign investment is. He went on at some length about what a terrible thing foreign investment in Canada is. Yet at the same time, the Leader of his Party, the Hon. Member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), is sitting on the platform of General Motors when they invest billions of dollars in his riding. He welcomes that kind of investment.

Bob White, the national Vice-President of the NDP and President of the Canadian Auto Workers, where was he recently? In Japan, welcoming and encouraging Japanese investment in Canada. Bob White, President of the Canadian Auto Workers, but more importantly Vice-President of the NDP, was in Japan encouraging Japanese investment in Canada. Isn't that something? The socialists love to stand up here and knock foreign investment out of one side of their mouths, and on the other side they are over there begging for it in their ridings. Invest here, create employment, create economic activity here.

I tell you, when American Motors decided to build their new plant in Brampton, I did not say, "That is terrible, take your foreign money somewhere else. Do not put it in Brampton. For heaven's sake, that is terrible". No. It created some 1500 jobs, and that will probably be 3,000 jobs eventually. That is what is important to the community and the economic growth of this country.

Then I listened to my hon. friend from Prince Albert. He talked about social programs. He said our social programs cost our manufacturers just a little more money. They increased the cost of our goods. They make them a little more expensive because we have these social services. That is out of one side of his mouth. Then, out of the other side of his mouth he says that the Americans will be saying that our social programs are an unfair trade practice and they cannot compete with Canadians. How can you have it both ways? That is the NDP's argument. That is the debate they are having.

Then I listened to the Liberals, the moaning, the weeping, and the gnashing of teeth going on over there. As one example, I listened to my friend, the Member for Algoma (Mr. Foster), who I think is still their agricultural critic. Sometimes one must wonder, but I think he is. He talks about the wine industry, the grape growing industry of the country. For the record, I would like to refer to an article on one winery in Ontario with which I am familiar, Hillebrand. The article reads:

> Hillebrand's president . . . John Swan, puts the case succinctly, "Without GATT and the FTA, the industry would have died a lingering death. This has been a useful jolt. We can produce world-class grapes here".
> World-class grapes are the key to success, but it takes five years on average to produce a mature vine. Currently, Hillebrand produces two main kinds of wine: house wines, which are a blend of grapes, and varietals, which are made exclusively from one kind of grape from one grower's farm . . .
> Only 30 per cent of Hillebrand's production is varietal, but the plan is to increase production as new vines mature. Varietals such as Chardonnay and Riesling command a higher price commensurate with their higher quality.
> Hillebrand gets its grapes from 80 independent growers in the Niagara region who annually produce 3,300 tons of grapes on 600 acres to yield 230,000 cases of wine . . . Two years ago Hillebrand began a program of signing 10-year contracts with the producers of their best varietals in exchange for control over the way in which the growers tend their vines.
> Clearly, there is a lesson here for the other grape growers of Niagara. If they switch growing high-quality European varietals and can survive the five-year maturing period for the vines, they have a great future in the brave new world of free trade.
> There are signs that the growers are getting the message. In the past two months, 200,000 new vines have been planted in Niagara.

The message, very clearly, is that they can survive under free trade, that they want to survive under free trade, and that they are working toward that end rather than the doom and gloom that my friend from Algoma is always crying the blues about and moaning and groaning about here in the House. He says that everything is so terrible in this country and we are going to hell in a hand-basket. Hemorrhoids and all the social ills are caused by free trade. This free trade is a terrible thing, my God, look out, here it comes.

Let us talk about the proposed amendments for a few moments. The first amendment that the Opposition has brought forward is to delete Article 102 of the free trade agreement which contains the objectives of the agreement. I find it amazing that the Opposition wants to eliminate the objectives of the agreement. Opposition members always talk about supporting the elimination of barriers to goods and services. The agreement facilitates conditions of fair competition within a free trade area which is what we want, fair trade.

No one will question that we want fair trade. That is what it is all about. We want liberalized conditions for investment within the free trade area. It is amazing to note that more Canadian investment went into the United States last year than American investment came into Canada. Imagine, Canadians investing offshore. Holy smokes, what is the world coming to? Well, that is happening and we want to ensure that our investors are treated as fairly as are any other investors. That is exactly what is happening.

Through Motion No. 6 our friends would eliminate Clause 4 from Bill C-130. This is a legal matter. At common law the Crown was bound by statute either if the statute so stated expressly or if, on a fair reading of the statute, the intention to have it applied to the Crown was necessarily implied. However, Section 16 of the federal Interpretation Act provides that Her Majesty is not bound by a statute unless therein mentioned or referred to. Two recent Supreme Court of Canada decisions raise serious doubts as to whether a clear implication that the statute is intended to bind the Crown is insufficient in light of the wording of Section 16. Therefore, we had to put Clause 4 into the Act to ensure that we were following the rules.

The Opposition wants to eliminate Clause 6 from the Free Trade Agreement. I get a big charge out of this because they say that the provincial Governments have nothing to do now. They say that through Clause 6 we have taken away all their powers. Can you imagine? The federal Government has taken away all the powers of the provinces.

Let us get one thing very clear. Clause 6 makes very clear that the federal Government has the right to implement an international treaty signed by two sovereign nations, and that is exactly what we are doing through this clause. The clause is an important interpretative aid but it does not, as my hon. friends would try to have you believe, change the existing division of powers in Canada. It is impossible for Parliament to give itself constitutional authority that it does not already possess. Hon. Members know that, yet they put up all these bogeymen that the provinces are having their powers taken away from them.

Alberta and Quebec protect their rights very strongly and probably talk about provincial rights more than any others. Both of those provinces support the free trade agreement very strongly. If they thought provincial rights were at all diminished by this free trade agreement they would be the first knocking on our doors worried about this clause. Yet, they are not.

On May 4, 1988, the Senate Standing Committee on Foreign Affairs in its wisdom reported on the constitutional jurisdiction pertaining to the free trade agreement. It said that it was perfectly within the power of the federal Government to implement the free trade agreement. All Clause 6 says is that we can implement the free trade agreement. That is exactly what we are doing and that is what we will be doing when the free trade agreement is passed by the House of Commons.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to take part in this debate in support of Motion Nos. 5, 6, and 8. I hope you will note that I have mentioned them and I will try to get to them again.

Motion No. 5 is to strike out certain clauses. Clause 5 says it is to facilitate conditions of fair competition. Well, we have been running into these conditions of fair competition ever since the legislation to deregulate transportation which was started by the Liberals, as my colleague reminds me. Let us not be under any illusions. Deregulation, privatization, and the trade deal are all part and parcel of the same operation. They are the three essential parts.

We find that the so-called fair competition under the new National Transportation Act and the free trade agreement is a farce. In fact, it increases unfair competition from the American side. Let me illustrate. The National Transportation Act provided for competitive line rates. That means that a railroad or a trucking company, but particularly a railroad in the United States, could negotiate a rate with International Nickel in Sudbury or a forest product company in Thunder Bay or British Columbia. The Canadian railroad has to haul that commodity only for its share of the competitive line rate, from its origin to the U.S. border. That would be acceptable if the free trade agreement allowed us to do the same in the United States, but it does not. Competitive line rates are prohibited in the United States so that what American railroads can do to us here, we cannot do to American railroads there. There should be a clause in the agreement stating: "We shall do unto you what you do unto us".

When we proposed such an amendment to the National Transportation Act, the Tories turned it down. They state that they have an agreement to facilitate conditions of fair competition. I want any Conservative to tell me what is fair about competitive line rates that are allowed in Canada but disallowed in the United States. While I am not noted as a great fan of the CPR, they are correct, for once, that $300 million of their revenue in transborder traffic is jeopardized under the National Transportation Act and the free trade agreement. Canadian National states that up to $500 million of its revenue is jeopardized.

I have a copy of a freight waybill in my office that was sent to me in a plain brown envelope. It is a confidential contract with a competitive line rate. It concerns a carload of plywood manufactured just outside New Westminster that is to travel some 25 miles south, across the U.S. border to the Burlington Northern line. It travels on the Burlington Northern line from about Seattle to Minneapolis, then travels on Conrail from Minneapolis to Port Huron. The last 30 miles is to Kitchener, Ontario, on the CNR. There is no weight of the carload lot on the waybill. There are no freight charges, just a note saying, "Destination railway, weigh the car for your own revenue". Canadian National had to weigh the car itself to get its freight charges for the last 30 miles. The belt line railroad for the originating 25 miles is jointly owned by Burlington Northern and a collection of railroads.

Historically, such a load would travel CN or CP east-west across Canada. Instead, it went south, then east, then back into Canada. The Tories want to tell me about fair competition. They do not know what they are talking about.

I regret to say that our good neighbours to the south do not have a very good record, if not one of the worst, of living up to agreements. The history of our contracts, deals and treaties with them since 1812 is replete with violations. The same thing applies to this present Government. I always understood that when a treaty is signed or an agreement is made, one's word is one's bond. I cannot help but remark on how the Government has broken the agreement between the Government of Saskatchewan and the federal Government and the native people of our province reached in 1976. It has refused to implement it. It is not only the Americans, the Government's word is no good. The Conservatives will not live up to the bond of the federal Government in power prior to their coming into existence. I was always under the impression that governments honoured the agreements and treaties of predecessor governments.

The Government talks about deliberalizing significantly conditions of investment. I had a long phone conversation with the Canadian Truckers Association last week. As a result of the free trade agreement and the new National Transportation Act, and deregulation, trucking companies will now establish profit centres in the United States because of taxation laws that will allow them to write off a tractor and trailer in three years rather than the 10 years it takes up here.

We do not come anywhere near the tax breaks that exist there. The competition is not fair and, therefore, Canadian investment is leaving Canada for the United States as a result of the policies of the Government. It calls it free trade, but I call it unfair trade. I call it a decimation of Canadian sovereignty and Canadian independence.

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I was amazed that the Members who made representations from Atlantic Canada found it so difficult to accept the present trade agreement. The history and museums of Atlantic Canada will prove that Atlantic Canada prospered when it could trade by water both eastward and southward.

We have reached a point of great prosperity along the eastern seaboard, with greater and cheaper transportation access, contrary to the assertion of our friend, the stubble-jumper from the West. The assertion we heard by those Atlantic Canadian Members is not in agreement with the needs of the forest industry, the fishing industry, the mining industry or the potential steel industry in that part of Canada. The trade in these industries must go either eastward across water or southward by land or water into the New England market.

I have said in the House previously that one can stand on the Empire State building and see an area that contains a population greater than all of Canada.

May I call it 10 o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 10 p.m., pursuant to Order made June 20, 1988, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m. pursuant to Standing Order 3(1).

NATIONAL REVENUE

TABLING OF TRIBAL CLASS UPDATE AND MODERNIZATION PROJECT REMISSION ORDER

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of State and Minister of State (Treasury Board)): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today, on behalf of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. MacKay), to table in the House the Tribal Class Update and Modernization Project, or TRUMP, Remission Order.

This order remits the customs duties and a portion of the federal sales tax paid or payable on goods imported between January 1, 1987 and December 31, 1993, for use in the updating and modernization of four Tribal Class destroyers for the Canadian Navy. It is estimated that the order will remit $28 million in customs duties and $3.5 million in federal sales tax.

• (1110)

The tabling of this order is in line with the Government's commitment to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts to increase accountability and openness with respect to the use of the remission orders.

PETITIONS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of State and Minister of State (Treasury Board)): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 106(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the Government's response to Petition Nos. 332-4867 and 332-4939, and, Mr. Speaker, I move:

That this House do now proceed to Orders of the Day.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed to the motion will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the Members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried. Orders of the Day.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if there might be unanimous consent from the House to permit the Chairman of the Human Rights Committee to deposit a report from the committee immediately prior to entering into debate on Bill C-130.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. At first glance one would wonder why the Members of the House who are not supporters of the Government should help the Government out of a difficulty that it has created for itself by its arbitrary and abusive approach to the proceedings of the House. The Government has created this problem by moving in a pre-emptory and arbitrary manner that the House proceed to Orders of the Day before the stage could be reached—

Mr. Speaker: The Minister of State has put a proposition to the House. I know that the Hon. Member for Windsor West would want to give the Chair some indication of whether or not that proposition has support. Perhaps a number of Members in the House might very well want to make certain commentary on many things, but I would ask the Hon. Member to assist the Chair.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): The issue is, while we are always ready to assist the Chair, should we be assisting the Government out of a difficulty that it created for itself. I am ready to say that we will give consent because the report in question is a report of the Human Rights Committee. I understand that it deals with important issues involving the plight of older workers in the country. I want to ensure that the country realizes that if there is a problem that we now have with respect to tabling the report of the Human Rights Committee, it was created by the Government for itself and for the majority of Conservative Members of the House.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the Hon. Member. The Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap.

Mr. Riis: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the Day.

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Monday, August 15, consideration of Bill C-130, an Act to implement the free trade agreement between Canada and the United States of America, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee; and the amendments of Mr. Axworthy:

Motion No. 5

That Bill C-130 be amended by deleting Clause 3.

Motion No. 6

That Bill C-130 be amended by deleting Clause 4.

Motion No. 8

That Bill C-130 be amended by deleting Clause 6.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of State and Minister of State (Treasury Board)): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion under Standing Order 117. I move:

"That, in relation to Bill C-130, an Act to implement the free trade agreement between Canada and the United States of America, not more than two further sitting days shall be allotted to the consideration of the report stage, and two sitting days to the consideration of the third reading stage of the Bill; and

That fifteen minutes before the expiry of the time provided for government business on the second day allotted to report stage consideration and on the second day allotted to third reading stage consideration of the said Bill, any proceedings before the House shall be interrupted, if required, for the purpose of this order and, in turn, every question necessary in order to dispose of the stage of the Bill then under consideration shall be put forthwith and successively, without further debate or amendment."

Mr. Speaker: I will hear the Hon. Member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray) on a point of order, and then I will hear the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap (Mr. Riis).

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the motion made by the Hon. Deputy Government House Leader is out of order and cannot be received by you and be put to the House. Why do I say this, Mr. Speaker? In attempting to move a motion for time allocation under Standing Order 117, the Deputy Government House Leader is doing something from which he is precluded because a majority of representatives of the Parties in this House has reached agreement for allocation of time under Standing Order 116.

The Standing Orders have three provisions for the allocation of time. Standing Order 115 applies when all three Parties, or whatever number of Parties there are in the House, have reached agreement. This is clearly not the case here. Standing Order 116 applies when a majority of representatives of the Parties of the House have reached agreement. Standing Order 117 applies when an agreement cannot be reached under the provisions of Standing Order 115 or 116.

It is very clear from a letter read into the record yesterday by the Deputy Government House Leader that an agreement was reached and continues to be in place among and on the part of representatives of a majority of the Parties of the House. Therefore, the requirements for Standing Order 117 have not been met, and that Standing Order cannot be used as long as the agreement to which I have referred is in place.

What the Minister on behalf of the Government can and should do is to make a motion to give effect to the agreement between the representatives of a majority of Parties in the House. The Minister, as a Minister of the Crown, has already met the basic requirement for the application of Standing Order 116 because yesterday he rose in the House and stated that a majority of representatives of the several Parties had come to an agreement with respect to the allocation of time. The Minister may not have intended to do this, he may not have realized that he was doing it, but in fact he did so when he rose and read into the record the letter signed by myself and the House Leader for the NDP. I say to Members of the House that it could well be argued that it is the obligation of the Deputy Government House Leader to rise and move a motion to give effect to that agreement reached by the representatives of a majority of the Parties in the House.

He may say that Standing Order 116 states only that the Minister may propose a motion without notice, but I submit that this is one of those occasions well recognized in the parliamentary and the general law when "may" can only mean "shall". Otherwise, the Standing Order would have little sense or purpose or effect because it starts out by saying, and I think I have already made this point:

> "116. When a Minister of the Crown, from his or her place in the House, states that a majority of the representatives of the several parties have come to an agreement in respect of a proposed allotment of days or hours for the proceedings at any stage of the passing of a public bill, the Minister may propose a motion, without notice, during proceedings under Government Orders, setting forth the terms of the said proposed allocation;"

And so on. I have already said, and the record is clear, that the Minister from his place in the House did state yesterday that a majority of the representatives of the several Parties had come to an agreement with respect to the allocation of time for the Bill in question. Therefore, the subsequent words of the Standing Order can only have meaning if the word "may" in this case is interpreted to mean "shall". There is therefore an obligation on the part of the Deputy Government House Leader to move a motion, to give effect to the agreement which was reached between the representatives or a majority of the representatives of the several Parties in this House.

The Deputy Government House Leader may say that the real meaning of Standing Order 116 is that a representative of the government Party has to be part of this majority. I say that this should not be the interpretation—and it is clearly not the interpretation—because Standing Order 116 provides that once the motion is put there has to be a debate for up to two hours in which anybody who wants to can speak for up to 10 minutes, and then there is a vote. It would seem to me that this was clearly intended to provide a safety valve so that representatives of the Government—even if a Minister on the government side moved a motion—could get up and argue against it, and there could then be a vote. If there is this safety valve, the fact that a representative of the government Party is not one of the majority of representatives should not preclude the motion from being properly put.

In any event, even if Your Honour should find that the motion cannot be put unless the Minister of the Crown wishes to do so, I submit that the motion the Deputy Government House Leader wants to put under Standing Order 117 cannot be put, because his opportunity to do so has been pre-empted by the agreement reached by a majority of representatives of the several Parties in this House, pursuant to Standing Order 116.

Therefore, on the basis of what I have just put to you, Mr. Speaker, I submit that the Minister's motion is completely out of order. I think we also mentioned yesterday that the notice of that motion was defective because it did not state the number of days the Government proposed to allocate for the report stage and third reading of the Bill. However, quite apart from that, on the basis of the arguments I have just given, I submit that it is completely out of order for the Deputy Government House Leader to move the motion under Standing Order 117. He is precluded from doing so, so long as the agreement reached between the majority of the representatives of the several Parties in this House remains in place. Therefore, I submit, Mr. Speaker, that you cannot accept the motion, the motion cannot be put, in an effort by the Government to obtain the order that it wants with respect to the allocation of time for the remaining stages of Bill C-130. The motion, for the reason I have given, is out of order and I hope, in the interest of parliamentary democracy, Your Honour will accept my arguments and in fact formally rule that the motion is in fact out of order.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I, too, want to lend support to the points made by my hon. colleague, the House Leader for the Official Opposition by suggesting that the motion put forward by the Deputy Government House Leader under Standing Order 117 is out of order. Standing Order 117 reads:

> "117. A Minister of the Crown who from his or her place in the House, at a previous sitting, has stated that an agreement could not be reached under the provisions of Standing Orders 115 or 116 in respect of proceedings at the stage at which a public bill was then under consideration either in the House or in any committee,"

And so on. First of all, I want to deal with the particular motion put forward by the Deputy Government House Leader. Your Honour will remember that not long ago under Standing Order 115 the House used 115 when we were dealing with Bill C-72, the official languages Bill, because at that time there was agreement between the representatives of all Parties involved. At the moment, of course, that would be representatives from each of the three federal political Parties.

When the Deputy Government House Leader indicates that an agreement could not be reached under the provisions of Standing Order 115 or 116, I simply want to submit that half of that is correct; that under Standing Order 115, no, there was not unanimous agreement among the representatives of the three Parties, but such is not the case under Standing Order 116. Standing Order 116 says:

> "116. When a Minister of the Crown, from his or her place in the House, states that a majority of the representatives of the several parties have come to an agreement in respect of a proposed allotment of days or hours for the proceedings at any stage of the passing of a public bill,"

And so on and so forth. Such is not the case. As my hon. colleague, the House Leader for the Official Opposition, has indicated there was an agreement. I understand that there is some question about the appropriateness of the agreement in terms of the necessity for this length of time, but I want to indicate that the Deputy Government House Leader thought it was appropriate to read into the record yesterday so it was perfectly clear that there was an agreement between two of the three representatives of the Parties represented in the House of Commons.

It says, simply, "we wish to inform you that our respective parties are prepared to agree on an allocation of a further" number of days.

There was an agreement between two of the three representatives of the political Parties of Canada, that we were prepared to agree on an allotment of time at both report stage and at third reading stage.

I also wish to submit that under Standing Order 117 there is obviously an obligation for the Minister introducing that motion to point out the appropriate time that would be allocated at each stage. I want to submit that, as I read Hansard, that certainly was not the case yesterday. It would make, if we like, another reason for considering this initiative by the Deputy Government House Leader to be out of order at this time.

An Hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I want to thank both the Hon. Member for Windsor West and the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap. I will now hear the Hon. Minister of State.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be brief, just to review the history of this matter. There have been several delays in getting to report stage and third reading of Bill C-130 which have been outlined to the House on previous occasions, so I will not repeat them. I made a serious effort yesterday to negotiate time with the representatives of the opposition Parties, or the coalition Party, and the House will know—and I will not repeat it because I read it into the record—that the coalition has been formed to review this matter. Normally I would table this letter, but there are some things that one comes upon in one's parliamentary career that one wishes to hold. For that reason I would prefer to keep the original copy of this letter, myself, for my personal records, and it may perhaps be of interest. I can provide copies to anybody who wants one.

• (1210)

Here we have a coalition of the opposition Parties, a coalition Party, suggesting that the House take 150 days at report stage and 200 days at third reading stage to consider Bill C-130. I will speak to the substance of that at an appropriate time.

Today I want to deal with two things. First, I want to deal with the argument of my hon. friend that the notice must specify the number of days that will be spelled out for report stage and third reading. I would refer my hon. friend to page 287 of Beauchesne's Fifth Edition which sets out the appropriate wording for a notice of motion for time allocation under Standing Order 75C as it then was. It reads as follows:

> "That an agreement could not be reached under the provisions of Standing 75A or 75B with respect to an allocation of time to the (stage of Bill) of Bill C- . . . . . , An Act . . . ., and, under the provisions of Standing Order 75C, I give notice of my intention to move a time allocation motion at the next sitting of the House for the purpose of allotting a specified number of days or hours for the consideration and disposal of proceedings at that stage of the Bill."

I submit it is very clear that the form spelled out in Beauchesne's does not require that the number of days or hours be stated. It is simply the notice and that notice has been met by reading right from Beauchesne's, substituting the appropriate Bill number and title. I submit that the allegation of my colleagues opposite that the notice must contain the specified number of days or hours is incorrect. We have complied with that part of the requirements.

Second, I would review very briefly to the second argument made which is an interesting argument, but I do not think it has any substance whatsoever. My hon. colleagues are claiming that they have met the provisions of Standing Order 116 by having, as it states in the letter, a majority of the Parties agreed. Yesterday, when my hon. colleague made this point, you very appropriately made it clear that the wording is a majority of the representatives of the several Parties.

I would submit that in arguing this point my colleague has continually referred to a majority of the Parties. That is not a majority of the representatives of the Parties. It is an interesting argument but I do not think it has any substance whatsoever if it is to be read correctly.

I submit that we have met the provisions of Standing Order 117 and that we are in a position to move an order for time allocation, the motion which I have in fact moved. I do not think we need to prolong this argument any further. I think the points have been made. If in fact Your Honour wishes to reserve judgment on this and spend some time reviewing it, the Government is perfectly content with that and would simply call Bill C-130 and enable the debate to continue on the amendments that are before the House.

I submit that both arguments made by my hon colleagues opposite fail. The first argument fails because Beauchesne's sets out the notice and we are within the terms of that wording. The second argument fails because the exact wording of Standing Order 116 refers to a majority of the representatives and my hon. colleagues opposite have misread it, though I am sure the misreading of it was well intentioned. I submit that we have met the notice requirements and that the motion is in order to be presented and proceeded with at this time.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a small point of clarification. In dealing with the matter of whether or not the notice he gave yesterday for a motion under Standing Order 117 was in order, my hon. friend made reference to Beauchesne's. I would like to draw to your attention that the edition of Beauchesne's that we use predates by a number of years the adoption of the Standing Orders on time allocation. I respectfully submit that whatever Beauchesne's said about a notice or the form of a notice, it could not possibly apply by way of a precedent to these Standing Orders because they were not in effect at the time this edition of Beauchesne's was prepared.

Second, I am informed that in every case to date since the Standing Orders went into effect, the notice required under Standing Order 117 did include the details of the time allocation to be sought in the motion for which the notice was a foundation. I wanted to make that small point of clarification.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate very much the Hon. Member for Windsor West's continuing assistance to the Chair on these sometimes difficult issues. I will look at Beauchesne's, but it seems to me that the latest edition of Beauchesne's may have come out after the change in the rules. I think I am right on that, but I will have a look at that and I will take into account the other point the Hon. Member made.

I have listened very carefully as well to the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap (Mr. Riis) who is always of assistance to the Chair in these matters. I will give his remarks considerable consideration.

I think the Hon. Minister of State has divined my sense of this and has indicated that the Government will not be surprised if I reserve for a few hours to give this the consideration it needs. I want Hon. Members to know that I have done some considerable work on this, but I will return at three o'clock to make a ruling. In the meantime, we will proceed with the Orders of the Day.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have just checked the date of publication of the Fifth Edition of Beauchesne's. I think you are right. It did come out after the Standing Orders, but again, I am told that all the precedents involving the use of Standing Order 117 did give the details of the motion to be sought. I had wanted to say immediately that you are quite right in what you said about the edition of Beauchesne's and its timing.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the Hon. Member for Windsor West. The question of when the edition came out takes nothing away from the argument, and I want the Hon. Member to know that I will give it the consideration that I ought to give it as I will give to all of the arguments that have been made.

Resuming debate.

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, the arguments which have been placed before the public of Canada in respect to free trade do not really conform with reality. I think they should be referred to more as scare tactics with political motivations. They involve the pursuit of power rather than the pursuit of truth and the pursuit of what is in the best interests of Canada.

I am in particular disagreement with the concept that in any way, shape, or form the culture of Canada will be altered by virtue of a free trade agreement. Culture is something which government cannot legislate. We have tried on occasion to legislate morality in conformity with the faith the majority of the House has supported. We have tried to create legal structures which would implement our belief in the morality we would like to see sustained in this nation, and we have failed. We cannot, no matter how hard we try, legislate culture. That is something which is always in a state of transition and always in a state of change.

While historians may depict a reason why there has been a change in the culture of any particular area of the world, I do not think they have ever pinned it down to a particular piece of legislation, particularly as it relates to trade.

• (1220)

Culture is something which prospers in prosperity. It never advances in a period of recession. This Bill in intended to create prosperity in this land and I believe that it will. Any argument, political or otherwise, to the contrary certainly will be negated by the study of history as to when culture thrived, be it art or whatever, and when it failed to develop. It needed money and sponsors, which is what I hope a prosperous Canada will generate, in order that culture may indeed thrive.

We have heard representations that our entertainment industry may not thrive. I say, as I have said before, that at such point in time as the entertainment industry of Canada chooses to present the entertainment which Canadians enjoy, it shall then prosper. As long as there is an alternative to what is produced in Canada it shall be in competition with the listening audience, the viewing audience, or the reading audience in this land as it is elsewhere.

If one wishes to look at the independence of Canada, every nation in the world has, to one degree or another, committed itself to trade arrangements. No other nation in the world has accused itself or its Government of surrendering independence by virtue of pursuit of better business for more people in the jurisdiction in which the trade pact has been made.

The Hon. Member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin) and I have been in accord on a number of subjects, particularly in respect to transportation. However, as to his remarks and his complaints about the transportation system, particularly as it relates to rail in Canada, until such time as both the Crown corporation and the publicly held corporation decide that they want to be competitive in the transportation industry, we shall be poorly served.

Unfortunately, the rates which go north and south are usually more beneficial to Canadian traders than are the rates which go east and west. That is the difficulty that both eastern and western Canada have in trade locked into an East-West pattern for this nation. It is fine for the centre, but it is not applicable to the best prosperity which we could obtain in either eastern or western Canada.

I am amazed that one who is so dependent upon the livestock industry of the West, as is the hon. gentleman from Regina, would hold such a position in respect of this item because north-south is a way for the fringes of Canada to trade.

There will be certain industries in this land which may not prosper as well as they have under this structure. However, I submit that the natural resource industries, in particular, and the technical industries now have a market which they can reach and that there is a challenge to Canadian government to ensure that the taxation system of Canada is competitive with that of our trading partners.

We must keep that competitive. If our taxes exceed the taxes which entrepreneurs or labourers would experience in other jurisdictions, we cannot provide the world market with our goods and services. We must recognize that there is an international competitive world in which we trade. Whether it be with the Pacific Rim, the United States, or the European Economic Community, we are in a world of trade, not in a nation isolated in an igloo, and we cannot prosper under that perception of our trading responsibilities.

It has been stated that the American law in respect to trade will still apply. It has been ignored that the Canadian law in respect to our trade with the United States will also still apply, and this is important. The other facet is that there is to be an international tribunal. Our fate is no longer to be decided by a single political thrust from our neighbour to the south. Rather, an international tribunal will discuss the difficulties which we may experience in whatever item of trade may be concerned. In our experience, particularly in lumber and potatoes, we have been the subject of a political decision rather than a legal or a trade agreement schedule. That is wrong.

Surely we have responsibility. I said that government must not tax excessively. We must have beneficent, ambitious, and competent management in the industrial life of this country. We must be in pursuit of markets. It is said that we should seek the Pacific Rim. We have been seeking markets in the Pacific Rim and we have been expanding, but in no way have they ever accommodated the degree and volume of trade which this nation needs for its prosperity.

We have been and shall continue to be in pursuit of all markets, but if we do not give notice to the world that we, as the European Economic Community, as Australia and New Zealand, and as, to some degree at least, the Pacific Rim, are a unit of trade; that we are a market of trade; that we are in pursuit of fair trade and equitable trade, then we will find ourselves in the same position as all those trade agreements which have been made by the coalition, which has actually been in existence for quite some time, whereby all the laws of the United States apply to GATT and all the laws of the United States apply to Canadian trade. They have and, yes, they still do, but future law cannot amend the treaty. That can only be amended by negotiation. That has been the traditional international structure in which we have traded by treaty for a good many years.

Mr. Langdon: That's not true.

Mr. McCain: I hear a little chirp over there. I would like to quote the Right Hon. Winston Churchill in his response to some remarks. I think this is very applicable to the type of remarks which have been emanating from both opposition Parties. "The Hon. Member is never lucky in the coincidence of his facts with the truth". In another situation of a comparable nature Sir Winston Churchill said: "I should think it hardly possible to state the opposite of the truth with more precision".

With that, Mr. Speaker, I leave this subject matter because never has the opposite of the truth been presented to the Canadian public by its political representatives with more precision than it has been done by both opposition Parties. That is a disgrace to both of them and it is not the leadership which Canada needs from either.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I will enter the debate by taking up the point made by my hon. friend who has just spoken and for whom I have very great respect. The remarks he made illustrate one of the main reasons it is essential that there be more debate, more discussion, and more exposure of the terms of the free trade agreement which is dealt with by the legislation before us.

My friend said that we should not be worried about future law because from the time the trade agreement was signed future law does not apply to it. He referred with some affection and pride to the binational dispute settlement mechanism which is pioneered in this particular agreement and, of course, validated in the legislation.

I would like to challenge him on his assertion. I regret that I do not have a copy of the free trade agreement with me in the House, but I know the article number by heart because I have read it frequently at meetings that I have attended. I refer my friend to Article 1902 of the free trade agreement which provides categorically—

• (1230)

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Perhaps I could supply the words to the Hon. Member:

> "Each Party reserves the right to change or modify its antidumping law or countervailing duty law, provided that in the case of an amendment to a Party's antidumping or countervailing duty statute—"

There is notification that the party is so included.

[Translation]

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, fortunately or perhaps unfortunately, I only have a copy of the Agreement in French, but since the Parliamentary Secretary has asked me, I would be happy to read it for him. Part one of article 1902 reads as follows, in English:

> "1. Each Party reserves the right to apply its antidumping law and countervailing duty law to goods imported from the territory of the other Party. Antidumping law and countervailing duty law include, as appropriate for each Party, relevant statutes, legislative history, regulations, administrative pratice, and judicial precedents".

[English]

As the Member for New Brunswick who spoke before me said, that makes it very clear that the existing law of each country applies. The Government achieved absolutely no success in eliminating or reducing or moderating existing countervail and anti-dumping law.

Mr. McDermid: Go on and read about the GATT.

Mr. Kaplan: I am coming to the future.

Mr. McDermid: Read the whole section. Be honest.

Mr. Kaplan: I am delighted to accommodate, as I always do, my friend, the Parliamentary Secretary. However, I would like to do it in my own way. I look forward to what he has to say.

Subsequent to the signing of this agreement, the United States Congress passed very far-reaching additional protective legislation, protective of American trade from competition from abroad.

The Government made no secret of the fact, and we know that the Canadian Government and its very competent ambassador in Washington tried extremely hard to exempt Canada from that new legislation, because the new legislation gives additional powers to the President of the United States to punish the trading partners of the United States who, in the American view, violate their standards of fair trading. The Government tried to exempt Canada from that law and was unsuccessful.

If my friend, the Member from New Brunswick who just spoke, was right, why would the Canadian Government have worried about that legislation because it was passed after the trade agreement was signed? The answer is found in Clause 2 of Article 1902, a clause which makes it clear that legislation passed after the signing of this agreement affects this agreement. Therefore we as a country did not manage to achieve any reduction of countervailing and anti-dumping legislation in the United States at the time this agreement was signed.

Mr. McDermid: Neither did they.

Mr. Kaplan: But we also did not manage to get ourselves exempted from future measures like the one I just described even though a very valiant effort, made which was certainly supported by all Members of the House was made to try to get us exempted.

[Translation]

Part two of the article in question, which I have here in French, reads as follows, in English:

> "2. Each Party reserves the right to change or modify its antidumping law or countervailing duty law . . . "

[English]

In other words, the United States can add anti-dumping and protective measures additional to those in effect when this agreement was signed, provided conditions are met, and when those measures are passed they apply to the Canada-U.S. trade—

Mr. McDermid: Is one of those to apply to GATT?

Mr. Kaplan: Yes.

Mr. McDermid: Do you support the GATT?

Mr. Kaplan: I support the GATT.

Mr. McDermid: The protection is there. Get serious.

Mr. Kaplan: My friend is telling me that the protection is there. If the protection is there, how did the Americans get away with the legislation—

Mr. McDermid: Tell them about the binational dispute settlement mechanism.

Mr. Kaplan: Now I will come to the binational dispute mechanism. This dispute mechanism—

Mr. McDermid: You have not read all the conditions yet.

Mr. Kaplan: They are here. I only have another minute. I can see that there are conditions, but these conditions do not prevent the United States from imposing what, in its opinion, are valid countervail and anti-dumping measures against us.

Mr. McDermid: Not inconsistent with GATT, and you support the GATT.

Mr. Kaplan: We do support the GATT.

Mr. McDermid: You are arguing against yourself.

Mr. Kaplan: I am not arguing against myself. I think I should take the floor and continue to make my points. The final reason why these motions ought to be accepted is that the binational dispute settlement mechanism does not open the United States to free Canadian trade.

The impression that the Government wants to give to Canadians about this agreement is that a business in my riding will be able to go into an American city or anywhere in the United States, make sales, deliver and so on, in the same way that it can any place in our country. That observation is not valid because countervail and anti-dumping legislation do not apply when my constituent makes sales in Winnipeg and in Windsor.

Mr. McDermid: Is your constituent a fair trader?

Mr. Kaplan: My constituent will trade in the United States the best he can. The point the Parliamentary Secretary is trying to make and achieve great satisfaction from is that the binational dispute settlement mechanism somehow or other will carry my constituent through the objections that can be raised on an American countervail and anti-dumping basis. This is not the case.

I would ask him to be big enough to admit that all that mechanism does is assure that American law and Canadian law will be applied objectively and impartially. I am prepared to say that that never bothered me because I always respected American jurists in the same way that I respect Canadian jurists.

These are two countries characterized by fair arbitrations, by fair court procedures. The binational mechanism is interesting. It is a world model because it does provide for impartiality and objectivity, but I took those for granted. I think most Canadian traders did.

What we do not take for granted is countervail and anti-dumping which is a tool available for American interests to protect themselves from people in my riding who want to do business in the United States because they think the Government has won for them protected, unlimited and equal access to the American market as they have in Canada. These motions become even more important. I commend them to the House.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak to Motions Nos. 5, 6, and 8 which would delete Clauses 3, 4, and 6. I will attend only Clause 3 which states the general purposes of Bill C-130.

The Hon. Parliamentary Secretary has referred previously to Clause 3 which sets out the purposes of the Bill. It is interesting to note that among all the purposes cited there is nothing here about creating more jobs for Canadians. If our Party had been foolish enough to enter this kind of deal, among the purposes of this Bill and the agreement that it seeks to implement would have been the purpose to increase the availability of jobs and the opportunities for Canadians to assure a secure future, to ensure that the comparative advantages and the resources that we have would be used to enhance, as I cited yesterday, what most Canadians consider as a definition of Canada not only for the present but for the future. One of the worst aspects of the statement of purposes is the identification within the statement of failures of the trade agreement to achieve the purposes which are cited.

Let us examine those. The first purpose is as an objective to:

> "(a) eliminate barriers to trade in goods and services between Canada and the United States."

I see nothing in the free trade agreement that would do anything about the barriers to softwood lumber, to shakes and shingles, to hogs, to specialty steels, to the impediments that are presented to the free trade of goods and services represented by the new trade legislation, which other speakers have indicated will apply to Canada and from which we have not achieved any exemption. Clause 3 goes on to state:

> "(b) facilitate conditions of fair competition within the free trade area established by the Agreement."

Will this free trade agreement make level the field that is made unlevel by the 20 per cent higher costs in energy that Canadians have to pay? Will it eliminate the great transportation costs that we face when in this country? Will it eliminate the barriers to conditions of free competition which are imposed upon regions of the country, victims of past failures, to achieve economic development, the kind of economic development that is now substantially prevented by this legislation through concessions made by the Government to the Americans? The clause goes on to say:

> "(c) liberalize significantly conditions for investment within that free trade area."

This is one area of purpose that has been achieved. It certainly does liberalize investment and the acquisition of Canada by the Americans that not only makes it possible for them to accumulate our industry and our services, it permits them to control the means of investment through the provisions with respect to financial institutions. I have to concede, Mr. Speaker, that purpose (c) will be substantially achieved to the detriment of Canada and its future.

Let me come to subparagraph (d) which reads:

> "—establish effective procedures for the joint administration of the Agreement and the resolution of disputes."

Nobody really believes the dispute settlement mechanism will achieve that. As a matter of fact, we can look forward to even further opportunities for harassment of Canadian traders. By the time the disputes are settled, the victims will already have suffered the effects of American countervail and anti-dumping provisions.

Mr. McDermid: You should have heard testimony at committee.

Mr. McCurdy: Finally, subparagraph (e) reads:

"—lay the foundation for further bilateral and multilateral co-operation to expand and enhance the benefits of the Agreement."

Nobody believes that; no outside observer believes that. Probably what we have done with respect to the service area has created an opportunity for the use of this area of investment for a new kind of colonialism of which Canada is the first victim.

It is shameful that this piece of legislation has to be rushed through the House by virtue of closure. There have been observations made about this kind of activity on the part of the Government. Let me read an interesting quote. Imposed upon us is that:

"—we have to hold our noses and pass whatever this government brings to the House, and pass it quickly. This comes from a closure-crazed government, a government which suffers from the crime of parliamentary bestiality. It cannot wait to force these kinds of things through the House."

Who said that, Mr. Speaker? Who went on to say:

"It is a betrayal of the parliamentary system to add to the betrayal of the people of Canada, who have been betrayed in gasoline prices. They have been betrayed in heating oil prices. They have been betrayed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

They have been betrayed by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Lalonde). Now they have been betrayed by the House leader of the government."

This same, up until now, anonymous commentator who has been so right about the circumstances which face us now went on to say:

"Today we have a parliamentary system of government without any checks and balances and without the separation of powers. The Prime Minister has a group of docile sheep in his caucus who keep him in power, no matter what he is doing. They just say, "Baaa, sir, baaa, sir, pass it through the House, sir".

As long as they do that, he has absolute power. This Prime Minister has absolute power as long as the majority in his caucus give him that unlimited power. They are so busy with their noses in the patronage trough and the power trough that they neither know nor care what happens to this Parliament, and we can expect nothing from them."

He goes on to say, and this is relevant in the present circumstances, this very erudite and observant commentator:

"Where are the people with the grapes in their district?"

Finally, he said:

"Where are all the defenders of the people on the other side of the House? They are going to come out of their trough in a few minutes. They will hear the bell and will have to break away from whatever trough they have their noses in at the moment. They will have to come into this House and say "Oink, oink".

They will have to say "Aye, aye". They will have to say "Yes" to the stampeding of Parliament, to rushing this bill through the House. They will have to say "Yes" to the gutting of Parliament. They will have to do the dirty work that the parliamentary assistants, assassins and eunuchs have asked them to do."

That was the Minister of International Trade (Mr. Crosbie) who identified what this Government is doing with its imposition of closure in an attempt to hide from the Canadian people the rape of Canada.

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, these three amendments before us in this group on the trade bill, Bill C-130, enable us to point out some of the very serious dangers in this Bill. Motion No. 5 would delete Clause 3 in the Bill. That would have the effect of deleting the statement of purposes. That would be a distinct improvement if it were done, but I want to mention particularly two of the purposes that seem to me quite misleading or misworded as they stand.

In Clause 3(b) it says one of the purposes is to:

"—facilitate conditions of fair competition within the free trade area established by the Agreement."

We have heard a great deal in the past about the need for having a dispute settlement mechanism. We now find that we do not have one, not of the sort promised to us by this Government. We do not have one that protects us against non-tariff trade barriers, against countervail, and against anti-dumping laws passed by the United States in the past or in the future. All the dispute mechanism does is tell us, if it is carried through, whether an American law was fairly applied. We could have a two, three or four year process of dispute while Canadian exporters to the United States go down the drain and find at the end of the judgment that the American law, while we might think it an unfair law, nevertheless was fairly applied, that is, applied in the way it was intended and, therefore, we have no complaint and no remedy.

There are many manufacturers in Spadina in the clothing industry who are seriously worried about this Bill, particularly because of this aspect of the Bill. They have spoken out against it, including some who originally favoured the negotiations, took part in the negotiations, and at first said that it was a good deal. They then found it was a bad deal. They are threatened, for example, by the prospect of restriction of Canadian imports into the United States depending on where the Canadian manufacturer buys its fabric. That has been objected to strongly by Mr. Nygard who was the chairman of the SAGIT and who took part in these negotiations. He even recommended that his industry, not his company but the whole clothing manufacturing industry, be removed from the free trade agreement for that reason, but of course his recommendation to the Government was ignored.

The result of that sort of failure in the negotiations with the United States was illustrated some months ago when a clothing producer in Ontario was negotiating a loan with a bank, had gone through all the stages up to the point where he was told: "Okay, go and see the manager next week and he will sign the loan". He went, but in the meantime the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) had been on television talking about winners and losers and mentioning the clothing manufacturing industry among the losers. When he got to the bank manager the bank manager said: "Did you hear the Prime Minister Sunday night on television?" "Yes," he said. "Then you don't get the loan". In other words, the bank manager believed the Prime Minister at that point in saying that the clothing manufacturing industry would be a loser and therefore of course not fit for that banker to lend money to.

There are other industries in Spadina which are worried about this deal as well because the trouble in it goes far beyond the clothing industry. We have a very large set of service industries. The service industries have been opened up to foreign takeover according to purpose number(c) of Clause 3 to liberalize significantly conditions for investment in that free trade area.

In other words, American firms can come to buy up Canadian firms. They can come and buy up large chunks of Canadian banks, much larger than they could before. It should be said that Canadians can go buy up Americans which is still small comfort, still small protection for those Canadians who do not happen to be extremely wealthy. In fact, there have been thousands of sales already by those who believe that this deal is a certainty, people who have decided if you can't lick them, join them. Instead of moving bodily to the United States they have simply transferred their assets to the United States to be protected from the people who would take them over, to surrender instead of resisting. We do not intend to surrender.

In the analysis done by the Bank of Nova Scotia we are shown that industries can be classified according to that bank's predictions as to which ones are likely to gain and which ones are likely to lose. In its general classification it states that the resource industries which employ between 300,000 and 400,000 people have a favourable risk factor of four. They are at the top of the list. They will do better than anybody else by this deal. The manufacturing industry which employs 2.25 million people has an unfavourable risk factor of minus one. In other words, they stand to lose. Agriculture, likewise, which employs nearly 500,000 people has an unfavourable risk factor of minus one. They stand to lose. The service industries employing 7,710,000 people in Canada have a risk factor of minus two. That is a lot of service jobs that can go down the drain.

We have many, many services, whether it is computer processing, whether it is management of hospitals, management of other health facilities, funded by the public through a health insurance system much better than the United States health insurance system, covering all the people instead of only some of the people. The management of this, according to the trade deal, can be taken over by the American hospital management corporations that have a record for cutting services and cutting staff in order to increase their profits. Those are the people that this trade deal invites to come to take over key sections of the Canadian health system as the process of privatization is led by this Government and by other Conservative Governments, and perhaps by other Liberal Governments in Canada.

These are not the only industries that are at risk. There are some that worry us very much in Spadina where we have the hospitals, many other health care institutions, and the garment industry.

The Bank of Nova Scotia has done a much more comprehensive job. It has also pointed out that industries rated at extreme risk, minus four, include light cotton apparel, foundation garments, automotive heavy truck assemblers, automotive small parts producers, food processing of fruits and vegetables, railway freight car assembly.

This is the judgment of a bank which will be controlling a significant share of investment in these industries. These are the ones that this bank in its own interest finds vulnerable and put in danger by this Bill.

Therefore I would urge the adoption of these amendments.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would like to bring to the attention of Hon. Members that Motions Nos. 5, 6, and 8 have been grouped for debate and will be voted on separately.

The question is on Motion No. 5, standing in the name of the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 114(11), the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

The next question is on Motion No. 6, standing in the name of the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 114(11), the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

The next question is on Motion No. 8, standing in the name of the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 114(11), the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

LA VERENDRYE WILDLIFE RESERVE—OPPOSITION TO HYDROELECTRIC PROJECT

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, the Algonquin Indian people of Barriere Lake in the Province of Quebec are vigorously protesting a hydroelectric project designed to encourage further development activity in the La Verendrye Wildlife Reserve.

The Algonquins of Barriere Lake, some 450 persons, have a 59-acre reserve located in the middle of the La Verendrye Park. Clear-cutting of timber is already devastating this sanctuary.

To add insult to injury the Minister of Indian Affairs (Mr. McKnight) has offered to advance nearly $4 million of the band's capital funds to Hydro Québec for this project. The Barriere Lake band says: "No". The Minister of Indian Affairs says: "Get out of my way".

How long will we go on imposing our will on the first citizens of this country? We must cease trampling on peoples' rights simply because they are few in number, terribly poor, and without any political power or influence.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

ERRORS IN CREDIT CARD STATEMENTS

Mr. Reginald Stackhouse (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, if you, I say with respect, any Member of the House, or any citizen of this country habitually pays your credit card bill scarcely thinking about it, break the habit, stop, check your statement. Two per cent of all credit card statements are wrong through human error, computer glitches, and fraud.

Customers are well advised to check their statements against their receipts because of such errors as billing for charges that were not made, incorrectly identified charges, charges for items that were returned or were not accepted, and late billings.

In view of the large number of people affected and the large amount of funds involved, I intend to bring in legislation that will limit the liability of customers and ensure that genuine complaints are honoured.

EMPLOYMENT

CLOSURE OF GLACE BAY, N.S., FISH PLANT—EFFECT ON WORKERS

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, a group of people from Glace Bay who work for Highland Fisheries recently occupied the offices of the Premier of Nova Scotia. They occupied those offices because they are worried about their jobs, and no one will give them a straight answer.

Clearwater Fine Foods, which owns the plant, closed it on June 21. It said at the time that the move was necessary because it did not have enough quota. The federal Fisheries Minister went to Glace Bay to meet with union and community officials. He told them he would meet with the President of Clearwater Foods, John Risley, and that he would try to get the plant opened by August 1. The Fisheries Minister also said repeatedly in the House of Commons that Clearwater had plenty of quota.

August 1 has come and gone and the plant is still closed. John Risley is still saying that Clearwater does not have quota. He even said that present groundfish management plans have clouded the future of the plant.

The people of Glace Bay want to meet with John Risley and the Fisheries Minister at the same time. They want some straight answers, and they want their jobs. Glace Bay has already lost important jobs in the mines and heavy water plants. People deserve some straight answers from their last major employer, Highland Fisheries.

NORTHUMBERLAND STRAIT—DUMPING OF PULP MILL WASTES

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, every day the Scott Maritimes Limited Pulp and Paper Mill in Pictou County dumps millions of gallons of waste into Boat Harbour in Northumberland Strait. The wastes are only treated mechanically before being discharged. The result is that waters in Boat Harbour have been virtually deprived of oxygen and are contaminated by polluting by-products of pulp and paper production. The Canso Chemicals Chlor-Alkali Plant, operated by C.I.L., Scott and Domtar, is a source of mercury pollution here too.

• (1405)

During the past 22 years 12 studies have been conducted by the federal and provincial Governments, but no action has been taken to stop the pollution. The people of Pictou County do not want any more studies or tests; they now want action.

We urge the Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan) and the Minister of Fisheries and Ocean (Mr. Siddon) to use Section 33 of the Fisheries Act and prosecute Scott Maritimes Limited whenever a violation occurs. The Government must start to practise what it preaches.

NATIONAL PARKS

PRINCE ALBERT NATIONAL PARK—WILDER FAMILY DONATION

Mr. Don Ravis (Saskatoon East): Mr. Speaker, last week I had the pleasure of representing the Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan) at the Prince Albert National Park to unveil a plaque to honour the Wilder family from Washington State.

The park preserves the memory of one of Canada's most famous conservationists—Grey Owl. Recently Edwin and Margery Wilder bequeathed to the Prince Albert National Park real estate valued at more than a half a million dollars, the largest donation ever made by private citizens to a Canadian national park.

This money will be used to maintain and preserve the Grey Owl wilderness area in perpetuity, thereby ensuring that the Grey Owl legacy continues to enrich future generations.

I am hopeful that more citizens will follow this example and join in the preservation of Canada's natural resources by supporting our national parks.

FINANCE

PROPOSED NATIONAL SALES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) has not made it clear to the people of Canada that after the next general election he plans to introduce a national sales tax, probably something in the 15 per cent range, so that after the next election, when people go out and buy school supplies, they will be paying this new federal sales tax; when they buy their children's toys, they will be paying the new federal sales tax; when they buy their kid's bike, they will be paying the federal sales tax; when they go out to a restaurant, they will be paying a tax on the restaurant meal; when they buy hockey tickets, they will be paying this new federal sales tax.

They will be paying a new federal sales tax every time they buy a new home or pay for home repairs. When they go bowling, they will pay the new federal sales tax; when they have their hair done, they will pay the new federal sales tax; when they go to a movie, they will pay this new federal sales tax; when they pay their child care, they will pay this new federal sales tax.

Ms. Copps: Isn't anything free?

Mr. Riis: When they pay for their legal fees, they will pay the new federal sales tax; when they fill out a will, they will pay the new federal sales tax; when they have their tax return completed, they will have to pay a federal sales tax on top of that; when they go to the dentist, they will have to pay a federal sales tax; when they have their oil changed and their spark plugs changed, they will have to pay a new federal sales tax; when they have a music lesson, their children will have to pay a national sales tax. It goes on and on and on. You can plainly see that there is a national sales tax on every business service in the country.

ESTABLISHMENT OF ROUGE VALLEY HERITAGE PARK URGED

Mr. W. Paul McCrossan (York—Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, the Rouge Valley system, located in York—Scarborough, is the last significant wildlife area remaining near Toronto. The area has a rich and diverse ecology, supporting a wide variety of birds, fish, mammals and reptiles. Regionally, rare plants and several important archaeological sites are also found in the valley.

Most of the land in the Rouge Valley is publicly owned. However, both the conservation authority and the provincial Government have indicated that they want to sell the land to private developers for luxury housing, and Metro Toronto has indicated it thinks the Rouge Valley would be the ideal site for a new dump.

Environmentalists in Canada and around the world have recognized the importance of the Rouge Valley ecosystem. Since local and provincial authorities appear unwilling to preserve the last remaining wildlife area near Toronto, it is time for the federal Government to indicate that it would be prepared to manage the area as our first Canadian heritage park.

FISHERIES

NEWFOUNDLAND AND LABRADOR INSHORE FISHERY

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, in the Province of Newfoundland and Labrador, Newfoundlanders, no matter where they lived, were shocked and angered by the response of the Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), Newfoundland's sole representative in the federal Cabinet, to questions raised in this House about the disastrous inshore fishery in the Province of Newfoundland and Labrador this year.

The Member for St. John's West calmly informed the House that he had toured St. John's West and found no evidence of an inshore fishery within that primarily city riding and, therefore, there was no problem in the entire Province of Newfoundland and Labrador.

