to find out how much we will give them after we have accepted everything and gone in blind." It would be like buying a house with a mortgage on it for more value than the value of the house, for in one case we have assets of $402,000,000 and a liability of $600,000,000; and, even if we add the $30,000,000 of assets which they said they forgot, the amount is still much below what they are liable for.

I would not waste my breath about the stock, because the only people who investigated that declared that it had no value. I do not believe in having the arbitration; but I think everybody in this House would admit that it would be an excellent thing in the interests of this country if the matter went to the Exchequer Court. To give you an idea of what we are taking over, there is a company called the Prairie Land Company which originally had about 400,000,000 acres of land, on which bonds were issued for $21,000,000 which the Government will have to pay. Whether they got $21,000,000 or less on those bonds is a question; very few of them were sold at par. That company sold 3,200,000 acres and got the money; but where is the money? We do not know. To-day there are only 800,000 acres of land left. Those bondholders are very imprudent, because in their trust deed they should have provided that when the lands were sold they should have received something on account.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Do you not think they did?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: You said we would have to pay $21,000,000; but if they have been paid already it is a worse steal yet.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We will point that out later.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: How did they get rid of the mortgage, if it rested on the land and they sold the land?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: That is one of the mysteries of the Mackenzie and Mann transactions. That is one of the easy ones. However, the fact remains that $21,000,000 must be paid by this Government, and what will they get in return? $2,000,000 worth of stock in this company, and naturally the balance of the lands; but those are the lands that have been left out of the 4,000,000 acres which nobody would take. They may be in sloughs or in sandy places; they have been refused ever since they have been owned by Mackenzie and Mann or the Canadian Northern system—and it is not a large proportion to have one-fifth of the land unsuitable. But why should this country take 8,000,000 acres of land and pay $21,000,000 for it when we have now more land than we know what to do with, and when we read in the advertisements that only one-tenth of the Northwest is settled, and we are looking for settlers?

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I will tell you that when I come after you, something you do not understand yet.

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: In speaking of the $100,000,000 loan in New York, and the fact that $96,000,000 was received and $100,000,000 would have to be paid, the honourable gentleman said that he did not know where the Minister of Finance was going to be able to get it. It seemed to me that that remark might be liable to misapprehension.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I thank you for drawing my attention to that, because it might look as if I had lost confidence in the credit of this country. I have not got that far yet, although we are on a fair way of spoiling the credit of the country. I did not know, and that is my explanation of it. The people themselves, the present Government, have to pay out of the consolidated fund of Canada an amount equal to $25,000,000.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Not exceeding $25,000,000.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: A bank cheque for $25,000,000 to whom? That is the question. One of the fundamental principles of constitutional government is that when money is voted an amount is fixed and the person or institution that is to receive it is named. Is that going to be the way here, or how is it going to be? This $25,000,000 should be earmarked. The business men of this House should make it a point to know where and to whom that $25,000,000 is to be paid. That is what Parliament is for.

At six o'clock the Senate took recess.

The Senate resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN (continuing): Honourable gentlemen, once again I have to take issue with the leader of the Government in this House. He said that the present Government had inherited a third Transcontinental railway. Now, the leader of the Government will admit that the former Administration had nothing to do with that part of the Canadian Northern railway which is in British Columbia. He will admit that not one dollar of money and not one acre of land was granted, and that no encouragement was given for the building of that portion of the road. I have it on absolute authority, from no less a person that the ex-Prime Minister, that his Government had never given one cent of subsidy to the Canadian Northern railway in British Columbia. Therefore I may crave absolution.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: You were the parent of the child, and we had to clothe it.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The policy of the Government at that time was that the railway should not go outside of Alberta. With all respect, I contradict the leader of the Government when he says the present Government inherited a third transcontinental railway, because after the former Government had granted subsidies to the Grand Trunk Pacific from Edmonton to Prince Rupert, surely no sane Government would think of subsidising another railway within an acre or two parallel for a distance of 350 miles from Edmonton to the top of the Yellowhead Pass. The honourable the leader of the Government admitted this afternoon that my contention was correct—that when we did guarantee any bonds, it was on that piece of road from Port Arthur to Montreal. I believe that if the Canadian Northern had not undertaken that work in British Columbia they would be in a much better position to-day. From Edmonton westward for 360 miles the Grand Trunk Pacific has as fine a road as there is anywhere, and right next to it is the Canadian Northern which was built afterwards. When rails were wanted, what took place with those two parallel roads, in a country where no one lives? Beautiful railways, with easy curves, easy grades—beautiful roads, but no one to ride on them?

Hon. Mr. SHARPE: I thought the two roads were racing to see who could get through first.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I stand to be corrected, but my opinion is that there was a race for location plans so as to get into the Yellowhead Pass, and the Canadian Northern Company allowed the other road to go ahead because they had no subsidy, and they were never known to build a road without some subsidies. Every one knows that no money was ever put into that enterprise except by the Federal Government, the local governments, and the municipalities. I must say that the municipalities are the only bodies that the Canadian Northern has not been able to get much money out of. The sum they got from municipalities is ridiculously small. I suppose they did not want to bother with small fry; they went to where there was money in large quantities. The first year that the present Government was in power it granted subsidies to that road in British Columbia. The road runs from Edmonton to the Yellowhead Pass, and there it turns almost at right angles, following the north branch of the Thompson river, and makes a bee-line for the Canadian Pacific railway. It could not take a more direct line to Kamloops, and from there it parallels the Canadian Pacific railway to New Westminster and Vancouver. It was one of the most expensive parts of the road to build. According to the honourable the leader of the Government, it cost $88,000 a mile, and there has been no return from that road.

If the Canadian Northern railway had remained in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, it would not have been in its present predicament, and I charge the present Administration with having encouraged that road to go from Alberta into British Columbia. What was done in British Columbia? In the very first session that the present Government was in power it granted not merely one subsidy of $3,000 a mile, but four subsidies, $12,000 a mile in spot cash, for the same line in that province, and in addition the company received a guarantee of $45,000 a mile from the Government of Sir Richard McBride, making the total receipts for that road in guarantees and subsidies $57,000 a mile. That is one thing for which the former Administration is not responsible, but for which the present Administration must take the blame.

Then we come to Vancouver Island. We have not heard about it at all. Perhaps honourable gentlemen are not aware that they are buying railways on Vancouver island, which have no physical connection whatever with the Canadian Northern system. What does the Government of this country want railways on Vancouver island for? Can any one give a good reason for that? I am informed that there is on the Alberni canal, on the west coast of Vancouver island, a railroad which is only partly built, built on a sort of shelf. Those who are familiar with the Saguenay river will understand me when I say it is as if the railway ran along Cape Eternity or Cape Trinity on the Saguenay and was not connected with anything. There is where the telegram from the Hon. Mr. Oliver, of British Columbia, comes in. He says to the Government: "In taking over this system, remember you must finish the undertakings of Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann on Vancouver Island, in the province of British Columbia; you must finish such works as the Alberni canal." It is, I am informed, the most expensive road that could possibly be built, hanging on the side of perpendicular rocks for mile after mile, and not starting anywhere or finishing anywhere or connecting with anything. What would that construction cost this country? We all know that Messrs Mackenzie and Mann, whatever people may say about them, were the greatest railroad builders that this country has ever seen. They could do more and get more work done for one dollar than others could for more money; certainly they could get more done for one dollar than the Government could get done for two dollars, or even three.

We are to inherit that part of the estate, and we must finish it. Hon Mr. Oliver telegraphed to the Prime Minister asking: "How are you going to finish it? Where are you going to get the money for the purpose?" What guarantee have we that this Government will be strong enough to resist the province of British Columbia. I think I see the candidates of the present Government at the next election going about on Vancouver island guaranteeing that certainly the work of construction will be proceeded with immediately, because the Government is committed to it.

Now, how much will it cost to bring that road to standard? The main line of the Canadian Northern may be in good condition, but how much will it cost to bring that section up to the standard? It will require an immense amount of money. It will be found that much more will be expected of the Government than would be expected of a private company. Extensions will be asked for and will have to be granted, or that part of the country will turn against the Government, for a private company would erect ordinary railway stations. They would put up the station and say, "That is the best we can do and you have to be satisfied with it." But with the Government the case would be different. I can quote in advance what the people will say. The Grand Trunk Pacific and the National Transcontinental built stations which were much too good. I admit it, but why should we commit a similar mistake? I do not know how honourable gentlemen on the other side can say, "Oh, the stations on this system will not be any better than those on the National Transcontinental." I am telling you now that on the National Transcontinental the stations were much too big for the traffic to be done, and were much too good. They were built with Government money. But in the case of the Canadian Northern the Government will be doing the same thing, if it does not do worse.

Then, as to the service, the people will ask for more trains; they will ask that a train shall stop here and a train shall stop there. We know what takes place on the Intercolonial railway. There will be a repetition of that from ocean to ocean. When it comes to the erection of stations what kind of station will satisfy the city of Montreal, the great metropolis of Canada, and the head of the railway system of 9,513 miles? When they see the beautiful station of the Grand Trunk and the palatial station of the Canadian Pacific railway, what kind of station do you think the city of Montreal will want? There is $14,999 available for the purpose, and what kind of station do you think could be built in the city of Montreal for that amount, to compare with the beautiful Canadian Pacific Railway station only 100 yards away? I hope honourable gentlemen will take this into consideration before voting on the subject, and they may perhaps then feel inclined to vote in favour of the motion by the honourable leader of the Opposition that we should have more information about this proposal, so that we may know what it means and how much money will be required.

With regard to equipment, the very best cars will be required. We know that on many branches of the Canadian Northern there are perhaps one or two engines and one train going up and down each day, or, as has been the case outside of Edmonton for years, a train going up one day and coming back the next day. Such arrangements accommodated the people to a certain extent, and the people had to put up with it because they could get no better accommodation from Mackenzie and Mann. But when the Government owns the railway the people will want the very best of service. What will be the cost of improving the service, and what revenue will the country get for it?

I really believe that in order to assume all the known liabilities and requirements and in order to bring the system up to the standard, the public debt will be increased much more than $600,000,000. That figure has been mentioned often in another place, and never has it been contradicted, by either the Minister of Railways or the Minister of Finance. I think this transaction is a calamity for Canada. It is a calamity from the financial point of view. It is a calamity also with respect to the service we shall get from it. We know very well what kind of service we are getting on the Intercolonial railway and what it is costing this country. Was the Intercolonial railway ever known to pay a cent of return on the cost of the road, or even a cent of return on all that is put into it from year to year? I am open to correction. I stand subject to correction by honourable gentlemen from the Maritime Provinces, but I have never heard that the Intercolonial under Government management ever paid anything on its cost. If it had any bonds it would have been bankrupt long ago. If it had any shareholders, they would have got nothing at all.

Then, all the construction to which the Canadian Northern has committed itself will have to be done by the Government. I do not care whether it is this Government or any other. There will be such pressure brought to bear upon them that they will have to give way; whereas the Canadian Northern under Mackenzie and Mann could resist the pressure and simply say: "We have not the money; Sir William Mackenzie is away in England; if he can raise the money there we will build the line; we expect him back in a short time." That used to be the excuse for years. Mr. Mackenzie was absent and it would be necessary to wait until he came back; or Mr. Mann was ill, having undergone an operation, and the matter would have to be deferred for another season. There was always some good reason given. But the Government cannot become ill, the Government cannot go to England, and the Government will have to do the work.

There is only one remedy for the situation, and that is the remedy which I indicated this afternoon—to refer this matter to the Exchequer Court. All these questions would then be disposed of and there would be no more talk, but only the ruling of the court. There are securities which must be looked after during this coming year; and, after speaking of money at eight per cent, let me point out some of the securities for which this country will have to provide. I will give you the dates. The information is found in the company's own book. There is, first and foremost, the "Memorandum re Short Term Loans, Loans and Current Liabilities, June 15, 1916." The total is $98,000,000. And that does come in immediately. Here are some of the items:

Canadian Northern railway 6% 1 and 2 year notes July 10, 1917, and July 10, 1918, $6,000,000.

Now we do not even know whether this has been paid or not.

Canadian Northern railway 4% D.S. (Dom. Guart.) two year notes 1st September, 1917, $11,500,000.

We do not know whether that has been paid or not. We do not know who is going to pay that whether the Canadian Northern or the taxpayers of this country; but it must be paid; someone must pay it, if the Government takes over the road, especially if it is taken over without having the matter referred to the Exchequer Court and having the company declared insolvent. If that were done we could pay when we liked.

Canadian Northern railway 5% one year notes, September 1st, 1917, $1,750,000.

Canadian Northern railway 5% one and two year notes due 10th January, 1918 and 10th January, 1919, $2,500,000.

The total is the neat little lump of $21,750,000, and the treasurer of this country must go to New York or somewhere else to find the money in order to pay it. Why not let it become insolvent before we put our money into it. What is the use of sending good money after bad and impairing the credit of this country? Lower down on page 8 you will find:

Temporary loans and advances covering interest reconstruction, betterments and equipment at 14th June, 1917....	$21,145,913
Less: Receivable from proceeds of securities, etc., applicable in reduction of the above certified to by Company's Official	1,260,898
		$19,885,015
Due to Construction Contractors at April 30, 1917..		1,277,323

If you add those three items together you get a grand total of $42,912,338, which is a very considerable amount, which we must find and pay this year. And I showed this afternoon that the Finance Minister had paid 8 per cent for the loan of $100,000,000 in New York.

While I am on this page, may I point out the carelessness with which this statement has been prepared? We have on page 8 of the report: "Pay-rolls, audited vouchers, etc." The vouchers have been audited by Webb, Read, Hegan, Callingham & Co., chartered accountants—

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN.

$12,994,152. Now, turning to page 1 of the book, what do we find? "Audited vouchers and other floating liabilities," etc. The amount given is $12,994,152.11. There is a difference of 11 cents, and yet the statements were prepared eleven and a half months apart. I say that the clerk who prepared this was very careless. He should have read this over, and for decency's sake, he should have made a difference of $1,000 anyway, because the amount after 12 months would not be the same. Still, there is the document put before you. What confidence can we have in figures like these? There must be some honourable gentlemen here who are well versed in finance and are accustomed to statements of companies, and I would like some honourable gentleman to find in this book any reference to the liabilities to the Government for advances. Where are those liabilities shown? There must be some liability, since the company have agreed to pay the interest on the advances, etc. I cannot find any trace of that liability. I hope some honourable gentleman will be able to find it, for the Government has lent them $15,000,000 at one time, and more money at another time.

What did the company realize? There is another very important point to which I would call attention. What did the company realize from the convertible debenture stock issue of $25,000,000? A great gusto was made last week. It was stated that we were going to become the owners of all those shares. It was said that we already had forty millions and we were going to own the other sixty millions, and would own the whole thing. The holders of this debenture stock may come at any time and say, "We want shares." I admit it is not very likely, however, but we can find no trace of what was realized for that $25,000,000 of convertible stock. Where did the money go? How was it employed? Was it at par, or discount? Who owns this stock? That is another mystery.

It appears that during the year the contractors were paid, roughly speaking, about $15,000,000. I would like to know who were those contractors. The amount due in June, 1916, was $16,666,957; but in June, 1917, it was reduced $1,227,323; consequently there was $15,000,000 or a little over paid to the contractors. But who those contractors were I really do not know, and nobody knows. It would be very interesting to have that information. Perhaps they were, forsooth, the Mackenzie and Mann Contracting Company, Limited. If, as is reasonable to suppose they were, they made a little profit out of it. They were not absolutely without profit.

The funded debt in June, 1916, was $285,416,264. In June, 1917, that debt had run up to $359,931,635 about $75,000,000 more. What was done with this $75,000,000 during that short 12 months? That is something which the Senate should be told, if the Senate is going to know anything about this matter.

The Canadian Northern mileage is, roughly speaking, 9,513 miles. The main line is about 3,200 miles, and the branch lines about 6,313 miles. The liabilities to be assumed by the Government for the road as it stands will not be less than $600,000,000, or $63,000 per mile. The main line, as I have already stated, is in good condition, but some of the prairie lines are in very poor condition. I can call upon any honourable gentleman living on the prairies to corroborate that statement. There are some ties laid on the prairie, and a little soil is thrown around them, and that is all. Those branch lines, if the Government takes over the road, will have to be brought up to the proper standard, and it is estimated by reliable authority that to do so will require at least $20,000 per mile, which will make the cost of that road per mile over $80,000. Taking $80,000 at 5 per cent, that means that the earnings must be $4,000 per mile over and above the working expenses, in order to pay the interest. How much business will it be necessary to do on those roads in order to make a profit of $4,000 per mile? We all know that there is about one dollar made out of every three dollars. Consequently the earnings would have to be about $12,000 per mile. That is greater than the Canadian Pacific railway is making to-day.

What were the net earnings last year? They were about $1,200 per mile. The year before they were less than $1,000 per mile. I would like to draw special attention to that fact. They were not $4,000 per mile last year, or the year before, but about $1,000. Under government management the expenses will probably be largely increased and the net earnings will probably be diminished. Therefore you will see that for every mile of that system there will be a deficit which must be met by the taxpayers of this country.

The principal items of liabilities as per the memorandum attached amounted to $392,432,105 on June 30, 1916, while they amounted to $487,501,170 on June 15, 1917, an increase of nearly $95,069,065 during the year. If the liabilities are increasing at that rate there is no reason to suppose that the government liabilities in connection with the system will not increase in the same ratio as they did when the road was in the hands of private individuals. You will see the enormous amount of money involved.

Then, of course, there is always that story of the current liabilities being about the same.

The following statement summarizes the situation:

Liabilities.

	June 30, 1916.	June 15, 1917.
Funded debt. C.N.R. Schedule A..	$162,192,440	$359,931,635

I want to show how the inside group of people who are connected with this business, not the taxpayers, will make money out of it. The taking over of this road by the Government considerably enhances the value of all those securities. A person might have a claim against the Canadian Northern, a doubtful claim that would involve a lot of litigation before he got the money; but the moment the Government assumes it, that claim becomes a Government security and worth par, plus interest, from the time the claim is due. There is where the fortunate insiders will make money, the people who knew this was coming. Honourable gentlemen must not think that this is a bolt out of the blue. This coup has been premeditated for years. What was wanted was a majority in both Houses of this Parliament. The insiders knew about it, and went and secured options on or paid money for some of those securities, which to-day have got behind them the credit of this great country, and hence are worth par with interest. Those insiders took questionable and doubtful paper at a great reduction, and those who were fortunate enough will make a great speculation at the expense of the taxpayers of this country. All the guarantees are to be assumed. There has always been a good price for the bonds guaranteed by the provinces, but those that are unguaranteed, amounting to $147,000,000, have been on the market at 60, 65 and 70 cents for anybody who wanted them for more. We are going to pay par for those, and there is going to be an arbitration afterwards to see whether we should not give a sort of honorarium, or fee, or recompense, to the people who succeeded in putting this road into insolvency. The $147,000,000 of unguaranteed securities is where the group of insiders will make their millions. Having bought them at 60 and 70 cents they stand to make fifty millions of dollars if they only get an advance of 30 per cent, and the Government has given them that. The group has been sitting up nights and thinking about this thing, organizing the whole business.

Money has been lying in the bank in Alberta for several years for the building of branch lines, in many instances in duplication of existing lines, as I am informed; but they do not dare to take that money out to apply it to any other part of the system, because a judgment of the Privy Council has decided that when bonds have been issued and authority given to build a line in a certain place the money cannot be diverted from one line to another. Even the Alberta Government themselves, who guaranteed some of those lines, could not take the money and transfer it from one line to the other, and that Government, with the whole power of a large majority in the legislature, were not able to pass legally legislation allowing that money to be diverted.

Now what is going to be done here? The Government has to build those lines. Where will they build them? They do not know; we do not know. How much would it cost to build them? That is not known, either. Is there enough money in the bank to build them? We do not know. If there is not, we will have to borrow it, and at a high rate of interest.

The honourable gentleman from Cape Breton (Hon. Mr. McLennan) seems to believe in public ownership; nationalization of railways seems to be his hobby. He has seen the service given by the Intercolonial railway, and I would ask him if he would want such a system to extend from the Atlantic to the Pacific. All the taxes that we can levy in this country would not meet the deficit if the road was run as the Intercolonial has been run by any government. Personally I am absolutely against Government ownership. I have had something to do with a railway near the Intercolonial, and we could get people to work on our road; but after a snow storm on the Intercolonial the men would not do any work, and when the foreman would come to a man and say, "Here, Jean Baptiste, you go faster than that," the man would reply, "I won't go faster, I am going fast enough." Then the foreman would say, "I will dismiss you," and the man would reply: "You don't dare to do it; I will go to Charlie Marcil, our member."

Hon. Mr. TANNER: That may be the state of affairs in Quebec, but it certainly does not exist in the Maritime Provinces. There the people work.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I am very glad to see that the people work down there, and if they do I do not see why they will not pay freight like other people, so that the railway might make some return. It runs through New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and has never paid a cent into the treasury.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: My honourable friend is entirely mistaken. If it were not for the exceedingly great expense that is incurred in the province of Quebec the railway would be a very profitable system.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: That is a satisfactory answer to the majority—to put it on Quebec. I will not answer that; you can get my friend, Senator Choquette, to answer that.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Switch on to the Canadian Northern now.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The Canadian Northern will add a very large amount to our debt, nearly three-quarters of a billion; and as the debt is now one and a quarter billion, we will have two billions of a debt as soon as this transaction goes through. That will mean $100,000,000 yearly for interest, and the whole income tax that will be raised in this country will not be sufficient to pay the deficit on this transaction. All this talk of an arbitration on the shares has been nothing but a red herring to take the mind of the people away from the known and unknown liabilities of the road, because everyone knows that there is no equity in that road at all. But the plan worked beautifully.

I take off my hat to the Minister of Finance; he is certainly one of the ablest men that ever sat in this Parliament. He was able to put it all over the Commons members, even the member for St. John, with all his astuteness, because the Minister of Finance could explain everything so nicely to him. He is a great acquisition to the Conservatives, and I really believe it was a loss to the Liberal party when he left our side, for if he had stayed with us we would have had one man able to put many things over.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: That is what you want to do.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: This thing has been well staged. The press from end to end of Canada has been chloroformed. The good Toronto Globe has no big headings, no talk of "Raid on the treasury." How does that come? It is because there is a group of gentlemen, able men, to whom the Conservative party is no more than the Liberal party, who are always on the side that is in power. They have made the Government. Formerly many of this group were Liberals, but the day came when they saw light; perhaps they were not satisfied with the earnings on our side; however, they changed, and became good Conservatives, at least for the time being. I would not give much for their conversion; I do not think they will have final perseverance; but if we ever return to power I expect to see them back and getting into the band wagon with us, and directing our party the same as they are directing this party. Mackenzie and Mann are not the heads of the group, but they are good partners in it. In 1904 we had a general election, and that group came down to Montreal; they had had it all their own way up in Toronto, for no Liberal could have a look-in to the fourteen counties around Toronto, and they thought they could do the same thing in Montreal. It was necessary to buy the big French paper, La Presse, which had a bigger circulation by 40,000 than any other. It was Mackenzie and Mann, Greenshields, and Lord Atholstan who bought La Presse. It was done in a very questionable way. However, they bought it, and there was a lot of champagne over it; people who signed might not have signed if they had not taken so much champagne. They did not keep La Presse very long. They fought during the election all they could, but they did not come into power. That same group tried to cut the political throat of Sir Wilfrid Laurier on that occasion, but they did not succeed. What did they do? Six weeks afterwards they were as tame as doves; they were eating right out of his hand; they had come right back, every one of them, and they wanted to be his very best friends; and as he is good-hearted he took them to his bosom once more. The question is now on that $147,000,000. Who is going to get that money? I do not believe that Mackenzie and Mann will get that money, that $50,000,000 of profit that will be made on those unguaranteed securities. I do not think the country will get it either; I do not think the Canadian Bank of Commerce will get it; but I think those who get that will be that group of financiers, the same old outfit that wants $25,000,000 right now for different purposes, who have interests scattered through this broad universe, in South America, in Spain, and other parts of the world.

Before I conclude I want to read something from the Toronto Globe, dated 1st of November, 1911, and it is prophetic; no one could have thought any one could read into the future like this. It is a letter written by another good Conservative—to-day I am reading only letters from Conservatives. The writer of this letter is R. A. Reid, D.C.L., a Toronto barrister, and a very well-known Conservative worker:

To the Editor of the Globe: In view of the universal dissatisfaction in Canada with the new Conservative Government regarding the appointment of Mr. W. T. White to the position of Minister of Finance in the Borden Cabinet, it may not be amiss to point out a few things that might be brought about by such a total disregard of the people's rights and interests in this country.

Now I will pass a long way and read only a few sentences:

It seems a most extraordinary thing that Premier Borden has not been able to select a Minister of Finance out of the whole number of his supporters elected by the voice of the people at the recent elections held in Canada. What is the reason for such a strange state of affairs? Surely there must have been at least one man elected as competent as Mr. White at any rate, to fill the position. If not, then it is a sad commentary on the intelligence of the people of this country. What is the position of affairs regarding this matter as things stand to-day? Here we have a man, Mr. White, who was not a candidate during the recent elections, who was not elected to Parliament, who is not now a member of the House of Commons and who is nevertheless for the present, at any rate, a Cabinet minister, sitting at the Council Board of Canada without any authority from the people of this country and passing upon measures of more or less importance from the date of his selection by a group of constitutionally irresponsible, unlettered, so-called financial magnates, representing not the people's interests or the interests of the masses, but the financial or moneyed interests who may hereafter be seeking special privileges or favours from the Government of the day.

Is not that prophetic? Has it not turned out exactly as was foretold?

We are not overstating the position when we say that the honours of governing Canada at this date are pretty evenly divided between the railway companies, the bloated capitalists and monopolists, the unscrupulous corporation politicians and the financial interests. These are the chief governing factors at Ottawa to-day.

That was written six years ago, but one would think that it was written this morning.

And the sooner the source of this form of government is destroyed and the growth torn out, root, branch and fungus, the better it will be for the Conservative Administration in this country.

"We, the people, rule," is a familiar pet expression. Yes, the people rule (sometimes) in the conventions, when they select their candidate, but when the candidates are elected some of them have a different ruler. We have a new Government in this country and it looks as though it would become tied and bound to the corporation influences and financial interests in a worse manner than ever before heard of in Canada. What do we find? Men who from an intellectual standpoint know nothing of the principles of constitutional law or government and less of politics, men who could not tell a fundamental principle of government from their funny-bone, rushing down to Ottawa and getting what has been called the ear of Mr. Borden when forming his Cabinet. We find men like J. W. Flavelle, Z. A. Lash, W. T. White, Willison of The News, Graham of The Montreal Star, and that intellectual giant, Arthur Hawkes, all out to dictate who shall govern this country.

Let us for a moment carry our memories back to the mass meeting in Massey Hall last summer, called to protest against the reciprocity measure, when it was noticed that the letters Canadian Northern railway were strongly in evidence everywhere. What did we find, and whom did we find mostly in evidence? Why, Arthur Hawkes, alleged to be the editor of a paper, said to be a newspaper, called The British Weekly, and formerly employed by Mackenzie & Mann, who on that occasion made what he called a speech. Z. A. Lash was also there. He was formerly legal adviser for Mackenzie & Mann, and is largely interested in their enterprises at the present time. W. T. White was also there explaining the great things to be expected if the financiers were to continue in charge of the affairs of this country.

There is a great deal more of this that I could read, but I shall just read one more short paragraph:

The interests considered there was not one among the whole number of Conservatives elected on September 21st, 1911, qualified to fill the positions to their liking.

That is referring to the position of Finance Minister. The interests, the group, could find no one in the Conservative party in this country to fill that position, and they gave it to a man who had been a Liberal all his life, and who at the Massey Hall meeting declared himself to be a Liberal. Of course, the Liberals are noted for their honesty, and if they wanted to keep the strong box intact, the Government said: "We cannot trust a Conservative from New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, or even Quebec," and they took in a Liberal. I am afraid that evil associations corrupt good manners. Now, I shall read the last paragraph:

The "interests" considered there was not one among the whole number of Conservatives elected on Sept. 21, 1911, qualified to fill the position to their liking, and so all those good old staunch Conservatives who had borne the burden and heat of the day for years on the Conservative side in the House of Commons and in the party, men who have spent their whole lives working for the country and the party, were passed over and a stranger and political adventurer was suddenly thrust to the front as a minister of the Crown over their heads. The smile that came over the faces of "Doctor" Flavelle, LL.D., White, Lash, Walker, Arthur Hawkes and the other plotters after they had accomplished their purpose can be better imagined than described.

Hon. H. W. RICHARDSON: Honourable gentlemen, the Canadian Northern is a legacy; it was not made by the present Government, but was left to them to handle in the best way that they could. It is not our child. The Canadian Northern was formed by Messrs Mackenzie and Mann, and was built, as you are aware, through the provinces of the Northwest, and as a grain-carrying and colonization road it had no equal. The road was well located. It goes through the most fertile part of the Northwest, and has been of great service to this country. Unfortunately, the road was never properly financed. Its promoters looked to the municipalities and to the different governments for aid to build it. The Government of the country and the provinces were anxious to have the vacant wild lands opened up, and there was no other means of opening them than by railroads. The Northwest to-day is far more productive than it would have been without the Canadian Northern railway; I think every honourable gentleman here will admit that. The burden that we have to take upon ourselves to-day is enormous; no one denies that. We have not sought for this burden, but we have guaranteed the bonds of that railway to the extent of $212,000,000.

Now, we have been told that this railroad should be put into the hands of a receiver. I question very much if that could be done. We have been told that the railroads of the United States have been in the hands of receivers, foreclosed, taken care of, and that they have generally come out of the hands of the receivers. This is an entirely different proposition. The bonds of the railroads in the United States were not guaranteed by Governments; they were guaranteed by the roads, and there was no other recourse than to put them into the hands of receivers. If that were done in this case, the bondholders would immediately go to the Government and look for the $212,000,000 which was guaranteed by the provinces of the Dominion and the Dominion Government. Liquidation and insolvency are twins, and the first thing the bondholders would do would be to demand indemnity from the Government. To finance an undertaking of that kind would be much more difficult than to finance the present road and to pay pressing debts.

I am not going to go into figures, but there are some features which I will touch upon that have not been brought out. The bonded debt has been spread over a great many years, giving this country from, say, 1937 to 1960 to meet these obligations. The money to build this road was borrowed at a wonderfully low rate of interest, I think under 4 per cent, perhaps 3¾ per cent. I know of no borrowing by any corporation or any Government that equals the borrowing of the Canadian Northern railway.

We are told that the Canadian Northern Railway has a mileage of 9,513 miles. We have been told that this road has cost less per mile than any of the competing roads. This cost has been compared with the cost of the Grand Trunk Pacific. In the East it cost about $30,000 a mile less, and in the West about $40,000 a mile less than that road. We have been told, and we know, that this road has the best grades of any road in this country. The Grand Trunk Pacific has beautiful grades, but the Grand Trunk Pacific is not in the same class with the Canadian Northern, because the Grand Trunk Pacific was built irrespective of earnings, whereas the Canadian Northern was built with an eye to earnings, and is in a far better location to earn than is the Grand Trunk Pacific. Now, if the grades of the Canadian Northern are so much better than those of the Canadian Pacific, and if the Canadian Northern territory is equal to or better than the Canadian Pacific territory, and if it has not cost more to build than the other roads, is it not reasonable to suppose that in the future this road will earn enough to take care of itself?

I venture to say that if it had not been for the war the difficulties of the Canadian Northern would not have existed. As we know, 1914 was a very difficult year for railroads, and it almost wiped out the earnings of the Canadian Northern railway. I have looked over the grain shipments of the Canadian Northern railway, and I may say that the world to-day owes that railway a debt which perhaps will never be paid. During the last three years there has been 155,000,000 bushels of wheat shipped over that road. That wheat would not have been raised if that road had not opened up the prairies. The road is new, it is extending day by day, and the land through which it passes is not all settled. There is lots of vacant land which is not producing, and when it is settled production will be increased, and it only takes 25 per cent increase of gross earnings to make this road pay its own way, even provided that it owes $570,000,000. That is not a very large amount when we remember that in 1884-5-6-7 there was little or no traffic on the Canadian Pacific and that its earnings in the West were comparatively small. In the eighties it was doubtful whether the Canadian Pacific railway would be able to pay for the grease on its axles; and looking at it to-day what do we see? We see the Canadian Pacific railway system stretching not only across this continent, but reaching to the Orient on one side and to Europe on the other.

I am not going to prophesy, but I think that the future will prove that the Canadian Northern railway will be profitable to the country in more ways than one—that it will take care ot its earnings and bond interest. I do not say that this will take place immediately, but I think that such is likely to be the case before ten years are over. The Canadian Northern railway will open up our country and increase our wealth. We have to colonize the country, and there is no way of doing it except by railroads. If you wait until the people go into the country before building a road, you are not going to settle the country. You must first open up the territory by building the road and then the people will come in because they will have facilities for moving their products. There is no other way to do it. I think that the Government has no other way out of this difficulty.

It has been proposed to lend the company enough money to tide it over its difficulties, but it seems to me that the people of the country will not advance any further funds to the Canadian Northern railway. I have never been in favour of government control; but there are times when a man is driven to accept things which he does not like, and I see no reason why the Government cannot operate this road as well as private individuals. Surely there are enough honest, intelligent men in this country to handle this road as well as the Canadian Pacific railway is handled. I would be ashamed to stand on my feet to-day and acknowledge that we had not the ability and honesty in this country to operate the Canadian Northern railway. We need not compare the Canadian Northern with the Intercolonial. The Intercolonial railway never had a chance to make the earnings that this road has. I am not going to back up Mackenzie and Mann. I am not going to say anything either in their favour or against them. They made a great venture, and they almost won. If times had not been hard, and if the war had not come on, I think they would have succeeded. I think they made a mistake in building the road on to British Columbia and in the East. If they had concentrated their energies on a grain road running into the prairies, a cheap road to construct, a cheap road to maintain, a road with large earnings, they would have made themselves perhaps multimillionaires. But they dreamed of a transcontinental road. They built that British Columbia section at an enormous cost, through the rocks of that country, and where the earnings were so small that they were of little aid in paying the cost of the eastern end of the road. The time will come when the products of British Columbia will be a part of the East, and when the products of the East will be a part of British Columbia, and then there will be room for both the Canadian Pacific railway and the Canadian Northern railway. I hope that in future, perhaps ten, fifteen or twenty years hence, there will be room for the Grand Trunk Pacific.

I do not intend to speak at length. I have spoken on a difficult subject. I am perhaps as well acquainted with the conditions of the Canadian Northern railway as any other man in this House. I have sat at the board repeatedly and taken part in the discussions repeatedly; I have seen the burden of debt, and realized the impossibility of this system surviving. I know that the different links of this road should not be separated, that this country must have a competitive road. The people of the country would not be willing that the Canadian Pacific Railway company should absorb this road, and then absorb the country. If you put the roads into one corporation, that corporation has such power behind it that it would be a menace to the country. There is no question at all about that. Therefore it was the duty of this country to keep the Canadian Northern in existence as a road, to protect the people in the West as well as the people in the East. Just now there is a war in progress and we are called upon to finance it. It seems that all the energy which we possess should be spent in the one direction of winning the war; but, unfortunately, this problem must be faced.

I have listened to the remarks of the honourable gentleman from De Lanaudiére (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) with a great deal of pleasure and interest, with the exception of his closing remarks. I think it would have been better if he had omitted the attack upon Sir Thomas White. I do not know a man in this city of Ottawa who is carrying such a burden as Sir Thomas White is carrying. He has had to find the money for this country, to finance the war. Do you think, honourable gentlemen, that he would take over this railroad from choice? No, honourable gentlemen; he took it over because it was necessary to do so. He loathed the undertaking. It was another burden to be placed on his shoulders when his shoulders could hardly bear the burdens they were already carrying. And I want to tell the honourable gentleman from De Lanaudiére that the attack he made was unfair, and I think the honourable gentleman, having listened to what I have said, will realize that it was unfair. Honourable gentlemen, I have done.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I would like to ask the honourable gentleman a question. I understand he is director of the Canadian Northern system on behalf of the Government. He did not deal with the question of what the directors thought of taking foreclosure proceedings under the Act of 1914, the Act under which the honourable gentleman was appointed.

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: I did not become a director until about a year ago. I have no financial interest whatever in the Canadian Northern. The matter of taking over the system was never discussed at any board meeting which I have attended. No Government business was discussed, nor did I hear at any board meeting of any proposal that the Canadian Northern should come to the Government for help. All negotiations with reference to the government assistance were conducted between Sir William Mackenzie and the Government, not between the Canadian Northern Board and the Government.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Would the honourable gentleman allow me to explain what I said with reference to Sir Thomas White? I simply read from the Toronto Globe. I do not think I should be accused of making a charge against him. I said that I was quoting from the Toronto Globe, published in his own city.

Hon. Mr. SHARPE: The honourable gentleman said it was prophetic.

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: The honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) quoted from the Globe, but left it to be inferred that his own opinion was the same.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: It was not a compliment, I admit.

Hon. F. L. BEIQUE: I agree with a good deal of what has been said by the last speaker (Hon. Mr. Richardson). I agree with him that the government ownership of railways is not the proper thing for this country. I disagree with him, however, when he seems to be reconciled to the idea of the Government assuming the ownership of a large railway. He stated that he hoped we would be able, as in another case, to manage a large railway properly. We have had an experience of 50 years in the management of a railway, and so far it has been shown, and I think conclusively, that it was an utter failure and that not only would government ownership be unprofitable, but it would not promote the development of the country. The Intercolonial has been in the hands of the Government and has remained what it was 40 years ago, except for the waste of money from the beginning to the end of the year.

In approaching this question I am very much concerned, as I am sure every honourable gentleman on this or the other side of the House is concerned, with its importance. I am concerned also with my inability to suggest a proper solution. I think that if we had been afforded the necessary information we might have been able to deal with the question in a much better way. I have been in this House for a good many years now, and have seen many questions, and very important questions, come to this branch of Parliament in a very unsatisfactory form. I have in mind particularly the Railway Act of 1903, which, after it had been dealt with by the House of Commons for months, came before us with the different interests at loggerheads. This House, after giving due consideration to the matter and getting the proper information, succeeded in settling the difficulty, and enacted a law which was considered satisfactory by all parties concerned. I might also refer to another very important question, one of more recent date, the Insurance Act. In 1910 it came to us from the House of Commons in a very unsatisfactory condition. For months deputation after deputation had been heard before the House of Commons committee and nothing had been settled. The parties were directly at variance. This House managed to settle all the difficulties inside of two or three weeks, and was complimented in the press throughout the country for having settled the question so satisfactorily to all concerned.