The fishermen and fishermen's families in Newfoundland, whether they are in Burin—St. Georges, represented by the Minister's colleague, whether they are in Bonavista—Trinity—Conception, in western Newfoundland, Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe, whether they are in Labrador, know that there is hunger in their communities today and that fishermen's families are reeling from the double bang of low prices and an absence of fish in many communities.

They want a compassionate, caring, and sober response to the reality that besets them. Just as we properly and rightly responded to the need of farmers, primary producers, we must respond to the fishermen of Atlantic Canada today.

WESTERN DIVERSIFICATION PROGRAM

GOVERNMENT COMMITMENT TO WESTERN CANADA

Mr. William G. Lesick (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, let there be no question about it. The Western Diversification Program introduced in August of 1987 has been a resounding success in its first fiscal year of operation. Western Canada has made great strides forward in diversifying its economy as a result of this federal government program.

To date there have been 503 projects approved with over $345 million being allocated to the western economy. These results represent jobs and prosperity for all regions of the West. This program has also demonstrated the commitment of the Conservative Government to the economy and the people of western Canada.

AEROSPACE INDUSTRY

LOCATION OF PROPOSED SPACE AGENCY

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, once again the Conservatives are playing politics with the decision about where to locate the headquarters of the new Canadian space agency. Having gutted the National Research Council by spending cuts in 1985 and having ignored his election promises to expand research and development in Canada, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) is now trying to attract votes in Quebec by promising that the space agency will go to Montreal at the same time as he tries to hang on to votes in the Ottawa area by endlessly deferring the final decision.

The fact is that, while the Government has delayed this announcement, the work of the space agency has been taking place in the national capital area for the last two years. As an Ottawa Member, I think that the space agency should be located in the national capital region because this is where the work has been taking place. I also think that a competent Government would have made this decision two years ago rather than used it as a political football.

S. O. 21

People in Montreal and in Ottawa threw the Liberals out over the issues of favouritism and patronage in 1984, and I do not think they want the Conservative Government doing the same thing in 1988.

CHILD CARE AND UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—POLICY OF NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY

Mr. Léo Duguay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Leader of the NDP (Mr. Broadbent) outlined his policy on child care and criticized ours as "scatter-gun", "spending money in all kinds of ways", and said "it's all quite irrelevant". He promised to save Canadians $4.1 billion, and to change maternity benefits from 15 weeks to 28 weeks. However, he could not elaborate on either the savings or the costs of these changes. The Hon. Member for Vancouver East (Ms. Mitchell) quickly added that the maternity benefit changes would cost the Government nothing since they would be paid for by the employees and employers.

As the parliamentary task force of which she and I were members concluded, her "nothing" happens to be $1.8 billion over the next five years. His "irrelevant" includes $2.3 billion of tax savings for Canadians.

That is the NDP for you, Mr. Speaker. A $1.8 billion expenditure is nothing and a $2.3 billion tax saving is irrelevant. That is how NDP Members are going to help ordinary Canadians. They will label all expenditures irrelevant and all savings nothing. With them in control, as Manitobans well know, ordinary Canadians quickly become less than ordinary and a lot poorer.

TRIBUTE TO MID-EAST PEACEKEEPING CONTINGENT

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, hats off to the personnel in the Canadian Armed Forces who have worked so hard to put the United Nations Iraq-Iran military observer group together over a period of just a few days. Our professionals in the military community have once again proven that they can put a team together in short order, and they will once again display Canadian good-will and effectiveness at peacekeeping to the world at large.

The 495-person UN peacekeeping contingent was put together at Canadian Forces Base Petawawa and includes about 350 from that base, about 50 from Calgary, approximately 20 from CFB Kingston, and about 40 from reserve units across Canada.

Canadian peacekeeping had its beginning under the wise guidance and initiative of the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson, Canada's Foreign Affairs Minister when the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent was Prime Minister of Canada. Our Canadian service people will once again display their diplomacy, their professional soldier qualities and their ability to handle political problems and difficult challenges.

Canada and the world will be well served by the Canadian Armed Forces as they proceed to take over their observer and communications UN peacekeeping duties in Iraq and Iran, and this Parliament of Canada wishes them well as we express our appreciation to them.

POLITICAL PARTIES

LIBERAL PARTY—RESERVED QUEBEC RIDING NOMINATIONS

Mr. John Oostrom (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, the Liberal Party of Canada claims to be open to all who wish to join and participate. However, it is evident that this is a shallow and hollow claim. Let us examine the present situation in Quebec.

In that province a small clique determines who may and who may not seek a nomination. Ridings are reserved for different ethnic groups and candidates. Presently, Dr. Déry, who has signed up 1,400 members, is being denied the opportunity to seek the nomination in the riding of St. Laurent because it has been reserved for an as yet unknown parachute candidate.

The Leader of the Liberal Party (Mr. Turner) continually states that the Party is open to grassroots participation. However, the present situation in that province contradicts him. It is very apparent that democracy is only empty rhetoric to the Liberal Party and the reality is that only chosen friends need apply.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT—NIAGARA GRAPE GROWERS

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, at least in the Liberal Party there are people who want to run for nominations in Toronto.

I have here a four-quart basket of sour grapes that unfortunately the rules prevent me from delivering personally to every single Conservative on the Government side. However, I do have some farmers here from the Niagara Peninsula who know that the Government has victimized the grape and wine industry as a result of the trade deal, but for heaven's sake do not wait for the election to deliver on a pay-out package to those farmers who are hungry, who are going bankrupt, who are losing their jobs, and facing marital stress as a result of the Government's sell-out on the trade deal.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) promised those farmers would be compensated. They are here in the gallery today. They want to know where their compensation is. Or, are all they are going to get from this Government is another bunch of sour grapes?

POLITICAL PARTIES

LIBERAL PARTY—RESERVED QUEBEC RIDING NOMINATIONS

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, contrast if you would, Sir, the disgraceful and undignified free for all in Toronto with the much more genteel way of choosing Liberal candidates in Quebec. In the latter case special reserved places are held for the chosen few, carefully selected by the high party brass, while the common Liberal yobs are told to shut up and keep quiet. The only common thread between the two situations is the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition's (Mr. Turner) complete impotency in dealing effectively with either.

Is it any wonder, Sir, that electors in both Quebec and Toronto will be turning out in record numbers to vote Conservative in the next election?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

REGIONAL INDUSTRIAL EXPANSION

MANITOBA ALUMINUM SMELTER PROJECT

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. As we all know by now, last weekend the Prime Minister met with the Premier of Quebec and at the end of the meeting came out with a statement giving a guarantee of federal funding for an aluminum smelting project in his own riding. We now learn from a letter written by the Premier of Manitoba to the Prime Minister that the Premier of Manitoba also had a meeting three weeks ago with the Prime Minister and an aluminum smelter was discussed at that time, but with a difference. The Premier of Manitoba came out empty handed, no guarantee, no assurance, no support.

Mr. Masse: How do you know that?

Mr. Axworthy: Because Mr. Filmon says so.

Mr. Mazankowski: Nonsense.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, the question is one of fairness.

Mr. McDermid: What did you do with Alcan?

Mr. Axworthy: Even though poor Mr. Filmon could not get an answer, I wonder if we can get an answer today from the Government to our request.

Is the Government prepared to say today that it will offer a guarantee for the exact amount of support and funding for an aluminum smelter in Manitoba as it offered for the same smelter in the Prime Minister's riding in Quebec?

Mr. Holtmann: Naturally.

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say first that what we have here is a level playing field.

Ms. Copps: A what?

Mr. de Cotret: A level playing field. If we have a project in one region of the country or the other, we will deal with the project on an equal and equitable basis, whether it be Manitoba or Quebec. I would like to quote from the statement of the Prime Minister who said:

> "Yesterday in Montreal, I met with Premier Bourassa and we discussed the proposal to build an aluminum smelter that is now under study by an international consortium. Of course, the final decision will be made by the investors but the Premier and I agreed to promote Sept-Iles as the site for the proposed smelter. The federal government is monitoring this project's progress with great interest. This project, being studied by international investors of solid reputation would create many jobs and have a considerable economic impact on Sept-Iles, on the North Shore and on all of Québec. This is another example of how a stable political climate and open markets attract private investment."

That is in no way suggesting that we would not consider a similar project for Manitoba. Obviously we would.

• (1420)

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, this is the same Minister who, when asked similar questions about a year and a half ago about the CF-18 project, gave us assurances that there was no political interference. Yet every document since then has pointed out that the Prime Minister's hand was in that area.

REQUEST FOR FEDERAL FINANCIAL COMMITMENT

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, in a statement which was printed today the Chairman of Manitoba Hydro said that in order to ensure that the private investment for the aluminum smelter would take place in Manitoba the Government of Manitoba has requested up to $150 million of subsidies.

Mr. Crosbie: Better luck next time.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the Conservative Minister for Manitoba is contradicting the Conservative appointed Chairman of the Manitoba Hydro Board.

Mr. Epp (Provencher): That is not what I said.

Mr. Axworthy: It is too bad that the Conservatives cannot get together and agree on these simple facts.

Mr. Ransom has said that it would take up to $150 million. Is the Government prepared to answer that question? Are you going to give the commitment that there would be that kind of funding?

Mr. Speaker: I would ask Hon. Members to address their questions through the Chair. I hesitate very much to interrupt, but that is the rule. The Hon. Minister.

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make it very clear that we are working with a level playing field. We will look at any request from Manitoba in the same way as we would look at a request from any other province or any other region in this country. There is no difference in that respect. I do not understand why the Hon. Member keeps on insisting that we have a request that we do not have, and that we are not prepared to look at it. We will look at that request in a very serious manner.

In a letter sent by the Deputy Prime Minister very recently we stated very clearly—

Some Hon. Members: When?

Mr. de Cotret: Following questions on the issue. We said again that we will look at the project. There is no problem there. It is a level playing field for anybody. It is the same for everyone.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Minister says we are working with a level playing field. The rules of that level playing field apply very differently to the people in Manitoba than to people in another part of Canada. We have the CF-18 case before us and we know how biased the rules are on that level playing field.

PRIME MINISTER'S POSITION

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, the Minister says the Government will look at a project in Manitoba but the Prime Minister gave a guarantee for the project in his own riding. I want to know why the difference. Why the guarantee for a project in his own riding and only an offer to look at the project in Manitoba? Why the difference? Why do you not play fair with the people of Manitoba?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the premise of the question is totally false. I will quote again: "Of course the final decision will be made by the investors but the Premier and I agreed to promote Sept-Iles". The final decision will be made by the investors. That is what the Prime Minister said.

If there is a request made in the case of Manitoba, that request will be analyzed and decided upon according to the same rules that apply throughout the country from Newfoundland to British Columbia.

Mr. Axworthy: The same rules as on the CF-18?

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT—NIAGARA GRAPE GROWERS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade and concerns the impact that the Prime Minister's trade deal has had on the grape growers of the Niagara area of the country.

Over 16,000 jobs are dependant on this industry. Farmers were promised operating loans which they have not been able to get. Land values have dropped precipitously since last December. Grape growers are forecasting about 50 per cent of the price they got last year for their grapes. The industry and the whole region are in chaos.

Can the Minister for International Trade tell these grape growers when he is going to announce a program to compensate them for the loss of the industry?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the grape growing industry of Ontario had problems long before the U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement was negotiated. It had a problem because of the finding of a panel of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade which Members of the House know was made earlier this year.

• (1425)

That industry have had problems for a number of years because there has been a surplus of lower quality grapes produced in Ontario every year that has required a program of government assistance to get rid of the surplus. These problems are present in the Ontario industry.

The Government has entered into an agreement with the Government of British Columbia for a grape adjustment assistance program in that province. There are negotiations under way at the present time between the Government of Ontario and our Government to try to devise a similarly satisfactory agreement for the grape industry in Ontario.

These matters are proceeding. It takes the two Governments to reach a satisfactory adjustment program, which we hope will be accomplished. We are doing our share.

Ms. Copps: Bull.

Mr. Crosbie: We are taking the initiative and we hope a generous and adequate program will come out of the consultations between these two Governments.

FEDERAL ASSISTANCE—TAX QUERY

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, it is clear that the Government does not know what it is doing on this adjustment program. The Minister of Agriculture admitted last week that he did not even know whether the adjustment program would be subject to income tax. That is a pretty important issue for these producers.

More important, the producers in Niagara want to know if the Government is prepared to give at least the $156 million of assistance that was forecast to be their losses to cover even half which is forecast to be taken out of the industry, plus assistance for the other half. Will the Minister give a commitment that at least $156 million will be provided to take 11,000 acres out of production and state whether or not that assistance will be taxable? Will he give at least that amount of information today?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I would only hope that the hon. gentleman would make some representations to the Government of Ontario—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gauthier: Pass the buck.

Mr. Foster: Whose trade deal is this?

Ms. Copps: It is your trade deal.

Mr. Crosbie: —a government to which he is very close, to encourage that Government to do the right thing and be as generous in this approach as the Government of Canada.

Mr. Foster: It is your trade deal.

Mr. Crosbie: The basic problems afflicting the Ontario grape industry are as a result of the GATT panel report—

Mr. Foster: That is bull.

Mr. Crosbie: —that found provincial liquor board practices to be unfair trade under international trade rules.

Ms. Copps: Sour grapes, Crosbie.

Mr. Crosbie: It is the GATT approach that the Official Opposition favours. That is where the main problem arises.

Ms. Copps: That is totally false.

Mr. Crosbie: We are prepared to do our share, and a very generous share, of assisting the Ontario industry. We need the help and assistance of the Ontario Government. Put some pressure on the Ontario Government.

Mr. Foster: That is totally false. The free trade deal went out first.

Some Hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. McDermid: Get your facts straight.

Ms. Copps: Stop spreading manure.

Mr. Speaker: I might just say quietly that the Hon. Member for Algoma will undoubtedly have another occasion to pursue this matter, along with his colleagues. The Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Birds Hill.

REGIONAL INDUSTRIAL EXPANSION

QUEBEC AND MANITOBA ALUMINUM SMELTER PROJECTS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg—Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for Regional Industrial Expansion. How can he claim with any degree of intellectual and political honesty that the Government is creating a level playing field when the Prime Minister, according to the quote which the Minister himself read to the House, has agreed to promote Sept-Iles as the site of an aluminum smelter? Does the Minister believe that investors who, he claims, will make the final decision, exist in a vacuum? Does he think that they do not read the papers or pay attention to the House of Commons? Does he think they will not notice that the Prime Minister has agreed to promote a certain location? Is that what he calls a level playing field?

• (1430)

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I would like to be very, very clear on this issue.

Some Hon. Members: We would like you to, too.

Mr. de Cotret: We will give equal consideration to a request that could come for a smelter in Manitoba and one that could come for a smelter in Quebec. I would like to make it very clear that these are not competing projects. I do not know where the Hon. Members opposite got that idea.

We will give equal consideration, fair consideration, to both projects and both projects could go ahead.

I really fail to see the point of the argument which the Hon. Member is trying to raise, Mr. Speaker. It will be a level playing field and both could go ahead.

REQUEST THAT PRIME MINISTER PROMOTE MANITOBA SITE

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg—Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, the Government continues to maintain that there has been no request from Manitoba, no proposal. But that simply is not the case.

If the Minister is serious about this level playing field, will the Prime Minister be making a statement to the effect that he is prepared to promote, to use the words the Minister used here in the House, Manitoba as a site for equal consideration? We know what equal consideration means. We got that with the CF-18.

Is the Prime Minister willing to promote Manitoba as a site in the same way that he is willing to promote Sept-Îles?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member keeps on referring obliquely to the fact that there is a kind of competition here. There is no competition. It is not a question of Manitoba versus Quebec. There can easily be two smelters. There is easily the potential for two smelters and we will consider both requests on an equal basis. Everybody will be treated equitably in this question. There is no difficulty with that.

All I am saying is that we will wait until we have the full documentation on both projects and, if they both go ahead, so much the better. It will mean more jobs throughout Canada.

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg—Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Regional and Industrial Expansion.

On what basis does he make the claim that there is no competition between these two proposals? Does the Minister have a study that is available to the House and to the various Governments that shows the rationale behind the Prime Minister's statement in Quebec and the rationale behind the Minister's statement here today that there is no competition?

Is there any intelligence behind this, or is it just the electioneering of the Prime Minister in Quebec, Mr. Speaker?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I would like to know whether the Hon. Member opposite is against this kind of project anywhere in the country.

We are going to deal with the requests that we receive when we receive them, on an equal and equitable basis. We must have the requests in before we can give an answer, and we do not have them.

I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that these requests will be dealt with equitably whether they be in Québec, in Manitoba, in B.C., in Newfoundland or in any other province in this country. There is room for more than one. We have no problems with that. It is a level playing field. We will look at the requests as they come in and hopefully we will be able, through the initiative of private investors in this area, to create more jobs throughout the country again.

FREE TRADE

CLOSURE OF SIMONDS PLANT IN GRANBY—REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade and is further to the questions I asked him yesterday about the 131 victims of the spirit of free trade who were laid off by the Simonds Company.

This morning, the workers read the Minister's advertising, which says, "Let's be prepared to take advantage of free trade. Canadians are getting ready for free trade and the Government of Canada is there to help them."

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the 131 Simonds workers, what is the Canadian Government prepared to do for those who are losing their jobs because the plant is being transferred to the United States, according to the good principles of free trade? What is the Government ready to announce for these workers?

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, as I surmised yesterday the Hon. Member's facts were entirely wrong. The company in question, which is known as Simonds Industries Inc., has four plants.

It has two plants in the U.S. and two in Canada. For reasons of economy and efficiency the company has decided to close one in Canada to consolidate operations in the east, and to close one in Portland, Oregon, consolidating its production in the west in the company's plant in Vancouver, B.C. The company will end up with two plants instead of four, one in Vancouver and one in the United States, rather than having four plants.

In addition, I am told that Toronto will be the location for a new warehouse and distributing centre for the company as well as being the site of the Canadian head office, and that a president has been appointed for the Canadian company.

It is a complete tissue of fabrication that the plant in question is closing because of any connection to the U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement. Tell the truth. If you are going to go to the people, start to learn to tell the truth.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I think that is some consolation prize for the 131 unemployed workers to know that there will be a warehouse in Toronto! If that is the kind of economy he wants to build, that is not what we want!

REQUEST FOR ADJUSTMENT AND EARLY RETIREMENT PROGRAMS

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, in advertising paid for by the Government of Canada with taxpayers' money, the Government offers assistance to victims of free trade.

What I am asking the Minister is: What else has he to offer these 131 unemployed workers? Having a warehouse in Toronto will not feed their families next week.

I want to know from the Minister where the adjustment programs are. Where are the early retirement programs? What is he offering these families, instead of stupid answers like those he has given us since yesterday?

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, all of our government programs will be available to assist anyone laid off as a result of this decision of a private company to consolidate its operations in the interests of the over-all company's productivity.

Operations will continue with one plant operating in western Canada and closing one in the western United States, one plant operating in Massachusetts and unfortunately closing one here in Canada. It has no connection with the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement which is not even in effect yet. It is not suggested by the company that it has any connection, and the hon. gentleman deliberately distorted the facts when he brought that up. No amount of subterfuge can conceal the fact that you do not wish to tell the truth. You are following your Leader. You do not want to tell the truth.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Essex-Windsor.

GRAPE GROWING INDUSTRY

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister for International Trade who spoke against a closure motion in 1981 when he was not a Minister. In the course of that speech against closure he said:

> "Where are the people with the grapes in their district? They do not care what happens to the grape industry—"

Let me ask the Minister as he sits there with grapes on his desk, is he not the person who now doesn't care about the grape industry in this country?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the fact is that three years ago the European Community made a complaint to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, loved and supported by the Liberal and New Democratic opposition Parties. They love the GATT. They hate the U.S.-Canada relationship but they love GATT and all 96 countries that belong to GATT.

The European Community laid a complaint before GATT that our provincial liquor board practices with reference to liquor and wine were unfair and discriminated against those competing from outside. During the three year period a GATT panel found against a Canadian province, Ontario, and the rules had to be changed—

• (1440)

Ms. Copps: After the trade deal was announced.

Mr. Crosbie: —and the protection given to the grape growers by Ontario and other provinces has to end. It does not matter whether the U.S.-Canada agreement never goes through. If it never sees the light of day, grape growers in Ontario are in trouble. We are doing our best to help them, not Members opposite who do not give a darn about them.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, that is totally false.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Langdon: The agreement which was signed with the United States came first. It also put a much faster situation into place to which grape growers had to adjust.

Why is the Minister trying to distort the facts in front of the country? Why is he trying to distort the facts in front of grape growers who are here and who will be able to tell him and tell the country that he is wrong?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman opposite would not be able to tell the truth if it came up and smacked him right in the chops. He would not recognize it.

Ms. Copps: Sit down you buffoon.

Mr. Cassidy: Why do you not clean up your act?

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Minister is getting very close to crossing the fine line between colourful language and accusing another Member of not being able to tell the truth, which is pretty close to saying that the Hon. Member is doing something else. I ask the Hon. Minister and other Hon. Members in this Chamber to restrain themselves.

Some Hon. Members: Withdraw!

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, we are subjected to a campaign of untruthfulness from persons who, whether or not they know it, are telling untruths.

Three years ago the European Community took Canada—

Ms. Copps: Quit lying!

Mr. Crosbie: —to the GATT. The GATT found that provincial practices on pricing, listing and distribution discriminate against imports of alcoholic beverages and are inconsistent with GATT rules. We have to go back to the GATT by the end of 1988 to report how we are now complying with international GATT trade rules which both Parties opposite support. So the grape growers of Ontario and British Columbia are in difficulty in large part because of the GATT to which 96 countries belong and to which we cannot afford not to belong. That is the truth. Those are the facts, whether you are capable of realizing it or not.

EDUCATION

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION—FOLLOW-UP TO SASKATOON CONFERENCE

Mr. Don Ravis (Saskatoon East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. Last October nearly 600 people representing students, labour, industry, and educators met in Saskatoon at the National Forum on Post-Secondary Education. I am aware that the Minister's predecessor met with provincial Ministers at a later date.

Can the Minister tell this House what type of follow-up action students and educators can expect from him since he has recently assumed this portfolio?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Secretary of State of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the Saskatoon Forum called for closer federal-provincial co-operation on post-secondary education. We have achieved this. I met the Ministers of Education of Canada in Québec last June. We have also met many groups representing colleges, universities, professors and teachers. That was the first time ever that consultation involving both levels of government took place.

We must also recall that the Saskatoon Forum called for action on post-secondary education. We are now tackling specific issues in co-operation with the provinces, for example, improving accessibility to student aid, increasing support to university research, and supporting better research and information on post-secondary education.

I intend to have another meeting with provincial ministers next fall. This is just a start. Contrary to the past we are now creating a new partnership with governments and with the private sector on post-secondary education.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FISHERIES

NEWFOUNDLAND AND LABRADOR INSHORE FISHERY

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Acting Minister of Fisheries. Yesterday the Minister dismissed reports of an inshore fishery failure in the Province of Newfoundland and Labrador by saying that all is well in the Minister's own riding of St. John's West and therefore all is well in all of Newfoundland and Labrador.

I want to ask the Minister whether he has managed in the last 24 hours to shed that callous and, I suggest, arrogant attitude, to discover that inshore fishermen on the Burin Peninsula on the south coast of the province, inshore fishermen on the Labrador coast in the north, inshore fishermen in the Straits of Belle Isle and, indeed, elsewhere in the province are having a very difficult year this year and are in desperate financial straits.

Given that the Minister has probably had 24 hours to recognize reality rather than the fantasy of his own visit to St. John's West, will he now say to the fishermen, primary producers, that help is coming from the federal Government? Or is he telling them all to move to St. John's West?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Hon. Member said that there was a disastrous failure of the inshore fishery in the Province of Newfoundland and Labrador this year. That is absolutely untrue.

Here are the figures. The over-all landings and landed values for the Newfoundland region for the period January to July have increased over the same period in 1987. Inshore cod landings and values are estimated at 90,000 metric tonnes so far this year and $40 million, compared to 59,000 metric tonnes and $28 million in 1987. Capelin landings and values in 1988 show a dramatic increase with 78,000 metric tonnes compared to 32,000 last year, with landed values up to $28 million from $7 million. Total crab landings have gone up by a $2 million increase in landed values.

There is no disastrous failure. There are some areas in which there has been a poor fishery. Where there has been a poor fishery and if the fishery does not improve—and we are only half way through the year yet—this Government, as always, will be prepared to bring in special measures of assistance to help, through employment programs or otherwise if that is necessary. But the over-all fishery in the Newfoundland inshore fishery this year from the facts, from the figures—not from the fiction—is far better than it was last year. The hon. gentleman should stop getting up in this House with specious nonsense and falsehoods.

REQUEST FOR FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, is that not just like the Hon. Member for St. John's

West? He calls his corporate friends to get the total landings, but he does not bother to inform the House that the price of fish is half what it was last year and fishermen's incomes are halved. Many fishermen have had no landings whatsoever in significant areas of the province. I am not interested in the statistics—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Tobin: —I am interested in people, fishermen and their families.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member can complete his question.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, my question is a straightforward one, a very straightforward one. Given that fishermen are primary producers, just as farmers are primary producers, and given that the price of fish is half what it was last year, and in some areas there have been no landings whatsoever, will the fishermen of Atlantic Canada, and in particular those in Newfoundland and Labrador most severely affected, be treated exactly the same as the farmers of the country and be offered financial compensation? It was right and proper in the case of farmers. We saluted it. It is right and proper in the case of fishermen. Why will you not announce it?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I just gave the figures to show the increase in landed value of the fish caught this year. In cod it is up from $28 million, compared to the first six months of last year, to $40 million this year. The fishermen are getting $40 million so far this year rather than $28 million—

Mr. Tobin: The fishermen are not. They are getting half the price. You are lying to the House.

Mr. Crosbie: —for the landed value of cod. In capelin it is up from $7 million to $28 million. In crab it has gone from $8 million to $10 million. We have a program, a Newfoundland inshore fisheries agreement, infusing $60 million into the fishery over the next five years. We are spending $10.7 million this year in capital projects in harbours, and infrastructures.

• (1450)

In any particular area where there is a disastrous inshore fishery we will continue to assist as we have done in past years. The over-all inshore fishery in Newfoundland this year is better than last year. The hon. gentleman is totally and maliciously wrong in what he says.

HEALTH

LEAD CONTENT OF GASOLINE

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Health who will know that evidence is mounting and is coming from a variety of sources that lead in quantities smaller than heretofore thought is harmful to human health, and particularly to the development of children.

Will the Minister admit that the Government's plans to reduce the lead in gasoline are too little and too slow? Will he announce that the Government will speed up the removal of lead from gasoline to improve the health of Canadians, especially children?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as the Hon. Member has indicated, the Government of Canada has put forward a program to remove lead from gasoline by 1992, and the responsibility falls particularly within the Ministry of the Environment, but not exclusively.

Recently a study was presented to the Minister of the Environment and myself respecting the program for lead removal by 1992, as well as the effect of lead on the development of children, especially infants. The Department is examining that information, and I have asked for recommendations relative to that report.

CHILDREN'S EXPOSURE TO LEAD

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same Minister. The latest estimates are that half a million Canadian children are at risk from present levels, and indeed these may be low estimates given the harm that lead does to the development of children.

Will the Minister confirm the figure that half a million children are over-exposed to lead and that their development might be harmed, or does the Minister have another figure that he could give us as to exactly how many children are being harmed by exposure to lead today?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I cannot dispute that figure or confirm it. It was in a report that was given to two Departments and, as I already mentioned, to two Ministers.

I wish to tell the Hon. Member with respect to lead removal, and I am not putting forward that other action might not be considered with regard to gasoline, that also lead soldering in containers, especially containers for baby food and infant formulas, is being examined.

I have asked my Department for further recommendations following not only that report but other work that has been done in the Government respecting lead poisoning.

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT ACCELERATE LEAD REMOVAL DEADLINE

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and it also concerns leaded gasoline. I wish to obtain from the Minister an answer that would indicate to us whether he is willing to accelerate the deadline for reducing lead in gasoline from the planned date of 1993 to 1990, as it was originally indicated as a feasible and possible date by the Royal Society of Canada. Is the Minister willing to give us that commitment today?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to give that commitment. As I said to the Hon. Member for Broadview—Greenwood, that report had been given to us. The effective date is December 31, 1992.

The Minister of the Environment and I have asked our respective Departments for further recommendations, and I cannot go beyond that at the present time.

MINISTER'S POSITION

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same Minister. Will the Minister at least indicate to the House when he will report to the House indicating his decision in light of the additional study that he has requested, considering the fact that a number of studies that have been conducted on the subject north and south of the border indicate that lead is a very poisonous element in human blood?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I want to ensure that we understand the manner in which the word "study" is being used. I did not ask for a further study as to the validity of lead poisoning. The evidence is quite clear, and that is not the argument, but rather if changes were to be made, or additional steps to be taken with respect to lead poisoning, what would be the various administrative details that we would have to consider, plus any other considerations. It is in that area that I have asked for further information rather than a further study confirming what we already know in terms of lead poisoning.

ENERGY

SALE OF TEXACO CANADA

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy. I am sure the Minister is aware that last Thursday the Petroleum Monitoring Agency published a report that stated in the last two years Canadian ownership in petroleum has declined by some 5 per cent, and Canadian control in petroleum has declined by some 13 per cent.

In light of the objective of the federal Government to have some 50 per cent Canadian ownership in the petroleum industry, I wonder if the Minister, as the Minister in charge of energy in this country, and considering that Texaco Canada is now for sale, can tell us what he is doing to ensure that this corporation is Canadianized in order to restore some of the balance and meet the objective of the Government that 50 per cent of the petroleum industry is Canadian owned.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the statistics published by the Petroleum Monitoring Agency show the direction in which the petroleum industry is going. Some years it may be going in one direction and other years in another direction, but this does not in any way affect the objectives and goals pursued by the Government of Canada with respect to the Canadianization of the upstream component of our petroleum industry. As for Texaco, Mr. Speaker, for the time being this is a private transaction that will take place in accordance with the regulatory system existing in this country, especially if it includes investments in Canada.

ROLE OF INVESTMENT CANADA

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, in light of the fact that control of the petroleum industry in this country by Canadians has declined by a sharp 13 per cent in two years, which is very significant, is the Minister now contemplating giving any special instructions to Investment Canada to ensure when Texaco Canada—which is foreign controlled—is sold, that it is sold to Canadians in order to Canadianize the industry?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, that is not exactly the way business transactions are handled in a free enterprise country. If there is any reason for Investment Canada to be consulted and to intervene, this will involve the co-operation of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister responsible for Investment Canada.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT—GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of International Trade. Today Canadians were shocked to learn that the Government increased the free trade advertising budget by an additional $6 million after public opinion polls indicated that an increasing number of Canadians were against the Prime Minister's trade deal.

If the Prime Minister's trade deal with the United States is so great why must we spend another $6 million to convince ourselves that surrendering our sovereignty to another country is in our best interests? How can the Prime Minister justify this? How can the Minister justify this?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, this is an example of the type of devious tactics that are being used by hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. gentleman's question comes from a report in The Globe and Mail today which received the information under the Freedom of Information Act. It refers to last year's budget for free trade communications where a special audit was done that gave us the assurance that all tax dollars were spent properly. As the House knows, last year a total of $16 million was spent. The article and the information detail and outline what was spent. The free trade printing cost $6 million.

Every inquiry and poll in Canada shows that the public wants more information on the free trade agreement, and by golly we are going to see that they get it. They got it last year, and it cost money to print; and they are going to get it this year, so that they will get the truth, the facts, and not the deceit and deception of hon. creatures like the hon. gentleman opposite.

Mr. Boudria: It has been said that the opposite to the truth has never been stated with greater accuracy, and that would apply today.

[Translation]

COST OF TRADE AGREEMENT—REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT JUSTIFY EXPENDITURES

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): I would like to put a supplementary to the Minister. So far, the Prime Minister's trade agreement has cost Canadians a total of $44 million: $20 million for the negotiating team, $14 million for advertising and now another $14 million to convince Canadians that handing over their sovereignty to the United States of America is in their best interests.

How can the Minister justify this kind of spending? How can he justify spending taxpayers' money on advertisements of the kind referred to by the Hon. Member for Shefford earlier today, in which Canadians are asked to believe statements that are utterly false?

• (1500)

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. gentleman asked me about the Hon. Member for Shefford. I have in my hand a Canadian Press report wherein a Granby Simonds official, J. P. Patry, said there is no connection between the plant closing and the trade deal. Patry, the plant controller and a native of Granby, also said he would have no stake in protecting the parent company since he is one of the 131 workers who will be laid off.

The hon. gentleman, knowing of this statement by this official who will be laid off himself, got up in the House with deliberate deception and suggested that the Granby plant was being closed because of the free trade agreement—deliberate deception of the Hon. Member for Shefford, deliberate.

RAILWAYS

SURVIVAL OF MONTREAL SOUTH SHORE LINES—REQUEST FOR MORATORIUM

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed either to the Deputy Prime Minister or the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport. It concerns the survival of Montreal's south shore commuter railway line. Since the line between Beloeil and Montreal's Central Station is suppose to close on August 31, is the federal Government prepared to pay the cost of a moratorium on the closing, to give a federal- provincial task force time to examine ways in which these lines can be maintained on a permanent basis, with the support of the federal, provincial and municipal governments?

[English]

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the Cabinet would not be in a position to make a decision like that at the moment because, under the new National Transportation Act, there is a process the NTA goes through. A railway applies to abandon. Anyone who is interested can appear at public hearings. The NTA then has certain guidelines it can follow in determining whether a line is economical or uneconomical. It can be kept on. Interested parties can purchase the short railway and run it themselves. A huge number of possibilities can occur under the new National Transportation Act that Parliament recently passed.

As well, over-all the railways are limited to a 4 per cent reduction each year. Change is inevitable in certain instances simply because the dynamics of Canada are changing vis-à-vis railway and other methods of transport. Parliament put a 4 per cent maximum on the reduction and I thought that was pretty wise.

[Translation]

RETENTION OF RAILWAY SERVICES FOR SUBURBAN AREAS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

M. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): The Parliamentary Secretary says that change is inevitable. I am sure the Parliamentary Secretary never travelled on one of these trains from Montreal's south shore. They go back to 1925, have no washrooms or heating and are among the oldest trains in this country. Will the Government make a commitment to maintain commuter railway services in the Montreal region? If so, will the federal Government participate in a joint program with the Government of Quebec and Montreal region municipalities to maintain these commuter services and thus prevent the closing of the Saint-Hilaire line which will otherwise disappear on August 31?

[English]

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, at the appropriate moment there is no doubt that the Government will be prepared to consider any type of combination of possibilities. If an area is in trouble, it is because people are no longer using the service, whether it is VIA Rail service or traffic service, because they have often moved to other modes. That is the reality of the market-place.

CN finds itself in a position where some one-third of its lines carry over 90 per cent of its traffic. That means that two-thirds of its lines are carrying only one-third of its traffic. It simply cannot carry that on and be competitive with the trucking system that is becoming very sophisticated in Canada.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT—ONTARIO GRAPE GROWERS

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture. Recently the Minister announced an adjustment program for the grape growers of the Province of British Columbia. Why has the Government not made a similar adjustment for the grape growers of the Province of Ontario?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, this Government is fully committed to a policy and a process of consultation with provincial governments and with producers, wherever they may be. We are pleased by the results of those negotiations with the Government and the producers of British Columbia. As the Hon. Member for Erie has indicated, the results were announced some time ago when a package of some $28 million was announced.

I want to make it very clear that there is an offer on the table with respect to the difficulties the producers are encountering here in the Province of Ontario, difficulties which they are encountering for a variety of reasons that have already been discussed at some length during Question Period today. The federal Government has put an offer on the table. The provincial government is currently looking at that offer and I would hope that there could be a resolution to this problem in the not too distant future. In fact, I would hope it would come very soon.

I would also point out that we as a Government are fully committed to the process of keeping producers informed, wherever they may be, including the producers who I understand are here today. I also understand that Department of Agriculture officials have announced that they would be happy to meet with the producers to whom the Hon. Member for Hamilton East has referred, but I regret that apparently that offer has not been accepted.

Ms. Copps: That is false, Mr. Speaker, that is false.

An Hon. Member: That is a lie. That is a lie.

Mr. Speaker: I do not know who said that, but it does not help the Chamber and it does not help the Speaker. I will not pursue it further, but please, it is not necessary.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PROPOSED ACQUISITION OF NUCLEAR POWERED SUBMARINES

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, the Government, and in particular the Minister of National Defence, used to grandstand all over in Canada and in NATO circles telling everyone they were going to bring on stream 10 to 12 nuclear powered submarines by the year 2012, 24 years after this Government will have been defeated. The rhetoric has really cooled of late and silence seems to be the order of the day. The Government has long passed the date it said it was going to make an announcement.

Is the Government now prepared to admit that it was wrong and that it will no longer proceed with this ill-conceived idea?

Mr. Bud Bradley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member raises a very serious question, as he is well aware. I would be interested to know if the Hon. Member is now showing that he no longer supports such a move by the Government of Canada to modernize Canada's Armed Forces.

I think the Hon. Member will find that it is Canada's intent to modernize its navy and to provide its navy with the best technical equipment available. I think he will also be aware that the Minister of National Defence stated very recently that the announcement would be made soon.

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, that answer is the square root of nothing. The Hon. Member knows that I support the Armed Forces and the refurbishing of them. However, this Party does not support nuclear submarines.

Will the Government proceed with this $8 billion ill-conceived purchase of 10 to 12 nuclear powered submarines or will it not? That is the question. Perhaps the Parliamentary Secretary could come to the answer, stop the grandstanding and tell the people of Canada where he stands.

Mr. Bud Bradley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would be very pleased to tell the Hon. Member where I stand. I stand with this Government in supporting Canada's Armed Forces and in replacing their ill-equipped vessels which were given to them and not replaced by previous Governments. We will provide the navy with the required weapons systems.

I notice that the Hon. Member says that he supports but his Party does not. I wonder if he supports a submarine program or if he is talking through his hat.

Mr. Speaker: That concludes Question Period.

PRIVILEGE

MR. LAPIERRE—ALLEGED INCORRECT INFERENCE IN CHAMBER

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I feel I must raise a question of privilege, because during Oral Question Period the Minister for International Trade (Mr. Crosbie) let his emotions get the best of him and finally impugned my motives. Mr. Speaker, I think we should realize that every statement made in the Simonds case is connected with the concept of free trade, and even the company itself has made statements to the effect that in future it would cover the North American market from its plant in Massachusetts.

Mr. Speaker, I did not want to mislead the House, far from it! I think that the arguments put forward by the company, by the Opposition and even by free trade supporters . . . I would like to quote to the Minister what was said by, the PQ MNA for Shefford: "Manufacturing of knives and tools will be transferred to Fitchburg, Massachusetts in . . .

• (1510)

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the Hon. Member but if he wants to raise a question of privilege, the Chair must have a very clear position. I would appreciate the Hon. Member's co-operation.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I cannot make my position any clearer: It is that the Minister of International Trade (Mr. Crosbie) be asked to have the strength of character to withdraw the fact that he questioned my motives or that he said we voluntarily misled the House.

I can say one thing, Mr. Speaker. Not only was it not done voluntarily, but we did not mislead the House at all. The Minister refuses to face the facts, and instead of reacting like a hard-hearted nouveau riche, he should realize what it means to those 131 people to lose their jobs.

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, if the Hon. Member says that he did not have this information or he did not deliberately mislead the House, then I will accept that. However, he certainly did mislead the House, because I have just cited a person working in the company at Granby who was quite clear in his position. He is one of the persons being laid off, and he said that there is no connection between the plant closing and the trade deal. If the hon. gentleman said that he did not know about that at the time, fine. I will withdraw my suggestion, if there was one, that he deliberately misled the House.

Mr. Speaker: I will hear the Hon. Member for Windsor West and I note that the Hon. Member for Hamilton East is rising. I want to advise the House, and I think that I should do so, that I have a fairly complex question of privilege from the Hon. Member for Halifax West, and I will be hearing that as well. In the meantime, I will hear the Hon. Member for Windsor West.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, it had been my intention—and I usually notice this during the Question Period—to raise a point of order on what I consider to be the use of unparliamentary language by the Minister for International Trade (Mr. Crosbie) during the Question Period.

Mr. Crosbie: Give me some examples.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): I want to draw to your attention that at one point in the Question Period the Minister for International Trade used the words "deliberately distort" with respect to a question posed by a Member on this side, and later in the Question Period he used the words "deliberate deception" with respect to remarks made in the Question Period by the Hon. Member for Shefford (Mr. Lapierre).

Mr. Speaker: Once again in order to assist the Chair, the Hon. Member cited two instances, do they occur in the same exchange between the Hon. Member for Shefford and the Minister? I only ask that because the Minister has risen and said that if he contravened the rules he withdraws. I just want to know where we are here.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): I am talking about two separate instances in the Question Period, separated by some minutes of time. The Hon. Minister for International Trade, in responding to the Hon. Member for Shefford, did make some comments about the second instance to which I referred, concerning the Minister's use of the words "deliberate deception". He said, "If the Member for Shefford now says that he was mistaken, he", that is the Minister for International Trade, "withdraws the words 'deliberate deception'".

I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that it is unparliamentary for the Minister for International Trade to use the words "deliberate deception", whether or not there was an explanation given by the Hon. Member for Shefford which the Minister found satisfactory. Even if the Hon. Member for Shefford had not said anything, it would have been improper and unparliamentary for the Minister for International Trade to use the words "deliberate deception".

If you look at page 106 of Beauchesne's, you will see—

Mr. Speaker: I can assist the Hon. Member. I do not need quotes from Beauchesne's. I accept the proposition that the Hon. Member for Windsor West is putting to me. He is a Member with very great experience in this House. The use of words "deliberate deception" is just like calling somebody a liar. I accept that. I do not need any quotes from Beauchesne's.

Would the Hon. Member complete his comments, please, for the assistance of the Chair?

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Therefore I also want to ask you to give attention to the use—earlier in the Question Period on a separate occasion—of the words "deliberately distort" by the Minister for International Trade. This has also been ruled on several occasions by distinguished predecessors to you, Mr. Speaker, to be unparliamentary. I therefore respectfully call on you to insist that the Minister withdraw, unequivocally and unreservedly, those words.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate those comments from the Hon. Member for Windsor West. The Hon. Minister has already, I think, dealt with at least part of the complaint, but I would hear the Hon. Minister.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, let us get this quite clear. I believe that there is a deliberate campaign by the Official Opposition and the New Democratic Party deliberately to distort and deceive with reference to the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement. That is my position.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Now, if Your Honour feels that to say that is unparliamentary, I will withdraw it in this Chamber but I will repeat it outside the Chamber. There is no doubt in my mind that it is a campaign of deliberate distortion and deceit that is going on in this connection.

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the Hon. Minister to do this to assist the Chair. Whatever the Hon. Minister may think about the strategy or tactics of another Party, that may well be his or somebody else's opinion, but in this Chamber we cannot use those words about a Member. Perhaps the Hon. Minister could assist the Chair in making it clear that, whatever he may think of the strategy or tactics or pronunciations or campaign of another Party, he is not applying those words to any Hon. Member in the Chamber.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to make your task difficult, so I therefore withdraw the words that you say offend the rules.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the Hon. Member. The Hon. Member for Hamilton East.

ALLEGED REMARKS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I am also rising on a question of privilege, and it deals with a false statement made by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Clark). I am not going to debate the substance of most of what he said because most of what he said is certainly in my mind not true, but he definitely stated a falsehood about me when he said that my office had refused to have a meeting with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise).

In fact, the facts are as follows. We contacted the Prime Minister's Office to see if we could have a meeting with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) so that he would follow through on his promise to the grape growers. He bounced us off to the office of the Minister of Agriculture, and the Minister of Agriculture was unavailable. We suggested that if a mutual time could be set up in the future for a meeting between the grape growers and the Minister of Agriculture, the grape growers would be very happy to come back to Ottawa. So, please, do not spread falsehoods.

Mr. Speaker: I wanted to say something on the past exchange. I understand that it is one of your colleagues who has been here for a good many years, and at times we all perhaps go beyond the mark, but I do want to thank Hon. Members for the way that they have dealt with this matter, and I thank the Hon. Minister for his complete withdrawal. I should have made a point of that before hearing the Hon. Member for Hamilton East. I apologize to Hon. Members and to the Minister for that.

However, I am now listening to the complaint of the Hon. Member for Hamilton East, and I recognize the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary in reply.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, perhaps it would be most useful in exchanges such as this one if various Members involved were to wait until they had a chance to see the "blues" in order to verify what was and was not said. Having said that, however, the Hon. Member for Hamilton East (Ms. Copps) has risen and I think to some degree has put words in my mouth, but I will let the record speak to that itself.

What I said—and I chose my words very carefully—was that we as a Government were very much committed to a process of consultation with provincial governments and with producer groups. I reported to the House, through you, Mr. Speaker, that the Department of Agriculture officials had offered to meet with the grape growers who had been referred to earlier in the House by the Hon. Member for Hamilton East, and that offer had been declined.

Ms. Copps: That is totally false.

• (1520)

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I can assist the Hon. Member for Hamilton East and the House. I will look very carefully at what Hansard reports. If it is appropriate I will come back into the Chamber with this matter. If I need any further assistance from Hon. Members I will call for it.

The Hon. Minister on a point of order.

POINT OF ORDER

A GIFT OF GREEN GRAPES

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I want to object to the production and sending of these sour grapes which were sent to me during Question Period. If we are going to start throwing fruit around during Question Period we will not be having very fruitful Question Periods because the grapes of wrath will seize the House.

Are we going to permit the production of these kinds of exhibits? A rotting salmon was brought in at one time, or was it a mackerel?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, we saved 400,000 spawners.

Mr. Crosbie: You did? I do not know whether this will save the grape industry, but I do not believe this should be carried around the House by pages, and not with notes.

Ms. Copps: Why do you not read the note?

Mr. Crosbie: The note says: "Please tell the truth and help the trade victims". That is an allegation that I do not tell the truth, but I am not going to bring it up because we have had enough of that today.

Mr. Speaker: I am terribly grateful to the Hon. Minister for not bringing it up.

The Chair noticed that there was a basket of grapes in the House some time ago. Messages were sent to the Member who seemed to be the owner of the basket of grapes. The basket of grapes was then put underneath the Member's desk. How the grapes got from there to the Hon. Minister I do not know, but I must say that the Hon. Minister is absolutely right. It is not according to the rules to pass grapes or other things like that back and forth across the House, and most certainly it is less than elegant to send notes such as the note of which the Hon. Minister complains. The note was, I take it, a private communication and was not brought to the attention of the Speaker.

PRIVILEGE

COURT MARTIAL RESPECTING SUBMARINE CASE

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, this is not an easy situation in which to raise a question of privilege which I honestly believe has grave merit. It was with some regret that I gave you notice and now seek a hearing on the question of privilege I described in the notice which, as you know, involves the actions of serving officers of the Canadian Forces.

As I indicated to you in my notification, the basis of my claim is a violation of my privilege as a Member of Parliament by reason of the gratuitous interference in the performance of my duties and what I honestly believe to be an attempt to intimidate me to prevent me from investigating and commenting upon what were apparent acts of violence reported in the media as a result of a court martial under the National Defence Act.

The court martial involved two members of Maritime Command, then Petty Officer Timothy C. Farler and then Master Seaman Ryan M. Buttar. This case attracted wide regional attention as well as national attention. Members of the House of Commons will know that in yesterday's Quorum, circulated to all Members and to many other people connected with the Parliament of Canada, there was a report of this case and the surrounding circumstances originally published in The Globe and Mail. I do not need to convince you, Mr. Speaker, that this is a matter of wide and serious concern.

I believe there is a clear prima facie case disclosed in published media reports, particulars of which appeared in The Daily News of Halifax on August 11, 1988, and I have provided you with a copy of that publication. At this time I do not have access to the transcript of the remarks as reported in the court martial, but I have made attempts to ascertain from persons in attendance at the court martial that the report in The Daily News is a reasonably accurate presentation of the thrust and tenor of the remarks made by serving officers in the court martial.

If you affirm my view that there is a prima facie case, Mr. Speaker, I am, of course, prepared to present a motion requesting reference of this matter to the appropriate committee, which I assume is the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges and Procedures.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that you recognize a substantive difference between the question of privilege I now raise and the matters of privilege which you have just witnessed in this Chamber. If you will allow me the time, I would like to begin by reviewing what I consider to be the relevant considerations.

Mr. Speaker: I want to assure the Hon. Member for Halifax West that I have received material from him. I take this as a very serious complaint and want to assure the Hon. Member that I will listen very carefully to his entire submission. The Hon. Member.

Mr. Crosby: Mr. Speaker, first, to relate the facts to Your Honour and to put them on the record of the House of Commons, there was, in the City of Halifax, a court martial proceeding which resulted in a conviction, if that is the appropriate term, of then Petty Officer Timothy Farler. The punishment which was imposed on Petty Officer Farler was a demotion of three ranks with a recommendation of immediate promotion to the next rank.

In commenting to a journalist on this matter I indicated my view, which I do with some sense of pride as well as concern, that the punishment did not fit the crime, that had that kind of offence been prosecuted in a civilian court the punishment would have been much greater. I do not see why I should hesitate to express that view. The cruelty involved in the actions of Petty Officer Farler was evident to all involved.

As a result of making those remarks certain events took place. For the purposes of Your Honour's consideration you merely need consider the events which took place with regard to a subsequent court martial of another member of the Canadian Forces whose name I have just indicated.

In that proceeding counsel for the accused seaman argued before the court martial that as a result of the remarks I made, and the publicity attendant upon the court martial, the charges should be dismissed as a fair trial or a fair court martial, if that is the proper terminology, could not be had.

As I understand the authority one should quote from the article, and I do so as follows:

> "—Halifax West MP Howard Crosby jeopardized a court martial in Halifax yesterday by trying to contact a chief witness before the trial, a defence lawyer charged yesterday.
> Defence lawyer Lieut. Guy Phillips said Crosby has tried to contact Leading Seaman Paul Jack Mishak, chief witness in the court martial of Master Seaman Ryan Michael Buttar. That, coupled with media reports on a prior court martial of Leading Seaman Timothy Charles Farler, means charges against Buttar should be dropped, said Phillips.
> Mishak, 22, testified at Buttar's court martial yesterday that a friend had received a phone call, asking him to contact "a Mr. Crosby".
> Rather than return the call, Mishak consulted his superior officer who told him not to talk to Crosby."

There are the facts, Mr. Speaker. However, the relevant consideration is that I made no attempt whatsoever to contact any witness and I certainly made no attempt to contact Leading Seaman Mishak. In fact, quite the opposite, I was contacted by a person and I avoided any further involvement in the inquiry.

● (1530)

For a serving officer of Canada's Armed Forces to rise before a court martial and say a Member of Parliament does not have the right to speak out on a matter of wide public interest involving national defence and the Canadian Forces is totally wrong and without any justification. To accuse a Member of Parliament of contacting a witness for apparently improper reasons is a serious allegation which should not be disregarded. If untrue, it raises questions about the motivation of the officer who made the allegation. What is the purpose? I suggest to you that on the face of it, it is to intimidate the Member of Parliament, to say butt out, this is an affair for naval authorities, a court martial, and you should not concern yourself with what is regarded as military justice.

I said in Halifax and I repeat in this Chamber, not for one moment will I butt out of what I consider to be a serious matter involving the health and welfare of individuals in the Canadian Forces and one of interest to all citizens. We know, you and I, that civilian law governs in this country, not military law or their version of discipline in the Forces.

I do not want to impute ill motives to everyone involved in the situation, but it is certainly worthy of close investigation. Let me tell you why. While that officer, Lieutenant Guy Phillips, was prepared to make the suggestion in the court martial that I was interfering in the process by making remarks which were published, as well as the media who exercised their rights, the same officer made no comment on an article published in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of August 11, 1988, signed by Rear Admiral H. T. Porter, in which he said the sub affair was an isolated incident, not to worry. That did not affect the outcome of the court martial. That did not bring to the attention of the officers involved that they need not treat this matter too seriously because it was an isolated incident in the mind of Rear Admiral Porter as published in the newspaper under his signature. However, the chance remark of a Member of Parliament, repeated to a journalist, published in the paper, does affect the court martial. Now do you get the picture, Mr. Speaker? Now do you begin to wonder what is going on in this court martial? What are these people up to? Are they trying to intimidate a Member of Parliament? Are they trying to say courts martial are the business of the military and they do not want any civilians interfering?

I think this relates very directly in a very serious way to every Member of Parliament. I will tell you right now the next time around I will do exactly the same thing. If I think the punishment meted out to a member of the Armed Forces by a court martial or by anyone else is not in the public interest, I will say so. I am not going to be told what to do by any lieutenant in the Navy or any other serving officer.

I want your backing on this, Mr. Speaker. I want you to stand up on behalf of all Members of the House and say civilian law governs in this country. The laws enacted by this Parliament are what govern. We are the ones who have to see that they are implemented and enforced to the benefit of all Canadians.