Now, it seems to me that, in approaching the present question, we might have had much more information than is now before us. I have only to refer to the statute of 1914 concerning the Canadian Northern railway system, and I find the following in section 9:

> The books, returns, reports and other records of the Canadian Northern and of each of the constituent and subsidiary companies shall at all times be accessible and open to inspection for and on behalf of the Governor in Council by any person or persons from time to time named in that behalf by the Governor in Council or by the minister.

Had the honourable leader of the Government consented to the request—I think, the fair request—which was made by the leader of the Opposition, that this Bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, it would have been easy to obtain much better information than we have to-day in discussing the question. The reason alleged for not referring it to the committee was that it was a public Bill and of great importance. The two Bills to which I have referred were important public Bills, but they were referred to the Standing Committee because it was only in that way we could obtain the information necessary to enable us to deal with the question satisfactorily, and I fail to see why the honourable members of this House were not afforded a like opportunity in the present case.

However, we have to do our best and deal with the question with such information as we possess. So far as I am concerned, I must say that I am reduced to the information to be found in the statute of 1914 and in the report of the commission which was appointed to investigate this question. The Canadian Northern railway system, as honourable members know, comprises not merely one railway, but a great number of railways. There are 21 constituent companies and 5 different subsidiary companies, or 26 in all. They are mentioned in the Act to which I referred a moment ago, and from what is known as the Canadian Northern railway system. Most of those companies have been incorporated by this Parliament. Some of them have been incorporated by the provincial legislatures; but by section 15—

> The works and undertakings of the following companies are hereby declared to be works for the general advantage of Canada, viz,—
> The Canadian Northern Manitoba Railway Company,
> The Irondale, Bancroft and Ottawa Railway Company,
> The Marmora Railway and Mining Company,
> The Halifax and South Western Railway Company,
> The Quebec and Lake St. John Railway Company.
> 2. The works and undertakings of the Canadian Northern Western Railway Company are hereby declared to be works for the general advantage of Canada.
> 3. The works and undertakings of the Canadian Northern Saskatchewan Railway Company are hereby declared to be works for the general advantage of Canada.
> 4. The works and undertakings of the Candian Northern Pacific Railway Company are hereby declared to be works for the general advantage of Canada.

I think there are a few which were not declared to be works for the general advantage of Canada, but I fail to see why they were not so declared. It would be easy to have that declaration made if it were found useful in dealing with the system. Such action is often taken, whenever occasion arises or necessity occurs. This system, as I have stated, is composed of 21 constituent companies. As to the conditions of these various companies taken by themselves, as to the value of the assets and the amount of the liabilities, although I have been trying to find some information I have been unable to obtain any, and I think there is not a member of this honourable House who can find any information as to the nature and value of the assets and the amount of the liabilities of any of those companies. Now, how can we deal with the matter without that information? If we had had the opportunity which was asked from the honourable the leader of the Government, we could easily have obtained the information. Honourable gentlemen will admit that it is information which is absolutely necessary. Suppose that a person were dealing with this matter as his own business—and I hope it will be admitted by every member of this House that we are in duty bound, as citizens and as members of this honourable House, to deal with this matter as if it were our own business—how could he decide whether it is advisable or not to take over those properties and practically assume the liabilities of those 21 different companies before ascertaining the value of the assets and the amount of the liabilities? How can we as citizens and as members of this honourable House take the responsibility of passing judgment on a question of this kind when we are entirely in the dark? Shall we not be responsible to the country? Shall we be discharging our duty in presuming to deal with a matter of such importance entirely in the dark?

Information is all the more necessary because the commission, composed, as it was, of the best men who could be found in Canada, England and the United States, have been obliged, after having had, as I understand, a staff of 50 men employed for months and months, to come to the conclusion that the figures submitted to them by the Canadian Northern officials, or Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann, were unreliable. I do not want to be offensive to those gentlemen, but you will find that fact in the report which is before you. For instance, on page 18 of the report they refer to the estimates made in 1914 for the years 1916-17-18. Taking these in round numbers, the estimated gross earnings were 54, 61 and 67 millions respectively for those years; the operating expenses were 38, 43 and 46 millions; the net earnings were 15, 17 and 20 millions respectively. Then the fixed charges and the surplus are shown. The gross earnings for 1916, estimated at 54 millions, were reduced in fact to 35 millions. The net earnings, instead of being 15 millions, were 9 millions, and so on. The estimates for 1917 were of a like nature; when revised they had to be reduced from 61 millions gross earnings to 42 millions; and the net earnings had to be reduced from 17 to 13 millions, and so on. The report is full of figures of this kind, showing that, although the books were supposed to have been kept properly, and open to the Government from 1914 to this date, when they came to examine and verify the figures they found them unreliable. We have now to take the figures as they are. The Commission found that the amount invested in the whole system was 370 millions, that the cost of reproduction was 397 millions; but, deducting depreciation of 47 millions, reduced it to 357 millions. That, with 45 millions as present value of equipment, formed a total amount of 402 millions. On the other hand, the Commission found that the liabilities amounted to some 500 millions. We have now ascertained that the proper figures were evidently not given to them, because the honourable gentleman who has just spoken has just mentioned 517 millions. This is more than appears in the report of the Commission, and the honourable member should know, because he is on the Board; but it has been stated repeatedly in the hearing of both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance in the other House that the liabilities amount to over 600 millions, the amount that appears to be acknowledged by all parties as being at least 650 millions, and this by taking only the liabilities that are known.

It is perfectly evident, from an examination of the statements which have been furnished, that the figures are not reliable. For instance, at the middle of page 6 of the Financial Statement published by order of Parliament, this item will be found; "Unguaranteed securities, 4 per cent perpetuity debenture stock, Great Northern Railway of Canada, bonds maturing October 1st, 1934, $3,505,750," as being the total issue. I happen to be interested in a bank which holds part of those securities, and I find that the bonds maturing October 1st, 1934, are part of an issue of $4,963,000 in respect of the railway constructed with the bonds issued on the 1st of October, 1904, and $20,000 per mile of a railway of 150 miles to be constructed. I do not believe 150 miles were constructed, but if they were it would amount to $7,960,000. At any rate, there appear to be outstanding, on the face of the bonds themselves, an issue for construction amounting to $4,963,000. It seems to me very unlikely that the Canadian Northern or Mackenzie and Mann have provided for those securities in anticipation. They are dated October 1, 1904, payable in 1934, and I am quite sure that none of those bonds have been taken up. I think it is the same thing with many of the twenty-six other companies with which we are called upon to deal. Is it reasonable for this honourable House to be asked to deal with a matter of this importance without having the proper information?

I would call attention to a very important point—that the Canadian Northern railway is assumed to control all the stock of some of those twenty-six companies; but there are several companies of which the whole stock is not controlled by that system, but which seem to be in the hands of third parties, to whom I think they have been pledged as security. I cannot lay my hand on that statement just now. In some companies, the Canadian Northern system controls 61, 59 and 51 per cent. So there appears to be a minority interest which will remain out when the Government has purchased the $100,000,000 of shares. That is very serious, because the Government will be advancing the money, and will be supporting these twenty-six companies for the benefit of those shareholders as far as they may be interested. They will be minority shareholders who may cross their arms and wait until the Government has made money for all of them. That cannot be the intention of the Government; it must be an oversight on the part of the Government; a condition of that kind should not exist. But we have the admitted fact, as regards the twenty-five millions of bonds which may be exchanged by virtue of the agreement which is recognized by the statute, that those twenty-five millions may remain out for all time to come. They amount to one-fifth of the total, and the Government will have no way of redeeming those twenty-five millions, and those shareholders will wait for profits which may be made for them; they may wait 25, 30 or 50 years, when those shares may be worth as much as the shares of other companies that are now prosperous. Surely that is a condition of affairs which should not be allowed to take place in any country. If the Government is to take hold of the railway let it take hold of it entirely, but not leave out one-fifth of the stock in the hands of different shareholders who will have nothing to do but wait for the benefit that will accrue.

As to the consideration which is due to Mackenzie and Mann or to the pledgees of the $60,000,000, or part of the $60,000,000 of stock which is not owned by the Government, it has been suggested that it would not be proper on the part of the Government to confiscate any interest which might appertain to any holder of the shares, or any interest which might belong in equity or otherwise to Mackenzie and Mann.

I could understand the point being raised and very properly raised, if this property which is being taken over had been subsidized in the ordinary way. But in approaching that question one must bear in mind that this was a private enterprise of Mackenzie and Mann, and that they owned all the stock from the beginning; that it was a close corporation from the beginning; and that they had the help of the federal, provincial and municipal governments to the extent of $298,253,000. We may say that in round figures $300,000,000 has been granted to a railway which has been found to have cost $370,000,000. They acknowledge that they have been helped to the extent of $300,000,000. In addition, they have been helped to the extent, I think, of some $35,000,000, and they have been helped by loans in cash to the extent of $25,858,000. As far as I can make out, a large part of that $35,000,000 is not included in the total of $298,000,000. If it is I cannot trace it. Surely it cannot be suggested that the country would be dealing unfairly with these gentlemen if the Government exercised the rights which were set forth in the Act of 1914. I refer to section 22, which says:

> Upon the happening of any event of default and at any time or times while the same shall continue it shall be lawful for the Governor in Council after such notice to the Canadian Northern as the Governor in Council may direct, to declare to be vacant the offices of the directors of the Canadian Northern and of any of the constituent or subsidiary companies which may be subject to the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada, and to appoint a board or boards of directors in lieu thereof respectively (any former director being eligible for appointment).

The Act then goes on with regard to the powers of the directors. Then section 24 says:

> If authorized by the Parliament of Canada, the Governor may on such terms and conditions (if any) as Parliament may prescribe at any time, while any event of default shall exist and the continuing, by order declare the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern and of all other persons whomsoever in the mortgaged premises to be foreclosed, and thereupon the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern (and of such other persons) in the mortgaged premises and every part thereof shall be and become absolutely barred and foreclosed, and the same shall thereupon be vested in His Majesty in right of the Dominion of Canada any statutory enactment or any rule of law or equity to the contrary notwithstanding.

It was suggested by the honourable leader of the Government in opening the debate that Mackenzie and Mann were entitled to some consideration because they had never charged anything for their services. It is true that it would appear from the evidence adduced before the Railway Commission that they did not charge anything as managers or otherwise. It is stated in the report of the commission that they were paid by means of stock. The answer to the question which I put to the honourable leader of the Government as to whether anything was to be paid for the stock is to be found at page 41 of the report. It says:

The property investment of the Canadian Northern Railway system is stated in the balance of June 30, 1916, at $494,112,489.34. This figure admittedly has been written up to include $100,000,000 of capital stock. And this stock, as we have already said, was issued without any cash consideration.

There is the evidence that there was nothing at all paid for the stock. Now, if we refer to the agreement which was made between the Government and Mackenzie and Mann in 1914, which is to be found at page 154 of the statutes of 1914, we find this:

That the contractors will not at any time make or seek to enforce any claim for contractors' profits commissions or otherwise against the Canadian Northern, or against any of the constituent or subsidiary companies, upon or in respect of any express or implied contract, understanding, agreement, or stipulation of any kind, heretofore or hereafter made, whereby or whereunder they, or any one or more of them, may now or hereafter be entitled to receive from the Canadian Northern or from any of the constituent or subsidiary companies any construction profits, in respect of work heretofore undertaken, or as consideration for transfers of properties, rights, or franchises already transferred, or to be transferred under sub-classes a and b of this clause, or for commission or remuneration for services in financing, or for any other services heretofore rendered, and all such claims are hereby by them and each of them absolutely renounced and released.

This is the agreement which was confirmed by the statute. We are therefore face to face with this position, that they have been helped by the country to the extent of $300,000,000 and more. For twenty years they have been given every possible opportunity of making a large fortune out of this enterprise, and before the war commenced in 1914 they were bankrupt. They had already obtained, first, some $900,000 in cash from the Government; second, $10,000,000 on certain securities—I do not know what they are worth—and then they came and obtained $45,000,000 from the Government. On the occasion of this further aid to be extent of $45,000,000, they made an agreement the effect of which I have mentioned.

Now, the Government will not be justified, in regard to the stipulations to which I have referred, in paying possibly $60,000,000 for the $60,000,000 of stock which is outstanding. I do not believe the country will ratify anything of that kind, and the country will hold us morally responsible if we permit a thing of that kind to be consummated. The honourable the leader of the Government has stated that there was an objection to the resolution to proceed under the Act of 1914, in that it would necessitate the appointment of several receivers, because these subsidiary companies were provincial companies. Only a moment ago I showed that most of these companies were declared to be works for the general advantage of Canada. I have shown, if there are any which were not, that it would be easy to have them so declared. They form part of a transcontinental system; they are avowedly works for the general advantage of Canada; and if there ever was an occasion for this Parliament to exercise this power, now is the time to do so. But there is more than that. If the honourable gentleman will refer to section 6 of the Railway Act which has been passed by the House of Commons, which is in great measure a reproduction of the Railway Act which is now on the statute-book, they will find this:

The provisions of this Act shall, without limiting the effect of the last preceding section, extend and apply to,—

(a) every railway company incorporated elsewhere than in Canada and owning, controlling, operating, or running trains or rolling stock upon or over any line or lines of railway in Canada either owned, controlled, leased or operated by such company or companies, whether in either case such ownership, control, or operation, is acquired by purchase, lease, agreement or by any other means whatsoever.

This would dispose of the roads or the subsidiary companies incorporated in the United States. As they are controlled by the Canadian Northern they come under this paragraph of section 6 of the Railway Bill. As far as the other roads are concerned, section 6 says:

(b) Every railway company operating or running trains from any point in the United States to any point in Canada.

Then section 6 says:

Every railway or portion thereof, whether constructed under the authority of the Parliament of Canada, or not, now or hereafter owned, controlled, leased or operated by a company wholly or partly within the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada, or by a company operating a railway wholly or partly within the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada, whether such ownership, control or first-mentioned operation is acquired or exercised by purchase, lease, agreement or other means whatsoever, and whether acquired or exercised under authority of the Parliament of Canada, or of the Legislature of any province, or otherwise howsoever; and every railway or portion thereof, now or hereafter so owned, controlled, leased or operated shall be deemed and is hereby declared to be a work for the general advantage of Canada.

Therefore we have the necessary declaration to place every one of those companies under the jurisdiction of this Parliament, and thereby give jurisdiction to the Exchequer Court. The honourable member for De Lanaudière (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) said that at my request this law had been put on the statute book in 1904. It goes back to 1899, but the Act was completed in 1903. In 1899 the necessity of placing the railways under the jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court was recognized, but that is all that the Government was willing to concede at that time. It was in 1903 that the Act was perfected.

Fortunately or unfortunately, for many years I have held shares in some of the railroads of the United States, and I have had experience with several receiverships. I was interested in the Northern Pacific; I am interested in the Missouri Pacific, which has just come out of a receivership; and I have had occasion to see the necessity of having machinery in our law to deal in a proper way with railway property. Formerly the only means was to have the property seized and sold by the sheriff, which was not at all the proper thing to do, and it was for that reason that the Act which is now chapter 140, sections 26 and following, of the Revised Statutes of 1906, was passed. The Act provides for the appointment of a receiver, and, as has been already stated, the receiver has all the power necessary, not only to manage the property, but to extend and complete it, and to buy rolling stock; he is vested absolutely with the same power as a board of directors of the railway would have, and with the further advantage of being able to give a first lien on all the property for any money which he deems it advisable to borrow. Of course, all his actions are under the control of the Exchequer Court. I have had experience with a number of receiverships. I have been concerned in a couple of railways which have gone through receivership, and I have had experience of the working of the machinery.

But if the Government deems that it is not advisable to put the railway in question under a receivership, I fail to understand the objection to letting the law take its course. If any arbitration is to take place, let it be done by the Exchequer Court. The Government appointed a commission composed of the three best men who could be found. I think those men have the entire confidence of the country. There is evidence in their findings of great judgment and honesty. I refer particularly to Mr. Acworth, who is from England and who might have been presumed to be disposed favourably towards the English capital which has been invested in the Grand Trunk system. We know it is practically all English capital which is invested in that important railway. But his report shows that he was entirely unbiased and dealt with the question irrespective of any consideration for the investors in that great enterprise, whether they were Canadian or English capitalists. These gentlemen have come unanimously to the conclusion that there is no equity at all in the Canadian Northern stock. They valued the property on the basis of the investment, on the basis of the cost, on the basis of what it would cost to duplicate it, and on the basis of how it could be sold, and they have come to the conclusion unanimously that there is no equity at all and that the liabilities far exceed the value of the property.

What is suggested by this Act? That an arbitrator be appointed by the Government to act with an arbitrator appointed by Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann or by the pledgees of the stock, and with a third arbitrator. They are to be instructed to make a valuation in a summary way—to proceed, it was suggested, by way of affidavit, or at any rate in a summary way for the purpose of revising the valuation made by these three men, who employed experts who were engaged for six months or more in investigating the subject. Suppose that the arbitrators differ. Suppose they come to the conclusion that the stock is worth $10,000,000, $15,000,000 $20,000,000 or $60,000,000, will the country regard it as a judicious valuation? Will not the country remain perfectly convinced, and will not every member of this House remain perfectly convinced, that it is a wrong valuation, that the true valuation was made by the three disinterested persons who have shown a great deal of ability and judgment in dealing with the matter? Therefore I submit that from every point of view it is injudicious to provide for an arbitration of the kind proposed.

But if there is to be an arbitration, we have in the Revised Statutes provision for a court which for years has been chosen as the arbitrator in all cases of the kind. It is so stated in the statutes. The judges of the Exchequer Court have superseded the official valuators whom we had several years ago. The judges of the Exchequer Court are called upon daily to value property which has been expropriated. Why put them aside and entrust the arbitration to persons who, though they may have the confidence of the country—

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Some of them.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE:—have had no such experience in matters of that kind? Is it because—I dislike to make such a suggestion, but I am afraid that it is because there is some apprehension that what took place in the case of the Quebec and Saguenay railway might be repeated. There we had the counsel appointed to represent the Government before the arbitration admitting two different items, amounting to over $1,250,000, which were rejected by the judge of the Exchequer Court. He showed not only that he was competent, but that he had the necessary force of character to protect the interests of the country; and that is, it seems to me, a reason in itself for entrusting the arbitration to him, if a second arbitration were necessary. But, so far as I am concerned, I fail to see that this arbitration can be satisfactory to the country. It will either confirm the valuation already made, or change it, and if it alters it, the country will have no faith in the valuation, whatever it may be.

I have called attention to the fact that under this Bill the Government is not taking the whole stock; that one-fifth of it will remain in the hands of private parties, possibly for all time to come. If the Government deems it advisable to give a further indemnity to Mackenzie and Mann, would it not be better to give it by way of stock? If it is deemed desirable to give an indemnity instead of having an arbitration, why not leave them $10,000,000 of the stock—

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: They would not take it.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: —of the company, as a further consideration—as a gift if you like? It would assure to the enterprise their good will. If I am not mistaken, either the Prime Minister or the Minster of Finance stated in the House of Commons that it was important to profit by their experience and to enlist their co-operation. Well, their co-operation will be much better enlisted if they remain interested in the stock than if they are paid a few millions in cash. They would put that amount into their pockets and would cease to be interested as far as the company is concerned.

An argument which has been advanced in favour of this legislation and against the appointment of a receiver is that the credit of the country would be affected if the Canadian Northern railway were allowed to go into the hands of a receiver. Honourable gentleman, I am afraid that the country will be affected much more if the course proposed in the bill is followed than it would otherwise. What is the position occupied by the country? The public debt is acknowledged to be $1,250,000,000 or more. When the accounts are settled between the Canadian Government and the Imperial Government, when all the expenses of the soldiers and other military expenses on the other side are taken into consideration, I am afraid there will be several millions added to that. Now, we are going to load upon this country an additional $650,000,000. The debt will be over $2,000,000,000. What does that represent for a population of seven and a half millions? It represents about $270 a head; or, as the average number in a family is five, it represents five times that amount, or about $1,400 for each head of a family. I am afraid, honourable gentlemen, that the future of this country may be very seriously jeopardized.

You must bear in mind that the passing of this Bill would not be the end of the matter; that it will be necessary to take care of the Grand Trunk Pacific, which is being dealt with only piecemeal; that next session, whatever Government we may have, a similar problem will have to be faced. If the Government deals with the Canadian Northern on the basis proposed, it is very likely that the other company will have to be dealt with on a similar basis and another $400,000,000 or $500,000,00 will be added to the public debt. If this transaction goes through, do you not think that when the country is obliged to pay 8 per cent interest, as it is at the present time, the credit of the country will be very seriously damaged—much more so than if we proceeded as is done in the United States?

I stated a moment ago that I have been through two or three receiverships in the United States. I have had to put my hand into my pocket in order to protect my securities, whether stock or bonds, because when a receiver was appointed his first duty was to entrust the organization to a man of experience and get him to devise a scheme to deal fairly with all classes of securities and to submit that scheme to the courts for approval, and then to call upon the holders to contribute the $50,000,000 or $100,000,000 required to put the company on a good footing, in a permanent solvent condition. That is what is done. That was done in the case of the Northern Pacific shares. I myself bought some of the stock at four and five cents on the dollar, and they are now selling above par. That was done with the Union Pacific, which is to-day worth over—

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: 128.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: A few day ago it was at 140. It is the way that value was given to that kind of security. Do you not think it would be better to call upon the different parties interested, who are the holders of those securities, to protect their securities? Let the Governments, provincial of Federal, bear their share of the guarantees that they have given; but why put the whole load on the Federal Government? Where is the fairness of giving an increased value to those unguaranteed securities for 127 millions by the passing of this Act? I know the bonds of the Great Northern to which I was referring—and I am speaking against my own interest and that of the bank of which I am president, and which holds over $100,000 of those bonds—were on the market at 40 cents on the dollar. If this Bill is passed those bonds will increase in value at least 25 per cent.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Par.

Hon. Mr, BEIQUE: No, not par, because they are 4 per cent bonds, but they will increase very materially, and I am speaking of only one particular class of security. The $127,000,000 occupy the same position. Apart from that, there is a floating debt of $98,000,000 which may be worth 100 cents on the dollar, that would not be worth perhaps more than 10 or 15 cents on the dollar if this Bill were not passed.

Is it fair to ask this, especially at a time when the taxpayer is called upon to put his hand in his pocket and pay at least 4 per cent over the $1,500 or $3,000 exemption, and pay as much as 25 per cent if he justifies the amount? Is it fair to call upon those people to pay for a thing of this kind? Are you not afraid that you will drive out of the country a large amount of energy and capital? Do you think that those who have accumulated any fortune, if they see they are exposed for the balance of their lives, as they are, to be treated in that way, will not be tempted to go elsewhere so that part of their fortune will not be applied to the footing of bills of this kind? Here you are dealing with some 26 different companies. We do not know their condition, the value of their shares, or the amount of their liabilities; but we do know that in many cases a large proportion of the railway has not been completed. The moment the Government assumes ownership of those railways the citizens interested in the different localities will be pressing the Government for their completion, and this will be the cause of a very large expenditure and increase in the public debt. I think that is a point which should not be lost sight of.

I hope every honourable gentleman in this House will feel it his duty not to treat this as a party matter. I have avoided every phase of the question as to whether the Borden Government or the Laurier Government is responsible for the conditions which we have to face. It is immaterial to me. The Governments, on one side or the other, have committed mistakes, and big mistakes. Our system of construction of railways has been very defective. We have been constructing many more railways than were required or will be required for a long time to come. We should have concentrated much more than was done; colonization should have been limited to the lands close to a railway, instead of being spread all over the Northwest. The position as it is has been created, and we must face it; but let us face it in such a way that the credit of the country is not ruined, and that the future of the country is not jeopardized.

Hon. Mr. PLANTA: I understand the honourable gentleman is a director of the Canadian Pacific railway?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Yes.

Hon. Mr. PLANTA: That fact will, I think, explain the honourable gentleman's objection to the proposed solution of the problem under discussion; but is it not a fact that the Canadian Pacific railway offered Mackenzie and Mann $20,000,000 for their interest in the Canadian Northern?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I am advised, and am quite sure that it is not the fact at all. I think the honourable gentleman is not justified in insinuating that I am influenced by the fact that I am a director of the Canadian Pacific railway. I am proud to be a director of that great corporation. Unfortunately I am not entitled to claim any credit, because I came on the board too recently. But I am not influenced by that. I am glad the question has been put, because it gives me occasion to say what I intended, that I agree with the honourable member from Kingston (Hon.

Mr. Richardson) when he says that this railway should not fall into the hands of the Canadian Pacific railway. I am of that opinion, not because I would be afraid of a monopoly, for as long as we have a Railway Board such as we have fortunately had from 1903 to this date, the public will be protected, as the Railway Board has the fixing of the rates. I do not think it would be advisable in the interests of the country that this road should go to the Canadian Pacific railway, but I should hope that it would fall into the hands of a company such as the Canadian Pacific, which has done a great deal for the development of this country, and is still doing a great work in that direction, so much that if that company disappeared to-morrow it would be as though part of Canada had disappeared. My idea is that if the Canadian Northern railway fell into the hands of people who would make such a success of it as has been made of the Canadian Pacific we would then have the benefit of one more company working for the interest and development of the country.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: Is it the honourable gentleman's opinion that this solution would be best arrived at by putting the Canadian Northern in the hands of liquidators?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: It would solve the difficulty to this extent, that it would be the duty of the receiver to ascertain what are the liabilities, and he could do that very thoroughly by calling upon all persons having claims to file them.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: What I want to know from my honourable friend is whether he thinks that would be the best remedy?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: No, I am not in a position, with the information at my disposal, to take the responsibility of naming such or such a remedy. In my opening remarks I said we should have been given facilities to obtain the proper information. I go further: if we are not satisfied with the suggestion made by the commission which was appointed by the Government, I think we should consult the best railway experts before arriving at a conclusion. I think it was the duty of the Government to either accept the suggestion of the commission or to find other qualified persons who would help them to formulate other plans.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: I understand the honourable gentleman has no opinion on that question?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Yes, I have my opinion, and I have expressed such opinion as I have. I have other opinions, but would not take upon myself to formulate them before having all the information which I should possess.

Hon. E. D. SMITH: I wish to preface the few remarks I will make with a few paragraphs from a paper read by a celebrated engineer, Mr. W. F. Tye, at a meeting of the Canadian Engineers, as he expresses, in more concise and clear language than I could command, exactly my own sentiments in regard to the situation. Mr. Tye is a very celebrated engineer, and his opinions ought to be of some weight. He was selected by the city of Hamilton during the past year to make a report on the railway situation in that city, and in conjunction with another engineer made that report, which has proven very satisfactory indeed to the city of Hamilton. That report had to deal with the railway situation in the district between the city of Toronto and the Niagara frontier, and had immediately to do with the complicated situation which arose there as between the Canadian Northern—about which we are discussing to-night—and the Hydro-Radial system that is being introduced into Ontario by Sir Adam Beck and the municipalities of Ontario. If this Canadian Northern railway is purchased by the Government, it will very greatly simplify the situation there. The Canadian Northern have chartered a line running from the city of Toronto to the city of St. Catharines, and they have 60 miles of railways, which are included in the list of railway in this Bill, radiating from the city of St. Catharines to the Niagara frontier. Those are excellent roads, and they are required to connect with the terminus of the Canadian Northern in the city of Toronto in order to make the system perfect. There is no question that at present the Canadian Northern is greatly handicapped by not having its terminals completed. Here is one instance in point. With a terminal from the Niagara frontier, they will be able to get their coal in on their own rails, whereas at the present time they have to bring it in on the rails of other lines. If the Dominion Government took over the Canadian Northern, it would surely enable us in that district between Toronto and the Niagara frontier to do with one road instead of two. There was no probability of the Canadian Northern and the Hydro-Radial getting together on any scheme, but it ought to be easy for the two Governments to get together on a scheme so that only one line would be built from Toronto to the Niagara frontier, instead of two. Reverting to the report of Mr. Tye, this is what he says:

Canada's Railway Problem and its Solution.

After a great deal of study of Canada's railway problem, the writer of this paper has arrived at the following conclusions:

1. The National Transcontinental, the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern railways are unable to earn their operating expenses and their fixed charges. Canada has built, and is operating, the first of these roads, and Canada and the various provinces have guaranteed the principal and interest of most of the bonds of the other two. As the roads are unable to earn their fixed charges they must, of necessity, be paid by the country.

2. The failure of these roads is due to the duplication of lines by all the railways, encouraged and bonused by the Government; to the excessive cost of the Grand Trunk Pacific and National Transcontinental railways; to the failure of the Grand Trunk Pacific to provide itself with an adequate system of feeders in the West; and to the construction, by the Canadian Northern, of the long and unproductive stretches of road across British Columbia and Northern Ontario without feeders, terminals, etc.

3. If the Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk Pacific and National Transcontinental be maintained in two separate systems, it will cost at least $400,000,000 to build the necessary branch line feeders and terminals, to provide them with adequate rolling stock, and put them in proper physical condition to compete with the Canadian Pacific.

4. It will be necessary that the Grand Trunk Pacific build five to six thousand miles of feeders in the West.

5. It will be necessary that the Canadian Northern build two or three thousand miles of feeders in the East, and terminals costing many millions in Montreal, Toronto, Ottawa, Quebec and Vancouver.

6. Canada has already sufficient railway mileage for years to come. The additional mileage necessary for these roads could only be had by duplicating existing lines. Such duplication of lines would only add to the burden to be borne by Canada in the way of subsidies, guarantees, etc., without doing the country any good.

7. Canada has sufficient railway mileage and traffic for two good transcontinental systems,—the Canadian Pacific and another—but has not enough for three.

8. A consolidation of the Grand Trunk, the Grand Trunk Pacific, Transcontinental and Canadian Northern railways would give a well-balanced system. The Grand Trunk has an excellent system in the East, with terminals in all large and important centres. The Canadian Northern has not. The Canadian Northern has a good system of feeders in the West. The Grand Trunk has not. Each is strong where the other is weak. Combining them must, of necessity, be the most economical and efficient way of handling the situation.

9. Such a combination would not require more than $100,000,000 to provide it with sufficient rolling stock and to put it in proper physical condition to compete with the Canadian Pacific.

10. The saving in capital cost would be at least $300,000,000, and, at present rates of interest, the saving in fixed charges at least $15,000,000 per annum.

11. The Transcontinental cost $100,000 per mile to build. The parallel Canadian Northern cost less than $50,000 per mile, and is, in every way, as efficient an instrument of transportation. The Quebec bridge, with approaches, will cost $40,000,000, and will not be necessary for many long years to come.

12. The Transcontinental, including the Quebec bridge, has cost Canada at least $100,000,000 more to build than it would have cost the Canadian Pacific to build as efficient a road.

That is the situation that exists to-day. How are we going to get out of the difficulty? This situation has been brought about, not by any action on the part of the present Government, but by the building of the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental railways twenty years ahead of their time. An enormous amount of money was spent in building those roads and was added to the debt of the country. Those roads have no feeders and will be a great burden until a system of feeders is established. Already the National Transcontinental railway has been thrown upon our hands against our will. Now that we have it we must make the best of it. It is evident that before many years pass we will be forced to take over the Grand Trunk Pacific railway. If we have those two systems on our hands, we shall have forever an enormous burden unless we can provide a system of feeders in the West. The Canadian Northern railway has a system of feeders which is equally as good as that of the Canadian Pacific railway. Therefore, if the Government is forced in the near future to take over the Grand Trunk Pacific in addition to the Transcontinental it seems to me that it would be the height of folly to allow the Canadian Northern railway to pass into the hands of a private corporation. It will be absolutely necessary for the Government of Canada to have the Canadian Northern system to be able to carry on the transportation affairs of these other two railways with any expectation of making a profit.

There are only two alternatives to taking over the Canadian Northern railway. We have been bonusing the Canadian Northern Railway Company, lending them money, and guaranteeing their bonds. One way out of the difficulty is to continue doing that, but that is something which I am sure would be repugnant to the people of this country from one end to the other. No gentleman in this House or in the other House has suggested that solution of the problem. The other alternative would be to allow the railway to pass into other hands. There is no question but that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company would be glad to buy it; possibly some of the wealthy corporations of the United States would be glad to buy it, assume all liabilities and pay something to the shareholders. I believe that if this railway were put under good management it would become a paying proposition in a very few years.

Honourable gentlemen seem to be very much exercised about the liabilities which we are undertaking to assume, namely, $400,000,000 or $500,000,000. They have exaggerated the amount and made it perhaps $600,000,000. I do not propose to go into figures, but whatever the amount is at which we have to take it, we have the road as an asset to balance the liability. It is not as though we were getting nothing for the money. We have an asset which in this case, I think, would be excellent value.

I have not heard any one propose any other solution of this problem except that of allowing the road to go into the hands of a receiver. If it were dealt with in that way it would be put up at auction and sold to the highest bidder. If that were done, there is no reason why the Canadian Pacific or some other railway system should not buy it, and then it would pass into the hands of another company. If the suggestion of the honourable gentleman from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Beique) were carried out and the road were operated by a receiver for a number of years, some one would have to put up the money. The honourable gentleman suggested that in the United States the bondholders put up the money in order to bring the road back to a state of efficiency. In this case the principal bondholders are the Dominion of Canada and the provinces. If they would have to put up money when it was in the hands of the receiver, they might as well put up the money and have the road themselves. So, after all, there is only one way out of the difficulty, and that is to take the road over and operate it.

I am not very much alarmed at the thought of the Government taking this road over. Surely we do not acknowledge that we have not got men, or that we cannot devise some system which will enable us to operate this road as well as any privately owned road is operated. We have examples of public utilities being carried on successfully. Perhaps the best illustration of that is the Hydro Electric system in the province of Ontario. This enormous system has been successfully operated, and has brought the price of electricity down to, perhaps, one-third of what it formerly was. That does not necessarily prove that it might not have been equally successful under private ownership, but it does prove that works of this kind can be carried on successfully. There is no reason why some system could not be devised by which this road could in the near future be operated efficiently and economically under a department of the Government. This has been done in England during the war, and it has been done in many other countries. It is being done in Canada. I think that the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railroad is as efficiently and economically conducted as any road in Canada. The only reason why a publicly-owned road is not so economically and efficiently conducted as a privately owned road is because politics are allowed to enter into it. Surely the brains of the Parliament of Canada can devise some scheme whereby this road, and any other road that may come into our hands, can be operated with efficiency and economy. I am satisfied that in a very few years the feeders of the Canadian Northern in the West will enable the other roads to make up their annual losses. The Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental are bound to be a continual source of loss unless they have feeders in the West, and to prevent that loss we have to have the Canadian Northern, by means of which I believe the loss can be converted into a profit in a few years.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Will the honourable gentleman permit me to ask him how it is that the Intercolonial has not been placed outside of politics?

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: It has been ever since 1911.

Hon. Mr. SMITH: We have had only one road. The management of the Intercolonial railway has not been taken out of politics, but it has been greatly improved during the last six years.

By the amendment before the House it is sought to have certain information collected by a committee of this House. That is the function of the Board of Arbitrators. If we attempt to gather that information together and call witnesses before the committee of the Senate, judging by our experience in the past, we shall be sitting here until Christmas. Whether or not that is the idea of the amendment I cannot say, but it seems to me that a more efficient way of ascertaining the value of the road is that proposed in the Bill.

Honourable gentlemen on the other side of the House have been very free in quoting the Drayton-Acworth report, and they seem to place reliance in it. Let us see what that report says in regard to the method of settling the value of the road.

We suggest that, if it is decided to permit the present shareholders to retain a portion of their holding, the Act of Parliament constituting the Board of Trustees, shall contain a provision for arbitration between the Trustees and the Canadian Northern railway and establishing an arbitration board to act forthwith. The Trustees should appoint one arbitrator and the Canadian Northern shareholders the other, and the two arbitrators should agree on the appointment of an Umpire; failing agreement, an Umpire should be appointed by the chief justice of the Exchequer Court; and the decision of the Board should be final.

That is exactly what the Government proposes. Then on page 52 this is what they have to say in regard to a receivership:

Under a receivership the holders of the junior securities have to submit to compound their claim, and the fixed charges are reduced to an amount that the net revenue from operation suffices to meet. Ought this drastic course to be adopted here? We think not. We think the security holders of the companies have to some extent a moral claim on the Government. Their schemes of extension have been matters of public knowledge for many years. So far from discouraging them, the Governments, both of the Dominion and of the provinces, have by subsidy and by guarantee, by loans and cash advances, encouraged them to go on.

But there is more than this. The bonds and debentures of the Grand Trunk Pacific and Canadian Northern have been placed in the main through London with non-Canadian holders. And these holders in subscribing have unquestionably been influenced by the fact that the companies were backed by the Canadian Government. Technically, of course, the Government has no responsibility beyond that of meeting its own guarantee. But if the two companies went into the hands of receivers, we cannot doubt that investors outside Canada would believe, however erroneously, that the Dominion Government had treated them badly and that the result would be serious injury to the credit of the Canadian Government, and indeed of all Canadian enterprises. And this result is one that, putting it on pecuniary grounds alone, the Canadian people should in their own interest spend a good deal of money to avoid. We therefore consider that Canada should assume the responsibility of seeing that the interest on these securities is met.

This being the case, it seems to me that there is only one course to pursue. We have appointed a board of arbitrators. The chairman, Sir William Meredith, is a man whose ability and integrity are unchallenged. There is provision for appeal to the Supreme Court in case the decision of the board is not unanimous, and can any one imagine that a unanimous decision could do any injustice to the people of the country? I for one cannot agree with those who have advocated confiscation under some circumstances. I do not think that such action is in the interests of Canada, and I do not think it would meet the views of one in a hundred persons in Canada to take over this road without paying fair and reasonable compensation for it. That is all that is sought by this Government, and it is the business of the board to find out what is an honest, equitable amount to be paid for this road. If the findings of this tribunal are not unanimous the Government has the right to appeal to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court is composed of six gentlemen, three of whom were members of the late Government, and all of whom are Liberals; so I do not think the Liberal party need fear, if there is an appeal to the Supreme Court, that they will do anything that would, in the opinion of honourable gentlemen, be unjust to the people of Canada. Having taken that view, I purpose voting for the Bill.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The honourable gentleman has said that he is satisfied to take the recommendations contained in the Drayton-Acworth report on certain phases of this question. Why would he not take their recommendation as given on page 84 and proceed under the Act of 1914?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He selects another page.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Dandurand, the debate was adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until three o'clock to-morrow afternoon.

THE SENATE.

Friday, September 7, 1917.

The Senate met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

NEW SENATOR INTRODUCED.

Hon. Aimé Bénard, of Bénard, Manitoba, was introduced by Hon. Sir James Lougheed and Hon. W. H. Sharpe, and took his seat.

VOLUNTEERS UNFIT FOR ACTIVE SERVICE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK rose:

To call the attention of the Government to the following announcement, which appeared in the Globe of the 31st August last:

"Slip in ahead of conscription—Recruits come better after Military Service Bill is signed by Governor General.

"Whether or not it was because the signing of the Military Service Bill became more generally known or not, yesterday was an exceptionally good one at the Toronto Mobilization Centre, as good days go now. No less than 120 men presented themselves for examination, although about half of the number came from the United States, as the result of the recruiting efforts of the British Mission. Fifty-one of the American recruits were found fit to be attested, and with the local men made 70 all told, to be taken on the strength of the various units still recruiting.

"These were allotted as follow: 1st Reserve 1st Central Ontario Regiment, 24; C.A.S.C., 5; C.A.M.C., 4; University of Toronto Training Company, 1; York and Simcoe Forestry draft, 13; Parry Sound Forestry draft, 2; P.P.C.L.I., 2; and Divisional Signallers, 1."

And to inquire if any steps are being taken to utilize the services of these men who are not considered fit to be attested?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Six applicants for enlistment at the Toronto Mobilization Centre on August 30 were rejected as physically unfit and placed in category E, which means that they were unfit for even clerical work in Canada.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Can my honourable friend say whether they were unfit for farm work?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If they were physically unfit for clerical work, they would not be sufficiently robust for agricultural work.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Could not they pick strawberries and things like that?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, but we do not get our strawberries in the Northwest until about December.

CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY.

FURTHER FINANCIAL STATEMENTS.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK inquired of the Government:

1. To what companies does the Canadian Northern railway owe $16,666,957 on construction account, and the amounts due each company?
2. To what construction company does the Canadian Northern railway owe the $1,277,323, and the amounts due each company?
3. To whom does the Canadian Northern railway owe the $11,161,443, as floating liabilities, and the amount to each?
4. How much money has the Bank of Commerce and other financial institutions already advanced to the Canadian Northern railway, and upon what securities?
5. For what amount has Mackenzie and Mann, Limited, pledged the fifty-two million dollars of the capital stock of the Canadian Northern railway to the Bank of Commerce, and what other securities does the bank hold for the loan?
6. To what affiliated companies have advances been made to the extent of $10,250,506, and the amount to each company?
7. What debts are owing by the Canadian Northern railway other than those referred to in the financial statement submitted to Parliament?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1, 2 and 3. These liabilities are made up of the ordinary accounts contracted in the construction and operation of the railway and numbered many hundreds of accounts and are due to individuals as well as to corporations. The important consideration is the total amount which is shown in the blue-book No. 237. These liabilities will be taken into consideration by the arbitrators in fixing the value of the stock.

4. Particulars are shown in the blue-book No. 237, pages 11 and 12.

5. The stock is held as general collateral, no specific advances being made upon it.

6. The affiliated companies are those included in the Act of 1914.

7. None.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK inquired of the Government:

1. The funded debt of the Canadian Northern Railway company is shown in balance sheet 30th June, 1916, to $162,192,440.38, and that of affiliated companies, $123,223,824.19. Whereas the statement of securities outstanding guaranteed and unguaranteed shows an amount of $359,931,-635.64. How is the difference made up and where does it appear in the financial statement printed by order of Parliament?
2. What is the bonded debt, floating debt, and other liabilities direct and indirect of each of the affiliated companies of the Canadian Northern Railway Company, whose capital stock is held or partly held by that company?
3. What is the amount of bonds, debentures or other securities pledged for loans to the Canadian Northern Railway company?
4. What is the amount of loans? What is the amount of securities? Were these loans made to Mackenzie and Mann, Limited, or to the Canadian Northern railway? When these loans are paid to whom will these securities so pledged revert—to the Canadian Northern railway, or to Mackenzie and Mann, or to other parties?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1. The funded debt as shown in the balance sheet of 30th June, 1916, $162,192,-440.38, and of affiliated companies, $123,223,-824.19, making a total of $285,416,264.57, represented the amount of securities outstanding in the hands of the public. This did not include the securities which were held as collateral, the amount of loans secured thereby being shown. The statement of securities outstanding $359,931,-635.64 as of 30th June, 1917, represents all securities both funded and those held as collateral to loans.

2. The balance sheet of the Canadian Northern Railway system as presented is a consolidated balance sheet as required by statute 1914 embracing all of the affiliated companies, so that this statement shows all the liabilities outstanding both of the parent company and the affiliated companies.

3. Particulars are shown on page 10 of the blue-book No. 237.

4. All loans to the Canadian Northern railway are shown in the blue-book No. 237. When the loans are repaid all securities held will revert to the Canadian Northern railway.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Nothing is said about the loans to Mackenzie and Mann, Limited. The inquiry is made in paragraph 4.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If my honourable friend thinks that he can get any further information of a more specific character, I shall be glad to do it.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT.

CORRECTION.

Before the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: At the outset I should like to congratulate our new acquisition to this House. I regret that his commission has not been read in French. I thought he was a French Canadian, but now I am not sure.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We will look into that.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Hear, hear. The point is well taken.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I want to call the attention of the House to an incident that took place yesterday, and which is not reported as it should be, or if it was reported as it should be we were under a misapprehension yesterday. On page 935 and 936 the report says:

> The Hon. the Speaker: I shall have to name the honourable gentleman the next time.
> L'honourable M. Choquette: Monsieur l'Orateur, considérant votre position et comment vous l'avez reçu, vous ne devriez pas faire tant de zèle pour le gourvernement.
> The Hon. the Speaker: Asseyez-vous. Sit down. The honourable gentleman has no right to be insulting.
> Hon. Sir James Lougheed: I ask the honourable the Speaker to maintain order, and if the honourable gentleman does not maintain order, I ask the Speaker to name him.

So the honourable the leader of the House was under the impression at that time that the Speaker had not named the honourable member for Grandville, and if we look at the report we find nothing at all previous to that time to show that he had been named. Then the report goes on to say:

> The Hon. the Speaker: I have named him.
> Hon. Sir James Lougheed: Then I propose to move a motion.
> Hon. Mr. Domville: What is the meaning of this?
> Some Hon. Senators: Order.

Then Sir James Lougheed said:

> Inasmuch as the honourable the Speaker has named the honourable gentleman from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette), if that honourable gentleman does not retract his discourtesy to this House, I will move that he be suspended from the service of the House for a certain number of days. I propose doing that at once.

Then a remark which I made is attributed to Hon. Mr. Belcourt. I said:

> Before the honourable gentleman from Grandville answers, I want to state that His Honour the Speaker did not name the honourable member. He told him "Asseyez-vous"—sit down. That is not the way in which the Speaker names a member.
> The Hon. the Speaker: I beg pardon; I named the honourable gentleman, and asked him to sit down.

So, after looking at the report, I am still convinced that the honourable the Speaker did not name the Hon. Mr. Choquette.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: What is the point of order?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: They do not know.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: The honourable the Speaker says that he did name the honourable gentleman.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I say that I am still convinced that he did not name him, and shouting, "Order, order" or anything else will not change that conviction.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Under our regulations it is the duty of every member to accept the statement of any member made in this House. The Speaker has stated that he did name the Hon. Mr. Choquette, and it is out of order for any member of this House to question that statement. I would like a ruling on that point.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I suppose that I can answer the honourable gentleman. I have that right. I did not say that the Speaker did not name Hon. Mr. Choquette. I said that I was still under the conviction that he did not. If he says he did, I suppose every one heard that he did. I am the only one to be mistaken. I cannot explain why the honourable the leader of the Government said:

I ask the honourable the Speaker to maintain order, and if the honourable gentleman does not maintain order, I ask the Speaker to maintain it.

He too was of the same opinion. There are perhaps half-a-dozen on the other side of the House, who are nearer to the voice of the Speaker than I am, that are of this opinion. At all events, if the Speaker did name the honourable gentleman, I have the right to claim that this is not a good report. That is the only conclusion that I can come to. If his Honour the Speaker claims that in the excitement that every one was under—

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I was not excited.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Well, those who were not excited might have heard; but I understand that the honourable member for Kennebec (Hon. Mr. Lavergne) got up, and that it was he who received, "Mr. Lavergne, asseyez-vous." And he sat down.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I rise to a point of order.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I ask if there is anything before the House.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: There is the point of order raised by the honourable member for St. John (Hon. Mr. Daniel).

The Hon. the SPEAKER: There is already a point of order before the House, raised by the honourable gentleman from St. John, and in my opinion it is well taken. I remember distinctly that I named the honourable member for Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette). I spoke in French, I said, "Monsieur Choquette, asseyez-vous," which means, "Mr. Choquette, sit down." If the honourable member for Stadacona still thinks that I did not do so, I cannot help it. I rule that the point of order taken by the honourable member from St. John (Hon. Mr. Daniel) is well taken.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: We have a right to discuss the point of order before you give a decision.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I waited until nobody rose.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I was just rising to answer my honourable friend from Halifax.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I rise now to a point of order, and ask if there is anything before the Chair.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: You are.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I will answer that.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I do not want you to answer.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Let me answer.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I will not.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I have a right to speak to the point of order. The honourable gentleman has raised a point of order, and I have a right to answer.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I have ruled on the point of order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: There is another point of order.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: What is it?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: The Speaker has been asked to rule that there is nothing before the Chair. It is against the rules of order to discuss the question when there is no motion before the Chair; but when the honourable gentleman from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Crosby) has had a few more years in this House and has learned more of parliamentary law, he will have learned that when the Orders of the Day are called, we have a right to ask for changes in Hansard, and I have a right—

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Only on a question of privilege.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—and the honourable gentleman is not in order when he interrupts me and does not stand up.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: Honourable gentlemen, with regard to the report of what occurred yesterday, I do not feel inclined to go back to that matter. It was settled amicably between the leader of the Government and myself. He sent for me and admitted that he had misunderstood what I had said, and also others, and as a gentleman I accepted his word, and was satisfied with that. I will merely say in addition to the remarks made by the honourable member from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry) that the Hansard report is absolutely correct.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: The honourable gentleman has no right to say that I have lied to the House.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I do not say that. I say the report is correct.

CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY ACQUISITION BILL.

DEBATE ON MOTION FOR SECOND READING AND PROPOSED AMENDMENT.

The Senate resumed from September 6 the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed that Bill 125, an Act providing for the acquisition by His Majesty of the Capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway company, be now read a second time, and the motion in amendment of Hon. Mr. Bostock.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: Honourable gentlemen, before the honourable gentleman commences his speech, with his permission, I would like to put a question to the leader of the Government in this House. In this Bill reference is made to an agreement which is to be entered into with regard to the arbitrators. I would like to ask the leader of the Government in this House whether it is the intention of the Government, when they enter into the agreement which is proposed, to fix a maximum amount to be paid by the Government in payment for the stock; and also, may I ask whether it is the intention to take steps in order to ascertain the liabilities which are not disclosed, if any, to the arbitrators. I think an answer to this question will assist very materially in considering the nature of the agreement into which they may enter, and may throw some light upon the provisions of this Bill.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Will the honourable gentleman repeat the first question?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: I asked as to whether it was the intention of the Government to fix a maximum amount to which the arbitrators would be restricted. That is a question which has been raised, not only in the discussion here, but also by many members of the other House in discussing the provisions of this Bill. I think that if the members of this House were in possession of that information it would enable them to come to a better conclusion as to the merits of the Bill.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am very glad that the honourable gentleman from Hastings (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell) has asked this question, and I therefore answer it. I may say that the Government, upon entering into the agreement provided for in the Bill, will fix a maximum amount to be paid for the stock, and will further provide, of course, that the fixing of the amount shall not be taken into consideration by the arbitrators as an element in fixing the value, if any, of the stock to be acquired. As to the second question, I may say that the Government will provide in the agreement that any obligations of the company not disclosed to the arbitrators will, upon being established as valid claims, within a period to be fixed after the award is accepted, be paid out of the money so awarded, if any.

Hon. RAOUL DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, as representatives of the people of Canada we are discussing a contract to be entered into with the Canadian Northern Railway company and its principal shareholders, Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann, with the view of solving the difficulties that apparently confront that company. We represent one of the parties to the contract to be entered into, and that party, the people of Canada, stand towards the other contracting party as the second mortgagees of the property of the company, which has been mortgaged for the guarantee of loans which the company has negotiated. As second mortgagees we have to protect the sum of $119,000,000. Ranking before the second mortgages stand first mortgages to the amount of $107,000,000. The total amount which we have to protect is the sum of $226,000,000. If that were the clear and absolute situation, not complicated by other conditions, the problem would be quite easy of solution. But behind those mortgage claims there are other claims to the amount of $350,000,000 and over. At this stage it would appear that the company is unable to meet its liabilities. I say it would appear, because we have no official statement from the company that it is in default. If it were established either by document emanating from the company, or by some official act of default, that the company is unable to meet its liabilities, then we would be face to face with the alternative of allowing the company to fall into the hands of a receiver or of accepting some such proposition as the one before us, or that which was agreed upon between the parties in 1914, when the Government made to the company a loan of $45,000,000.

This great responsibility which confronts us is one which we must not approach lightly. Can we afford at this time to assume a debt of from $550,000,000 to $600,000,000, and add it to the funded debt of Canada? It seems to me that we should be slow in involving the country in an increase of its liabilities to that extent. Last evening the hon. senator for De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique), following the senator for De Lanaudière (Hon. Mr. Casgrain), suggested that there was another scheme which should have been adopted and which would find favour with Parliament. It is that of putting this company into the hands of the Exchequer Court, which would act as a receiver and would see to its reorganization. Yesterday it was shown clearly that if this company was given in charge of a receiver, under the provisions contained in the Exchequer Court Act for the liquidation of railway companies, the whole concern would remain intact and would continue to be operated, and schemes of reorganization and rehabilitation could be proposed and worked out. I was at first somewhat doubtful about the wisdom of placing such a large system in the hands of a receiver appointed under and governed by the Exchequer Court Act but I now realize that when we are facing such a formidable problem as the administration of that company in its complexity, with the untold and unknown liabilities involving 26 companies, the Exchequer Court would surely see to the protection of the various interests that would be affected. The bondholders would retain their rights under the guarantee of the Government; the ordinary creditors of the company who have not the government guarantee, and who obtained the bonds, notes and other securities of the company at a large discount, would probably be very happy to receive the cash which they put into the concern; the rehabilitation of the company would take place; millions would be unloaded which otherwise, if the Government assumes the load, would be paid to people who would receive more than the cash which they invested in the company. We all realize that the total debt of the company is such as to hamper the successful carrying on of its operations. Of course, if the Government takes hold, it will be assuming a dead loss to the country; but, through a scheme of reorganization carried on under the supervision of the Exchequer Court, I am convinced that every one would get his due; and, if the Government were generously disposed, it might even advance money to meet liabilities that are unsecured; but even then it would save millions by allowing no profit to such creditors.

It was yesterday represented to us, with a considerable degree of authority, that millions of the company's stock do not represent cash that went into the treasury; and this is the main reason which leads me to suggest that a receivership would have been a still better way of proceeding. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance advanced reasons why, in their opinion, it would be dangerous to proceed in that way, and those reasons were repeated on the floor of this House—that the bonds guaranteed by the provinces and by the Federal Government were placed at a low rate and in considerable amount, and under a liquidation by a receiver, money would have to be found to pay those bonds, inasmuch as they would become payable by the fact of the failure of the company. It seems to me that this objection could easily be met by the Government declaring that those bonds should continue in existence. The bondholders would not suffer by such a proceeding, so long as the interest was paid and the guarantee was unimpaired.

I recognize that the Government and Parliament dismissed the idea of allowing the road to go into the hands of a receiver, the reason given in 1914, at the time of the company's application for help, and repeated on the floor of the House of Commons during the debate last week, being that the financial situation of the Dominion and of the provinces would be very likely affected in the outside world. But are not the present financial conditions abnormal? When we decided in 1914 that we should advance $45,000,000 to the Canadian Northern Company to complete its system, there was the conviction in the minds of the members of Parliament that the amount would probably be sufficient to place the company permanently on its feet; and those were pre-war times. To-day we realize that our expectations have not been fulfilled, and that we are carrying a formidable load through the exigencies of war. The money market of Great Britain is closed to us; we know what rate of interest we are paying in the American market; therefore would we not be justified in applying in this instance the method which has prevailed in the United States, of agreeing to rehabilitate that whole system by putting it in the hands of a receiver?

Should we, when the war is on, and when we do not know how long it will last, or what obligations we shall have to assume from month to month, decide to assume a further liability of about $600,000,000? Should we not, on the contrary, postpone our decision for a year, or as long as the war lasts, with the expectation that it will not last a year, or at all events will not go beyond that? Should we not, in preference to the scheme which is offered to us, advance a limited sum to the company? It seems to me that the delay would allow of more light being received by Parliament.

Only two alternatives are presented to us. We are told that the Canadian Pacific Railway company is the only corporation able to take hold of the Canadian Northern, if the Government does not do so; hence a monopoly of railways in Canada would be practically established; or, on the other hand, we are offered the establishment of government ownership. The honourable senator from Wentworth (Hon. Mr. Smith) said that there were possible—or, in his optimism, did he mean probable?—groups of railway men who could easily be interested in taking up the Canadian Northern system, the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Transcontinental, and perhaps the Grand Trunk, and making one system of all these. I do not know upon what he based his hope; but if, during war time, it would be impossible to think of interesting capital from abroad in such an enterprise, who says that it would not be easier to obtain such a solution of our difficulties after the war? That is, it seems to me, one of the reasons why we should defer taking the fatal step in proceeding to buy or to take possession of the Canadian Northern and practically to establish governement ownership throughout this country. This implies, of course, that I have not very much confidence in government ownership. It seems to me that the load we shall have to carry after the war, apart from the ownership of railways, will be so heavy that we should lose no opportunity to obtain the necessary co-operation of foreign capital in order to give a private company a second transcontinental railway system which I am sure they could operate with far more advantage to themselves, especially if we succeeded in reorganizing the Canadian Northern and liquidating it so as to reduce its formidable liabilities.

The Prime Minister stated that this Bill was but a preliminary enactment; that we should have before long, if not at the next session of Parliament, to take up the question of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway. He showed that the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, with the Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Railway system in the East, formed with the Canadian Northern, a perfect system which should be linked together. This is the conclusion of the Drayton-Acworth report itself. I am not disposed to disagree with the Prime Minister's views or the Drayton-Acworth report in that respect; and, if there were a way of uniting those two systems so that there would remain two strong corporations in Canada to work in competition, the Canadian Pacific railway and the other, it seems to me that it would be in the interest of Canada that that should be done by private enterprise rather than by government ownership or government direction. The Grand Trunk Railway company should be able to find in England, after the war, sufficient support to help amalgamate those companies.

I want to repeat that while the war lasts we are facing formidable problems. We are absolutely in the dark as to the morrow, and we should not take a leap in the dark when we may defer the fatal step. I have so far spoken of the general policy to which the country is committing itself if the Bill now before us for consideration is adopted. I should like to examine for a moment the method adopted by the Government for taking hold of the system. We are presented with a Bill which provides for obtaining possession of the system by the purchase of 600,000 shares that remain in the hands of the shareholders of the Canadian Northern railway, representing 60 per cent of the issue, by arbitration. The statement has been made that Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann own 51 or 52 per cent of that stock. Now, the position taken by the Government clearly leaves the inference that that stock has some value. The honourable gentleman from Hastings (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell) has just asked if the Government will not fix a maximum amount beyond which the arbitrators will not be able to go. The answer is in the affirmative; but we have not been told what the maximum amount would be. Can it be contended that that stock is worth anything? There is no question that in 1914 our debtors, the Canadian Northern Railway company, admitted that they could not proceed further—they needed $45,000,000. The legislation of that year gave them that amount, and the Government took from the company a blanket mortgage covering all that was known of the assets, but covering at the same time mortgages to the amount which I have mentioned. The owners of the stock agreed, in consideration of the $45,000,000 loaned to them, to give the Government 40 per cent of the shares with the right of absolute foreclosure if the company failed to meet its obligations. The Government now claims that it is acting, in a certain sense, under the Act of Parliament of 1914; but it interprets that Act, particularly section 24, as giving the debtors a right to claim compensation for their equity. It seems to me that section 24, which would become operative in case of failure, does not support such a contention. It reads as follows:

If authorized by the Parliament of Canada, the Governor in Council may on such terms and conditions (if any) as Parliament may prescribe, at any time while any event of default shall exist and be continuing, by order declare the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern and of all other persons whomsoever in the mortgaged premises to be foreclosed, and thereupon the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern (and of such other persons) in the mortgaged premises and every part thereof shall be and become absolutely barred and foreclosed, and the same shall thereupon be vested in His Majesty in right of the Dominion of Canada, any statutory enactment or any rule of law or equity to the contrary notwithstanding.

The Government emphasizes the first part of the clause as giving to the parties the right to take into account the value of the equity. The first part of the section says:

If authorized by the Parliament of Canada, the Governor in Council may on such terms and conditions (if any) as Parliament may prescribe.

If the section is followed and read in its entirety, I am convinced that no such interpretation can be placed upon it, and that the words "such terms and conditions" do not imply the giving of a further consideration by the Government to the owners of the stock which was not transferred to the Government. If the words "terms and conditions" apply to a further bargaining with the parties, is it not apparent that something would be mentioned in the Act to that effect? The clause has for its object purely and simply a foreclosure, and that is what the Government itself understood when the Act was under discussion in the House of Commons. The honourable the Minister of Finance declared that this Act of 1914 had been drafted by the Hon. Mr. Meighen. Here is the interpretation which the Hon. Mr. Meighen gives to section 24. I quote his speech as appearing in Hansard of May 13, 1914, page 3693:

Then the right honourable gentleman has another distinctive feature in his railway policy. Under the present Bill we have a summary method of taking over the road, a summary method which in effect gives us as security the other sixty per cent of stock. We know we have the ordinary right which any mortgagee has, and the right which any guarantor of a mortgage has, the right by subrogation of getting into the shoes of the lender and in the event of default exercising the rights of a mortgagee and taking possession of the road as a receiver; we know we have that right, but we have the additional summary remedy of proceeding by mere Act of Parliament to take over the road as the property of the people of this country and eliminate once and for all, all other parties interested in that railway. And we have not only so arranged it that the interests of the Canadian Northern and all other persons whatsoever in the Canadian Northern system shall be eliminated, and that in the event of default all shall be the property of the Canadian people, but furthermore, the ten million dollars of stock in the townsite and the ten million dollars bonds are put into hotch potch, although they are the property of Mackenzie and Mann, and although Mackenzie and Mann alone made investment in them, and in the event of our foreclosing and taking over the enterprise we ourselves get the whole benefit of the townsite. That summary method is given us. It is true Parliament has to act. The Government did not think it wise to in any way tie the hands of Parliament in days to come. We provide though that Parliament in days to come, should there be default, shall have in its own hands the power to put in directors of the road, and we clothe the directors so appointed with full power to sell that road to any corporation established by the Parliament of this country for the purpose of taking over the road. Or, if we choose, we can ouselves, by Act of Parliament legislate that that road is the property of the people of this country and that the interests of all persons whatsoever outside of the people of Canada are eliminated. The idea of that is that we are at this time making the interested parties and all stockholders parties to this contract, and we say to them: We now and here bind you that should the day of default come you shall not appeal to the Parliament of Canada on the ground of your road being confiscated in any way whatever, but you here and now leave the Parliament of this country free from any such question and untrammelled in every way to deal with the property of the Canadian Northern as it may be advised in the interests of the people of this country. That is the summary procedure outlined here for taking over the road.

That is the explanation of the working of the Act of 1914, as given by the gentleman who drafted the Act, the Hon. Mr. Meighen. This explanation is clear, and it is borne out by the context of the Act, and borne out by the contract entered into between the Government and Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann.

I put a question to the honourable leader of the Government as to whether money had been paid into the treasury when those shares were issued. He answered quite candidly and correctly that they were given to Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann in consideration of the work they were doing in superintending the development of the system, and that that was their sole profit as contractors of the road under the name of Mackenzie and Mann, Limited. The contracts which appear in one of the schedules to the Act of 1914, are signed by Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann, and state explicitly that if any default occurs, they shall put up no claim as contractors or otherwise for services rendered, commissions, etc.

But in order that the Act of 1914 may become operative there must needs be default. Has there been default? Although the honourable leader of the Government in this Chamber (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) has said so, and has stated that the insolvency of the company is notorious, honourable gentlemen will be surprised to hear that the Prime Minister of Canada in the other Chamber emphasized the fact that there was no default. I can quite understand why. Here are his words, at page 4657, August 14. Referring to the statement made by the preceding speaker, Hon. Mr. Graham, the member from South Renfrew, he said:

> Then he came down to the legislation of 1914, upon which he based his chief argument. He endeavoured in the first place to distort the statements of the Minister of Finance into a declaration that default has actually occurred. The statements of the Minister of Finance bear no such construction, and if my honourable friend examines them carefully I am sure he will agree with that.

Having said that there is no default, and emphasising that fact, the Prime Minister is much more free to explain that he is entering into an agreement with people on an equal footing with him, to purchase their shares through arbitration. Denying default, he feels that he is entitled to express himself as follows:

> Would any hon. gentleman in this House say that the interests of this country would be advanced by any action in this Parliament that would take away from any man or any group of men in this or any other country, his property against his will without giving him a reasonable hearing for the purpose of determining its value? We cannot do that, and I shall come in a moment to the statute of 1914 and shall demonstrate very clearly, if not to my hon. friend, to any reasonable man in this House, that the proposal which we are placing before Parliament is based on precisely the same principle that Parliament would have been obliged to follow under the legislation of 1914.

At page 4659 he returns to that point and, in answer to Mr. Bennett of Calgary, he says:

> I will repeat, for the information of my honourable friend, if he did not understand me before: that any Government, of whatever political party would not, as I understand the matter, ask Parliament to confiscate any man's property without giving him the right to put forward and support his claim.

We have this situation: the representative of the Government here stating that the company is notoriously insolvent, and the statement of the Prime Minister that it is not in default. Now, is not this an extraordinary situation? The question has been put in the other House: "What statement have you to bring before us to substantiate your affirmation that the company will be in need of help?" The answer was: "Conversations between some members of the Government and some representatives of the company."

Is it not time that we should have a statement in writing from the company? Have we not had, outside of these negotiations, a statement from the company that it was in default? And should not the Government have exacted that statement, because if it had, as it had a right to—and the company could not refuse to give it, or it might have knocked at other doors for help—then we could apply to the company the Act of 1914, with all that it implies. We are now presented with a Bill which is based on the assumption that the company is unable to continue to finance its own enterprise and meet its liabilities; and yet the company has not said so officially, and is not officially in default. Although not officially in default, everybody in both branches of Parliament takes for granted that the company is at the end of its tether, and the Government claims to act according to the spirit of section 24, by lending itself to an arbitration in which arbitrators may be enabled to grant compensation to the shareholders of the company, the pledgees who are in the position which everybody knows.

The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance both stated that they did not proceed to foreclose the mortgage under section 24 of the Act of 1914, because under that section they would be taking the physical assets of the company and transferring them into the possession and ownership of the Government, and the railway would have to be operated by a department of the Government, while they preferred to maintain the company as an entity and have the railway operated by the present organization. The Government could easily have implemented the legislation of 1914 to maintain the company as a going concern. It had nearly completely done so by taking steps to substitute its own directors for the directors of the company.

The reason given by the Minister of Finance was that the company would be able to finance as it had done before, and that the Government would not be assuming all the liabilities of the company. Well, I cannot see that there is any force in that argument. The Minister of Finance repeated more than once on the floor of the House that under this legislation the Government would not be assuming all the liabilities of the company—that they were simply becoming the shareholders, and that as shareholders in a company their responsibility ended with the loss of their interest in the company. But why is the Government resorting to the purchase of the shares of this company and the taking over of its administration, if not to preserve it from the receivership? If this is the end in view, and undoubtedly it is, what advantage would there be in proceeding in that way if it is the intention of the Government to refuse to pay certain debts of the corporation? The company will remain as it is, a separate entity. It will have debts secured and unsecured. Those unsecured debts can be sued for and the company can be brought into liquidation if it does not honour its signature and meet its liabilities. So I do not see the force of the argument of the Minister of Finance when he says that it is not true that the Government is assuming the whole of the liabilities of the Canadian Northern company. It is not legally doing so by buying shares in that company. But, when it has all the shares of the company, and when it declares its intention of not allowing the company to go into liquidation, to go into the hands of a receiver, does it not imply that the country will have to foot the bill? Otherwise the company will go into the hands of a receiver.

The honourable the Prime Minister said: "Shall we in this Parliament recognize the principle that we can confiscate a man's property without any indemnity?" No one will disagree with the Prime Minister when he makes such a general affirmation. But is that the case to-day? If the company is not in default—and the Prime Minister has declared that it is not—then we have only to stay our hand and it will be. As a matter of fact it is. The Government, I understand, has allowed certain financial institutions to advance money to the company to enable it to meet the interest on its debts. The Government advanced money to it last year. The company is not in default because the Government has not allowed it to be in default. But should we not treat the situation as though the company were in default? And if the company is in default, or, as the honourable the leader of the Government has said, is insolvent, then are we confiscating the property of our debtor if we simply apply to it the clauses of the pact which the company signed, by which foreclosure happens from the moment of the default.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: Do honourable gentlemen contend that if the automatic foreclosure provided for by section 24 went into operation, and the Government took possession of the physical assets, and if the company asserted an equity of redemption, that nevertheless this Parliament should refuse to recognize that claim?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The company is debarred under that very agreement.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: If I borrow $1,000 from my honourable friend and give him an absolute deed of property, although it is an absolute deed there is nevertheless an equity of redemption.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I draw the attention of the honourable gentleman to the fact that the Government is face to face with a report of its own commissioners, which goes into the operations of the company and shows that not only is there no equity, but that there are vast sums for the Government to pay in order to maintain the railway in operation, to meet yearly deficits and to complete the whole system. We are face to face with a company that is not only in default, but is notoriously insolvent; and under these circumstances, when we heard the Government in 1914 explaining that this property would become the property of the country, if there were default, it seems to me there is no ground for speaking of confiscation.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: My honourable friend has not answered my question. I should like to know whether, under the circumstances stated, if the company asserted that an equity did exist would my honourable friend refuse to consider that claim?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If I have a document signed by that company stating that it will set up no such claim—

Hon. Mr. TANNER: You have not got that?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I think the contract signed by the parties will show that there is an abandonment of any such claim.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: You had better read it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I cannot read the whole of the covenants signed by the parties; but those covenants must be taken in relation to the Act itself, section 24 of which gives an absolute right to enter upon the property and foreclose absolutely. The contractors themselves, Mackenzie and Mann, Limited, say in the covenant, page

Hon. Mr. TANNER: My honourable friend knows that every mortgage ever written has that clause in it—that the equity shall become barred and foreclosed, but it is not barred and foreclosed until the court says so.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Parliament is the court to-day; and can act judicially.

I did not intend to close my remarks without speaking of the compensation that can be given to those gentlemen under certain circumstances. I affirm that the minister who drafted the Act of 1914 gave the interpretation which I have read to the House, in which he said that all safeguards surrounded the contract, and on the day of the default the Government could lay hands on the whole property of the Canadian Northern railway. Now, if Parliament decides to abandon wholly the question of receivership and to proceed on the lines laid down in this Act, why did not the Government follow the recommendations of the Royal Commissioners whom they themselves appointed? After stating that there was no equity, the Royal Commissioners have come to this conclusion:

> We conclude, therefore, that the shareholders of the—have no equity either on the ground of cash put in, or on the ground of physical reproduction cost, or on the ground of the saleable value of their property as a going concern. If, then, the people of Canada have already found, or assumed responsibility for, the bulk, the capital; if they must needs find what further capital is required; if they must make up for some years to come considerable deficits in net earnings, it seems logically to follow that the people of Canada should assume control of the property. We return later to the Canadian Northern company in order to set out our recommendations as to its ownership and management in the future, and as to the terms to be offered to the existing shareholders.

> Under these circumstances, have the Canadian Northern shareholders any claim to compensation? Not, we think, as of right. But governments in the past have not taken a stand on strictly legal grounds in their dealings with other companies.

And further on—and I call the honourable gentleman's attention to this statement:

> We think that, on the whole, the equity of the case would be met, if the Canadian Northern shareholders were permitted to retain a moderate portion of the $60,000,000 of shares which they now hold.

What proportion of the Canadian Northern stock may fairly remain to the present holders? The commissioners suggest that 5 per cent of the Canadian Northern shares should remain the property of the existing holders. When in 1914 we loaned those gentlemen of the Canadian Northern $45,000,000 we took 40 per cent of the stock. Suppose to-day we were obliged to advance to them a certain amount, I do not know how much, could not the Government do as it did in 1914? If the parties, being in default and needing money to pay their pressing liabilities, came and asked for $10,000,000 or $15,000,000 to bridge over their difficulties for another year, could not the Government proceed on the same lines as it did in 1914, and say: "Out of the 52 per cent of stock that you hold you will give us another $40,000,000 of stock," thus leaving to Mackenzie and Mann about the face value of $12,000,000 worth of stock? This would be following the precedent of 1914, and it would be what is generally done between man and man. In your daily life have you not often seen a debtor coming to his banker, or to one who had advanced to him funds, and to whom he had given a certain proportion of stock, for whatever value it might have in the future, and saying, "You are my second mortgage creditor; I am falling down; I cannot meet my liabilities; you will have to advance more money; I need so much more." What would the creditor answer? If he were in the mood, would he not say: "You will give me a further interest in the company; you gave me 40 per cent interest when I advanced to you a certain amount three years ago; you are asking me to continue to add good money to what may be bad money; should I not receive a further interest in your company?" What would the creditor say to the proposition that, besides helping to finance the company, he should pay to that debtor cash for the stock which that debtor held in the company, when the amount already advanced was in peril? The offer would be so preposterous that no one would think of making it. If there is anything in the future for the shareholders of the Canadian Northern, should they not assume the risk and take the advantage, if there be any? To give them cash in view of the situation as it has been disclosed to us would seem to be preposterous. We should leave them a certain interest in the company, and, as the honourable gentleman from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) said, force them to retain an interest in the company, since it is said that their experience may be of service and advantage to it. But surely we should not give them further money compensation when we are faced with the obligation of assuming hundreds of millions of responsibilities. The Government of Canada has assumed responsibilities amounting to $119,000,000, but ahead of those are $107,000,000 from the provinces. This is quite a load. The Government will have to assume further responsibilities; and yet it is proposed that we should go into an arbitration in which we shall be made to pay tens of millions to shareholders who paid nothing for their stock.

The honourable leader of the Government has said, "Yes, but we intend to limit the amount which the arbitrators may in their discretion be disposed to allow the shareholders." But why not arrange to give them stock? The day after the Government announced its policy in the House of Commons, Sir William Mackenzie declared to the press that the stock was worth par. Well, if Sir William Mackenzie has such confidence in the potential value of that stock, why should he not gladly accept a few millions of it? If it is worth nothing he will be no worse off than thousands of men in Canada who since the war have seen everything swept away, after having built up a considerable estate in large undertakings. I know a number of such men, who had by their own spirit of enterprise, their own energy and intelligence, built up quite a fortune. I know of one man in Montreal who had succeeded in building up a fortune of about a million dollars, but who, in his optimism, had gone into many enterprises which seemed to be good, and which would have been good but for the war, and had assumed such large obligations, that the war broke him. But he did not turn to the Government and ask, "Could yon not give me something for my equity?" He could not turn to anybody and ask anything for his equity; he was wiped out. Thousands of men from the Atlantic to the Pacific who had amassed wealth by their own spirit of enterprise, have been wiped out; they had not the provincial or the Federal treasury to draw upon, and have been left practically penniless. The case of the two gentlemen who have built up this system by the help of municipalities, provinces and governments, is very different. They deserve considerable credit for having developed that system in the West. They did wonderful things, and they did them during their lifetime in a big way. But no one can say that they have not benefited by what they did in building those railways. To-day they are interested in numberless enterprises—tramways, water-powers, all kinds of companies which bespeak prosperity; and I simply put their case in contrast with those of the thousands of men in Canada who have borne the whole risk of their ventures, and who have not had the advantage of drawing upon governments, but who have been wiped out. I say, let us do the fair thing; and this is my answer to my honourable friend from Pictou (Hon. Mr. Tanner): the fair thing would be done between man and man if we left them some stock instead of giving them cash.

I have stated that it would be better, in my opinion, to advance a certain amount to the company to help them over their difficulties for the present. We would be no worse off than we are to-day if we advanced the company $10,000,000 or $15,000,000, should they need that money to bridge over their difficulties, as the Bill itself authorizes the Government to advance money to the extent of $25,000,000 to meet the company's liabilities. But, besides this $25,000,000, we know that there is a floating indebtedness to the amount of $98,000,000. Is it not better to gain time while the war proceeds for another twelve or perhaps twenty-four months, by advancing to the company a certain amount, without shouldering here and now the whole load? If wo do that, and the Government takes a further block of the stock and takes control by majority rule, it will be in a position to appoint directors on the board of the company who will study at close quarters the inside working of this complicated system, and will enable us to obtain progressively all the information that we have been denied up to this day.

I close by saying that this is a most important step that we are called upon to take; it is a final and perhaps a fatal step; why not postpone that step for twelve months, when we shall be in a better position to know where we stand, and whether it is opportune for the Government to saddle itself with such an enormous responsibility?

Hon. ALEX. McCALL: I rise to make some observations on the Bill before the House, and, so far as I am able, to advance arguments in favour of its adoption. I agree with the honourable gentleman who has just concluded that this is a most important financial question—perhaps as great a problem as Canada has had to deal with for a long time.