I want to point out that one reason we are talking about courts martial is because of a recent decision of the courts of Canada under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms which now makes courts martial public hearings. We can expect this in the future. We, Members of the House of Commons as well as members of the public, will know what takes place in courts martial. We will see and judge for ourselves what constitutes military discipline. If I think the cruel treatment of a seaman in the Canadian Navy by a petty officer and a master seaman is not properly punished, I am going to say it.

I know you have ruled in other cases. I have been up in this House on previous occasions raising questions of privilege. I know about the Quigley case. I know you said that privileges are for a Member of Parliament and not for Mr. Quigley. He is punished for contacting a Member of Parliament, not to worry. You saw what happened in that case. The ruling was that it was none of Parliament's concern, that Mr. Quigley was punished by loss of employment by the Deputy Minister because of his involvement with Members of Parliament. Time goes by, he is reinstated, and then fired again for what I consider to be an inadequate reason.

You, Mr. Speaker, are not going to answer the question in the way you did in the Quigley case, in my humble opinion, because if you set it up so that no one with a problem, in the Canadian Forces or the federal Public Service, can contact a Member of Parliament for fear of recrimination or sanctions or fear of getting into difficulty, then you will indirectly have destroyed the ability of Members of Parliament to function in the performance of their duties.

I could quote authorities to you but, as you said earlier, there is no need, the situation is clear. The obligation is to present a prima facie case of a violation of a Member's privileges. I think I have done that. The facts are there. In my view they indicate a violation of my privileges as a Member of Parliament in a very clear way. It is an attempt to keep me from communicating with a person with whom I have a perfect right to communicate. The reverse also is true. In this case I am referring to Able Seaman Mishik and he was, according to the reports, told not to communicate with me.

Has anyone in this country the right to tell any person not to communicate with a Member of Parliament? Is that not a violation? Is there not something wrong with that? Can you say that if you allow that to occur it will not affect the rights of Members of Parliament? I think it is obvious that we cannot tolerate this kind of abuse. We as Members of Parliament have to decide whether we have duties to perform. If we make that decision, we have to have the capacity and the right to perform those duties untrammelled by anyone's view of what we should or should not be doing. We are going to be judged by the people when we run for office. Do not let us be judged by any other authority other than those that we endorse and condone.

In conclusion, I want to make this point. If you tell me as a Member of Parliament that I do not have protection, that I do not have the force of the Parliament of Canada behind me when I inquire into what I believe to be a case of injustice, I do not have that ability and authority, then tell me because I will not do it. I will not stick my neck out in these situations. Why should I if I am not going to receive the support and endorsement of my peers in the House of Commons represented by you?

I ask you to review carefully the things you said in the Quigley case and come down on the side of Members of Parliament and their right to investigate without fear of molestation, hindrance, interference, or obvious attempts to denigrate them in the eyes of the public.

Mr. Speaker: I think I should say to the Hon. Member for Halifax West and other Hon. Members that I have listened very carefully to the relation of events which has been brought before the Chair. I do not have in front of me the written reasons in the Quigley case, but I seem to remember that it turned on the question of whether or not the Hon. Member who raised the matter had in fact his capacity to act as a Member of Parliament abridged or restricted in an undue way. If that had been the case, it would of course have been within the definition of privilege.

• (1540)

I believe what I decided at that time was that the Hon. Member's capacity to function as a Member of Parliament had not been in any way impaired by whatever happened to Mr. Quigley. I bring this to the Hon. Member's attention, but I will look at it very carefully and will reread the Quigley case. There may be a distinction between what happened in that case and what happened in this case.

I advise the Hon. Member for Halifax West that I shall reserve and I shall look with very great care at his submission.

I think I can say something, at least as a Speaker and as a lawyer, that there is no property in a witness. In this case, the Member of Parliament says that he not only never did, but did not even try to speak to a witness. Even if he did, there is no property in a witness. That is not like phoning a judge. That is not like tampering with a witness, bringing undue or improper influence on a witness. To speak to a witness is a right, not just of a Member of Parliament but a right of any Canadian. I say this because I am concerned about the thought pattern that has been related by the Hon. Member and I think that ought to be clearly understood. There is no property in a witness. There is no law in this country that says a Member of Parliament or an ordinary private citizen cannot talk to somebody who happens to be a witness in a case.

What the law does not allow is tampering with a witness, putting undue or improper influence on that witness, or in some way pressuring, persuading or doing or not doing something, that would influence that witness' capacity to tell the truth, whether that be by threat or by seduction or by whatever other means.

I say to the Hon. Member for Halifax West, who has clearly said in the House today that he did not contact the witness, that even if he had there is nothing wrong with that.

I am concerned about the matter that the Hon. Member has brought in front of me. I say to the Hon. Member and other Hon. Members that the question the Chair must decide is whether the Hon. Member's privilege has been abridged or wronged. As I say again, that comes down to the question of whether what has happened affects the Hon. Member's capacity to carry on as a Member of this place. That is the question I will have to decide. As the Member for Halifax West who as a good lawyer well knows, I will have to do that on the basis of the procedural law of this place.

I do say to the Hon. Member that whatever I may decide he most certainly has a justifiable complaint and, as other Members will always find in a case like this, the Chair will listen very carefully.

SPEAKER'S RULING CONCERNING ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER REPORT AND THIRD READING STAGES OF BILL C-130

Mr. Speaker: I have a decision to render.

Yesterday the Honourable Minister of State (Treasury Board) (Mr. Lewis) gave oral notice of a motion for time allocation for the report stage and third reading stage of Bill C-130 the Canada-United States Free Trade Agreement Implementation Act, pursuant to Standing Order 117.

[English]

The Hon. Member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray) then rose on a point of order to argue that the notice was defective because it failed to specify the number of hours or days to be allocated. This morning he further claimed that the Minister could not proceed because agreement had been reached under Standing Order 116 "by a majority of the representatives of the several parties".

The Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap (Mr. Riis) has supported the Hon. Member for Windsor West in both the arguments and took the position that the Government House Leader was precluded from resorting to Standing Order 117 because of a declared agreement between the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party on a specific number of days for debate at report stage. That is, the agreement between the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party indicated that they had agreed on 150 days at report stage and on 200 days at third reading with respect to the free trade Bill and, as they argued, as required in the Standing Order.

I will first address the issue relating to the deficiency of the oral notice. The basis of the argument against that notice was because it did not specify the amount of time to be allocated for further debate. The Chair has carefully reread Standing Order 117. When it deals with notice the Standing Order employs the words "and has given notice of his or her intention to do so". It appears to require only notice of intention and not notice of the text of the motion per se.

Furthermore, I can point to two precedents, on May 3, 1988 and June 3, 1988, when the same notice of intention was given without specifying a number of days. I should point out that I bring both these occasions to the attention of the House, not necessarily to suggest that just because it has been done once it ought necessarily, to legally be done again but to bring the matter to the attention of the House. I do not take those two incidents as the basis of a legal, procedural precedent, but I do bring them to the attention of the House.

I remind Hon. Members that at the moment the motion which may eventually be proposed to the House by the Chair is one that has been proposed by the Hon. Minister. A point of order has interrupted that process. I am considering whether or not the Hon. Minister's motion is acceptable. If it is acceptable, then it would inevitably be proposed by the Chair, and the motion that might eventually be proposed to the House by the Chair is required to be specific and to provide for at least one sitting day for report stage and at least one sitting day for third reading. I think that comes from any clear reading of the rules.

I must therefore rule that the Minister has properly given notice of his intention and that his action was in keeping with the House's usual form.

The second point the Hon. Member for Windsor West argued this morning is more complex and simply restated is: Is a Minister of the Crown precluded from invoking Standing Order 117 if a majority of the Parties, not including the Government, states that it has reached an agreement under Standing Order 116?

[Translation]

The first sentence of Standing Order 116 hears repeating:

> "When a Minister of the Crown from his or her place in the House, states that a majority of the representatives of the several parties have come to an agreement in respect of a proposed allotment of days or hours for the proceedings at any stage of the passing of a public bill . . . "

[English]

I have read carefully the words "representatives of the several Parties". The Hon. Member for Windsor West has stated that those words mean the three Party House Leaders, but the use of the word "representatives" is open to considerable interpretation and could mean a majority of the members of each Party or, indeed, even a majority of the Members of the House. I think the Hon. Member for Windsor West and the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap will remember that earlier I may have made a comment in that direction. I probably should have used the counsel of the seniors from whom I learned to do court work who always said that it was wise, a judge who did not comment while listening to an argument. In any event, these words have never been clarified. I have to say now, after having given both Hon. Members' submissions careful consideration, that I would tend to agree with the view that the words mean the House Leaders of the several Parties or their appointees, for no other definition is practicable since there is no former mechanism in the Standing Order to determine the majority of a larger group of Members.

That being said, I am not sure I can agree with the Hon. Members for Windsor West and Kamloops—Shuswap that two Parties in opposition alone can form the basis of an agreement that would compel a Minister of the Crown to act under Standing Order 116. Just so the Hon. Members and the public understand, if that proposition were accepted by the Chair it would mean that two opposition parties, or three opposition parties, or whatever number of opposition parties could form an agreement to decide on how many days of debate would continue on any given Bill, and the Government would thereby be bound by that agreement. All three Standing Orders, that is 115, 116 and 117—and they all deal with the question of how to handle the time allocation at various stages of debate on a Bill—in their opening sentences clearly leave the initiative of announcing any agreement or no agreement to a Minister. It is my view that a Minister must be party to any agreement and that rising in his or her place under Standing Order 115 or 116 to take any initiative means that he or she is supportive of the proposed proposal for time allocation.

Standing Order 117 provides for a Minister to act if there is no agreement and, as I stated on June 6, 1988, the Chair must take a Minister's declaration at face value and cannot judge the quality of negotiations or of any proposals that may have been made. In this case I was not even asked to judge on the quality of the negotiations because there is a document that indicates the arrangement at least had been entered into with two of the Parties in the House, albeit, not that of the Government.

As a consequence, I have to rule that the notice was in order and the motion is receivable.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT IMPLEMENTATION ACT

ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER REPORT IN THIRD READING STAGES OF BILL C-130

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of State and Minister of State (Treasury Board)) moved:

That, in relation to Bill C-130, an Act to implement the free trade agreement between Canada and the United States of America, not more than two further sitting days shall be allotted to the consideration of the report stage, and two sitting days to the consideration of the third reading stage of the Bill; and

That fifteen minutes before the expiry of the time provided for government business on the second day allotted to report stage consideration and on the second day allotted to third reading stage consideration of the said Bill, any proceedings before the House shall be interrupted, if required, for the purpose of this order and, in turn, every question necessary in order to dispose of the stage of the Bill then under consideration shall be put forthwith and successively, without further debate or amendment.

Mr. Speaker: I remind Hon. Members that this is a debatable motion, and I will hear Hon. Members.

Time Allocation

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to explain fully the Government's position and to explain why we are moving to time allocation in this particular instance.

There are four or five reasons. First, it is fair to say that there have been numerous statements by Opposition Members that they have intended from day one to delay the Bill, the legislation, as long as possible, not to correct or amend but to delay as long as possible at any cost.

Second, I would point to the manoeuvres by the Right Hon. Leader of the Liberal Party to trade power by the elected representatives of the people for power by the Senate in asking the Senate to delay forever the Bill, or at least until a general election is called.

Specifically, Mr. Speaker, I refer you to the delays in the past week or so. In fact, last Wednesday the entire day was wasted by votes on the introduction of Private Members' Bills to which government Members were naturally pleased to assent because we hold the view that every Member should have the right to introduce his or her Bill and have it read for the first time.

I also refer you to last Friday's recorded division on whether or not the House would move to the business of the day and thus debate of Bill C-130 at report stage. As well I refer you to yesterday from eleven o'clock in the morning until one o'clock when the Opposition pulled the same manoeuvre by introducing a Private Member's Bill and then having the last three rows of the New Democrats say "no" and the first two rows say "yes" in order to trigger a recorded division and waste the time of the House.

I also refer you to the remarks of the Leader of the New Democratic Party on the CBC radio program The House on July 23, when the point was made by the interviewer that the New Democratic Party was opposed to free trade. The interviewer said:

> "Yet watching the debate in the House of Commons and elsewhere, the message seems to be lost on people."

In reply the Hon. Member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) said:

> "I think that around here amongst politicians because it has been debated for so long and we know the arguments in one sense on both sides so well that there can be amongst journalists, amongst some MPs, some jaded, "I've been through this so many times" perspective."

Those words are very helpful from the Leader of the New Democratic Party in making the case.

Yesterday, as soon as the bell rang on the first vote to see if we would introduce and print a Private Member's Bill, I went to the House Leaders of the New Democratic Party and the Liberal Party and asked them if they could give me some idea of the amount of time required at report stage and at third reading stage in order to dispose of the Bill. That was an honest bona fide effort to elicit a reasonable timetable from the Opposition as required under Standing Order 117. I received the following letter from the coalition Party. I have read this letter into the record, and it is very specific. It says that the two Opposition Parties:

"—are prepared to agree to an allocation of a further 150 days to the report stage and 200 days to the third reading stage of this Bill."

The letter is dated August 15, 1988. While it is a coalition letter, I would not want my friends in the New Democratic Party to think that they are on equal footing with the Liberal Party in this coalition. I would point out that it is a Xerox copy of the signature of the House Leader of the Liberal Party but that it is an original of the signature of the House Leader of the New Democratic Party. I do not want my friends to think that in this coalition one is exactly equal. The are in it together just as they were in the national energy policy together. However, it is not an equal footing. If my friend from the New Democratic Party wants to then consult, we can perhaps give him some advice as to how he can bring himself up to equal so that he can sign original copies too. I would be glad to do that at another point.

• (1600)

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that this letter is an embarrassment to the democratic process. It is a mockery of democracy. It is an embarrassment to efforts to negotiate in good faith. I think it is a fundamental error.

If my friends opposite had wanted to place the Government in an awkward position, they would have given us a reasonable proposition. I ask my friends opposite how we would have responded if the argument had been five days at report stage and five days at third reading. Then we would have had to argue that two days at report stage and two days at third reading is reasonable. But my friends made the argument for us when they said 150 days at report stage and 200 days at third reading.

I point out another piece of advice that I give my friends. In my office when, as one does on occasion—and we all do it—I write a letter in a fit of temper without thinking it through my office staff will come to me and say: "Mr. Lewis, do you really want to send this letter out?" I take another look at it in the calm of the moment and I say: "You are probably right. I should not send out this letter". That did not happen across the way. They rushed into this and gave us the entire case, the entire case that they are not serious about this Bill, that they are not serious about this Parliament.

I say this to my hon. friend from Winnipeg—Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy). The critics in this case have made an honest effort, I would expect. They sat at committee hearings. They spent time on this Bill. I suggest that the critics who sat in committee on this have been undercut by their House Leaders. They have been undercut because they have made a mockery of the effort that my hon. friend made at committee. I would expect that there is some disappointment. For example, my friend from Winnipeg—Fort Garry was quoted in The Ottawa Citizen as having said last week two weeks at report stage. Why did that not come in the letter? Why was it not suggested that there be two weeks at report stage, as my hon. friend is quoted as saying? No, we got 150 days at report stage. There has been a breakdown in communication between the Parties opposite. I suggest it is an embarrassment to every Member who has debated substance in this House. I think that it is unfortunate.

We regret that it has come to time allocation on this Bill. We regret that. But the substance of the issue of free trade has been debated over the past two years. One could even go back farther than that. I think Your Honour would find that other speakers are going to go back to the 1978 report of the Senate committee, the report of the House of Commons committee and various other committees and refer to those in their arguments. The issue of free trade has been before the House for a long time. The issue before the House now is whether or not this Bill properly implements the free trade agreement. We suggest that is what this debate is about at report stage. That is what this debate is about at third reading.

We have moved the motion of time allocation with a view to moving this through the House in order that the issue can be sent to the Senate for approval. We hope, obviously, that the appointed and anointed Liberal Senators will withdraw their embargo of any further discussion as dictated by the Right Hon. Leader of the Liberal Party. We hope that we can get on with what the House and the duly elected representatives of the people have decided in this case, that is, what was decided at second reading—that the free trade agreement between Canada and the United States should be implemented by way of Bill C-130.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, we have just witnessed one of the greatest acting performances of all time in the House of Commons, the visage of pained innocence on the Deputy House Leader who seemed to say: "The devil made me do it. The Opposition forced me into calling closure. Something that I would not dare to do in my wildest nightmares I had to do because I had no choice".

Let us look at the facts. On every single step along the way on this trade agreement the Government has imposed a restriction on Parliament. At every single stage of the Bill there has been closure. At every single stage there has been a clear decision by the Tory majority to restrict debate, to restrict travel, to restrict exposure and to restrict examination. The Tories said that they did not want this Bill, this legislation, this agreement to have the open, honest, accountable judgment of the Canadian people.

Mr. Speaker, I take you back two and a half years to the original communication strategy paper by the Cabinet of the Conservative Government. Let me quote from that communication paper. It states that: The strategy should rely less on educating the general public than on getting across the message that the trade initiative is good". In other words, it is a selling job, not information, not examination but a selling job.

The paper goes on to state that the public support generated should be recognized as extremely soft and likely to evaporate rapidly if the debate is allowed to get out of control. Two and a half years ago the strategy was set. It was: "Do not let the people know. Keep it in darkness. Keep it restricted. Keep it confined. Keep it under cover. Oh, it is okay to spend $30 million or $40 million in propaganda. We can sort of get all the printing presses wound up. We can get all our Conservative public relations firms into the trough putting forward all kinds of bright messages. But for goodness sake don't let Parliament have the right to examine what we are going to do—$35 million and $40 million of PR propaganda for five or six hours of debate at report stage looking at 77 amendments".

What that basically says is that this is a Government that has replaced Parliament with a rule of propaganda. Today, when we spoke in Question Period about the victims of the trade agreement, the grape workers in the Okanagan and in southern Ontario, the manufacturing group in Granby, and all the other workers—the 186,000 workers that the Economic Council of Canada has described as going to lose their jobs—we see that there will be victims. But the most serious, the greatest loss will be the integrity and sanctity of this Chamber itself. The greatest casualty of the Canada-U.S. trade negotiation is the Parliament of Canada. It is an institution that is central and integral to our identity as a country but which has been abused, manipulated and tortured out of its rules, out of its procedures and out of its proper operation simply to support the maniacal and fanatical obsession to get this deal into place according to the timetable set by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney).

The Prime Minister, who has a natural gift for counterfeit, has bestowed that same endowment on his friends and allies. All the Tories have now become true believers. I weep. I came into Parliament at a time when there were some great Conservative parliamentarians, for example, Ged Baldwin and Walter Baker, people that one could look up to as Members who would defend the rights of the House. What a sad and sorry lot sits across from us now. Ged Baldwin and the late Walter Baker must regret that they ever used the word "Progressive" Conservative because it has been so corrupted by the present Government. It has been corrupted in part by the agreement itself. The Conservatives have abandoned their traditions, their beliefs, and their commitment to defending the sanctity of this country, and in so doing they have trampled on the rights of Parliament.

The Deputy Government House Leader has stated that there has been enough examination, and "Why would people want to debate more than nine or ten hours on the trade agreement?" It is a document which the Government itself states is the singular most important piece of legislation in this administration.

When I was Minister of Transport in the previous administration, we brought in the Western Grain Transportation Act. It was an important piece of legislation affecting western Canada, but not nearly as comprehensive or extensive as the trade legislation which covers 26 other Acts. The Western Grain Transportation Act was debated for 58 hours and 30 minutes at report stage alone, and 37 hours at second reading. That amount of time is four or five times what the Government has allowed the House to debate on the trade legislation. The Western Grain Transportation Act was a Bill of significance, but not nearly of the consequence of the Bill in front of us. To feign that somehow "the devil made them do it" and that the Government has now been forced into bringing in time allocation is sheer hypocrisy and deception.

We knew what we were up against. In a rare moment of lucidity when he was not blustering and bluffing his way around the country, the Minister for International Trade (Mr. Crosbie), said out straight: "I am not going to let this Bill go more than two or three weeks". He is the Minister responsible. We do not see him very much, but we are told that he is responsible.

The fact of the matter is that the Government has a timetable. It had a timetable from the beginning. The Minister for International Trade announced the timetable, and that the timetable was that the Government was going to complete this Bill by the third or fourth week in August. That is what the Minister said. Well, the Government is on its timetable, but in achieving it the Minister and the Prime Minister have been prepared to torture and twist the rights of the House, and that is shameful.

In attempting to achieve a win on the trade agreement the Government is prepared to lose in the surrendering of Parliament. In the classic words of the old play: "They stoop to conquer". They reach down to a level in order to get what they want most of all. We will have some opportunity to argue whether or not it is worth it, but surely to goodness do Members of the House, particularly on the government side, not recognize the damage and the travesty they are doing to an institution that they took a sworn oath to uphold? Do they really think that Canadians will buy their argument for allowing three or four days of debate on second reading?

Do they really think that Canadians will buy their argument for allowing three weeks in committee? The committee was not allowed to travel outside Ottawa, it had a restricted number of people who could come before it, and it was not allowed to talk to individuals, only organizations. Now at report stage there are 77 legitimate amendments accepted by the Chair, therefore designed to be relevant, but the Government will only give us four days to debate them. Does the Government think that the Canadian people will buy a piece of legislation that affects the Bank Act, investment, energy, agriculture, the service industry, and customs duties, and that we are to be allowed to debate that in all its stages in four days and consider that to be a proper and honest expression of parliamentary view? It is impossible. We know now that it will be impossible to get to anywhere near all the amendments and allow Members a proper opportunity to express themselves on important amendments dealing with the changes in this country.

The two opposition Parties have some 70 Members, and we recognize that we are a minority. We recognize that we cannot carry the day, but simply because we will fail to carry the day in the House it surely should not mean that a minority has to stop advocating its point of view. Surely we recognize the rights of minorities in this country, whether they are Liberals or New Democrats, to have a voice, and to be heard, and to speak for what I think is a majority of Canadians. I believe in the House that we speak for the majority of Canadians on the trade agreement.

Whether we are a minority or a majority our voice is being snuffed out, the rights of Canadians are being denied, and Parliament is being trampled on by a Government that is so suffused with the appetite for power that it has forgotten its obligations and rights to recognize the most fundamental principle that we must honour in the House is the rights of democracy and freedom of expression, and those are what the Government is turning the lights out on in this House of Parliament.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, once again this is a very dark day for Canada's Parliament. This is a closure-crazed Government. Time and again over the last four years the Government has brought in the heavy jackboot of closure. It brought it in on the drug Bill. The people of Canada were speaking out against the initiative of the Government regarding prescription drugs and we see the results in rising prices. The Government brought in closure on the Air Canada Bill, the refugee Bill, the immigration Bill, and the Official Languages Act.

The Government has assumed because it has 208 Members that it can do anything it wants. We saw it with the Standing Orders which govern the behaviour in the House in terms of regulation. Government Members tossed them out the window and said: "We don't have to follow any Standing Orders. We can make up our own. We have the majority. We have the jackboots on in this democratic system". This is a closure crazed Government.

It brings in its parliamentary assassins. For example, the Minister for International Trade (Mr. Crosbie) is one of the major assassins, then there is the Government House Leader (Mr. Mazankowski), the Deputy Government House Leader (Mr. Lewis), and the Parliamentary Secretary, and the other Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister for International Trade (Mr. McDermid). They are parliamentary assassins because they are making a mockery not only of Parliament, but they are democratic assassins. They have said to the people of Canada: "We are going to thumb your nose, Canadians". The fact is that seven out of ten Canadians, 70 per cent of the people of Canada, have said time and again that they want an election on this trade deal before the Government jams it, rams it, forces it, and rushes it through the House of Commons.

What does the Minister for International Trade say to them? "Poof, we don't care about 70 per cent of Canadians. We know better. We have the majority. We have the muscle in the House of Commons and we can do anything we want. We are going to jam this legislation called the free trade deal down your throats, Canadians".

The people of Canada are just waiting to get back at the Government. The people of Canada are just waiting for the election to be called. Everybody in the country is saying: "Call an election, Prime Minister. If you have the courage of what you say in the House of Commons regarding the trade deal, if you believe what you say, then let us debate it for the two months of a general election, and let the people decide whether or not they want to proceed".

But, no, this Government does not believe in democracy. After all, why should we be surprised? This is the Party that shut down the House of Commons for 16 days. Its members rushed around and said: "We are not going to come into the House of Commons, we are going to close it down. We don't want any more debate". That is the Party that abused Parliament.

Once again we are seeing what happens when it decides to hold hearings across Canada before anybody sees the trade deal. Can anyone imagine anything so silly, so peculiar, and so dumb as the Minister for International Trade stating that hearings would be held across Canada for one day in every major city before anybody sees the trade deal?

• (1620)

That is exactly what they did. They said: "Well, we have had hearings across the country". Well, they have used closure at every single stage of this Bill. Then the Deputy Government House Leader (Mr. Lewis) came to the House Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Gray) and to the House Leader of the New Democrats (Mr. Riis), and said: "Listen, could we cut a deal? Can we agree to wrap up the debate in a few days?" What does it take for these people to understand what we are saying? We are trying to say that we are not going to facilitate the passage of this legislation.

An Hon. Member: Tear it up.

Mr. Riis: This is bad legislation for Canada. This is unCanadian. This is undemocratic, the way that they are approaching this. We will not have anything to do with it. Do not ask us to cut a deal behind the scenes.

How do we get through to these thick-headed monsters called Tories across the way? We wrote a letter and said: "Well, listen, we want to spend the next two years debating this trade deal". Maybe they will then get the impression, the picture, that we do not want to co-operate to facilitate a deal that we think is not in the best interests of Canada. Finally, they caught on. They realized that we were not prepared to facilitate the debate. They caught on that we were not prepared to make a deal to jam this through before the people of Canada have had an opportunity to indicate their position on the trade deal.

I will be sitting here in a moment, waiting to hear the speech of the Minister for International Trade, while he explains to the people of Canada the fact that seven out of ten Canadians want an election fought on this deal before it passes in the House of Commons. I am going to be listening with interest to what he is going to say when he says: "We do not believe in that process, we do not have to go to the people of Canada before we jam this through the House of Commons".

I look across now at the Minister for International Trade and at his colleagues. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) said to the people of Canada that he was against the trade deal. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) told the people of Canada, in 1983, that he was against the trade deal. Then the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) said that he was against a trade deal with the United States. That is what he said. The people of Canada made the mistake of believing the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister did not say what he was really feeling.

I want to say to the Minister for International Trade that I do respect him for being honest with the people of Canada. I remember during the last campaign where he said to the people of Canada: "We can't tell them what we are going to do, because if we told them what we are going to do, they would never elect us". He was dead on. Now they know what they were going to do; they were going to sell out this country, they were going to give away Canada. The people now have figured out that that is the hidden agenda of this Government. The minute that they have a chance to walk into those polling booths, they are going to make an "x" and this Government is going to be history.

I want to simply say that the Minister for International Trade has finally realized that we do not want to be part of any process that jams this trade deal down the throats of Canadians. He may want to use that approach, and he is using that approach, but we are not going to be part of that process in any way, shape or form.

If he wants to introduce closure, muzzle the Members of Parliament and jam this legislation through the House of Commons and then some time in the distant future call an election to see what the people of Canada think about it, I am afraid that the people of Canada are going to send a very clear message. Then the Minister for International Trade will finally have his way. He will then, as a defeated Member of Parliament, ask to go to the United States to become an American citizen, because that is what he wants to do. That is what he wants all of us to do. He wants Canada to become a fifty-first state, a territory of the United States. That is what he wanted when Newfoundland was coming into Confederation. He went out with his family and he said: "We do not want to join Canada; we want to join the United States". A few years later, he is finally having his boyhood dream of being an American citizen. He can even still live in Canada.

When the people of Canada have an opportunity to register their view on this—and they will—unfortunately this Government will have ignored their requests to have a chance to indicate their position on this trade deal before it passes the House of Commons. They do not have a mandate to jam this legislation through the House of Commons. The Prime Minister said that he was against the trade deal. It was never even mentioned during the last general election, not once. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister for International Trade did not mention it once during his campaign. The Minister for International Trade did not mention it once during the campaign. The Prime Minister of Canada did not mention it once, and they are jamming through the House of Commons the most important piece of legislation that this country has ever seen. Those are the words of the Prime Minister.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, this is not a difficult or a complicated matter. This present Government of Canada has a two-track trade policy. One, of course, is to negotiate in the Uruguay Round of the General Agreement of Tariffs and Trade to try to improve our trading access to the 96 partners of GATT, particularly with emphasis on the Pacific Rim. We are pursuing that. The conference of the Uruguay Round will be held in Montreal in December. We all hope that there will be some progress. It is very difficult. There are 96 countries involved.

The second arm of our trade policy is to secure better and more assured access to the U.S. market. They take 80 per cent of all of our exports. A third of all the wealth of Canadians every year comes from our exports. A quarter of the wealth of Canadians every year comes from our trade and our exports to the United States of America.

We have secured an agreement after two years of negotiation. It started in June 1986. The elements were agreed to in October 1987. They were made public then. The full text of the agreement was made public in December. We have had that for eight or nine months, whatever the period is. The agreement was signed on January 3, 1988. We had Senate reports in 1982 and 1987 that we should enter into a free trade agreement with the United States. It has been studied in the Senate and in the House of Commons on many occasions. I will not go into all of the details. They are already on the record.

This present Bill has been studied and debated longer than the debate in the United Kingdom Parliament, when in the United Kingdom they decided to join the European Community. The debate there was a shorter debate than we have already had in this House. The Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Turner) said: "Let the people decide". The problem is, Hon. Members in the two opposition Parties were never satisfied with the decision that the people made in 1984. The Liberals do not think that the people of Canada should be allowed to have any other government than a Liberal government. They would not accept the verdict of 1984.

In 1984, the people decided. The Canadian people elected the Mulroney PC Party and they elected them for a five-year term. That Government is legitimate and is entitled to be in place, to govern this country, to bring forward this policy and to have it enacted with its majority of the House of Commons, as a result of the election of 1984. At some point in that five years the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) decides when there should be another election, if he has a majority, and he has a majority today.

The Liberal Party is not satisfied. They think that they are destined to govern Canada forever. If they are not elected by the people of Canada, as they were not in 1984, then they think they will govern Canada through their majority of appointees in the Senate. It was people like Senator Kirby, Senator Kenny and Senator Fairbairn, all from former Prime Minister Trudeau's staff, people who are going to be in the Senate for the next 30 years. Do the people of Canada want these Senators deciding what government policy is to be until the year 2018? Senator Kirby will be there until the year 2018. There would be a Liberal majority in the Senate, if they all lived to be 75, until the year 2008.

Are we to be governed by the Liberal Party no matter who the people of Canada elect to form a majority in this House? That is going to be a crucial question in the election. The Leader of the Official Opposition said: "Let the people decide". Well, he should decide by beginning to tell the people the truth. When is he going to start telling the people of Canada the truth?

We are going to see that he starts telling the people of Canada the truth. He had to be corrected by Premier Bourassa the other day. Premier Bourassa said that Turner was wrong on trade. He made a stupid statement about the stock savings plan in Quebec. Premier Bourassa said: "I do not want to intervene in the federal election, but if I have to be personally involved, especially to re-establish the facts, I will do it". I will venture to guess that Premier Bourassa is going to be very busy in Quebec establishing the facts, when the Liberal Party and the NDP Party go to Quebec with their distortions, their inaccuracies and their rumours, as they will be doing during the election campaign. He is going to have his hands full if he wants to keep the federal Liberals truthful. They are finding it very difficult to do that on their own.

Last October, almost as soon as the FTA was made public, the Opposition announced that they would tear up the deal. The official Liberal Party. The line was: "Tear up the deal". Never in Canadian history has there been such a silly and juvenile position adopted by the Official Opposition. Since then they have constantly complained that they have not had time to study and debate it. Why do they need to study and debate it when last October they said that they would tear it up? Why are they studying and debating this Bill when they say that when they get into office they are going to tear it up, even though they only have to give a six month notice to terminate the agreement anyway? It is hypocrisy, pure and simple, for members of the Liberal Opposition to say that they want to further study and debate this Bill. They made their decision months ago when they said they would tear it up.

• (1630)

When we sought to table Bill C-130 this spring, the Opposition, and mainly the New Democratic Party, blocked the tabling of it for three weeks with a series of procedural points, all ruled out of order by the Speaker. Why did they do that? Simply to obstruct. They do not want to study and debate the Bill, they want to obstruct the Bill. They want to kill the Bill. They want to guillotine the Bill. They do not want to discuss and debate the Bill.

While protesting that we are supposed to be seeking to ram the legislation through Parliament, opposition Members tied the House up with measures like recorded votes on first reading of a Bill to proclaim hockey as Canada's national sport. Why are members of the NDP doing that? They did it this week as well. It is simply to obstruct.

Even though both opposition Parties are committed to tearing up the deal—the Liberals want to tear it up, the NDP want to tear it down—they have moved over 100 amendments to the implementing legislation. Why would they move 100 amendments to legislation they say they will tear up? It is simply to obstruct, naturally.

When we sought to establish a reasonable time frame in which to conclude the debate on Bill C-130, what did members of the Opposition propose when we asked them how many days they thought would be reasonable? They proposed 350 sitting days, almost two years of House time. They suggested that we should debate this for two years. Why? Simply to obstruct.

Now, when we propose to conclude consideration of this legislation, those who have done nothing but obstruct say that they want more time for study and debate. They do not want any time for study and debate, their minds are closed. The poisonous vapours of their machinations and distortions are radiating across Canada. They do not want to study and debate the Bill. They are not interested in the Bill. They want to tear it up. They want to get into power and they want us out of power. It is just as simple as that.

Opposition Members do not believe that the people should ever decide to have a Progressive Conservative Government. That is why they are calling on the Senate to do their dirty work for them, to try to stop passage of this Bill. In this debate, members of the Opposition have shown nothing but hypocrisy, deception and deceit from start to finish.

What of the debate itself? Have opposition Members proposed to deal seriously with the free trade agreement? Who has heard a serious opposition speech on tariffs, procurement, financial services, the rules of origin, border measures, agriculture, investment, energy, services, temporary entry for business persons or binding dispute settlement? Has there been one sensible paragraph uttered by a Member opposite on any of those important, vital matters? Nothing at all, nothing but attempts to distort. Nothing but sweeping charges without any basis in fact, just charges that the FTA will force Canadian society to become like American society. There has been no proof, just charges, charges that everything that distinguishes Canada from the U.S. will be swept away, all our social programs, regional development, agricultural supply management, cultural policies, all are going to be imperilled. This is not debate, this is trying to spread alarm with broad, general, silly statements.

This is what Le Devoir had to say about that in an editorial of August 12:

> It is difficult to take seriously the Liberal amendment recommending that the free trade legislation be amended so that it not undermine Canada's social programs, including health care insurance, unemployment insurance, pensions, minimum wage legislation, labour legislation and maternity benefits.
> This rhetoric has a hollow ring to it, because none of the programs mentioned is even remotely jeopardized by the (free trade) agreement.

The Winnipeg Free Press, the hon. gentleman's home paper, does not think much of him. This is what that paper said about the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner) on August 9:

> There is room for honest disagreement over the likely effects of free trade on Canada and Canadians. The point at issue in Mr. Turner's approach to free trade is not one of honest disagreement but of simple, deliberate distortion.
> John Turner these days has a liking for slogans. "Let the people decide" is his latest. Before the people do decide, he might direct another slogan to himself: "Tell the people the truth."

That was the Winnipeg Free Press, not the words of a partisan Member of this House, not the words of an active politician. That is the impartial judgment of the Winnipeg Free Press.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that the Hon. Minister's time has expired. The Hon. Member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray) has the floor.

Mr. Rossi: You are a phoney, John.

Mr. Crosbie: You are a phoney and you are a dummy. You are never up to speak.

Mr. Rossi: You are a phoney and you did not even read the report and you are a bluffer. You are a big bluffer.

Mr. Crosbie: You do not even get up and speak. Let us have your maiden speech.

Mr. Rossi: I would rather not speak than tell what you are saying.

Mr. Crosbie: All you do is grovel from your seat.

Mr. Rossi: Big blabber-mouth, shut up.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, order. Both Hon. Members are out of order. I would like to hear the Hon. Member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray).

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, when I listened to the Minister for International Trade (Mr. Crosbie) ranting and raving, I was reminded of the story of the lawyer who looked over his brief and wrote beside one paragraph: "My case is very weak here. When I get to this point in court, I'm going to yell like hell". That is obviously what has happened here.

All the Minister for International Trade has done with his ranting and raving is to confirm what a weak case the Government has in its attempt to force through a motion to choke off further debate on the Bill to implement the trade deal in only four more days. He has also confirmed, through his ranting and raving, just what a weak case the Government has when it says that it has negotiated a deal with the United States that deserves the support of the Canadian people.

The Deputy Government House Leader, in introducing the Government's motion, attempted to paint a picture of sweet reasonableness, of a true desire to have a useful debate and to give a reasonable period of time for that debate. However, he was soon undermined by the Minister for International Trade who tore away that veil of reasonableness with which the government House Leader attempted to cloak the real position of the Government.

The Minister for International Trade made clear that the Government had no intention, from the very beginning, of allowing a reasonable and proper debate on this trade deal in the House, or of allowing a reasonable and proper debate on this trade deal throughout Canada by the Canadian people. The Minister for International Trade has made this very clear, and in this he has certainly told the truth.

The Minister for International Trade has in fact taken issue with the very desire of Members of this House to have any debate at all on this measure. He said in effect that he and his Party won the last election and therefore they can do whatever they want until the next election. He said that he and his Party have been allowed to form a one-party state, a form of what he might consider to be a dictatorship, benevolent perhaps but a dictatorship all the same.

The fact is that this was not what the Canadian people thought they were doing when they, perhaps with good intentions but now intentions they may well believe were misguided, elected the Minister and his Party to office. The idea of having the trade deal that the Minister's Government negotiated with the United States was never mentioned once during the last election campaign. In fact, the only thought that Canadians might have had about the issue during the election was that it would be the very last thing that a Government led by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) would ever attempt to do. I say this because when that Prime Minister was running for the leadership of his Party, he made very clear, in rejecting the support of the current Minister for International Trade for free trade with the United States, and I think I recall his exact words, that it would undermine our sovereignty and he would have none of it at that time or at any other time.

I think it is very clear that whatever Canadians had in mind in voting for the Conservative Party, it was not because they wanted to give it a mandate to negotiate any kind of comprehensive free trade deal with the United States. Therefore, I do not think it is very credible for the Minister for International Trade to say in this House that because his Party won a majority in the last election it can push this trade deal through this House and down the throats of the Canadian people without any real or meaningful debate or study. That is what he is saying to this House but I do not think Canadians agree with that in any way, shape or form.

The Minister and his colleagues claim this matter has been debated for over two and a half years. However, the Minister himself made clear that could not be correct because he said the negotiations for the deal started two and a half years ago. The elements of the deal were tabled in the House on October 6, and the full text of the deal was made available only last December. He then said, and this is perfectly true, that the Bill to implement the deal was only presented to this House last May 24. That means that whatever was going on over the past two and a half years, it was not debate in this Parliament or in this country on this trade deal which Bill C-130 asks us to accept and put in force to damage this country in perpetuity.

If the Minister and the Government really had any intention of allowing a proper debate and a study of this Bill, they would not have choked off debate on second reading after only five days. They would not have choked off committee proceedings after three weeks. They would not now be trying to choke off report stage and third reading debate after only four days. Apart from the committee hearings, that means they want to allow only eleven days of debate in the House of Commons on what is the most important measure to come before Parliament in the history of this country. It speaks to the very future, the very existence of this country in days to come, but for them eleven days is too much. The Minister talked about the decision of the British Parliament on the entry of the U.K. into the European Common Market. If I am not mistaken, before that debate there was at least one election and one referendum.

The Minister and the Government are afraid to let Canadians decide in a general election whether they want to have this deal and that government. The Government knows that if there were ever to be an election, as there must be before this deal goes into effect, the Canadian people will say no to this deal because they know it means the undermining of their future and the future of their children. They would say no to this deal because they know it is the product of an incompetent and inept government and is a prime example of its lack of sincerity and credibility.

We have said we believe there must be an election with a resulting majority vote for the Government before this deal can be implemented. That is why we have asked our Senate colleagues not to block it, not to defeat it, but simply to postpone a final decision on this matter until the Canadian people have had a chance to speak in an election. That is why in our response to the inquiry as to whether we would agree to time allocation on this Bill we said there should be a sufficient number of days allocated, yes, over 300, to bring the debate past the time when this Parliament must end so there could be no final decision on this measure until the Canadian people have had the chance to speak during an election.

Let us be very clear that in approaching the opposition Parties to see if there could be an agreement on time allocation, the Minister was only going through the motions. As the Speaker made clear in a ruling earlier today, the statement of the Minister on behalf of the Government that agreement on time allocation could not be reached has to be accepted at face value. It cannot be looked at, it cannot be probed. Therefore, it is clear from what the Minister for International Trade just said in the House, the Deputy Government Leader, in spite of what he said in opening this debate, was only going through the motions, and the Government never intended from the beginning to allow a proper study, a proper debate, either in this House or in this country on its trade deal.

Why not? Because it knew that the more this measure was studied, the more it was understood by the Canadian people, the less the Canadian people would like it, the less the Canadian people would want it, the less the Canadian people would support it. That is why the original strategy was to try and slide it through without the Canadian people knowing what it was all about. That is why every step of the way the Government attempted, unfortunately with success, to choke off debate so the Canadian people would not have a full understanding about how damaging, how harmful this trade deal is and would be to them and future generations.

The Government may be able to abuse the opportunity given it through its majority to force this measure through this House but I say it will not be able to play that same game with the Canadian people. The Canadian people are already on to what the Conservative Party is about and we will join with the Canadian people to make sure they have a chance to pronounce themselves in an election. I am confident that when they do so they will reject this deal and they will reject this Government because both the deal and this Government are harmful to Canada and its future.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, when we listened to the Minister for International Trade (Mr. Crosbie) a few minutes ago, we were treated to an example of why in recent polls we find that politicians are held in about the same esteem among Canadians as convicted sex killers. Politicians continue to plummet in public esteem because of people like the Minister for International Trade.

Mr. McDermid: Oh, shame!

Mr. Fulton: I will tell you why bringing in closure at this point in time is so inappropriate.

Mr. McDermid: Look at your performance last week.

Mr. Fulton: Let us take a look at where those same cabinet Ministers on the other side stood in 1984 on free trade. Let us look at what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) had to say, because the Government has no mandate whatsoever to be proceeding with this legislation, let alone damaging the rules and the reputation of this House by bringing in closure in this way.

Here is what the Prime Minister had to say: "Canadians rejected free trade in 1911, they would do so again". "It affects Canadian sovereignty and we will have none of it". That is what he had to say four and a half years ago. What about the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson)? This is in 1984:

Mr. McDermid: In 1983.

Mr. Fulton: In 1983.

Mr. McDermid: Early 1983.

Mr. Fulton: "Bilateral free trade with the United States is simplistic and naive. It would only serve to further diminish our ability to compete internationally." That is the Minister of Finance.

Mr. McDermid: Read what the Minister for International Trade said.

Mr. Fulton: What about David Crombie, the former Secretary of State? He said: "It is silly. Our natural destiny is to become a global leader, not America's weak sister". What about a friend of all Members of this House, the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Hees): "An examination of the facts as they are today gives a clear indication—"

Mr. McDermid: "As they are today".

Mr. Fulton: —"that a move towards free trade with the United States would not be a good thing for this country from either the economic or political point of view". Who else? What about the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark): "Free trade raises the possibility that thousands of jobs could be lost. Before we jump on the bandwagon of continentalism we should strengthen our industrial structure so that we are more competitive". There you have some of the key actors on the government side.

There are some very critical things you have to obtain in a democracy. You have to obtain a mandate for major platforms that you are going to implement. The Progressive Conservative Party not only did not try to obtain such a mandate, they never pursued it during the election campaign, in their literature, during the leaders' debate or anything else. In fact, exactly the opposite impression was pushed through to the Canadian public. The former Prime Minister, the Member for Yellowhead, the present Prime Minister, and the Minister of Finance all said exactly the opposite.

• (1650)

Canadians should be concerned about what is going on on the floor of the House of Commons today because the Government is now starting to hurry on with its agenda again. It spent $16 million on propaganda last year. A good chunk of it was turned into toilet paper because it was so bad that they could not convince a dog catcher that it was a good idea with all the crap and so on that was being published by the Minister for International Trade.

Let us not forget that during that same time period the former Minister for International Trade, when she was on the West Coast said that people would be able to go from anywhere in B.C. to Washington and bring back all the stuff they wanted and would not have to pay any more customs or duties. Within a few hours, of course, it had to be said that that was not really true. However, the headlines had been made, the propaganda was spread.

What kind of propaganda are we going to get this year? We know that it will cost more than $16 million. The Minister for International Trade fudged on the figures in Question Period today, but we know it will probably be $30 million, $40 million, or $50 million in propaganda. Canadians need to know. Parliament is important because it focuses the debate and gets information to the media and the constituencies across the country.

Canadians are finally asking the critical question: Where did this idea come from? A couple of year's ago the Conservatives were all opposed to it. Both opposition Parties are opposed to it and most Canadians want an election. Three-quarters of Canadians want an election on this issue prior to it going through the House of Commons. The Government is acting with a knee-jerk response to a very small group.

Canadians are wondering where this idea came from. It has finally been tracked down and Canadians are now starting to talk about it. The Republican convention is taking place in the United States right now. The idea came from the United States. President Reagan was talking about this more than a half dozen years ago. It was one of his main Republican planks for re-election as President of the United States.

In addition, the large multinational corporations in the United States and Canada support this idea. The present Solicitor General (Mr. Kelleher), when he was the Minister of Employment, said that it would affect 800,000 workers in the short term. When the present Minister of Finance was the Minister of Employment he estimated that up to 500,000 Canadians could lose their jobs because of the deal.

The Government wants to close off debate on this issue. Closure was imposed when it was originally brought in. There were three weeks of hearings and now four days have been allocated for debate.

The President of the Canadian Manufacturers Association has said that it is simply a fact that as we ask our industries to compete toe to toe with American industries we in Canada are obviously forced to create the same conditions in Canada that exist in the U.S., whether the unemployment insurance scheme, workers' compensation, the cost of government, the level of taxation or whatever.

The Canada West Foundation says that free trade between our two countries will inevitably lead to wages being equalized between Canada and the United States and that this will occur since the high-cost producer will not be able to compete against a lower-cost producer if goods are traded freely.

Nine U.S. states have no minimum wage. In Texas the minimum wage is $1.40 Canadian an hour. I will give you a graphic example of what happens when some tariffs are taken down. Ten years ago there was a protective tariff on home appliances made in Canada. Fridges, stoves, percolators and all those kinds of things were made in little GE and other plants in Canada. When the tariff was in place, 80 per cent of home appliances purchased in Canada were made in Canada. The tariff was taken away and 10 years later 80 per cent of the home appliances purchased in Canada are made in the United States in states like Texas where the minimum wage is $1.40 an hour.

Canadians ask what this means for them. We know that our social programs are threatened. Medicare is clearly threatened. I have yet to hear a single Member from the government side, including the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp), give a speech nailing down point blank that they will not be affected. The Government will not put up speakers like that on social programs; unemployment insurance, Canada pension, medicare, or workers compensation.

We know that 36 million Americans do not have any health insurance of any kind. I will not even talk about the Maquiladora zone between Texas and Mexico where workers are paid 65 cents an hour. They produce commodities, put a U.S. label on them, and bring them into the Canadian market. Companies making widgets in Canada will pay $8 an hour or $7 an hour but will have to compete against a widget producer in Texas who only pays $1.40 an hour and does not have to pay for any health benefits, lay-offs, or anything else.

If Canadians think for one moment that the one-fifth of goods traded between Canada and the United States which have protective tariffs are going to survive, they are dreaming in Technicolor because the widget producers in the United States will make it almost impossible for those kinds of widgets to be produced in Canada.

Mr. McDermid: Total mythology.

Mr. Fulton: We always hear the Parliamentary Secretary saying it's mythology and the Minister for International Trade saying that all the Members of the Opposition are involved in deceit, untruth, and everything else. We will see, Mr. Speaker. We want an election. We are going to get an election and Canadians will throw the Progressive Conservatives out of office in this country for good.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, since the ways and means motion was tabled on May 18, 1988, by the Minister for International Trade (Mr. Crosbie), we have had more than 130 hours of debate, including more than 90 hours of testimony before the legislative committee by witnesses from practically all walks of life. I refer only to what transpired in Parliament, because I think it would be frivolous to include all the seminars, briefing sessions, press releases and other kinds of public debate we have had for over two years across this country. Mr. Speaker, it is time to stop this ridiculous farce designed by the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Turner) to obstruct debate. Canadians, Mr. Speaker, are sick and tired of the incredible ravings of the Opposition, and that is exactly what we have been hearing today.

[English]

There is more to it. It is also a question of honesty, especially when the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition is calling to let the people decide.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Minister will have nine minutes left after six o'clock. It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

SUGGESTED REPEAL OF SECTION 17

The House resumed, from Monday, July 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Redway:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the Government should consider the advisability of repealing Section 17 of the Financial Administration Act and require that all remission of taxes, fees or penalties be submitted, each year, to Parliament for approval.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When the motion was last before the House the Hon. Member for Edmonton West (Mr. Dorin) had the floor. I will recognize the Hon. Member for Calgary South (Mrs. Sparrow).

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to speak tonight on Motion 101 during Private Members' Hour. Section 17 of the Financial Administration Act and Section 101 of the Customs Tariff, which is the new tariff remission authority, allow the Government to respond quickly and selectively by Order in Council to rectify inequities and anomalies in the tax and tariff regimes. This important flexibility would be lost if these remedies had to await parliamentary debate and approval. Most remission orders provide relief for individuals or single companies in very specific and non-reoccurring circumstances and, as such, are not really appropriate matters for parliamentary consideration.

Parliament did grant the Government authority to remit taxes, fees and penalties by order in council mainly in recognition of the need for quick and selective action where the application of general laws and regulations are having unintended or undesirable results in particular cases. Since most remissions fall into this category, the raison d'être for the authority is still valid and it would be inappropriate at this stage to rescind the order in council authorities.

I want to relate a problem that we have in Calgary and southern Alberta that really calls for a faster and more efficient system to rectify unfair duties and tariffs, especially on the conversion side. Let us start at the beginning. Before January 1, 1988, a great deal of equipment utilized by drilling contractors and petroleum service companies in the oil patch came into this country duty-free by virtue of statutory concessionary tariff items. Approximately a year and a half ago, the customs tariff was amended to adopt an international system of numbering. In that conversion, or slotting of all the items into one group during the redrafting of the schedules, there was a mix-up. For some reason, everything duty-free on the petroleum equipment side of the page on the schedule was missing.

In effect, when the harmonization system came into effect on January 1, a lot of oil field equipment and apparatus such as well logging equipment, well perforating equipment, seismic instruments, pressure maintenance or other formation pressure improvement equipment became subject to a 3 per cent to approximately 10 per cent duty. This represents tens of millions of dollars in duty, all because of a mistake. I would like to see fast action on that problem. This equipment is vital to the oil industry. It is vital to the drilling contractors and to the Petroleum Service Association of Canada.

During 1986, when oil prices fell from $35 Canadian a barrel to some $15 or $16 a barrel, the industry came to a slowdown. More than three-quarters of the drilling rigs in western Canada were put out of operation. When the drilling rigs are not operating, the service companies also become inactive.

Progressive Conservative Government policies and programs have been able to assist the medium and the small sized producers by providing incentives to go back to explore, drill, develop and produce. We are working our way out of a very slow time, when over 40,000 in the Province of Alberta were laid off as a result of that slowdown in the oil and gas industry.

As a result of a mistake with regard to the harmonizing system that was put into effect on January 1, the drilling contractors who are importing some portions of equipment, as well as the petroleum service industry, are now faced with an unfair duty that they should not be paying at all. I have been working to rectify this mistake and I believe the process should be much faster.

The implementation of Motion No. 101 which would repeal Section 17 of the Financial Administration Act would require all remissions to be submitted to Parliament. It would create further delays because, unfortunately, the parliamentary system sometimes can come to a crawl, a standstill and indeed, a dead stop. Companies and people need to be assisted in the most efficient and quickest way possible.

Today I understand that these conversions and remission proposals go through a review committee where they are thoroughly reviewed, as they should be. Once they have been approved by the committee, they go to the Minister who reviews the details and recommendations. They then go to Cabinet, and once they have been reviewed by Cabinet they finally receive an order in council. This is extremely important for either the remission or conversion to go through.

I also want to pay a compliment with regard to the remission order with respect to an excellent equestrian area in Calgary called Spruce Meadows. Some time ago they were able to purchase some specialized timing equipment for international events. The equipment had to be purchased overseas and there was a large duty factor on it. Through the assistance of the Department and the committee review of this particular issue, we were able to have the duty remitted, mainly because Spruce Meadows does entertain international equestrian teams for international events. This is an area where fast action took precedence, and I want to compliment the Department.

That is why it is important for Section 17 to remain in the Act. If it came to a parliamentary review, it may take many months to be put on the agenda, and many hours of debate may slow many companies and individuals to a point where people may be put out of action.