It is observable that the gentlemen across the floor, who have spoken at length upon this question, have shown a very great anxiety to serve the public interest, and to offer the most careful and prudent proposition that could be made on a question of this importance. It is unfortunate that the spirit and wisdom they have displayed was not used for the country's advantage at the time the Grand Trunk Pacific scheme was offered to the country. The gentlemen who have spoken, and their friends in the country, offered to the people of Canada a transcontinental railroad scheme that was so imperfectly safeguarded that the contracting company could not be compelled to take over the 1,600 miles at its enormous cost when it was ready and offered to them. Perhaps in another year, when the Grand Trunk Pacific railway will be before the country for adjustment, we shall have a development of the same wise care over and the same intense interest in the welfare of the country; and I am wondering how honourable gentlemen will be able to argue upon that question, when it comes before us, upon the lines of their argument of the last two days. The Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental railway have involved and will involve the country in twice or three times the amount of liabilities that we have to undertake in disposing of the question now before the House.

I will not attempt to follow the arguments; I am unable to do so; but the discussion seemed to have narrowed itself down to this: will the country allow the Canadian Northern to go into bankruptcy, with whatever may follow, or will the whole question be referred to the Exchequer Court, or will it be dealt with as proposed under the present Bill? The average mind finds it hard to distinguished between a reference to the Exchequer Court and an arbitration. The latter would be clothed with all the powers exercised by the Exchequer Court, and either body would be sufficient to deal with it; but an arbitration would give to all the parties concerned and all the various interests the consideration that their claims deserved. The question referred to arbitration will be largely the acquiring of the $60,000,000 stock of the Canadian Northern. It seems to me that as long as that stock is on the market it is a danger to the interests of Canada. That stock might be acquired by a corporation holding large railway interests in this country. The majority of it might be acquired by an American company. Bear in mind that the Northern Pacific and the Great Northern, two enormous corporations, lie alongside our great West. I know of no power in this country which could prevent them from acquiring a majority of that stock and taking possession of the road, if they paid all the claims against the Canadian Northern, including that of the Government. I know of no legal objection to their entering Canadian territory and handling the traffic of the country, which they might perhaps run over their own lines. Bear in mind that those two lines join with the Canadian railway systems at a great many points. The possession of the Canadian Northern system by those companies would be a condition to which, I am sure, we would all object. But with the stock in the hands of the Government of Canada, the Government can deal with all the interests as they choose.

If one of us had made advances to a trading company or a manufacturing concern and they were confessedly in arrears and could not pay their liabilities, what would be done? The ordinary course is to obtain possession of the stock of that company, out their directors, put in directors favourable to the claimant, and deal with the various interests of the company through the stock controlled. In my judgment that is the wise course, and the one that the country should adopt.

However, that is not the whole question. Honourable gentlemen who have preceded me have pointed out that the country is today facing a great crisis, one which I am sure we would all have liked to avoid if possible, or defer until a period when the country would be free from the enormous burdens imposed upon it by reason of the war and when we could deal with our entire railway problem. Unfortunately, this particular problem cannot wait. It can be dealt with now and it must be dealt with, for the reason which I have given—the danger that if the outstanding stock were acquired by hostile interests there would be another railway problem before us for adjustment. If I may use the term, the finger of destiny points to the amalgamation of all the railroad interests in this country other than those of the Canadian Pacific railway and the Grand Trunk railway. There is no other course open. As honourable gentlemen have said, that course has been outlined by the Prime Minister as one of the early possibilities.

I think we can all understand, then, the importance of the Government of Canada acquiring upon the best possible terms the possession of the Canadian Northern. The Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental are already finished, and undoubtedly when the question of amalgamation comes before us we shall have all the difficulties now confronting us and shall hear much the same arguments as are being offered on one side of the House or the other. With the taking over of the Grand Trunk Pacific and its incorporation with the Intercolonial, there will be in this country a system of railroads comprising 16,000 miles and covering all parts of Canada other than the portions now occupied by the Grand Trunk railway and the Canadian Pacific, particularly in the West, where these railways have their largest mileage. Honourable gentlemen can readily see that by the combination of all these roads in one system a saving can be effected in the cost of operation. I shall later touch on the question as to how the system shall be managed. It will be seen that by merging all these systems into one, important terminals owned by one system and not by the other can be utilized. To illustrate: The Canadian Northern have a very important line from Sudbury to Toronto, which reaches all of the trade of western Ontario and supplies the products of the West to that large region. It takes the manufactures and production of that portion of Ontario to the West. There is a large volume of traffic. The volume of traffic that goes into the Northwest over that line is, I venture to say, larger than any other. The traffic from Ontario to the West exceeds that of Quebec and the Maritime Provinces.

The Montreal terminal owned by the Canadian Northern is in a similar position. The promoters of the Grand Trunk Pacific, for some reason, passed by Montreal. They have no connection with Toronto except by the route now open over the provincial road and the Grand Trunk. But that is of no value to Montreal. So far as the relation of the Grand Trunk Pacific or the Transcontinental to Montreal is concerned, Montreal has scarcely the position of a tank station. But with the development of the Montreal terminals for the use of both systems, a connection would be established between the province of Quebec and the whole Northwest. I will say further that the development of the Canadian Northern under the proposed government management will bring an immense volume of trade by at once completing the terminals to Montreal. Montreal is in the happy position that the three transcontinental lines make it their terminal at the seaboard.

Another advantage that appears is that less rolling stock would be required for the united system than for the three separate system, the Intercolonial, the Transcontinental and the Canadian Northern. The rolling stock, under one control, could be utilized where it is most needed. There would be no question of borrowing or lending cars. The rolling stock of the whole country would be available. Looking at the future of the country, we trust and believe that when the war is over we shall obtain a large immigration. We must have it. The ability of seven or eight million people to hold this country, which is large enough to provide homes for eighty million people, will be challenged. Immigration and development in the West and Northwest are absolutely necessary, and I can conceive of no better method, no better policy, than the union of all these roads for the development of that country, for bringing in the immigration which will be needed, and for carrying the much greater production of the West to the seaboard. The direct route leads to the Montreal terminals by the Transcontinental and the Canadian Northern, and to the present Quebec terminal by the Transcontinental.

There is in the West a source of revenue which perhaps may not be known to many honourable gentlemen. There is on the Pacific slope a forest growth which I claim, in presence of the honourable gentleman from Rideau (Hon. Mr. Edwards), is in extent and in quantity the largest block of valuable timber, for the same area of land, that stands upon the continent. I could not estimate its value in billions. There is a stretch of timber 600 or 700 miles in length by from 100 to 250 miles in width. That timber must come to the railways, largely, to be marketed. That portion which lies along the Pacific coast or a short distance inland may be taken out, converted on the coast and shipped by water. We are going largely to the Pacific coast for lumber and timber to-day. Shipbuilders on the St. Lawrence, at Quebec, Montreal, and, I think, at other points, are drawing their timber from the Pacific coast. It is only there that they can get the quantity and sizes required. The production of that timber is marvellous. The timber is two feet square and 120 feet or more in length; not only is it valuable for construction purposes, but the better grades, the clear-faced lumber, is a splendid finishing wood. It is used largely now, and will be used to a greater extent in the future, because it is cheap and when finished gives an excellent appearance and answers all the purposes for which interior finished lumber may be required. Bear in mind that the entire shingle consumption of Canada, except at small local mills, comes from British Columbia. British Columbia shingles are the standard article in the market. Now, that trade could be developed greatly but for the excessive rates that are charged by the railways for their transportation from the coast to the East. I am sure that the Canadian Northern and the Canadian Pacific railway are working under joint traffic agreements with the American roads farther south. The freight rate on the production of that country to-day is 68 to 72 cents per 100 pounds, from the point of production to Ontario and Quebec points. For some grades of lumber the cost would be $10 a thousand, and the freight upon it, to Ontario points, will be $20 or $22. I am assured that under the combined system of railways, which may be termed "the Canadian Government Railways," occupying their own territory, free from all traffic combinations, not under the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission or any other body except our own Railway Board, the rate would be much reduced and the trade would be developed to a much greater degree. I have had considerable experience in shipping from the Pacific slope to eastern points, and I am assured by railroad men that the freight rates, averaging 70 cents per 100 pounds, could be reduced to 50 cents if the products were moved in large volume—if they were moved in trainloads instead of single carloads. With the reduction of freight, that would be quite possible and the proposed system of Canadian Government railways would be within the borders of Canada and would facilitate a traffic which, to all appearances, would furnish a very valuable business for those roads for many years, besides giving to the homebuilder, whether upon the plains of the West or in Ontario, an article most valuable in the construction of houses and buildings and at very moderate prices. All of this would go to build up and help the development of the West. It is the duty of the Government of Canada to see that all its interests are preserved, and, in my opinion, it can be done in the way that I suggest.

Sometimes we have difficulties with regard to the movement of coal. Dealers have to transact their business with different companies. At junction points congestion occurs. Coal may be plentiful at one part of Canada and yet people may be freezing in another part of the country. I think it can be seen that with a system of railways serving the people of Canada, the difficulty of joint freight, the difficulty of congestion and of supplying a deficiency, could be largely overcome. To my mind, the matter is the most important question we have to deal with, and one that might be safely dealt with under the proposed resolution as a starting point. With the acquisition of the Canadian Northern, the question of settling with the creditors and all of the difficulties that have been raised here will adjust themselves through arbitration, and, as we hope, in mutual fair dealings between the Government and the present holders of the railroad. The railway problems of the country will be settled for all time to come.

The government-owned system would deal with extensions wherever they were needed. Millions of dollars would be required for extension into productive points, particularly when we get the immigration, which, as we expect, will fill up the country.

I attach a great deal of importance to that question of developing the timber supplies of the West. At present they are being worked only along the Pacific coast, with the exception that the Canadian Pacific railway have several lumber establishments in the interior; but the vast country to the north which is touched by both the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific is to-day scarcely worked at all. Development would result if the rate were made satisfactory. But until rates are reduced or prices are advanced very materially there will be no very great development there.

The difficulty that we all meet at this stage of the discussion is the condition of the Intercolonial. That question has been dealt with by both Houses of Parliament for many years. The failure of the Intercolonial to earn interest on its cost is always used as an argument against government ownership of public utilities. That difficulty is due largely to the road being under the control of the Minister of Railways and Canals. I can understand that politics would get into that system and would be utilized by the local politicians, and that the road would be expected to do much more than it ought to do, and to do it for a much lower rate than it ought to have. Unless Canada can be assured that a board of trustees could be constituted who would be strong enough to manage the entire system independent of political influence, the proposed step would be a very dangerous one to take. The eminent specialists to whom was referred the railway situation, in discussing this question of government control or ownership, suggested a board of trustees, the members to be appointed for different periods, from three to seven or ten years, and to retire as their respective terms expire. Possibly that might be a good policy; but I think I can suggest one that would be better. I say that modestly. I will outline it as briefly as I can.

We will assume that nine directors or trustees are necessary to protect the various interests of the country. Two should be appointed from the Maritime Provinces; two from Quebec; two from Ontario; two from the three western provinces, and one from the coast; or more might be appointed from the western provinces as their population increased. Those men should not be selected by the Government of the day. They could hardly be selected jointly by the leaders of the two parties. I am afraid that political leanings make the selection difficult. But it would be possible to appoint a selecting committee of men from the Bankers' Association, the boards of trade of the different cities, and perhaps the universities might be asked to name some men, so as to get highly specialized ability. A large committee of thirty or forty men would meet together and select the men to form this Government Railway Board. If only nine men were needed, then the leaders make a list of three times nine, say twenty-seven names—men well known in business—and those names would go before the committee which would make the selection. Those men should be selected for a long term of office. There might be a direction that they should be on the sunny side of life, men of under fifty or sixty. Of course, the ability of the men would be more important than their age. If a member of this board resigned or died, the remaining members would select his successor; because, if the vacancy were filled by the political party in power, we would at once introduce politics into the matter and impair the usefulness of the board. I am sure that if such a board of management, you may call them trustees, were obtained—a board that would impress the country with its honesty and fairness, as the present Railway Commission has done—it would be absolutely free from political influence, and would be able to conduct this enormous system in the same way that directors of a bank conduct the business of that bank. The men appointed to this board should give their whole time to its work, and they should be well paid for their services. They might be given a retiring allowance similar to that which the judges receive upon retiring from the Bench. I am not offering this as a perfect scheme; but I do not like to hear it said that we cannot manage this great enterprise ourselves. I believe the public is growing away from the idea that a public position is one in which men are only allowed to advance the interests of themselves and their friends. I believe the temper of this country is growing better every day, and that every one is getting a higher conception of public duty. I believe that this country can enter upon a scheme of railway ownership that will produce desirable results.

To go back for a moment, it is of the greatest importance that we should settle our railroad problems as quickly as we can, and to prepare for the development that we expect and that we must have after the war, when we enter upon the period of reconstruction.

This is my first attempt to address this House, with the exception of an occasional "Hear, hear," or "Carried," in which some honourable gentlemen excel me. I have offered these imperfect remarks in a proper spirit. I do not take very serious objection to the remarks of the honourable gentleman who preceded me. He admitted that this problem was one which attracted him, and that he thought that we were approaching the time when it must be entered upon. I believe that the people of the country are prepared for this proposition, and for the larger scheme of taking over new railroad systems which are beyond the territory already organized and have their own fields of operation. I believe that we can settle these problems for all time to come. I will not discuss the financial responsibility involved, except, perhaps, to say that it will not be beyond the resources of the country. With the two lines of railway under discussion, and the Intercolonial railway, which is paid for, we shall have assets of over $1,000,000,000. The Canadian Northern railway is apparently within a very short distance of being able to earn its own fixed charges. With the development of the Pacific coast traffic, with the completion of the terminals in Toronto and Montreal, with the growth of the Northwest, it is a fair guess that in a very few years this will be a paying concern. It cannot be regarded altogether as a liability. So long as it will pay its fixed charges it will take care of itself. But suppose that the earnings of this system fall short $8,000,000 or $10,000,000, a population of 8,000,000 could be taxed one dollar a year for the common good of the country, and the shortage would be made up. The greater portion of Canada would be served by this system, and any earnings beyond the fixed charges would go back to the people in the way of further extensions and better service.

I will not take up the time of the House to say anything further. I have given my views as they have occurred to me, and I hope they will commend themselves to the members of this House.

Hon. H. J. CLORAN: Honourable gentlemen, the study of this Bill and its provisions, and of its effects on the welfare of the country, has involved recollections of the past in regard to similar matters of railway legislation. The Bill at the present stage of Canada's development is no stranger than the presentation of a similar Bill thirty-two years ago by the Government of Sir John Macdonald, when a similar enterprise, known to-day as the Canadian Pacific railway, made application to the people of Canada for loan of $30,000,000. The Canadian Pacific Railway company had been abundantly supplied by the governments of the day, both Liberal and Conservative, with funds with which to build that railroad. From its very inception the Canadian Pacific railway, through its directors and its financial powers, had sufficient money to contribute to the election funds of the Conservative party in 1872. I think my right honourable friend the senator from Hastings (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell) will remember the incident. At that time it was considered an important project for Canada, with a population of about 3,000,000 or 4,000,000, to build a transcontinental railway. But there were men at that time who were sufficiently courageous to undertake the project. They undertook it. That is a long time ago, but I remember it well. These courageous projectors had doubts about receiving the support of the Liberals at that time. To make sure that they would have true friends in the Government they started subscribing money to the Conservative election funds of 1872. Unfortunately for themselves, they had not subscribed a sufficient amount, and one fine afternoon, as polling day was coming on, the Prime Minister of the day wired Sir John Abbott—he was not Sir John then; there were very few sirs then—he wired John Abbott, "Another $10,000 is required," and of course John Abbott, who afterwards became Prime Minister, although he had previously signed a requisition and demand for anexation to the United States, sent Sir John Macdonald the $10,000, with the result that Sir John Macdonald was able to carry the election. Of course, at that time Sir John Macdonald did not have to buy Alberta, Saskatchewan, British Columbia, and so on; all he had to buy was Ontario and Quebec, "those shreds and patches of Confederation," as Sir Richard Cartwright called them.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: What was the rate per head?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The House was in session only a few days when Lucius Seth Huntington rose to the floor of the House on a point of order. He said to the Prime Minister of the day: "You are holding a seat through corruption and by corrupt means." He was challenged to prove this. He risked his head. He made the charge on the floor of the House of Commons that the Government was taking money from the company to which the charter was granted to build this road. He was defied. He brought the charges forth. He produced the original documents and the original telegram of Sir. John Macdonald himself to the attorney of the company, asking for $10,000 more. What was the result? There was consternation in the camp in that famous session of 1873. How could it be possible? How did Lucius Seth Huntington get hold of the original telegram? How did he get hold of the correspondence? We all know. History, I suppose, has related it. He got hold of it through a clerk in the telegraph office. It was a question of thief finding out thief. Lucius Seth Huntington held the documents in his hands which finally destroyed the Government of Sir John Macdonald. It is wonderful how human phenomena will repeat themselves in the course of human events.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: What year was that?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The election which was stolen from the people of Canada was in 1872, and it was the first session after that—

Hon. Mr. TANNER: B.C. or A.D.?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: It was before you were born, I guess because you do not seem to know much. I was saying that it is strange how human phenomena will repeat themselves in the course of human events. The old saying is that history repeats itself. Well, history is repeating itself to-day.

May I venture another comparison? Lucius Seth Huntington drove the Tories from power in 1873. There was another man in this Parliament who drove the Tories from power in 1896, because he held incriminating and damning documents against the Conservative Government, its ministers and its officers. Can any gentleman on the other side tell me who he was? He was not one of ours. He was one of your leaders in the province of Quebec.

The most prominent, the most able, the most efficient, and the most acute leader of the Liberal party held documents incriminating the Conservative Government from 1881 to 1886; he called them his little papers, but he produced enough papers to send ministers in disgrace out of public life and to send members of Parliament and contractors of the Government to the penitentiary; with the result that the people rose in arms in 1896 and drove that Government from power, just as they had done twenty-three years before, in 1873. This is all in regard to railroad legislation. Do you know your own history? If you do, you ought to be ashamed of it.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: The honourable gentleman ought to tell us about the election of 1878 before he gets to 1896.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Poor Mackenzie did not have a cent to spend on the election.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Laurier must have had plenty in 1896, then.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: We never had; we did not have a contractor or a manufacturer behind us, and we only came to power on the honest, unpurchased vote of the people of Canada.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: That is the only time they were not purchased.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Where did we have money in 1896 after being in opposition eighteen years? Where did we have money in 1878, when Mackenzie stood like a watchdog over the treasury and would not let a cent be spent, as the Tory Government has been doing, allowing everything to be stolen from the treasury for their own use and benefit and elections?

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: He had to have a shotgun.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Well, you would not be able to fight.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Tell us what Mackenzie said about that.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I am telling you what he said—that he stood as a watchdog.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Watching the Liberals.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: And there are mighty few watchdogs in the Tory camp.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: We never go near the treasury.

Hon. Mr. PLANTA: We don't need a watchdog.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: You don't? That is how so many of your people are millionaires.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: All the millionaires are over on the other side.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: Will you tell us how much of a fund you got out of the Grand Trunk Pacific in 1904?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: We got so little that they were not able to finish what they had built, and they could not give anything. Does that satisfy you? That is railway legislation, which has always been a source of anxiety to Parliament, and the cause of a good deal of expenditure and loss of money to the people. I quoted to you two celebrated occasions; now I will give a third. By 1885 the Canadian Pacific railway had received some 600 miles of constructed road from the Mackenzie Government, had been granted 25,000,000 of the finest grain lands on the earth, some of them to-day from $10 to $1,000 an acre in town lots, and had received bonuses from municipalities, provinces, and so on; but that enterprise did not have the support of the Liberal party of that time, through its leader, Mr. Edward Blake, who said the country was undertaking a scheme to build a railroad into a sea of mountains. The company had to face all those conditions and obstacles common to such enterprises, and the result was that one fine day George Stephen, then president of the company, now Lord Mountstephen, came up to Ottawa, and I think my right honourable friend, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, Senator from Hastings, was a member of the Cabinet at the time and ought to remember it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: You give more titles than I have a right to.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Well, you cannot have too many as far as I am concerned, because I think there is no nobler citizen in Canada to-day than yourself.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I beg your pardon for saying so, but I had better tell the truth before you die than after, and that is my opinion of you.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: We will forgive you for everything now. Go on.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I know that charity covers a multitude of sins. George Stephen came to Ottawa; he was president of the Bank of Montreal at the time—and what I am going to recite was told me by Sir John Macdonald's best trusted friend, Sir Frank Smith in the Russell House three weeks before he died. Mr. Stephen interviewed Sir John Macdonald and said: "The Canadian Pacific railway is in difficulties, we need money"—just as is claimed in this Bill—"to pay interest on stock, to pay other disbursements and expenses." Sir John said to him : "Do you want to ruin the Government? We have given you abundantly out of the treasury already, and how can I face Parliament and ask them for a loan of $30,000,000?" George Stephen said: "Well, if we don't get that money we will have to go into insolvency; you will have to appoint a receiver." Sir John said: "I would rather that the company had a receiver and went into bankruptcy than that my party and myself should be hurled from power," and he there declined the loan of $30,000,000. What happened? That very evening George Stephen came down, disconsolate, broken-hearted, to Sir Frank Smith, who was a great friend of his. Sir Frank said: "George, don't be discouraged." Stephen said: "I am leaving here to-night by the next train, and I don't know if I will be alive to-morrow." Those were the solemn words uttered by George Stephen, and, as Sir Frank Smith told me: "The statement struck me as an awful one, and I thought, what did he mean by those words, that to-morrow there would be no more talk of George Stephen or of the $30,000,000 loan? After a second or two I said to him: 'George, now you go straight to your room; I will take this grip from you,'" and he forced him to his room. The very next morning Sir Frank Smith, who was minister without portfolio in Sir John Macdonald's Government, went to the Premier and said: "Sir John, I know the financial conditions of this country probably better than you do, and if you refuse this loan to the Canadian Pacific railway, the banks and the financial institutions of the country will go to ruin and be wrecked within twenty-four hours." Sir Frank's statement to Sir John had its effect. Sir John said: "Sir Frank, do you mean to tell me that the situation is so serious as that?" Sir Frank, who was greatly interested in financial concerns, said: "Yes, Sir John, this money has got to be loaned." Sir John yielded; George Stephen left, and the Canadian Pacific railway was built, and afterwards paid back every cent of that money.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Did the Canadian Northern ever pay anything back?

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Oh, they will pay it back.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Where will you be then?

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I hope in heaven.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: In limbo or somewhere else.

Hon. Mr. PLANTA: Will my honourable friend tell me who it was that said the Canadian Pacific railway would not pay for the axle grease after it was built? And yet they repaid the loan. Was it a Liberal or a Conservative who said that?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Certainly it was a Liberal.

Hon. Mr. PLANTA: Yet they repaid the loan.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Yes, but that was said ten years before the road was in operation, when Edward Blake said it was running through a sea of mountains, and he was perfectly correct, because it is nothing but a sea of mountains for 500 miles.

Hon. Mr. PLANTA: It is paying, is it not?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: No, not paying anything.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: What about the water stretches?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Well, some of the fish got out and they are here now. After Sir Frank Smith's interview with Sir John he went down to the Russell House and met his friend George Stephen, and said: "Stephen, everything is settled; you are going to have your loan of $30,000,000." George Stephen became a new man. He went back to Montreal as a saved financier, as a man who was not obliged to bankrupt the Bank of Montreal. These are things that happened in connection with railway legislation. That was 32 years ago. To-day we have history repeating itself. It is not Mr. Stephen; it is Sir William Mackenzie and Sir Donald Mann. On behalf of Canada, I wish to pay as warm a tribute as I can to those two men for their enterprise, their energy, their business acuteness, and for their ability to pull the wool over the eyes of the men who handle the treasury of Canada. If I were not such a good Christian, believing somewhat in honesty regarding the public, I would like to be one of the trio; I would like it to be Mackenzie, Mann and Cloran, and I would be a richer man than I am to-day. I have not a word of blame to utter here to-night against Mackenzie and Mann; I admire their energy too much. I am only sorry that I was not linked up with their enterprises, for then I would not have to work so hard to get a few dollars; I would come to the Government and choke them, and put my hand in the treasury and take the money out. That is what they are doing to-day. They are choking the Tory Government. I do not blame them. Five years ago, when they came before this honourable House and Parliament for one of their loans, I think it was $25,000,000, I had sized up those two honourable gentlemen, knights of the Empire, to be the two ablest financial fakers in America. To-day, after looking over their career and seeing what the Government has done for them, and what it is prepared to do, I have come to the conclusion that those two men are the greatest pirates of the high financial seas of the world, in taking from Government treasuries and other institutions all the money they required either for themselves or for their enterprises. I have no blame to them, but I blame the captain and officers of the ship of state, one of whom is here to-day, who allowed the ship of state to be scuttled.

At six o'clock the Senate took recess.

The Senate resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Honourable gentlemen, when the Senate adjourned at six o'clock it was for the purpose of allowing the honourable members of the House to go and take a hearty copious meal. I am afraid that during war conditions, under the dictatorship of the food controller, you did not have a hearty meal, as this is a meatless day. Therefore I beg, in continuation of this debate, to offer you a little dessert, coffee and cognac, on board the ship of state, which I said was about to be scuttled when this debate adjourned at six o'clock.

Before entering on the discussion of the measure proper, I have a slight correction to make, a clerical one, in regard to the statement which I made, that Sir John Macdonald had telegraphed to Sir John Abbott, attorney at the time, for another $10,000. The statement should have been that Sir John Macdonald telegraphed directly to the president of the company, Sir Hugh Allan. That telegram, of course, was submitted to the attorney of the company, who was then Hon. John Abbott. The telegram came into the possession of the public through the Liberal party at the time. I am not going to condone or discuss the means whereby those documents came into the possession of the public, but I must confess that, notwithstanding the origin of their procuration, it helped the country a great deal in regard to public morality and ministerial responsibility. There is no doubt that the documents were stolen from the safe or the desk of the attorney of the Canadian Pacific Railway authorities at that time, and thank God for the stealing. Felix culpa, as they say of Adam's fault—a happy fault. Theologians will tell you to-day that the fall of Adam was a happy fall, because it brought about a new generation, a new resurrection of the human race. So did the fault of the man who stole those documents bring about a happy resurrection for the people of Canada in 1873.

With these explanations on that point, which, I believe, is the only error—and it is only a clerical one—that I committed—I submit to honourable gentlemen opposite, or even to honourable gentlemen on this side of the House, that if I made any other statement which is not based absolutely on facts, I am prepared to explain, or withdraw, or rectify it. I am open to correction by the highest or the humblest member on the other side, or by any of my friends on this side. I cannot be fairer than that in the discussion of a public matter. I do not wish to advance a single argument on the floor of this House, any more than I ever did on a public platform in this country, that I think in my soul and conscience is wrong, and I will not consider it an affront or an insult if any honourable gentleman can interrupt me at any moment and say, "What you are saying, Sir, is not correct." That is a privilege which I give in every public meeting which I address, and to every elector in this country, and it is not your privilege but your right to interrupt a speaker who is stating what is not according to fact. That is one of the reasons why I am so little in dread of interruptions. I like them, especially when they are well founded. If they are not well founded, well, the other fellow gets it.

At six o'clock this Bill had arrived on board the ship of state which was about to be scuttled by high financiers—enterprising men of Canada. That is a kind of crime, but the greater crime and the greater responsibility lies on the officers of the ship who connive at that. Connive at that? Oh, they go further; they support the pirates in scuttling the ship of state. I am not going to attach blame, although I can, to Mackenzie and Mann and their associates. I am going to attach blame, and the people of this country will attach blame, to the officers of that ship of state for allowing pirates to scuttle the ship. There is the difference. This company, this combination of three or four financiers directly interested in the company, with associates outside comprising presidents, directors and managers of banks, men in insurance corporations and other large financial institutions—these men are doing their work, and they are doing it cleverly; for how otherwise could any one, two, three, four or five men during the past 25 years accumulate a fortune of millions and millions? When they started in business 30 years ago they did not have a cent to their name. Sir William Mackenzie was a good, honest teacher in Elgin county some thirty years ago, and had probably $8 or $10 or $12 a month, which was paid to teachers at that time. Sir Donald Mann was a good hard worker in a lumber camp as foreman of a gang. That was only thirty years ago. To-day these men are millionaires or multi-millionaires; and they came to the Parliament of Canada, the representatives of the people, to ask for another hundred millions.

During the past five or six years we gave them close on to that amount. Clever and astute as they are, they do not come this time and ask for a straight gift of $45,000,000, $25,000,000, or $10,000,000. They come to the people of Canada through their representatives and say: "Look here, we have $100,000,000 of stock, of which you have already $40,000,000; we have $60,000,000 left; it is stock that nobody paid for, never contributed a cent towards; we want the Parliament of Canada to give us par value for that stock, and in case you do not do that we are prepared to accept the ruling of an arbitration commission." There is the plain proposition before Canada and before Parliament. What does the Senate think of the proposition? The stock is not worth the paper it is written on. I myself am a shareholder, and hold thousands of shares of stock—

Hon. Mr. POWER: In the Canadian Pacific railway?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: No, I would not have to come to Parliament if I were in the Canadian Pacific.

Hon. Mr. POWER: In the Canadian Northern railway?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I guess that some of my honourable colleagues, some of whom have died recently, are in the same company. Would we come to Parliament and say: "Here is a railroad, we have 100,000,000 shares of stock; it is true that we did not pay a cent for it, and no one else did; it was distributed; pay us the full par value." The thing is simply preposterous, it is an outrage on the people, and Parliament is called upon by the Government of the day to sanction, approve and adopt such outrages upon the taxpaying power of the poor people of Canada, just as if they were not paying enough to-day to keep their sons alive at the front. What does this Government mean? What does Parliament intend to do? I appeal to you in all honesty, in all fairness, to respect the rights of the taxpayers of this country. Now, my 10,000 shares are in the Canada Central railway, and I will give them to the first comer for ten cents.

Hon. Mr. SHARPE: Sold.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: And if I were a stockholder of that $60,000,000 in the Canadian Northern railway, I would give it for nothing, because I would not have the dishonesty to come to the people of Canada and say: "You have to pay me 100 cents on the dollar, or you have to pay whatever the arbitrator proposes." I am man enough to say that. Are there enough men on the other side of the House to say the same? I ask the question. People will judge you by your acts and by your votes.

Mackenzie and Mann are two men whom the public have to admire, but much more to dread. Mackenzie and Mann are worthy of admiration, but look under their cloak of ability for their cleverness to bamboozle the Government, to pull the wool over the eyes of the Government. They may be admired, but they must be feared and dreaded. The fear that they have of us will not diminish their wealth. They are millionaires now, multi-millionaires, and if we refuse them the $60,000,000 it will not make them any poorer. It may have the effect of not making them much richer. If we put the whole company into bankruptcy to-day, these knights of the Empire and their Allies can live on the fat of the land without turning a hair for the balance of their lives. Why should Canada bleed itself to death to add more to this fortune which has been acquired under such conditions? These are things which will appeal to the people. I am not going to follow my colleague in regard to the financial details of the measure; it would be useless. What the people want to get at is what they are going to get for the $60,000,000 that the Government is going to pay.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: I do not wish to interrupt the honourable gentleman. I do not wish to be discourteous, but he says the Government has undertaken to pay them $60,000,000. I have not noticed that in the Bill, and I have not heard it in the Government utterances. Perhaps the honourable gentleman will give his authority for the statement.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The honourable gentleman asks a question which he ought to be able to answer himself, but since he asks me to answer it I will. Under this Bill the Government proposes to establish a board of arbitration in regard to $60,000,000 of stock. Does not the honourable gentleman know that? What has he been here for during this debate?

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: The honourable gentleman said that the Government had undertaken to pay $60,000,000. My understanding is that the Government had submitted the matter to arbitrators, who are to decide what amount they will award.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The honourable gentleman is under a misapprehension. I did not say point blank that the Government was going to pay $60,000,000. What I said was that the company came to the Government and was going to demand $60,000,000, and they said: "You will get the value of the stock."

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: I would like to ask what is the honourable gentleman's authority for the statement that the company went to the Government?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The president of the company said the stock was worth par.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: I am asking for the authority for the statement that the company went to the Government and demanded $60,000,000. The honourable gentleman made that statement, and I am asking him for a straight answer.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: He will give a straight answer. Although I am not in the counsels of Mackenzie and Mann, as the honourable gentleman is and, although I do not know, I am told that he is interested in the company. I have no interest in the company. I am only interested in the people.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: The honourable gentleman has not answered my question. He has asked another.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: That is an Irishman's way of answering a question. I am not going to identify Mackenzie and Mann; they are no more guilty than their allies and associates; there is no more blame to be attached to them than is to be attached to the directors or managers of banks or other institutions; probably they are less to blame than the men who are backing them. When the company laid this proposition before the Government there was the $100,000,000 of stock, of which the Government had already acquired $40,000,000, and the $60,000,000 was put up to the Government. Will the honourable gentleman tell me that the company went to the Government and said: "Pay us only five cents on that stock?"

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: Will the honourable gentleman tell me if they went to the Government and asked $60,000,000?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Asked the value of the stock which the president of the company said was worth par value. Can the honourable gentleman deny that?

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: There is no use in arguing with the honourable gentleman at all. I see that I cannot get a straight answer. I will let the matter drop.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I am giving as straight an answer as can come from a bow and arrow. I say that when the company went to the Government with this proposition, they produced a stock-list of $60,000,000 and they wanted value for the same. Does the honourable gentleman deny that?

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: I have not as much knowledge as the honourable gentleman I am not aware that the company did come with that agreement to the Government.

Perhaps the honourable gentleman can tell us whether they did or not.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Then I will take the word of the honourable gentleman, and I will relieve the company of all responsibility. I say that if the company did not demand value, and the present Government has offered either to give it to them, or to submit the question to arbitration, it has done a damnable outrage to the country of Canada.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The word "damnable" is English. If the Government has done this, it is all the more to be condemned. What has the honourable gentleman to say to that? He is putting the Government in a worse light than I wanted to do. The very fact of the Government proposing a board of arbitration is sufficient proof that the company wanted full value for the stock. Now, what does the amendment moved by the leader of the Liberal people of this country in this House ask for? You have read it time and again. It says:

> That the further consideration of the said Bill be deferred until the following information has been communicated to the Senate:
> "The production of the report made to the Government by the directors of the Canadian Northern Railway System including the directors appointed to the board by the Government under section 16, chapter 20 of the statutes of 1914."

Through the Senate, the people of Canada are asking for the report submitted to the Government in regard to this transaction —that report made by the directors; and by a hostile vote in this Senate the people are going to be refused that information and be made to assume the debt under the provisions of the law. Is the Senate acting in its good, honest sense regarding the welfare of this country? In this amendment we are simply asking for the report submitted to the Government in this matter, and we are told that we cannot get it. Does the Government intend to have the ship scuttled in the dark? That is the question. Are they going to have the ship of state, the treasury, scuttled, robbed and pilfered, without giving us the information required? That is the question which honourable gentlemen on the other side of the House must decide for themselves. The position is more serious than some honourable gentlemen take it to be. I for one am always in favour of promoting public enterprise for public welfare, but I am one of those who is not prepared, and never will be prepared, to support public enterprise for private gain. I am prepared to vote not only $60,000,000, but $600,000,000 to the Canadian Northern railway if it is in the interests of the people, if there is no squandering of the national money; but I am certainly opposed to legislation of this kind which involves expenditure applicable only to private gain. The shareholders of this company who have the balance of the $100,000,000 of stock in their names are not entitled to one cent from this country.

Now, is Parliament going to vote this money to them, whether it is 10, 20, 50 or 100 per cent of the stock. It is up to honourable gentlemen on the Government side to fix their consciences in this matter, and to say to themselves that it is all very well to stand by the party, but it is better to stand by the people. How many honourable gentlemen on the other side of the House will take that attitude? How many will say: "We have been sent here to vote for Conservative interests, Conservative policy and Conservative measures"? But how many men will undertake to stand before their country, and say: "It is true that I was nominated by my Prime Minister to serve the interests and the purposes of the Conservative party, but when it came to a showdown on a tremendous steal from the people of the country, I stood aloof and said, 'No.'" We shall see how many will do that. Let the country examine the vote when it takes place. This railway matter was very thoroughly gone into by the leader of the Government, who had control of the Bill, in submitting in to the House. He very devotedly lamented the fact that if this company was allowed to go into insolvency or into the hands of a receiver, it would have a bad effect on the interests of the creditors, the guarantors, and all the other people. His argument at first sight seemed to be plausible, but the more you weigh it and examine it, the more you see that there is very little foundation for it. For instance, he said that this road was not a unit, but was composed of some five, six or seven, companies; that there were six or seven branches, some running in Ontario, some in Quebec, some in Alberta and other provinces; and that if the company had to throw up the sponge it must go into the hands of at least six receivers. I am not going to dispute that, but I will point out that there are really no six companies. All the roads, subsidiary or otherwise, of the Canadian Northern system are held by the same people, with the probable exception of one or two of the shareholders. Every road is in the hands of Mackenzie and Mann and their associates. So that this argument is put forth simply to blindfold and hoodwink the people, that there will be at least six receiverships and that chaos will exist. The fact is that all those roads are under one organization, and though they have different charters, all those charters are under the control and in possession of the same men. That statement cannot be disputed; so that the honourable leader's argument on that point cannot hold water. Another point is that the Canadian Northern has already obtained from the treasury of Canada hundreds of millions in money and lands; I am not going to say how much they got from the poor municipalities or from the different provinces. But I will say that if this deal goes through, the province of Quebec must be protected against any liability assumed by this Government for the purchase or acquisition of this road. The province of Quebec has paid all its liabilities as subsidies to branches of roads held by the Canadian Northern, and we owe the system not a cent. Other provinces have bound themselves to pay many millions to this same system. Let those provinces pay their own liabilities; but we from the province of Quebec do not want this Government to undertake liabilities which will be distributed over all provinces equally after the deal is put through. That is a fair proposition and a fair warning. What has the province of Prince Edward Island done to make itself liable in any respect to the Canadian Northern? Absolutely nothing. What have the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia done to any extent to involve themselves in indebtedness to the Canadian Northern, or to the Government, if this Canadian Northern proposition is taken over? Those provinces must be protected against a joint liability; and when the Government assumes the duties and responsibilities and liabilities of the Canadian Northern system it does so on the ground that all the expenses incurred in that deal shall flow only from the province responsible for the same; otherwise you will be dealing unfairly by the taxpayers of this country and by the province of Quebec.

There are honourable gentlemen here who remember the strenuous times in 1885, when Sir John Macdonald had under consideration the demand of the Canadian Pacific railway for the loan of $30,000,000 to enable the Northwest to have the Canadian Pacific Railway construction finished. What happened? The members from the province of Quebec formed what we call a "cave," and established a house in Ottawa where they met day after day and night after night, and that house is known to-day in political history as the "chambre des Bleus"; and, if I mistake not, the honourable Speaker of this House to-day was a representative in that chambre des Bleus, with Langevin, Sir Adolphe Caron, McGreevy, Ouimet and the others; they were all there. At that time Quebec was thoroughly Tory; I do not think the Liberal party had thirteen members in that whole province. We were under the thumb of the clergy at that time, and under the thumb of several different things, but the Tories had all the clergy with them in those days. Forty or fifty members from the province of Quebec met in that house, for what purpose? Sir Frank Smith and Sir Adolphe Caron, who were great friends of Sir John Macdonald, brought him to consent to granting the $30,000,000 as a loan to the Canadian Pacific railway. Those fifty members from Quebec rented that "maison bleu," I think on the corner of Slater and Metcalfe streets, and gathered there sulking in their tents, and sent word from time to time to Sir John Macdonald saying that his Government could not put that vote through unless the Conservatives of Ontario and the members from the West would consent to Quebec getting a fair share of the money that was going. And what was the demand? It was that the Government, in granting the loan of $30,000,000 to the Canadian Pacific railway, should at the same time compel that company to buy from Quebec the North Shore railroad running from Montreal to Ottawa. The province of Quebec had spent some $20,000,000 in building that road, and had to accept $7,000,000 or $8,000,000 for it. That cave of Conservatives insisted on Sir John Macdonald granting thereafter cash subsidies to roads at $3,200 a mile—because you must remember that in those days while railroads were being built in Ontario and the West with cash subsidies and land grants, there was very little that came to the province of Quebec, with the result that the Provincial Government of Quebec had to subsidize roads with tremendous amounts of land —6,000 or 8,000 acres per mile. Quebec got tired of that business, because at that time the province was not flourishing as it is to-day, and was not able to cope with the financial situation as it existed. I do not blame those Tory members who formed that cave; I believe that is what we ought to do here to-day; we ought to form another cave. Were their demands granted? Yes, they were. That shows what a good solid kick can do. That North Shore railway from Montreal to Ottawa was taken over from the Quebec Governement at a small figure, but there was an awful nigger in the fence at that time. The road was sold by the Government to one of its friends for between six and seven millions. Mr. Senecal, the man who bought it, had not had it forty-eight hours when he sold to the Canadian Pacific railway for $8,000,000. Those are the facts; I saw the champagne drank in the Windsor hotel over the sale; I was looking on; I was too young to get a snip at it. After that, money was voted to railroads constructed in the province of Quebec, and God knows how much we gave to the Saguenay road, Sir Rodolphe Forget's road. That gentleman carried two Liberal constituencies in the province of Quebec, and he forced the Government to give him millions on millions of money. That is the history of railroad legislation all along, under Liberal and Conservative regimes. We are going through the same process of unwarranted expenditure, unjustifiable in every respect. Now, I appeal to members of the Senate who have any respect for past traditions or any hope for the future of the Government to call the Government to time, and say that the experience of Canada has been too lamentable in this respect for the past forty years, since 1872. That is not too much to ask even from strong party men on behalf and in the name of the people of Canada and the taxpayers, who are going to be ground to the earth for the next fifty or a hundred years owing to the tremendous burden this war is putting upon their shoulders. In the name of Heaven, do not add a useless and unfair burden. If the Government wants to take the road over, let it do so without paying cash into the hands of men who never earned a cent in regard to that road. If the Government is going to enter into the ownership of railroads, let it do so on the cheapest basis possible. I am not opposed to the Government taking over the system; all I am opposed to is the giving of unfair advantages to individuals as against the people at large. I think I have done my duty by the people I represent in putting these statements before this honourable House.

Hon. A. B. CROSBY: I intended to speak on this subject, but several gentlemen who have spoken are not here, and I will be very glad to speak when they are present. But as we are here, we do not like to go away without doing something. This subject was introduced by our leader so lucidly, and so perfectly put before this House, that there did not seem to be any reason why I or any other gentleman should use any time in dealing with this question, the situation being such that there is no room, as no honourable gentleman on the other side of the House except the honourable member from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) has for a single moment touched the principle of the Bill before us.

The honourable leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Bostock) spoke for a long time, and I have no doubt his desire and intention were to get past a situation which he did not find very satisfactory to himself. That is, he tried to get by the Bill that is before this honourable House. He moved a resolution which I shall take the liberty of repeating. I do not know just what his intention was in moving it. It seems to contain nothing but a request for some information. As I have said, he discussed the Bill for about an hour and a half without touching upon the principle of the Bill or the policy to be adopted. Not a single minute of his time was devoted to the principle of the Bill. Then he moved this amendment:

> That further consideration of the said Bill be deferred until the following information has been communicated to the Senate. The production of the report made to the Government by the directors of the Canadian Northern railway system, including the directors appointed to the board by the Government under section 16, chapter 20, of the statutes of 1914; the names of the stockholders of the Canadian Northern railway company; the names of the pledgees of this stock.

Etc., etc. That is the kind of amendment proposed by the honourable gentleman. I do not know why it should be accepted by the House. It does not seem to have any beginning or any ending. The principle involved in the Bill which is now before the House is, to my mind, the question whether we shall continue to contribute to the Canadian Northern every year, when they apply for money to keep their railway system in operation, or whether we shall stop those payments. The policy of the Bill involves the question: What is the means to be adopted when we decide not to pay over any more money? We are interested to a very great extent in this road. We own a considerable portion of the stock. We are confronted with the problem, what policy are we going to adopt? When we come to consider that aspect of the situation we find that three courses are open to us: liquidation, government ownership, or allowing the road to go into the possession of the Canadian Pacific railway. Now we must decide on some method in dealing with the situation.

I would like to ask my honourable friend the leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Bostock) if he would say that we should hand over to the Canadian Northern the money which is required at present, amounting to a sum between $15,000,000 and $25,000,000. I would like to ask him if he would favour the policy of continuing to give money to the Canadian Northern Railway company in order that they may keep the railway in operation? If he says: "I would do that," then we shall know the position which he takes on the question. If he says: "No," then what is his policy? I think it is the decision of the people of this country that the present system shall not be maintained. Personally, I feel that the position of the Canadian Northern people is a difficult one. Nevertheless, we must deal with the matter.

Some men talk of the Canadian Northern as if the Government or the people of this country had no interest in it; they talk of it as if it were similar to the railways in the United States. We know very well that the United States Government is not interested in the railways, and never was, further than to give them a franchise in the best interests of the people. But in this country transportation is of vital interest. Without transportation facilities of the very best, we cannot develop this country as it ought to be developed?

We must therefore decide whether we are going to allow this road to go into liquidation, whether it is to be brought under government ownership, or given to the Canadian Pacific railway. I would like to ask my honourable friend, the leader of the Opposition, to what policy he is going to adhere—what part he is going to play. Is he in favour of liquidation? Honourable gentlemen know very well that if we allow the railway system to go into liquidation, our interests will be immediately jeopardized. Not only that, but the transportation interests of the country will be endangered. What would become of this railway, of the great traffic it is now carrying on, of the great assistance it is now rendering in connection with the supplying of our overseas lines? What would happen to all that? What would happen to the 11,000 or 12,000 men who are employed on that railway, and to whom the sum of $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 is paid annually? On the other hand, suppose we allow the Canadian Pacific railway to take over the road. If we want to let it go into liquidation, there is no corporation in Canada that could touch the Canadian Northern system except the Canadian Pacific Railway company. What would the Canadian Pacific do when they had taken over this road? They would acquire those branches which are of advantage to the Canadian Pacific railway and the rest of the road might go to rust for all they would care about it. The main line from Port Arthur to Fort William they would use; the branches in the West they would use; that is all they want. We have had information with reference to the branches of the Canadian Northern system, and on that subject I need not give you my own opinion, but can refer to the opinion of the best engineering authority in this Dominion, that the branch lines of the Canadian Northern are equal in every respect to those of the Canadian Pacific railway and are in many respect better.

There is another point with reference to the Canadian Pacific railway. No man in Canada has higher appreciation of the Canadian Pacific railway than I have. No man has been a stronger follower of the Canadian Pacific railway than I have been. As a Conservative I am proud of Canada and proud of the Canadian Pacific railway. I am proud of the men of Canada who constructed that railway and made it what it is. The Government of Canada has helped the Canadian Pacific railway, and the Canadian Pacific railway has helped considerably to develop Canada.

I do not want to take up the time of this honourable House in touching upon the ground covered by the honourable gentleman who has preceded me (Hon. Mr. Cloran); but may I refer for a moment to the loan which was made by the Canadian Government to the Canadian Pacific Railway when it was in a condition similar to the present condition of the Canadian Northern. What would have happened to the Canadian Pacific railway if the Government loan had not been made? We know very well that on that occasion the money markets of the world were closed to the owners of the railway. We know that the financiers in the country to the south of us, and the railway and transportation men, were against the Canadian Pacific railway and used every possible means to prevent that company from getting money anywhere. The money markets were closed, not because the railway did not have plenty of good security, but because it was desired to drive that company out of existence, in view of the posibility that it might become a disadvantage to the traffic of the United States railroads. But the great men who had charge of the affairs of this country at the time gave to the Canadian Pacific the assistance they required. The company continued its operations ,and it is needless to say what has happened since.

I have a great deal of sympathy with the Canadian Northern to-day, because I am quite satisfied that if it had not been for the outbreak of the war in 1914 the Canadian Northern would probably not have been under the necessity of coming back to this Parliament for assistance; and I am confident that when they came here in 1914 to ask for a loan, and when the Government granted that money, they really and truly believed that it was all the assistance that would be necessary. But the situation has been entirely changed by the war. In the interests of the people of this country, and in the interests of transportation, the Dominion Government have been forced by the existing conditions to take over, for the present at least, the ownership of that road. I have no hesitation in declaring that I am a believer in public ownership, to some extent at least, and I do not think there are many men in this Dominion who have not a little of that belief. The point I want to make, honourable gentlemen, is that the taking over of this road is not a matter of choice; it is a forced condition and cannot be helped. For the time being we must take over the railway system, and the Government has so intimated and in this Bill has so provided. My honourable friend the leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Bostock) will note that the Government propose this arrangement simply for the present and leave to the next Parliament the rest of the problem—the formulation of a policy and the adoption of a method by which the road may be acquired, or otherwise dealt with in the future. That, I think, is clearly and distinctly the situation.

A great deal has been said with respect to the method of acquiring the road. I am not a lawyer, but if I were going to acquire a great property or to deal with a matter of this kind personally, I should certainly employ the best legal talent I could find. Now, where do I look for advice with regard to the best method of taking over this road? In the first place, we have in the Premier of Canada a lawyer of the very first rank. No man in this country will say that the Prime Minister of Canada does not stand in the very foremost ranks of the legal profession of Canada. Then we have the Minister of Justice, and no man will say that he does not stand in the front ranks of the legal profession. Then we have in the Solicitor General a man who has proved beyond the shadow of a doubt that he stands in the first rank of the legal profession. There is also the great Finance Minister, of whom every man in this country should be proud, and who, with his colleagues, has accomplished so much that he has surprised not only the people of Canada but the people throughout the world whose eyes are upon Canada. He also is a lawyer. Those four men have been investigating and studying the situation, not for a few hours, a few days, or a few weeks, but for years, and when they have come to the conclusion that the best way, without interfering with vested rights, is to take over the control of the railway system by acquiring five-sixths of the stock, I am bound to feel, notwithstanding the references made to the Act of 1914, that I have the very best advice that can be given anywhere in this country.

Now, it having been decided that the best course is to take over the road, we come to the question of the equity. My honourable friend from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) was the only membre on the other side of the House who touched at all on the principle of this Bill, and what did he say? He made a very wearisome argument, though we know that the honourable gentleman is able to make good argument and a good speech, no matter what the subject may be. But he could not speak well this afternoon. The honourable leader of the Government had told him something—I do not know what it was, but I think it was some information in connection with the Canadian Northern—and that seemed to knock out of his head the whole speech that he had prepared. At any rate, he made up his mind that he could not use it. Consequently he got himself into difficulties. He argued for over an hour and a half that the company had no equity at all; but he had not argued very long before he encountered the fact that there was an equity. He wanted the Government to pay for the stock with stock in place of letting the question go to arbitration and having the arbitrators decide how it should be paid. When you read his speech you will find that he argued against equity. My honourable friend from Pictou (Hon. Mr. Tanner) questioned him on the subject of the equity, and asked him, in regard to mortgages, why there was always an equity, no matter what the situation was, and he denied it, and tried to argue on that point; but my honourable friend from Pictou must have convinced him, for before he got very far he said that there was an equity—that there was no question in his mind about the equity. He said, "We will pay that equity by giving the Canadian Northern some more stock, and if it does not become valuable they will be no worse off than they are now." That is the admission of the equity. What did the honourable gentleman say on the principle of the Bill? I am sorry that he is not here; it is to my disadvantage to have to speak in his absence. He said: "I would rather give the Canadian Northern the money; I would rather loan them the money and let them go on." He said that he was not in favour of the Bill, but that he was in favour of giving them money, as has been done before, and letting them go on. The Bill does not say whether we are going to pay for the equity or not. We do not say that there is any equity; but in considering this question we must remember that there is always an equity in a franchise; therefore, I say that the Government could not in honesty take over the ownership and control of this railroad without giving the company a fair opportunity of placing its claim before the proper tribunal.

Honourable gentlemen do not object to arbitration, but they say that the senior judge of the Exchequer Court should be the arbitrator. What is proposed in the Bill? The Government names Chief Justice Meredith as its arbitrator, and allows the Canadian Northern to name one and the two gentlemen thus chosen are to select a third arbitrator. If they do not agree as to who shall be the third arbitrator, the question is referred to the senior judge of the Exchequer Court, who may name any one he wishes. Can any one say that is not fair, or can any one suggest a better way of appointing the arbitrators? I think that answers once and for all the argument that we should have asked the senior judge of the Exchequer Court to act in the capacity of arbitrator.

The only difference between the proposals contained in the Bill and those of the honourable gentleman from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) is that he says: "We will take the money out of the treasury and give it to the Canadian Northern to keep it up until after the war is over," whereas the Bill says we will take over the ownership of the road. The road will continue its operations; the officials will continue to run it; we will become the receivers. If a receiver were appointed, the creditors would be coming in and asking for their money, and every man in this House knows that what would take place would be a calamity. If such a thing happened, the Government would have to come in and take over the bonds that have been issued by the company, the majority of which bear interest at 3, 3½ and 4 per cent.

My honourable friend from De Lanaudière (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) talked a great deal about the interest that we would have to pay for money, but in spite of that he said to let the road go into bankruptcy and into the hands of a receiver. If this road went into the hands of a receiver, we would have to pay eight per cent for money to take up the bonds. I ask any honourable gentleman in this House, or anybody in this country, if under the circumstances any better policy can be adopted than the policy which has been adopted by the Government. The only reference my honourable friend from De Lanaudiere (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) made to the policy of the Government or to the Bill was when he said that he did not know what was going to be done with the $25,000,000 which is mentioned. He was not told. It is apparent that the honourable gentleman has never read the Bill, because section 3 of the Bill says:

> So soon as the said five-sixths of the said shares have been transferred as aforesaid, the Governor in Council may assist the Canadian Northern railway company, or any company included in the Canadian Northern railway system, in paying and settling any indebtedness of such company or postponing the payment thereof on such terms as may be agreed upon, and for such purposes may make advances out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund: provided, however, that until authorized by Parliament, the total of such advances shall not exceed the sum of twenty-five million dollars. A statement of any such advances, showing in detail the purposes for which they were applied, shall be presented to Parliament by the Minister of Finance within twenty days after the opening of the next ensuing session thereof.

That explains what is going to be done with the $25,000,000, or whatever portion of it is necessary to continue the road in operation. In the Senate we vote Estimates for the Intercolonial railway and for public works of different kinds. The Estimates are made up and are passed by the House of Commons and by this House a year before the money is to be expended, so my honourable friend will see how unfounded and how unfair it is for him to stand up here and make such a complaint as he has made. The Bill before us is a very short one, and contains particular and exact reference to the $25,000,000. The Bill does not say that the whole $25,000,000 must be spent. We are providing that amount, and that is all the money that can be used for that purpose until the further authority of Parliament is obtained.

My honourable friend said that we would have to pay out a great deal of money. There is no more money to be paid out than we would have to hand over to the Canadian Northern in order to keep the road going. The Canadian Northern must be carried on or the country will lose the advantages in getting foodstuffs from the West and which are so badly needed by our Allies in Europe.

My honourable friend the leader of the Opposition suggested that this Bill be referred to the Railway Committee. I do not know whether he remembers making such a suggestion or not. I do not think he really meant it. I leave it to honourable gentlemen to imagine for themselves how such a plan would work out. I leave it to any member of the Railway Committee to imagine what would happen if we had a witness before that committee and honourable gentlemen on the other side of the House and honourable gentlemen on this side of the House were all trying to get answers to the question which they had in their minds. I would remind the members of what has been going on at the last four or five meetings of the committee. Just imagine trying to get information in this way. I am sure that the honourable the leader of the Opposition did not make this suggestion seriously, and I will forgive him for making it if it was not done seriously.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The honourable gentleman is quite considerate.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: He has to be sometimes. To my mind the only alternatives are national ownership or national disaster. It is for this Parliament and the Parliament that succeeds it—and that will suit my honourable friend from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran)—to deal with this matter. This is not a hard and fast bargain, the next Government can decide upon its own policy and carry it out. This Government does not bind the future Government, it is just doing what it is compelled to do for the time being under the circumstances. My honourable friend must admit the fairness of that. I know that my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Cloran) wants to be fair. As I said to him this afternoon, I do not know how he ever got so far astray when he was such a great friend of the late Sir Frank Smith. There may be hope for him yet. The honourable gentleman must admit that the present Government might have gone ahead and made a definite and distinct bargain; they might have made whatever arrangement they liked, and they might have bound the next Government by it. They did not do that, they only made provision to carry on this undertaking for the time being, and, as has been said in the House of Commons, they leave it to the incoming Government to settle the question.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: It is quite a load to leave to the next Government.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: The last Government left quite a load. I do not think this Government will leave very much; it cleans things up pretty well.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: There will not be much left for anybody.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Mr. Rogers said they were very undecided.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I regret that the member for De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) is not present, because it may seem unfair for me to say things when he is not here, and I have some questions I want to ask him; because, though he made a very long speech, like the honourable leader of the Opposition, not one single moment of his time did he give to discussing the principle or policy of the Bill. Some one accused him of being a member of the Canadian Pacific railway, and I was very glad he did, because otherwise he would not have said a word about the Bill at all. However, he pledged himself to this, that the railway should not go into the hands of the Canadian Pacific. I was glad to hear him say that, because that was proper and right. Although no one has greater faith in the Canadian Pacific railway than I have, I must say that if they had control of all the roads in Canada it would be impossible to make the people of this country believe that they were getting fair treatment, because there would be an appearance of monopoly, and the people are down on that. The people must be treated fairly, and they must be kept content; they must have fair play. But if we do not let this road go into the hands of the Canadian Pacific, where will it go? If the Government of this country does not take it over, and it does not go into the hands of the Canadian Pacific, where is the corporation in Canada that can take it over? Not one. And what is left? There is no choice in the matter. The Government is bound to come to the rescue of the people of this country. Financially involved as we are in that great undertaking, we are bound to come in and take it over. So much for the principle, and so much for the policy that we have adopted in this matter.

Now I propose to show that in taking over this road we are obtaining a valuable asset. The honourable member for Wentworth (Hon. Mr. Smith), who made a very practicable speech here yesterday, read from an able authority on railways, and I compliment him on doing that, for it is an authority worth quoting. I propose to quote from the same authority to show that we are getting a railroad that has been built for less money than any other in Canada, which I think is saying a good deal. I read from a paper by W. F. Tye, resident engineer, and formerly chief engineer of the Canadian Pacific railway. That would be a sufficient recommendation of him any where. He is to-day consulting engineer in Montreal, and one of the leading engineers on the continent of America, and that includes everything. In regard to the Canadian Northern he states:

A consolidation of the Grand Trunk, the Grand Trunk Pacific Trascontinental railway and the Canadian Northern railway would give a well-balanced system. The Grand Trunk has an excellent system in the east, and has terminals in all large and important centres; the Canadian Northern has not. The Canadian Northern has a good system of feeders in the West; the Grand Trunk has not. Each is strong where the other is weak. Combining them must of necessity be the most economical way of handling the situation.

He goes on to say:

Such a combination would not require more than $100,000,000 to provide it with sufficient rolling stock and put it in proper physical condition to compete with the Canadian Pacific—

And that is saying a great deal.

The saving in the capital cost would be at least $300,000,000, and at the present rate of interest the savings on the fixed charges would be at least $15,000,000.

When you consider the fact that the fixed charges on the Canadian Pacific are $10,800,000, you will see what an advantage there would be in this, when it makes a saving of $15,000,000 by that combination. He goes on:

The Transcontinental cost $100,000 per mile. The parallel Canadian Northern cost less than $50,000 per mile.

Now, if this report is true, and there is no doubt that it is, the Canadian Northern has been built for half the money that the Transcontinental cost, and this same authority tells you that in the Canadian Northern you have a railway equal in every respect to the Transcontinental line.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Nobody questions that the Canadian Pacific is just as good a railroad as there is in North America.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I am glad to hear my honourable friend say that. My honourable friend sometimes tries to talk about cost, but his arguments do not amount to much. I am not here to raise any question of cost. It is not a question of cost. There is not a dollar spent that we can get back, except by conserving the identity of the road and keeping it going. We intend to keep it going, and when the war is over and things go on as they must under normal conditions, we will get our reward, and we will feel all the advantage this Government has gained in taking over this road by the proposed policy, and saving the calamity which would have come to the country if it had been allowed to go into liquidation. Why talk about $600,000,000? You might as well say $7,000,000 or $8,000,000 or $1,000,000,000, for $600,000,000 has no more to do with the cost of this road than $7,000,000 or $9,000,000 or $1,000,000,000.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: What do you give the cost at?

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I do not give the cost at all, because when I speak I do so with authority, and there is no man who has as yet spoken on the other side who can give the cost of this road. But I do tell my honourable friend this, that an authority worth quoting says the Canadian Northern road cost $50,000 a mile, while the Transcontinental cost $100,000 a mile—a road for the construction of which he voted—and he surely should be satisfied with that. If the Canadian Northern cost half the money, then we cannot be getting much the worst of the bargain. I am not complaining of the cost of the Transcontinental road at $100,000 a mile, for we will have to take over that road and link up those roads so as to give Canada the transportation which the country needs and must have. Every honourable member who is interested in the public affairs of this country must come to the conclusion that it needs two transcontinental roads. No country in the world is so dependent upon transportation as this great Dominion, in which we have the honour and privilege of living. What must that transportation be? Can we afford to let it go into the hands of anybody and everybody? We must take great care of it. One member of this House said to-day that if we had to resort to direct taxation to pay the deficit on those roads he would be willing that should be done.

I have some questions to ask the honourable gentleman from De Lanaudière (Hon. Mr. Casgrain), who is a great authority on railways, or at least thinks he is, and I want to have him here so as to learn something from him; and as I have some doubts about things he said, I wish to put some questions to him. When he talks so much about money, is he going to ask us not to pay any deficit on the Grand Trunk Pacific road, which is in trouble? We have to pay that money. I would also like to ask him what he is going to do with that road. I will wait until he is here so as to have the opportunity of asking him, because that matter is important. As I said the other day when discussing transportation and shipping affairs in this House, I am not going to quarrel with what the Transcontinental road cost. It has been built and we have paid for it. What is the use of worrying ourselves over spilt milk? Let us go on and make the best of it. I do not want to make any party capital out of matters of that kind. I know that my honourable friend from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran) is going to give us that practice from this night on, because I can tell from his looks that he has changed his mind to-night. In the other House it may be reasonable to expect some partisan speeches from men who are compelled to go before their constituents, but our call to this House is the call of the King for the purpose of advising the King without any hesitation, and without any doubts in our mind, and doing the best we can for the people of this country. My honourable friend frequently says that in the other House they sit longer than they ought. But what matters it so long as we have the control? We will see that everything goes straight and right until the new Parliament comes in. My honourable friend must not forget that he is here and we are here, and we are going to see that the public affairs of this country are carried on properly, no matter what is the inclination of the other House, and if my honourable friend and others on that side of the House will give up partisan speeches and partisan affairs we will get along a great deal better, and when we have a Bill before us as to the principle or policy of which not a single honourable gentleman on that side of the House can raise a question, what reason have they for opposing it by their votes?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: There is no principle to the Bill.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: The principle of the Bill is this: shall we keep on giving the Canadian Northern money to carry them along, or shall we stop?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: That is not a principle; that is a matter of closing down on the purloiner.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Well, then, I cannot find what is the principle of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: There is none.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Then the Bill is a good deal like my honourable friend.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I am glad you admit that.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: There is no use in discussing it with him.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: If you withdraw the Bill I will withdraw; then there would be two no-principles go out.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I have nothing to withdraw. We have a Bill with a principle in it; therefore you may withdraw, but I have something I do not want to withdraw. My leader has given me permission to move the adjournment of the debate, and I would be very glad to do that, so that I might conclude my remarks when the honourable gentlemen are present to whom I have alluded. I therefore move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Adjourn until Monday morning. I see no good reason why we should not proceed with the debate on Monday morning.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: So far as I understand, there was no intimation given that there was to be a sitting on Monday morning.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: The honourable gentlemen who have gone to Toronto and Montreal do not expect the House to meet until three o'clock.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I was about to give notice of motion. It is desirable that we should go into committee on Tuesday, assuming that we have a vote on this Bill. The motion could lapse between the second reading and our going into committee. If my honourable friend is willing that we should go into committee on Tuesday we will dispense with the Monday morning sitting.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I could not exactly pledge myself to that, because there might be another amendment to be moved to the Bill.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That would make no difference.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: If there was, the House would not go into committee on Tuesday.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It was understood that we would dispose of the second reading of the Bill on Monday evening.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Would dispose of the amendment.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Not the amendment.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I may have other amendments.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Does my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Bostock) take that view?

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I understand that there is to be a vote on Monday night on this amendment.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Not on the amendment at all.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Certainly; that is the only thing before the House.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We will go on with the morning session if that is the case. It was distinctly understood—every member on this side of the House who has left for his home to-night understood that he was to return not later than Monday night for the vote on the second reading of this Bill.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: That is right.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Now, if that is the understanding there should be a vote on the second reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: On the amendment.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Not on the amendment. I am concerned with the second reading of the Bill, not the amendment.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I think there is a misunderstanding in this matter, because the question was about the vote on the amendment before the House, and there was no understanding that after this vote was taken an honourable gentleman would not be privileged to move another amendment if he wanted to do so.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If that be the case, it is quite clear—I will not say that there was deliberate misrepresentation; but I do say that every honourable gentleman on this side of the House who went to his home to-day went with the intention of returning on Monday night, and he is coming here with a view to voting on the Bill. The representation made to me was that the Bill would be voted on Monday night. I have deferred, since giving notice of it, my motion for morning sessions. Had I known that that was the case, we would have arranged to sit to-morrow. If a series of amendments are to be moved to the motion for the second reading, then it must be quite evident to my honourable friends opposite that we have no alternative but to avail ourselves of the motion of which I have given notice, and sit daily.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I do not think my honourable friend is fair in taking that stand in the matter. I think he will admit that no proposal was ever put to me that there was to be no other amendment moved. I am not saying at this moment that another amendment is to be moved, but I cannot speak for the honourable gentlemen who have gone, and I certainly do not propose under present conditions to give a pledge that no other amendment shall be moved on the second reading of the Bill.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Then why should the House not continue to sit until the Bill is disposed of? Is there to be no finality to it? If my honourable friend is under the impression that amendment after amendment will be moved, so that no date may be fixed for the second reading of the Bill, then my honourable friend cannot reasonably expect that I should consent to the adjournment of the sessions of this House, skipping to-morrow and skipping Monday morning, when we have a right to sit. That is not the way to dispose of public business at this time of the session.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I had something to do in the arrangement with the honourable gentleman from Leeds (Hon. Mr. Taylor), the Chief Whip on the other side, and also with the honourable leader of the Government in this House, that, as I thought, for the convenience of the members, we should have no sitting on Saturday and that a vote on the amendment before the House should be taken on Monday evening. That time was fixed for the convenience of members who were leaving town in order that they might be here in time for the vote. The question of the business of the House was also discussed, and there was no intention on this side, so far as I knew, to have any obstruction. We have not been long debating this important Bill. But it was pointed out that there was nothing else to come before the House except the Military Voters Bill. When there is no rush with the work before the Senate, it seems to me there is no necessity for crowding the work by meeting on Saturday or at 11 o'clock in the morning. There is very little on the Order Paper, and it can all be disposed of before we receive any more work from the House of Commons. We shall not receive the Franchise Bill before some time next week in any case, and it seems to me this Bill can be disposed of in very short order. I quite appreciate what the honourable leader of the Opposition has said, that his attention was not called to the question of having no other amendment moved to the Canadian Northern Bill. As a matter of fact, I heard there were to be some amendments coming from the other side of the House. I do not know whether that is correct or not. But that is the position in which we are placed, and I know that honourable gentlemen on this side left with the intention of coming back to vote on the amendment on Monday evening; in fact, I know a number of gentlemen on the other side of the House who have made pairs with other members until Monday evening.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not propose to have the vote take place before then, but I want to know whether it is to be a vote on the second reading of the Bill or not.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I do not think my honourable friend is justified in accusing the honourable leader of the Opposition of breaking faith because he states that he was not approached on the question of other amendments to the Bill.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I venture to say that every honourable gentleman sitting behind me is under the impression, and the well-founded impression, that it was on the second reading of the Bill that the vote would be taken on Monday night; and I undertake to say that every member left here with that understanding.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: There is every possibility of the vote being taken on Monday night. What is the use of wasting our time discussing a trivial matter of this kind? The amendment will be voted on, then the alternative will be immediately the second reading—unless I, who am not responsible to either the leader of this House or the leader of the Opposition, offer a new amendment. If I feel that the interests of the country demand that I submit a new amendment, it is my business to offer it. I am not going to tie myself up in a trivial matter of this kind.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would suggest to my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Bostock) that the Bill go into committee the session after it receives its second reading. That would dispense with the moving of the motion to sit on Monday morning.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Yes.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: That is all right.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Then the debate will be adjourned until Monday.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: At three o'clock.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: At three o'clock. It will be the first Order of the Day, and it is understood that the Bill will be referred to committee the session after the second reading.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The hour after, if the honourable gentleman desires.

The motion for the adjournment of the debate was agreed to.

MILITARY VOTERS BILL.

On the Order:

Second reading of Bill 127, the Military Voters Act, 1917.—Hon. Sir James Lougheed.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I observe that this Bill has been on the Order Paper for some time. Has my honourable friend any objection to our proceeding with it?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: My honourable friend does not propose to take it up tonight?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: To give it a second reading.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Honourable gentlemen may want to discuss this Bill.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is practically the product of a conference that took place between both sides in the House of Commons, and, that being the case, I assume that it would be unnecessary to discuss it here, particularly as it has to do with the other House. However, if my honourable friend—

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: All I can say is that one honourable gentleman, who left this afternoon, told me he understood this Bill was not to be taken up to-night.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No one ever spoke to me about it. If honourable gentlemen take certain liberties with regard to Bills of this kind without saying anything to me, who am charged with the responsibility of dealing with them, it is a rather strange procedure.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: He certainly wanted to speak on the subject.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: A practice followed in the House of Commons when I was there, in cases of this kind, was that when it was necessary, in order to facilitate the passage of a certain Bill, to permit the second reading to take place, it was understood that the principle of the Bill might be discussed in committee. We know that the rules of the House are that the principle must not be discussed in committee, but the Bill must be considerd clause by clause. The practice followed in the House of Commons might be adopted in this case, in order that time may be saved. Honourable gentlemen opposite who desire to discuss the general principle of the Bill would then have an opportunity of doing so in committee. An amendment could be moved in committee just as well as upon the second reading. That is the course may not forget, as the Irishman says, to gentlemen want to keep repeating the same argument over and over again, so that we may not forget—as the Irishman says, to "insense" it into your minds.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: All I can say in reply to the honourable gentleman is this. Of course, I understand that practice is sometimes followed, but an honourable gentleman who left this afternoon asked me whether I understood that this Military Voters' Bill was to be proceeded with or not, and said that he particularly wanted to speak upon it on the second reading.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: He can do that in committee just as well.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: No, he cannot.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: This Bill comes to us from the House of Commons, and, as I understand, there is at present plenty of time and there is no danger of the Bill being strangled, or delayed, or affected in any way that I can see, by allowing it to stand.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The reason I am desirous of having it passed is that the machinery is complex and the Act has to be put into operation overseas. It is necessary to print a very large number of copies of the Bill. It is necessary, in fact, to make provision at once to put it into operation so far as concerns the preliminary steps. My honourable friend will appreciate the necessity of that. That is the reason I do not want to delay the Bill. It is purely a matter of details; there is no principle involved except that of giving the military forces both in Canada and overseas the vote, and I fancy honourable gentlemen will not contest a principle so obviously fair as that.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I quite understand that we really adopted the principle of this Bill in 1915.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. This Bill takes the place of the 1915 Act.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: As I understand it, the Bill is on similar lines, and differs only as to details from that adopted in 1915. I would probably have no objection to the House proceeding with it but that an honourable gentleman who spoke to me about it this afternoon told me he understood it was not to be taken up this evening. I do not want to obstruct.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Cannot the honourable gentleman speak to it in committee?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I would prefer if the honourable leader of the Government could let it stand.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Anything to delay.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I would just like to suggest that if my honourable friend's (Hon. Mr. Bostock's) wishes are complied with, I think this side of the House would not object to the suspension of the rule, so that the Bill may be advanced a stage.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not see very much evidence of that. I have given notice for a suspension of the rules—

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I beg pardon. The honourable gentleman has done so.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: —and, as my honourable friend very well knows, we can carry that motion. I have avoided giving any evidence to my honourable friends on the opposite side of the House that we could carry that motion. At their request I have allowed it to remain on the Table. Consequently I do expect that reciprocal courtesy will be tendered to this side of the House in assisting us with our legislation at this late period of the session.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: It seems to me that there would be really a substantial advantage for any honourable gentleman desiring to discuss the principle of the Bill in doing so when we are in Committee of the Whole, if the same latitude is allowed for moving amendments in committee as is given on the second reading. I cannot see any possibility of prejudicing in any way the wish or the purpose of any honourable gentleman who desires to discuss the principle of the Bill; and he would have the additional advantage that in committee he could speak as often as he liked, whereas on the second reading he could speak only once.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: This is another illustration of what occurs very often. The business of the country is delayed in order to accommodate members of the Senate who desire to go home. My only point is that it is about time to put a stop to this. I have been advocating it for a good many years. It is the desire, particularly of those who live near the capital, to go home to attend to their own business, or for their own convenience, at the expense of those who have to remain here—

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: There is no place like home.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—and the sooner we put a stop to it the better. I would like to see the Government prevent this practice. If a gentleman accepts a position in this Senate let him stay here and attend to the business; or, if he desires to neglect it, let him take the consequences.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I quite agree with the honourable gentleman from Hastings (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell). I do not think he can accuse me of not attending to the business of the Senate, and I think that if we could get honourable gentlemen to attend more closely to the work before the House, we should do better work and get along more quickly, and conditions such as that which has now arisen would not occur.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: Then we agree for once.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Bostock) does not desire the second reading of the Bill tonight?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I have told my honourable friend that I was specially spoken to about this Bill, and I should prefer that he would allow it to stand.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Under the circumstances I will let it stand till Monday; but after Monday we shall have morning sittings and suspend the rules. I do not propose that we shall delay the public business if we can expedite it, and I do not propose to consider the convenience of honourable gentlemen who go to their homes every week and refuse to attend here when other members are attending to the public business. I therefore hope that honourable gentlemen on the opposite side of the House will appreciate the views which I hold upon the subject and will assist me in getting the business done.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the order was discharged and placed on the order paper for Monday next.

SUPPLY BILL NO. 3.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 128, an Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st of March, 1918.

He said: The Supply Bill now before the House consists of two schedules, "A" and "B," and contains portions only of the main and supplementary estimates brought down during the present session for the fiscal year 1917-18, amounting in the aggregate to $56,503,089.70.

Schedule "A" is composed of seven-twelfths of that portion of the main estimates not wholly included in the two preceding appropriation Acts (excepting votes 70, 79, and 285 still standing), which passed the House of Commons on the 6th of February and the 6th of July last, and amounting to $51,681,871.90. Schedule "B" is composed of a portion only of the supplementary estimates voted by the House of Commons during the present session, amounting to $4,821,217.80.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Are those the supplementaries for the year 1917-18?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. The estimated expenditure for the year 1917-18 as shown by the main estimates amounts to $203,472,765.94, and by the supplementary estimates to $50,542,372.35, making a total aggregate estimated expenditure of $254,015,-238.29. Of this amount $200,721,146.06—including $74,691,001.24, which is statutory and therefore uncontrollable expenditure—is chargeable to Consolidated Fund, and $53,294,092.23 to Capital.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I am not prepared to go on and discuss this Bill at the present moment. Of course, it does not go to Committee, but there will be a third reading of it. We are asked to vote an enormous amount of money, but as I understand that there will be a further Supply Bill coming along later, I will reserve my remarks until that time. I presume that if I wish to discuss this Bill on the third reading my honourable friend will permit me to do so.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Inasmuch as this is a Supply Bill, which manifestly we cannot interfere with unless we reject it—and I fancy that, notwithstanding the very critical mind of my honourable friends opposite to-night, they do not propose to reject the Bill—I was about to move the suspension of the rule that it might be given a third reading. It is manifest that nothing can be said which will influence the Bill in any way unless my honourable friends are prepared to throw it out, and I do not think they are prepared to assume the responsibility of that action.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I do not know of any intention on this side of the House to attempt to throw out a Supply Bill; but when we are voting such large sums of money, and spending money in the way in which we are, possibly it would be in order for the Senate to express some opinion as to the condition of the country. But, as I understand that a further Supply Bill is coming up later, I am quite willing to agree to the request of the honourable the leader of the Government and allow the Bill to go through.