I am pleased to speak on this motion today and hope that Section 17 will remain in the Act. I hope the entire procedure can be speeded up so that everyone who has duties or tariffs that prove to be unfair or injurious can have them remitted as quickly as possible.

Let me say on behalf of drilling contractors and petroleum service people in the riding of Calgary South and Calgary generally that their proposal has been approved and is in the Minister's hands today. I believe the system that is in place provides the most efficient service.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard—Anjou): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity today to speak to motion No. M-101 in the name of the Hon. Member for York East (Mr. Redway), who is also a member of the Public Accounts Committee which in the past made a study of this question and reported to Parliament on the remission of taxes, fees or penalties.

First of all, Mr. Speaker, to make sure everyone understands what we are talking about—fiscal matters tend to be so complex that even the experts get confused—I would like to quote Section 17 which allows the remission of taxes or penalties. Mr. Speaker, I will now quote Section 17 which provides: "The Governor in Council, on the recommendation of the Treasury Board, whenever he considers it in the public interest, may remit any tax, fee or penalty".

• (1710)

Mr. Speaker, today we are talking about repealing this section which currently allows the Government, on recommendation of the Governor in Council, in circumstances when it is in the public interest or economically preferable, to forgive income tax owed to the Government by a company, an institution or a private citizen.

Mr. Speaker, as I said at the outset, the Public Accounts Committee drafted a very detailed report on the question, after the Auditor General of Canada's reminder on March 31, 1985, in connection with the income tax remission granted to Hudson Bay's Oil and Gas Company Ltd., a subsidiary of Dome Petroleum Ltd., in February 1985.

Mr. Speaker, the report contains a number of recommendations. For instance, the Public Accounts Committee recommended under No. 7 of its report tabled in the House on October 28, 1986: The tabling in Parliament of all income tax remission orders; the preparation of an explanatory note, to accompany each remission order so tabled, outlining why the remission order is in the public interest; the reference of all remission orders so tabled to the appropriate Standing Committees; and the prior approval by Parliament of all income tax remission orders exceeding $20 million in value.

Mr. Speaker, we have here a recommendation by the Public Accounts Committee which says that income tax remissions should not exceed $20 million, and we have a motion that says that the Government should consider the advisability: "of repealing Section 17 of the Financial Administration Act and require that all remissions of taxes, fees or penalties be submitted, each year, to Parliament for approval".

Mr. Speaker, I believe Parliament has the right to review all tax remissions. We have income tax legislation that is clear and specific, with whose provisions all Canadians, whether private citizens or corporations, must comply. If the Government, and I think the Government has a right to make that decision, if the Government considers that it is in the public interest, it should grant remission of income tax or penalty or interest or whatever, but I also think that the Government should provide Parliament, in a report or through the Auditor General . . . that was actually how the whole thing started, how we found out about the problem, when the Auditor General reported he had been unable to obtain the requisite information on this transaction.

I recognize the fact that the Government is entitled to act under Section 17 but I also think this section should not always be kept secret in the case of such transactions, and I don't think it should be left up to the Government or to the corporation but to Parliament, which represents the people of this country, which represents all taxpayers who have a right to know all the details and what the justification was . . . in other words, if the Government makes this decision, it should at least let taxpayers know, through Parliament, what its reasons were for making the decision. I think that this would let us give the Government an opportunity to take the appropriate action in the public interest and then call the Government to account for what it has done; it could report directly to Parliament or through the Auditor General's report so that we could know whether the reasons why such a remission of tax, interest or penalty was necessary.

I believe that the same goes for all the other recommendations of the Public Accounts Committee. For example, I quote the recommendation in Section 9 of the Public Accounts Committee report: "Your Committee recommends that the Minister of Finance in future ensure that income tax remission orders do not deal with any matter currently before Parliament." This is to avoid conflicts of interest, etc.

So, Mr. Speaker, I agree that we need a Section 17 to allow the Government to make tax remissions if it sees fit in the public interest, but at the same time, the Government must account for its actions and report to Parliament.

We have a tax system—and I said at the very beginning that it was a very complex system that no one can understand—that gets more complex from time to time, especially these days, and every time we want to improve it, every time we talk about tax reform, Mr. Speaker, this system becomes more complex.

In the 1970s, we had a tax reform and it was really six months after the new Tax Act was passed—there were so many amendments that it was impossible to figure out. Nearly twenty years later, we have another tax reform, which is even more complex.

Why are the tax laws so complex? The reason is the Tax Act does not concern only taxes. If we just said, "Taxes must be paid, period," fine. But the tax law is meant to take account of the regions. Each region has its own needs. Different sectors of our society have needs. So we have a tax system that addresses particular social, economic and political situations and thus creates all this complexity and exceptions. Often, there are very specific cases, individual cases in the public interest that relate to regional economic development, so the Government, for the sake of regional development and in the public interest, grants tax exemptions or waives an interest penalty, but I think that like any democratic government, after taking such action, it must report to Parliament.

Mr. Speaker, I think that this is the distinction I make in this debate between the motion to repeal and have Parliament approve all remissions and the Public Accounts Committee report that sets a limit of $20 million on transactions.

One need only explain why, in our budget process every year, the Minister of Finance must maintain strict secrecy. The reason is that transactions affecting our economic system might lead to speculation. If people knew beforehand, they could take advantage of it. That is why, at the same time as we ask the Government to allow tax remissions, we ask that before accepting them, they be considered in Parliament; I think that it would take about the same amount of time. It is a matter of passing a Bill. I think that we often have to act quickly in such cases, because of the economic effects. It is better if the public is not informed in advance.

But once the action is taken, once the tax remission is granted, Mr. Speaker, it is very important for any democratic government to report to Parliament—that is the least it can do—and give the Auditor General all the information when the books are audited; the Government must act like any good householder or corporate citizen. When the auditor arrives at the company's office, he must be provided with all supporting documents and all the reasons why a particular action was taken, why such a transaction was approved. And the same goes for the Government of Canada, Mr. Speaker. In this case, in the public interest, I agree that it should continue to be allowed to remit taxes, provided of course it is in the public interest, in accordance with Section 17, but once such action is taken, at least once a year, it should report to Parliament, which represents the people, so that Parliament can judge on behalf of Canadian taxpayers whether the Government has acted in accordance with Section 17 of the Act, under its mandate; it is on this precise point that the Canadian people can judge the Government.

So on that, Mr. Speaker, I would like to conclude my remarks and of course I hope that at the end of this debate, my colleagues can deal with this motion so that we can perhaps send the Government a message to make an amendment and find a solution between outright repeal and setting a $20-million ceiling, so that the Government can grant tax remissions but must report them to Parliament when it does.

[English]

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, it is always a useful exercise to have a debate about the expenditure of public funds or the non-collection of taxes which we are talking about here when we are considering Section 17 of the Financial Administration Act. Section 17 allows remission orders to be made either to say that people do not have to pay a certain tax which they would normally have to pay, or to rebate those moneys to them either conditionally or unconditionally once the taxes have been paid. As parliamentarians we always have to keep a watchful eye on the financial dealings of the Government. That is one of our prime responsibilities.

I want to say this in respect to the proposition put forward by my colleague from York East (Mr. Redway). My heart is with the Hon. Member but my head is with the existing Section 17. It would be nice to say that Parliament should monitor every particular expenditure of Government immediately before it is made, or look at every particular remission order before it is made. But in actual fact I do not think that is possible. There are hundreds if not thousands of remission orders made annually, and if Parliament were to scrutinize every one of those in advance, we would be doing very little else. However, occasionally, and I might get back to this later in my remarks, a very political one or one involving great amounts of money can slip by. If we could isolate those particular remission orders and have a parliamentary debate on them before they took place, that would be the ideal situation. How we would do that I do not quite know.

Both the existing Financial Administration Act and the Hon. Member for York East recognize that there has to be a provision for remission orders. There has to be authority in legislation for the making of those remission orders. That authority, under the existing legislation, is Section 17(1) which states as follows: "The Governor in Council, on the recommendation of the Treasury Board, whenever he considers it in the public interest, may remit any tax, fee or penalty". If we were, as was suggested, just to get rid of Section 17, then we would have to re-examine the Financial Administration Act, or some other Act, to put back that authority. Presumably, that is recognized by my colleague from York East.

However, were we to act on his recommendations we would then require an additional stage in the process by which remission orders are granted. There would be a necessity for parliamentary consent, and I presume that that would mean the passage of a special Bill. Annually, or as the need arose, Parliament would be presented with a Bill listing these various remission orders that the Government proposed to make. That Bill would then have to go through the proceedings in this House and then over to the other place and receive Royal Assent the same as any other Bill. That could be a very time consuming process. For people on the government side of the House I can see a difficulty there in that it could take a great deal of time away from other government business which ought to be debated and which should be debated here.

There has to be provision for public and parliamentary scrutiny. It would be wrong if that provision did not exist. It exists to a certain extent in the present law. If we cared to examine Section 17(8), we would see that it states therein that a statement of each remission order of $1,000 or more granted under this section shall be reported to the House of Commons in the Public Accounts. So each year for those remission orders in respect of the previous year presentation is made to the House of Commons by way of the Public Accounts. Of course, that goes to the parliamentary committee which can study it in detail. Thus there is provision for scrutiny.

These remission orders are listed and made available to parliamentarians and the public at large so that they can be examined. If a parliamentary committee so chooses, it can call witnesses before it to say why a particular remission order was granted. It has wide-ranging authorities in that respect. So there is that element of parliamentary control that exists within the current system.

Also, as with any other Order in Council—and remission orders have to be made by way of Orders in Council—there is an obligation that these be published in The Canada Gazette. In this way any subscriber to The Canada Gazette can take the current issue and look at what remission orders are in the process of being granted. Sometimes it makes very interesting reading. However, I doubt very much if many people actually read them. If a parliamentarian had reason to question a particular remission order, it would be available to him at the time of publication in The Canada Gazette and could be brought up in the House.

I think there is in respect of most remission orders an adequate system of public and parliamentary scrutiny and that we need not necessarily go the full route suggested by the Hon. Member for York East in order that parliamentarians might do their work respecting remission orders.

I was going to go into a whole list of types of remission orders with which I am familiar, in particular the canned baby carrots remission order. Because I have only a minute or so remaining, I will not get into the details about canned baby carrots and the taxation thereon.

• (1730)

On balance, Sir, if we were to adopt the resolution before us we would have a little more public and parliamentary scrutiny, but we would tie ourselves up in a series of knots and loss of time. We would not be able to get these remission orders through in time. They are often badly needed, for example, by the marketer of canned baby carrots, or by some of the examples given to us by the previous speaker.

That, Sir, is my contribution to this great debate.

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate this afternoon on Motion No. 101 standing in the name of the Hon. Member for York East (Mr. Redway). My feelings are not unlike those of my colleague who just spoke, the Hon. Member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson). I have a lot of sympathy for what my colleague, the Hon. Member for York East, is attempting to do, but I have some difficulty with the practicalities.

Before I launch into a few comments, I would like to indicate the high respect I have for my colleague, the Hon. Member for York East. We know him here in the House as an ardent and earnest Member of the House. In his capacity as a member of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts he has brought to that committee a high degree of inquisitiveness and, as my colleague the Hon. Member for Western Arctic pointed out, a desire to make sure that the funds spent or the taxes not collected are indeed done in a wise fashion.

Under Motion No. 101 my colleague, the Hon. Member for York East would like to have remission orders of various types, whether they be for taxes, fees, or penalties, brought to the House of Commons. We must acknowledge that due to the work of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts there is a new procedure, as was alluded to by my colleague, the Hon. Member for Western Arctic. The Government now publishes a document every six months. The first one came out recently, and represents the six month period ending March 31, 1988. It documents those cases of remission orders that have been approved by Order in Council in the six months preceding March 31. This is an innovation and it gives Parliament an opportunity to see the reasons why certain funds are being remitted and the circumstances that lead up to that.

For example, in glancing through the report in front of me, it is reported that the Lions Club in Riverside was building homes for handicapped persons. It had to import stoves and ovens that could not be obtained in Canada. They had remitted some $9,940. This was a reasonable thing to do considering the charitable nature of the work the Lions Club was doing in Riverside.

I was even more interested when I turned to the next page and found an example in my own constituency of Oxford where we have been blessed with the building of a large CAMI plant. It is an automotive plant, the largest of all plants being built in Canada under the combined efforts of an American and foreign manufacturer. In this case it is General Motors and Suzuki.

Much of the work going into that plant involves equipment and machinery being brought from Japan, or outside the country. In order for the plant to be competitive with foreign vehicles which would compete against the plant in Ingersoll, the Government has wisely seen fit to remit a significant amount over a period of three years to allow that company to bring in this equipment which will make it more competitive in the manufacture of automobiles.

I do not have to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that a company which will employ somewhere between 2,000 and 2,400 people in my constituency will be a significant addition to our economy. I would think that the amount of money being remitted through this remission order of some $12 million will be more than recaptured by the sales that this company will produce as a result of manufacturing certain automobiles here in Canada, and also exporting them abroad.

There is another interesting problem in my constituency that relates to remission orders, but more in the area of taxation. It comes as a result of the plight of certain tobacco growers at the present time. The tobacco industry is in a downturn. As a result many tobacco growers have found themselves with an immense debt to banks or other financial institutions, often hundreds of thousands of dollars, and sometimes more than the value of their property.

When they go through certain negotiations with the banks, other financial institutions, or the Farm Credit Corporation, it sometimes happens that they are granted certain concessions in terms of repayment. There are provisions under a program instituted by the Department of Agriculture whereby assistance is provided to some tobacco growers who are able to get out of growing tobacco and into some other line of work.

As a result of a combination of factors, it may end up that, because of reductions in moneys owing to a financial institution, the Income Tax Act requires that the taxpayer, the tobacco grower who is in considerable difficulty, has to pay a significant amount of tax in one year when he has not received any money and is grossly in debt to the institutions. Yet at the same time he is expected to fork out a significant amount of money to pay tax on what is deemed to be income in his case. If significant hardship can be demonstrated, a remission order can certainly be requested, and one would hope at times that that might be granted by the Government.

I agree with my colleague, the Hon. Member for Western Arctic that it would be very desirable to have Parliament scrutinize this type of activity where we give Canadian manufacturers concessions. However, to do so, and to bring it before Parliament in each and every case, would certainly be unrealistic, and would add to the burden we already have in the House. When one considers that yesterday we were asked to spend 350 days debating one Bill, one can realize the impracticality of bringing forward dozens of remission orders, whether they be for customs tariffs or income tax.

I applaud the Hon. Member for York East in what he is attempting to do in terms of bringing more openness to the financial aspects of government. However, I do feel I have to oppose this motion in light of the practicalities of the whole problem.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion lost.

I believe there is unanimous consent to suspend the sitting until six o'clock?

Mr. Rossi: There is unanimous consent to adjourn until six o'clock.

SITTING SUSPENDED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 5.40 p.m., the House will suspend sitting until 6 p.m.

At 5.40 p.m. the sitting of the House was suspended.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 6 p.m.

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT IMPLEMENTATION ACT

ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER REPORT AND THIRD READING STAGES OF BILL C-130

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lewis:

> That, in relation to Bill C-130, an Act to implement the free trade agreement between Canada and the United States of America, not more than two further sitting days shall be allotted to the consideration of the report stage, and two sitting days to the consideration of the third reading stage of the Bill; and
> That fifteen minutes before the expiry of the time provided for government business on the second day allotted to report stage consideration and on the second day to third reading stage consideration of the said Bill, any proceedings before the House shall be interrupted, if required, for the purpose of this order and, in turn, every question necessary in order to dispose of the stage of the Bill then under consideration shall be put forthwith and successively, without further debate or amendment.

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as I was saying to the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner) just before we adjourned temporarily for Private Members' Business, the right hon. gentleman should tell the people the truth. It is a very surprising performance for a man, who was once regarded as a man of integrity, to take phrases from one part of the agreement and to apply them to another, distorting the real meaning of the wording and simplifying the application of yet others.

[Translation]

He should tell them the truth, Mr. Speaker. I would like to expand on that, if I may. Last Thursday, on August 11, the Hon. Member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Turner) rose in the House and proudly claimed that under the terms of the agreement, the Government of Quebec would no longer be able to promote investment by Quebecers in Quebec companies. Mr. Speaker, he was referring specifically to the Quebec Stock Savings Plan, better known as the QSSP.

I certainly would not want to question the intelligence of the Right Hon. Member with respect to his reading of the agreement. However, Mr. Speaker, I strongly question his ability to understand the wording without distorting the real meaning. His statement was a reflection on the integrity of the Premier of Quebec, a fervent supporter of the agreement who is well aware of the benefits it will provide for Quebec, and the Leader of the Opposition has proven once again that he has no compunction about resorting to tactics that rely more on rhetoric than on the truth.

If the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition had done his homework and had read the agreement, he would know that the investment provisions do not apply to investment portfolios, and that as a result, various levels of government are entirely free to establish investment promotion programs like the QSSP.

If the Hon. Member has trouble with my interpretation of this provision, perhaps he will accept the interpretation provided by the Premier of Quebec whose irony was apparent on the weekend when he made the following statement, and I quote: "At some time in our lives, we have all made statements based on facts that are not altogether accurate". Mr. Speaker, Mr. Bourassa said these words during the closing ceremony of the sixth convention of the Youth Wing of the Quebec Liberal Party which was held in Sherbrooke on the weekend. At the same convention, militant youth members of the Quebec Liberal Party endorsed a resolution to support the free trade agreement, despite intrusive action by more than 150 delegates from Mr. Turner's party who were sent by his Quebec lieutenant as mercenaries to try and dampen the enthusiasm of Quebec's young Liberals. However, these young people are not as easily taken in as the Leader of the Opposition would like to think. They know that the agreement is a ticket to the future that will give them access to jobs commensurate with their interests and capabilities.

There are others, Mr. Speaker, like the Hon. Member for Laval-des-Rapides (Mr. Garneau), who are lost in their nostalgia for what Canada was like during the last century and who turn a blind eye to this country's potential for the twenty-first century. Mr. Garneau refers to a possible amalgamation of Canada with the United States and spreads fear and panic with his so-called nationalistic tendencies. He says he is fighting to keep Canada independent, but he refuses to understand what this country is all about, a country that has prospered because of its exports. Mr. Speaker, I may remind the Hon. Member that Canada is and always has been a strong country with a distinct identity, and to claim it is on the verge of being assimilated is an insult to the very people who built this country. He hides all too readily behind the alleged values of sovereignty which to him is the same as protectionism. He forgets what his own leader said, and I quote:

[English]

—yielding to protectionism under the guise of economic nationalism is self-defeating for Canada. This country has always prospered under freer rules of international trade". Why is it essential to tell them again and again that the way of securing Canada's sovereignty and culture necessitates a strong economy capable of offering to Canadians security, prosperity and a future based on their hopes and aspirations? It is because they do not envision Canada's future.

[Translation]

How will these same detractors answer Quebecers, Mr. Speaker, if the United States imposes import restrictions on electricity? Will they answer that to save Canadian sovereignty, they preferred to sacrifice more than 8 per cent of Hydro-Québec's total income? Have they explained to Quebecers, Mr. Speaker, that electricity is not yet covered by international trade agreements, that the United States can impose restrictions without incurring the sanctions provided by GATT?

The free trade agreement provides that neither Canada nor the United States can impose duties or other charges, import quotas or any other quantitative restriction on energy imports, including electricity, from the other country, unless an exception is recognized by GATT.

Have they explained to Quebecers, Mr. Speaker, that a strong protectionist tendency is now growing in the United States and threatens the viability of our trade with our largest trading partner? Have they told them, Mr. Speaker, that our country's economy is heavily dependent on foreign trade, that more than 30 per cent of our national income and over 3 million jobs depend on this trade?

No, Mr. Speaker, they just raised fear by using false pretexts! In particular, they suggested that Canada would lose power over its water and the legitimate right to control this natural resource. They spoke of our lakes and rivers eventually drying up, but what was really drying up was their own ideas.

Our Government, Mr. Speaker, has removed any controversy by amending Bill C-130, because again they had spread doubt and fear.

And they have done even more by their acts of omission. They have intentionally not said that their leader was and still is the only leader of a national party to have suggested using water as a bargaining tool for greater access to the American market. In a speech to the U.S. Chamber of Commerce on December 9, 1965, Mr. Turner said, and I quote:

[English]

—and if some day we can agree to the sharing of this continent's water by offering some of our water for export, we might want at that time to insist that if water is to be considered as a continental resource, markets should also be considered on the same basis. We might wish to export—not for money—as we sold power under the Columbia River Treaty, but in return for access to your market".

History definitely has its ironies, Mr. Speaker!

[English]

We have heard an entire litany of myths, allegations and innuendoes regarding this free trade agreement from the Leader of the Opposition. We have yet to hear any reasonable arguments, any rational debate for substantive opposition from Mr. Turner. The quantity of his material is prolific but the quality of his debate is pathetic.

The people of Canada want to know about free trade. They do not need more simplistic argumentation without any basis of fact. It is time for Mr. Turner to either articulate a real reason as to why he cannot support this agreement, or he should admit that his opposition is based on nothing more than political opportunism, and I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, since you are indicating that my time is finished, that Canadians will remember.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, in bringing in closure to stop this debate on free trade, after only two days of debate at the report stage of the proceedings, the Government is committing a total affront to parliamentary democracy. Here we have what the Government claims to be the most important piece of legislation to be presented in this Parliament, and it has allowed five days of debate at second reading. Now, after two days of debate at the report stage, it is going to allow two more days at report stage, which is four days of debate at report stage, and then it will close down the debate with two days of debate at third reading.

In addition, the Government also imposed closure in the legislative committee when it only allowed three weeks of hearings for witnesses. There was a large demand for witnesses, not only to hold hearings here in Ottawa but all over the country.

With this most important piece of legislation, the Government has imposed closure at every stage of proceedings. The debates have been of very brief duration. As I said, there was five days of debate at second reading, three weeks in committee to hear from witnesses and groups representing the people of Canada, and now there will be four days at report stage and two days at third reading.

The Government has said that imposing closure is justified because the opposition Parties have already made up their minds. They say that the Liberals have already made up their minds, they are against the agreement. The NDP Members have made up their minds, they are against the agreement. Since the Members of both Parties in opposition have made up their minds, why bother continuing with the debate? The Government completely misunderstands the purpose of debate in this House.

No one presumes for one minute that by debating issues in this House, we will convince government Members to change their minds and vote with the Opposition. We know that the Government has 211 Members and the Opposition has about 70 Members. We know that we will be out-voted on every issue on every occasion.

The purpose of debate is not to convince Members on the other side that they should vote with us; the purpose of the debate is to elucidate what is being debated for the benefit of the public outside the House, the great Canadian public, the citizens of Canada, so they will understand what we are debating. If we are limited to only four days on report stage and two days at third reading, we will not have time to explain to the Canadian public the faults of this particular legislation. Nor would the Government, if it were interested, have the time to explain the good points about the legislation. I say "if it were interested", because it is obvious from this debate, both at second reading and at report stages, that government Members are not really debating the details of this agreement. They are debating theoretical free trade.

Time and again, Members have said what a great thing free trade is and what it will do for Canada. However, they are not debating this very specific agreement with the United States. We in the Opposition, on the other hand, are debating the specific details of the agreement. To do so, we need time. That is why it is a travesty of parliamentary democracy that the Government is closing down debate after such a short period of time.

We are not interested in convincing those people over there. We would like to, but we know that that is a lost battle. With these many amendments, we are trying to bring to the attention of the Canadian public the failings and faults of the legislation so that Canadians will better understand it once we have an election.

I mentioned that we are interested in the details of the legislation. In addition, we take the position that the Government had no mandate for this legislation at the time of the election in 1984. It was not mentioned during the election campaign of 1984. As a matter of fact, the only words we heard from the leading figures of the Government prior to the election were spoken in 1983 when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) said:

> "Canadians rejected free trade with the United States in 1911. They would do so again in 1983. Canada must increase its share of total world trade, which has dropped by 33 per cent in the past two decades."

What did the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) say in 1983? He said:

> "Bilateral free trade with the United States is simplistic and naive. It would only serve to further diminish our ability to compete internationally."

What did the former Secretary of State, David Crombie, say? He said:

> "It's silly. Canada must improve relations in trade with the United States, of course. But our natural destiny is to become a global leader, not American's weak sister."

The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) said similar words. Before the election campaign of 1984, these were the positions of the leading figures in the Government. During the election campaign of 1984, nothing was said.

In 1986, they started negotiating this agreement following the Shamrock Summit between the President of the United States and the Prime Minister in Quebec City. They started negotiating this agreement without any mandate, and then in October of 1987, we received a 35-page Elements of Agreement, which we were given little time to be debated. I believe there was a short one or two-day opposition day debate on that. Then in December, we received the 1,400-page full free trade agreement, and we had three days to debate that. We had three days of debate on a 1,400-page agreement a few days after it was sent to our offices, but the debate was not on the legislation. We only received the legislation in May of this year, a few months ago.

A few moments ago, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Cadieux) was accusing the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner) of not telling the truth with respect to this agreement. He said that the Leader of the Opposition distorted in a serious way the terms of the agreement, and he referred to his recent questions with respect to the Quebec investment plan. I must say to the Minister of Labour, though he has left the House now, that he himself should practise what he preaches. He has distorted the words of the Leader of the Opposition.

The Leader of the Opposition at no time said that the Canadian version of the agreement prevented the Quebec Government or the people of Quebec from having their particular stock promotion plan. What he said was the following:

> "Nevertheless, the official statement or official interpretation by President Reagan says, on page 86, that a province shall grant investors from the other country the same favourable treatment granted investors from that province.
> President Reagan is saying that the Government of Québec cannot use special measures to encourage Québecers to invest in their own province."

I read the response of Premier Bourassa. In his response, he did not refer to the American interpretation. He once again referred to the Canadian agreement and he also referred to the present plan and not to future plans.

When the Minister of Labour and the Minister for International Trade start accusing the Leader of the Opposition of distorting the truth, they should practise what they preach. They should not distort what the Leader of the Opposition said as recorded in Hansard of August 11, 1988, at page 18199.

Earlier this afternoon, the—

Mr. McDermid: You're choking on that.

Mr. Allmand: Yes, I am, because I have a cold. I am doing my best, and I wish you would accept that.

Mr. McDermid: You are choking on your own words.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary does not have very much to say so he is trying to bug me about my cold.

Earlier this afternoon, the very rambunctious Minister for International Trade was launching forth, as he usually does, with all sorts of wild statements. Of course, he referred to the proposed action by our Party to delay the passage of this Bill in the Senate in order to force an election so that the people could decide whether or not they want this agreement. It is our policy that since there was no mandate for the free trade agreement with the United States in 1984 and since it is such an important matter that will change the fabric and the nature of this country so much, it should be decided in a national election. We have decided that in order for that to happen, since we are massively out-voted in the House by the large government majority, we will delay the legislation. We will not defeat it but delay it in the Senate so that that can occur.

The Minister for International Trade, of course, was very critical of that. He started making fun of the Senate and referred to the fact that Senators are not elected and were mostly appointed by Liberals. At the beginning of this Parliament, and as a matter of fact, on May 9, 1985, in response to challenges from opposition Parties to reform the Senate, the Government finally put before this House a motion to reform the Senate. That motion to reform the Senate provided that money Bills that were sent to the Senate would be passed automatically after 30 days and non-money Bills that were not passed by the Senate after 45 days would be automatically passed.

The Leader of the Opposition challenged the Prime Minister to proceed with the legislation and said that he would support it, but that was never done. This motion to reform the Senate died on the Order Paper and was never passed by the Government because the Government did not have the political will to reform the Senate.

• (1820)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that the Hon. Member's time has expired.

Mr. John McDermid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I have been sitting here waiting to get in on this debate because I have listened to members of the Opposition moan, cry, weep and complain about time allocation on Bill C-130, an Act to implement the free trade agreement. They say we have not had time to debate. I am going to try to cover some of the points that the opposition Members have raised.

How can we take them seriously? First, the Right Hon. Leader of the Liberal Party said, yes, he would form a coalition government. Then, no, he would not form a coalition government. We have the Leader of the NDP saying, certainly, we will form a coalition. Yes, we have seen the first signs of it. Here it is in a letter to our House Leader. Our House Leader said, let us have an orderly debate, let us have time allocation here, come back with your ideas on time allocation. Here is what they came back with. They proposed, and both the Liberal House Leader and the NDP House Leader signed this, that there should be 150 days of debate at report stage. Then they had the audacity to suggest another 200 days for third reading.

How can you treat the Opposition Parties seriously when they bring in this kind of nonsense? They are talking about over two years of House time in debate. They are talking about ignoring day care, ignoring tax reform, ignoring the refurbishing of the Armed Forces, ignoring a myriad of issues we have to debate in this House. Now they are moaning and groaning because we have limited the debate.

They say we have not had time to debate. Let me just give you the figures on second reading alone. The Liberal Party put up 22 speakers on second reading. Their critic spoke three times. Four Members spoke twice. Yet they say they did not have time to debate it. Not only did they have that many people speaking, but on the third day of second reading they ran out of speakers. Let us take a look at the NDP. Twenty of them spoke, eight of them twice, on second reading. Their critic, the Hon. Member for Essex—Windsor (Mr. Langdon), spoke three times. They ran out of speakers on the same night. Do you know who carried the debate to make sure it went the whole five days? The Conservative Party carried the debate. They could not carry it that night, they ran out of speakers, and we kept the debate going. Now they are moaning and groaning because we are going to limit the time for debate. That is total nonsense.

They are saying we do not have time to discuss this with the public. We are ramming it through. The free trade debate has been going on in this country now for over three years. The agreement was signed January 2 or January 3 and this legislation has been before the House since May. All we have seen since May are stalling tactics, not genuine debate, not serious study of a Bill.

I have to give the NDP Members full marks. They stood up and said what they were going to do. They were going to obstruct and do everything they can to stop the debate, not to have a serious debate. They do not want to sit down and inform the public of what this is all about and how important it is to Canada. No, they just want to obstruct.

They say we need a lot more debate. I was reading something rather interesting the other day about the debate in the British Parliament over joining the European Economic Community. The total time taken to decide that important stage of legislation dealing with the decision to enter the European Economic Community took a total of 18 hours. We have been debating this for hours and hours and hours. Some days have involved extended hours, and every day of extended hours is like two days of debate. Members opposite fail to mention that in their great moaning and groaning about the lack of time to debate.

When we finish report stage debate we will have had a total of five days of debate, three of which will be extended hours so that is basically an extra three days of debate. When third reading comes along it will probably be two days of extended debate, so that is really four days. The Opposition Members could not sustain the debate on second reading and there is no reason to think they can do it on third reading. We are into well over a couple of hundred hours of debate in one form or another, yet Great Britain debated entering the European Economic Community for only 18 hours.

Then we have to deal with the red herrings the opposition Members bring up. They say we did not have a mandate. I keep hearing we do not have a mandate to negotiate this agreement. I went back just to take a look at the commitments that the Conservative Party made during the last election on trade matters. One of them was to develop stronger trading relations without limiting the access of developing nations. That is exactly what this agreement does. Another plank in the platform was working toward a reduction in world trading barriers. What is this all about? Reduction of trading barriers. That is exactly what we are talking about. That is what we campaigned on.

We campaigned on assisting our service industries in penetrating foreign markets. That is what this agreement does. Most of the two million new jobs needed in Canada in the 1980s will be in the service sector. We campaigned on creating a framework in which that sector can better compete worldwide. What are we talking about? That is exactly what this agreement does. We campaigned on working closely with provincial Governments and regional industries to develop local initiatives that will both increase exports and develop stronger regional economies. That is out of our campaign literature and that is exactly what this free trade agreement does. We campaigned on economic renewal in this country and part of that, I must say, is the free trade agreement. We have a mandate.

Let me just wind up by saying this. The Opposition Parties love to go around and quote the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and some of the candidates for the leadership, but since that time we have had a royal commission on the economy report to Parliament recommending free trade. We have had the Economic Council of Canada report recommending free trade. We have had the C. D. Howe Institute report recommending free trade along with other independent thinkers in this country, including the business community, both small, medium and large.

That evidence was presented to the Government. When it was, we made a decision to get an agreement. If that evidence had been presented and this Government had not acted on it, we would have heard the moaning and groaning and crying from across the House. They would be asking, why are you not paying any attention to the evidence presented to the Parliament of Canada? We did pay attention and that is why we brought in this agreement. That is why it is a good thing for Canada.

We will be debating this issue over the next period of time. Time allocation is necessary because the Opposition is not interested in debating the facts.

• (1830)

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have this opportunity to speak, particularly following the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister for International Trade (Mr. McDermid). He took a lot of time to tell us that the proposal which was put before this House by the House Leaders of the two opposition Parties was unrealistic. Perhaps it was. However, we must remember that Bill C-130 is not an ordinary Bill. It is an omnibus Bill which will amend 27 other Bills.

In the House of Commons it takes anywhere from 10 to 15 days to amend a Bill. If you multiply 27 pieces of legislation for amendment by 10 days each, that is 270 days. At 15 days each, that is 405 days. If we debated each of the Bills that we are amending through this omnibus Bill for 15 days, it would take us 405 days.

Allow me to list the Bills that are going to be amended. They are: the Canada Agricultural Products Standards Act, the Department of Agriculture Act, the Bank Act, the Broadcasting Act, the Canada Wheat Board Act, the Copyright Act, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff Act, the Excise Tax Act, the Export and Import Permits Act, the Canada Grain Act, the Importation of Intoxicating Liquors Act, and the Income Tax Act. We have been trying to amend the Income Tax Act for the last year and a half and have not done very well; it is still on the Order Paper. Along with amending 26 other Acts we are going to amend this Act in four days.

The other Bills to be amended are: the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, the Investment Canada Act, the Investment Companies Act, the Loan Companies Act, the Meat Import Act, the Meat Inspection Act, the National Energy Board Act, the Seeds Act, the Standards Council of Canada Act, the Statistics Act, the Textile and Clothing Board Act, the Trust Companies Act, and the Western Grain Transportation Act.

Many of these Bills have been before the House for 25 to 30 years and they are being amended by this piece of legislation. Had this been done methodically, as the Government should have done it, we would have had 27 different Bills.

No one can tell me how the Acts affecting my area of concern, agriculture, will be affected by this legislation. We needed to hear witnesses on every one of the agricultural Acts which are being changed. Instead of that, witnesses on agriculture were given a mere couple of hours each in which to comment on the Canada Agricultural Products Standard Act, the Department of Agriculture Act, the Canadian Wheat Board Act, the Western Grain Transportation Act, the Seeds Act, and the Canada Grain Act. It is not unrealistic to suggest that this legislation should have taken a year or two to get through this House.

Democratic government operates well only if it operates with the consent of the governed. That is an accepted basis of democratic governments all over the world. That does not mean that a government receives a majority one year and then forgets about the people of Canada for the next four years. It means that the government keeps in contact with the people of Canada daily and ensures that it knows how they are reacting to the legislation being put before them.

We know how the people of Canada are reacting to this legislation. Seventy per cent of the people of Canada think there should have been an election before these 27 Bills were amended. A large portion of the population, approximately 51 per cent, disagrees with this trade deal.

When I ask people on the street about the free trade deal being pushed through the House of Commons they tell me that they do not understand what it is about. There is not enough information out there to inform them on what it is about. They do not believe what the Government is telling them and they do not believe what I am telling them. They want to know the facts from a non-political point of view.

I tell people that they are going to have to choose a government on the basis of whether or not they want this free trade agreement. Just because they do not know enough about it does not mean that they will not vote on it. I ask them how they will vote on it and they tell me that since they do not know very much about it they will vote against it. Very few people who do not know what this free trade deal is about are willing to take the chance and, in a leap of faith, vote for something which will affect them they know not how. They do not trust the people who are telling them that it is good for them.

"This country could not survive with a policy of unfettered free trade". Sounds familiar? "I'm all in favour of eliminating unfair protectionism where it exists. This is a separate country. We'd be swamped. We have in many ways a branch-plant economy, in many ways, in certain important sectors".

That quotation comes from an interview of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) by John Gray in The Globe and Mail in June of 1983. The Prime Minister said, "All that would happen with that kind of concept would be the boys cranking up their plants throughout the United States in bad times and shutting their entire branch plants in Canada. It's bad enough as it is". The people believed the Prime Minister when he said that in 1983 and they elected him. But he has sold his electors down the river. Canadians have not given their consent to this legislation. We should not have to go through it in the time to which we are being limited by this closure motion.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, there are very few things that have happened to me in my years in this House that have made me as proud to be a Canadian and a Conservative as this trading agreement. It is one of the most significant achievements we have been able to make in this Parliament. It is significant because of what it will do for Canadians, whether they are rich or poor, young or old. Every Canadian will have a higher standard of living as a consequence of this free trade deal because prices will go down.

History tells us that when small nations have entered into singular trade relations with larger nations, it has resulted in more and better paying jobs for the smaller nations. In every case, the smaller nation was very dependent on the larger nation prior to the trading relationship. Today, when the United States sneezes, we catch a cold because 80 per cent of our exports go to the United States and one-third of our jobs relate to exports. We are affected by protectionism in the United States.

We can expect increased productivity in the future from free trade, which will help us capture a larger share of the European, Japanese and other markets in the world. In 20 years we can expect that about 65 per cent of our exports will go to the United States, with 35 per cent going to other places in the world. We will be less dependent and less threatened by our relationship with one country. Therefore, free trade will result in lower prices, more jobs, better paying jobs and less dependency on the United States.

We have witnessed the filibustering tactics of the Opposition for over two years. In September, 1984, there was a massive change in government. We achieved the largest majority in Canadian parliamentary history, not because we were so wonderful, but because people understood that those who had been governing this country were not getting the job done. The Liberal Party really learned that because its members were almost wiped out.

The only reason the Liberals are filibustering today is that they do not want us to complete the job we were elected to do in 1984, which is to straighten out this country, get control of inflation and put 1.5 million Canadians who did not have jobs in September, 1984, back to work. We have made progress, but our target is for 2 million, 2.5 million and then three million more Canadians with jobs. The free trade agreement is a big piece of that agenda.

Canadians voted for change. Both opposition Parties stand consistently in the House seeking to go back where we were before, when Canadians were out of jobs, our standard of living was dropping like a rock, and prices were rising like balloons. Interest rates were 22 per cent and 23 per cent. Those were the results of the policies of those two Parties. We must not forget it.

This agreement is good for Canada and every Member in the Opposition knows and understands that. Yet they waste the time of this Chamber, at about $500,000 a day. Every dilatory tactic by the Opposition costs Canadian taxpayers another $500,000 in wasted money.

Yesterday the Opposition asked for Parliament to continue for another 350 days of debate on this issue. Such a debate alone would cost Canadian taxpayers $175 million in order to listen to the kind of speeches we have been hearing. Do Canadians want to spend $175 million of their money on this debate?

They do not want an election when we have kept our commitments. The Opposition wants to stop us from keeping our commitments in the hope that Canadians can be persuaded to go back to the old ways of unemployment, high inflation and so on. In addition, the Opposition has been somewhat sneaky about this. They stand up to say that they have not had much time to debate the free trade agreement.

Let us examine this situation and compare June, 1987, with June, 1988, when we were trying to begin the free trade debate. In June, 1987, we dealt with 23 Bills and three other major issues in this Chamber. In June, 1988, we were only able to deal with 14, 11 of which were dealt with in three days. In June, 1987, there were no dilatory motions and phoney votes on the introduction of Private Members' Bills. This June, there were 19, which, at an average of an hour each, represented six of the 21 sitting days in this Chamber. It cost Canadian taxpayers $3 million to watch us vote and hear the bells ring in the month of June. That took us into extended hours, with overtime for the House of Commons staff and so on.

Our first Ways and Means motion related to this legislation was first brought into the House on May 18. The opposition Members argued on procedural grounds right through to June 8, before we could even bring it into the House. That took three weeks of House time when they could have been debating if they sincerely wanted to debate the free trade issue.

We have made an assessment of this. There were eight opposition days on free trade before we got anywhere near this stage. There were two government motions and four days of debate in March and December, 1987, representing 12 days of debate on this issue in this Chamber in 1987.

The Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade spent 120 hours in hearings. In normal parliamentary days, that is equivalent to 40 days in substantive time.

At the committee stage on this Bill, there were 87 hours of hearings, 59 witnesses and 350 submissions. That is the equivalent of 29 days of parliamentary time. There were 12 days of debate in equivalent time on the second reading stage in this House. There will be the equivalent of seven days in terms of report and third reading stages.

I have added these numbers, which come to a total of 341 hours which Members have spent on this issue. In terms of normal parliamentary days, it represents 114 days at an average of three hours of substantive time per day. This Chamber will have spent 114 days on this issue, which is enough.

Canadians elected this Government to govern. They wanted better health care, they wanted inflation under control, they wanted better pensions, they wanted more fairness in the system. They wanted the economy strengthened and they wanted jobs to be created. We have done that for them as rapidly as we could over the last four years while straightening out the mess we inherited. This is another piece in that process and I am proud to look forward to 10 minutes from now when I can vote for time allocation so that this Bill can get out of the Chamber and into the Senate. Hopefully those unelected people in the other place will see the wisdom of bowing to the will of the democratically elected Members of this Parliament.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, it was very discouraging to hear a speech like that and follow the Parliamentary Secretary on his cheap accounting of parliamentary time and how it is used.

We all believe—unfortunately the Parliamentary Secretary does not—that the House of Commons is a place which distributes information to the public because the public has a right to get it. The public after hearing different partisan voices, then makes up its mind. That is what this place is all about. It is not a place where you count dollars and cents to determine how long a debate should go because it is costing so much. It is a place, instead, from which the public can make up its mind about what is going on. The facts speak more than the empty, pathetic rhetoric of the Parliamentary Secretary.

In this debate, which was introduced in May of this year, not a year ago, not six months ago, but in May, in this Chamber on second reading we have had some 26 hours of debate and at report stage we have had some six hours and 24 minutes. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, is that an unreasonable length of time on a piece of legislation which, as the Hon. Member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo) has indicated along with others, covers some 27 pieces of existing legislation that will have to be changed as a result of this measure? Is it an unreasonable length of time to have 26 hours on second reading and only six hours and 24 minutes on report stage debate?

The sad and unfortunate fact is that when you are in government and you are embarrassed, you call closure. When you are in government and you do not know how to deal with the arguments of the opposition, you then bring in closure. In other words, when you run out of arguments and do not know how to deal with the arguments put forward by the opposition, you invoke closure. That was typical last Friday when we dealt with the question about why in an international agreement Canada is not defined in the opening clauses, not even included, while the United States is. This document mentions Canada and the U.S. all the way through. It was sad to see the weak defence which the Government put forward explaining why Canada had been forgotten in one of the major opening clauses.

Mr. McDermid: It has not been forgotten, and you know it.

Mr. Caccia: The Government is embarrassed, uneasy and will impose closure to move ahead.

The Government has forgotten to seek the advice and information essential to make sure this agreement is in the interests of Canadians. I refer specifically to the environment.

This agreement is a bilateral one. All the points which the Parliamentary Secretary made earlier would refer to multilateral, global agreements. This one is not one of those. When the talk began, the Canadian Environmental Advisory Council raised a number of interesting questions and brought them to the attention of the Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan) and through him to the Government. For instance, it said that Canada's freedom to impose environmental regulations and to yield subsidies and tax incentives to pursue the social goals of a clean environment and sound resource management must not be restricted by any freer trade agreement.

Did the Government take any cognizance of that? It did not. Did it launch any study of this point? Unfortunately, it did not. The Advisory Council went on and made another point. It said there will be pressures to reduce costs. In the absence of uniform standards and inevitable enforcement there could be pressure from Canadian firms or firms wishing to locate in Canada to reduce the short-term costs of production in Canada by reducing expenditures for pollution control and for sound long-term resource management. Did the Government pay any attention to this point made exactly two and a half years ago? No, Mr. Speaker, unfortunately not.

The Advisory Council made another point in this paper. It asked whether a free trade agreement achieved either bilaterally or multilaterally would require Canada to adopt another nation's environmental legislative and management approach. Was that explored? It was not. We ended up, as in the case of pesticides, with a notion that we should harmonize our regulations with American regulations. We know who will harmonize with whom. It is not the bigger with the smaller, it is always the smaller with the bigger because that is the way harmonization works out.

I see you are getting impatient with me in terms of time, Mr. Speaker. There are three other major points—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am never impatient with the Hon. Member.

It being 6.56 p.m., the two hours provided for the consideration of the motion now before the House under the provisions of Standing Order 117 have expired.

Accordingly, under the terms of the Standing Order it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the motion.

Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the Members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Lewis) which was agreed to on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion carried.

Mr. Riis: I have a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap (Mr. Riis) on a point of order.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I simply wanted to say that I actually thought that it was a 30-minute bell. I came in late.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Riis: Order.

Some Hon. Members: Resign!

An Hon. Member: Resign as House Leader.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): This is only Tuesday. It is August 16 and it is not a full moon. Could I have just a little order so that I can hear the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap?

Mr. Riis: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I did want to say that had I made it in time, I would certainly have voted for democracy and against this particular motion.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not have to say that that was not a point of order.

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-130, an Act to implement the free trade agreement between Canada and the United States of America, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Motions Nos. 9, 10, 11, 12, 13 and 14 are grouped for debate. A vote on Motion No. 9 will apply to Motions Nos. 10, 11, 12, 13 and 14. Is the House ready for the question? The Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy).

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry) moved:

Motion No. 9

That Bill C-130 be amended by adding immediately after line 43 at page 3 the following:

"7. For greater certainty, nothing in this Act shall be interpreted so as to apply to lands, resources, and waters claims by aboriginal peoples under an aboriginal claim."

Motion No. 10

That Bill C-130 be amended by adding immediately after line 43 at page 3 the following:

"7. For greater certainty, nothing in this Act shall affect programs to protect the environment or conservation of land, resources and waters."

Motion No. 11

That Bill C-130 be amended by adding immediately after line 43 at page 3 the following:

"7. For greater certainty, nothing in this Act shall be interpreted so as to affect or preclude the continuation of existing or the establishment of new special adjustment programs to help firms or workers adjust to the changes brought about by the implementation of the Agreement."

That Bill C-130 be amended by adding immediately after lines 43 at page 3 the following:

"7. For greater certainty, nothing in this Act shall be interpreted so as to affect or preclude the continuation of existing or the establishment of new regional development programs."

Motion No. 13

That Bill C-130 be amended by adding immediately after line 43 at page 3 the following:

"7. For greater certainty, nothing in this Act shall be interpreted so as to affect the continuation of existing or the establishment of new Canadian social programs, including medicare, unemployment insurance, daycare, pensions, minimum wage laws, labour laws and maternity benefits."

Motion No. 14

That Bill C-130 be amended by adding immediately after line 43 at page 3 the following:

"7. For greater certainty, nothing in this Act shall be interpreted so as to affect or preclude the continuation of existing or the establishment of new cultural programs by future Canadian governments."

He said: Mr. Speaker, this group of amendments that were moved will put the Government to a test. It will challenge the assertions that they have made over the past two years. The important parts of the Canadian national fabric; environment, aboriginal rights, regional development programs, cultural programs, are in no way affected by this agreement. We have heard the guarantees, assurances, from the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney). That great counterfeiter has provided every kind of guarantee that one could ask for.

Now they have a chance to prove it by voting for these amendments. Now we will really see if they are prepared to live up to their word. There is a very important precedent for supporting these amendments. The Government said that during the course of the last month or two, because of a concern raised in the country about the issue of water, they would move an amendment to the legislation for greater certainty. For greater certainty they moved an amendment to ensure that water was excluded in the legislation.

We have here five amendments which say that for greater certainty we want to ensure that cultural programs, regional development programs, and adjustment programs will not be affected. So if the Conservatives can support an amendment for greater certainty on water, then surely they will have to support these amendments for greater certainty on issues that have raised similar doubts and skepticism in the minds of many Canadians. It is very simple. They vote for these amendments, they support them, then, in part they will have taken away much of the doubt that exists, so they can say that at least in the legislation we have made our case clear and we know.

In my own generous, charitable way I am trying to help the Government. I want to give Government Members the means by which they can convince Canadians that they are prepared to stand by their word.

• (1930)

I have a suspicion, though I do not want to be too skeptical, that Government Members may not vote for these amendments. If they do not vote for them, then we will know that all those assurances are simply the kind of misrepresentation we have had from the time this agreement was first announced. We will not be able to trust them any longer.

I would like to deal with one particular amendment. My colleagues will deal with environmental issues, social policy and aboriginal rights, but I want to deal with adjustment. We know how important that is. The Economic Council of Canada has indicated that some 186,000 workers will be dislocated by this agreement.

Before the committee we heard testimony from the food processing industry, one of Canada's largest employers, indicating that close to 60,000 workers could lose their jobs as a result of the free trade agreement. The printing industry, a highly skilled industry, a small business industry based in every city across Canada, estimated that 10,000 workers could lose their jobs. The same is true for the textile, clothing, machine and electrical fabrication industries.

There was very substantial testimony from members of industry groups indicating that they will be directly affected by this agreement. Companies will close down. Workers will lose their jobs. It is very clear that adjustment programs will be required.

What has been so curious is why the Government changed its mind about so-called adjustment programs. The Prime Minister, before a big convention in Ottawa, said that there will be a big adjustment program, not to worry. The then Minister of Employment and Immigration indicated that there could be up to half a million workers affected. All of a sudden, about a week later, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) and the Prime Minister started changing their tune. We are used to that. We are used to them changing their tune on a 24-hour cycle, but surely not on something as important as someone's job being put at stake.

We began to understand why this is so. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance recognized that bringing in the kind of adjustment programs that would be required would be contrary to the agreement itself. They recognized that the Americans would exercise their right under the agreement to take trade action, according to U.S. trade law, against any industry.

As an example, we know that the applications for assistance by various industries under our regional development programs are now being screened by the Department of External Affairs to determine whether or not they live up to the conditions of the agreement. Already, before the trade deal is even in place, bureaucrats are providing a filter to determine if programs passed by this Parliament, in its sovereign right to help regions or workers, are acceptable. They are being censored by DRIE and by the Western Diversification Agency. Those agencies admit to that.

In the committee, I posed a question to Ambassador Ritchie who was testifying before the committee. I said that the assurances given by the Government were that the adjustment programs would not be affected. Ambassador Ritchie went on to say, as recorded in issue 22:24 of committee testimony, the following:

> "The difficulty would of course arise with targeted assistance to particular firms or particular industries. There the jurisprudence, if one can qualify it in such a way, is ambiguous and would leave open the distinct possibility that certain forms of assistance could be attacked under Canadian law or under American law.
> In addition to that, it should perhaps be noted that there are a number of other forms of adjustment assistance or measures that could be presented as adjustment assistance which would be contrary to the agreement—"

The most knowledgeable bureaucrat, the one who negotiated the agreement, now admits that adjustment programs for industries would in fact be contrary to the agreement. That seems to be a pretty compelling argument for how we are limiting our independence as a Parliament. Programs already passed by Parliament will be subject to the discipline of the trade agreement with the Americans.

We saw a very clear example of that in the softwood lumber case. The Americans challenged the right of provincial governments to impose a certain royalty scheme because they said that it was an unfair form of government subsidy. The Government of Canada agreed with them, and as a result, we imposed a $600-million tax on ourselves.

Perhaps more significantly, by accepting that judgment and not challenging it at the GATT, we accepted the precedent that this kind of direct assistance to industries could be considered an unfair trade act on behalf of Canada. We surrendered before the battle started. We gave up those rights before the battle even began. That precedent established in the softwood lumber case is now being applied to all other kinds of Canadian exports.

Let me give Hon. Members another example that should give real cause for concern. Under the American implementing legislation that is being examined by Congress today, Congress is taking upon itself new powers to monitor all Canadian exports to determine if there is a subsidy. The Congress will not require U.S. industries to do the work themselves, the U.S. Government will pay for it. By monitoring it, it is prepared to take action against any Canadian exports. The Congress has acquired a brand new trade power.

One of the great ironies of the free trade deal is that after two and a half years of negotiation, we are ending up with tougher U.S. laws. The writing is on the wall. If there is any attempt by the federal or provincial governments to provide direct assistance to specific industries to meet the needs of the dislocation that will be caused by the trade agreement, we will be subject to American attack and the Americans will have the power and precedent of the agreement to point to. That is why they are backing off. That is why they are in retreat on this issue.

This amendment, along with the several others in the grouping on culture and social programs, is here to put the legislation to a test. If there is any question in the minds of Canadians about just how strong and unalterable an impact this trade agreement will have on the right of Canadians to make decisions for themselves, the test will be tonight when this vote is taken. When Government Members rise to vote against this amendment, it will be a confession of guilt. It will be an admission that we have already surrendered our right as the Parliament of Canada to take actions to support workers and industries that will need assistance to deal with the dislocation that this agreement will cause.

There can be no clearer example of how we will restrict and restrain our right as a Parliament, as a government and as a society to make choices for ourselves. The victims of the trade agreement will be prevented from getting decent assistance because the Government has already sold its soul. Yet we know how crucial this kind of assistance can be.