The motion was agreed to, and, certain rules having been suspended, the Bill was read the second and the third time and passed.

The Senate adjourned until Monday at three o'clock in the afternoon.

THE SENATE.

Monday, September 10, 1917.

The Senate met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

LT.-COL. H. ST. G. LINDSAY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the Government:

1. Does Lt.-Colonel H. St. George Lindsay receive any pay for the position he occupies in the Canadian militia, and what amount has he drawn on that account from his appointment to date?

2. During the same period, has he received any other remuneration? To what amount, and for what services?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: So far as the Department of Militia and Defence is concerned, the answer to questions Nos. 1 and 2 is: No.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE.

SUSPENSION OF RULES.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved:

That during the remainder of the session the Orders of the Day shall be called immediately after the calling of notices of inquiries and motions; that Rules 24a, paragraphs 5 and 6 of 19, be suspended in relation thereto.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I realize that the honourable the leader of the Government may wish to keep the control of the Orders of the Day in his hands, but I think it is hardly fair to ask the House that no inquiries and no motions for the production of papers be allowed to come before the Orders of the Day. I would call my honourable friend's attention to what is done in another place, where I think the rule is not so stringent with regard to these matters. On looking at the Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons—of the 18th of May, 1917, I find the following:

On motion of Sir Robert Borden, it was resolved, that on Monday, the 28th day of May, and on subsequent Mondays until the end of the session, Government notices of motion and Government orders shall have precedence after questions and notices of motion for the production of papers.

That gives any honourable gentleman an opportunity of asking the Government a question. I do not exactly understand the procedure with regard to a notice of motion for papers, but I presume that is a motion that is not discussed. I think the honourable gentleman should be willing to amend this motion to that extent, that inquiries shall come in their regular place on the Order Paper.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Under the rules of the House of Commons there is provision made for the submission of questions to the Government. We have nothing akin to that in this House. On the other hand, there is nothing in the House of Commons analogous to our proceeding known as "inquiries," which might possibly take up the whole afternoon, and this is the only thing that I ask should come after the Orders of the Day. If papers are wanted, they can be brought down on motion, or notice of motion given. I do not disturb the priority which those two items of business take, and there is no desire to suppress anything like an ordinary question.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: As I understand the motion, it would cut out the proceedings which we have just gone through on the Order Paper to-day.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It would put them after the Orders of the Day, that is all. Surely the Orders of the Day are more important than inquiries, important though inquiries may be. It is not intended to cut them out at all except to give precedence to the others.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I think there is a way to get out of the difficulty. I think that what the Government wants is to make Government measures the first Order of the Day. We could do that during the remainder of the session.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Under the rule Orders of the Day are entirely different from inquiries and motions and notices of inquiry. If my honourable friend means that the first order of business for the day, after the doors are opened, shall be the Orders of the Day, I am content.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: No, the honourable gentleman is too cute. What I mean is that the Orders of the Day are called there are some motions that have been postponed —take, for instance, the motion which I made the other day on the bilingual question. The debate was adjourned.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is on the Orders of the Day.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Yes, but what I understand the honourable gentleman wants is to have the Government measures brought up first, after the Orders of the Day are called.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I want them to take precedence of inquiries, not notices of inquiries and motions.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: If you take all the time for a government measure, when will we have time for an answer?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We will not take all the time for that.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Suppose I gave notice of motion for Thursday, that motion would never come.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is not disturbed. We only disturb inquiries.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Yes, you disturb any motion that may be made.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Notices of inquiries and motions, then Orders of the Day.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Will the honourable gentleman strike out the words "and motions"?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am willing that, after the calling of notices of inquiries, Orders of the Day shall be called.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: With the understanding that it does not interfere with motions. I want to make it clear. Do we understand that it gives motions precedence over the Orders of the Day.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, it only postpones inquiries.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: With that understandng I have no objection. I want to make a motion for the nomination of a committee.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: In order to be very clear—

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I take the word of the honourable gentleman. The more the honourable gentleman explains the more I am confused.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I will cease, then.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Just to illustrate, I give notice of motion to-day. The honourable leader of the Government says the Orders of the Day come before this. Well, if the Orders of the Day come before this they come before any motions that you will find on the paper.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We will couple notices of inquiries with motions.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: In the opinion of the honourable gentleman, the inquiries are struck out.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: Until after the Orders of the Day.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: But the motions come before?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: That is understood.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: That means that the orders of the Government will be the first Orders of the Day after inquiries and motions.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Notices of inquiries and motions.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: No, no; not after inquiries and motions—after notices.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: That is what I just said.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I think the motion should be changed.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: To satisfy my honourable friend, if he has any doubt, and if the House will permit an amendment, I will move that my motion be amended to read that the Orders of the Day shall come before inquiries.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Before inquiries? That will be too late for a motion.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No; because notices of inquiries and motions.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: But inquiries come before motions.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I have given my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Landry) a very wide range of choice.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: If I am given my choice let me choose. If Orders of the Day come before inquiries, they come before the thing which is after inquiries. And what follow inquiries? Motions.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Carried.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: No. I think we can come to an understanding. The honourable gentleman (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) gives me the privilege of making a choice. I am making it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: So that the House may understand what I mean, let me explain. Rule 19, as to order of business, remains as it is down to No. 4, namely, notices of inquiries and motions. I propose that we should then proceed with the Orders of the Day, and then, following the Orders of the Day, should come "Inquiries, motions," etc.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: That is all right.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Yes, I understand that; but I do not want that.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is simply a question whether inquiries and motions are more necessary than the business that really calls us together, that of putting through the Orders of the Day.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: There will be plenty of time for dealing with those. This motion is to change our rules.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, no; it is suspending them.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Carried.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Wait a minute. Honourable gentlemen ought to be a little more generous than that.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: We do not want to waste the afternoon on the question.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I do not want to waste the afternoon; I want to make the matter clear. I understand what it means. Of course, if the honourable minister (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) does not want to grant what I am asking, I will do without it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I will assist the honourable gentleman in any way I can.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: Do not suspend the rule until to-morrow.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What is it that the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Landry) wants?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I want our rules to remain as they are. I have given notice of an inquiry for the purpose of calling attention to a certain matter. I give that up, you see; but if I have a motion to make, I want to have a chance to make it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I will assist the honourable gentleman in that.

Hon. Mr. LAVERGNE: This motion is against our rules, and the proposal to defer any discussion of inquiries or motions until after the Orders of the Day is arbitrary. We have no further opportunity of making a motion or discussing it if inquiries and motions are placed after the Orders of the Day.

The motion was agreed to.

CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY ACQUISITION BILL.

DEBATE ON MOTION FOR SECOND READING AND PROPOSED AMENDMENT.

The Senate resumed from September 7 the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon.

Sir James Lougheed that Bill 125, an Act providing for the acquisition by His Majesty of the capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway company, be now read a second time, and the motion in amendmend of Hon. Mr. Bostock.

Hon. A. B. CROSBY: Honourable gentlemen, when I had the privilege adjourning this debate on Friday evening I had been discussing the principle and the policy involved in the Bill. From the statements made by the honourable leader of the Government in connection with the same and also the speeches made by the honourable gentleman from Kingston (Hon. Mr. Richardson), the honourable gentleman from Sydney (Hon. Mr. McLennan) and the honourable member for Wentworth (Hon. E. D. Smith), I feel that sufficient arguments have been advanced, if arguments were required after reading the Bill, to convince every honourable gentleman that no Bill has ever come before this House more entitled to the unanimous support of the members than the Bill now before us. We had decided that the principle and policy involved in the Bill were the principle and policy of stopping further payments to the Canadian Northern, and we had also decided that that was the only way to deal with this question. We had decided, by referring to the situation which exists throughout the Dominion of Canada, that the people would not be satisfied to give further aid to the Canadian Northern Railway company in order that they might keep their system in operation. We had decided also that one of the principles involved in the Bill was the question of equity, and that that matter should be arbitrated upon by the very best means which we could find in the Dominion of Canada. I am sure there is no honourable gentleman in this House who would deny that the Government have adopted the very best method of arbitration. They have named, as arbitrator to represent the Government, Chief Justice Meredith. The Government have provided that our arbitrator and the arbitrator to be appointed by the Canadian Northern shall confer, and, if they fail to agree upon the third arbitrator, his appointment shall be in the hands of the senior judge of the Exchequer Court of Canada.

If I have heard, in this House or anywhere else, a word in any way reflecting upon the method of this arbitration, or suggesting something better, it has been in the direction of saying that the matter should be referred to the Exchequer Court. Well, honourable gentlemen, if we give a judge of the Exchequer Court the opportunity of naming the third arbitrator, he may name himself. Thus would be removed the only complaint which has been made with regard to arbitration, if complaint has been made at all. But if the judge of the Exchequer Court does not name himself, he will nominate some other gentleman who, in his opinion, will be capable of filling the position probably as well as himself. So I say that is all that can be desired. We have decided also that, in the interest of this Dominion the road shall not be permitted to go into liquidation; that it would be disastrous to allow such a thing to occur; and therefore we must continue the road in proper operation, in order to maintain the traffic facilities which are essential to the best interest of the country, as well as to our overseas battalions and our Allies. An additional reason is in order that every man who is employed on that road shall continue his work as if nothing had happened, and in order that the $12,000,000 to $15,000,000 which are yearly paid to those men shall continue to be paid.

Then we come to discuss, more or less in detail, the other advantages that will come to the Dominion. Everybody who has been following this matter knows that all the provinces of Canada are interested in this Bill, and very many municipalities are interested. It has been said here by some honourable gentleman that the province of Quebec has not contributed anything in the way of subsidies or bonuses to the Canadian Northern railway. If that be so, the province of Quebec is much better off; but I do say here, and say it in the presence of honourable gentlemen representing that good old province, that the continuation and proper equipment of the Canadian Northern, as provided for in this Bill, are going to be of the greatest possible advantage to the province of Quebec as well as to the other provinces. Every province of Canada is interested in the question, as well as many municipalities. The provinces in the West are interested to a considerable degree. For what reason? Because in the West the branches of the Canadian Northern are of the very best; they go in all directions and provide facilities for the farmers and producers of that country equal to, if not greater than, those offered by the Canadian Pacific railway. Those products of the West are brought to the main line, and must be transported to the East. We shall be further interested when the railway is completed to Quebec and linked up with the other government railways. Honourable gentlemen understand, as I do, that when it is connected with the Transcontinental, communication will be established with the province of Nova Scotia, that old province by the sea. The people of the Maritime Provinces are very much interested in having this Bill go into effect. The honourable gentleman who, the other day, named me as the member of Cape Breton—perhaps the junior member for Cape Breton did me a very high honour indeed. He knows that I have lived in Halifax for some time and am a citizen of Halifax. He knows the Halifax and Southwestern railway, which by this Bill will be made to serve the province of Nova Scotia, and the great respect which we have for that road in the East. He knows, as every honourable gentleman knows who has followed the situation, that road has a very great financial interest in Nova Scotia and that it will get relief, in being taken over with the Canadian Northern system, and will be conducted to the satisfaction of the people of that province. Anything which will benefit the Halifax and Southwestern will be a benefit to the people. While there has been some complaint of that rotd not being as good as it ought to be. or not giving as good accommodation as it ought to give, I can assure you, honourable gentlemen, that the people of the province who are very much interested in it, will be greatly interested and pleased to hear that this whole system has been taken over by the Government of Canada.

Some have said, with regard to the management of the road, that it should be kept free of politics. If ever there was a time when the Government was out of politics in this respect it is to-day, and I defy any man who has followed the career of the present Minister of Railways to deny that if ever a man has made a strong and honest minister, and has succeeded in taking that road out of political influence, the honourable Minister of Railways is that man. There is not a man, I do not care from what part of the province of Nova Scotia or New Brunswick he comes, or even a man from the province of Quebec, who can say otherwise. There may have been, there may be, and there always will be, some matters of personal desire. There are always cases of men who think they are more competent to run a railway than somebody else. I have no doubt there are hundreds of men in the various provinces of this country who think they are very much better fitted for a seat in this Senate than many of the present members. So it is in all important matters, such as railway affairs. There are many men who claim to be more competent than the Minister of Railways; but I do say, without fear of contradiction, that the Minister of Railways has, by every possible means, in that honest, determined way of his, taken the Intercolonial and the other government railways out of the hands of politicians.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: Has the Minister of Railways succeeded in taking it out of politics?

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: That has nothing to do with the point I am trying to make; but he is doing the best he can, and I would ask the honourable gentleman if he does not feel that is the case. I do not think the minister has succeeded as he would desire to succeed, but he has gone a long way, he has taken the proper means, and he is going to succeed. There are no two ways with the honourable Minister of Railways and Canals, and no man can swing him from what he considers to be fair, honest, and just. Where can we find better evidence of his desire to take this road out of politics than his appointment of Mr. Brady to supervise the western part of the Transcontinental road? Every honourable gentleman in this House knows Mr. Brady though I am not competent to judge a railway man, I believe and I know that Mr. Brady is a very good railway official. But if the honourable minister had intended to allow political leverage to be used, he would not have appointed Mr. Brady to manage the Transcontinental. If the honourable Minister of Railways had wanted to leave the Intercolonial railway in politics he would have appointed a man with a political record when Mr. Gutelius, the late manager of the road, got an appointment elsewhere. I believe Mr. Gutelius is an excellent railway man, and I sometimes think it was perhaps a pity that he did not remain. But, from my information as to Mr. Hayes, he is an excellent man, and my honourable friend from Moncton (Hon. Mr. McSweeney) cannot say that Mr. Hayes has any politics; at least, I never heard anybody say that he knew what Mr. Hayes' politics were or that he had left a political record anywhere. Therefore it is reasonable and fair for us to assume that the honourable the Minister of Railways has taken the government railways out of politics as far as he has been able; and from what any of us know at the present time, there is no politics in the management of those railways.

In the splendid Island of Cape Breton, which I have the honour to represent here, and to which I feel incompetent to do justice, there is great need for railway construction. We have a road there running from St. Peters to Inverness which I understood to be part and parcel of this system, but which I have not heard mentioned in that connection. If it is not a part and parcel of this system I hope it will be made so, because it is necessary for binding up that beautiful country on the northeastern side of the Island of Cape Breton, a country that is exceedingly fertile, and at present has no way of getting its products to the markets at certain seasons of the year. Then, the Orangedale road must be constructed when the war is over to give the people in that part of our province the accommodation they have been so long deprived of. Then, the road from St. Peters to Louisburg should be taken over and built, and no doubt will be taken up in the nationalization of this great system, for we feel that those places in the eastern as well as in the western part of this Dominion should have branches and get the assistance they require, and which must be given in order to make our transportation system a success. Then, there is the road from Halifax to Musquodoboit and from there to Guysborough, and on to the strait of Canso, joining again the Intercolonial. These feeders east and feeders west are of great advantage to the railway.

Our people are looking to see this Act put through, because they feel that they can depend upon the Government of this country, but not always upon the corporations. The last thing the Liberals should do, in this House or any where else, is to talk about railways, for they cannot point to a single case in which they have carried a railway to success. In the first place, we know their attitude towards the Canadian Pacific railway, and we need not elaborate what that railway has done. They have been opposed to everything in the line of railways. In 1903 they came along and said they were going to give us a transcontinental railway. The leader of the Opposition in this House asked the other day for more information about the roads mentioned in this Bill. The discussion has been going on for months, yet he does not seem to know anything about it, and asks us to lay some information before him, and give him the resolution incorporating this company. But what did my honourable friend from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) say when they were putting through the Transcontinental scheme? He said: "We don't want any information; we are not looking for information; this is the time when we must act; what information do you want when the Grand Trunk Railway company is liable for everything? This is not a contract with the Grand Trunk Pacific; it is a contract with the Grand Trunk." I would like my honourable friend to look up that speech and find what he had to say about the situation, and then ask anybody to take his advice on contracts or on railway matters of any description. The Liberal party in this country should not for a moment attempt to interfere with any railway legislation, because they have always been wrong in regard to that or any other national project. On the other hand, the Conservative party never was wrong in connection with any great national undertaking, as history will prove, for the facts are there. We have honourable gentlemen, on the other side of the House telling us we should be careful and look into this matter; but we find that in connection with the Transcontinental railway they said the very opposite. Their position then was: "This is not the time to wait, to consider; you must not say anything, but go along with the scheme; we don't know anything about the railway, but we will plunge into it;" and the situation you have to-day sadly shows the result of that attitude. The honourable member for De Salaberry told this House that the Transcontinental railway could not cost this country more than $15,000,000, and that there was no possibility that the construction of that line and the Grand Trunk Pacific could cost Canada a single dollar more than $30,000,000. Yet now we are paying $13,000,000 a year in deficits on the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental, the deficit on the latter alone being $6,000,000 or $7,000,000, without regard to the original cost of $200,000,000. That is the situation in which we find ourselves. Yet you have honourable gentlemen who were connected with those railway projects trying to tell us in this House what we should do in railway matters. I think that whatever they discuss they should never deal with railway matters.

I had hoped, before concluding my speech on Friday night, to have put some questions to the honourable gentlemen who are not here, as I should like to get their answers; but I must conclude without having that opportunity. I assert that the whole Dominion is benefited by the method of taking over the Canadian Northern system which is proposed in this Bill. It is the only way in which we could take it over. Whatever may be done in the future in connection with this road is being allowed to stand, and what we are doing to-day is just for this particular time, because we could not prorogue this House without making provision in some form for the Canadian Northern, or that system would have gone into liquidation. Every schoolboy from the country knows that. Therefore I say we could not let it go. I would ask any man who will speak on this subject, to suggest some other better way in which provision could be made than the one we have adopted. In adopting this plan, the Government has not decided for the future at all, but simply for the time being; and the Government which comes in and takes charge of affairs after the election, which must take place very soon, would have the opportunity and the responsibility of settling a policy and arranging a way by which this can be carried out. I do not think there could be anything fairer or more honest done in connection with such a large and important problem, and one in which this country is so much interested. Canada is interested doubly and trebly in having this road continued for the benefit of the people of Canada, the plain people, who are entitled to the consideration of this Parliament; because not only has the Dominion advanced money and granted land to the Canadian Northern system, but every province in the Dominion is involved, and municipalities from one end of the Dominion to the other are interested, many of them having given free right of way for the construction of this road through their lands. But I believe that the people of this country are getting the very best consideration of this Parliament under this Bill which we are about to put through.

Hon. W. C. EDWARDS: I feel compelled to say a few words on this subject. Perhaps I occupy a position different from that of several members who sit here, and if the conclusions at which I arrive may be somewhat divergent from those of the honourable gentlemen with whom I generally co-operate, I believe I shall be able to give fairly good reasons for them. One thing I wish to say at once that the matter to which I have referred does not in the slightest degree affect my judgment on this question, as I believe that my conclusions are in the best interest of the people of Canada, regardless of any institution whatsoever.

The question with which we are unfortunately confronted is probably the most difficult which Canada has ever experienced excepting that of the great war in which she is now engaged. There is no question of doubt whatever that Canada has overbuilt in railways, and the great question now is, what are we going to do in the matter? My judgment is that there should be a great limitation of existing lines. Canada has duplicated her railway building in a manner not at all in the interests of the country, but in a such way as very seriously to overburden the present and perhaps the future of the country. Each party is disposed to blame the other for the present condition. So far as I am concerned, I blame the people of Canada themselves; they far overestimated their possibilities. If the governments of Canada had known the country east of the Great Lakes as I know it—for I do know it—those railroads, or a great portion of them, never would have been built. Honourable gentlemen may think that I do not speak with any authority as to knowledge of the country; but my firm has explored almost the entire country from Behring Strait to the Albany river. My firm spent three winters and a large amount of money in exploring Labrador and Ungava, supposing of course that it belonged to Newfoundland, though we found ultimately that it belonged largely to the province of Quebec. We have explored every river from Behring strait to this end of the island of Anticosti. From that portion to the Rouge river we know thoroughly what the country is, though we have not made an actual exploration of it. From that portion to the Albany river we have explored the entire country; and I want to show you briefly how the people of Canada are misled as to a great part of its possessions, or supposed possessions, and also to show you something of the value of government reports on which our various Governments act. The Dominion Government explored the Albany river for mineral purposes, and at the same time reported that there was a vast amount of spruce and other timber suitable for pulpwood purposes. The Ontario Government made a special survey of that country, and the report is in the archives of the province of Ontario, to the effect that there are 300,000,000 cords of pulpwood upon that river. Just figure what that means when I tell you that a 100-ton pulp mill requires some 30,000 tons of pulpwood annually for its operations. Upon reading the report of the Ontario Government and believing that this might be a very fruitful field for pulpwood operations, we explored the river right down to James bay, and what did we find? On the fringe of the river there was a considerable growth. Our men—and I may say they were the very best explorers on the Ottawa river—travelled 20 miles inland every 10 miles for the entire length of the river, and just a few acres back from the banks of the river, there was no pulpwood at all. They found the country valueless for any purpose whatever. They had guns with them, but they never saw a bird to shoot. It is evident that previous explorers never went any distance out of their canoes, that they simply multiplied the area of the small fringe on the river by the large area of that country, and thereby arrived at the conclusion that there were 300,000,000 cords of pulpwood on the territory. It is consequent upon such reports as this that the country has such an erroneous idea of the value of its assets. I merely give this instance to show that that country north of the Ottawa and St. Lawrence rivers is enormously overestimated, and that no railway should ever have been built in that portion of Canada.

Now, in dealing with the history of Canadian railways, we have first the Grand Trunk railway. The Grand Trunk was the first great railway built in Canada. It was built at the expense of British investors, and Canada put but a comparatively small sum into its construction. The old original Grand Trunk railway is not in the position of the railways generally in Canada.

Every one knows the history of the Intercolonial railway: it was built with public money and is owned by the Dominion of Canada. The Canadian Pacific railway, like most other railways in Canada, has been built by means of land grants and other assistance, financial or otherwise, from the Dominion Government. Generally speaking, the Canadian Government or the provinces of Canada fix the basis of credit on which railways are built; and if any more are built this must be the case, because this country, with its sparse population, does not render it possible that private capital can for a long time to come engage in the building of railways in Canada. The Canada Atlantic was the next railroad, and it occupied a rather peculiar position. One man, John R. Booth, built that road, which is four hundred miles long, with his own capital and on his own credit. He afterwards sold it to the Grand Trunk Railway company. It occupies an exceptional position, and there is no parallel for it on the continent, except possibly a road built in Virginia by Mr. Rogers, vice-president of the Standard Oil company. Next come the Grand Trunk Pacific and the National Transcontinental. Every one knows how those two roads were built. The Government owns the National Transcontinental; the Grand Trunk company is behind the Grand Trunk Pacific, guaranteeing its securities, and so forth.

Now comes the Canadian Northern. There has been a good deal of discussion here as to whether the common stock of that company is the result of investment of money on the part of the individuals who built the road. Every one knows that that was impossible, and that the basis on which this road was built was the guarantees and aids of the various provinces, and of the Dominion of Canada herself, and a certain amount of money borrowed by the promoters in the British market without any guarantees. The inception of that road was in Manitoba. The two gentlemen engaged in building it were contractors in the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway, and finally entered into railway undertakings themselves. They built their first road under a charter that had existed for many years, with a grant of land attached to it. No one had undertaken the construction of the road. These two gentlemen finally undertook the construction, and that was the beginning of what is now called the Canadian Northern railway system. Manitoba guaranteed the bonds of the road for a very considerable sum—honourable gentleman all have the figures—which enabled them to finance the construction of the road. These gentlemen extended their operations to the other two western provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan under similar conditions, each of those provinces guaranteeing their bonds. If those gentlemen had confined themselves to the operation of those railways in the three western provinces, they would be the greatest railway men in the world today, and would have been men of fabulous wealth; but they conceived the idea of building east and west from the prairie provinces, and of finally having a transcontinental line. This ambition was gratified, first by the Government of British Columbia, and afterwards by the Dominion Government.

The Grand Trunk Railway company committed a fatal error in entering into arrangements for the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and entering into a contract for the leasing of the Transcontinental line; and the Canadian Northern made a mistake owing to the ambition of those two gentlemen, and that is the real reason why we are discussing this question here to-day. Again I say the people of Canada are primarily to blame. Both Governments, the present Government and the former Government, are to blame in not having a proper realization of the resources of this country. If they had such a realization, these roads would never have been built. But they have been built, and we have to deal with this very knotty and very difficult question.

Now, the Grand Trunk Railway company has repudiated its contract for the leasing and operation of the Transcontinental; but it is yet, of course, bound to maintain, if it can, the Grand Trunk Pacific. The Canadian Northern, with the carrying out of the construction of the eastern and western lines in 1914, found itself embarrassed and approached the Government to obtain the sum of $45,000,000 as an advance, or aid. A very considerable discussion took place at the time, but finally their wishes were acceded to, and aid to the extent of $45,000,000 was granted to them. Honourable gentlemen must perceive that this grant would possibly have seen that road through to the finish but for the financial condition almost immediately thereafter brought about in consequence of the declaration of war. It became impossible for the company to dispose of the securities which the Government had endorsed for them, and they were obliged to come back to the Government and deposit some of the securities and obtain $10,000,000. This circumstance shows that the general lending markets of the world were closed to them. The very considerable amount of money which Sir William Mackenzie was able to borrow in the British market without any security at all shows what an adept that gentleman must be in the matter of borrowing funds, and this guarantee of $45,000,000 would have enlarged those borrowing powers—but for the reason which I have given. The breaking out of the war curtailed at once all possibility in that direction. No one conceiving what a very large operation this is can feel otherwise or be at all surprised that the company finds itself in the difficulties which I have named, and for the reasons which I have given. Of course, both the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk railways were knocking at the doors of Parliament for further aid; and in 1915 the Canadian Northern returned and obtained further assistance from this Government to the extent of $15,000,000. I am not in the secret of the Government, nor of the Canadian Northern. I am speaking as an independent Canadian, just as the rest of honourable gentlemen are.

The Government then perceived, and perceived perhaps more forcibly, that something would have to be done with regard to these two railways. This was a very difficult question to deal with, and the determination of the Government was to appoint a commission to investigate the general railway situation in Canada and report thereon. That report you have in your hands, honourable gentlemen. It is not necessary for me to say very much pertaining thereto. I am sure that honourable gentlemen have read it. Three gentlemen were appointed—an English railway man, the Chairman of our own Railway Commission, and Mr. Smith of the New York Central lines. You will observe that they differed in their conclusions. The majority report suggests the taking over of the entire Grand Trunk Pacific, and also the Canadian Northern. Mr. Smith, in his minority report, does not go so far. He suggests certain changes in so far as a part of each road is concerned. He suggests that, if the Canadian Northern is put in the position again of having the prairie provinces to operate in, it can get along. He suggests that some interchange be made so far as the Grand Trunk railway is concerned—that the Government take over a portion of it, and leave a large portion of the road in the hands of the company. No doubt the Government has carefully weighed the two reports, and the conclusion is practically this: nationalization of the two great systems, beginning with the Canadian Northern; and as a consequence, honourable gentlemen, you have before you this Bill. To me personally, at first sight it would seem a desirable thing that the Canadian Pacific Railway company should become the owners not only of the Canadian Northern railway but also of the Grand Trunk Pacific system. A great saving would accrue to the entire people of Canada if the railway mileage of the country were much lessened. Our entire railway operations would be carried on much more economically, the people would be better served, and conditions generally would be better. The Canadian Pacific is unquestionably a great railroad and well managed, a credit to the proprietors and a credit to the Dominion of Canada. The Canadian Pacific being such a strong organization, there is to my mind no question about the advantage that would result from its taking over the Canadian Northern. Most people think it would do away with competition. However, the idea of the advantage of competition is a mere fallacy. We have no such thing in Canada as railway competition except in slight and remote instances. Now, under an efficient railway board such as we have, the rates would be regulated and great economies would accrue to the people of the country.

But consider the question a little further. What a gigantic institution the Canadian Pacific railway would be if it absorbed the other two systems. It would practically become the Government of Canada.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: It is now.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: It would actually own Canada and would therefore be a mistake. What is the situation? We are, in my opinion, in this difficult position, that, while government ownership may seem, theoretically, to be desirable, it has been found in Canada, by our experience with the Intercolonial, that government ownership is a mistake. I believe also, for the reason which I have already given, that the centralization of the three railways under one management would also be a mistake.

Under the peculiar circumstances and conditions, honourable gentlemen, what are we to do? If it is possible to consummate such an arrangement as would remove the operations of this road absolutely from political considerations or influence, then perhaps Government acquisition of the road may be under the circumstances the best thing. That is what is now suggested—that five men, I think, shall be appointed, representing various interests, who are to become the Dominion Railway Board. Is not that the name of the proposed body? If that can be accomplished and if political influence can be entirely and absolutely eliminated, it is, after all, what may be best to do.

We now come to the question of the taking over of this railway. I have read the Act carefully several times and have read of all the proposals that have been suggested, and it is quite true, I suppose, that the Canadian Government could step in and take possession of the Canadian Northern system; but to do so, I have no doubt, would involve a great many legal and technical difficulties. It appears to me that the simpler and better way, the way by which a large saving would be effected for the people of this country, is to adopt the means suggested, namely, to become possessed of the balance of the common stock.

If there is one thing for which I blame my own friends it is this: they have kept finding fault with what the Government suggests, but they have not offered a single alternative. They have not offered any suggestions, so far as I have been able to see, as to what might be done instead of that which is being done, with the exception of the suggestion that the Government might forcibly dispossess the gentlemen who are now in control and itself take possession of the railway.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Liquidation has been suggested.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: Liquidation, or placing the matter in the hands of a receiver, would be a slow, tedious and expensive operation, and my opinion is that any sum which these gentlemen may get under arbitration would be small as compared with the loss to this country in the expenses entailed by the other process.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: If the honourable gentleman will permit me, may I point out that the right honourable leader of the Opposition in the other House has distinctly said that he is opposed to liquidation.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: The honourable gentleman refers to my leader in the other House. I have no leader anywhere.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I hope the honourable gentleman has some followers.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: Well, no. As a rule, people do not accept my views to-day, but in a few years hence they will.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: My honourable friend misunderstands me. I understood that the honourable gentleman from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt) suggested liquidation. I did not understand my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Edwards) to be in favour of liquidation. The right honourable leader of the Opposition in the other House is against liquidation.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My honourable friend is mistaken. I did not suggest anything. When the honourable gentleman who is now speaking stated that no other suggestion had been made by anybody, I reminded him that liquidation had been suggested. As to the other statement, made by the honourable gentleman from Pictou (Hon. Mr. Tanner), I think he is quite wrong. I do not think the leader of the Opposition in the other House has ever stated what my honourable friend says he did state.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: My honourable friend is absolutely incorrect, because if he reads the debate he will see that Right Honourable Sir Wilfrid Laurier has distinctly given his judgment against a receivership.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Go on with your speech.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: I have stated that, in the building of railways, excepting the two instances which I have named, the people of this country furnish the means or the credit by which our railways are built, and the common stock of a railway which may not be valuable to-day may have a very large prospective value. The Canadian Pacific Railway company authorized the issuance of a large amount of common stock. The gentlemen who built that road were not men of wealth; they were not men who had private means to put into the construction of a railway, and they did not do so. Their whole financing was on that which was afforded them by the Dominion Government and what further financing they could do, based on the Government's assistance. The common stock when issued did not represent any capital put into the construction—none whatever. But some time after the road was in operation they issued that stock, I think, at about 25 cents. Am I right in that?

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: Twenty cents.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: Twenty cents; and the large fortunes which were made out of that construction were made by that means. The president of the road at that time, and until he became engaged in the St. Paul-Manitoba road, was an ordinary merchant in Montreal, and not at all wealthy. He became a very rich man, so rich that he was able to buy an estate in England and has lived there ever since. All the other gentlemen engaged in that construction became wealthy, but, as I have stated, not out of the construction of the road, but out of the accrued value of the common stock after the road was built. In this instance it is suggested that Mackenzie and Mann might perhaps be accorded some of the common stock. That is suggested in the majority report on the inquiry into the railway situation. It has also been suggested in this House and in the other House. If Mackenzie and Mann were to participate in the management and operation of the road, that, I think—althought I do not know, but am speaking from my own standpoint—might occur to them as being reasonable. But they are to be dissociated entirely from the operation and management of the road. Therefore a more absurd proposition could not be made.

It is granted that the Canadian Northern is the most cheaply built of the three railroads in Canada. It is conceded that it is the best located road. It is conceded that in Manitoba and the other western provinces the Canadian Northern is provided with the most useful and the greatest number of feeders. These gentlemen have devoted the best of their lives to the construction of the work which is now to be taken over by Canada and to become part of Canada's possessions.

It is shown by the balance-sheet that there is an actual surplus to-day, apart from the question of the value of the stock, which I admit has not at present a market value. But the stock has a prospective value, and I am firmly of the belief that the future will determine that.

Two courses are open to-day: either that Parliament should adjudicate on the question and say that the owners of the company shall get a certain amount, if anything, or that the question shall be left to an independent arbitration. In my humble opinion, an arbitration by an independent party outside of Parliament is the best thing to have. A question that was very much discussed in another place was the character of the Government representative upon the arbitration board. My humble opinion is that there is the weakest part of the whole proposition, so far as the interests of Mackenzie and Mann are concerned, because that gentleman, while ranked as a Conservative, is not a Conservative and was not when he was leader of the Opposition in the Ontario legislature. He is a radical of the most extreme character, bordering on socialism, and if I were in the position of Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann, I would be decidedly afraid of the results so far as that gentleman is concerned. I think that if an injustice is done to Mackenzie and Mann, it is by that appointment. What are the conditions in Ontario to-day? Ontario has followed the lead given by that gentleman when he was leader of the Opposition in the Ontario House. The whole Government system of Ontario to-day is socialistic, highly radical. It is not Conservative at all. The Liberal party, if they were wise, would constitute themselves the Conservative party in Ontario.

I am convinced, honourable gentlemen, that the taking over of the Canadian Northern, as has been suggested, would be in conformity with the wishes of the entire population west of this city; it would be entirely in conformity with the views of the people of Ontario and the four western provinces, because those provinces are all more or less socialistic and radical in character. But in the province of Quebec another condition prevails. That is an old, staid, careful, conservative province. It is governed by a Liberal Government, but at the same time it is a conservative, judicial and careful government. No such radical ideas would be entertained for one moment in the province of Quebec as prevail in Ontario and the western provinces; and I suppose that farther east a condition prevails similar to that in the province of Quebec; people down in that direction have more common sense. But the farther west you go, the more prevalent you will find the idea of public ownership and other socialistic principles. My firm conviction is that the majority of the people of this country will be in accord with the action of the Government in taking over the Canadian Northern Railway system, and eventually nationalizing the Grand Trunk Pacific, and there is no doubt that the Government will have to go a step further and nationalize also the Canadian Pacific railway. There can be no other outcome, whether we like it or not. I am not one of those who like it, and I frankly say so; but the die is cast, honourable gentlemen, and it is now determined, without any doubt, that all the roads of this country shall be nationalized and operated by the Government. I admit that good results may accrue, if political considerations can be kept out.

If government ownership had been the condition from the first, do you suppose, honourable gentlemen, that we should have had the unnecessary duplication of roads which we now find all over this country? Do you suppose that there would be three lines from Belleville to Toronto? Do you suppose there would be the present number of roads between Ottawa and Montreal? That condition prevails all over Canada simply because of the private building of roads, each company aiming to get the traffic in its district. The multiplication of railways over this country is a very great detriment indeed.

In England to-day, as I understand it, the railroads are practically under government control and there is a co-ordination among the various railways. I understand that in the United States also there is an arrangement of a similar character amongst the presidents of the different lines, and there is a good deal of co-operation.

I speak, honourable gentlemen, with very great difficulty. I have a trouble which makes it very difficult for me to speak, and I would not have spoken on this occasion at all but for the peculiar position which I occupy. I want to give reasons why I am acting as I do on this occasion.

The Dominion Government became part and parcel of this road in 1914, when they took over some $40,000,000 of its stock. At that time I thought it was a mistake for the Government to do so. I do not know the reason why it was done, but having done so, it is really a partner to-day in the ownership of this road. I want to ask honourable gentlemen if it would be a fair proposition on the part of the Dominion Government, being a partner in the ownership of this road, to deprive the men who have borne the brunt of the construction and carrying on of this work without any consideration whatever? I have not heard that proposition denied; all who have spoken, both commoners and senators, say they think Mackenzie and Mann should receive some consideration. and the important question is how that should be decided. There are only two methods, decision by Parliament or decision by arbitration. I believe that arbitration is the fairer system. I know nothing of and have not the remotest idea as to the expectations of Mackenzie and Mann. They may get nothing at all, or they may get something; it will be for the arbitrators to decide. An arbitrator will be chosen on the part of the Government, one on the part of the custodians or owners of the stock, and the third will be named by those two, or by the Exchequer Court in case of their disagreement. The decision of the arbitrators must be unanimous; if not, the question must be referred to the Supreme Court. To my mind there can be nothing fairer; and, as no suggestion of an alternative proposition has been made, I feel absolutely constrained to support the measure which is proposed by the Government.

Hon. WILLIAM ROCHE: A gentleman experienced in finance once told me the cardinal principles of high finance. He said: "First, get as many people as possible interested in your project; make it as large as you can. In the next place, get as large a commission as you can. Then, try to defer the payments as long as you can. Then, when you cannot defer them any longer, shuffle the whole thing off on the other fellow." Let us see whether any of those principles of high finance may be found in this project.

I listened very attentively to the honourable leader of the Government when he proposed this measure. He had none of his jocund and optimistic manner with which he usually presents Government measures and I may say that no person can present a more attractive display when he has the goods; but on this occasion my friend was entirely dolorous, quite clearly, and he stated the alternative to be liquidation or the Government proposal. The gentlemen who have spoken on the other side followed along those lines. There was an admission, almost—not in words, but in manner—that if this proposal were to be entered into by themselves privately, they would have nothing to do with it. Secondly, we could gather that if the Government were not embarrassed and encumbered already by what they had done, they would not support the measure for the giving of further aid or the wasting of further money. It was all Pandora's box: all the ills escaped, with only hope at the bottom; and it was the hope that in the future it may turn out better—that something may turn up in remote time which will make it profitable and reimburse the country for the money it has expended. My honourable friend who spoke this afternoon (Hon. Mr. Edwards) has caught the emotion.

It occurs to me that those gentlemen all founded their views upon the record of the Canadian Pacific railway; that was what ran through all their observations and was the foundation of their hope. That is, there had been diffidence expressed at the outset as to the profitableness of the Canadian Pacific railway, and that was falsified, and they hoped that for this railway in the future the same conditions might prevail, and that this one might turn out profitable and recoup the Government for the money. Now, let us look at the circumstances of the Canadian Pacific railway; we all remember them, because those events occurred within our own observation. The Canadian Pacific railway was commenced at a time when there was a lull in the war-fever of Europe. Wars had ceased, and the nations were convinced that they would not recur for a considerable period; that the time had arrived when commercial enterprises might be embarked in with safety; that it was time for the capital which had been held up in view of the possible event of war, to be embarked in commercial enterprises. That railway was undertaken about the era of the return of good times in Canada. Everybody was hopeful, everybody was optimistic; the Canadian Pacific had the favour of a large number of capitalists in Montreal and throughout the country; it had the support of the banks and moneyed institutions. It had the hopes of the people of Canada, because for a long time writers in the press and writers of pamphlets and of books, as well as public sentiment generally, favoured union of the whole of British North America, and that the union should be consummated and the settlement of the provinces in the Northwest should be effected through the connection by a trancontinental railway. The British Government favoured it. The British people favoured it, for they saw for this railway a mode of transit from the East to the West, a connecting link from their Asiatic possessions over the northern continent to England and Europe. So that there were many considerations that favoured the construction and success of the Canadian Pacific railway. It then received from the Government all the stock and material which had been used by Government effort previous to the railroad being attempted by the corporation. It had also a gift of money. What has made the Canadian Pacific railway successful in addition to its traffic returns, in addition to its business, was that, first of all, it had cheap money, because a large accumulation of capital was let loose at a low rate of interest. It had also an immense amount of cheap labour, which was then at a far lower point than it has been at since then. But, above all, and the culmination of all, was that it was granted a large block of the best prairie lands, which were brought into cultivation, and which sold at increasing prices, from $2.50 an acre up to the price reached at the present time. It was through the continuous influx of money from the sale of this government land which was handed over to them that the Canadian Pacific railway was enabled to meet its financial obligations, to establish a good credit, and to become the successful institution which it is at present.

But what is this Canadian Northern railway? It was started in Manitoba. It went a considerable distance. It became a local road. But when the Government started the Grand Trunk Pacific line and it became probable that line should be carried through the provinces and reach the ocean, then the builders of the Canadian Northern began to expand and take on quixotic notions. Then they began to be optimistic far beyond their means and resources, and they used, and were intending to use, that road in opposition to the government road for their own profit. They intended to be its rivals; they intended to cut out, forestall, monopolize, all opportunities in opposition to the government railway. Therefore what sentimental right have they to come before this Parliament? Because the former Government represented the people of this country. What right have they to come before the Commons and Senate of Canada and ask aid in an enterprise which was intended to impoverish absolutely the Canadian Government's projected railway? Now, we know that either of those gentlemen, for whom I entertain the highest respect, or some people representing them, would go to one of the municipalities or towns and confer with some member of the town council perhaps. They would tell them that the managers of this road had seen with a great deal of interest this flourishing town of A, and intended to run a branch or the main line in the immediate vicinity or through this town, but that those benevolent intentions were somewhat frustrated by the fact that the right-hand town had promised a large bonus to the railway, and in the interests of the railway,—knowing that the land of that town was a little better that the land in A, and they always required money for the execution of their projects,—they might be compelled, notwithstanding their good will for the town of A, to go over and carry the railway extension work a little over to the right-hand town. Shortly after that, the theodolite would appear in the town and locate the railway at almost every citizen's back door; and in proximity to the town, where the town lots were eligible and select, a very large station would be located, quite near enough to the main walks of the town for the young ladies to promenade in the evening and see the incoming trains. Of course, this was startling. All the prospects of the town of A faded away; the right-hand town, its rival, was to come into prominence through the extension of the Canadian Northern. The town council was summoned. A bonus was immediately proposed. It passed the town council without a dissenting voice. Then a public meeting was called. The town council was present, the mayor presiding. A gentleman who was in the town council, and a prospective condidate for the legislature, come into the public meeting and proposed that a bonus should be given by the town of A, and that considerable portion of land outside, that was only fit for habitation by the coyotes and other animals up there, might be voted to this railway. The other candidate for the legislature, who might be supposed to have a counter-project, was invited to second the resolution, and it passed unanimously amidst the greatest applause, that the town of A should bonus the railway and donate a large portion of land for the extension so as to make the town of A a rival of Winnipeg or any of the other great cities. Perhaps some young man in the audience would perk up and ask: "Oh, but what will the taxation be after all this? When the bonus and bonus interest have to be paid, what will be the taxation on the town of A?" He was immediately hustled out, and a number of gentlemen got around him and put him a considerable distance from the meeting, and, when they returned, a vote of thanks was passed to the mayor, and the whole thing was consummated. The next day, perhaps, the tax-collector would go down to the poor man who asked about the taxation, and thrust in his hand a bill for last year's taxes and perhaps he had to go to jail for non-payment of them. But the whole thing was consummated, and the town of A has a connection with a transcontinental line. That was the history all over the country. Those municipalities voted bonuses and voted land; the provinces voted bonuses and voted land; and here we are with all those encumbrances on the transcontinental railway; and, like Oliver Twist, they come back asking for more. The first request that was made to the Parliament of Canada was for $15,000,000; I think I am correct in saying that that sum preceded the $45,000,000. That was thought not to be a very large sum. The revenue of Canada at that time was buoyant and expansive, and there was apparently no limit to the sums that could be taken from the revenue; the resources of Canada were great, and $15,000,000 was not supposed to be a large sum, relatively, at that time So the vote for $15,000,000 was passed. Those who voted that—I believe I was of the number myself—thought: "This disagreable matter is ended; those gentlemen are assisted; the railway will go on, and everybody will be satisfied, and Canada will not suffer injury." It was not esteemed to be a very important matter. But it was thought to be a finality. The next proposal that came was for $45,000,000, and that was a serious matter. The $45,000,000 was then secured, the Government taking a mortgage which was to be foreclosed in case of default, or, at their option, and this apparently secured the continuous operation of the road, and also the expectation that there would be no more coming to Parliament for assistance. Then, again, there was $10,000,000 more. Now, where is the assurance and guarantee that this is a finality? Where is there any promise of that kind? When this money is expended is there any guarantee that these gentlemen will not go on infinitely until all patience is exhausted and all funds are exhausted? The question arises, can the present management carry on this road? It will be remembered that no Government guarantee of bonds or of stock or of assets will be available. The situation of this road is that cash must be had for payment. The running expense must be paid in cash; the salaries of the officials must be paid in cash; the repairs to the rolling stock of the road must be paid for in cash. Those who furnish the cars and locomotives must now be paid in cash, because they will not trust a road under these embarrassing conditions. The equipment and also the upkeep of this road must be paid for in cash. Traffic must go on in order to meet the bond interest. That traffic must be conducted in the winter time, and the upkeep of a road, constructed as it has been, must be kept up at a large expense and paid for in cash. The interest keeps steadily on; there is no let up to it. The money must be had, and all this must be available money—not promises, not guarantees, not assistance of any kind; but cash, to meet these obligations. The debts of the road must be paid, whether they are on the branch roads or on the main road. They must be paid in cash, because now that the road has got government assistance, the money is in hand and the creditors must have it.

Where is the Canadian Northern to get this assistance? It cannot get assistance in England. The money market is now bare; assistance will not be given to railroads in remote countries. England can no longer pay her obligations in gold. An enterprise like this cannot obtain from the public a large sum of money to help it when they are floundering and struggling. It is quite possible that the bondholders, if their bonds are not pledged, might meet together and consolidate them and raise a small amount of money on them, if they chose to continue the road—if they did not wish to dispose of it altogether by saying "We have lost it."

Another question arises: are the bonds of the Canadian Northern now in England? A large quantity of stock and bonds were sent to the United States and money raised upon them. A large amount of the stock of the Canadian Pacific railway company was sent to New York, and was there used as a means of liquidating the balance which was owed by England for munitions and provisions for the army. Now, if the stock is found by this valuation board to be of little or no value, all they will get is a very small amount of money. They will not have money to pay the debt, to run the road, to get equipment, to pay the salaries, and they will be more embarrassed than if they had got no assistance whatever. All this points to the fact that there will be very strong inducements to bolsters up the value of the stock. These people must get at least $25,000,000 out of this stock before they will be able to pay the obligations which have been enumerated; therefore their idea will be that they should get a sufficient amount to wipe off all those obligations and give them a clean sheet. Let us try to figure for ourselves what this appraisement and valuation is going to be. Who will come before the appraisers? Surely the representatives of the Canadian Northern will be very keen to get every dollar that they possibly can out of this arrangement. They will have the best of counsel; I think they have them now. They will have the most astute manipulators; they will have experts who will be able to prove to a demonstration that this stock is worth par; they will have railroad managers and others who will prove that the prospects of the road are excellent; they will quote the speeches of our optimistic friends in Parliament to show that the possibilities of the railroad are immense; they will quote the example of the Canadian Pacific railway; and the orations of my honourable friend from Rideau (Hon. Mr. Edwards) will be brought into court, and every dollar's worth of this optimism will go into this award to the Canadian Northern. If they do not get 50 cents on the dollar out of this stock, all the benevolent Government interventions will be utterly nullified, and of no avail to them, it will be a positive injury to them. They must get a large amount in order to make the project successful, and every means will be taken to avail themselves of every resource to swell the magnitude of the sum of money which they are to get. Furthermore, the sympathy of the public will be with them. The Government will go complacently into this arbitration. It will not be severe with these men, or, as my honourable friend from Rideau (Hon. Mr. Edwards) stated in his panegyric this afternoon, any one who oppose dealing generously with these men by arbitration will be looked upon as an injurer; and it will be a difficult matter for the Government, even if it were so disposed, to bring that arbitration down to the level where it ought to be. Who has given any assurance that Mackenzie and Mann or the Canadian Northern will be satisfied with the maximum that has been put upon the stock? Will they be content with $8,000,000 or $10,000,000, or whatever has been fixed? No, they will go into the arbitration to win, and win they will, and this country will very probably, have to pay a large sum of money in order to acquire this stock.

Now, I should like to commend this observation to the mature judgment of honourable gentlemen opposite. Aid has been given to the Canadian Northern. How many more aids will they require? Does the situation of the country warrant that the Government should go on and on, and on and on, because, when they have once committed themselves, and when these trammels are around, when they must give more and more money to make this enterprise successful, the finances of this country will be embarrassed by the fact that they have committed themselves to and taken upon their shoulders the financing or the working of this railway.

I should like to say that I do not think a receivership is so very bad a proposition as an alternative. Let us look at it. My honourable friend who spoke the other day pointed out that 72 per cent of the railroads of the United States had been in the hands of receivers. I think the Erie railroad has been in the hands of the receiver. I think the Pennsylvania, or at least a subsidiary company, the Philadelphia and Reading company, has been in liquidation. The Union Pacific has been in liquidation. Many other railroads have been in liquidation. Some have delivered themselves, and some will continue in liquidation. What about the Great Northern railway? What about the Inverness railway? They have gone into liquidation. If one portion of the Mackenzie and Mann system goes into liquidation, what great harm would it do? What obloquy, what disgrace to Canada, or to her enterprises, if other portions of the Canadian Northern go into liquidation?

Some honourable gentlemen have contended that this railroad might be bought up by some American railways. I do not feel very much alarmed about that. If they bought up the western portions of the Canadian Northern, they might work them in connection with the railways of the United States; but would they buy the eastern portions of this railroad? They could not buy up one portion without buying the whole, and what railway in the United States would buy up the whole? What railway in the United States would buy up a portion of a system in Canada, when that system is covered by Government obligations and by the control of the Government? Furthermore, would that be such an awful prospect? Do we not go over the Canadian Pacific railway every day where it runs through the state of Maine? That portion of the railway is not ruined; the rails are not torn up, the Americans have not taken possession of it, because it is in the United States.

I think I may say that the Canadian Northern railway company at the present time cannot get money in England. Even if they could, the English financiers are so astute and so grasping that the little amount of money that they would pay in exchange for any securities that the Canadian Northern could offer, would never meet the obligations of the company, and would cause it extreme embarrassment. There is another consideration that perhaps may affect some people, that is, the failure of an enterprise in Canada and its effect on British investors and other enterprises in the country. Such an instance might be quoted when gentlemen went to England to ask for assistance to manufacturing, commercial, railroad or other projects in Canada. They might say: "There is your Canadian Northern, which had such brilliant prospects, and which was so belauded and supposed to be such a favourable investment for capital, and it has failed." That does not affright me. Other enterprises have failed. For a long time we shall not be able to get any English capital for enterprises in Canada. At the present time England is so embarrassed over her war expenditures, over the immense sums she has had to give in subsidies to other nations, that she will not be able to afford aid; and the financiers of England will not be attracted by any proposition in Canada for some years to come. Canada cannot borrow money in England at the present time. I observed a speech by Lloyd George, in which he said that the British Government had already loaned millions of money to Canada to assist her financially. Canada went to J. Pierpont Morgan in New York, and borrowed $100,000,000 of money, I am told, because she could not borrow money in England. J. Pierpont Morgan is a very acute financier. The Americans are very sharp people at a bargain. They know that Canada is obligated to the extent of billions of dollars due to the war. They know that Canada will have to pay immense sums in the future for pensions, for interest, for all the expenses of government. They know that Canada has already borrowed $400,000,000 and more before the war. They will not take guarantees by Canada; they will not take promises to pay; they want securities that are immediately transferable into cash. Suppose we had to go to New York and pledge to those financiers the income of Canada from the customs——to give them an assignment upon our customs duties—would not that embarrass Canada? Would not that humble Canada? Would not that be a greater loss of the prestige and the honour and the prospects of Canada than allowing he Canadian Northern railway to be embarrassed or to go into the hands of a receiver, or any possible misadventure that could happen a private enterprise?

Hon. J. DOMVILLE: Honourable gentlemen, there have been good speeches made on this subject both in this House and outside; but it is the practical side of the question we want to consider. It is not necessary to condemn the Government or praise the Opposition. It is not necessary to make highfalutin speeches on the future. "Baccy I hopes, sugar I think," as the man said when he picked up the parcel—I have forgotten the rest of the phrase. But we must boast that we are the people. The people have not much to say. They do not know what these hundreds of millions are. An eminent statesman from New Brunswick, whom I will not name, went over to England in 1859 or 1860. He raised $100,000 in England. When he came back he was greeted with a salvo of artillery; a guard and picket were called out, and a salute was fired in honour of the hero who had been able to raise $100,000 in England on the credit of New Brunswick. That was at a time when the assets of New Brunswick were good and the liabilities short. But to-day we are talking of millions, hundreds of millions, billions, trillions almost. How can the people understand that? They will ask anybody who speaks to-day upon this question. "What do you know about this Canadian Northern railway?" Well, the answer is, I know it pretty well. The representatives of the company are in the lobbies all the time, lobbying, and we see them here. "I come to bury Cæsar, not to praise him"—you remember what Marc Antony said. "There is his corpse," as Cassius put the knife into it. "But you are all honourable men"—that is what Marc Antony said. Well, they are all dead men, as we shall be some day, when our descendants will be considering how we voted in this House or in the other House, and how short-sighted we were, so far as concerns the credit of Canada.

I have here the report of Sir Henry Drayton. a man who has been honoured by the Crown. I have the report of Mr. Tye. As you all know, there is not a better engineer in the world than Mr. Tye. He is a most clever railway man. Sir Henry Drayton and his colleagues were called upon to investigate the whole railway situation, and they report that the Canadian Northern started with great hopes. The Canadian Northern has done great work. I would not run them down with regard to the work they have done for Canada, but they were adventurers, and Canada was paying the bills. As an honourable gentleman stated the other day, it was a case of "heads I win, tails you lose." What did they care? They had the prestige. They were embarking upon various enterprises all over the world, out of which they may have made profit or no profit, but still it gave them prestige to be backed by the Government in their demands for capital for their various enterprises. However, they went too far and their financial embarrassment was the result. Now let us see what Mr. Tye says:

Canada's Railway Problem and Its Solutions.

After a great deal of study of Canada's railway problem, the writer of this paper has arrived at the following conclusions:

1. The National Transcontinental, the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern railways are unable to earn their operating expenses and their fixed charges. Canada has built, and is operating, the first of these roads, and Canada and the various provinces have guaranteed the principal and the interest of most of the bonds of the other two. As the roads are unable to earn their fixed charges they must, of necessity, be paid by the country.

If such is the case, they have bitten off more than they can chew. Parliament, as the custodian of Canada, has the right to see what remedy can be applied. We are all differing now only on one point: who shall get possession of the system? I take no stock in their equities, because I turn to one of these reports, Sir Henry Drayton's I think, in which it is stated that they have no equities, that the stock is valueless, that it is all water. Yet, without knowing what we are going to do with it, for no information has been laid before Parliament as to the value of the bonds, we are asked to arbitrate with a debtor as to what we are to give him, instead of saying. "What are you going to give us? Render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's. What have you to give us for our money?" "We have nothing to give your but that stock," and that stock is to be hypothecated, melted or boiled down in some way, and we are to decide in some way how much the company are to have. The owners of the company have had their private cars and their yachts and have enjoyed a good living, such as few people have had; they have lived on the fat of the land. Now they have come to the end of their tether, and Canada has to ascertain what is to be done with the money of the taxpayers of this country which has been invested in that railway enterprise. That is the first consideration. So far as Mackenzie and Mann are concerned, it makes no real difference to the people of Canada whether their prestige is gone or not. They have been knighted. But why should we lose sight of the point that we are here to decide, what is best for Canada? It is all very well to deliver a beautiful speech in favour of Mackenzie and Mann, as kings in the world of finance, but we have nothing to do with that. What we have to consider is the proper action to take, and the people will expect to know why it was done, or what pressure was brought to bear to change my mind or the mind of any other man, or why the statement was made on the floor of this House that the Canadian Northern railway company should be assisted because they had done something for the country. Of course, when I go home I will not have to give an account to the people. I am not responsible to them beyond the fact that, being here, I should try to guard their interests by my advice or any suggestion I may make which may have some effect on this wild dance in which we are engaged. It is like Belshazzar's feast: you remember the golden goblet and the feast, and how the enemy came and destroyed it all.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE.

We have to provide for the expenses of the war, which is an absolute necessity. I do not think there is anybody in this House who will deny that we owe a debt of gratitude to England. We are descended from the Mother Country, who lent us a hand when this Dominion was in its infancy and who is perhaps helping us now. We must remember this part that this country must play in the great struggle. Is democracy to prevail, or are we to have the divine right of kings, as in the days of Moses and Aaron? Are we to have the apostolic succession? I am speaking now for my own denomination. Tell me, must I bow to the cocked hat and feathers? This earth is going like a ball through the air, and the great stars are still above us, and, after all, we are only poor, miserable creatures, worms, trying to believe that we are superior animals. So far as Canada is concerned, I can see only one point ahead. I can see only that this Canada will exist, that this ball will continue to go through the air when we have all passed away. I can only say that it should be the idea and the best desire of every man in this country to see how this Canada of ours may in the future be a bright star. We are bound up in the welfare of our country and its various interests—its crops, its manufactures, the children who will come after us. That is the great idea. Who shall govern this country, who shall get this plum or that plum that has nothing to do with the question before the people to-day. The question is whether wise statemen, be they Liberal or Conservative, be they for coalition government or otherwise, shall keep the higher view before them, a greater idea of that than the pecuniary interest of some railway corporation and what they may get out of a transaction. If public men fail in their duty, they must take the consequences. I would have no objection if we said to Mackenzie and Mann, "We will give you $500,000 a piece to relinquish the railway." They will be out of a job, but if they have done so well in the past and can now get $500,000 a piece, they will be well provided for. That amount of money at 6 per cent to-day would provide them with $30,000 a year to live on. For that amount a man can have motor cars and almost anything he wants if he is not too hard to satisfy. But we are dealing with millions; yet the port of St. John, for instance, is left in need of a dry-dock. At Courtenay bay nothing is being done; the work has been cut off. Millions --$4,000,000 or $5,000,000— could have been spent for the general advantage of Canada and the whole trade of this country. What are we asked to pay Mackenzie and Mann who have got their road into financial difficulties? Do you suppose for one moment it would be right or prudent to let them have a say in the management of the railway? No. As honourable gentlemen have stated, they have been imprudent in going into this enterprise. They had great ambition and received great assistance in the advancement of their interests; but, as I have already stated, they have undertaken more than they can carry out.

Now, what are we to do with this railway? I do not think the Government know what is to be done. I think the Government would have been glad to get rid of the whole business. What would we do with it? It would seem at first blush that the road should be put in an independent position; that is to say, that a receiver should be appointed or something of that kind done. The whole question should be studied, with all the surrounding conditions, in order that it may be seen what should be done with the system, instead of the proposal to give this money for the stock, which the report says is water and nothing else, and of no present value. Why did we not know this before, when we were asked by the company for the loan of $15,000,000? Why did we not know it when we guaranteed them $45,000,000 more? Why was not the danger signal, the red light, put out? Why did we not ascertain the exact situation between last year and the present time, by the appointment of a commission if you like, to study the situation in all its details? Auditors cannot do so. All they can say is: "We have examined such and such an account; we find the vouchers correct; we find that according to the books the liabilities amount to so much and the assets are so and so; and we find nothing more." They do not know all the business. They have not been able to go back farther than the past five years in order to investigate and ascertain what was done with the money, and yet we are asked on that ipse dixit to agree that they are quite right and to give the Canadian Northern any money they want. I think we should have had full particulars, and we would have had the information, if there had been an independent investigation to get at the root of the matter, if it were possible. I do not suppose you would have got at it. My honourable friend says they would bring all the pressure to bear, that they would have myrmidons here and there; that they would base their claim on the country and on this Parliament by statements patched together like a quilt; that the pressure would be so great that the award might not be, and probably would not be, according to the merits of the case.

Now, we have a great debt to face, and it must be faced. The war debt now amounts to $600,000,000. In addition to that, there is the past indebtedness of Canada, which brings the total up to nearly $2,000,000,000. If you figure $2,000,000,000 at 5 per cent interest you will see what an enormous interest account it means, which must be borne by the 7,000,000 in this country. The farmer says: "I cannot pay it; I am paying all I can now." Where is the money to come from?

But that is not all; the matter does not end there, because the war is not ended yet, and we shall have more money to pay and more obligations to assume; and this in face of what the Finance Minister of Canada says. I bow to his ability. No doubt he has done very hard work. He says we cannot borrow any money from England. We find in Montreal shell factories closed down. Why? They cannot get financed. In the first instance, we rushed up factories everywhere. We said: "Go ahead; make shot and shell; this war will continue; we shall have pork and beans and everything else to sell to the Government; we do not lose our blood relations, or if we do lose any, they are somewhat distantly removed, but we are going to prosper out of this war." And they are prospering to the extent of millions and tens of millions. Is there anything in that of a Christianlike nature? Is there any patriotism in that? Is there any desire to build up Canada, to elevate all classes, to stop warfare between one province and another? All sorts of dodges are put up to breed ill-feeling. That is very small work indeed.

But how are we going to find this money? The common stock, it is of no use to bother about; it is worthless according to the report. And when we get a commission appointed, what are they going to do? Who shall compose the commission? I have so little faith in human nature that I cannot look for any great result except in propitiating somebody or their benefiting themselves. Our credit, if the Finance Minister is correct—and I have not the slightest doubt that he is correct, and it seems to me he is very sound in what he has done—our credit is such, he says, that we cannot borrow any money. What are we going to do with the securities, then? We have undertaken to do something, but we have not the borrowing power or the money. How much harm would it do if this Canadian Northern matter remained in abeyance? Let the creditors wait. We should not vamp up the credit of that company in order to pay bondholders who went into the investment for a matter of profit. If they had not seen the interest they were going to get, those financiers would not have gone into that road. They were bolstered up with the idea that the Canadian Northern company had the Government in such a position that they could make them do anything they said. It was told me by one of those men themselves that they were going to have the Intercolonial railway in spite of anybody; they would kerwallop the country and take it. They did not get it, but we all know they exerted an immense pressure, and the unwritten history of that road would show that they made the most determined efforts; and if they had got that road for $100,000,000——

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: They wanted it for nothing.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Or for nothing—though I do not take extreme views; but if they had got it, they would have floated bonds in connection with their system and would have brought up the value for the investing world. We find them working to get hold of that railway with the sole intention of furthering their own ends. I hope the leader of the Government in this House, for whom I have great respect, will listen to our representation to amend this Bill so that the equities, whatever they are, would be got out of them without any bias or coercion. When I was running an election in Kings county once, my opponent said: "Mr. Domville has been milking the cow long enough; now I want a suck at the critter myself." Well, I say that the poor critter is so attenuated now that you can get no milk out of her. Mackenzie milked her, and there is nothing left.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: But skim-milk.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: No, it is down to strippings, and very little of that. I view all this with great alarm. We cannot alter it; we are not in power, and if we were, I am not prepared to say that we would have a much better chance than the Government of the day are getting.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: Cannot you amend it?

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: That, I say, can only be done by the Government taking into their consideration the whole state of these affairs, not dressing the men up and vouching for them as honourable men, like Marc Antony. When the Canadian Northern managers gave that celebrated picnic out West, three telegrams came inviting me to go; but I said to my wife, "No, they are not going to bind my vote with two bottles of wine." They had a tour all over the West, and I did not go; therefore I am under no obligation to them.

How will this Bill be received by the taxpayers when they find the Government going into these vast expendiures and the country getting nothing out of it? We all know that the future of Canada must depend on what the soil will produce to feed the people. The hewers of wood are the people, because without them we cannot live or produce any revenue. We cannot depend on our knights and baronets, but must look to those who develop our minerals, our fisheries, and our other resources. As we develop those, we will be in a solvent position, and able to pay our creditors; but giving Mackenzie and Mann this money is not going to help us meet our creditors, or help us in our position in the world. We should bend all our energies to building up Canada and producing. Are we getting down to that point? We are patriotic and I am sure nobody would accuse me of not being patriotic; but we let cheap patriotism run away with us. Somebody in England said, "Patriotism is the last resort of a damned scoundrel." Who was that?

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: Ben Johnson.

Hon. Mr. POWER: No, Sam Johnson.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: It doesn't make any difference who it was, the verdict was good; the idea was original, perhaps, and the result would be that those lip-loving patriots that are scooping this money are bleeding this country to death.

We complain that the farmer's prices for his produce are too high, but what does he get out of it? He has to meet all the interest on the municipal bonds, the interest on the provincial indebtedness, and everything around. How much better off is he to-day than he was ten or twenty years ago, when he did not have to pay all those things?

Before Confederation the expenditure in New Brunswick was less than $1,000,000 a year; we had not even a general commanding the army, though we had majors and quartermasters and all necessary officers. We had 43,000 men under arms, and Nova Scotia had 40,000 or 45,000 men that cost the country nothing. What is the cost to-day? The return brought down on the 21st of June shows thousands of dollars wasted, and the idle officers are walking around the streets of Halifax in uniform.

Where is the guardianship of this country? Are we looking after our interests? This question comes before us to-day, and it is our duty to call the attention of the people of Canada to our objections to this Bill. We may lose every vote on it, but we may point out to the people of Canada that we entered the strongest protest we could to stop this carnival of folly.

At six o'clock the Senate took recess.

The Senate resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Honourable gentlemen, I was trying in my imperfect way to draw attention to this proposed deal of Mackenzie and Mann. I am glad to see my honourable friend opposite from St. John (Hon. Mr. Thorne), because I am sure that he will endorse what I am going to say, that we in that part of the country are not going to benefit at all by this deal.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: There is another gentleman on the floor of the Senate from St. John. If this money is expended, we have a right to know why we do not get any benefit, and what influences there are that keep us from getting any. No doubt, my honourable friend will enlighten us as to what we are going to get in this shuffle. I tried to point out that we were not discussing the details of the Bill now, but the principal only. We will not discuss the details until we get into committee. I am speaking of the principle that we should not go into this bargain the way it is. I wish first of all to read a letter from Lord Shaughnessy. I think he is known by some; he is worshipped by some. I am not a worshipper of any man. Lord Shaughnessy says that no organized opposition has been offered; that is, that there is no organization as to the Canadian Pacific railway taking any hand in the affairs of the country and blocking the Canadian Northern deal or manipulating on their behalf. The Canadian Pacific company is a very powerful company. Whatever they have done they have done well. Nothing that they have taken hold of has been a mistake. Therefore we have every reason to bow in deference to any expression emanating from such a great concern as they are, and especially from so great a man as Lord Shaughnessy. I think Lord Shaughnessy's appointment one of the best appointments of the day, it was a recognition of what Canada and what the Canadian Pacific Railway company had done. On the other hand, we are faced with the failure of this other concern. But Lord Shaughnessy has come out as a great Canadian organizer, and we have every right to take some stock in what he says and thinks. He says, in an open letter to the Montreal Gazette:

> I wish to deny most emphatically the statement published in a number of newspapers, and evidently inspired, that the Canadian Pacific Company is offering organized opposition to the Government proposals about the Canadian Northern. Up to the present time no effort of any kind has been made by the company to influence the vote of a single member of the House of Commons or the Senate upon the measure now before Parliament.

He brings forward the fact that, so far, he has not taken any step towards recognizing as he does afterwards, the question of the hour.

> This reference to the Canadian Pacific is the same old threadbare ruse to which resort has been had on more than one occasion, during the past thirty years, when railway schemes of one character or another were being considered by Parliament.
> It is true that the acquisition of the Canadian Northern by the Canadian Pacific was discussed by representatives of the parties concerned, but the discussion was at the suggestion of members of the Dominion Cabinet.

Any dickering or any by-play that was going on, was just like what we have had with regard to the coalition government and things of that sort. Lord Shaughnessy was called in so that he could be talked to. What took place at the lunch we do not know; but he says he was called at the suggestion of members of the Dominion Cabinet. They must have had some idea. They must have been considering the difficulties of the hour, and the urgency of protecting the country and making good their own position, while recognizing that there was a blanket over this country, recognizing that there was some drastic measure to be taken and trying to see how they could clear their skirts of it, and taking advice of such an eminent railway man as Lord Shaughnessy of the Canadian Pacific.

After a time it was evident that no transaction was possible, and negotiations were dropped.

Now, what were those negotiations and transactions? Why were they dropped? What was the object of them? There must have been something. The Government must have seen that what they were doing would not take before the country. They must have seen that they could not pull the wool over the eyes of the country—I will not say that, it is not parliamentary; but they could not induce the country to accept the same view that they did of the Canadian Northern.

The fate, or destiny, of the Canadian Northern is not a matter of special moment to our company as a common carrier, but the company, having enormous interests in Canada, naturally views with apprehension the possibility of the payment of an excessive price for the alleged equity of the holders of the majority stock, and feels that some less speculative and more direct means should have been used to fix the amount than the very uncertain process of arbitration.

Now, I am going to refer to the equity that these people claim they have and what it is worth. I quote from no less authority than Sir Henry Drayton. What he says chimes in exactly with what Lord Shaughnessy says. Of course, my honourable friend was absolutely charmed with the Canadian Northern, and made apologies for them, which will be used to good effect. He made apologies for them, and said that they had done some good, even if they were plungers. They were living in hope, and they had done good work for Canada. Therefore, they should be remunerated, not at a value set by themselves, but at a value set by Parliament, as to what they should receive.

It is to be hoped that if the transaction is carried out the country will not, in consequence, be saddled with heavy liabilities heretofore undisclosed, and that in fixing the amount to be paid under the arbitration proceedings, no consideration whatever shall be given to personal investments in unfortunate ventures such as coal mines, lumber mills, blast furnaces and other works alleged to have been undertaken for the advantage of the Canadian Northern enterprises, but being in fact private speculations of the promoters of the railway company.

The references to my own attitude on conscription are offensive and unwarranted. On this subject and on every other question or work connected with the prosecution of the war, I require no advice or inspiration from that little coterie of men who are engaged in fixing standards of patriotism, and whose catechism fails to distinguish between loyalty to the King and loyalty to their particular projects or interests.

That is Lord Shaughnessy's statement, a man who has been successful in railway undertakings, and whose name shines before the world to-day, not only on this continent, but on the other continents, a man whose word is considered. He cautions us—for it is a caution—to see what we are doing before we are carried away by any blandishments whatever. Sir Henry Drayton says:

Conclusion as to Canadian Northern. We conclude, therefore, that the shareholders of the company have no equity either on the ground of cash put in, or on the ground of physical reproduction cost, or on the ground of the saleable value of their property as a going concern.

Now, what does that mean? The head of the Railway Commission is a trusted man in Canada, a man of great ability, and when he says that, are we to take his scientific knowledge as against the expression of some honourable gentlemen here who think otherwise? We must have some authority. I discard all questions as to Liberals and Conservatives, all questions of Ontario bucking Quebec, or Lower Canada bucking Upper Canada. I want to see some higher ideal. Let us be statesmen if we can. Let us stand up for our country, fight anybody if it is absolutely necessary, and not be fooled or humbugged by every Tom, Dick and Harry, who has some little influence. Sir Henry Drayton goes on to say:

If, then, the people of Canada have already found, or assumed responsibility for, the bulk of the capital; if they must needs find what further capital is required; and if they must make up for some years to come considerable deficits in net earnings, it seems logically to follow that the people of Canada should assume control of the property.

I pin my faith to that. If it is moribund, if it is a financially broken-down company, let it go into the hands of a receiver. If the road is no good—I do not say but what it is a very valuable asset—do not tell them to take our money for the future and place it in some other concern. The road will bring its quantum meruit. Why have we to stand by them? I can understand opposing the Government or standing up to the Government; but why we should stand by these men who have sucked the country nearly dry, and bolster up their case for them in order that they may be remunerated to such an extent as they may see fit, is more than I can understand. The Drayton-Acworth report goes on to say:

We return later to the Canadian Northern Company in order to set out our recommendations as to its ownership and management in the future and as to the terms to be offered to the existing shareholders.

A little further on it says:

There is yet another reason, why we do not think that, even if it were possible, any attempt should be made to form a new company, either on the Mexican or on the New York subway model. Such company could not be Canadian. The capital would have to be found elsewhere, and the control would follow the capital. We think Canadian railways should be under Canadian management.

That is all very well. Now, according to Sir Henry Drayton, the money was to come here. When they come in forma pauperis and say they have failed in every way, is that any inducement for outside people to invest their money in the enterprise? No, I think not. Then he goes on to say that the $60,000,000 or $40,000,000 of stock—whatever it may be—has no consideration to correspond with it; there is no consideration for that large amount of stock that Canada has to pay for, wherever it may go, trusting to luck as to the disbursement of it. I do not say for one moment that it would be improperly disbursed. I am not going to say that there would be any humbugging about it, but I am pointing to the unfortunate position, the difficulty that in the handling of so much money improper management may occur. We should guard against that. I do not think there should be any personal feeling in the matter. I have none. I want only to let the country think. I want to place on record in every home in this country, that the country has already assisted the Canadian Northern to the extent of all that money. Then the people will have the chance of deciding what they should think. Any talk that takes place here is probably of very little service. Nobody reads what the senators say, and nobody cares; but if the senators can enunciate a doctrine which the people can approve of, then it will stand out bright and shining. The Senate should show to the country that it can rise superior to influence. This House should be similar to the House of Lords, not prejudiced by anything. You do not find that in the House of Lords the members complain because some one says something which they do not like. They are gentlemen and know how to behave themselves, and so should we. I do not say we do not, mark you, but we should show the country that, when the proposal came up to plunge this country further into debt, the Senate rose superior to the occasion by recording their view and their conviction that that should not be done.

We are all desirous of winning the war. We have some of our people in the fight. There are others who have not, but we are doing our best. Why should there be any remark from the other side, or anywhere else, that we are unpatriotic, that we are not standing up for the country, that all the loyalty that exists is over there, or amongst them? It is ridiculous. As I was saying at home the other day, get every Frenchman into line and every Irishman, and cut their throats and let United Empire Loyalists have the country. Yes, let them have it. Honourable gentlemen, we are all too big to go into that question. I shall place on record, and I think I can speak for everybody on this side of the House, that we are anxious to do everything in our power to win the war—to sacrifice everything in a legitimate way; but we desire to know that our money is not frittered away or thrown to the dogs, but that we are getting value for it. We tax the people, and the people are not unwilling to pay their share and will pay their share, when their money is not being wasted, as it would be in this case. We are now in the death throes of a war, and are using all our energy to try to raise money for the soldiers. The women are knitting socks, and everybody is doing something. Then we are confronted with this matter and are told, "We must have all this money to make our position." I say again it has nothing to do with making good the position of this country. We want to make it good. I am speaking for this side of the House when I say that we are ready to join in anything to make good the position of Canada in this war, but we are not willing to be led away by the nose, by false measures or false representations.

I do not know that I can say any more. I want it well rammed home so that the people may read and understand it. With the present difficulties and hard times, the farmer and the workingman and the producer of wealth are being taxed for the benefit of a railway that has already had hundreds of millions of dollars. That is what to place on record in order that the country may know. As to the question of loyalty, I pay no attention to it, because there are as loyal men on this side as there are on the other side of the House. I do not often take up the time of this House. I can remember a saying by a young man who had great expectations from an uncle. He asked: "Uncle, how long did I speak? An hour? Two hours?" "Yes, two hours, or perhaps three." "What did you think of it?" "Well," he said, "it would have been better if you had made it in a quarter of an hour; but if you had any brains you would never have made it at all."

Hon. P. A. CHOQUETTE: As a great part of the Canadian Northern system is in the province of Quebec, such as the Canadian Northern Quebec and the Quebec and Lake St. John railways, and as the province of Quebec and the city of Quebec particularly have given large bonuses in land and money to these two lines of railway, I feel it my duty to say a few words on this Bill. I do not intend to go over all the arguments which have been put forward to show that this Bill should not pass. We have had forcible speeches made by honourable gentlemen on this side of the House. I would mention particularly the honourable gentleman for De Lanaudière (Hon. Mr. Casgrain), who is particularly well posted on this question, and I think that the reasons which have been given ought to prevail, if good reason is to prevail.