In 1971-72, when President Nixon brought in a surcharge on Canadian taxes, we introduced the Employment Support Act which provided assistance for something like 5,000 to 6,000 Canadian companies to meet the American challenge. It kept them in business, it kept their operations going and it allowed them to survive. It was a very successful program. It has now been put in abeyance by this Government.

The Canadian Industrial Renewal Board was designed to protect direct assistance to the footwear and textile industries to modernize and buy new machinery. Again, it was a successful program and was so considered by the North-South Institute, an objective institute. What did this Government do? It cancelled the program. It let it run out.

The ILAP Program allowed for a combination of assistance to communities affected by labour problems. In the throes of the downturn of the automobile industry in southern Ontario, it kept automobile communities alive. It allowed the people to keep their jobs and to bring new industry in. What did this Government do? It cancelled the program.

Once again, we go back to the thesis that this is a Government that is trying to introduce, under the guise of a trade Bill, its kind of 19th century economic philosophy. That is, to not permit the Canadian Government to offer decent, constructive, productive support for its own citizens. They borrowed the Republican-Regeanite philosophy from the U.S. and are trying to entrench it in a Bill and an international agreement.

The group of amendments I brought forward, which you will hear a great deal about tonight, are the ultimate test. They will show the Canadian people who is right and who is wrong in this debate. What we say is that the Government has sold out the right of Canadians to make decisions for themselves.

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, despite the heavy and very expensive flow of propaganda which has come out of the Government, despite the huffing and blustering which has come from the Minister for International Trade (Mr. Crosbie) and his Parliamentary Secretary, we in this Party, and a great many other Canadians, know this trade agreement is much more than merely a commercial transaction. It is in fact changing the very direction in which Canadian society has gone.

It is interesting to note how very quickly the U.S. administration and the Congress gave their sanction to this trade agreement. Why not? Like the "Open sesame" door, this agreement has opened to the United States all the rich natural resources of Canada. In a sense, we could describe it as one of the biggest giveaways in the history of the western world.

Mr. McDermid: Nonsense.

Mr. Penner: You have done your blustering and now we are counteracting some of it.

Mr. McDermid: You will hear from me again, too. We have to keep you honest.

Mr. Penner: No wonder the great business corporations and those who speak for them love the agreement. Yet what about other Canadians? That is who we are talking about tonight, other Canadians who care about the environment, Canadians of aboriginal ancestry, Canadians who know they are not in a strong position to survive as employees in the new kind of society that this trade agreement will bring about, and I will describe that in a moment.

What this trade agreement seeks to do, to put it one way, is to deify the market-place. If you are a person who is ruthlessly competitive, highly entrepreneurial, if you are at all times market driven in your motives, then you may survive the stiff, vigorous U.S. competition. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) has said on more than one occasion, yes, we Canadians can compete. The trouble is that in those areas where we have been successful in competing, we have had our foot stamped on in a way that still hurts.

My hon. friend from Winnipeg—Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy) mentioned the softwood lumber deal. There we were competing successfully and we know what happened. The penalty we paid because we competed successfully has now been written into this agreement and we have to live with it for all time. I want to tell you that many Canadians with whom I speak tell me that they do not want an American market driven, commercial type of society in Canada. Many feel we have too much of that already. Certainly many of Canada's aboriginal peoples feel that way about the trade agreement. That is why the Assembly of First Nations rejected it outright. They oppose it as forcefully as they can, knowing they do not have a big voice in the Canadian political system. They have neither political nor economic power, but we give them all credit possible for the efforts they make on behalf of the First Nations and their people.

The Native Council of Canada has many serious reservations about this trade agreement. I quote to you from the committee hearings when the Assembly of First Nations appeared. They pointed out that the Government of Canada has gone to great lengths to enable people designated as nationals of the U.S. and U.S. citizens or corporations to have all the benefits and all of the protection anyone could want to operate in Canada. They may do whatever they wish with respect to trade, investment, buying and selling energy, raw resources, setting up manufacturing plants, establishing outlets for goods and services, or anything in the field of commerce. The Government has conveyed these and all other kinds of rights to people over whom Canada has absolutely no control or jurisdiction. These people are protected by this agreement, while at the same time the rights of First Nations in Canada have not been defined despite the fact they are spelled out as specific rights in Section 35 of the Constitution of Canada.

Since my time is very brief I want to limit myself to only two points and then conclude by stating to the House why we need in Bill C-130 a non-derogation clause for aboriginal peoples as proposed by my hon. friend from Winnipeg—Fort Garry in Motion No. 9.

Point number one is that a totally market driven economy can be very threatening and damaging to many, and none more so than to the aboriginal peoples of Canada. A U.S. magazine specializing in trade matters and economic issues said in a very recent issue, in explaining the Canada-U.S. trade agreement to its readers in the U.S., that as this agreement evolves, choices would expand and prices would fall for consumers in both countries as Canada becomes the equivalent of the fifty-first state. That means our goods in Canada will have to be produced more cheaply in order to be sold in the U.S. Quite obviously that means a downward pressure on wages, on benefits, on various forms of government assistance to people, communities and fledgling enterprises.

That is clearly threatening to Canada's aboriginal peoples. There may be some Canadians who say, well, a good thing, too, because we give them too much. We are too concerned. However, I tell you that there are no well informed Canadians who take that position. There are Canadians who realize that our economic debt, our economic rent to the first citizens of this country is enormous. There are still a majority of Canadians who care about human rights and who care about trying to establish as much equity as it is possible to establish in a modern society.

I know that those who have been educated, trained and conditioned to live and survive in a market driven society may do well. However, there are a great many others who are going to fall by the wayside. We in the Liberal Party are concerned about those people, and my hon. friend from Winnipeg—Fort Garry has talked about that already. Marginal firms and marginal workers, when confronted with intensified competitive forces coming from the U.S., will not be able to survive. Many of those Canadians are going to be native people. They are already less well educated than the population at large, less well trained. Already they are struggling to make it in Canadian society. They are going to find life ever so much more difficult, ever so much tougher in the American-type market driven society which the Government wants to force down our throats. I say no, and many Canadians say no.

I wish the Government would give the people of Canada the opportunity to decide before we pursue this folly any further. There is an old hymn that you may remember which says there is a wideness in God's mercy like the wideness of the sea. Be that as it may, I want to tell you, Sir, that the god of the market-place has no affection for anyone except the most successful, the most competitive, the most aggressive. The aboriginal peoples of Canada have every right to fear their place in a so-called new-right market driven American type of commercial society. The Canada-U.S. agreement is going to put major decisions respecting Canada's economy and its political decisions in the hands of the market-place, and I say that that is frightening.

My second point is that this agreement paves the way for the mass influx of American capital to gain even more control over vast sectors of mining, petroleum, and other resource sectors of the Canadian economy. While it may be true, as the Government has stated and argued, that existing land claims are grandfathered and are in no way threatened by the trade agreement, it is clear that the trade agreement is entirely silent about future agreements. Large areas of Canada rich in oil and gas are still subject to outstanding aboriginal title. Canada has no right to negotiate the allocation or management of these resources until such time as a valid treaty or agreement between the first nations affected and the Crown have been concluded. Anything less, Sir, would amount to theft.

The cash and the benefits from land claims are entitlements which cede from large tracts of traditional territory given to Canada. These entitlements must never ever be regarded as subsidies. Yet, I can imagine that when these entitlements are used to start aboriginal type of businesses and these businesses begin in some way to penetrate the American market, which the Government promises is going to be open to more Canadians, agents from the U.S. Department of Commerce will begin to smell around for subsidization. We will have many of those agents in Canada. They will be searching out subsidization in exactly the same way as the CIA and FBI are constantly searching out communism.

I conclude simply by saying that we must have this non-derogation clause for aboriginal people. I plead with the House to put it in Bill C-130 for greater certainty.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, we have before us a set of five motions which, in a certain sense, attempt to set out as an objective or a certainty with respect to this trade deal something which is in fact very much threatened by the trade deal. In that sense they are strange motions. They are potentially contradictory motions. They are motions which I wish the Conservatives would confound us by adopting and then proving in the future that their adoption actually demonstrated that these were facts, once adopted.

However, in practice that is not the way it is going to be. In practice the various motions which are put forward here attempt to present some kind of protection for aboriginal land claims, some kind of protection for environmental or conservation programs, protection for new special adjustment programs to help workers or firms adjust to the changes brought about by this agreement. The motions suggest that regional development programs will be protected, that social programs, including medicare, unemployment insurance, pensions, minimum wage laws, and labour laws will be protected as well as new cultural programs.

Would that it could be so, Mr. Speaker. Would that it could be somehow in this terrible trade deal, simply by passing these motions, an established fact that these protections were provided. In fact, that cannot be done. It is not possible to do because the agreement itself, in fundamental ways, threatens each and every part of the areas which these motions are meant to protect.

I would like to mention the heart-felt speech of the Member for Cochrane—Superior (Mr. Penner) whose sincerity no one in this House can possibly doubt when he speaks of aboriginal land claims. I hope very much that the Conservatives will take his speech seriously and put that clause into the Bill even though the agreement contains such threats to aboriginal land claims. It includes the threat that all local governments including, therefore, local aboriginal governments, must not offer preferences, must not have the freedom to set economic policies which will be contrary to national treatment of United States firms.

I want to talk about three of the motions within this set. First, I want to talk about Motion No. 10 which says:

> "For greater certainty, nothing in this Act shall affect programs to protect the environment or conservation of land, resources and waters."

It is absolutely clear, as we found out from expert testimony in committee, that protection of water cannot simply and completely be protected by an amendment to the Act. In fact, the Liberal Party has been arguing that very strongly and I am, therefore, a little surprised to see this put forward here.

With respect to conservation of resources, under changes which are made as a direct consequence of this agreement we will be forced to export our resources and to export our energy even when we face situations of shortage in this country. That is a fact which no one can deny. It is a fact which the Conservative Party should, if it has enough honesty within it still, stand up and admit.

I believe that the threat to environmental programs under this agreement is immense. Under this agreement for five to seven years we will negotiate subsidies.

• (2000)

It does not say certain subsidies and therefore includes subsidies which are provided to assist industries in this country to become environmentally viable and stop polluting rivers and lakes as a consequence of the assistance with which they are provided. That is very much at risk as a consequence of this agreement.

Mr. McDermid: Nonsense.

Mr. Langdon: It is very much at risk, absolutely and totally at risk.

Mr. McDermid: Total nonsense.

Mr. Langdon: If the Parliamentary Secretary were ever to get this Act through, he would find that those are precisely the points that the United States would raise as key concerns. For instance, the pollution grants that we have given to our forest companies will be very much subject to that discussion and negotiation.

Mr. McDermid: Not true.

Mr. Langdon: The Parliamentary Secretary says not true. Every subsidy is open for negotiation—

Mr. McDermid: It takes two to negotiate.

Mr. Langdon: He cannot possibly say that these will not be negotiated. All he can say is that he can hope they will not be negotiated. I am not sure if many Conservatives share that hope. That particular motion is useful and important, but it runs directly contrary to the agreement itself.

A second motion suggests that new regional development programs and existing regional development programs will be safe. Let me quote from an authority, the Deputy Minister of Finance in the Conservative Government at that time who said:

> "We are going to have to think differently in terms of ways to promote economic development."

That is what he said in response to questions from Members of the Public Accounts Committee. He said:

> "The Michelin Tire type of transaction is just not on any more."

He went on to say that: "We will have to find other unobjectionable ways" to provide industrial development assistance. That was his statement to that committee. What more definite and clear-cut proof could we want than the statement of the Deputy Minister of Finance that we will have to change our regional development programs as a consequence of this trade deal?

Finally, this agreement says a great deal about health care and the future of medicare in this country. If we look at the various services that are provided under the services section of the trade deal, one sees that there are dozens of health services that are not just management services but commercial services that run medical labs, public health labs, and blood banks. All these are being open to national treatment, that is, equal treatment for American firms with Canadian firms.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, as you have noticed in the past half hour, one Member after another has brought to your attention and to the attention of people watching this debate the fronts on which the Government has failed in negotiating this agreement. It has become gradually evident when examining the Bill.

The Government has failed in protecting aboriginal rights, as the Member for Cochrane—Superior (Mr. Penner) so eloquently put it. It has failed to protect Canadian social security programs as the Member for Hamilton East (Ms. Copps) will point out. It has failed on the front of protecting the workers and firms which will be affected by the deal, as other Members will point out.

It has also failed to protect the environment. I will briefly give a chronology of facts to show how, despite the warnings the Government was given, the environment has been neglected.

Despite the fact that the Government published a booklet for almost every activity that comes under federal jurisdiction in which to praise, promote and propagandize the virtues of this agreement, it did not do so with respect to the environment. Not one word was expressed on it. That is, in itself, an astonishing fact. It means that the Government somehow concluded that it would be wiser to say nothing either because conceptually it did not link the agreement with the environment or it felt it was too treacherous a territory on which to speak up on behalf of the Canadian environment.

Let me take you through this chronology, beginning with June, 1986, when the Canadian Environmental Advisory Council alerted the Canadian public to the fact that free trade could have an impact on the environment in Canada. Five months later, in November, 1986, the Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan) came to our committee on the Environment and Forestry to say that although he had requested the report by the Council, he had read it and saw no links between free trade and the environment. The fact that he saw no link was, in itself, an astonishing statement.

In 1987, the Minister of the Environment for Canada endorsed the Brundtland Report, which is a very carefully crafted policy paper that speaks about environmentally sustainable development. The Americans have remained silent on this. They have not taken any position on it. Surely at that point, having committed the Government of Canada to the Brundtland Report on the northern side of the border, one would want to make absolutely sure that the commitment would not be eroded by Washington because of its lack of commitment to the very same report.

Let me take you to September, 1987, when the Minister of the Environment endorsed the report of the National Task Force on the Economy and the Environment, which is another emanation of the Brundtland Report. Let us then move to November 23, 1987, when in response to a question of mine on the Order Paper, the Government replied that the free trade agreement is a commercial accord, it is not an environmental agreement.

How blind could one be? How short-sighted can one be for the sake of lower prices, as some of the spokespeople on the other side have said, not to realize that this is not just a commercial agreement? It entails regulations and develops more and more into other measures and legislation that go far beyond commercial operations, as many Members have already indicated this afternoon in the House.

We then come to May, 1988, when an official of the Department of the Environment appeared before the Standing Committee on the Environment and Forestry to deal with the Estimates that came before that committee. We asked him if he conducted any studies on the implications of the agreement on the environment. The answer was that nothing had been undertaken because there was no need to do so. The Minister of the Environment and the Government had decided that trade and the environment are unrelated. Can you believe that, Mr. Speaker? It is unthinkable to have such a short-sighted, blind attitude, if I may say, toward the implication of this agreement.

Another important front that has to be covered by Motion No. 10, which I am addressing now, as proposed by the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy), is one representing a major shortcoming in the legislation itself. Every Member on the Government side, when we come to vote, will have to vote for Motion No. 10. I cannot see any other alternative if Members really mean what they say about the environment. If they are serious about it, Motion No. 10 is essential to personify, to give substance to the rhetoric that we have heard over years from the Government that it is in favour of protecting the environment.

The points that have to be raised are very clear. They are not so complicated that they would not come to the mind of any observer. First, there is the question of Canada's freedom to impose environmental regulations and to use subsidies, as others have already said, or tax incentives to pursue certain social goals for the clean environment or for sound resource management. This is a very profound central question and it has not been dealt with. There are some fools across the floor who can smile about this matter because they do not understand the implication. The freedom for Canada to impose or introduce subsidies and tax incentives, as anyone who has read this agreement knows, is in danger. This matter has not been studied or examined by the Government as it should have been.

Mr. McDermid: That is totally wrong.

Mr. Caccia: Let me move to another point that is also at stake. There will be pressures to reduce costs as a result of this agreement. When you do not have uniform standards and equitable enforcement there could be pressure and, in this case, by Canadian firms or firms wishing to come to Canada to reduce the short term costs of production in Canada by reducing expenditures for pollution control. They will say: "We will come in and open up a subsidiary or a plant provided that you allow us to operate the dirty way because we want to be free to produce at the lowest possible cost in order to be competitive—"

Mr. McDermid: Come on. What nonsense.

Mr. Caccia: This shows the ignorance of the Parliamentary Secretary—"in order to be competitive with American firms which do not have to respect the regulations which exist in Canada". That will be their argument.

Mr. McDermid: Nonsense.

Mr. Caccia: If the Government of Canada would have taken the trouble to prove that this fear was misplaced, why did it not have the decency to produce a study which would have come to that conclusion?

Mr. McDermid: Where is your study that says it will? Don't be silly.

Mr. Caccia: We know this pattern could develop. We know that there are certain standards and regulations in Canada which do not exist south of the border. The Parliamentary Secretary should know that. It is not just me saying it, but the Canadian Environmental Advisory Council which said it two years ago. The Government is deaf. It does not want to listen.

We have another area which the Government failed to address in protecting the environment because it does not understand the issue. The Government understands lower prices and the free market. Life to the Tories is lower prices and a free market, but the quality of life does not mean anything to them. Protecting our natural resources for future generations is like hearing a foreign language. That is why the Tories ignored the environment. If they cared they would have undertaken these studies.

Mr. McDermid: Our Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) spoke up about the environment. Trudeau never knew what the environment was.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member's time has expired. The Hon. Member for Broadview—Greenwood.

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, all aspects of life, and the Greeks divided them up into four elements, the earth, the air, water and fire, will be affected by this trade deal. My colleagues have dealt with three of the basic elements, the earth, water and air. I want to deal with the fourth, the fire, the spirit. In other words, culture.

I want to deal with the big lie which the Government has perpetrated with regard to the supposed cultural exemption in the trade deal. We were told that culture would not be on the bargaining table at all. Clearly it was. Clearly the Americans saw a great victory. For them culture is an opportunity for making another buck. It is business as usual. It is entertainment and all of the measures that we have developed as Canadians to promote Canadian culture. To Americans this is discrimination and it is against the spirit of the trade agreement. The Americans would like to have as little of it as possible. Because Canadians are sensitive to the issue, it could not be ignored altogether. We have a double-barrelled exemption for culture. We have a whole lot of areas where cultural industries are very specifically included. I have dealt with them in other speeches.

Here I want to deal with the big lie aspects and the so-called cultural exemption. Let us look at what the Americans say they won in the trade deal negotiations on culture. Recognizing Canadian sensitivities, the U.S. has agreed that certain cultural areas are not subject to special provisions. However, the U.S. retains the right to redress any adverse commercial effects of any future cultural measures enacted by Canada. To them this is just an opportunity to make a buck. If you limit the opportunity for American corporations to make a buck in Canada, that is against the trade deal and the spirit of it, even if it is promoting Canadian creativity and the Canadian cultural world.

We have the chief trade negotiator, Simon Reisman, who has been asked about what this exemption means. The exemption is there in one clause and then there is part 2 of the clause which says there can be retaliation. If Canada does something to promote Canadian culture, the Americans can retaliate. What does Mr. Reisman say about it? He says: "There are many things we can do that would not be inconsistent with the trade deal".

Canada wants to promote Canadian culture in publishing, music, sound recordings, performance, and broadcasting in a particular way, but let us ask the first question. Is it consistent or inconsistent with what we have given away on the trade deal? Unfortunately a lot of it is inconsistent. We have some measures to promote Canadian culture. For example, we have some subsidies. We know that all subsidies are up for negotiation in the next five to seven years. Cultural subsidies are not exempted there, not at all. We know we have some areas where there is actual protection in foreign investment, for example, in the area of broadcasting. We have Canadian ownership requirements. Canada as a society, and after some considerable thought, decided that it would be better to allow a very small minority of shares to be foreign owned in broadcasting. That is frozen, at least so far in the deal. That is one of the exemptions. But supposing we wanted to do that in some other cultural area—

Mr. McDermid: Yes, let's pretend.

Ms. McDonald: Supposing we wanted to make that choice. Supposing we wanted as a society to move forward in film distribution. As a matter of fact, we had a task force established by the former minister of culture who has moved on to other things. The report came up with a proposal that there be in film distribution Canadian ownership. Film distribution we know is massively American-dominated. The profits go into the United States, into Hollywood, to promote more American films which come flooding back into Canada. Supposing we wanted to have Canadian ownership in film distribution, a recommendation by a Conservative-appointed task force? We cannot do it in this trade deal.

• (2020)

We have a Minister of Communications (Miss MacDonald) who had a very modest Bill on film distribution to have a licensing scheme developed. Even that very modest proposal, which was not even remotely close to Canadian ownership in film distribution, had to be watered down to suit the Americans because any kind of attempt for Canadians to get back, to get control of, to use in this case people's purchases of cinema tickets, to get into Canadian production, to put Canadian writers, directors and performers to work was not acceptable. We have a great deal of creative talent here in Canada, but the money is going to Hollywood for American productions. We had the possibility of turning that around, but the Government bowed to the pressure. Jack Valenti's problem was certainly dealt with by a cowardly Minister who has lost all of the vision that she used to have.

We have another sign of the Government giving way on culture. We have a publishing policy. We do not have, unlike broadcasting, a requirement of Canadian ownership in publishing. We had a proposal by the previous Minister that we move in the direction of Canadian ownership in publishing. That was the so-called Baie Comeau policy. The Government has never repudiated that policy in so many words, but it is not implementing it. Whenever a specific case comes forward it finds an excuse such as: "This one does not apply. We cannot make it retroactive. We will start doing it in the future". We then got passed the so-called retroactive period and it simply stopped implementing it and looked for other excuses such as: "The operation was not big enough so we will not bother to apply it". We have a policy to move to Canadian ownership in publishing and it is not being acted upon in any concrete case.

We have the instance of the Broadcasting Act, a new Bill which was before Parliament 20 years after the last Bill. We have a Government which wants to reduce the Canadian content requirements in the Broadcasting Act. We had organizations appear before the committee today which recommended that we not pass this Bill because the old Act of 1968, is stronger for Canadian content. We have a Minister who puts her Canadian content into PR so she can appeal to her former nationalist friends. If one reads the fine print in the Act, one will see that that is not there.

The Canadian Broadcasting Act of 1968, was tougher because we did not have the Americans dictating the terms. We have reason to believe that the Minister had clauses removed from a draft Bill at the instigation of Americans who had a look at it and vetted it. It already includes mention of the free trade deal. Culture was always on the bargaining table. There are specific measures in the new Broadcasting Act which reflect that.

I suspect that there are a number of clauses that were recommendations of the Caplan-Sauvageau report, a Conservative-appointed task force, as well as the unanimous recommendations of the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture, a Conservative-dominated committee. Yet we have a Government that is so base, so cowardly, so keen to do what the Americans tell it that it removes the Canadian content requirements in the Broadcasting Act to curry favour with the Americans. It cares more about them than it does about Canadian culture.

If the Government really believes what it said, that is, that culture was never on the bargaining table, and that we should be free to pursue our own cultural objectives, then it would pass this motion which would ensure that indeed there is a cultural exemption. It has no intention of doing that, however, because it has lied from the beginning. Culture was always being bargained away. Shame on this Conservative Government for doing it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Minister of Communications.

Ms. McDonald: Shame on the Minister. "Hon. Minister" is a corruption.

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, there is nothing that rattles around more than noise in an empty shell. We just had an excellent exhibition of that.

One of the things that has been said by the Hon. Member is that nothing has been done in the way of cultural initiatives by the Government. I would just like to mention some of the things that have been done, have been done because they were so long overdue.

In the field of book publishing we have invested $1,723,000.

Ms. McDonald: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Relevance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I hope that the Hon. Member would give the same courtesy that the Minister gave the Hon. Member. I know that the Hon. Minister will be coming to the motions. The Hon. Minister has the floor.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, do not hold your breath. She does not understand the word "courtesy".

In the field of film production we have invested $165 million in feature film funds.

Ms. McDonald: It is a buy-off. You are trying to buy out the culture community.

Miss MacDonald: Just recently after the signing of the free trade agreement, after the agreement was tabled in the House, we introduced legislation and new policies under Investment Canada. We have brought in a $200 million package—

Ms. McDonald: Buy out and sell out.

Miss MacDonald: I know that the Hon. Member does not want to see moneys go to the Canadian film distribution industry. I know she is not interested in supporting the Canadian film distribution industry. But it has been very interesting to me to see in the last week Astro Distribution Industries announce that it will distribute for the first time in a number of years 13 Canadian films as part of its package—13 Canadian films that were not there before.

Ms. Copps: I rise on a point of order.

Ms. McDonald: Mr. Speaker, a point of order—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Hamilton East on a point of order.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Minister could speak to the amendments that are on the floor.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Broadview—Greenwood (Mr. McDonald) on a point of order.

Ms. McDonald: The same point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not want to get involved in this particular debate with Hon. Members. I know that the Hon. Minister will get to the motions at hand. I think it would be nice if we would give her the courtesy and listen and wait and see. The Hon. Minister of Communications has the floor.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I know that the Hon. Member from Toronto never really wants to hear the truth. I know it hurts her. But perhaps she will be quiet long enough to listen to some of the facts, some of the things that happened.

She has introduced some kind of a woolly-minded amendment. What I am saying is that these are measures that have been taken since the free trade agreement was signed, since this legislation was brought before the House. Therefore these are measures that prove that Canadian culture has been exempted from the free trade agreement. There is no reason or no need for such an amendment.

Do not take my word only, Mr. Speaker, for the fact that these measures have been welcomed by, say, the Canadian film industry. In fact, they have been welcomed by people in the distribution business. They have been welcomed by those who are producers. May I just say, for instance, the executive director of the Winnipeg Film Group, Bruce Duggan, had something positive to say. Winnipeg has a very active film group. I know that members of the Opposition do not want to see the Winnipeg Film Group helped. But it wrote to say:

> "It was with considerable happiness that we hear of your tabling of the Film Distribution bill in the House of Commons.
> Congratulations!"

From Sherrin Productions Ltd. of Toronto I received this:

> "Your recent announcement of more financing for independent film production and distribution in Canada is very encouraging and exciting."

I know that the Hon. Member from Toronto does not want to help a Toronto production outfit. I know that she does not want to help Toronto companies. But of course that is what they have to say.

Stephen Roth, Frank Jacobs, David Perlmutter of Cinexus wrote stating:

> "Congratulations on your long awaited distribution regulations. From the material available it appears the legislation will go a long way in satisfying the concerns of which we are all aware."

This was done after the free trade agreement was signed.

• (2030)

Ms. McDonald: Where is Canadian ownership in film distribution?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. There is such a thing as courtesy in this House. I would like to hear the Hon. Minister. I do not know if she is in order or not. If the bantering across the floor would stop, then I would be able to hear it. The Hon. Minister of Communications (Miss MacDonald) has the floor.

Miss MacDonald: It is indeed agreeable to hear that one can speak in the House without being shouted down by people who simply do not want to hear the truth.

The reason I am making these comments, and the reason that I am intervening, is that I do not feel that any amendment is necessary. That is what I am speaking to, the fact that I reject such an amendment, simply because the steps we have taken have strengthened the Canadian film distribution industry, and the broadcasting industry.

I heard the Member say a few moments ago that she did not want to see those aspects of Canadian content and measurement, which have always been associated with the CBC, and which will continue to be part of the role of the CBC, extended to private broadcasters in Canada.

Ms. McDonald: You do not know your own Bill. You have reduced the requirements.

Miss MacDonald: The Hon. Member did not want to see it extended to the distribution systems in Canada. She did not want to see the whole area of Canadian content enlarged beyond the public broadcaster.

Ms. McDonald: You have reduced it.

Miss MacDonald: I happen to believe that we should have a great deal of Canadian content in both our private and public broadcasters, in our networks, and in our distribution systems. When the Hon. Member for Broadview—Greenwood (Ms. McDonald) says that she does not agree with this, then I could not disagree with her more. I want to see more Canadian content in our broadcasting system.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On a point of order the Hon. Member for Broadview—Greenwood.

Ms. McDonald: The Hon. Minister is quite wrong. Her Bill actually reduces the requirements for Canadian content for private broadcasters—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is not a point of order, it is a point of debate and the Hon. Member did have an opportunity. The Hon. Minister of Communications has the floor.

Miss MacDonald: I wish to mention a couple of other persons who have written to us to congratulate us and to urge the passage of the legislation before the House, legislation in film, legislation in broadcasting, all designed to improve and to enlarge the Canadian contents in these industries. The reason we are doing this is that these were steps that were taken following the introduction of the free trade agreement, following the time when, according to the Hon. Member, nothing could be done to strengthen Canadian content. That is absolutely wrong, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Axworthy: Talk to Jack Valenti.

Miss MacDonald: I hear the interjection of the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry. He would be one of those who would not endorse the sentiments of the Winnipeg film crew who feel the film legislation has been beneficial to them.

Mr. Axworthy: They are opposed to the agreement. They came to the committee.

Mr. McDermid: They did not oppose it.

Mr. Axworthy: They did.

Miss MacDonald: They are the ones who wrote to say that the legislation would be helpful to them.

I have a letter here from Lauron Prouction Ltd. which states:

> "I am writing in my capacity as Chairman of Lauron Productions (you may remember us as the company which produced the film "Loyalties" which Anne Wheeler directed) to offer my congratulations to you on your announcement of Film Legislation and Support Programmes for the Canadian Independent Film sector at the CFTA 40th Annual meeting."

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Windsor—Walkerville on a point of order.

Mr. McCurdy: I hesitate to raise this point of order, but I am surprised that you have not noticed, Mr. Speaker, that there is a reasonable application of relevance that is lacking here.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Minister has another 30 seconds to wind up. The Hon. Minister of Communications has the floor.

Miss MacDonald: I am pleased to do that, Mr. Speaker. As I set out to substantiate, and as I can show from comments from coast to coast, the initiatives that we have taken in the field of culture, broadcasting, film, book publishing, and in postal rates, all taken since the free trade agreement was signed, have been introduced. One of the major positions is that we can show that there is nothing in the free trade agreement which inhibits us or forbids us from doing anything to strengthen Canadian culture, and that is what we have been doing.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, this evening we are dealing with six Liberal amendments to the free trade Bill, all of which have the purpose for greater certainty of exempting different matters from the Bill.

Motion No. 10 states:

> "7. For greater certainty, nothing in this Act shall affect programs to protect the environment or conservation of land, resources and waters."

Motion No. 9 has similar provisions for aboriginal lands and aboriginal claims. Motion No. 11 has similar provisions for worker adjustment programs. Motion No. 12 has similar provisions for regional development programs. Motion No. 13 has similar provisions for social and health programs. Motion No. 14 has similar provisions for cultural programs. All these amendments were suggested at the committee by various witnesses appearing before the committee.

For example, the proposal to exempt aboriginal lands and claims was proposed by the Assembly of First Nations. The proposal to exempt environmental protection laws was proposed by the Canadian Environmental Law Association and the Canadian Wildlife Federation. The proposals to exempt regional economic development policy and social programs were proposed by the National Anti Poverty Organizations, GATT-FLY, the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, the Canadian Council on Social Development, the Canadian Health Coalition, the "One-Voice Seniors", and Mouvement Solidarité populaire Québécoise. Finally, the provisions to exempt cultural industries were proposed by ACTRA, the Independent Record Producers, and so on.

My point is that these motions to amend which are presently before the House came out of hearings from Canadian groups of citizens who very strongly proposed that such measures were put in the Bill. Other members of my Party, and other members in the Opposition are dealing with various of these amendments, but I want to zero in on the ones relating to adjustment policies for Canadian workers and Canadian industry.

There is no doubt that, as a result of the free trade agreement, many jobs will be lost. There have been different studies and different estimates as to how many jobs will be lost, but the fact of the matter is no matter what study is accepted, jobs will be lost. In December, 1987, the former Minister for Employment and Immigration stated that he thought approximately 300,000 jobs would be lost. The next day he reversed himself and withdrew that statement. In 1986, a study conducted by the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion stated that approximtely 227,000 jobs would be lost in 17 industries. In a study tabled in December, 1987, the Ontario Department of Labour stated that 280,000 jobs would be at risk in Ontario.

The most recent report of the Economic Council of Canada published on April 13, 1988, stated that there would be a net gain of 250,000 jobs over a 10 year period, but it also stated that there would be a decline of jobs in 17 out of the 36 industries studied. The report of the Economic Council entitled "Venturing Forth", states at page 21: "It indicates clearly that without improvements in Canadian manufacturing productivity, increased United States competition could result in a net decline of output and employment in 17 of the 36 industries studied, virtually all of them in manufacturing". Further on it states: "Some firms will have to merge, others will have to close. As projected in simulation one, for example, the electrical products industry would account for 40 per cent of all of the job losses in manufacturing".

There would be serious losses in manufacturing. The report goes on to say that the employment gains would be in the service industries. It would be, for example, in clerical, sales and services, administrative jobs. We all know that manufacturing jobs, industrial jobs, are generally unionized, highly paid and have benefits and are usually full-time jobs, whereas jobs in the service industries are usually very often part-time and at minimum wage and non-unionized and without benefits. The jobs that we are gaining in this deal on the whole are service type jobs, and the jobs that we are losing are industrial type jobs.

Unfortunately, there is nothing in the agreement and in the Bill which provides for adjustment. The Government launched this whole free trade agreement, it says, as a result of the Royal Commission on the Economic Union and Development Prospects for Canada, known as the Macdonald Report, the Macdonald Royal Commission.

What did Macdonald say? He recommended a free trade agreement, but he also said on page 316 of Volume I of the report: "The commissioner's assessment of the economic costs of free trade indicates that Canadian investors and employees are likely to bear relatively larger adjustment burdens than their United States counterparts. A free trade agreement should therefore incorporate explicit provisions that reflect a proportionately greater cost of adjustment that Canadians will face. It should provide for transitional safeguards which permit temporary limits on the speed of adjustment, and it should operate to smooth out the dislocation and re-employment of workers and physical capital".

That is what was recommended. It was recommended in several other reports, but there are no new adjustment programs. Not only are there no new adjustment programs but the employment and training programs that are presently in place, and have been in place for several years now, have been drastically reduced.

Since 1984, employment and training programs have been reduced by this Conservative Government by 32 per cent. Whereas the budgets were $2.2 billion in 1984, they have now been reduced to $1.5 billion. This is the kind of program that the Government said it is going to rely on to help workers and firms adjust as a result of free trade. That will not do. I pointed out very clearly that there will be serious dislocations of workers. Industrial workers will lose jobs in Hamilton, Cape Breton, Toronto, southern Ontario. Jobs will be opening up in service industries in other areas of the country.

What are we going to do with these middle-aged workers, let us say in the electrical products industry, which will be the worst hit according to the Economic Council report, workers who have spent 20 and 30 years in electrical products industries and all of a sudden they are put out of work and told: "Well, don't be too upset. As a result of this free trade agreement you can have a clerical job out west"? Or, "If you are from central Canada, don't worry. You could have a clerical job or a sales job in Quebec, if you are from Ontario".

Adjustment programs are absolutely necessary. What is surprising is the day after the free trade agreement was tabled in this House, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) spoke to the Canadian Export Association—I believe that is the name of the association—and promised significant and massive adjustment programs. When he returned to the House the following day, we attempted to ask him questions about these programs. We attempted to ask the Minister of Employment about these programs. He said that the Prime Minister was misunderstood.

This is one of the travesties. We oppose the agreement and we think it is a bad agreement. Canada gave much more than it got. It is going to be bad for Canada's independence, identity and sovereignty. Surely, if we are going to have the agreement, there must be provision for adjustment programs. That is why Motion No. 11, which is presently before us and is one of the six motions, says:

> "For greater certainty, nothing in this Act shall be interpreted so as to affect or preclude the continuation of existing or the establishment of new special adjustment programs to help firms or workers . . . "

Of course, one of the reasons for that type of wording is that very often grants and subsidies to firms, to help workers, have been considered countervailable, or considered subsidies which may be negotiated away as a result of this agreement. We may not even be able to continue subsidies for workers in some cases, or subsidies for firms that are attempting to readjust, firms that will be very hard hit by the free trade agreement, whether they are textile firms, shoe firms or whatever.

I think it would be helpful to bring to your attention those firms which the Economic Council says will lose jobs as a result of this agreement. We have the rubber and plastics industry, the textile industry, the metal fabricating industry, the machinery industry. I have already mentioned the electrical products. We have the chemical products industry, the non-metallic minerals, paper products, furniture and fixtures, knitting mills and leather. These are among the 17 industries that will be hard hit.

If the Government maintains that adjustment programs will not be hurt by the agreement, then let it accept the amendment. The amendment only says that for greater certainty adjustment should not be hurt by this agreement. The Government will do no harm by accepting the amendment, but it can be very helpful by protecting adjustment programs and bringing in some new ones.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity this evening to speak on Motions Nos. 9, 10, 11, 12, 13 and 14. I think, as perhaps the Chair, being one of the very few Government Members interested enough in this historic debate to be listening to it, that we must know that the FTA provides complete armaments for large multinational corporations and right-wing Governments to bust unions, lower wages, cut social programs—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): A point of order. The Hon. Member for Davenport.

Mr. Caccia: I apologize to the distinguished Member for Skeena for interrupting. I note that there are only two Tory Members in the House, and it may be necessary to call for a quorum.

Ms. Copps: Quorum.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do see a quorum. On a point of order, the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I would like it to be known to the House that earlier this evening an agreement was reached between the Parties, and it has just been broken by the Liberals, like they break every other promise that they make.

Mr. Axworthy: What agreement?

Mr. McDermid: Speak to your House Leader.

Mr. Allmand: I know that there is no such agreement. I have been sitting here all day.

Mr. McDermid: Too bad he does not talk to you.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Skeena has the floor.

Mr. Fulton: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I was saying, the FTA provides a complete arsenal of armaments for large multinationals and right-wing Governments on both sides of the border to bust unions, lower wages, cut social programs, lower environmental standards, cut regional development funding, while simultaneously giving what is know in the agreement as national treatment, or pipeline of resources to the same multinationals for wood, water, minerals, fish and many other things.

I am going to direct my remarks this evening to two key areas covered by the motions before us, one on Motion No. 9, in relation to aboriginal title and rights. I must say that I find it unusual that the one Minister of the Crown, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. McKnight), who clearly under Canada's Constitution and under rulings by the highest courts in Canada, has a fiduciary responsibility to the first citizens and First Nations of Canada, has not participated in the debate and has not produced for the First Nations a report on the impact of the FTA upon those to whom he has a direct constitutional responsibility.

The movement on aboriginal title and rights in Canada since Confederation has been a sorry and sad tale. Perhaps it has been the most sad and sorry in recent decades, going back to 1971-72 with the notorious White Paper which was reversed by the Calder decision of the Supreme Court of Canada, a decision that was tied three-three. That created some movement in the settlement of comprehensive claims but that movement was turned back in 1981-82 when the Government removed aboriginal rights from Canada's Constitution. Of course, we have seen that followed by the now famed Erik Nielsen report known as the Buffalo Jump of the 1980s, a report which would bring about the total assimilation and annihilation of the first citizens of Canada. That, of course, will be followed by the 1988 FTA should it in fact be passed and implemented.

One has to have some understanding of the gravity of the situation affecting first citizens and First Nations to know why the Assembly of First Nations opposed this Bill so strongly before committee and are opposing it so strongly across Canada. This Government has not moved since it came to office on Section 35 of the Constitution, recognizing aboriginal title and rights.

In my view, there is no fair-minded Canadian who is not appalled at the neglect by governments one after another which has brought the First Nations to such a state that any negative social indicator one can imagine can apply including the highest rates of suicide, the lowest rates of employment and the highest rates of incarceration. All the negative social indicators that can be found to measure the situation of the First Nations is there for all to see. The governments have a responsibility to settle comprehensive claims in British Columbia and North of 60 and to live up to the treaties in the rest of Canada. The governments have a responsibility to settle the specific claims which now number over 500.

Those first citizens who are listening this evening have to understand that a premonition of what will come under the FTA was what has gone on in Alberta with the Lubicon people. Just when the federal and provincial Governments could have moved to settle outstanding claims of the Lubicon people, the governments turned over a vast tract of land covering all of the Lubicon claim in northern Alberta to Daishowa Pulp Company, a pulp company wholly owned by Japanese. That process will accelerate, not just in Alberta but in every province and North of 60 should the FTA be implemented.

We must understand what national treatment means. The steeplechases that will have to be jumped by First Nations in order to settle comprehensive claims will be so much higher. One need simply read the FTA to see that local governments would have to follow rules against local preferences.

The First Nations have a true understanding of sustainable development. They understand the Brundtland report, the World Commission on the Environment. They understand how to properly harvest plants, animals and fish. They have a love for the land. One need only read the FTA to see how difficult it will be to maintain that traditional lifestyle.

For example, if an American corporation were to set up a large guiding and outfitting operation next to an Indian band which had a similar operation set up, it would be only a matter of a moment before the parent corporation would take some kind of countervailing action for unfair subsidies against the Indian band. I have here an excellent article entitled "The Binding Dispute Settlement Mechanism". It says:

> "And since all Canadian producers are to some extent subsidized by government-run hydro, telephones, postal services, health care systems, etc., etc.—failing US firms will never run out of grounds for filing unfair trade practices suits.
> Following a suit brought by the New England fishing industry, for example, the US International Trade Commission identified 58 Canadian government programs it labelled "unfair subsidies" to the Canadian fishing industry."

Let us think for just a moment about long-standing treaty entitlements and the specific entitlements of the first citizens of Canada. How long would it be before they would be challenged before the U.S. International Trade Commission? Even if they were taken before the so-called binding dispute settlement mechanism, we do know this, as stated in the article to which I just referred:

"—binational panels are bound only to US laws and practices whenever US firms want to challenge how we do things in Canada. They have no power to investigate, gather facts, or direct national agencies to make specific judgments. All they can do is judge whether American trade legislation has been applied properly."

The First Nations of Canada perhaps more than any other single identifiable group, stand at risk before the FTA.

I doubt any Member on the government side has read the excellent study done by the Native Council of Canada on the impact of the FTA on the First Nations and first citizens of Canada. We know that the Minister for International Trade (Mr. Crosbie) has not even read the agreement, so we can be quite certain that the Minister of Indian Affairs has done nothing to date to protect the first citizens.

This motion would simply provide the kind of protection the Government says exists. If it exists, this is precisely the kind of motion the Government should accept to lay to rest the very deep, real and identifiable concerns of the first citizens.

I would like to spend a moment dealing with Motion No. 10. There is another question I want to pose. Why has the Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan) neither spoken in this debate nor produced for Canadians the estimate of the professionals who are working at Environment Canada of what the impact of the FTA would be?

We know from a recent Canadian Wildlife Service survey that over three-quarters of Canadians are prepared to accept a lower standard of living in order to have a higher quality and a safer environment. Yet south of the border, there has been no serious movement on acid rain. Anyone who has travelled to the Love Canal or to the Niagara Escarpment has seen how the Americans handle waste storage. They drove the locomotive from the atomic testing site to the Niagara Escarpment, simply dug a hole and drove it in. One need only go to Hanford in the State of Washington, just South of British Columbia, to see what American environmental standards are. They simply dump waste onto and into the ground.

When U.S. firms are required to install scrubbers in Canada and there are either federal or provincial incentives to do so, it would be just a blink of an eye before the parent company in the United States brought countervailing action against Canadian firms to try to reduce environmental standards. The Canadian environment stands at enormous risk from the way this agreement is worded, and any Member who truly cares and who truly speaks out on behalf of Canada's environment should support Motion No. 10 to ensure that the environmental standards that all Canadians support will be implemented, maintained and improved in the future.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, in my riding of Hamilton East, I imagine that there are many people who are wondering what effect this trade deal will have on social programs. Senior citizens want to know what effect it will have on pensions. Young parents would like to know what kind of effect it will have on future child care programs.

Time and again, we have heard Government representatives say that our social programs will not be touched, our social programs are a sacred trust. I remind Government Members that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) said the same thing about senior citizens' pensions. We remember what the Prime Minister said. He said that senior citizens' pensions are a sacred trust.

I would like to spend a few moments outlining very specific concerns we have about the trade deal and specifically about how it will impact very negatively on social programs. As many people in the public are not yet aware, the hidden agenda of the trade deal is not to be simply a strict economic and commercial deal. It will be a committee that will spend the next five to seven years determining what constitutes a subsidy. If the committee decides that pregnancy benefits or the extension of future pregnancy benefits or unemployment insurance constitute unfair subsidies, then we will see Canadian social policy being harmonized with that of the United States.

Mr. McDermid: Where does it say that in the agreement? Show me.

• (2100)

Ms. Copps: Annex 1498 of the deal specifically identifies health care facilities' management services as part of the trade deal. American companies can come into Canada and establish management services for profit in every single hospital across this country.

Mr. McDermid: Only if the provinces allow them to.

Ms. Copps: The Parliamentary Secretary is not interested in the facts. The facts are that the deal also includes a clause which permits the establishment of commercial blood banks in this country.

Mr. McDermid: Only if the provinces allow it.

Ms. Copps: The Minister for International Trade (Mr. Crosbie) when questioned on this issue, said: what does it matter? If people want to sell their blood, that is their business. I say, and Canadians say, that we have developed a universally accessible national medicare system because we do not believe people should have to sell their blood.

Mr. McDermid: Neither do we.

Ms. Copps: We do not believe we should be setting up a for-profit system where people in need, the sick, the poor, those at the lowest end of the socio-economic scale, are exploited.

Mr. Gormley: What about surrogate mothers?

Ms. Copps: As a matter of fact, surrogacy, as many Government Members probably do not care to know, happens to be big business in the U.S. There are many American lawyers who make their living matching surrogate mothers with people who want children. They do it for profit. As a matter of fact, those American companies are now eyeing Canada as a potential market. They can come to Canada, hire a Canadian mother to bear a child, and it is all covered and paid for under the Canadian medicare system.

Mr. McDermid: Can they do it now?

Ms. Copps: If my Private Members' Bill is passed, no.

Mr. McDermid: Oh, but they can do it now before the trade Bill? I see. You mean the Liberals have allowed that all these years?

Ms. Copps: My Bill says that surrogacy for profit should be illegal. However, the Government believes in doing anything for the almighty dollar. It does not care for a national health care system. It would love to see us go to the kind of system they have in the U.S. where 25 per cent of women of child bearing age have no medical insurance.

Mr. McDermid: Oh, what nonsense.

Ms. Copps: Where the infant mortality rate is 40 per cent higher than in Canada. That is the hidden agenda of this deal.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Ms. Copps: Why do you think these companies, these big businesses, are coming to the Government to promote this deal? They would love to see a situation where we have no maternity benefits, where we have no minimum wage, which is the case in the vast majority of states in the U.S., where we do not have affirmative action, where we do not have child care programs. Those companies, aided and abetted by the Government, do not believe in the development of the social safety net which has characterized Canada.

We are different from the Americans. We extend our hand in friendship to the U.S., but we have made a conscious decision to develop a society which says we pay for national medicare. We developed a society which says we have responsibility to the poor and weak in a way quite different from the U.S.

If the Government is so sure that its trade deal is not going to affect this, why not pass a simple amendment?

I would like to read the amendment into the record. What could make it more clear? It says:

> ""7. For greater certainty, nothing in this Act shall be interpreted so as to affect the continuation of existing or the establishment of new Canadian social programs, including medicare, unemployment insurance, daycare, pensions, minimum wage laws, labour laws and maternity benefits.""

That is clear and apparently corroborates what the Government has been telling us. All along the Government has said that medicare will not be touched. Let us put it in the legislation by way of amendment. If the Government is so sure of its position that our senior citizens are going to be safe, then why not pass an amendment which puts it right in the legislation?

We believe that the Government will not move this amendment because it intends by way of commercial blood banks, by way of commercial health management facilities which could include for-profit operation of everything from hospitals right through to health clinics, to see the harmonization of social programs. In fact, a number of people who appeared before the trade committee made exactly that point. Let us look at some of the people who came before the committee and what they had to say about the deal. One was Mitchell Sharp. There are a number of eminent authorities who understand that the intent—

Mr. McDermid: Mitchell Sharp? The senior trade adviser to the Liberal Party?

Ms. Copps: —and long-term objective of this deal is to see the harmonization, not only of economic policy but also of social policy between the two countries.

Mr. McDermid: What nonsense.

Ms. Copps: The Government continues to say "what nonsense". Why not move a simple amendment to clarify the situation? Does the Government expect that the senior citizens of this country—

Mr. McDermid: It does not need clarification because it is not there.

Ms. Copps: —are to take your Government at its word? Senior citizens heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) when he said their pensions would not be touched. The first thing he did was to try to grab off their pensions. I am from Missouri and I want to see it written in the law.

This amendment will merely specify that medicare will not be affected by the deal. Unemployment insurance will not be affected by the deal. Yet the Government will not move the amendment because it knows full well that the subsidy panel which will be examining our social programs over the next five to seven years will put future parental leave programs at risk. It will put unemployment insurance programs at risk. It will put medicare at risk.

The Parliamentary Secretary flees because he knows that his position—

Mr. McDermid: The Parliamentary Secretary does not flee. He is going to check your facts.

Ms. Copps: —in refusing this amendment is indefensible. Look at Article 2010 and 2011, the nullification clauses. They say that any American company, once this deal is put in place, can come to Canada, lay a complaint about our medicare programs, our unemployment insurance, and demand compensation. Under the nullification clauses we will be required to pay them compensation because of programs that we have established under our social safety network.

When you talk about the over-all objective of harmonization, let us face it, do you think the Americans are going to introduce medicare to harmonize with us? Who are you kidding? The Canadian system will be harmonized to the U.S. system and we will see a reduction in workers' wages. We will see a reduction in the kinds of social benefits that have characterized a different path for this country. The reason we will see that is because the Government—

Mr. McDermid: The Parliamentary Secretary is back.

Ms. Copps: —is so bent on selling out this country that it will stoop even to the point of setting up commercial blood banks. I do not want my children to have to buy their blood when they grow older. I do not want to have to buy my blood when I am at an age when I might need an operation.

Mr. McDermid: I would not want it either.

Ms. Copps: That is the potential written into this trade deal. Otherwise, why would the Parliamentary Secretary and the Government include commercial blood banks in the annex? It is specified right in the trade deal because the whole mentality of this Government is characterized by the Minister for International Trade who said, what is wrong with selling your blood? If not blood, what is next? Kidneys? Are we going to be selling babies next? Are we going to be selling other organs?

Mr. McDermid: Are there any blood banks in Canada now?

Ms. Copps: As a matter of fact there has been established for the first time under the Conservative Government in 1987 in the City of Montreal a for-profit blood bank. I say shame, and we say shame and we cannot understand—

Mr. McDermid: You mean before the trade deal?

Ms. Copps: —why the Government would want to introduce in the trade deal a specific section dealing with commercial blood banks. It is a hidden agenda and I say to senior citizens, when you hear the Government say your social programs will not be touched, just remember what it said about pensions. The Government cannot be believed and it has to be thrown out, so let's call an election.

• (2110)

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to speak to this very important series of amendments including Motion Nos. 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, and 14 which call the Government's bluff about the take-over that is provided for in the so-called free trade agreement and in Bill C-130.

The rationale for the free trade agreement is that it will reduce tariffs. In fact, that is a very small part of what the agreement really is about. It is partly about giving American corporations a much freer hand than they now have in taking over Canadian resources and Canadian labour.

With regard to the Bill, these amendments attempt to protect the lands, resources, and waters of the aboriginal peoples from the agreement. They attempt to protect environmental and conservation programs for our own land and water. They attempt to protect the continuation of special adjustment programs for workers or companies which suffer under the agreement. They attempt to protect the establishment or continuation of regional development programs and they attempt to protect the health and social service programs that we have now and the plans and hopes we have for extending them. They attempt to protect our cultural programs, present and future.

It is doubtful, even if these amendments were written in, that that protection would be given because if the free trade deal is finalized the agreement itself would give American corporations claim to all these things. Even if these amendments were written in we would, at the very best, be tied up in long court battles. The Government probably does not want to deal with these amendments because if they are passed it would be caught in contradiction to the agreement it has signed. It does not want to debate the amendments because it knows the amendments expose the take-over provided for by the deal.

I represent a constituency which has at least six hospitals, many nursing homes, and other health institutions, public and private. I want to speak particularly about the amendment which deals with social services. Motion No. 13 would add to the Bill the words:

> "—nothing in this Act shall be interpreted so as to affect the continuation of existing or the establishment of new Canadian social programs, including medicare, unemployment insurance, daycare, pensions, minimum wage laws, labour laws and maternity benefits."

We are being told, of course that these things are not on the table. We were told that by the same Prime Minister who told us that he would never negotiate a free trade deal with the United States. His statement that these are not on the table turns out to be just as true as his promise not to negotiate a free trade deal with the United States.

In fact, under Article 1402 of the agreement any American firm can claim any rights, benefits, and opportunities in Canada which any Canadian firm has under our laws. There can be no preference given to Canadian firms and no preference given to non-profit services over for-profit services.

Under that article these firms will be able to come into Canada much more easily than they now can. The list of nearly 300 services which are expressly opened up includes the management of a series of health services including hospitals, nursing homes, homes for the aged, homes for the retarded, homes for disturbed children, halfway houses, rehabilitation clinics—

Mr. McDermid: What about homes for disturbed MPs?

Mr. Heap: Someone across the way is worried about disturbed Parliamentary Secretaries. To continue, it includes ambulance services, public health clinics, X-ray laboratories, medical laboratories and, of course, blood banks. The Government made sure that blood banks are open to the United States.

This means that as governments deregulate, privatize, and contract out services which are now provided by public servants in a not-for-profit arrangement, they will all become open to takeovers by the American corporations which have established immense financial power and expertise for the purpose of making profit out of people's health. In the United States there are corporations whose large business it is to manage hospitals. They boast that last year and the year before they eliminated 73,000 hospital worker jobs.

In case some naive person on the government side imagines that this is because Americans have become much healthier and do not need hospital care, I will point out that statistics show that many millions of Americans have no hospital care at all, that the time spent by the elderly in particular in these institutions is being reduced, and that the quality of health care in the United States is lower than the quality of health care in Canada, even though the total cost is higher. That is what the Americans get as a result of for-profit hospitals and other services. That is why they want to reduce it here.

Mr. McDermid: That is not allowed.

Mr. Heap: That is why the Parliamentary Secretary keeps on heckling even though he does not like it when we heckle his Minister. The fact is that when any of these institutions are contracted out or opened up for privatization, American firms, without establishing in Canada, according to the agreement, will immediately be able to underbid on those firms because they will be bidding to provide a poorer service at a lower price in order to increase their profits.

People who work at these hospitals, nursing homes, homes for the aged, and other institutions like that now provided as public service under public jurisdiction and control with responsible union relationships among their employees and responsible staffing will be replaced by for-profit groups which in the States, as I have said, have a much lower level of service. There will be wage cuts, staff cuts, service cuts, and profit increases.

If this were not in fact the case, the Government ought to be willing to amend this law in the way this amendment asks. It ought to be willing to renegotiate the agreement with the United States so as to exclude this possibility. It is clear that this amendment calls the Government's bluff and exposes its intention to open our health services to the profiteers from the United States.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, it is nice to see the Chairman of the Communications and Culture Committee sitting in the Chair. I hope you will transmit to the Minister and the Government the views that are not being presented by a partisan politician, or someone who thinks you have done very dastardly deeds with our communications and cultural policy.

I am going to read for the record the views of the Cultural Industries Alliance which says that the free trade agreement undermines Canadian policy. Those organizations and institutions have the very important responsibility for promoting Canadian sovereignty and cultural industries and the responsibility to portray a view of ourselves so that, as the Minister would say, Canadians can see each other, appreciate and grow with each other. That will not happen as a result of the work the Minister undertook. I suggest that her remarks today were completely irrelevant.

I want to read a statement on the implications of the Canada-U.S. trade agreement for Canada's identity and cultural sovereignty. It was issued in July, 1988, and was prepared by the Cultural Industries Alliance composed of the following groups: Alliance of Canadian Cinema, Television and Radio Artists; Association des Producteurs de Film et Video du Québec; Association of Canadian Film and Television Producers; Association of Canada Film Craftspeople; Association of Canadian Publishers; Canadian Actors' Equity Association; Canadian Association of Motion Picture and Electronic Recording Artists; Canadian Conference of the Arts; Canadian Film and Television Association; Canadian Independent Record Production Association; Canadian Periodical Publishers Association; Directors Guild of Canada; National Association of Broadcast Employees and Technicians; Periodical Writers Association of Canada; and The Writers Union of Canada.

The Alliance states that publishers and writers have allied with actors and directors, as well as with film, television and record producers, to amplify their opposition to the treatment of culture in the U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement. The singular importance of this issue has persuaded them that they must speak out together to voice their serious concern over the long term effects of the agreement. Each member of this alliance is convinced that the agreement's so-called exemption for culture will actually discourage Canadian Governments in future from taking measures to assist the development of independent cultural industries by Canadians for Canadian audiences.

They believe that nurturing of Canadian works, which reflect and inspire uniquely Canadian points of view, is essential to this country's growth as a sovereign nation. Owing to our small population, our geographic proximity to a major power, and the extraordinary dominance of imported cultural goods, Canadians have found it necessary to provide counterbalances by introducing policies and legislation that make it possible for Canadian voices to be heard in our own country. I would like them to read the Minister's remarks about Canadian voices.

They go on to state that measures that might be taken to ensure this growth, however, appear compromised by the agreement, and it is doubtful if measures introduced in the past would be acceptable were they to be proposed in the post free trade Canada; therefore, they say, we are forced to conclude that our sovereignty is jeopardized by the agreement.

They say that in the past 18 months they have already seen evidence of the effect of the agreement on existing policies and policy development, including: The reduction of the capital cost allowance for Canadian films and television programs, which had encouraged production of Canadian films and television programs;

The revision of the Film Products Importation Act, which now substitutes grants for structural change. The Minister thought she could throw money at the problem and it might go away.

Third is the rejection of the Investment Canada guidelines for film distribution proposed by the 1985 film industry task force, recommendations that would ensure the orderly transfer of ownership in film distribution to Canadians which have been ignored;

Failure to apply the 1985 "Baie Comeau" book publishing policy, which promised to see the transfer of ownership in book publishing to Canadians.

Rejection of key recommendations for broadcast policy made by the House of Commons Standing Committee on Communications and Culture. These proposed measures would have significantly enhanced the production of Canadian programs for a Canadian market, and could well have had significant beneficial effects for the recording sector.

They go on to state in their document that it seems clear that the free trade agreement will alter not only the course of our economy, but by inhibiting our freedom to strengthen vulnerable yet essential cultural industries, it will also alter the course of how we define ourselves as Canadians. The agreement recognizes a North American reality, but it leaves little room for a Canadian vision. It is just like the Canadian broadcast Bill introduced by the Minister, which is a sad comment on how she and the Government view the application of a Canadian content policy.

The document states that the Government of Canada has repeatedly offered Canadians the assurance that under the free trade agreement our ability to protect our cultural sovereignty and to provide for the expression of our identity has been protected. For example, in a speech given on April 7, 1988, the Minister of Communications (Miss MacDonald) stated:

> "We have a free trade agreement because this Prime Minister, this Minister of Communications and this Government promised one thing: that Canada's right to determine our own culture would be respected in every degree. Without that promise . . . a deal simply was not possible."

It is a shame that they did not mean what they said.

The Alliance goes on to say that the organizations which have signed this brief share fully the view expressed by the Minister that no trade agreement is acceptable which does not retain fully Canada's right in the future to take the kinds of measures it has taken in the past to develop its culture. However, they state, all of them have been forced to the conclusion that the free trade agreement of January, 1988, does not meet that test. Instead, the agreement sharply and unacceptably constrains Canada's ability to take the necessary measures in the future to provide fully for the expression of the values, creativity, ideas and talent of Canadians throughout the country and for such activities to occur under the control of Canadians.

We have concluded as well, they say, based on decisions taken recently by the Government that the Government itself understands that its right of action is substantially limited by the agreement and has been prepared to accept those limits as a cost of the agreement.

What is the evidence on which we base these conclusions? First, we base them on the somewhat convoluted but increasingly understandable formal provisions of the agreement itself.

The key provisions of the Bill are in Article 2005. Rather than repeat those provisions, we simply note that we share the view expressed by Canada's Trade Ambassador and Chief Negotiator, Simon Reisman, that "it is rather impenetrable language". However, in a June 17 speech to the Canadian Film and Television Association, Ambassador Reisman provided considerable help in clarifying what Article 2005 means. He explained that it means:

> "... new measures affecting cultural industries would be scrutinized by both sides to determine whether they were consistent or inconsistent with the agreement."

Let us remember that American law is still American law. We did not change that.

They go on to say that Ambassador Reisman went on to state that if new measures were not consistent with the trade agreement then retaliation of "equivalent commercial value" was provided for. He expressed the opinion that: "There are many things we can do to support the cultural industries without being inconsistent".

Ambassador Reisman's view is clearly different from that of the Minister of Communications, they say. What he is saying, and what we believe the agreement says, is that actions taken in the past are exempt from the agreement, but any new initiatives are not. As a result, all of the provisions in the U.S.-Canada trade agreement which apply to the economy in general apply to the cultural industries as well, insofar as new measures are concerned.

The result is to limit drastically our ability to build our own domestic Canadian-owned and controlled companies in the cultural industries and to further enhance the development of Canadian cultural products. The one area that remains clearly open for government policy is that of direct subsidies. However, we note that the issue of subsidies is itself the subject of a series of negotiations flowing out of the U.S.-Canada trade talks and that, as as result, there is no final resolution of the subsidy issues.

Moreover, there is a need for serious legislative and structural initiatives in the cultural industries, and not just for financial assistance. They go on to state in the document that if we look at the actions the Government has taken in the recent past we see a consistent and profoundly disturbing pattern. The following examples can be cited:

First, the reduction of the capital cost allowance for Canadian films and television programs. In June, 1987, the Government announced a major reduction in the special capital cost allowance for investment in the production of Canadian films and television programs. While that reduction was announced in the context of tax reform, it reduced substantially an irritant in Canada-U.S. relations, since the capital cost allowance had always been regarded in the United States as an unfair stimulus to Canadian production. Coming at a crucial stage in the Canada-U.S. trade negotiations, this decision can only have been seen as reassuring by the United States. The second example is the revision of the Film Products Importation Act.

• (2130)

The third example is the rejection of the Investment Canada guidelines for film distribution proposed by the 1985 film industry task force. Fourth, a backing away from the 1985 "Baie Comeau" policy on Canadian ownership in book publishing and distribution, which has never been put into effect. Five, the rejection of key recommendations made by the House of Commons Standing Committee on Communications and Culture in the recently announced broadcasting policy and the proposed new broadcasting Bill—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that the Hon. Member's time is more than expired. The Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Ms. Dewar).

Ms. Marion Dewar (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I suppose I should say I am pleased to rise to speak in support of these amendments, but I am also sad to think that we are having this kind of debate and the Government has gone so far as to sell out this country the way it has.

We have heard a lot about the Auto Pact. The Government talks about the Auto Pact as free trade. Anyone who knows anything about trade knows it is very managed trade. In the Auto Pact what we have discussed is the ability to have Canadian content. The Government has eroded that, and the threat to the auto industry is very serious.

We did have a free trade agreement in 1944. It was with the agricultural manufacturing industry entered into with the United States of America. It resulted in a huge deficit in trade and farm machinery. Canada is one of the world's greatest agricultural countries yet we do not manufacture any of our own tractors. That is a specific example of the industrial end of Canada in the future.

More important, I would like to take a few moments to speak about the social policies which the Government is so anxious to say are not in the agreement and have not been touched. We have to look very seriously at the implications. We know that the Government would not get into any kind of discussions about what subsidies are. I am mortified to think that Canadians have negotiated an agreement which leaves everything until later on, later on, later on. I would not want the negotiators negotiating anything else for me because they have not defined what a subsidy is. They say we will get around to it in the next five to seven years. If the United States will have the kind of clout with the government negotiators in the future, we will not have very much say. When we look at what it is costing us in Canada as far as delivering our comprehensive health care system is concerned, which has all sorts of warts in it which need to be improved, we must realize that it happens to be one of the best health systems in the western world and is something of which we should be proud.

The biggest cost per car of General Motors in Detroit is not the steel costs nor the labour costs but the cost of Blue Shield and Blue Cross. It costs General Motors $650 per car in health care delivery.

We know in this country that our labour unit costs have been low because health care costs are built into what it is to be a Canadian and to live in this country. Certainly there is absolutely no reason that cannot be identified as a subsidy when we are talking to industries in the next five to seven years. The insidious part of this is that it is not clear. It is left ambiguous so that we are left as victims with no guarantee about our social policies.

What happens to our unemployment insurance, Mr. Speaker? This is something we thought was a reasonably good program. Again it has its problems. It needs improvements and constantly in this House we review it and try to make it better. We know that people are kept at work and not allowed time off because companies keep trained staff on call while cutting payroll costs. In Canada, 80 per cent of unemployed workers receive unemployment insurance up to 60 per cent of their wages. In the United States only one-quarter of the unemployed receive such benefits, generally at less than 40 per cent of their earnings. Those are the kinds of comparisons we are talking about.

For the Government to say that our social policies are not involved is a lot of nonsense. It says very clearly that we have to harmonize our programs and harmonization means to make things the same. If we are going to make them the same, we have to look at what that means. The greatest treasure we have in Canada is our children. When we talk about their future we have to think about their education. It is very clear that we in Canada have chosen to spend more on elementary and secondary school education per child than in the United States. Is that considered a subsidy?

Mr. McDermid: No.

Ms. Dewar: It is not defined. You do not know. The Parliamentary Secretary seems to think he knows but at the same time he has been unable to write that into the agreement. The Tories are not honest enough to let the Canadian people know how they are eroding the whole society. It would not be bad if it were just their own lives they are hurting, but they are hurting the lives of future generations of this country and that is totally unacceptable.

Mr. McDermid: You do not know what you are talking about. You have not a clue.

Ms. Dewar: The Parliamentary Secretary likes to think it is nonsense.

Mr. McDermid: Show me.

Ms. Dewar: We know that we have to harmonize. We know that we spend more on education. As a matter of fact, the only way we have been unable to get Canadian texts and programs into our education system has been by nationalist regulations. It was nationalist regulations that forced large companies like Prentice-Hall to set up branch plants in Canada so that Canadians were finally able to interest these companies in creating distinctly Canadian products especially designed for Canadian educational systems. It seems to me that that does affect our children. We know from now on what we will have to do is to treat the Canadian and American companies—

Mr. McDermid: Who purchases those things?

Ms. Dewar: Those books are purchased by the Canadian book companies because they are forced to print in Canada. That will no longer be possible. That is the kind of thing about which we are very concerned. I do not think a Government that only looks at the bottom line and profit really cares what happens to children or social programs. It does not really care about the resources, the future and the environment of this country. But a lot of people in the House, people in the gallery, care very much and that is why they are here.

We are not going to stand for this. We know this Government will not get re-elected. We recognize that we will be able to stand proud and tall as Canadians. I said at the committee today that we would never see this agreement implemented. I firmly believe that from the bottom of my heart. I know the people in this country will not stand for it. Our fathers, mothers and ancestors have worked too hard to give us a value system, a society and a country of which we can be really proud. We are probably looking at the meanest and cheapest social network in the whole western world south of the border, and yet we say we want to harmonize our programs with it?

Mr. McDermid: Where does it say that in here? That is poppycock.

Ms. Dewar: We will not do that.

Let me quote someone who was a Member of Parliament here to whom I always looked up and I think many Canadians did also. Tommy Douglas used to say:

> "The measure of a nation's greatness does not lie in its Gross National Product, in the size of its gold reserve, or the height of its skyscrapers. The real measure of a nation is the quality of its national life . . . what it does for the least fortunate of its citizens, and the opportunities it provides for its youth to live useful and meaningful lives."

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. How is it that several times you called people to order when they interrupted the Minister but you never call people to order when they interrupt opposition Members?

• (2140)

Mr. Holtmann: Because they are not important.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Chair recognizes the Hon. Member for Richmond—Wolfe.

[Translation]

Mr. Alain Tardif (Richmond—Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, I also welcome this opportunity to speak in this important debate concerning motions numbered 9, 10, 11, 12, 13 and 14.

My remarks will more specifically concern motions 12 and 13, and especially Motion No. 12, which reads as follows:

> "For greater certainty, nothing in this Act shall be interpreted so as to affect or preclude the continuation of existing or the establishment of new regional development programs."

. . . and now for Motion No. 13, which reads as follows:

> "For greater certainty, nothing in this Act shall be interpreted so as to affect the continuation of existing or the establishment of new Canadian social programs, including medicare, unemployment insurance, daycare, pensions, minimum wage laws, labour laws and maternity benefits."

Mr. Speaker, I listened to all the previous speakers, and I think it is rather astonishing that what we propose in the way of amendments is relatively simple, in the circumstances. The Government is saying: There is no problem, there will be no consequences. What the FTA will do is create jobs and boost growth in this country, and there will be no consequences of any kind.

What we want to do in the House today is improve the Bill by adding a few simple sentences. These additions would provide guarantees that in the circumstances I think are altogether essential, reasonable and indispensable.

We are told that the FTA will have no impact on job creation or regional economic development . . . so they say! But if they are so sure and spend so much time saying they are so sure, I wonder what their motives are. Why not include guarantees in the FTA so that Canadians know what to expect?

Mr. Speaker, in a survey, American manufacturers were asked what they felt were the ideal conditions for setting up a company. According to the findings of this survey, a good business climate in the various States depended on the following conditions, ranked as follows: low taxes; low union membership; low insurance rates for work-related accidents; low unemployment insurance benefits; low energy costs; and fewer days lost as a result of work stoppages.

Mr. Speaker, if the same survey, evaluation or analysis were made in Canada, the conclusions would obviously be the same.

I think this is the kind of language we can expect from entrepreneurs, from industry, from those who create the jobs. It is quite normal and quite reasonable for a company to want to cut costs. So what will happen when the FTA is implemented? There will be three consequences, Mr. Speaker. There will be howls of "unfair" from the Americans because our conditions will not be the same as theirs. This could affect us in various ways. There might be demands that we "harmonize", over time, various programs that are characteristic of our way of doing things, as opposed to the U.S.

However, there is also another possibility, and frankly it worries me, Mr. Speaker, because I talked to various business people, to the people who create jobs, and they often tell us that their American competitors pay an hourly wage of $3, $4, $5 to produce exactly the same goods they are making in Canada. Secondly, he tells us that the labour component of products made in Canada is 30, 35, 40 or 50 per cent of the total.

Mr. Speaker, you have to put yourself in this businessman's place. Obviously, if he cannot have conditions similar to those in the United States, he will be very tempted, very interested, to simply liquidate his business and take an option on some land in the United States, so as to benefit from the almost total lack of social measures on the American side. Who will pick up the tab, Mr. Speaker?

Unfortunately, I have a riding whose survival depends on regional economic development. Before the redistribution of the electoral map, I had 60,000 people in my riding, in 60 municipalities. The largest town had a population of 6,500. Fortunately, with redistribution, I will have 67 municipalities, of which the largest has a population of barely 13,000. Given that, the economic survival of my riding depends on regional development policies and is directly related to them.

In the past, we have seen the benefits—the tremendously positive and essential results—of a regional development policy. In 1982-83, we Liberals put forward a program called Canadian Industrial Renewal Board. It enabled us to develop the Sherbrooke region. This program made it possible to create thousands of jobs, which obviously had a beneficial impact on a riding like mine.

With the treaty before us, Mr. Speaker, we risk losing any regional economic development program.

I think it is interesting and very important as well to recall some figures that I think speak for themselves. You will allow me, Mr. Speaker, to refer, for example, to some self-explanatory numerical data.

We are told that only 25 per cent of the unemployed in the United States receive benefits under all the government and federal programs, as well as supplementary and expanded benefit plans . . . Only 25 per cent! The corresponding figure for Canada is 85 per cent. In the United States, our southern neighbour, unemployment insurance benefits amount on average to 8 per cent of the average wage. In Canada, this average is 40 per cent and even exceeds it in some circumstances. Here we have figures, and I think that to make a case, nothing beats having figures to refer to, real, concrete, actual statistical data.

I think this is a good example of what distinguishes us from our American neighbours. And I also think it is a very good indication of the potential risk of this kind of agreement as a result of transfers of labour and companies that will tend to follow the laws of the market place and set up operations in those states across the border where the minimum wage is much lower and social benefits are far fewer, thus creating an incredible situation in this country. We will lose dozens of companies that will move to the United States, because of the markets and because of the fact that our production costs are much higher, so that companies that stay in Canada will see their premiums for social benefit increase considerably, and so forth. There will be a time when thousands of people are laid off.

Mr. Speaker, there is another aspect I find very significant, and that is the minimum wage. I think the following figures speak for themselves. In Canada, all provinces have a minimum wage policy. When we compare the situation in the United States, we find that nine states have no minimum wage policy; twelve states have a minimum wage of less than $3; and Texas, with the third highest population in the Union, has a minimum wage of $1.40. In Canada, only Alberta has a minimum wage of less than $3. In all other provinces, the minimum wage exceeds $3.

Mr. Speaker, I am not a businessman but, on the basis of this information, if I had to start a business in which the wage component was at all significant, I would be very interested in setting up operations in the United States. The minimum wage is half what it is in this country, there are no social programs, and I am close to my markets. Mr. Speaker, what happens to Canadians who are looking for a job, especially in disadvantaged regions like mine?

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg—Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, what we are debating tonight is a series of amendments which, if the Government believes what it is saying about the agreement and is not actively misleading the Canadian people, it should be willing to accept by virtue of the same logic used by the Minister for International Trade (Mr. Crosbie) when he justified bringing in an amendment with respect to water exports. He said that the agreement did not affect water exports, and because it did not affect water exports he wanted to make that absolutely clear against what he called "false opposition charges" by bringing in an amendment to the legislation to make it clear that it did not affect water exports.

We continue to believe that it does affect water exports because we know that, in spite of whatever amendments might be moved here, it is the agreement itself which will be the final determiner of what is contained in the agreement and what is not contained in the agreement. But by using the same logic used by the Minister for International Trade with respect to the amendment concerning water exports, I see no reason why the Government could not have risen tonight, in the form of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister for International Trade (Mr. McDermid), to accept these amendments. I am sure the Parliamentary Secretary was not rising to accept these amendments.

Mr. McDermid: You will never know.

Mr. Blaikie: The Parliamentary Secretary says that we will never know. I would be very surprised. He spent the evening heckling people who spoke in favour of these amendments. Surely if the Government were going to accept these amendments then we might have expected a little more courtesy from the other side than we have received.

Mr. McDermid: Just keeping you honest, Bill.

Mr. Blaikie: What are these amendments, Mr. Speaker? They are amendments that have to do with aboriginal land claims, that would provide that the deal does not affect the special relationship that aboriginal peoples have with the Crown and the federal Government. It seems to me to be a reasonable amendment, not only in terms of the logic of the Government's arguments with respect to amendments, but also with respect to the fact that the Government, in my judgment and in the judgment of aboriginal peoples, has no right to enter into a treaty with another nation that would abrogate rights which they have by virtue of their treaties with the Crown. Surely we would want to make that absolutely clear. Surely it would be an elemental principle of justice in terms of the relationship between native peoples and the Canadian Government that we would want to see enshrined in the legislation implementing the free trade agreement.

Another amendment has to do with the whole question of environmental or conservation programs. If the Government insists, as it does, that this amendment does not affect environmental or conservation programs, what on earth could be wrong with an amendment that says so? What could be wrong with an amendment that makes explicit what the Government itself argues is already the case, unless what the Government argues is the case is a matter of interpretation, or a matter of trying to sell the agreement politically when the Government knows full well that many of these types of programs could come to be the object of negotiation between Canada and the United States.

Mr. McDermid: It is protected under the GATT. It is in the GATT and these are GATT rules.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, the Parliamentary Secretary is foaming at the mouth again.

Mr. McDermid: It is already there.

Mr. Blaikie: If it is already in the GATT why not reinforce it by having it in this agreement? I do not see any problem with that, but obviously the Government does because it does not want to offend what the United States obviously understands to be a different interpretation than what the Government is attempting to lead the Canadian people to believe with respect to this agreement.

Motion No. 11 states that the deal does not stop the establishment of special adjustment programs to help victims of the deal. There is confusion on this. At one point the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) said that there would be massive adjustment programs. Then almost the next day the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) stated that this would be handled by ordinary adjustment programs, programs that are already in place. One begins to wonder whether the massive adjustment programs talked about by the Prime Minister, and it is interesting that he thinks there will have to be massive adjustment programs, are actually possible within the agreement, or whether they would not violate the spirit of the agreement itself. The agreement states: "Let the market-place decide". We over here state: "Let the people decide", but over there they say: "Let the market-place decide". If the market-place decides, a great many people will lose the jobs they now have. That is what the agreement states. Perhaps that is why the Government will not accept this amendment that would make it clear that adjustment programs are permissible within the context of the agreement.

Another amendment that the Government refuses to accept has to do with making it clear that regional development programs are not affected by the deal. How many times have we risen in the House and asked the Government about the effect of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement on regional development programs and government Members have stood there, full of sound and fury signifying nothing and stating that the agreement does not affect regional development programs? If it does not affect regional development programs, what on earth is wrong with an amendment that explicitly states that this legislation and the agreement which it implements do not affect regional development programs?

Finally, with respect to the whole question of social programs, the sleeper in this agreement, and it is too bad that not very many Canadians understand as yet what I call the "sleeper" in this agreement, is the commitment to negotiate over the next five to seven years what constitutes an unfair trade practice and what constitutes a direct subsidy. This is a real danger in this agreement. It is in that process, a process which has yet to unfold, and a process which can only be judged in terms of the negotiations which have gone on so far, and in which negotiations Canada has emerged as the loser, that we will lose the social programs that we have now.

The Parliamentary Secretary and others say that this is hysteria and fearmongering, but there is a logic to this fear. One is only paranoid when he or she is afraid of something that is not there. We are trying to say that there is a real danger to Canadian social programs as a result of the commitment to negotiate over the next five to seven years what constitutes an unfair trade practice. There was plenty of testimony before the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade to that effect by businessmen themselves. Regardless of how the Parliamentary Secretary and I may disagree on the eventual outcome, nevertheless business people appeared before the committee and said that whether or not one had to pay health care insurance for one's employees was a factor in deciding competitiveness.

That is all one needs to know. One does not need to be able to predict accurately whether or not that will result in specific changes to our programs or to American programs. The point is that what was formerly our business, and our business alone, what kind of health care system we have, will become the business of the negotiations between Canada and the United States, and that is unacceptable.

CHILDREN

RETURN OF GARBAGE PAIL KIDS CARDS—REQUEST THAT CRIMINAL CODE BE AMENDED

Mrs. Lucie Pépin (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to protest vigorously against the distribution of Garbage Pail Kids cards in Montreal. These cards, inserted in chewing gum packages, show absolutely disgusting and unacceptable pictures of children. For example, one card shows a baby with its elbow in its behind and its umbilical cord plugged into an electric outlet. Another shows a small boy scalding his hands under a hot water tap and the skin literally melting away. The cards also give reprehensible advice, such as eating until you vomit and watching what has happened to the food consumed.

Mr. Speaker, who has responsibility? According to a Montreal Urban Community police officer, nothing can be done about it. Unfortunately, the prosecutors he consulted told him that there is no legal recourse to stop the distribution of these cards.

Mr. Speaker, we are facing a serious problem. We must put on pressure to stop the distribution of these cards. It is true that children's education plays an important role, but if our laws are powerless to stop the social abuse I described, it is time to change them.

I ask the Conservative Government to investigate the possibility of amending the Criminal Code to prevent the distribution of such material, to stop the abuse of children's rights in the media and to put an end to such disgusting and abusive material.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PAKISTAN—DEATH OF PRESIDENT IN PLANE CRASH

Mr. Reginald Stackhouse (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, word has been received that this morning the President of Pakistan, the United States Ambassador to Pakistan, and 35 other civilians died in a plane crash over Pakistan. Apart from any other consideration, the manner of their deaths must impress all Members of this House and law-abiding and peace loving citizens of this country. We must ask ourselves, in view of the possible assassination, what manner of world this is becoming when any person in a position of public leadership faces the risk that any leader faces today. It causes us to make note of the need for greater security for leaders and to value the peace that is part of this country.

I know that, apart from any political considerations, the sympathies of this country will go to the families concerned.

BANKRUPTCIES

BANK'S SEIZURE OF COMPANY ASSETS—LOSS OF WORKERS' WAGES

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, a couple of weeks ago Best Outer Wear Limited in Spadina went out of business, stopped making ladies coats, and dismissed 20 workers, owing each an average of $1,000 in back wages. The workers cannot collect their pay because the Bank of Montreal, being the secured creditor, has claimed the company's assets, leaving nothing to pay the workers. This is outrageous because this same Bank of Montreal in 1982 made $239 million profit but paid no taxes at all. In fact, it received a $22 million tax rebate.

This year, according to the Canadian Bankers' Association, none of our banks expects to pay tax. It is unconscionable that workers must pay taxes on their wages to subsidize banks that pay no taxes but the banks then have the power to seize the workers' wages. Canadian banks do the same to the peoples of Latin America where workers and peasants must watch their children suffer malnutrition and disease so that billions of dollars in external debt can be repaid to Canadian banks.

The people of Canada must organize to end these unjust Canadian laws made by the bankers' friends in the House of Commons and the Senate.

NATIONAL PARKS

BANFF NATIONAL PARK—THREATENED CLOSURE OF ROAD TO SHADOW LAKE

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, the view from the Shadow Lake area, about 11 miles up a mountain in Banff National Park, is magnificent and glorious. For years Bud Brewster has been taking Canadians seven miles up the mountain in a vehicle on a fire road, and then even a man on crutches can go the rest of the way. Thus, scores of seniors have been able to visit Shadow Lake and marvel in ecstasy at this handiwork of God. However, this fall Parks Canada threatens to close the fire road which means that no aged or crippled Canadian will ever again visit Shadow Lake.

In 1979 Parks Canada was stopped by the then Minister of Parks, the Hon. John Fraser, from closing this road. Our national parks are not just for the young and the strong. I plead with the Minister and the Government of Canada to keep this road open so all Canadians, including the aged, the weak, and the crippled, can enjoy our national parks.

ENTREPRENEURSHIP

ANNOUNCEMENT OF NATIONAL INSTITUTE FOR ENTREPRENEURSHIP—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE FOR SMALL BUSINESSES

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard—Anjou): Mr. Speaker, yesterday we attended a press conference that was a real farce. There were the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson), the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. de Cotret) and the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism (Mr. Valcourt). The three were all there to announce the idea of an entrepreneurship institute.

When journalists asked them about its mandate and budget and what they would do, the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism said, "I will get back to you in a month to make an announcement about that." A real farce!

Today, small business is stuck with bank charges, people have to pay twice for a returned cheque, and the Government is dragging its feet. Why don't they announce really necessary things that help small business instead of electioneering, as they did yesterday?

ABORTION

ATTEMPT TO SECURE POSTPONEMENT OF SUPREME COURT HEARING

Mr. Jim Jepson (London East): Mr. Speaker, I read with regret in The Ottawa Citizen, and had it confirmed by the Justice Department, that Justice officials are continuing to try to deny Joe Borowski his day in court. It is regrettable that the obvious bias of some Justice Department officials is continuing to prejudice Mr. Borowski's case which is to come before the Supreme Court in October.

I call on the Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn) to allow due process of law to be carried out in a free and democratic way. I get the distinct impression that Justice officials are afraid of the possible outcome of the Borowski trial and that, indeed, the life of the unborn might be protected under the Charter as Mr. Borowski claims in his submission.

APARTHEID

SOUTH AFRICA—CALL FOR RELEASE FROM PRISON OF NELSON MANDELLA

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, yesterday we heard the tragic news that Nelson Mandela has been transferred to a hospital and is seriously ill with tuberculosis, a disease produced by cramped and inhumane prison conditions. The white South African Government still refuses to release him, even on humanitarian grounds. It insists he is a criminal and a terrorist.

The crime for which he has spent the last 25 years in prison was refusing to accept the South African Government's view that blacks are less than equal. Nelson Mandela is a political prisoner. Anyone with a conscience knows that, just as people know who the real criminal and terrorist is in South Africa.

More important, Mandela is a symbol of black South Africans' struggle for justice. His refusal to bend to the racist regime or to be robbed of his human dignity is nothing less than a fiery demand by all black South Africans for full and complete equality, socially, politically, and economically.

The South African Government must release Nelson Mandela, not because he is sick but for the same reason it should free all black South Africans, because it is right. Canada and the world should insist upon it.

AIRPORTS

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—DISPOSAL OF GARBAGE

Mr. Bob Pennock (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to inform the people of Canada that irresponsible municipal government action has created a potential health hazard at Pearson International Airport.

On a daily basis Pearson is producing 40 tonnes of waste. The compactors at the airport can handle only 21 tonnes. It does not take a mathematical genius to conclude that Pearson has 19 tonnes of excess garbage to dispose of each day, every day.

Mounds of garbage already surround the planes and the disposal site. Flies and rats are infesting this refuse. These known carriers of disease pose a grave health hazard to the people working at the airport and in the surrounding area.

A new disposal system is being put in place at Pearson but, temporarily, the garbage must go somewhere. Toronto has an incinerator on Commissioner Street. Despite requests from Pearson Airport, Toronto closed this incinerator.

Hamilton has an incinerator running at 50 per cent capacity only. Why? Because they do not have enough garbage. Yet they refuse to take the garbage from Pearson until they get planes from Pearson.

Toronto and Hamilton's self-serving interests are holding the country to ransom. Their narrow-minded attitude is endangering the health of airport personnel, citizens of Canada, and the agriculture industry at large. Something must be done.

TAX REFORM

PROPOSED NATIONAL SALES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, when the Conservative Government raised taxes on families in 1984 average Canadians asked—

Some Hon. Members: Where was Brian?

Mr. Riis: When taxes were raised in 1985—

Some Hon. Members: Where was Brian?

Mr. Riis: When taxes were raised in 1986—

Some Hon. Members: Where was Brian?

Mr. Riis: When taxes were raised in 1987—

Some Hon. Members: Where was Brian?

Mr. Riis: Now the Government intends to add insult to injury by introducing a new everything-included national sales tax. What will this mean for the average Canadian taxpayer?

When you get a haircut, you will pay the new tax. When you buy school supplies for your children, you will pay the new tax. When you go to see a movie or rent a video, you will pay the new tax. When you go to McDonald's, you will pay the new tax. When you buy insurance, you will pay the new tax.

As more and more average Canadians find out about this new Conservative sales tax they are asking—

Some Hon. Members: Where is Brian?

POLITICAL PARTIES

NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY—CANDIDACY OF FORMER MANITOBA PREMIER

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Selkirk—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the Leader of the New Democratic Party for his astuteness in encouraging the former Premier of Manitoba, Mr. Howard Pawley of Selkirk, to run in the next federal election. Apparently the NDP consider Mr. Pawley to be a bright light. As the federal MP for that area I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, and this House, that the constituents know it is nothing more than low voltage and a dead fuse.

In the last provincial election Manitobans passed judgment on Pawley's NDP Government. At the same time they also passed judgment on one Mr. Sargent—remember?—who was defeated in Pawley's own riding.

In the next federal election Manitobans will have an opportunity to pass judgment on the man whose Party and leadership are sinking dramatically. Please, Mr. B., tell Mr. Pawley to run against me.

EMPLOYMENT

CALL FOR PROGRAMS FOR YOUNG AND OLDER WORKERS

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, unemployment manifests itself in different forms and hits different people in different regions of our country. In Toronto, and in my riding of York West, for instance, I am encountering an alarming number of younger Canadians, fresh from high school, college, or university, who are unable to find job opportunities that suit their academic training and will provide them with the all important on-the-job experience in their chosen profession.

This phenomenon is coupled with the experience of older workers who are being dismissed by employers despite their long years of service and experience and now face horrendous difficulties in convincing new firms to invest in their talents.

Their dilemmas are not easy ones. Older workers still have mortgages to pay and families to maintain. The morale and self esteem of young graduates are being shattered every day.

The Government has failed to address these two solitudes in our society. Through innovative employment programs we simply must combat this two-pronged employment malaise so that young Canadians are not denied a place to stand and older workers are not forgotten or abandoned.

FREE TRADE

CLOSURE OF SIMONDS PLANT IN GRANBY—REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. Last Friday employees at Simonds Saw in Granby read on the bulletin board next to the "punch" that their employment with the company would end on November 11 this year, because of the company's decision to transfer its operations back to Massachusetts and cover the North American market from its plant in the United States, thus adding 131 Canadians to the ranks of the unemployed.

I sent a telex to the Prime Minister the same day, and I therefore want to ask the Prime Minister: Has he had a chance to look at the possibility of adjustment programs for these workers, a pre-retirement program or even a program to reopen the business with Canadian backing?

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, we have dealt with this matter on two occasions this week. I believe the hon. gentleman is referring to the plant in Granby which he falsely stated was to be closed because of the U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement. Of course, he has now had to drop those allegations.

All government programs in connection with situations where plants close, for retraining or assistance for workers who are laid off, are in effect under the Department of Employment and Immigration and others. Everything will be done to assist them, as is always the case whenever a plant closes in Canada for whatever reason.

In this case two of the company's four plants are being closed, one in the United States and one in Canada, for reasons, the company says, of economy and greater productivity.

LOSS OF NUMERONS JOBS IN GRANBY—REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT ACCEPT ITS RESPONSIBILITY

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I would really like to have the Prime Minister's attention in this matter which is vitally important, since the 131 victims of free trade down in Granby are in their fifties. There is no pre-retirement progam for these people. As for the programs referred to by the Minister for International Trade, the only programs available are unemployment insurance for 52 weeks and welfare up to 65. I hope the Minister doesn't think these programs are designed to deal with the problems of these people.

Mr. Speaker, the workers at Simonds Saw are not looking for handouts. They didn't ask to have their jobs taken away and transferred to the United States. The workers at Simonds Saw want some consideration from the Government.

Mr. Speaker, I am not the only one who thinks this is a consequence of free trade. Even a supporter of free trade, the PQ MNA for Shefford, wrote to Premier Bourassa saying that manufacturing of knives and saws will be transferred to Fitchburg, Massachusetts, in accordance with the principles of free trade.

Consequently, I want to ask the Government to act responsibly and ask the Prime Minister what he has to say to 131 people who just lost their jobs and who will be out on the street as of November 11.

• (1420)

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I am sure I can speak on behalf of the Prime Minister and the Government to these 131 persons to say that we very much regret the fact that they will be unemployed as a result of the decision of this company to close its plant, which has no connection at all to the U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement. This was confirmed by Simonds official J. D. Patry who said there was no connection between the plant closing and the trade deal. He is a native of Granby. He has been laid off himself as the plant comptroller. He said he had no stake in protecting the company, but the position is that there was no connection between the plant closing and the trade deal.

I commiserate with these employees at that plant too because their representative appears to be interested in nothing but attempting to score political points out of their misfortune.

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT INTEREST ITSELF IN SITUATION OF WORKERS

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, once again I ask the Prime Minister to show some sympathy and understanding for what happens to ordinary workers.

I ask him to remember his own background, because these people could be one of his relatives. They could be from the North Shore.

At this very moment, we have 131 workers in their fifties who were machinists. We know that digital control machines are the way of the future, and that these workers will not be able to work with these new machines.

I want to ask the Prime Minister what he has to say to 131 heads of families who are going to lose their jobs. Will he just continue to ignore them as he did during my first two questions?

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I will once again point out that the company in question is closing its Portland, Oregon, plant, with western production being consolidated in the company's plant in Vancouver, while in the east it made a decision to continue a plant it has in Massachusetts while closing the plant in Granby.

Everyone in the House can sympathize with the 131 people who will be laid off. I personally sympathize with them, and all government programs will be available to them in securing and helping them in the transition period to other employment. Unfortunately, every year hundreds of thousands of people are laid off. They go on to obtain other jobs. In fact, the figures total several million a year.

In this particular case it is unfortunate that the company decided for economic and overhead reasons to do this, and unfortunate that the Hon. Member is attempting to twist this around for partisan political purposes.

REGIONAL INDUSTRIAL EXPANSION

ALUMINUM SMELTER PROJECTS—DEPARTMENT'S POSITION

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion. Yesterday, when answering a question posed to him concerning the strong bias that was built in against the Province of Manitoba when the Prime Minister announced a guarantee for an aluminum smelter in his riding, the Minister said that the Government was prepared to provide a level playing field, equal treatment for all in order to attract investors.

On the very day that he was making that statement the Minister signed a document from his Department, an industry profile on the aluminum industry, in which he says: "The prospects of expanding ABI's Bécancour facility and of constructing a world-scale aluminum plant elsewhere in Québec are promising. Prospects for new aluminum smelters in Manitoba and British Columbia are less attractive".

Is that a level playing field when his own Department signs a report designed to give direct instructions to the industry as to where and how it should be investing, and talking about one being promising and the other less attractive? Does that not give total lie and distortion to the commitment and guarantee given by the Minister, that in fact the Province of Manitoba is not being discriminated against? Is this not a clear distortion of the meaning of a level playing field?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I noted that my hon. friend said in his prefatory remarks that: "The Prime Minister announced a guarantee for an aluminum industry in Quebec". That statement is false from beginning to end.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: I made no such statement. My statement is on the record.

What is also on the record in regard to the smelter issue is a statement from Manitoba by Peter MacGuire, Alumax's manager of corporate development. He is promoting the idea of a smelter in Manitoba and says: "I do not think it has an effect one way or the other. We were aware as a company of Sept-Iles and thought it would go ahead regardless of our decision".

These are two different projects, both of which appear to have support and value. One is more further along than the other. One is in the process of submitting a request to provincial and federal Governments. Premier Bourassa and I indicated that among the series of choices in the Province of Quebec which the private consortium was interested in, we indicated our support for Sept-Iles which has some 27 per cent unemployment and has endured very difficult and tough moments.

This in no way precludes the possibility of another group, whose spokesman says that the Sept-Iles decision has no impact on them, coming forward with plans for Manitoba which the Government of Canada, when these plans are brought forward, would look at with consideration and concern and would make sure that the same kinds of programs that were made available to Quebec or British Columbia are made available to the developers in the Province of Manitoba.

MANITOBA PROJECT—REQUEST FOR GUARANTEE OF FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, it will come as some surprise to the people of Sept-Iles whose expectations were raised by the Prime Minister's statement, that the Prime Minister is now retracting the promise and the guarantee he gave in his own riding. If there was ever a clear example of the Prime Minister doing a flip-flop and a changeover, boy do we have it now.

Mr. Mazankowski: Tell the truth. It is time to tell the truth.

Mr. Axworthy: It is not I, it is the Prime Minister who just changed his mind.

Mr. Dick: Tell the truth.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member will put his question.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, let us put the Prime Minister's commitment to the test. A federal official has said that some $82 million would be guaranteed for the aluminum smelter in Quebec. That is fine with us, and a good commitment. Is the Prime Minister prepared today to give exactly the same kind of commitment for financial assistance to build transportation facilities to support the building and development of an aluminum smelter in Manitoba? Will he give the same kind of guarantee in Manitoba that he gave to the Premier of Quebec and his constituents last weekend?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, again I have to tell my hon. friend that his statement is in complete error from beginning to end in regard to—

Mr. Axworthy: Let us get the transcript.

Mr. Mulroney: You mean you are speaking without the transcript?

Mr. Axworthy: Why do you not read it?

Mr. Mulroney: I have it here and I can assure you that what you just implied about Premier Bourassa and me is completely and flatly wrong.

Mr. Speaker: I know Hon. Members will want to put their questions and their responses through the Chair. The Right Hon. Prime Minister.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend referred to the transcript. I will give him the transcript. It said: "Yesterday in Montreal I met with Premier Bourassa and we discussed the proposal to build an aluminum smelter that is now under study by an international consortium. Of course, the final decision will be made by the investors, but the Premier and I agreed to promote Sept-Iles as the site of the proposed smelter".

Mr. Axworthy: Let us give the same guarantee to Manitoba.

Some Hon. Members: Keep going.

Mr. Mulroney: I will be delighted to continue: "The federal Government is monitoring this project's progress with interest. This project being studied by international investors of solid reputation would create many jobs and have a considerable economic impact on Sept-Iles, on the North Shore and all of Quebec. This is another example of how a stable political climate and open markets attract private investment".

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: We do not have before the Cabinet or the Government of Canada a request from the Government of Manitoba or the private developers in Manitoba seeking to develop a smelter in Manitoba. As soon as those plans are forthcoming they will be carefully considered and favourably considered, if the objective criteria are met, by the Government of Canada. We are very much interested in the approach that Premier Filmon is bringing to industrial development and clearly it will have very beneficial effect for Manitoba.

My hon. friend refers to the surprise of the people of Sept-Iles.

Mr. Axworthy: That is right.

Mr. Mulroney: They will be surprised in hearing a Liberal spokesman today denigrating a legitimate—

Mr. Axworthy: You retracted your guarantee.

Mr. Mulroney: —attempt by the Government of Canada to try to get rid of some of the high unemployment. My hon. friend's slogan is "Let the people decide". The Winnipeg Free Press suggests your slogan should be: "Tell the people the truth".

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: Why do you not tell the people in your riding the truth?

REQUEST THAT PRIME MINISTER PROMOTE MANITOBA SITE FOR SMELTER

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg—Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister for the most part was careful in what he had to say about this. One of the things that it appears he was careful not to say was that he would be promoting Manitoba as a site for an aluminum smelter. I am not so sure we have the flip-flop here that the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry says we have, unless of course we can get the Prime Minister to his feet to say that, indeed, he will be promoting Manitoba as a site for an aluminum smelter.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in fairness, usually a politician does get blamed for what he says. My hon. friend says: "I am now blaming the Prime Minister for what he has been careful not to say".

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: We have a proposal from the Government of Quebec. As the gentleman from Manitoba indicated, they have been aware of the Quebec proposal for many years. It has not been a secret. The private sector representing people from Japan, Europe, the United States, and La Société générale d'investissements du Quebec, has put together a consortium which proposes to build an aluminum smelter some place in the Province of Quebec. That is one of the proposals.

There is another proposal that had been unsuccessful over some years with the previous Government and which Premier Filmon is now seeking to resurrect and bring to fruition, which involves the establishment of an aluminum smelter in Manitoba which looks to entirely different markets and entirely different financing—an entirely different approach—both of which are sustainable in a country such as Canada.

My hon. friend asks me to be careful about what not to say. I will tell him what I told Premier Filmon when he raised the matter in a private meeting with me a week ago. It was that when the Government of Manitoba had all the facts and was ready to proceed with some recommendations, the Government of Canada would be delighted to sit down with him as Premier of Manitoba, with his colleagues, to make sure that if they thought this was a deal that would fly in Manitoba the Government of Canada would be there to help them.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

WESTERN DIVERSIFICATION PROGRAM

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg—Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister was careful once again not to say that he would promote the Province of Manitoba as a site for an aluminum smelter.

The Prime Minister continues to maintain, as the Minister did yesterday, that there has been no proposal from Manitoba. This is not a proposal that Premier Filmon has to resurrect. It is a proposal that was made to the Government in the form of the Manitoba Government's submission with respect to the Western Diversification Program, for instance, within the last year, and no answer was ever received from this Government with respect to that proposal until we heard from the Prime Minister in Quebec just the other day.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and Minister for Western Economic Diversification): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to be given an opportunity to correct the record. As the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Birds Hill points out, it was a proposal that was put forward by the previous New Democratic Government of Manitoba. It was one line on a 19-page document that totalled over a $1 billion request to the Government of Canada for assistance to that provincial Government at that time, including municipal roads, support for all university programs, as well as almost every election commitment made by the New Democrats and unfulfilled over the last elections.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PRIME MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg—Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, we have heard that line before. However, Manitobans know and statistics prove that we have been getting the short end of the stick with respect to the Western Diversification Program for a long time. It has not changed under the current Progressive Conservative Government of Manitoba. Manitoba continues to be done in by this Government.

I go back to the Prime Minister because I notice he was reluctant to get up a second time. We still have not a commitment from the Prime Minister with respect to the so-called level playing field. We have not a commitment from the Minister or an explanation as to why, on the same day he talked about a level playing field, he released a report which states that the prospects in Manitoba are not as good as they are in Quebec, with no explanation. What was the intention of this, to reinforce the Prime Minister's already predetermined political decision that Quebec and not Manitoba would be favoured for such a smelter?

[Translation]

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we are hearing increasingly disturbing statements by the New Democrats and the Liberal Party critic. I have just come back from a disadvantaged region. Premier Bourassa and myself, reacting to a proposal by an international consortium, quite simply indicated that we favoured Sept-Îles as a potential site for the new plant. Now the Liberals and the New Democrats in the House of Commons apparently want to raise all kinds of concerns about the nature of the project, thereby harming not only Quebec's interests but also the interests of Manitobans. There is no connection between the proposal for Quebec and the project being proposed for Manitoba. The New Democrats and the Liberals seem to think we have to choose between the two, and that if there is one in Quebec, we can't have another one in Manitoba. That is absolutely false. We can have both a fair deal for Quebecers and a fair deal for Manitobans. That is something the Liberals have never understood!

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT—NEWSPAPER ADVERTISEMENT

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Prime Minister. It concerns the Government's futile and expensive advertising campaign to con Canadian taxpayers into supporting the free trade deal.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Boudria: I have in hand a copy of a newspaper advertisement in which a Winnipeg business woman, Ms. Meghan Grey, is depicted as supporting the Prime Minister's trade deal.

Given that Ms. Grey said in an interview, and I quote: "I still haven't made up my mind. But people who see the ad might think I'm pro free trade, and that isn't the case". Will the Prime Minister immediately order a withdrawal of this ad? Will he apologize to Ms. Grey and to all Canadians who have been so misled? Will he do what he suggested himself a while ago, tell the truth to Canadians?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the ad in question is an ad that does not advocate free trade. It is an ad that states: "Free trade. We're getting ready now."

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: The person in the ad describes how they are getting ready for free trade. Then, in the advertisement, more information is available on the free trade agreement, and it gives where one can call toll-free. It is an ad of the Government of Canada.

With respect to the young business woman in question, she has not said that she is displeased with this ad. She has confirmed that she has agreed to further use of the same ad featuring her in other publications. She was never asked to endorse the free trade agreement. She was asked to tell other Canadians how her firm was preparing to take advantage of the opportunities created by the FTA. She knew in advance that the ads were sponsored by the Government. She approved the copy of the ad before it appeared.

We are very happy with the publicity we are getting from this because the truth is coming out, despite the best efforts of the hon. gentleman in the Official Opposition and his Leader who had to be admonished by the Winnipeg Free Press to occasionally tell the truth, and the NDP.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, the Minister says that this ad is not designed to promote free trade. It states: "Canadians are getting ready for free trade. The Government of Canada is there to help."

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Boudria: What is that if it is not promotion?

REQUEST FOR GENERAL ELECTION

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): I would like to put my supplementary to the Prime Minister. Mr. Speaker, this is the second time in two days that the Government has been caught with its pants down. Yesterday, $6.3 million were spent to influence public opinion after a negative poll, and today we have advertisements that are completely false. I want to ask the Conservative Government when the Prime Minister and his Govennment will be frank and honest with Canadians on this issue. When will he call an election?

• (1440)

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the advertisement in question states: "Free trade. We're getting ready now". The Canadian business community, small, medium, and larger businesses, are trying to get ready for the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement which holds out great possibilities for them, for those who work for them, and for their suppliers. However, they are prevented from getting ready by the Leader of the Opposition and his threat to use the Senate, and by the obstructive tactics of the opposition Parties.

Finally, with respect to this Member, let me just tell him that truth does not lurk in rat holes.

BANKS AND BANKING

INCREASED MORTGAGE INTEREST RATES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Does the Minister realize that the chartered banks have just raised their mortgage rate to 12 per cent, following an increase in the bank rate set by the Bank of Canada last week, which means it is getting harder for average Canadians to buy their own home? Does the Minister and does the Government support the Bank of Canada's policy to keep interest rates high and thus increase our mortgage rates?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have commented on a number of occasions on the reason for the monetary policy of the Bank of Canada, which is supported by the Government of Canada, and that is to avoid the very difficult times we had during the 1970s and early 1980s when the previous Government ignored the pressures of inflation that were building at that time which led to 13 per cent inflation rates, and 23 to 25 per cent interest rates. That brought the unemployment rate up to 13 per cent.

I think that we can be judged on the record of our economic policy over the past four years. We have brought the unemployment rate down from 11.7 per cent to 7.9 per cent. We have managed in the broadest sense the economic policy in a way that has resulted in Canada being the number one country of the G-7 countries in economic growth during this period.

POLICY OF BANK OF CANADA

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, the interest rate increase by the Bank of Canada last week, which has led to 12 per cent interest rates on mortgages for Canadians across the country, touches people who are trying to buy a house in Kamloops, in Alberta, in Chicoutimi, in Moncton, and not only in the area of southern Ontario.

Does the Minister endorse the central bank for Canada becoming the central bank for central Canada, which is what is happening now because the Bank of Canada seems to be directing its policies only to what is happening in southern Ontario.

Can the Minister say how high interest rates will go before the Government is prepared to intervene?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member knows that last question is an impossible one to answer. Even he, with his utmost ability and full knowledge of everything that is going to happen in the future, cannot predict what is going to happen to inflation and interest rates, and that goes without saying.

The Hon. Member also knows, and he has discussed this with the Governor of the Bank of Canada, that there cannot be an interest rate policy that is different in different parts of the country. We have a monetary policy which is a national policy. We have regional policies which are devoted to regional concerns. That has been the policy of this Government.

HOUSING

USE OF FEDERAL LAND IN METROPOLITAN TORONTO

Mr. Reginald Stackhouse (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for the Treasury Board. Rumours have been flying around Parliament Hill that the Government may make some federal land in Metro available for affordable housing, but rumours are not homes. When will the Government move us from rumours to action?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of State and Minister of State (Treasury Board)): Mr. Speaker, as I have told the House on various occasions, we are looking at the federally owned lands in the Metropolitan Toronto area. We appreciate that there is a problem. Under those circumstances, we have asked the various agencies to review their present situations and needs.

I can assure my colleague that when that policy is ready to be divulged we will certainly bring that announcement to the House.

FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS

INTRODUCTION OF OWNERSHIP LEGISLATION

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Finance. Since December, 1986, the position of the Government has been that banks and trust companies should not be owned by large commercial interests because of the potential for conflict.

In June the Minister signalled a retreat from that, but did not say exactly what he had in mind, or when he would introduce legislation. Although this is not a politically glamorous issue, it is of vital importance to the Canadian economy. Will the Minister tell us today exactly what he has in mind?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the policy of the Government was announced with a draft Bill on trust and loan companies on December 22, 1987. We have also elaborated on it since in a press release in June, to which the Hon. Member refers.

Through Bills C-42 and C-56 we have accomplished excellent protection for depositors, and policy holders. We have improved the supervisory system for our financial institutions. We have put in place a draft Bill on ownership and powers. It is pretty well all completed, and in very short order we hope to have the Bill itself before the House.

TIMING OF INTRODUCTION

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I am well aware that the draft legislation is there, but draft legislation is not a Bill.

Since the predecessor of the Minister described this matter as urgent about four years ago, I would like to ask the Minister exactly when he will introduce the Bill.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, as I have said, it should be appearing very soon. The structure we have in place now protects depositors, protects policy holders, and improves the supervisory system. What we have left to do is to change investment rules and the control and ownership provisions, and that is what we will reveal very shortly.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

REAL ESTATE INDUSTRY—CODE OF ETHICS

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Would the Minister advise the House whether or not his Department has agreed not to press charges of price-fixing against a number of real estate boards, provided that the industry as a whole adopted a code of ethics?

Could the Minister also tell us whether or not his Department threatened to investigate an additional five real estate boards if the Canadian Association did not accept that code? If the officials of the Minister's Department did, will he tell us whether or not he supported that decision?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the first question of the Hon. Member, there was no selective agreement for part of the boards. The new Competition Act passed by this Parliament requires that there be competition in providing real estate brokerage services.

The director is enforcing that, seeking compliance, and doing it through the Canadian Real Estate Association. He will proceed to the point to ensure that that compliance is achieved right across the country, as required by law.

PRICE-FIXING—REQUEST THAT CHARGES BE PRESSED

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, the Minister must be aware that a number of boards have stated that they will not comply with the agreement that was worked out last week between department officials and the real estate board.

Could the Minister tell us whether, as a result of the investigations by the RCMP and other officials, there was indeed price-fixing in a number of local real estate boards? Would the Minister advise the House whether he will indeed press charges against those who were guilty of violating the Competition Act, and prosecute them?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, because of the confidentiality provisions contained in the Act I am unable to advise the Hon. Member on specific details of whether there might or might not have been compliance with the Act.

The law is there and the law will be enforced. We are seeking compliance rather than necessarily trying to get convictions. However, the law will be complied with, and the director will ensure that happens.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PURCHASE OF TROOP CARRIERS—INFLATION AND EXCHANGE RATE COSTS

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. On July 26 in answer to a question about the proposed purchase of 820 Swedish design all-terrain troop carriers at a cost of $421 million the Minister told the House that the vehicles would cost approximately $170,000 each.

On this basis the actual cost of the vehicles would be approximately $144 million, which leaves $277 million unaccounted for. The Minister had an explanation for this. He stated: "The difference is the difference in exchange rates and the inflation rates during that period," 1993 to 1997.

What type of inflation and exchange rates was the Minister of National Defence predicting for Canada when he told us that $277 million of a $420 million order would be eaten up with inflation and exchange rates?

Hon. Paul Dick (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member will have to talk to the person who made those utterances. All I can tell the Hon. Member is that the contract in question was costed in the dollars of 1992 at the beginning of the contract, and spare parts and other costing figures have to be included.

Mr. Hopkins: At this time we would expect him to know that.

• (1450)

TECHNICAL DATA PACKAGE

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): The Minister stated that the Canadian Forces already had 100 of these vehicles. He said that if we were to ask that some be designed, we would have to start from scratch at considerably greater cost. We now learn that the motor is going to be changed because it lacks power and many other adjustments are going to be made to this vehicle. Why did the Minister not tell us about that when we asked about the extra costs?

Why did the Minister not admit that the technical data package is in the Swedish contractor's office and the Minister's own departmental officials must visit the Swedish firm's consultant to get information and look at the plans because these things do not exist in his own Department? Will the Associate Minister now admit that his own Minister did not know what he was talking about when he gave that information to the House?

Hon. Paul Dick (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I can tell the Hon. Member that the northern all-terrain vehicle is the only one in existence and it is the one manufactured by Sweden. There happens to be a similar prototype on which the Finns are working, but the only one we in Canada have is a Swedish one. The only one in existence is the Swedish one. Four other NATO countries have that same vehicle. It is a very good all-purpose vehicle.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

SASKATCHEWAN—RAFFERTY AND ALAMEDA DAM—REPORT OF U.S. ARMY CORPS OF ENGINEERS

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. The Minister might note that a recent report issued by the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers raises very serious concerns about the building of the Rafferty and Alameda Dam and its effects on water quality. In its report, the Corps of Engineers has rejected the study of the Saskatchewan Government on water quality for being highly simplified, lacking in credibility, and for drawing the wrong conclusions. Why did the Minister issue the licence so that the Saskatchewan Government could start building the dam before the report of the Corps of Engineers was released?

I understand the Minister knew this report was in the making. How can the Minister now trust the Saskatchewan Government to uphold the water quality conditions of the licence?

Hon. Tom McMillan (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I should point out to the Hon. Member that my decision to approve the permit under the International River Improvements Act was not based on the study with which the Corps of Engineers has taken issue. Very stringent environmental conditions were attached to the permit. There were 13 in all. If any one of those conditions is not met by the Province of Saskatchewan, the permit will be revoked and the power plant will be brought to an end.

Mr. Benjamin: Do you want to bet?

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, that is the very question I was posing. The report of the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers shows that the Saskatchewan Government's work in the area in terms of water quality is lacking. How can the Minister trust the Saskatchewan Government to live up to the conditions of the licence when it cannot even produce an honest, unbiased report?

PRESERVATION OF WATER QUALITY IN SOURIS RIVER

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, in the same report, the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service has determined that water quality in the Souris River will be severely affected by building the Rafferty-Alameda Dam and the reservoir. The report states that the final concern expressed is the effect of the project on the water quality leaving the U.S. for Manitoba.

Some Hon. Members: Speech!

Mr. de Jong: The Boundary Waters Treaty calls for non-degradation of water passed to Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Order!

Mr. de Jong: This requirement may not be satisfied with the decreased flow regimes. Again, it appears this project will break the Boundary Waters Treaty. How can the Minister allow the Province of Saskatchewan to proceed when the study shows that the water quality indeed will be lowered? Why does he not refer the question of water quality to the—

Mr. Speaker: I think the question has been quite extensive.

Hon. Tom McMillan (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, obviously the Hon. Member did not listen to my first response. I told him that my decision to issue the permit was not based exclusively on the report he says is flawed. My own Department found the report flawed. We identified some 19 major omissions or problems with the study. On the basis of those 19 flaws, if you will, we specified 13 stringent environmental conditions that would have to be met. If they are not met, the permit will be revoked and the project will be terminated.

ABORTION

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. I want to ask him what his Government's policy is on abortion. After the Supreme Court of Canada struck down the old law almost seven months ago, the Minister of Justice said that legislation would be brought in regulating abortion on an urgent basis and that it would respect the Charter of Rights and Freedoms as defined by the Supreme Court of Canada. Since then there have been two wasteful and misguided government initiatives which have failed to produce anything. The Prime Minister now says that legislation will be brought in at an appropriate time.

After seven months of abortion on demand, thanks to this Government, isn't now an appropriate time? When is the Government going to bring in its legislation?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that a former Solicitor General would ask a question like that, notwithstanding certain important developments before the Supreme Court of Canada in what is a most serious and sensitive issue that has important moral and religious implications for Canadians as a whole and, if I may so, in a very special way for the women of Canada. It is an extremely challenging issue where we would all seek to bring together a position that can be supported by the largest number of people, given the pluralistic society in which we live.

My hon. friend appears to be berating me somewhat for not being more precise than that. I regret that, except to express surprise that he would say that of me when his own Leader indicated that his, his leader's views on this issue were irrelevant.

BOROWSKI HEARING BEFORE SUPREME COURT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): The Prime Minister, I think, is responsible for the Government of Canada and for legislation that is needed on this subject, and the Leader of the Official Opposition did take a position on the resolutions that were brought forward.

Mr. Crosbie: Yes, he ran. He wasn't here.

Mr. Kaplan: I have the communiqué here. He did take a position on the resolutions. It was the Prime Minister who said he had no position on those resolutions. Then he said he would bring forward legislation. I would like to ask him about the Borowski matter. If the Government has not taken a position, why, with no position, does the Government feel justified in going back to the Supreme Court of Canada a second time to try to prevent a private citizen from having a case heard before the Supreme Court of Canada?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the Borowski case, the Chief Law Officer of the Crown, the Attorney General of Canada, has filed, as he must do, a brief in that case setting forth a factum, setting forth the law which the law officers of the Crown feel to be pertinent to the questions in the appeal. His document is a legal submission, Mr. Speaker, not a statement of government policy. It sets forth an analysis of the current state of the law rather than being a statement of what the law might be or should be. That is the position taken by the Attorney General, who, in these matters, must operate independently of the Government. The Government cannot direct the Attorney General, nor the law officers of the Crown, as to what legal opinions they must produce.

They must give their unvarnished legal opinions, undeterred by government policy and separate altogether from any directives or directions of the Government. The Attorney General asked the court to postpone the appeal until Parliament had dealt with the matter so that the questions could be heard in a legislative context. That was his request which the court turned down. The matter is now going forward.

CANADIAN RADIO-TELEVISION AND TELECOMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION

FRASER VALLEY CABLE TELEVISION SERVICES

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications.

Cable television companies in the Fraser Valley have recently notified their subscribers that they are about to receive additional services. Rates will be increased to cover the cost of three new channels which will be arbitrarily added to the cable service.

In light of the fact that many of my own constituents, especially seniors in the Fraser Valley and I am sure others across the country, do not want the additional channels, could the Minister request the CRTC to re-examine these proposed changes immediately?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the decision to award licences for new specialty services was taken by the CRTC last November. It included in those series of decisions a structure for the imposition of new tariffs regarding the services.

The CRTC also indicated at that time that the carriage of these services would be by cable but it would not be mandatory. In other words, the services would be carried by the cable distributors based on the requirements of the local market.

The CRTC also at that time did a study indicating that it felt that the over-all rate of the increase of the new tariffs would not be excessive, and the Government in responding to those services and to the appeals therefrom last January did not see fit to vary that decision.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Prince Albert, a single question please.

DEPARTMENT OF REGIONAL INDUSTRIAL EXPANSION

FUTURE OF REGIONAL OFFICES IN SASKATCHEWAN AND ALBERTA

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, the Government is continuing to reduce services to remote and rural areas of Canada.

Mr. Crosbie: What nonsense.

Mr. Hovdebo: My question is for the Minister of Regional and Industrial Expansion. We have seen a cut in postal and transportation services. Now it has come to light that the Department of Regional and Industrial Expansion intends to close its offices in Prince Albert and La Ronge, Saskatchewan, and in Prince George, British Columbia. These DRIE offices administer the special ARDA and the Regional Economic and Development subsidiary agreements.

Instead of forcing northerners to travel many miles to reach other offices and take advantage of the services there, will the Minister make a commitment today that these three offices will remain open as long as these programs are in effect?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I would only like to reassure my hon. colleague that the whole thrust of what this Government is doing in the area of regional development is to decentralize the decision-making process so that regions can make their own decisions that have an effect in those regions.

We have done that with the Western Diversification Office, we have done that with the Atlantic agency, we have done that with Northern Ontario, and we have done it with Quebec. That is the spirit in which the whole program is working.

I will be happy to look into those three specific cases, but let me assure my colleague that decentralization on local decision-making fits perfectly well with the whole thrust of what we are doing.

Mr. Speaker: I want to advise the House there will be a single question from the Hon. Member for Etobicoke North. Then before going into Routine Proceedings, as I think has been arranged among Members, there will be a statement by the Minister for International Trade. The Hon. Member for Etobicoke North.

AIRPORTS

Mr. Bob Pennock (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture. It is my understanding that today Agriculture Canada was going to announce if it would approve the trucking of excess garbage from Pearson Airport to another province for incineration. Every day 19 tonnes of excess garbage builds up at Pearson Airport. Can the Minister tell us whether permission was granted?

Since Hamilton has the capacity to deal with our waste because its incinerator is running at only 50 per cent capacity, can the Minister assure this House that something will be done to prevent Hamilton from holding the safety of this country for ransom by refusing to alleviate this serious, critical health condition?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it is true that the airlines have requested permission of the Department of Agriculture to transport the garbage, both compacted and uncompacted, out of the area.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, it is the primary responsibility of the Department of Agriculture to ensure that garbage coming in from international flights is handled in such a way that we can ensure there is no danger of any disease being introduced into Canada which could be a threat to the Canadian agricultural community.

I am advised that the Department this afternoon has requested additional information from the airlines with respect to the proposal. If, indeed, that information is provided and is complete and there is a possibility of the garbage being moved out, and assurance that it will be moved out without any risk to the Canadian agricultural community, then a decision will be announced by the end of the week.

I might also note that the federal Minister of Agriculture, according to my understanding, does not have the power to compel the Hamilton community or any other community to accept that garbage. It may be, however, that Premier Peterson and his colleagues have that responsibility should they choose to exercise it.

Mr. Speaker: As I mentioned, I will recognize the Hon. Minister for International Trade. I think the distinguished spokespersons from the other two Parties will also want to make some remarks. The Hon. Minister.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TRAGIC DEATH OF PRESIDENT OF PAKISTAN

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, as the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, I want to say on behalf of the Government and the people of Canada that we are deeply shocked by the news of the tragic death of the President of Pakistan, Zia-ul-Haq and others in an aircraft disaster this morning in Pakistan.

The Government extends its condolences to the people of Pakistan on this sad occasion. Our Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) has sent a message of condolence to the Acting President, Ghulam Ishaq Khan. President Zia has had a long and distinguished career in the service of his country. He was deeply committed to the social and economic development of the people of Pakistan and to bringing peace to that troubled area of the world. He will be long remembered for the leadership he provided in assisting the people of Afghanistan in their efforts to restore independence.

His loss comes at a critical time in the history of Pakistan. The Government and people of Canada hope that this tragedy will not affect the further restoration of democracy to Pakistan.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Official Opposition, I would like to join in the expression of condolence and sympathy on the death of President Zia of Pakistan.

President Zia was known not only for his commitment to his own country and to the establishment of a better life for the people of that country but also for his efforts on the international stage, particularly in that troubled area of the world in Afghanistan where his efforts contributed to the re-establishment of the independence of that country.

It is ironic that this tragedy occurred just at the end of the week of celebration of the independence of Pakistan. I was myself with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) in the City of Toronto where we celebrated the independence in City Hall Square, Toronto, in the presence of Mayor Art Eggleton. On that occasion the Minister and myself saw a wonderful demonstration of the loyalty to Canada and of the dedication to peace and security in Pakistan of the thousands and thousands of Torontonians and Canadians who have come to our country from Pakistan and who now make Canada their homeland.

On their behalf and on behalf of other Canadians and in particular of the Official Opposition, I extend our sympathy and condolence.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg—Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the New Democratic Party, I would like to join with the Government in its regret at the news of the violent death of the President of Pakistan, President Zia, and others such as the U.S. Ambassador to Pakistan in the aircraft disaster this morning.

Tabling of Documents

We extend our condolences to the bereaved families involved and to the people of Pakistan. Our thoughts and prayers will be with them in the obviously difficult days which lie ahead. We share the hope, as the Minister himself said, that the road to full restoration of democracy in Pakistan will not be negatively affected by this event.

PETITIONS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 106(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the Government's response to Petitions Nos. 332-4940 to 332-4956 inclusive.

FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS

TABLING OF INTERIM REPORT OF SUPERINTENDENT OF FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, on June 30, I announced in this place that the major banks had decided to act voluntarily to improve their service to customers. It is with great pleasure that I rise today to present an interim report from the Superintendent of Financial Institutions on the compliance of the six major banks with this policy.

Hon. Members will be pleased to note that the sincere efforts being made by financial institutions to enhance their service have also been affected in the last two months. In addition to eliminating certain charges, the banks are providing enhanced disclosure, notifications, and a complaints mechanism to customers. They are in fact acting in advance of the legislation that I have introduced for this purpose.

I would also like to point out that while trust companies have not been surveyed for this report, the major federally regulated trust companies are taking similar actions to those of the banks, and their compliance with the measures will be examined in short order.

POINTS OF ORDER

WITHDRAWAL OF BILL C-292

Mr. W. Paul McCrossan (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, I introduced a Bill to force banks and other financial institutions to institute certain reforms, such as reducing certain charges, providing increased disclosure and providing an effective consumer complaint mechanism. Since my own surveys in the last week and discussions with all the banks have indicated that all six major banks are now fully in compliance with my Bill, I seek unanimous consent of the House to withdraw my Bill from the private members' list which is third in order of precedence.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for York—Scarborough has risen seeking unanimous consent of the House to withdraw his Bill. The Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the request of the Hon. Member. I simply want to make the observation that I feel the initiative he took as a private Member actually put teeth into the committee report. While he might be convinced that the banks have indicated that they have backed off sufficiently, I must say that I reluctantly take his word. I do not have the kind of enthusiastic endorsement for that position as he might have. I have some suspicions that we still have some way to go.

He has requested that the Private Member's Bill be withdrawn, since he is the private Member who sponsored the Bill. We will certainly support his request.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the request. Is there unanimous consent that the Bill be withdrawn?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and Bill withdrawn.

ORDER OF PRECEDENCE OF BILL C-264

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga North): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that Bill C-292 has been withdrawn by unanimous consent of the House, I would like to ask you to seek unanimous consent of the House that Bill C-264, which is presently No. 10 on the private members' list of precedence, be moved up to No. 3 and debated on Monday, August 22 at third reading.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I simply want to say on behalf of the New Democratic Party, now that there is an opportunity with the withdrawal of the Private Member's Bill regarding bank charges to facilitate the processing of this Bill and to participate in the final debate at third reading, that we are prepared to support this request.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Liberal Party I wish to add our support to the final debate of this particular initiative by the Hon. Member.

We have indicated throughout that we are prepared to co-operate with respect to this particular piece of legislation.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the request of the Hon. Member for Mississauga North. Is there unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

HUMAN RIGHTS

PRESENTATION OF SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Reginald Stackhouse (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to present, in both official languages, the second report of the Standing Committee on Human Rights entitled "Human Rights and Aging in Canada".

In accordance with Standing Order 99(2), the committee requests that the Government table a comprehensive response. This report on human rights and aging in Canada shows that Canadians suffer age discrimination in spite of the Charter and the Canadian Human Rights Act forbidding it. This discrimination is felt in the job market where middle aged and older people find that they are an invisible minority denied opportunity because of prejudice based on age.

The report also focuses on how other human rights are denied older people. It includes 17 recommendations to which the Government is asked to respond.

INDIAN ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-150, an Act to amend the Indian Act (death rules).

Mr. Speaker: Shall the Hon. Minister have leave to introduce the said Bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

RADIO ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Communications) asked for leave to introduce Bill C-151, An Act to amend the Radio Act and certain other Acts in consequence thereof.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to give the Minister leave to introduce the Bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Speaker: When shall this Bill be read the second time? At the next sitting of the House?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ALLOTTED DAYS TO CONSIDER REPORT STAGE OF BILL C-130

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of State and Minister of State (Treasury Board)): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions among the Parties, and I would now indicate to the House something that I usually indicate on Thursdays. It would be the intention of the Government to call day one of the time allocation debate at report stage on Bill C-130 tomorrow, Thursday, and to call day two on Monday of next week. Under those circumstances that would mean that any required divisions and the concurrence motion under the Order passed yesterday would be at 9.45 p.m. on Monday.

However, there have been discussions among the Parties, and I think Your Honour would find unanimous consent for the following motion:

> That further to the Order made on Tuesday, August 16, 1988, relating to the report stage of Bill C-130, an Act to implement the free trade agreement between Canada and the United States of America, at no later than 10:00 p.m. on Monday, August 22, 1988, all questions necessary to dispose of the remaining report stage motions shall be put to the House and any demanded divisions, along with divisions already deferred, shall stand deferred until 6:00 p.m. Tuesday, August 23, 1988.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the proposition put forward by the Hon. Minister of State. Is there agreement?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap.

Mr. Riis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the Deputy Government House Leader that one appreciates this type of Order to enable us to make the necessary planning, because various Members are in other places other than in the House today.

I wonder if we could make the same request of the Deputy Government House Leader, that he indicate as early as possible when the days for the third reading will also take place, particularly the vote at third reading, again to enable Members of the House of Commons to have ample notification to ensure that they are able to be in Ottawa for that important vote.

Mr. Speaker: Before the Hon. Minister of State deals with the second matter that has been raised, I think I should take the disposition of the House. I gather there was agreement to the suggestion made by the Hon. Minister of State as expressed by the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap.

On the second question, the Hon. Minister of State may wish to comment.

Mr. Lewis: Yes, very much so, Mr. Speaker. In order to enable Members to plan their schedules, we will be coming back to the House—if not tomorrow, perhaps early next week—to advise as to when the final two days of debate would take place. I am open to suggestions on how we can accommodate Members voting at that time.

PETITIONS

REQUEST FOR WITHDRAWAL OF PROPOSED CANADA CHILD CARE ACT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to have the opportunity to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 106 on behalf of a number of constituents who feel that Canada needs high quality, accessible, and affordable child care services.

They believe that the Child Care Act presently before the House, which we will be debating later today, contains neither national objectives nor the necessary funding arrangements. It will not ensure that families have access to high quality child care. They also feel that the proposed Act is not in the best interests of young children, women, or families and therefore they humbly pray and call upon Parliament to withdraw the Child Care Act forthwith.

CANADA-U.S. FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, it happens that I have a petition from a number of residents of Spadina and other constituencies in Toronto who are concerned about the trade deal negotiated between the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and the President of the United States. They point out that it threatens the fabric of Canadian sovereignty and that the Prime Minister had no mandate to negotiate it in the first place. It would reduce Canada's ability to plan our economic, social, and cultural programs and integrate Canada further into the North American defence industrial base.

For those reasons they ask Parliament to ensure that a national debate takes place on the Mulroney-Reagan trade deal and that the debate result in a national general election before such an agreement is finalized.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: On a point of order, the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap.

Mr. Riis: It is not a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have a different petition to present. I should have done it at the same time as the previous one, but if I can be recognized I will simply present it now.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We can do that by unanimous consent.

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, again pursuant to Standing Order 106, I am pleased to present a petition on behalf of a number of petitioners who believe that the fabric of our society is being threatened by the proposed trade deal. They believe that the Government lacks a mandate to negotiate this trade deal with the U.S. and that the deal will reduce our country's ability to plan our economic, social and cultural future.

There are a number of other concerns, but I will simply summarize their final point by saying that they ask for a national debate to take place on the trade deal and that it result in a national general election before the agreement is finalized.

OPPOSITION TO CANADA POST PLANNED ACTION

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I also have the honour to present a petition from a number of people in Canada who have expressed concern with the Government's cut-backs in Canada Post services. They believe that these cut-backs have been detrimental to the service and will consequently be at the expense of consumers. They also believe that many rural post offices are being closed as a result of this policy, cancellation of routes in rural communities have been effected, and there has been a drastic reduction in service for many Canadians.

Therefore, the petitioners humbly call upon Parliament to instruct the Government to make improved services the highest priority of the Canada Post Corporation and abandon the policy of closing rural post offices and urban postal stations.

RESEARCH INTO PREVENTION AND CURE OF SCHIZOPHRENIA

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and privilege to present three petitions from persons in my constituency of Sarnia—Lambton. Schizophrenia is a major illness in Canada, affecting about 1 per cent of the population, causing severe mental anguish and suffering to patients and their relatives. It costs Canadian society more than $3 billion annually in direct health care and other support costs.

Schizophrenia patients, their relatives, and friends desperately hope that a cure and method of prevention can be found as soon as possible through larger research efforts dedicated to schizophrenia. The petitioners ask that Parliament ensure that such research efforts reflect the very serious nature of this disease in the future.

REQUEST FOR WITHDRAWAL OF PROPOSED CANADA CHILD CARE ACT

Ms. Marion Dewar (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have the responsibility and privilege of tabling a petition from many citizens in Toronto and district. They say that whereas the Child Care Act proposed by the Government of Canada contains neither national objectives nor necessary funding arrangements, will not ensure that families have access to high quality child care, and whereas the Act is not in the best interests of young children, women, or families, therefore the undersigned petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to withdraw the Child Care Act forthwith.

OPPOSITION TO TRANSFER OF JURISDICTION OVER IRRIGATION PROJECTS

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and duty to present a petition signed by over 300 residents of southwestern Saskatchewan who express concern over any possible transfer of jurisdiction over irrigation projects in that area from the PFRA to the Saskatchewan Water Corporation. The petitioners point out that this area of southwestern Saskatchewan is drought prone. It is a dry and arid area within the Palliser Triangle, and the management of water is especially important.

They note that the PFRA, for over 50 years, has maintained and operated the irrigation projects in the area in a very satisfactory manner. Accordingly they point out that it is not in the best interests of farm families, small businesses, or rural communities to transfer the administration of and responsibility for irrigation projects in the area from the PFRA to the Saskatchewan Water Corporation.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to retain the PFRA in its present form.

CANADA-U.S. FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I have three petitions to present to the House, comprising approximately 1,500 names from the Province of Nova Scotia primarily, dealing with the trade deal which the Government signed with the U.S.

The petitioners indicate their view that when an issue of such fundamental importance to the future of Canada, as is this proposed trade pact with the U.S., comes before the House of Commons it deserves the fullest possible examination and should not be put into effect before an election permits the people to have a say on the subject.

I also have a petition in a different form from, again, mostly people in Nova Scotia but some in Ottawa as well, perhaps another 250 people who make the point that this proposed trade deal would deny Canada the policy freedom to determine its own economic future and would deny Canadians the secure access which was sought to the U.S. market. Therefore the petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to permit the people of Canada the opportunity to accept or reject the trade agreement.

RESEARCH INTO PREVENTION AND CURE OF SCHIZOPHRENIA

Mr. Anthony Roman (York North): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of the York Region Friends of Schizophrenia. They wish to remind Members that schizophrenia is a major illness in Canada, affecting about 1 per cent of the population, causing severe mental anguish and suffering to the patients and their relatives, and costing Canadian society more than $3 billion annually in direct health care and other support costs. They specifically request that research efforts related to schizophrenia be commensurate with the seriousness of the illness.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, Question No. 384 will be answered today.

[Text]

FUEL TAX REBATE PROGRAM

Question No. 384—Mr. Malone:

Since the 80-20 formula under the Fuel Tax Rebate Program was implemented on June 26, 1986, has the government (a) received any revenue from farm fuel taxes and, if so, in what amount (b) incurred costs for auditing and administering the taxable portion of farm fuels and, if so, in what amount?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of National Revenue): The guidelines for use of the 80-20 formula which the Minister of National Revenue issued on June 26, 1986, simplified claim procedures and the paper burden for farmers who are eligible for the federal fuel tax rebate program. It is not the policy of the department to assess farmers on the basis of the 80-20 formula where farmers have documentation to substantiate the fuel used on highway which is not eligible for the fuel tax rebate. The formula is used for audit only in those instances where farmers use fuel which is eligible for the fuel tax rebate in vehicles licenced for highway use and have no documentation of such highway use of fuel.

Assessments and reductions in amounts claimed by farmers including field audit costs for fiscal years 1986-87 and 1987-88 were as follows:

Fiscal Year	Assessment/Reduction	Field Audit Costs
1986-87	$1,142,747.13	$183,495
1987-88	$1,209,029.19	$169,381
Total	$2,351,776.32	$352,876

[English]

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, the Parliamentary Secretary will know, as does the Deputy Government House Leader, that Question No. 289 standing in my name has been on the Order Paper since March 15, 1988. As you know, Mr. Speaker, the Standing Orders of this House permit the Government only 45 days to respond to a question asked by an Hon. Member. I know that the question I have asked is a terrible embarrassment to the Government, but there is no provision in the rules to allow the Government a greater length of time to answer embarrassing questions.

Why is it that by strange coincidence this very embarrassing question has not been responded to? Why are the rules of the House being breached in such a cavalier manner by the Tories?

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member's behaviour is consistent. He has classified the answer as embarrassing to the Government at the same time as saying that he has not seen the answer. He does not have it because the Government has not provided it. That is consistent with his behaviour over four years. I have watched it time and time again. The Member reaches conclusions on the absence of information, the fabrication of information, and the total creation of information.

In that the Member has the right to ask about the answer to that question-

Mr. Boudria: I have a right to a response.

Mr. Hawkes: —I will undertake to find out exactly what the problem is in terms of answering Question No. 289. I point out that as of August 12 we had answered 93.1 per cent of the questions presented to us. That is a much better record, indeed a fabulous record compared to the record of his Government when it was in control of this Chamber. However, I do not accept the notion that he can classify an answer he has not received as embarrassing to the Government. That is a total fabrication which should be brought to the attention of the Canadian people right now.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, the question to which I am referring is about Mr. Jean Sirois of Quebec. All Canadians will understand that Mr. Jean Sirois is a political embarrassment to the Government. That is not a secret from anyone, regardless of what the answer will contain.

I will agree to allow the questions to stand, provided that the Government respects the rules adopted unanimously by the House wherein there is no provision not to respond to questions within 45 days. It is not good enough to say that the Government is only delinquent seven times out of ten or six times out of ten, or whatever it is. It should observe the rules all the time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Parliamentary Secretary would like to make a short comment to end this matter.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I will try to bring it to a conclusion. I have stood in this Chamber before and answered the inquiries of opposition Members about questions which were slow to be answered. I have told this Chamber, and that Member in particular, that when questions are asked which involve inquiries of every single Department of the Government and every single budget of the Government, it is going to take longer to get an answer. If a series of questions were asked with respect to one Department at a time, we would be in a position to answer more quickly. When the question is asked with regard to every single Department of the Government, we cannot answer the question until we have all the answers back from all the Departments.

Without even making inquiries, I know that part of the problem was created by the form of the question, and the Member has been warned about using that form of question.

Mr. Boudria: You have been warned to respect the rules.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sure the Parliamentary Secretary will do his best to provide the answer as soon as possible.

OFFICIAL REPORT

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw your attention to page 18401 of Hansard which reports the speech I made in this Chamber yesterday. During the course of that speech I said that the Opposition, through its dilatory tactics, was wasting the time of this Chamber at about the rate of a half million dollars a day.

When I read Hansard this morning I saw that it says "$500 million a day". That is a bit of an exaggeration. If it cost $500 million a day to run this Chamber throughout the sitting days in a normal year that would be very close to the total federal Budget. That is a bit extravagant even for the Parliament of Canada. I listened to the tape and I did say "half a million dollars a day". I suggest that the Hansard staff might correct that to read "$500,000 a day" in both the French and English Hansard.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, the Parliamentary Secretary has done some calculations on what our efforts to stop the jamming of this trade legislation through the House of Commons has cost. Has he calculated what it cost the taxpayers of Canada when the Conservative Party of Canada closed down the House of Commons for 16 days and made it impossible for the House of Commons to run day after day after day? Has he made that calculation yet?

Mr. Boudria: What about when they stormed the Speaker's chair? What did that cost?

CANADA CHILD CARE ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Thursday, August 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Epp (Provencher) that Bill C-144, an Act to authorize payments by Canada toward the provision of child care services, and to amend the Canada Assistance Plan in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee; and the amendment of Mrs. Martin:

That this question be now put.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I rise to speak in favour of Bill C-144, the Canada child care Bill. It is a double pleasure in that I was part of the special committee which was formed in 1986 and travelled the country to study this very important question and that I took part in the deliberations and putting together of a report for the Minister. While it was not a unanimous report it was, nonetheless, a majority report which has met with very favourable comment from practically all the provinces. The provinces are responding very favourably to the negotiations which are being undertaken by the Minister.

I would like to outline briefly some of the main parts of this Bill. Some $2.3 billion of tax benefits will be spread over one million families. There is a $100 million child care initiatives fund to support applied research and innovation of Canadian child care. There is also $60 million to stimulate the development of accredited on reserve day care for Indian children.

Within the system itself is contained 50 per cent of the provincial and territorial operating costs of their non-profit and commercial services, as well as 75 per cent of the capital costs for non-profit day care services, in other words, to grow more spaces. There is also a special provision for the topping up of this 75 per cent to as high as 90 per cent for those provinces which are not up to speed on child care due to their inability to fund. This will enable those provinces to catch up on their child care expenditures.

In a national child care strategy there is no one single facet with meets the needs of every person. In the final decision child care must rest with parents, and it behoves governments to support parents in their choices.

This afternoon I would like to speak in terms of the criticism which has been brought before the Canadian public of the national child care strategy. It has been argued that more could have been achieved for child care by simply making changes to the Canada Assistance Plan, better known as CAP. This view is far too simplistic.

• (1540)

As we studied the needs of Canadians and looked at all the presentations that came before us, one could rationalize how to assist and make more happen by using the CAP system. When one delves into it, one has to consider why CAP was established and what was its purpose. CAP is a generic act in the sense that its provisions cover the full range of social assistance and welfare service costs which the federal Government shares with the provinces and the territories. To begin to introduce into CAP the new provisions found in the Canada Child Care Act would have resulted in radical changes to the tried and true provisions of CAP. It was wiser and more responsible to create a new instrument to share in the costs of provincial day care services.

The flexibility and benefits afforded provinces and territories are clearer and greater. We are very cognizant of the fact that the application of child care is a provincial matter. It behoves us as the federal Government not to impinge on the responsibilities of the provinces. I am sure the provinces would not have thanked us if we tried to introduce a measure that would dictate to them something under their jurisdiction.

Consider the benefits which this new Act offers. Sharing in day care services under CAP is limited mainly to the cost of non-profit agencies. Services purchased from the commercial sector can be shared only on behalf of families who qualify for social assistance. Forty per cent of Canadian day care spaces are provided by the commercial sector. Under the Canada child care Bill the federal Government will now share in the cost of provincial operating subsidies to both commercial and non-profit agencies. It does not tell the provinces that they cannot share in profit and non-profit. It leaves the option open to them.

CAP sharing is restricted to subsidies to low income families and those who qualify for social assistance. Under the Canada child care Bill, all children under the age of 15 years are eligible clients. There is no requirement for provinces to needs test or income test the parents of these children. It will be up to parents whether they want to avail themselves of it. The choice is up to the province as well. Our Government believes in people making choices. It is not up to the Government to dictate what these choices should be.

Except in a limited way, CAP does not share in provincial capital expenditures to create and renovate day care spaces. Under the Canada Child Care Act, the federal Government will share 75 per cent of provincial and territorial capital grants and subsidies to their non-profit sectors.

Some provinces have not been able to keep pace with other provinces in their expenditures per child on the creation and maintenance of their child care systems. CAP cannot help them catch up. The Canada child care Bill contains provisions whereby such provinces may qualify for enhanced levels of cost sharing as they catch up. Indeed, they may qualify for a maximum federal contribution to their eligible expenditures of 90 per cent. Under such an agreement, a province would only have to put up one dime for every dollar spent on child care within its borders.

As I noted earlier, CAP shares in a range of services. Additional services under the Canada child care Bill shall be resource and referral services to assist parents so that they can find and obtain quality day care for their children. Also included are public education programs so that parents can be informed of what to look for in a child care agency. Such services will assist parents to be better consumers and to be more demanding of the quality of care for their children.

There has been much discussion of child care standards. There should be consideration of this important matter, but there is no requirement of or reference to standards under CAP. The Canada child care Bill clearly requires as a condition of cost sharing that provinces and territories establish a statutory basis for standards of care in their legislation or regulations, that their standards be publicized and enforced, and that they provide evidence that those standards are being enforced.

Finally, the financial benefits to provinces and territories of the Canada child care Bill are important. Under CAP the federal Government presently shares about 35 per cent of national expenditures on child care, largely because there are limits on the kind of costs which can be shared with the provinces. Through the first seven years under the new Act the federal Government will share in more than 50 per cent of those expenditures and at least 50 per cent in subsequent years.

The federal contributions to provincial and territorial day care costs will increase about twofold in the first year under the new Act and will increase about fivefold in the seventh year.

Finally, it has been repeatedly argued in the House that more new spaces would have been created under CAP than under the new Act. Those who have advanced this argument have obviously not spoken to provincial and territorial Governments.

It is true that the number of day care spaces has increased markedly in recent years. Governments can be proud of this growth and how it reflects their commitment to child care. However, the provinces and territories told us that they could not continue to support recent rates of growth unless new money was injected into the child care sector.

In other words, the growth of day care under CAP had about reached its limits. That is why the Canada child care Bill is before us, to provide the kind of funding that CAP could not. It is to enhance the capacity of provinces to maintain and in some cases accelerate the rates of growth of child care.

In my estimation the advantages of the Canada child care Bill are clear. It will produce more and better day care for Canadian children than could have been achieved under CAP. It has taken us some 15 years to create the first 200,000 subsidized day care spaces in Canada. Under this new Bill it will only take seven years to double the number of spaces.

We also discovered as we travelled across the country that there was not a consensus on to how a solution should be brought about. People suggested that they wanted to be able to have assistance with what would happen to their children. This Bill allows people to have that input. It also takes into consideration the responsibility of the provinces and asks for the co-operation of the provinces.

It is with pleasure that I heartily endorse the Bill before us today and ask the House to send it to committee so that we can ensure that the legislation is finalized and put into law.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, this Conservative Bill and this Conservative child care program will not meet the needs for accessible quality child care in Canada. We have heard a lot of rhetoric by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) exaggerating the benefits of this Bill. However it is mostly just that, rhetoric and window-dressing.

There is no doubt that this Bill will make some slight improvement in child care in Canada, but on the whole the policy is wrong and the program is inadequate. This Bill will not do the job.

The House may ask why this Bill will not do the job. In a nutshell, the Bill provides for 200,000 new subsidized child care spaces in Canada over a period of seven years. However, there is a need in Canada for two million spaces. There are presently over two million Canadian women in the workforce with children under 16 years. Almost one-half are mothers of pre-schoolers who require all-day care. That is why so many day care associations and day care groups in this group have criticized the program. I have here several telegrams and letters from day care groups all across the country asking us not to pass this legislation. In fact, about 30 minutes ago, various Members of this House introduced petitions asking that this House not pass this Bill.

While the Government will be spending $6.4 billion on this program over seven years—not in one year—$2.3 billion of that amount will go to tax assistance, not to increasing child care spaces which is the greatest need. There are presently about 240,000 subsidized child care spaces in Canada. This Bill would provide another 200,000 over seven years, but there is a need for two billion spaces. More seriously, the $2.3 billion in tax assistance will give greater benefit to rich mothers rather than to poor mothers. Again, the greatest need is being ignored. At the present time child care money is being provided through the Canada Assistance Plan. While that system is obviously inadequate, it at least ensures that the money goes to those in greatest need. Under the Canada Assistance Plan the money goes to those Canadian mothers and families with the greatest need, but under the new program there is no such assurance.

The Prime Minister and his Ministers brag about this program, claiming what a great improvement it is because of the provision of $6.4 billion over seven years. It sounds like a lot of money, but when this Government will spend over $8 billion on 10 nuclear submarines, we can obviously see it is not very much. It shows where this Government's priorities are. It is proposing to spend over $8 billion on 10 nuclear submarines and only $6.4 billion over seven years on child care. That will not do the job. It will only provide for 200,000 spaces. If the Government is going to do a job for day care, one would think it would do it right.

We had a task force on child care which was appointed by the Trudeau Government during the last Parliament and headed by Katie Cooke. The task force reported to the new Conservative Government in 1986. Its report recommended that we have a national, fully publicly funded, provincially run child care system taking the present health care and education systems as a model. I ask Members of this House and the public to think about that for a moment.

We have had public education in Canada going back to the early 1920s, and in some provinces before that. At one time, I suppose before the First World War, most education was private. People had to pay. However Canadians decided that public universal education was necessary, and now all children aged five years or over go to public schools free of charge and those schools are paid for by tax money. We would not for one moment think of doing away with that system. I ask Canadians and Members of this House to think of day care in those terms. What we can do is extend that principle whereby we will have facilities for children less than five years of age who do not go to school. We will have facilities and personnel to take care of them while their mothers and fathers are at work, because most of them have to work, and these children can be taken care of in a proper environment.

We accept public education for children from about five years to twenty years, and I think public day care should be an extension of that concept. In this respect, it is rather upsetting to me when I see schools being boarded up or torn down because they are no longer necessary. It would seem to me that we could put those older schools to good use as child care centres and other community organizations. I know that is done in some places, but I still see too many schools which no longer serve a large enough child population being boarded up. Of course, I would also like to see our churches, shopping centres, and so on providing child care centres.

Some Conservative Members in this debate have asked how the Liberals can criticize this program, that when they were in office they did not do as much. In fact, one or two Members have wrongly said that we were in office for 20 years and did nothing. When I came to this House 23 years ago, child care was not an issue. There was not the demand of the 1980s. In the late 1950s and early 1960s there were larger families, fewer single mothers, and fewer mothers in the workforce. In fact, in the 1950s and early 1960s, a greater percentage of mothers stayed at home with their children. However, as we went into the 1970s, there were major social, demographic, and economic changes. Women entered the workforce in greater and greater numbers. Liberal Governments which were faced with that situation responded with tax breaks for child care, first deductions and then tax credits. Then the regulations for the Canada Assistance Plan were amended so that child care centres could be funded under the Canada Assistance Plan.

Finally, the Liberal Government undertook a program of encouraging child care in places of work, including work places under the federal Government. As we came into the election of 1984, that is what was being done. We had a program of tax breaks for child care. We had child care centres financed through the Canada Assistance Plan and we had certain policies for encouraging child care centres in work places and commercial centres.

As we went into the 1980s, it became obvious that this sort of program was not adequate. That is why former Prime Minister Trudeau appointed Katie Cooke to head up a task force to examine how we might put in place a national day care program. In the 1984 election campaign, in that famous women's debate, all Parties promised improvements in dealing with the day care situation. As you know, Mr. Speaker, the Conservatives won that election with an overwhelming majority, and since 1984 we have been waiting for them to carry out the promises they made in that election campaign. Four years went by and we did not get a Bill on this issue until July 25, 1988, just about a month ago. Perhaps negotiations and some spade work was going on behind the scenes, but in fact we had no new programs put into effect until this Bill on July 25, one month ago.

The Conservatives have spent almost four years preparing a program they promised in 1984, and it ends up being a half measure, a measure which will not do the job adequately. When Liberal Governments brought in medicare in 1966 they did it right. They did not bring in a half measure. They brought in a program that has turned out to be one of the best medicare programs in the world. It is a universal, comprehensive, portable, publicly funded program.

• (1600)

While those four principles are laid down in the federal legislation, and the federal Government funds the provincial programs up to 50 per cent, medicare is administered by the provinces. Medical health care is principally a provincial area of jurisdiction, but nevertheless the federal Government is funding medicare and stimulates the creation of the medicare program through that federal legislation and provides the four principles in the legislation which the provinces had to meet in order to get the federal money.

Beyond that, when certain Tory Governments in the 1980s tried to circumvent those principles by permitting extra billing and user fees in the last Parliament, a Liberal Government stopped that to keep the program public and universal. I simply refer to the medicare program to point out that that is the way we did it on medicare. We would approach day care in the same way.

As I said, this Bill is a half measure. It only provides for about 10 per cent of the spaces that are required. It does not help those who need help most. It contains no national objectives or guiding principles to assure equality of treatment in all provinces. It does not deal at all with the problem of latchkey children, that is, younger children who go to school in the daytime but must go home to an empty house where there is no mother and father because the mother and father are working, usually because they have to work to make ends meet. These children are left alone from 3 p.m. or 3.30 p.m. until the parents come home. There is no provision in the Bill for that, although it was recommended that something be done.

Finally, this Bill contains a ceiling on what can be spent for child care centres, a ceiling which did not exist before.

We have had a great deal of Tory rhetoric during this debate about this Bill. But when all is said and done, if the Bill is passed there will still be a crying need for quality child care in Canada. There will still be a crying need for child care in Canada because it will only deal with about 10 per cent of the problem. This Bill will not do the job.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Are there questions or comments? The Chair recognizes the Hon. Member for Fraser Valley East.

Mr. Belsher: Mr. Speaker, I listened intently to the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East (Mr. Allmand). I was quite intrigued with his conclusion that two million spaces are needed. He is assuming that everyone who works wants to have their children in a day care program. That is not the case.

He also went on at great lengths about the Katie Cooke task force and its report. Yet I find it ironic in that he forgot to mention the dollar figure that is attached to that report. The report recommended that a universal system be put into place which would cost up to $8 billion per year for the two senior levels of government. I guess this is the irresponsibility of the Liberal Party that it does not matter how much one spends and how big the deficit grows. However, we are trying to work within fiscal responsibility. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) whom we have had for this past four years has hit his targets every time he has put before this House his Budget in terms of the amount of reduction of the growth of the deficit. The deficit is still with us and still growing. We have brought forward a Bill which deals within the fiscal framework of what we have in our country.

Are the Liberals not aware that the Hon. Member mentioned a good suggestion which I might point out about the schools that are closed and which could be converted to day care centres? I see nothing in this legislation that would not permit a non-profit organization from putting the capital costs it is eligible to receive through its provincial system for renovating schools into this system. I would like to ask the Hon. Member if Liberals are not aware that that provision is there. Churches can do it. Any non-profit organization can take advantage of the capital costs that are available to them.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, yes, I was aware of that. In my remarks I was simply deploring the fact that too often school buildings are closed and are not used for community purposes.

With respect to the main point in the Hon. Member's question concerning the cost of the program, my understanding is that the Katie Cooke program—and she mentioned the figure herself—would cost about $9 billion. While I think the principal recommendations in the Katie Cooke report are worth while to consider, we in the Liberal Party have not accepted the total proposal of that report. We believe in our alternative plan, a plan that was put out by my colleague, the Hon. Member for Outremont (Mrs. Pépin) entitled "Choices for child care now and in the future, a Liberal minority report on child care". We propose that people in the upper income brackets pay up to at least 50 per cent of the costs out of their own pockets. We also suggest that there should be refundable tax credits in place of tax deductions. This is one of my criticisms of the Bill before us.

In the Bill before us we are concerned about the money being spent. Part of the money, as I pointed out, is about $2.3 billion which is through tax deductions and tax credits. We do not believe that tax deductions are a proper way to go because tax deductions help those in the upper income brackets rather than those in the lower income brackets. Our plan would be restricted to tax credits, refundable tax credits which would help those in the lower income brackets rather than those in the upper income brackets.

It becomes not simply a question of spending large sums of money, but it becomes a question of how we spend the limited amount of money we have so that we best meet the needs of the Canadian population. The principal need right now is to increase the number of spaces and to help those on lower and middle incomes. A lot of the need is with respect to single mothers who must go out to work if they are going to stay off welfare. I think we would all encourage that they work rather than stay on welfare. Their incomes on the whole are much lower than those of men and other women. Thus, if we are to use the money available in the best possible way, then we should not have tax deductions. We should have a full tax credit system combined with moneys that will increase the number of spaces.

I just want to make clear that therefore our alternative is partially based on Katie Cooke's report but not totally.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I think the Hon. Member has a credibility problem. In the old days he had his interests in the manpower policy. We had 10 per cent of the unemployed people in the country living in the Province of Alberta, and he supported a Government that gave us 1 per cent of the funds. That was his view of what was best for all Canadians.

He made clear to this Chamber today that he thought what this Government was doing was not sufficient and that it should spend better. Child tax credits are better than deductions.

When this system is in place, child tax credits will double for lower income Canadians. Those with young children will get double what the Hon. Member's Government made available. Child services in the next six years will be better than double what was provided in the last six years of his Government. How can the Hon. Member stand in this Chamber and tell us we are not doing enough without providing this Chamber with solid evidence that he severely condemns the Liberal Government in terms of child care? If doubling is not enough on the two things the Hon. Member thinks are more important, how could he have stayed in the Chamber over 15 or 20 years and supported the previous Government and what it was doing for children?

• (1610)

The Hon. Member states that it is not enough and that we need two million new places. I challenge him to stand in the Chamber and tell us what is his schedule for providing two million new spaces, and then tell us the cost. Is the money to be borrowed in order that future generations, those same children, have to pay the interest on the public debt, or will some other services be cut in the system? Will the Hon. Member tell us what the cost will be for the two million new spaces, how the money will be found, and what the schedule will be to produce those spaces?

Mr. Allmand: In my remarks I explained that the whole problem of child care has been a developing question. When I first came to Parliament in 1965 it was not an issue. It became an issue through the 1970s, and it became more acute in the 1980s because there were more single mothers, smaller families, and more mothers were working. As a result, in the last Parliament the Liberal Government, recognizing that what was in place was not adequate, appointed the Katie Cooke task force. There was a clear recognition that what we had tried up to that time was not adequate. First, we met the problem with tax deductions and tax credits, and then we moved to the Canada Assistance Plan. I was in the House and there was not a hue and cry from Conservative Members at that time to go much beyond that because the demand was developing. However, in the 1980s it became pretty clear that the demographics and social situation in Canada had changed. That is why the previous Government appointed the Katie Cooke task force. I do not favour all her recommendations, as I said to the Hon. Member on the last question. As the problem became more acute what we tried before was not adequate.

In the federal election in 1984, in the famous women's debate, all Parties promised to deal with this growing problem in a more responsible and adequate manner. We have an alternative program. Anyone can have a copy of the Liberal Party policy on child care by contacting our Party or the Hon. Member for Outremont. When we did our calculations it came to approximately $5 billion, but that has to be updated.

I find it amusing that the Parliamentary Secretary asks that question, because with all the resources of the Government it took it four years to put in place its policy after negotiating with the provinces. When the Minister first announced the policy in January, the provinces told him that was not enough, so he had to amend his proposals and add more money. Obviously it is not easy to cost these proposals. I want to assure the Hon. Member that we will update our costing on this proposal shortly, and when we go into an election it will be very specific with respect to costing.

The program being put forward by the Conservative Government is a half measure and it will not do the job. If it is passed as it is, there will still be a hue and cry in the country for something more adequate. We are committed to filling that need over a period of time. The Government is taking seven years in this particular program and I presume that that would be a first stage. Obviously it has to be staged, and even the new New Democratic proposal is over a four-year period. It is obvious that this cannot be done overnight.

Mr. Epp (Provencher): I would like to ask the Hon. Member one question. In the minority report of the Liberal Party on child care, the Party committed itself to expansion of child care in those years where the federal deficit would go down. That is contained in the report. Since 1969, when the Liberals have been in office, the deficit has gone up every year except in 1979 when they were in office for three months of those twelve months. Could the Member explain how the Liberal Party intends to expand child care if those conditions prevail?

Mr. Allmand: I agree with the Hon. Member that it could not be expanded very much under those conditions. There has been an update and in the update that is not contained, and this is made even more specific. The minority report was published in March, 1987, following the report of the Martin committee. It is fairly obvious, if there is going to be a national program with so many unforeseen emergencies, that it cannot be expanded under those conditions. I would agree with the Minister on that point.

[Translation]

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Science and Technology)): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to take part in this debate, since I support wholeheartedly what the Government is trying to accomplish with its national strategy on child care and the instrument it intends to use, and I am referring to the Canada Child Care Act, to establish terms for co-operation with the provinces.

The whole issue of improving day care will have to be considered in terms of the kind of relations that should exist at various levels. At the most important stage, the actual provision of care to Canadian children, good working relations must exist between parents and day care staff and management. The federal and provincial governments will of course have to work as a team to harmonize their programs and ensure that both intermediate and general objectives are reasonable and realistic. Finally, the Government's policy must take its cue from the needs of parents and families.

Mr. Speaker, the national strategy on child care launched by the federal Government responds to this need for concerted action in a far more satisfactory manner than any of the measures proposed by other levels of government, by pressure groups or by the Hon. Members opposite.

As I see it, our strategy is the most practical response for two reasons. First of all, it meets the needs of children, women, parents and families, which is the guiding principle of the federal Government's commitment. Furthermore, the policy is designed in such a way that all Canadians, in all regions and provinces, are treated equitably.

The issue of what should be done to improve child care services in Canada has been the subject of a great deal of debate, protest and fault finding. However, if we listen very carefully to what is being said by pressure groups and Members of the Opposition, we soon realize it does not reflect the views of the Canadian people and shows utter disregard for the real needs of Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, during the debate on this Bill so far, we have heard the same platitudes, the same erroneous definitions of needs and the same ideological positions that in the past two years have been typical of the Opposition's approach to child care. I think the time has come to stop and reflect on a more realistic perspective for this debate. That being said, I would like to talk about what Canadians are thinking and what parents want, so that we can consider the Government's initiative in its true light.

In Canada, all parents accept responsibility for looking after their children. No Member in this House would deny this fundamental aspect of our family life. Not only do parents accept this responsibility, they are bound to do so. That is the basis of our family law and of much of our penal law in this country.

Although all Canadians have a number of fundamental values in common, their living habits are different, customs vary from region to region, from city to city and even from family to family, and their heritage consists of values and traditions from many countries the world over.

• (1620)

They want to bring up their children their way, without having government bodies telling them what to do and how to behave. Mr. Speaker, we all know the truth of that.

So when it comes to day care services, why would we suppose that this natural tendency does not exist, when indeed it does? Parents want to make their own choice based on their needs and those of their children. They do not want to be told by the Government, and especially a government as remote from them as the federal Government, that there is only one way for child care and one system that the Government is prepared to subsidize.

To say the opposite is sheer idiocy. There is not a single Member in this House who does not remember cases where previous administrations tried to tell the Canadian people that there was only one way to proceed. Canadians have always rebelled at that because it goes against their will. I am constantly amazed by the people opposite who, on the one hand, spend a great deal of their time promoting the pluralism and multiculturalism of Canadian society and, on the other, require that all Canadians subscribe to a specific, rigid line of conduct.

These Members demand that the federal Government establish a universal, institutionalized child care system without considering the many ways Canadians take care of their children. They are also the ones who say that the Government must not allow parents to stay at home to look after their children, if that is their wish, or to leave their children in the care of an unofficial service, a family member or a neighbour if that works better for them.

The Canadian people also recognize that paying for child care services is first of all the parents' responsibility. Parents want some help, because paying for child care services can be quite a heavy financial burden for a family. But there is no doubt that they want this assistance given to them on their own terms.

Mr. Speaker, most Canadian families would reject government assistance if it meant having to raise their children the way the Government feels they should.

If you look at the Government's child care strategy from this perspective, you will immediately realize how well adapted it is to the way Canadian families live and what they believe in. The strategy supports all child care options, from fully subsidized spaces to parents who choose to pay the total cost of official services in a private setting, and includes those who decide to stay at home because they believe that this is best for their family.

The purpose of the national child care strategy is not to restrict the options available to parents and families; rather, it is meant to help parents choose the solution best suited to their family's needs and to ensure that these options are less costly, whatever the family's financial situation. The tax measures announced as part of the strategy provide tax credits as well as higher deductions for child care expenses as ways to keep parents' child care options open.

Canadians are extremely well disposed to the need for subsidized day care spaces, especially for single-parent families. No parent who has had to look for a quality space for her or his children denies the need for more such spaces, subsidized or not.

In its strategy, the Government is committed to doubling the number of subsidized spaces over the next seven years. This means that if this goal is reached, the number will increase from 200,000 to 400,000 during the period of growth envisaged by the strategy and the Bill now being debated. But hold on, it does not mean that Canada will have only 400,000 day care spaces all told. Indeed these will be the only spaces for which the federal and provincial governments will pay all or most installation costs.

Complementary family day care facilities are not included in these figures, nor are neighbouring services or more formal private services which are now completely paid for by parents. Thanks to higher day care tax deductions, private services will become less of a financial drain on Canadian families. The resulting stronger demand might trigger a virtual explosion of the number of spaces made available this way.

Mr. Speaker, we all know that when consumers pick up the whole tab for a readily available service it has to live up to their expectations. If on top of that you consider the legislative provisions under which the provinces are required to define and implement child care service standards, I would suggest that parents will be surprised to find out how quickly day care services—public and private alike—will meet the requirements of parents, communities, and provincial authorities.

When it comes to child care services, Canadians have taken a pragmatic approach, as they did in connection with a number of other social issue. Canadians do not believe that the problem can be solved overnight, nor that a mere statement of principle by the Government will solve everything. I do not think that people are overly concerned whether a day care service is operated by a non-profit organization or by a commercial undertaking. The bottom line is not who runs the operation but how good are the services available.

Of course if there is one aspect about which all parents see eye to eye it has to be the need to improve the quality of child care services throughout the country. Mr. Speaker, this should not be interpreted to imply that existing services are downright inferior and fail to meet the basic needs of children, quite the contrary. This is just another indication that parents want their children to have the best they can afford, and this includes quality services when they simply cannot personally look after their children.

Under Section 4 of the Bill, the federal Government is firmly committed to improving child care standards in very many respects: child/person ratios, parent participation, health and safety measures, programming, to name only a few. However, a practical and realistic approach had to be designed in relation to child care standards. Canadians don't want arbitrary standards to be forced upon them as if they did not know what is best for their children.

I believe parents want to be sure that child care standards reflect their values as well as those of the communities and the regions where they live and to which they relate. In other words, Mr. Speaker, parents want to have a say in the quality standards which will apply to the care their children will be receiving.

I challenge any Member of this House to say that he or she knows what are the needs and concerns of Canadian parents. Once you have said child care services must conform to the highest quality standards, you can say no more without infringing on the parents' right to define what they believe to be the best for their children. All Hon. Members with young children know that this is true, no matter what they may claim during this debate.

• (1630)

Finally, Mr. Speaker, Canadians have indicated that they are prepared to support the extension of child care services everywhere in Canada. Recent surveys have shown that even Canadians without children recognize the important social and economic benefits which may result from more accessible and better quality child care services.

They will not really mind if Governments, both federal and provincial, invest large amounts of taxpayers money to enhance the child care system as long as they can ascertain that these expenses will achieve realistic goals and are shared equitably.

Many Canadians feel that subsidized day care government programs meet the needs of low-income families and that higher-income Canadians can provide for their own children. Those who need assistance most are the middle-income Canadian families where both working parents can hardly keep up their standard of living. Anyone who has carefully examined every aspect of the national strategy will clearly realize that the federal Government has not overlooked middle-income Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, we can all recognize that there are many special needs which current child care services cannot fully satisfy now. After all, it is only under this Government that child care was upgraded from a social welfare service to a social service. This Governement has recognized that child care is in a state of infancy as a social service and that in the future there will be a tremendous development and a great many changes similar to those provided to senior citizens.

The Government has shown leadership in these areas, just as it did in the case of the Child Care Special Initiatives Fund, the purpose of which is to support the solutions proposed by various communities to meet special needs. Canada's history is filled with examples of Canadians, working within small communities who have found solutions to many challenging social problems to various Governments.

It seems to me that the people opposite should look up Canada's history before requiring the federal Government to find solutions to meet all the various needs and values of Canadians.

As I pointed out, a feature of the national child care strategy is the good partnership that was made possible thanks to this Government. This is true both in terms of the needs and interests of Canadian families and our relations with provincial authorities, because let us not forget that the latter are responsible for child care services and programs.

Under the legislation, the Canadian Government is taking the initiative to increase and improve child care services. But in so doing it is respecting the roles of provinces, taking into account provincial programs and services, while making it possible to reach realistic goals within a relatively short timeframe. To those who demand a unilateral stand from the Canadian Government, something that flies in the face of established usage, and also centrally imposed criteria, I say: Stand up and explain two things. How will you operate the system, since you do not even have any right to act in that area in the first place? And then, how will you convince the large majority of Canadian families that they should pay for a system they will never use?

Let me make this clear, Mr. Speaker—I am not asking them to come and air their political rhetoric or ideological stands. What I am asking for is that they come up with a workable, affordable and feasible plan Canadian taxpayers and provinces can afford. I have yet to hear something in this debate that will convince me Opposition Members have found solutions that are more logical than the strategy put forward by this administration.

It is not difficult to trumpet that this Government should do this or that. It is not difficult either to glean figures here and there and use them to support a position, even if those figures have little basis in fact. But we must be careful about something. Figures should not be interpreted in a self-serving manner.

The solutions to Canada's social and economic problems lie in a balanced approach; we must be responsive to the needs of the various regions and provinces, and we must have a good partnership I was referring to earlier. This is how this country operates, and this is why this general legislation meets the needs of Canadian families as no other could.

I urge my colleagues in this House to put aside for a moment their political restraints in order to look at our children's genuine needs. In this pre-election period, it is very easy to promise people a cure-all solution. Will that solution however improve the quality of child care services? Will it create one single extra place in our current child care system? No.

I do not even believe, Mr. Speaker, it would bring us one extra vote.

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the Hon. Member for Louis-Hébert (Mrs. Duplessis) on her very good speech. I think she made points that were quite logical and most relevant on the proper way to raise children.

Children, as we know, need love and attention. They can get it in their homes. That is where young children belong. We are well aware of the psychological problems experienced later in life by children who are put under care as soon as they are born. That is why the main objective of a social policy aimed at children must be to keep them with their families. There are exceptional cases where parents must work outside the home. The Government has a responsibility to help them, and that is where a federal public day care policy is required.

In Alberta, for instance, we have an abundance of day care spaces, a matter that comes under provincial jurisdiction. The federal Government must provide help across Canada, in poor regions that are economically unable to set up services. Transfer payments must therefore be made by the Federal Government. That is how we should consider this Bill. The legislation must be balanced and must provide help in those marginal cases where the mother must stay home because she has several children. Tax credits must be added for those families.

Those are the comments I wanted to make. I wanted also to congratulate the Hon. Member for Louis-Hébert on her excellent speech.

[English]

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate having this opportunity to say a few words on this important issue of child care. I want to begin my remarks by recalling an incident in Kamloops during the 1984 election campaign when the now Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) visited Kamloops. He went on at some length at a public meeting about all of the wonderful initiatives that his Government would take in providing adequate child care to meet the needs of Canadian families and that it was one of his top priorities.

Here we are on the eve of an election call, four years later, and we are now just beginning to talk about legislation. But, this legislation before us is seriously and fundamentally flawed. It is actually a step backward in time. What the Government is providing is a complete and total smoke-screen because what we will get as a result of this so-called child care Bill is something worse than what we have today. Let me outline why I say that.

First I want to prick one big balloon myth that has been floating around. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) has said on many occasions that this package will add $6.4 billion over seven years to provide child care in Canada.

• (1640)

I want to quote from Marjorie Nichols column in The Ottawa Citizen of August 17, 1988. If there is one journalist we all hold in high esteem, it is Marjorie Nichols. If there is one journalist whose work appears in newspapers across the country, who appears on national television regularly as a commentator on the Government's work, it is Marjorie Nichols. She says that the Bill before the Commons would provide for about $2.6 billion in new federal funds for child care. Not $6.4 billion but $2.6 billion. I just wanted to put on the record very clearly that the Minister of National Health and Welfare is not doing what he says he is doing. I would not say he is intentionally misleading Canadians, but I would come awfully close to saying that.

What is the situation? We have a crisis in child care and there is no other word for it. There is not a Member of Parliament who does not have a long list of experiences with constituents who are forced to work and, therefore, know the tragedy of having to leave their young children with baby-sitters and so on. They get up at seven o'clock in the morning only to find their baby-sitter has gone on holidays and forgot to tell them, or is sick and cannot take their young children and they have to find someone else before they can go to work. There are all sorts of absolute horror stories that people are forced to contend with because the Government has not acted.

I have two letters here from constituents, one of which says:

> I am a single mother with two children living in Dallas.

That is a suburb of Kamloops, not Dallas, Texas. It says:

> I have a part-time job working about 30 hours a week and make only $1100 a month, yet I am required to pay out $610 a month for child care for my children. It is good care for my children and I applaud the care givers, but, Mr. Riis, I can hardly afford it. How can I continue? Have you any advice?

I will not read her name because I have not asked her permission to read the letter into the record, but she is a constituent. The other letter says:

> My husband and I own a small cattle ranch and my husband is forced to work out at Tumbler Ridge—

I should say that Tumbler Ridge is a coal mining area in British Columbia which is obviously away from their ranch. It says:

> —due to the bank problems that you are well aware of. The problem is that while I have managed to get a part-time job, there are no daycare facilities for our three children all under the age of seven. I hope in your attempts to get the Government to introduce more support for child care that you remember those of us who live in rural areas or small towns who desperately need daycare if we are to survive.

These letters are typical of the dozens of letters that constituents write to us vividly detailing the crisis they face on a personal basis. This has mushroomed into a national crisis. If you look at the situation in 1988, according to the national day care information centre there are 2,103,450 children whose parents work or study full time. How many licensed child care spaces are there in Canada? Only 243,000. In other words, less than 12 per cent of those who may need licensed child care spaces have them available. The province I am proud to represent from the constituency of Kamloops—Shuswap requires more than 150,000 day care spaces just to meet present needs. There are only 243,000 all across Canada. That is why I call it a crisis. Adequate child care spaces in Canada simply do not exist.

When we talk about child care we are going beyond simply day care spaces. We all recognize that significant numbers of day care spaces are available but there are also other forms of child care, including family home child care which we must develop. We must develop before and after school care. We must develop neighbourhood drop-in child care centres for young children and their parents. We see the development of essentially a resource centre to help people raising their children. We need 24 hour child care for those who have to work shifts or leave home for one or two days a week because of their jobs, such as selling and so on. We need weekend care facilities, particularly for single parents who on occasion simply must have a break. A weekend child care facility would provide that. We need toy lending libraries. We need part-time care and play groups. I could go on and on.

What is required under the general umbrella of child care is simply much more than day care spaces. I could talk about the need for enhanced maternity and parental benefits in our system or the fact we need paid family responsibility leave under the Canada Labour Code. Obviously the crisis is here. The need for action is now yet the Government is going backward. It is not introducing legislation to advance these services which are so desperately required. I say that in a country which has over 2 million young people in need of some kind of care or other, to have only 243,000 child care spaces obviously means the situation is totally and completely inadequate.

I suppose that is why when the National Action Committee on the Status of Women appeared before Members of Parliament not long ago they had very strong criticisms of the federal Government with respect to the lack of action over the last one, two, three or four years of the federal Government's administration. I remember that day in Kamloops when the Prime Minister said: "We have this at the top of our list of priorities". Even today, nothing has been done and now we are going to start worsening the situation through this legislation. That is why I say at the outset that I oppose the legislation. It is unamendable. You cannot improve it because it is such a disaster. I oppose it and hope the Government will bring in something that will actually begin to meet the crisis. It is not an easy situation to resolve. It will take many years. However, let us start building a good strong base today.

One of the things that the legislation will do is create 200,000 child care spaces over the next seven years. That sounds good to you and I, but under existing programs a lot more than that would be created. For example, in 1980 we had 109,000 child care spaces in Canada. In 1986 it had increased to 220,000. This year it is as high as 243,000. Over seven years, if we are to apply this same increase of 15 per cent each year, we would create over 500,000 spaces seven years from now. Under the government program we will only create an extra 200,000, which means we will have fewer child care spaces than under the present system.

Under the federal Government's program the number of child care spaces over the next seven years would increase at a rate of 10 per cent. Under present conditions, using the Canada Assistance Plan, it would increase at 15 per cent year over year for seven years. That is why I say we are going backward. The federal Government is worsening the situation. In addition, this legislation puts a cap on spending. After seven years, that is it. Of course, we will in no way be meeting the situation with this program, yet the Government says there will be no further expenditure. At least, that is the best information available today.

Another problem is that there will be no national guidelines or objectives. In other words, we will have one day care system in British Columbia, another one in P.E.I., a different one in Alberta, something different in Ontario and something totally different in Nova Scotia. We will have this patchwork of social programs for day care. That is not the way to run a country. That is not the way to provide leadership. Can you imagine if we had different family allowance cheques going out in different amounts in every province? Or, a different pension system in every province? Or, a different medicare system in every province? That is not a country, that is a hodge-podge. In her column a few days ago Marjorie Nichols said that the Government will rip the country apart by allowing different child care systems in each province of Canada.

• (1650)

In some provinces that might not be a bad deal, but I have no faith at all that Bill Vander Zalm in British Columbia will spend the money from the federal Government to enhance child care. As a matter of fact, Mr. Vander Zalm is on record as saying that if he gets the money, he does not know what he is going to spend it on. He has said that he is not going to spend it on operating funds. In other words, he might create a few extra spaces but the provincial Government will not give any money to operate those day care centres. I shudder at the thought of Bill Vander Zalm in charge of child care in British Columbia. Yet, that is what this particular legislation creates. We are obviously not very keen on that.

Let us look at the status quo in British Columbia and Alberta. In British Columbia there presently exist about 10,000 non-profit child care spaces and about 4,500 commercial child care spaces for a total of 14,500 child care spaces. In the Province of Alberta there are 824 public child care spaces, another 7,000 non-profit child care spaces, and an additional nearly 30,000 commercial spaces for a total of nearly 38,000 child care spaces. The Province of Alberta, therefore, has 38,000 child care spaces while over the mountains in a larger province, there are only 14,000 child care spaces. Therefore, even now we have a serious imbalance in what is provided to parents with young families in those two provinces. I could go through the list for every province in Canada.

We presently see two problems. One is the overwhelming lack of spaces for children in need of licensed child care facilities and the lack of federal standards to ensure that children have the same opportunities whether they live in British Columbia, the Northwest Territories, or Prince Edward Island. There is a lack of the federal leadership which is so desperately needed today.

Another problem is that, of the money being provided by the federal Government, $2.4 billion will be used through the tax system. With the way things are in Canada today, a low income family, particularly one headed by a single parent, probably does not pay any income tax. They are not likely to be in a taxable situation. If you do not pay any income tax, a tax break is of no benefit to you. To be fair, the doubling of the child care expense deduction will ease the situation for middle and upper-income families.

If the $2.4 billion to be used through the tax system, which will obviously benefit the middle and upper-income Canadian family, were used in the development of child care spaces we could develop another 170,000 child care spaces. That is the situation which I believe most Canadians would like to see in order to help the families most in need.

The legislation does provide some money for the low-income family. To help with baby-sitting the Government is going to give them an extra $200 a year. If you have five kids and are trying to find a way to get along, $200 a year for baby-sitting is almost a slap in the face.

However, we should not be surprised at this because it is this Government which brought in deindexing. It deindexed family allowance increases, child tax credit increases, and the child tax credit.

Mr. Kaplan: It's the opposite of Ronald Reagan.

Mr. Riis: My friend says that this is the opposite of Ronald Reagan's action. As a result of the Conservative Government's deindexation, rather than the family allowance going up with the cost of living, the costs go up but the family allowance cheque does not go up by the same amount. As a matter of fact, in 1988 $55 million which would normally go to parents in the form of family allowance cheques will not be paid out. The federal Government will keep it for nuclear submarines or whatever else it may want to use it for. The same is true for millions and millions of dollars under the child tax credit and millions and millions of dollars under the child tax exemption.

When you add up the money which has been taken out of the hands of Canada's children by the Government this year alone, it comes to $900 million. By 1992 that will total $1.7 billion. Thanks to our Prime Minister, $1.7 billion which should be going to the children of Canada is not going to them any longer. We should not be shocked that the Conservative Government does not seem to be making much of a progressive move on child care.

The country obviously needs a comprehensive child care policy which would be the first major national social program since medicare. We must approach child care as a Medicare II. At the urging of the NDP and CCF provincial Governments of the day and NDP and CCF Members of the House of Commons, Canadians took a major leap of faith and said that we should have medicare as other countries had. We finally got that and we should now be doing the same with child care in order that every young boy and girl in this country who requires child care has it available to them.

We need a comprehensive child care policy which will provide federal leadership to the provinces in order to have a uniform system across Canada so that boys and girls in Newfoundland and boys and girls in British Columbia will have the same kinds of opportunities. We need program criteria for funding set by national objectives and national standards to accomplish this.

The Government says that we should leave it to the market-place, that if there is a need it will be filled. Well, there obviously is a need and it is not being filled. The Americans have left it to the market-place, and we know the situation in the United States. There are tens of millions of young children in the United States desperately in need of decent child care. We should look to western Europe where decent child care systems have been in place for many, many years.

To summarize, I suggest that we not leave this to the provinces to decide. The most recent study done on this by the parliamentary sub-committee on child care said that the Government should not be funding new commercial services through capital or operating grants or fee subsidies or any other means. It said that if we are interested in creating a real child care system, the time has come to use this energy within a non-profit structure. I think that should be our model.

I could and should go on much longer, Mr. Speaker, but you are indicating, unfortunately, that my time is up. The Hon. Member for Vancouver East (Ms. Mitchell), a Member of the New Democratic Party, spent her entire lifetime caring for people and developing programs to support children. She represented the New Democrats on the standing committee which examined this issue. She wrote her own report entitled "Caring for Canada's Children" in March of 1987 outlining all the details which the New Democratic Party feels ought to be considered on this issue. If you, Mr. Speaker, or others would like a copy of that report, you can certainly obtain a copy to learn what New Democrats have in mind for a comprehensive first-rate child care policy for Canada in 1988.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order! The Hon. Member for Louis-Hébert (Mrs. Duplessis) has the floor for a question or comment.

Mrs. Duplessis: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap (Mr. Riis), since the New Democratic Party's long term goal is to establish a network of non-profit day care centres that will be fully subsidized by the State and accessible to all.

We looked very carefully at the day-care policy announced by the NDP. The New Democratic Party would establish this network in three stages. The first stage, until 1992, would involve establishing a system of direct operating and capital grants for the provinces and territories, in order to stabilize existing services, promote the development of new services, provide for new or expanded facilities or equipment, promote services for children with special needs, and improve wages and social benefits of care-givers. Grants would be approved only for licensed non-profit day care, and operating subsidies would be structured as follows: $8 per day for a handicapped child, $5 a day for toddlers or children with special needs, $4 per day for a school age child or when there is no school, and

$2 per day for a child who goes to day care after school or for half days. According to the capital grants system recommended by the New Democratic Party, $1,500 would be provided for a handicapped child, $1,000 for a pre-schooler, $500 for a school age child and $500 for a child in home day-care.

What bothers us a little is that the budget for the first year would provide $247 million in operating grants and $21 million in capital grants.

If the average operating grant is $4 per day and the average capital grant is $1,000, the budget for the first year would subsidize 237,000 licensed spaces and create only 21,000 new spaces.

In March of this year, we had 243,545 licensed day care spaces in this country, of which 153,159 were spaces in non-profit day care or home day care. Between March 1986 and March 1987, the number of licensed spaces increased by 23,000, and the number of spaces in non-profit day care and home day care increased by 12,334 spaces.

If the budget for the first year is maintained in constant dollars for five years, by the end of 1992 only 105,000 new spaces in non-profit day care would be created under the NDP plan.

My question for the Hon. Member is this: If, as his Party claims, we urgently need 1.8 million additional licensed day care spaces, why does the New Democratic Party plan to fill only 1.2 per cent of this requirement during the first year of its program?

[English]

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the serious question by the Hon. Member. She outlined some areas that I did not have a chance to pursue.

Of course one of our top priorities would be to improve the wages for care givers, the people employed in child care facilities who provide the support systems for children. They are presently grossly underpaid. I think the average industrial wage in Canada today is about $14,000 a year and the average child care worker makes at least 30 per cent less than that. In the commercial venture, child care for profit venture, which I personally do not support in principle, the pay is even less. That is a situation which we must improve quickly.

Obviously the kind of facilities that are run by communities and non-profit organizations are the best because parents play a direct role in the kind of care being given to their children. They do not have much say in a commercial or profit oriented venture because the reason that child care centre exists is to make money, not necessarily to care for children, while that is obviously a by-product of that initiative.

Community based, co-operative or non-profit organizations are ones in which the parents set the criteria for the curriculum and schedules. That is the kind of child care I think we want to see in this country.

The Hon. Member has raised an interesting question and one that I look forward to discussing, particularly in the upcoming election campaign. It is the legitimate question of how we pay for all of this. Where does the money come from?

The people of Canada will have an interesting opportunity to make some choices. If the people of Canada really want nuclear powered attack hunter submarines that will cost billions of dollars, then they should vote for the Conservatives because that is one of their high priorities. If they want decent child care facilities, they should vote for the New Democrats because that will be on the top of our priority list.

The people of Canada will have a choice to make, and that is what elections are all about. Do they want nuclear submarines or child care facilities? Do you want a variety and comprehensive set of child care opportunities for your children or do you want a fleet of nuclear attack hunter submarines on our east and west coasts? That is the choice. Those are the choices Canadians will have to make. If they want the nuclear fleet for Canada, they should vote for the Conservative Member in that constituency. If they want decent child care on the corner, a decent after-school care facility for their children, or a resource centre for families with spouses who remain at home to raise their children but want to have better books and toys, vote for the New Democrats. That is what elections and politics are all about. I look forward, as I suppose many of us do, to getting out in the election campaign and giving those choices to the people, to let the people decide.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, during the Hon. Member's speech I interjected a point to which I want his reaction. He was criticizing the Government for reducing the indexing and in some cases eliminating the indexing on taxation and some social benefit programs. Did the Hon. Member watch the Ronald Reagan event at the Republic Convention in the last few days? The President of the United States, a very Conservative President who, in some ways, is an extreme right-winger, took great pride in the fact that he introduced indexation into the taxation system in the United States, copying an idea that was brought into the Canadian system by the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Turner) when he was Minister of Finance many years ago. Is the Hon. Member aware that that right-winger, Ronald Reagan, is less harsh on the poor and ordinary citizens in his country than the Government has been toward poor and middle-income Canadians?

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond to that interjection by my hon. friend. I suppose there are only two pages from the Ronald Reagan book that I would like to apply to Canada. One is the imposition of a minimum corporate tax that I believe was another progressive item which the President and others have mentioned at the Republican Convention.

As the Hon. Member stated, in the past Canada has introduced a mechanism to combat inflation eating away at something like the family allowance. The value of the family allowance cheque would diminish year after year as inflation grows. I think all of us were pleased at the progressive initiative taken by the Minister of Finance some years ago with that indexation.

One of the very first actions of the Conservative Government was to grab money from the children of Canada by taking money from the family allowance cheque and the child tax deduction. It grabbed money from the child tax credit. I do not know if Canadians really appreciate the fact that it was one of the very first things the Conservative Government did.

Even Ronald Reagan commented that this indexation was one of the ways governments can provide better levels of financial support in order to provide for children in our countries. I thank my hon. colleague for his interjection and reminder of the fact that even right-wingers in the United States index these critical programs so that their young children will not be severely handicapped in the amount of money that will justly go to them from federal fiscal payments.

As I indicated earlier, I look forward to the campaign when Canadians can decide whether they want a nuclear submarine or a set of decent child care facilities.

• (1710)

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to participate in the debate today on Bill C-144 with respect to Canada's Child Care Act. First, I would like to congratulate the chairman of the child care task force, the Hon. Member for Lincoln (Mrs. Martin) and her colleagues, the Hon. Member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Belsher), the Hon. Member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Nicholson) and the Hon. Member for St. Boniface (Mr. Duguay). They certainly gave a great deal of their time and energy as they travelled across this country hearing from many groups and individuals. It was very interesting to read the report of the task force and note there were people who supported non-profit child care as well as people who supported commercial day care. They all gave extremely good representations. There were a number of people who appeared before the task force who felt very strongly that children should first be at home and gave some excellent reasons why they felt women should be supported in the home so they could take care of their families.

Members of the Opposition Parties, as well as some of the media, have criticized the Government's child care program because it has not imposed national standards. They claim that strong national leadership is not possible without national standards and that we will have a balkanization of day care across Canada with widely varying standards. Such criticism misses on two fronts. It misunderstands the nature of Canada and it misunderstands the fundamental role of standards. Canada is not a small, unified, monolithic country. A number of visitors from European countries with expertise in child care have expressed admiration for the multifaceted, pluralistic nature of Canada. They have expressed the sentiment that they would like to be in such a position where they could in fact observe and benefit from a variety of approaches and models which address regional differences rather than being hindered by an inability to allow creative and innovative approaches without having to make changes in their monolithic standards.

Child care in Canada is, in many ways, in its early formative stages. To prejudice the ultimate or final form and shape of child care services is to prematurely cut off the normal experimental path that developmental professions have to be free to follow in order to find a more efficient and effective approach. Just stop and think for a moment, Mr. Speaker. The realities facing Canadian families in downtown Toronto or Vancouver are vastly different from those which face families in Labrador City, Berin's River or Fort Simpson. What possible standard appropriate for Toronto would make equal sense to a remote village without indoor plumbing? Implementing standards to ensure quality of care in Toronto may well leave large parts of the country without the capacity to provide day care services at all.

This is not to imply that such standards would result in good care in Toronto while other sections of the country without identical standards would be offering inferior services. What it means is that situations differ widely and call for a clustering of approaches which meet the needs of specific situations.

This brings me to what I mentioned earlier, the misunderstanding of the nature and objective of standards. Licensing standards, which are of utmost importance to safeguard the well-being of children, should not be confused with quality issues. Licensing represents the minimum standard that a Government thinks is permissible in order to operate equally. It is not the same thing as a Good Housekeeping Seal of Approval. It is only indirectly related to quality day care. Quality care comes from individuals and groups who do their very best to offer the most nurturing and favourable care possible.

The federal Government recognizes the need for experimentation and fuller information as to what constitutes quality care and through its child care initiative fund supports efforts in this direction. This Government's approach is to work with the provinces. We recognize that there are certain areas in standards that do relate directly to good care and insist that in order for the provinces to enter into the cost sharing provisions of this Act, the provinces must address in regulation the various areas. However, the provinces, being closer to the unique situation of parents in their region, can develop specific standards in each of these identified areas that best meet the situation in those areas. I might add that standards are a matter directly under provincial jurisdiction.

I would also stress that given the tremendous differences which exist across Canada, licensing standards are remarkably similar. Who among the Opposition would think that, sitting in Ottawa, they could design more appropriate standards and enforce the standards better than can be done at the provincial level?

I would like to draw to the attention of members of the Opposition that some of the leading day care advocates have taken similar approaches to the federal Government on the question of national standards. On July 14, 1988, on the CBC Morningside program, Mr. Jack London, a member of the Katie Cooke task force, said:

> Now there is no way and our report found this in 1986. There is no way that Ottawa can tell a region somewhere in a remote area what ratios of children to supervisors there ought to be in a particular space.
> That's ridiculous. Ottawa can't control in that way. However, the federal Government has to ensure a number of basic standards right across the country and there are three of them. One is that money flow only into licensed, that is regulated and supervised care spaces, not into unsupervised and, therefore, inadequate spaces. Secondly, that moneys given to the provinces, and that's really what's happening here, moneys shared with the provinces, ought to be properly distributed so that the requisite number of spaces are available for infants, for preschool children, for school-aged children in the urban and rural areas. There's to be a proper distribution. And thirdly that the money be used to support public child care and not anything else.

On the CBC program, As It Happens, on August 11, Ms. P. Coates, Vice-President of the Canadian Day Care Advocacy Association was asked:

> Wouldn't the provinces object to having standards imposed on them?

Ms. Coates responded:

> We hadn't asked for specific standards to be imposed. What we had asked for was some global statements about the importance of standards, the importance of staff training, the importance of enriched staff child ratios without actually attaching detailed numbers to them. But if the criteria had been in there then there would have been pressure on the provinces to look at their standards, really review them and be accountable for the money that they spent on the types of programs.

The reporter asked her: "So all you want is a statement?" She replied: "We wanted some initial statements to begin with, national objectives and some criteria". So it is clear that those who have studied the question agree that our approach to quality and standards is sound.

• (1720)

I would like to go back to the February, 1988 Budget which stated that the child tax credit would be $559 for the 1988 tax year. Under this child care legislation the tax credit will be topped up by $100 per child under 18 years in 1988 and by another $100 per child in 1989. That is a $200 increase in the child tax credit.

On the deduction side in this legislation, parents with children under the age of six and with receipts from a child care facility will be able to deduct up to $4,000 per child. The lower income of a two-parent income family must be used.

Both of these assets, the child tax credit and the child deduction, represent $2.3 billion in this new program. Of the $2.3 billion about $2 billion goes to top up the child care tax credit. Thus out of every additional dollar of tax assistance in this program, 88 per cent is going to go to top up the child tax credit. That is good.

I want to talk about children here because topping up the child tax credit really assists children. Children have to come first. I know today that all across Canada in various regions and areas there are many parents who need child care assistance and child care facilities. I am willing to help those in need. We are a caring government. We will certainly assist those people in need, especially single parent women. But I feel that if there is a way to keep a family together, to keep children at home, especially in the very young years, then let us do it. I feel that parents have the responsibility to look after their children. I say let us try to encourage that.

I was very fortunate to be in a position to stay at home and look after my children. I recognize that. I strongly emphasize that I am willing to help those people in need. But if we can do anything, and do anything more to assist mothers or, indeed, fathers to stay at home and bring their children up in the home, I would certainly encourage it.

The Bill before us is the beginning of a new program. It is good. There are some inequities in it. I hope that we can resolve them in order to encourage moms or dads to stay at home. Child care is the responsibility of the parents. They should make the decision.

Within the Bill before us today there is flexibility. We have a great deal of flexibility that allows parents to choose between staying at home and receiving a child tax credit or sending their children to a commercial or non-profit child care facility with respect to which they will be allowed the tax deduction, as I said, with receipts up to $4,000 per child under the age of six. We have to work this child care program through. As I said, it is a beginning.

I know people have difficulties. I recognize that there are a great many ways to improve the situation. This is a beginning. There will be 200,000 new spaces created over the course of seven years. I welcome that. I welcome the fact that the provinces will be setting the standards. I welcome the fact that we will be working with each and every province to ensure that our moneys are well spent.

I am glad that 50 per cent of the provincial and territorial operating costs of non-profit commercial services will be paid for under the new legislation. Some 75 per cent of the capital costs for non-profit day care centres and services will be paid for. This is a step in the right direction. We have a long way to go. I am pleased to speak, but I must reiterate that kids come first. I would like to see kids come first at home.

I commend the Minister on his job well done, as well as the task force, and say that I look forward to implementing this new Canada Child Care Act. Canada can have the best child care system perhaps in the world if not, indeed, in North America.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Are there questions or comments? The Chair recognizes the Hon. Member for Calgary East.

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a comment. I listened with a great deal of attention to what the Hon. Member for Calgary South (Mrs. Sparrow) had to say. I wonder what her feeling is about the tax credit. It is only $100 in the first year and $200 in the next. For the mother who has to stay at home, I wonder if the Hon. Member would like to see this tax credit increased in order that more mothers can stay at home and so that they receive real justice for taking care of their children. Personally, I do not believe that day care is the solution to rearing a child. The Hon. Member is a nurse by training and has probably seen children who were abandoned, who have been in hospital and who did not get attention and love. This creates problems later in life.

I was surprised to hear the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap (Mr. Riis) say that he wanted two million day care spaces in Canada. As a physician, I know that people who put children in day care come to the medical office and quite often the children are sick because they are in contact with other children in the day care centre. They get infections. This creates a problem for certain mothers and fathers because certain children cannot stay in day care because of this problem. They are too easily infected with disease. The best solution to this problem is to have the child at home with a caring mother or father, grandmother or grandfather taking care of the child. I think we should look at this solution. For this reason we should give child tax credits in a larger amount so that people who stay home can benefit not only from tax credits but from being with their children.

Mrs. Sparrow: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague, the Hon. Member for Calgary East (Mr. Kindy) for his question. I have to agree with some of the statements he has made. When we compare the child tax credit to the tax deduction, I think there is an inequity. I would like to see more encouragement given to keeping a parent, whether it be the male or female parent, at home with the youngsters.

The child tax credit for the tax year 1988 is $559. The Bill which is before us will increase that tax credit by $100 per child under 18 years of age this year and by another $100 next year so that there will be a $200 increase, which will bring the tax credit up to $759. Each person will have to equate this within their own tax bracket. I have to check the figures, but for an income of $46,000 to $48,000, or perhaps into the $50,000 range, the child tax credit would be totally phased out. That compared to $4,000 per child with receipts is what is unfair in here.

I have to say to my colleague that this is a start. Even the Minister has recognized that there are some areas where perhaps there is not fairness. I look forward to reviewing it once the program is implemented, and seeing if by raising the child tax credit we could keep more moms and dads at home for their kids.

There are people who need child care facilities, and we know this. There are many single parents and many two-parent families who need double incomes to exist today, and we recognize that. The cost of raising children and the cost of housing is expensive. The inflation rate is between 3.9 and 4.1 per cent, depending on where one lives in the country. Therefore, it is very costly. The care of youngsters is up to the parents. I am quite willing to help those in need.

My colleague, the Hon. Member for Calgary East referred to the New Democratic Party comparing the national defence policy and the $8 billion for submarines and stating that that money should be spent on child care. It is very interesting that one compares eight to ten submarines with a child care program. If the truth were known, and as I understand it, the policy of the New Democratic Party with regard to defence is to scrap the eight to ten nuclear propelled submarines and build twelve conventional submarines. The New Democratic Party would also add an additional fleet of six frigates.

Members of the New Democratic Party have also stated publicly that they would discontinue defence cost sharing programs in order to design and build the defence equipment here in Canada. Their defence program will probably cost $3 to $6 billion more than ours. We are talking about $8 billion over 25 years. It represents $300,000 per year. This is not new money, and it is already budgeted for in the Budgets of the Government. I cannot believe how anyone can compare nuclear propelled submarines to a child care program.

This Government does not have tunnel vision. We do not look at one area, we look across Canada. We not only look at child care, but at post-secondary education, the agricultural department. Over the last four years we have spent $8 billion in the area of agriculture. Look what we have done in the energy sector. If we do not have agriculture healthy, energy healthy, and manufacturing healthy, we will not be able to pay for anybody's program. We need a balanced government, and that is exactly what we have done. We have helped the energy sector, the agricultural sector, and we are moving in to help the people in Newfoundland to create more jobs. The Government believes in a whole and total Canada and every person that we can get out there working will be able to support our social programs.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I may be in a somewhat unique position in the House since I am a day care parent. I hope the Member for Calgary East (Mr. Kindy) might listen to what I have to say because I heard him make some disparaging remarks about children who are in day care. I consider it a rare privilege that my little boy is in day care on the Hill. He receives incredibly good care and has had a great educational opportunity. I wish to pay tribute to the professional staff of the day care that operates here, and also to pay tribute to a former Speaker, the Right Hon. Jeanne Sauvé, who was the initiator of that program. It demonstrates the type of silly mythology and somewhat disparaging commentary that we heard from the Member for Calgary East.

Child care is a reality for 60 per cent of Canadian families. Let me make it very clear that, when one has direct experience, one speaks to the parents of other children, or is on the board as I am, or in my own riding where I have several day care centres, one finds out what people are talking about. It might help some Members opposite to spend a little more time talking to people who have a direct interest and involvement, which happens to be the majority of Canadian families.

Mrs. Sparrow: You bet we talk to them.

Mr. Axworthy: From what I have heard in the speeches, I do not think anybody from the Conservative caucus has talked to people whose children need day care. I listened to the Hon. Member for Calgary South (Mrs. Sparrow), who attempted to explain away the lack of standards. Has that Member ever talked to a parent with a deep concern about who is looking after their child, and what type of facilities the child will be in? What is the most important responsibility is that question of one's young child, who is going to look after him or her and how, and to have the assurances that are needed that there is proper teaching, proper care, proper surveillance, proper quality toys, and proper quality health facilities.

That should not be divided town by town, region by region, and province by province. We should not have a checkerboard Canada. There should not be discrimination in the quality of services because one happens to live in a rural area versus an urban area. By practice and experience we have learned since the 1960s that the only way to ensure that there is proper quality of social services is to ensure that the federal Government takes the lead and the responsibility for that insurance and does not surrender it.

I wish to take you back four or five years, Mr. Speaker, and discuss the medicare system, perhaps the most important and useful social program in this country. What was happening back in 1983 in Alberta, Ontario, and the Atlantic provinces? Provincial governments were undermining the standard of care under the medicare system. It was only when the national government brought in the Canada Health Act to establish national standards to ensure that funding was related to quality and services were we able to correct the downward decline of the medicare system.

Mr. Halliday: There is no relation at all.

Mr. Axworthy: There is a relationship. For anyone to argue that, argues against the history of the last 60 years. This is the first major social program we have talked about where the federal Government is abdicating its responsibility to ensure that there are national equitable standards for all children regardless of where they live. Flexible experimentation I believe were the words used by the Hon. Member for Calgary South. Does the Hon. Member know what that translates into? It translates into hodge-podge, substandard care and inequality. Those are the real words that should be used. I bring that back to the living reality of the parents I see every day when I take my own child to day care, or the people in my own riding who I talked to when I visited every single day care centre. It is a very important concern because it relates to the next one. The next concern is that so many parents in Canada today are accepting that substandard care because there is no other alternative. They do not know who is looking after their child because they have to go into the private market-place to find care.

Mr. Thacker: Why is a rich man like you being subsidized?

Mr. Axworthy: I am not being subsidized. We pay our full share. What a silly, stupid, reactionary attitude from the Member for Lethbridge—Foothills (Mr. Thacker). The fact of the matter is that he is talking about 60 or 70 per cent of the parents in this country. The Tories do not recognize because of their tax policies in other areas that one has to be part of a two-income family to survive in this country today.

Mr. Thacker: It was your policy which did that. There was 22 per cent interest while you were the Government.

Mr. Axworthy: If decent and proper care is not provided for children, the economy will fall to the bottom. This is a bad program. It is not designed for the care and concern of our children. It may be designed to fit the mythology and the ideology of the Member for Calgary East. However, it has nothing to do with what is required and what people want. I will give you an example, Mr. Speaker.

• (1740)

In 1985, I sat down with the churches and social service groups in my constituency, and organized what I think is probably the most extensive family study ever undertaken in Canada. We contacted every single household in my riding to ask about family related issues. We had close to 10,000 responses in a riding where there are 45,000 households. Close to 10,000 responses. I suggest that that is probably the most singular largest study of family concerns ever undertaken in Canada at a local community level.

What did we find? In my constituency, which goes from a downtown area where there is a high predominance of single-parent families to suburban areas with middle, upper middle-class families, upwards of anywhere from 58 per cent to 75 per cent of those in the area said that the number one concern was proper, decent child care. It had nothing to do with just those on the lowest income. This kind of Florence Nightingale, noblesse oblige kind of attitude that we hear that somehow we are going to help those only in need flies in the face of the fact that there is 60 or 70 per cent. I will give an example. In the Fort Richmond, Waverley Heights, South Fort Garry part of my riding, an area of middle, lower-middle-class, working class families, some upper-class families, 71 per cent of the parents say that additional child care programs are needed.

That compares to the fact that in that same area at the present time there is a grand total of 166 spaces for children, an area which includes close to 5,000 households. A hundred and sixty-six.

Do you know what the additional increment of the new Tory program will bring about in that area if you add it up? It is about six new spaces over that time.

Mr. Boudria: Great stuff.

Mr. Axworthy: I have to tell you that the people of South Richmond, South Fort Garry, Waverley Heights are not going to be dancing in the streets because they are going to get six additional spaces because of this new program.

Mr. Boudria: Such largess.

Mr. Axworthy: If anything points to the dramatic disparity between the rhetoric and the reality, it is that figure.

Mr. Riis: Are you sure about that figure?

Mr. Axworthy: I am positive about that figure. There are 166. If you add up the increment, they are going to get maybe an additional six spaces.

How can anyone stand up in this House and say that we have now met the problem? For those families, you have not begun to meet the problem. You have not begun to scratch the surface of the problem. You have not even got close to the problem.

When I hear, "Well, it is a beginning", it is a beginning and it is also the end. Once you entrench this program and turn it into one in which the provinces have complete control with no requirement for standard, you will never retrieve it again in order to establish a national program with national standards. You will never be able to undo the bad work that is being done. You will never be able to correct the major flaw that is being built into that program.

I can testify from my experience in my own community. That question of standards is absolutely essential. I have had parents come into my office and I have talked to them on the streets and in the day care centres. They have described to me the experiences of what it is like, the panic of when you have two parents working because they have to keep up mortgage payments or whatever it may be, trying to live in this high-cost economy, and all of a sudden they realize that there is no place for their child. They put an advertisement in the newspaper. Someone walks the street and says: "I may or may not be qualified", and they find out two or three weeks later that the baby-sitter, that private entrepreneur, is spending all afternoon with the TV set on, or is in some way ignoring the kid. We are dealing with that indifference, or even worse.

Ms. Dewar: With no background in child care.

Mr. Axworthy: With no background in child care training for families. I agree that there are some good private facilities. I have no argument about that. In fact, my mother was responsible for a day care centre for 15 years. She provided good treatment. They recognize that there had to be the essential question of standards there, because there are so many bad operators. There are so many corporate operators who simply see child care as a way of making a buck.

Mr. Riis: Shame.

Mr. Axworthy: There are too many chains being established across Canada with the idea of making a profit on children by providing the service; not providing the best service—

Ms. Dewar: With day care workers.

Mr. Axworthy: —to make sure that the day care workers get the minimum payment. How about the question of after school? Is there anything in this Bill that will provide for after-school care for the children? There is not one thing. I can tell you from a discussion that I had last weekend with some co-parents at the day care centre whose kids are about to graduate, recognizing that there is no provision for after-school programs, that they are now trying to rearrange their schedules and so on. We are not talking about people with big incomes. We are talking about secretaries working on this Hill who are making $14,000 a year, faced with the enormous question of "What do I do when my child has to go to kindergarten and is only there for three hours a day? Do I leave work?" All of a sudden the standard of living of the members of the family collapses.

That is the reality that we are talking about, not some document drafted by some bureaucrat in the Department of National Health and Welfare that is being read out by Members opposite. I am talking about something that is real, something you touch every day, something you understand by dealing with the people who are deeply involved in the issue.

I do not buy the argument that this is just the beginning and that all along the way we will tinker here or there. If you are going to do it, do it right. Get it right the first time. Do not put into place the kind of expectations that are out there in the public. They talk about $6 billion or $7 billion when in fact it is $2.3 billion, as we well know, for the actual additions of new spaces and for the support of families who need it going into child care services. How do you get that back? To go back in time and to rework it in a major way will occupy the next Government's time and energy.

I say to myself, when you have the Katie Cooke study and the House of Commons meeting for two years, how did you get it so bad, how did you get it so wrong? Why did you put together a Rube Goldberg machine? It is unquestionably the number one concern of the majority of families in Canada, and this Government missed the target by a mile.

I have heard the Member for Calgary South say: "Well, after a lot of pressure we have now increased the child tax credit". It is now $759 for those in the lowest income level. Do you know what the average cost is of a day care space, even those that are subsidized? It ranges from $450 to $900 a month. It may get your child one month's care. You have to compare that against the provision of the service and the space itself, geared to income. That is the real question. How much are you misallocating the resources by doing it that way as opposed to making sure that the space is there? It is not a 4 per cent increment a year. It is also to ensure that it is geared to income so that it can be properly monitored and managed. That is what the families are asking for, those with the lowest income; the single-parent families in my riding. That is what they want.

The middle class families also need the space. If there is a proper day care system with proper standards, set by a program that recognizes the importance of teaching and quality facilities, they are prepared to pay what it costs for their children if they can find the space. Yet, both those criteria have been missed in this program. They are not there.

No one here is arguing against the objective of a new child care program. The problem is that this is not the right program. It does not come in any way, shape or form close to meeting the real issue that is out there, street by street.

I have talked about the South Winnipeg family study, and the close to 10,000 people who responded to it. It was not just a statistical study. It was done house by house, with household interviews, being with groups in neighbourhoods. We had close to 300 or 400 volunteers, working over a year, giving up their time to undertake this kind of a program. I had the opportunity to join them in many of the discussions, to meet with the parents and with the organizations being called.

I only wish that Members of the House had gone through a similar kind of experience to realize that it is not an abstraction, it is not something that is for partisan dispute. It is something that is close to the real, basic concern. There can be nothing deeper and sweeter than the feeling of a parent for their child, and the yearning, the demand, the appetite for some support out there to meet that need.

• (1750)

The disappointment that comes with this program, Mr. Speaker, is crushing. It goes beyond just the sheer provision of child care. I suppose if I had my way—I am not the critic for my Party—I would revamp our entire family program structure. As you go through the other studies, you find that there is a desperate need for support for the latchkey kids and the roofless teenagers.

In my riding, the South Winnipeg Family Services said there were 1,200 teenage kids who are what they call foot loose kids who for all kinds of reasons have left home at 14 or 15 years of age and are living with friends or kicking around the streets. We have close to 800 or 900 homeless children in downtown Winnipeg. I do not want to be dramatic, Mr. Speaker, but there is a crisis out there when it comes to these family concerns, whether in housing, proper support, or counselling. The third highest priority is psychological and mental counselling. Many families want someone to talk to in order to deal with problems with their children or aging parents. People go through a terrific emotional upheaval trying to cope with these sorts of things. There have been breakdowns in church support. I regret that, but it has happened. In modern urban and rural society that support is no longer there.

We find the kind of family support which governments provide is sometimes wrongly targeted. I spoke to a family in my riding a couple of weeks back who had found that one of their children had a learning disability. This was an average family, but no place was prepared to help them deal with this child's learning disability. The parents will have to wait until the child gets to the public school system where there might be some help, but it could be too late. They told me the family allowance was not enough to cope with it, and they were unable to go on social welfare. There was no one to help them deal with their child who every day they could see was falling backward. The family will sacrifice, maybe sell the family car or even the family home to get that kid into a proper rehabilitation program. It seems to me we should have a better concept of the family and reorganize the way in which we deliver our income programs so that families as they meet crises can apply resources where they are most needed at the appropriate time. We have to get rid of the rigidities in the system.

The problem with this program before us is it will compound the problem. It will not help. It adds one more series of tortuous networks to go through rather than providing a greater facility and ability for families to meet their needs. I am not saying the state is the sole responsibility. Of course it is not. In our child care policy we said that it has to be a partnership between the parents, primarily supported by their governments, and the private sector. That is the basis of our policy, that sharing partnership principle, whereby we can employ the full resources.

People took leadership here several years ago to put a day care centre on the Hill, not just for Members of Parliament but for secretaries' and clerks' families and for the 5,000 people who work on the Hill. Those things should be done in work places around the country.

Ms. Dewar: There is a two-year waiting list.

Mr. Axworthy: Yes, there is a two-year waiting list. My wife and I got down on our knees and lit a candle when we got Stevie into that day care program because we were really up against it and we did not know what we were going to do.

From a personal point of view, I think I can say something in the House. I do not like to argue from a singular experience because as Members of Parliament we are supposed to represent the broad view. I think I can represent that because I have this study, but from the point of view of someone who is living the problem and able to share it with some other parents, I can tell Tory Members that they have this wrong. This program is not a good one. It will not work the way they want it to. They will waste a lot of resources, raise a lot of expectations and they will not get the kinds of answers they need. I suppose it will be up to another Government to go back to the drawing board.

Mrs. Sparrow: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I may have misled the House when I spoke about 20 minutes ago. I want to clarify what I said about the child tax credit.

The top-up for the child tax credit which is $100 in 1988 and another $100 in 1989 is for children six years and under. I mention that so as not to mislead the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Louis-Hébert (Mrs. Duplessis) for a question or comment.

Mrs. Duplessis: Mr. Speaker, I followed closely the speech made by the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy) and I would like to reiterate to him that the strategy we want to put in place is aimed first at honouring a commitment to significantly improve the child care situation, and it is a flexible, humane policy that respects the rights of parents as far as the care of their children is concerned, that respects the provinces' jurisdiction and that ensures the quality standards we want to put in place.

We carefully studied the child care policy put forward by the Liberal Party, as well as liberal propositions on child care services, and we find they include no objectives, no time table for increasing approved places. Also, they include less tax support than this Government's proposals or the existing system, and they venture into dangerous constitutional ground by proposing direct federal intervention through an appointed board and through involvement in the program's administration and the setting up of program administration standards, and they make the system's expansion conditional on the reduction of the deficit, something no Liberal Government has accomplished since 1969.

And when the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry stated earlier, and gave as example their national health system, that they could set up one system across the country, there is nothing in the Canada Health Act that says how many hospitals there should be per capita, in all provinces, and when earlier he also gave as an example post-secondary education, there is nothing in the Act that says how many professors there should be per university, nor what qualifications professors should have.

I feel the Hon. Member is venturing into highly dangerous ground, and I wonder, Mr. Speaker, what Premiers such as Mr. Bourassa, Mr. McKenna, Mr. Ghiz, Mr. Peterson could say if ever the Government came up with very specific standards it wanted to have.

Therefore, I think this would intrude upon provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, in answer to the Hon. Member, I accept the good intentions of the parliamentary task force chaired by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Public Works (Mrs. Martin) which developed a day care program, but I said it was not a good program, for the reasons I mentioned, particularly the lack of national standards to establish whether the program would be the same throughout the country. When it comes to the rights of children it is very important that they be given similar treatment under similar circumstances, region by region and province by province. That is the responsibility of the national Government, and as far as I am concerned this Government did forget all about its responsibility, more specifically as it relates to such an important program as child care services. This is my opportunity to point out that our national Government is responsible for this service, but unfortunately you forgot that responsibility. Besides, parents and children in Canada have no guarantee that comparable services will be available everywhere.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being 6 p.m., pursuant to order adopted on Monday, June 27, 1988, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 3(1).

The House adjourned at 6 p.m.