This House is supposed to sit as a court of justice or a jury to pass condemnation or approval on the measure which has been submitted to us. Perhaps our own personal opinion must not carry much weight on one side or the other, because it may be influenced by party politics or otherwise, as some people dare to say, but we have to take the facts as they are. It is well also to take into consideration the opinions of persons outside of this House and the views expressed by corporations or newspapers, and try to form an opinion upon the merits of this measure. The case before us, I may say, is that of Mackenzie and Mann supported by the Government against the people. Against Mackenzie and Mann personally I have nothing to say. Supported by the Government, they are asking the people, whose interests the members of this House are supposed to defend: "Will you buy our property, will you take over our interests in this big railway, will you assume the liabilities standing against us and be responsible for all our debts, and take the place of our company. The people, if they were called upon to vote on the question, would surely pronounce against the proposal, and it is our bounden duty to protect the interest of the people and to say that we cannot accept the bargain.

As I have said, our personal opinion may be prejudiced in some way. Some honourable gentleman on the other side—I do not know who—had the audacity to ask my honourable friend from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) if he was honest in his opinions, because he was a director of the C. P. R. All who know the honourable gentleman from De Salaberry would regard that question as an insult. The honourable gentleman places his duties as a member of this House above all his personal interests. But that same member ought to have asked the honourable gentleman in front of me (Hon. Mr Edwards) if he was interested? It would have been also an insult to be asked that, though he differed from the honourable gentleman from De Salaberry and from his Liberal friends. It would be similar to asking the honourable leader of the Government if his partner, Mr. Bennett, director of National Service, is interested for if there has been a plea made, whether in this House or outside, or in the other House, against the bargain, it is that of the honourable member for Calgary, who is a professional associate of the honourable leader of the Government in this House, and who ought to know something of the deal. He made the most stinging attack and passed the severest condemnation on the Bill. As to the honourable leader of the Government (Hon. Sir James Lougheed), he made a good presentation of the Bill, in his usually clever style, but we saw that his heart was not in the measure any more than was the heart of the honourable gentleman from Sydney (Hon. Mr. McLennan), who stated that the Bill was distasteful to him. But he was pardoned for his opinion when he said: "I do not like the Bill, but my friends asked me to vote for it, and I will approve it."

Let us now consider the views of disinterested parties. I will not recall the forcible protests made against the Bill by leading friends of the Government in Montreal like the Drummonds, the Ekers, Chaput and some twenty others, if I remember correctly, who condemned in the strongest terms this proposed legislation which would burden the country with a liability of $600,000,000 or 700,000,000. At Kitchener, the other day, the municipal council passed a resolution condemning the Bill in the strongest terms. In the province of British Columbia Sir Charles Hibbard Tupper, who as everybody in this House and outside knows, is a good friend of the Government, has condemned the Bill, but he took the precaution to preface what he said by remarking that he is going to support the Government just the same: "In ordinary times," he says, "the Canadian Northern deal would bring shame, ignominy and defeat on the Government."

That is an expression much stronger than any which has been used in this House, and it has been by friends of the Government in condemning the Bill.

Let us now refer to a newspaper which is very friendly to the Government, the Montreal Star, of August 21. What does it say?

The bill now before Parliament intended for the relief of Mackenzie and Mann and their creditors is decidedly weak in some of its provisions and dangerous in the extreme. Under the Bill as introduced there might be a staggering award. Mackenzie and Mann know how to engineer their schemes; they must not be permitted to engineer the country into bankruptcy. It is too big a risk and there is danger that Parliament may be woefully negligent in this case, as it always has been with railway legislation.

So far there is no provision for securing honest surrender of the assets. Some have been left out of the official lists. For one of the largest subsidiary assets of the concern no adequate provision is made, and there are many other assets paid for by Government money that are not included.

Is it possible to accuse the Government more vigorously of not considering the interests of the country and of playing into the hands of Mackenzie and Mann ?

All this condemnation indicates how we ought to deal with this Bill. What is the opinion of the people of Canada regarding it? I do not say that we ought to defeat the measure without examining it, but I say that the amendment moved by the honourable leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Bostock) calls for just the information which we ought to have in order that we may understand what is involved in the Bill—what are the assets and liabilities, what is the state of the railway, what has been the cost of the line. When all that information has been placed before us in committee, we whose duty it is to protect the interests of the people shall be in a better position to say why the people cannot buy that railway, cannot overburden the country with a railway with stock of no value.

Honourable gentlemen, I say without any hesitation that I will support the amendment, because when the Canadian Northern Bill came before us in 1914, when a loan or a guarantee of $45,000,000 was asked in order to enable Mackenzie and Mann to finish their road, I myself moved the following resolution :

That the said Bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraph and Harbours, and that the said Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, be and are hereby empowered to send for such persons, papers and records, as may from time to time be required by the said Committee for the purpose of affording evidence under oath, as to any matter arising out of the examination by the said Committee of the Bill from the House of Commons, (No. 214) 'An Act respecting the Canadian Northern Railway System', and that the said Committee be and are hereby authorized to employ a shorthand writer for the purpose of said examination, and also legal advisers and counsels and railway experts if necessary.

I do not blame the honourable gentlemen who then voted against that motion. There were only 20 in favour of it, and it was defeated. But, honourable gentlemen, I say that I will support the motion made in similar terms, or to the same effect. I do not boast that the 20 who voted for the motion were wiser that those who opposed it, but if at that time we had taken the necessary precautions and had made the investigation suggested, we would have know where we stood and would perhaps not have advanced the $45,000,000 which went into the pockets of somebody or paid the debts of the company and left the company still in the same position. I claim that that was the time, before advancing the $45,000,000, to take necessary precautions and to have such an investigation as we are now asking for, though it is a little late. In any case, it is never too late to mend. So I claim that the amendment ought to carry, and before rejecting or accepting the Bill we should have all the information which has been asked for in the motion made by my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Bostock).

I will give you now, in a few words, some of the reasons why I opposed this Bill before an investigation is made. In the first place, I oppose the principle of public ownership. I have always been against public ownership. I have always been of the opinion that a Government cannot fairly and justly administer a railway or steamship corporation, or even an electric railway, except in the case of a municipality. The Government cannot do that because politics always interfere. I heard an honourable gentleman state this afternoon that the present Minister of Railways had nothing to do with politics. Well, honourable gentlemen, when we recall what happened in Nova Scotia, when Messrs. Stanfield, two good Tories, sent in their resignations because the Minister of Railways did not accede to their request by naming their political friends, they were induced to withdraw their resignation, and they got what they wanted. It is sufficient to mention that fact to show that in spite of the good will of a Government, Liberal or Tory—I put them both on the same footing in this connection—the Government cannot administer a public corporation without any political favours.

So strong was my opinion that thirty years ago, when I was a member of the other House, I advocated there and in the press that the Intercolonial railway should be sold or leased to a corporation or company existing, because a government cannot make a financial success of such undertaking. Moreover that line was then passing through the county of Montmagny, which I had the honour to represent, and those who represented the counties through which it passed will say, like me, that they would prefer a hundred times not to have those railways belonging to the Government because of the trouble that came from them. If a cow or a horse was killed or a gate was left open, we were bothered to death to have the claim settled. I have always been against public ownership, and especially against the Government owning railway property. That is my principal reason for opposing the Bill. If the Canadian Northern is financially unable to face its obligations, I say we ought to do with it what is done with corporations that are financially embarrassed—let it go into bankruptcy or into the hands of a receiver. It would have been better to have appointed a receiver in 1914 instead of giving the guarantee for $45,000,000, but it would now be the best thing to appoint a receiver to the railway. Under a receiver the railway would go on as it is now; he could operate it during the war, and he could help the Government to redeem a lot of securities better than a private corporation could. The Government will have to spend large amounts in improving the road. I could cite a number of railways which have gone into the hands of receivers, and which have always turned out better. If a receiver were appointed under the control of the Railway Commission, or if the Government would put one in, we would know exactly where we stood. We would make a real inventory; we would know what the assets were—the value of the land, the amount of rolling stock, and all the material of the railway; we would also know all the claims against the company; and we would then be in a better position to know where we stand. A receiver might be appointed by the court itself, with authority to close those parts of the railway which are not paying, and with the right to make improvements on the road as it is now.

In the province of Quebec is the Quebec and Lake St. John railway, which forms part of the system. It is not a paying proposition, that road having been built very cheaply, and the common stock has no value. If there were a receiver administering that railway under the control of the court or the Government or the Railway Commission, it could be advertised for sale separately, because it is a special company incorporated by the legislature of the province of Quebec under the control of the local government. If he advertised that railway for sale it would be a good thing for the province of Quebec to buy it, and pay probably a better price than could be got in any other way, as there are many people in Quebec who would be in favour of buying it and administering it, as it reaches the immense fishing and hunting grounds at the back of Quebec, and this would be a good thing for that province in advertising and developing that section. I believe that if the sale were advertised all over Canada and in the United States, it would bring the company perhaps one-quarter or one-fifth more than the Government can get for it; the receiver would get that much more out of it; that is one of the benefits of having a receiver. And if the Government does take possession of this railway, I hope the province of Quebec will enter into negotiation to get the railway from the Government for that province, and it could be administered say by the Public Utilities Commission. The Government has not agreed to appoint a receiver, but proposes an arbitration to value the $58,000,000 of stock belonging to Mackenzie and Mann. If an arbitration is wanted, the best thing would be to appoint at once the Judge of the Exchequer Court, in whom the whole Dominion has confidence. The fact that the Government proposes to appoint as expert arbitrator Sir William Meredith of Ontario is sufficient to throw suspicion at once upon the proposition. While I have confidence in him as a judge, and think he is a fair and able man, as the expert of the Government I have not. We have had some experience of him already, and I frankly say I would not be more surprised and would not object more if the Government proposed to appoint Col. Allison. For me it would be about the same thing. Col. Allison was a good friend of the Government, like Sir William Meredith, I think, moreover, that the fact of appointing an expert to value stock which has no value is practically giving notice to the expert that something must be done.

The explanation given the other day by the leader of the Government in answer to the honourable member for Hastings (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell) was certainly a put-up job between themselves, as we all saw; but the question asked by the venerable member for Hastings was a fair one, and the answer would please some of his friends, who could refer to the answer given by the Government. But where does the Government get power to put a maximum of $10,000,000 on stock that is worthless? Moreover, the fixing of that figure is a premium to the expert to be unfair, and to value stock that has no value now, which has never been listed, a share of which has never been sold on the stock exchange. I say that is one of the worst things for the nation, for the very fact of putting that price on that stock is much more dangerous than if the Government said that the stock might be worth something. More than that, the maximum amount as given in the answer of the Government is not inserted in the Bill; at the same time it leaves it open for Mackenzie and Mann and their friends to speculate on that stock, as they have already done, knowing what was coming. It is as though Mackenzie and Mann said, "We have some debts, and we have nothing with which to pay them," and the Government answer, "We will fix a maximum of say $10,000,000 on your stock." We see how it all works out. As the Montreal Star says, they are very clever men to finance these affairs and push through their Bills. But they are also very clever members of the Government, and they are very apt to jump at a glance thrown at them by the wizards, Mackenzie and Mann; so they say: "We will give you something like $10,000,000, and then you will have money to pay your debts and to subscribe to election funds." As a business matter, is it possible that the Government is going to impose on the country a debt of between $600,000,000 and $700,000,000 without knowing what they are buying? They are buying it like a cat in a bag; they know nothing about it, just taking as O.K. the statement made by the auditors for Mackenzie and Mann.

I cannot understand how a shrewd business man like the member for Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Edwards) can advocate this Bill and accept the assets and liabilities of a corporation such as this without investigation. In his own lumber business the honourable gentleman would not deal in that way, and he would be insulted if for a moment any one would think he would do so. Perhaps he says that he is not speaking as a business man but as a senator; if so I will take his word. I highly respect his character and his business ability, but I cannot understand how he can support this Bill and retain his reputation as a business man. Moreover, Ontario and all the provinces west have guaranteed Mackenzie and Mann to the extent of from $25,000,000 to $40,000,000 for each of them; but the province of Quebec, which will be responsible for a share of this total indebtedness to the amount of about $100,000,000 did not guarantee debentures, but gave subsidies in land and money which it has paid. Quebec has $415,000 of common stock in the Quebec and St. John railway and in the Canadian Northern, if I remember correctly, although we have paid our share for the whole of these railways both in cash and land subsidy, we have never had practically a good service. We are not responsible for a cent of the guarantees of those railways in the West that have piled up debts of hundreds of millions, still we shall be loaded with paying a part of these millions of guarantee. Is it fair? Is it just? Is it possible that members of the Senate will stand for that bargain?

While speaking of Quebec, I will read the following telegram, which was sent by the mayor of Quebec to Sir Thomas White, the Minister of Finance, on August 30 last. It says:

Sir Thomas White,
Minister of Finance,
Ottawa.

The city of Quebec holds four hundred and twenty thousands of dollars of common stock in the Quebec & Lake St. John and Canadian Northern paid for at par, and a number of our citizens hold stock in these railways and in the Canadian Northern Quebec. Both these roads form part of the Canadian Northern system. We hope you will protect our interest by providing that this stock shall be provided for in the bill now before parliament.

H. E. Lavigueur,
Mayor of Quebec.

According to the list of shareholders given in the other House by the Minister of Finance on the 23rd of August, I do not see that the city of Quebec is a shareholder of the Canadian Northern system. I understand that the $60,000,000 of stock to be bought is stock in the Canadian Northern railway company, and the stock held by the city of Quebec is stock in the subsidiary companies, the Canadian Northern Quebec and the Quebec and Lake St. John railways. I do not quite understand the position, but I ask the Government: if this stock is a liability of the Canadian Northern Railway system, and if the experts are going to give a maximum of $10,000,000 for the stock, is there any provision by which the city of Quebec and private shareholders will get something out of that? I take that to be the meaning of the telegram of Mr. Lavigueur, the mayor of Quebec. I am told that there was no satisfactory reply to that telegram; so I put the matter before the Government, and I hope that they will soon give an answer which will be satisfactory to the mayor and citizens of Quebec, and that this stock will be considered as a liability of Mackenzie and Mann, or of the subsidiary companies; and, if Mackenzie and Mann get something for their stock, it will be arranged in such a way that the money so received will be used, at least partly, to reimburse Quebec and the shareholders in the city of Quebec. I bring up this question, and I will endeavour to get the information, and will try to see if something cannot be done, by amendments or otherwise, when we will go into committee. For the present I ask my honourable friend the leader of the Government to have a word with the Finance Minister so that he may be able to give me the information in committee.

I will not take up more time of the House. I have given some of the reasons why I think this Bill should not be accepted before we get further information. As a matter of principle, I am as I said against public ownership; but I do not say that we are going to find no good in the Bill whatever. If the Government is absolutely obliged to take over the railway, the least we can ask is to get the necessary information to intelligently pass judgment on the measure; and for my part, if it is not given, I will take the first opportunity at the third reading of moving the six months hoist.

Let me for one moment draw the attention of the House to another point. If I remember well, before the war, our national debt was about $340,000,000 in round numbers. Call it $400,000,000 if you like. What have we got for that? We have got a beautiful system of railway; we have harbours, public buildings, canals. Now, we are going to load this country, in this time of war, with an amount of obligations sufficient to carry on the war for two years, and with twice the amount that we expended until that war for these public purposes. And for what? For what reason are we going to do this? Just to please friends. We take over a railway on which we are going to spend as much perhaps as $100,000,000 to put it in good order, because, according to information which has been given to me by men experienced in railroad building, some parts of this railway may be good, but in many parts it is far from good, and on some parts the Government will be obliged to spend as much money to repair it and to build bridges as it has already cost. I am informed that it is in such a condition that they will have to spend a large amount of money to put it into anything like normal condition. I say that this legislation is going to load this country with responsibility, for the sum of $600,000,000 or $700,000,000, nearly double the amount of our national debt before the war, and it is all to pay this large amount to a railway which is not fit now, or a good part of it, to be used as a railway of the first quality ought to be used. It will be necessary to withdraw from the country a large amount of money which never should be withdrawn. I think this point of view ought to be considered, and that we ought to say entrusted as we are with the interests of the people, that a man should not stand up here and vote for such a Bill without at least taking the necessary precautions that every business man would take in making a a transaction involving a few thousand dollars. I endorse all that has been said before me by men of experience like the honourable gentleman from De Lanaudière (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) and the honourable gentleman from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique), who knows something about railways. The reasons are sufficient to convince any man who is acting in good faith and who has the interests of the people and the country at heart, that if the Bill is not rejected immediately, the amendment should be carried in order that we have the advantage of having the information and all the facts before us.

Hon. L. G. DE VEBER: Honourable gentlemen, the chief features of this measure have been very fairly, very fully and very ably discussed, and I am too old a sportsman to be caught shooting over ground which has been shot over within a few days. My remarks will be very brief. This measure is one of very great importance. It is probably the most important measure which has been before this House in many years, carrying with it, as it does, such an enormous load of responsability; assuming, as it does, such an enormous financial responsibility; and involving, as it does, the expenditure of many millions of dollars. It behooves us to look at this measure from all point of view, from all different angles, and at all its different phases, before we come to any conclusion as to whether we shall vote for or against the Bill.

In all the arguments which I have heard within the last couple of days I have not heard anyone point out the danger which comes from men of this stamp. No one has pointed out how easy it is for men experienced in these matters, having all the tricks of the trade, strong in ability but shy in morals, clever, energetic, without qualms of conscience, with umlimited capital at their back, and thereby having the best legal talent that can be obtained to fool, outwit, and bedevil any Government—how easy it is for these railway kings, these capitalist knights of the road, to bleed and rob the country of millions. I have in mind two transactions which may prove of interest. They are not new; they are old. They relate to the West in the early days.

In the early eighties, shortly after the Canadian Pacific railway was finished to the coast, some gentlemen in Alberta saw the advisability of having a road running north and south through Calgary. Whether they formed a company or not I cannot say. My honourable friend the leader of the Government could possibly enlighten us in regard to that, as he was one of the gentlemen who got very busy in promoting this railway. But my honourable friend the leader of the Government at that time was not embarrassed by riches any more than the rest of us were, and the company fell through. I am very sorry he had not the financial standing at that time which he has now, for if he had built the road I think the country would have been saved a great deal of money. I think he would not have been quite so rapacious as the gentlemen who eventually built the road. The scheme having fallen through, it was turned over to a number of gentlemen, and on referring to chapter 84, 53 Victoria, "An Act to incorporate the Calgary and Edmonton Railway," I find the names of those gentlemen, which are as follows: James Ross, Edmund B. Osler, Herbert C. Hammond, William Mackenzie, Nicol Kingsmill, Herbert S. Holt, and Donald D. Mann. Now, this charter says:

> The company may lay out, construct, and operate a railway of the gauge of four feet eight and one half inches from a point on the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, within the town of Calgary, to a point at or near Edmonton, with power to extend southerly to the International boundary between Canada and the United States, and northerly to the Peace river.

Then if I may refer to chapter 4, 53 Victoria, I find:

> To the Calgary and Edmonton Railway Dominion lands to an extent not exceeding six thousand four hundred acres for each mile of the company's railway from Calgary to a point at or near Edmonton, on the North Saskatchewan River, a distance of about one hundred and ninety miles; and also a grant of six thousand four hundred acres for each mile of the Company's railway from Calgary to a point on the international boundary between Canada and the United States, a distance of about one hundred and fifty miles.

Then I turn over the leaf and refer to chapter 5, 53 Victoria, and I find:

> In order to enable the Calgary and Edmonton Railway Company to construct so much of their railway as reaches from a point on the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company within the town of Calgary to a point on the North Saskatchewan River near Edmonton, the Governor in Council may enter into a contract with such company for the transport of men, supplies, materials and mails for twenty years, and may pay for such services during the said term, eighty thousand dollars per annum, in manner following, that is to say; the sum of eighty thousand dollars to be paid annually on the construction of the railway from Calgary to a point on the North Saskatchewan River near Edmonton—such payment to be computed from the date of the completion of the railway between such points: Provided that the Governor General in Council may order such sums to be paid in semi-annual instalments, and may permit the company to assign the same by way of security for any bonds or securities which may be issued by the company in respect of the company's undertaking.

Now, I have here the figures as to the building of that road, and I may say in regard to this bonus of $80,000 a year for twenty years, amounting in all to $1,600,000, that in the year 1897 I was sent down by the people of Lethbridge to look after their interest in the Crow's Nest deal. Wishing to find out all we possibly could, Mr. Oliver and I visited all the departments and obtained all the information possible; and upon going to the different departments we could not find that anything had been deducted from this $80,000 up to the year 1897. The Post Office Department had paid for every letter. The capital stock of this company was $1,000,000. How much was subscribed and paid in, I am not prepared to say. The return of cost of the road handed in to the Railway Department was $10,000 per mile, and they bonded the road for $18,000 per mile. The road was 300 miles long, thus it was bonded for $5,400,000. These are round numbers. The capital stock and the bonded indebtedness together, amount to $6,474,513. They had that much money to build the road, I suppose that they had to use some of it for organization purposes. The cost of the road at $10,000 a mile was $3,743,562, so that there was a profit on the bonds and the stock of $2,730,591. This is rather a nice little profit. They had also a land grant of $6,400 acres to the mile, or, as the files show, 1,888,000 acres of land in all. The value of that at $3 an acre, and I think I am in a position to say that is fair, because I lived in the country long before this scheme of building the railroad was mooted by the leader of the House and I know something of the circumstances; and I know that they did not sell any of the land at less than $3 an acre. They sold some at $5, some at $7, and some at $15 an acre, and I think they are holding some now at about $30 an acre. They had also the town sites. I think I am figuring the land value very low when I put it at $5,664,000. Add this to the profit above, which makes a profit of $9,994,951.

Then they had the annual bonus of $80,000 for twenty years, amounting to $1,600,000, or a grand total of profit amounting to $10,594,951 on a road costing according to their own figures, $3,734,562. A sweet little profit, is it not?

The Qu'Appelle, Long Lake and Saskatchewan railway was built exactly on the same lines—250 miles, with a capital stock of $201,000, bonded for $3,809,140, making in all $4,010,140. The cost of the road, the 250 miles, was $2,539,600. Remember, in regard to the Calgary and Edmonton railway, they reported to the department a cost of $10,000 per mile, whereas the second engineer, Mr. Drury, told me that it did not cost them over $6,000 per mile. I am quoting the departmental figures. The cost of the Qu'Appelle, Long Lake and Saskatchewan road was $2,539,600, leaving a profit of $1,470,540. The land grant of 6,400 acres per mile, 1,619,200 acres, at $2, amounted to $3,238,400. I am putting it in at $2 because they sold that land in a block to an American company at that figure. Therefore, there is a profit of $4,708,940; and, with the $1,600,000 added, there is a profit of $6,308,940, or, in all, the profits on the two roads, costing to build at their own figures $6,283,252, was $16,903,891.

I may say in regard to that $1,600,000 bonus, in connection with the Qu'Appelle, Long Lake and Saskatchewan that, in an agreement made with the Canadian Pacific railway company to take over and operate the road, the company become responsible to the Canadian Pacific railway company for such amounts as might be deducted from the $80,000 annual bonus for work done for the Dominion Government. I am quoting these figures, honourable gentlemen, to show you how easy it is for those men who know the ropes to outwit any government. I am not at all averse to the Government taking over the Canadian Northern railway. I think it would be a good thing for the Grand Trunk Pacific to have the branch lines in the West, and it needs them; but I do not think the present owners of the Canadian Northern, Mackenzie and Mann, should have the slightest consideration at the hands of the Government. They got a taste, and they became enamoured of the easy money they made in the construction of these railroads, and they feel they have to receive more, and have continued to receive assistance. They are to-day getting all the money they possibly can from the people of Canada to put in the road; and how are they spending it? Mackenzie and Mann, the company, receive the money. They give the contract to Mackenzie and Mann, the contractors, at a good, big, fat figure. These people, Mackenzie and Mann, the contractors, let the contract out to smaller contractors at a very much lower rate. They take all the cream off the milk and then they come to the Government, and say: "We have not any capital to run the road; help us out."

I may say in regard to the Calgary and Edmonton road that one would naturally suppose that when the road was finished the bondholders would have some interest in the assets of the road—for instance, in the land grant. But no; that belonged to another company—another company run by Messrs. Osler, Hammond & Nanton. And I presume the Canadian Northern railroad are running things in very much the same way, because they have a Canadian Northern Ontario company, a Canadian Northern Quebec company, a Manitoba company, all in one, but yet separated so that you cannot touch one of them if you happen to get judgment against another. They have the affair so much mixed up, in such a state, that I defy the devil, with the aid of a Philadelphia lawyer, to get at the bottom of it.

Hon. L. G. POWER: I do not propose to trouble the House for long. I have not a speech, but just a few observations to make. I have been thinking, and I think the general impression amongst the people of this country is that Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann are pretty shrewd persons, and the little story that has been told by the honourable gentleman from Lethbridge (Hon. Mr. De Veber) shows that they are gentlemen who need a good deal of watching. Consequently when we come to deal with them we should be very clear that we know all that should be known in connection with the matter on which we are dealing with them. Even if these gentlemen were Nathaniels, men without guile, it would be as a matter of business, I think, a duty to inform this House and to inform Parliament, so that we should know exactly what we propose to do.

Everybody knows that we have only the vaguest idea of what this measure before us involves. No one can tell whether, under this Bill, the Canadian Northern would be entitled to receive anything, or $10,000,000, or $50,000,000, and some honourable gentlemen have got the figures up to hundreds of millions. If there ever was a case where it was absolutely essential that Parliament and the public should have the fullest information, this is that case, and I think that the honourable gentleman who leads the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Bostock) has simply done his duty as a Canadian in trying to get a reasonable amount of light on the position of things.

Now, I direct the attention of the honourable leader of the Government and of honourable members to one or two features in connection with the Bill itself—with the wording of the Bill. As I said just now, a good many people do not think that Mackenzie and Mann are entitled to anything, but think they have already got a great deal more out of the country than the country has had any return for. Here I find in the first clause of this Bill this language:

> His Majesty may acquire the 600,000 shares of capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company.....on such terms and conditions..... as may be set out in an agreement to be made between His Majesty and the owners and pledgees of not less than five-sixths thereof, and for a price to be determined by arbitration as hereinafter provided.

It seems to me that the correct thing would have been to state, if the price is to be determined by arbitration, "for any such price as is found to be due to the pledgees." My own impression is that if an honest balance were struck between the people of Canada and the Canadian Northern, the debit balance on the Canadian Northern side would be very large, but here in this Bill we have the Government practically acknowledging in addition that there is something to be paid to Mackenzie and Mann. It does not strike me, honourable gentlemen, that that is a business-like way of putting it.

Then take section 2. We find that the 600,000 shares may be transferred to the Minister of Finance. Then :

> And if there be any of the said 600,000 shares not transferred as aforesaid, the Governor in Council may declare the said shares to be the property of the Minister of Finance in trust for His Majesty, and the same shall thereupon become the property of His Majesty and shall be paid for pro rata with the shares so transferred.

There, you see, is a further acknowledgment that these shares are of some value. The commissioners appointed by the Government, and who have investigated the affairs of this company carefully, report that the shares are of no value, and I think that it is not good business, in dealing with sharp people like those, to make any acknowledgments of that kind.

But I think the most important criticism I have to make on the wording of the Bill is in connection with section 4, subsection 2, where it is stated:

> The said arbitrators shall determine the value of the said six hundred thousand shares as of the date of the said agreement.

Now, honourable gentlemen, that agreement is not to be made until some time after this Bill passes and becomes law. We have been told by one of the partners, I think, the president of the company, that when this Bill became law the shares would be worth par. Why should the Government, when they come to provide for the fixing of the value of these shares, fix a date after the Bill becomes law. If you wanted to ascertain the real value of the shares, that is, to find out what the country was getting, you should have taken some date like the 1st of July last. Then the shares were worth nothing, and the country would not be compelled to pay anything; the arbitrators, if they knew their business and were thoroughly upright, would not award anything. I commend this last criticism particularly to the honourable leader of the House and to other honourable members.

The information that I think the House should have has not been given. The honourable leader of the House made a declaration yesterday or on Friday last, as a result of a suggestion made by the honourable gentleman from Hastings (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell), intimating that the Government would fix a maximum price, an amount beyond which the arbitrators would not be allowed to go in making their award. That undertaking on the part of the Government —for I assume that the honourable gentleman speaks for his colleagues as well as himself—is good enough as far as it goes; but it does not seem to me that in dealing with gentlemen like the Canadian Northern directors we should be quite satisfied with that. I think that when dealing with keen men like them we should "have it in the bond"—the maximum should be mentioned in the Act. I have no doubt that the intention of the leader of this honourable House are perfectly upright and honest now; but Governments have been known to change their opinion, and the present Government is no exception. A few months ago we heard the honourable leader of the Government declare that there was no intention and no probability of the introduction of conscription in this country; but he changed his opinion and the honourable gentleman opposite changed his opinion also, and they thought that persons who had not been able to change as fast as they had changed were enemies of the country.

I am afraid that there are loopholes left in this arrangement with the Canadian Northern through which some very serious difficulties may arise. As I intimated, we have to deal with the question without the information that we might have expected to receive. As to the position of the whole question, we cannot go on paying out millions of money which will never be repaid. We have paid out a great many millions to Mackenzie and Mann, and have never got anything back, and I think that we should not do anything to increase the tremendous burden which will rest on the people of Canada after the war is over and when the prosperity which is due to the war has ceased. This Bill proposes to do that—to place what would probably prove to be a very weighty burden on the shoulders of the people of Canada.

A goodideal has been said about the liquidation of the company. I do not see any particular reason why the company should not go into liquidation, but that is not the course that I think would be the wisest to follow. And I do not think the course adopted by the Government is the wisest. I think the third alternative, which has been suggested by more than one honourable gentleman, is that on which the deliberate opinions of this House should be expressed, and that is, to adopt the line of action indicated in the Act of 1914. At that time Mackenzie and Mann applied to Parliament for relief and they got it to the extent of $45,000,000. The terms and conditions of the loans are set out in chapter 20 of the Statutes of 1914. That has been referred to already and the section of the Act has been read by the honourable leader of the Opposition, by the honourable gentleman from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand), and perhaps by somebody else. However, it will do no harm to read it once. more. The section to which I ask the attention of honourable gentlemen is section 24:

> If authorized by the Parliament of Canada, the Governor in Council may on such terms and conditions (if any) as Parliament may prescribe, at any time while any event of default shall exist and be continuing, by order declare the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern and of all other persons whomsoever in the mortgaged premises to be foreclosed, and thereupon the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern (and of such other persons) in the mortgaged premises and every part thereof shall be and become absolutely barred and foreclosed, and the same shall thereupon be vested in His Majesty in right of the Dominion of Canada, any statutory enactment or any rule of law or equity to the contrary notwithstanding.

That is pretty clear and provides a very effective way of winding up the dealings between Canada and the Canadian Northern. I do not think, after what has fallen from the honourable member for Lethbridge (Hon. Mr. De Veber) and what has been stated by other honourable gentlemen, that this is a case where Christian charity is called for in dealing with the other parties to the transaction which we are now handling. This is not a case where the Government should be governed by sympathy for a good, honest man who is struggling with difficulties. These good, honest men are rolling in wealth, and we are asking the poor men who are struggling with difficulties to help to add to the wealth which those men already have. And this is not a time for either Governments or members of Parliament to try to benefit people to whom they are under political obligations. All political obligations have been discharged, honourable gentlemen, and much more than discharged.

I do not propose to go into the figures. The honourable gentleman who preceded me (Hon. Mr. DeVeber) and the honourable gentlemen to my right have all dealt with the figures quite fully, and even if I were competent to do it, I should not think it necessary at this stage of the debate. But it is clear that we have advanced, I think, a couple of hundred millions. What are we getting in return? Stock which is not worth anything, which the commissioners appointed by the Government have reported to be worth nothing.

My idea is that we should pay Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann just what the Government commissioners report that stock to be worth. Nothing has been paid on the stock: barring the action of Parliament now, that stock is at the present time absolutely worthless. Even supposing that the gentlemen who control the Canadian Northern were men of the most guileless, and affectionate and amiable dispositions, I do not think that the Government are in a position or have any right to be influenced by sympathy. The Government are trustees for the people of Canada, and it is their duty as trustees to exercise any legal rights that they may possess with a single eye to the interests of those people. I think that is a perfectly clear proposition. We are trustees for the people. We do not own the public money ourselves, and we cannot afford to be generous with it. A man may, as a matter of law, do as he likes with his own individual property, but as to property which he holds as trustee, he has not such liberty. He is bound as trustee to see that all the legal rights of his client or cestui qui trust be preserved; and in the present case the Government as trustees can, by moving under the Act of 1914, acquire all the property of the Canadian Northern without paying anything for the stock, and simply by assuming the liabilities for the encumbrances which are prior to their own. That is the duty of the Government, and I must express my regret that they do not apparently wish to discharge it. There is no difficulty involved in this matter. There is no need for reference to arbitration. There is no employing of counsel. There is no trying to fight the devil with fire for months perhaps, when you simply foreclose. Get Parliament to pass a measure authorizing you to foreclose, and you foreclose under the Act of 1914, and then the property is yours, and in the next session you can pass any Act to dispose of that property in any manner you wish. You would relieve the public mind, and you would sever the partnership which has existed for over thirty years between the people of Canada and Mackenzie and Mann, and we would leave those gentlemen to enjoy all the wealth they have realized from their dealing with the people in the past; and you would place these roads in the hands not of Mackenzie and Mann, but of Parliament and the country, which I think every one must feel would be a very desirable consummation.

Hon. N. A. BELCOURT: The immediate question is the one involved in the proposed amendment of the leader of the Opposition, which of course is merely incidental to my honourable friend's motion for the second reading. By his amendment the leader of the Opposition asks, among other things, information which is stated and reported at page 972 of the Debates, of which I am going to read only a very few lines:

What is the bonded debt, the floating debt, and other liabilities direct and indirect of each of the affiliated companies of the Canadian Northern Railway company, whose capital stock is held or partly held by that company? What is the amount of bonds, debentures or other securities pledged for loans to the Canadian Northern Railway Company.

Then I take the last item:

The debts now owing by the Canadian Northern railway other than those referred to in the financial statement submitted to Parliament.

Now, that information we have not got. My honourable friend who is responsible for the Government action in this House has not chosen to give us that information. The Government has the information, or it has not. So far as we know, the Government has not the information; and indeed it is quite possible that they may have acted upon the ipse dixit of Mackenzie and Mann, or on the only statement furnished by them, and nothing else. We have this, further, that the statement of the auditors have not been verified; no investigation has been held; not one single item can be vouched for before this House; there is absolutely nothing to show that the annual statement furnished to the House contains one single item that can be relied on. The Government proposes to pay all the liabilities of this concern, but the Government has not the information as to what those liabilities consist of. We know that there are liabilities which are not disclosed by this statement. A statement has been made in the House which has been practically admitted by the representative of the Government on this railway corporation.

Could there be a more reckless, a more audacious disregard of the most elementary principles of business than the making of this deal without this information? If the Government has the information, why is it refused to Parliament and to the people? It can only be because the information would not be palatable to Parliament, and might appear such as to endanger the passing of this measure. I do not care which horn of the dilemma the Government chooses to take. If it has not the information, then it is most derelict in the most elementary way, and if it has the information it is grossly guilty in not submitting it to Parliament. It is quite evident that some of the other admissions contained in the statement furnished by the railway company have aroused and seriously troubled the conscience of some of the honourable gentlemen opposite. Evidence is not lacking that some of our honourable friends on the other side who intend to vote for this measure do not feel quite easy about the matter.

My honourable friend from Sydney (Hon. Mr. McLennan) said the other day that this Bill is distasteful to him. I am quite sure that if all honourable gentlemen on the other side were to give their best thought about this Bill they would agree with my honourable friend from Cape Breton. We had the other day some evidence of awakening of conscience on the part of some gentlemen opposite in regard to this so-called concession about the fixing of a maximum for arbitration, which was given out to ease the souls of some of the troubled gentlemen opposite.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: It is not put in the Bill.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: No, it is not put in the Bill. Truly that concession will not satisfy the honourable gentleman from Cape Breton, for instance, and there must be other honourable gentlemen on the other side whose conscience must still be troubled; because I have too much respect for the business ability and intelligence and experience of some of those honourable gentlemen to believe that they can vote for this Bill with a perfectly clear conscience. I do not think that the very thin coating of sugar that has been put on this bitter pill is going to make it very easy to swallow. Upon the majority in this House now rests the whole responsibility for inflicting this iniquitous transaction upon the people of Canada.

But however scant is the information we have, we have enough evidently to arouse the conscience of some honourable gentlemen opposite.

There is great hostility to this measure throughout the country, though we see very little evidence of it in the press. What are the principal facts with which we are familiar? Those facts are taken from the Drayton-Acworth report, and are not contradicted. For instance, we have the unquestionable evidence that there have been invested in this enterprise some 383 millions of dollars. of which 300 millions have been furnished by the people of Canada. The commission finds that the maximum cost of the system as at present existing is 370 millions. They further find that the actual value of the whole system, including equipment, is 402 millions. The liabilities we do not know. They have been estimated all the way up to 650 millions. But there is one thing we do know, and that comes from unquestionable authority, from the representative of the Dominion Government on the board of this railway corporation, my honourable friend from Kingston (Hon. Mr. Richardson), who told us the other night that the liabilities of the company are almost 510 millions. Now, there is a fact that has not been and cannot be disputed; it stands uncontradicted in the Drayton report, which puts the valuation at 402 millions, so that we have 108 millions of liabilities over the value of the assets as determined by the commision's report. Besides that we have it on undoubted authority that all the stock of the company, 100 millions of stock was allotted for nothing, not one dollar being paid for it. I ask honourable gentlemen opposite, in all seriousness, how can you, how can any one arrive at the value of these shares without knowing what the liabilities of this company are? There is no question that the Government will have to pay these liabilities in full. Since 1914 the Government has been the owner of $40,000,000 of this stock by the agreement of that year, which provided for the possible acquisition of the remaining stock. To-day, by this Bill, the Government is taking over the remaining shares, this $60,000,000, so that when this Bill passes, if it does, the Government will be the owner of every share in that company. What is the Government going to do? Is it going to refuse to pay the liabilities over 402 million dollars? It must pay the 510 millions, which the honourable gentleman from Kingston says the company owes. It must pay the 650 millions if they owe that much. The Government will be the owner of the whole thing, lock, stock and barrel, and it must pay every dollar owing by that company, even to the amount of 650 millions.

We have also the further fact, which comes from the leader of the Government in this House, that this company to-day is clearly insolvent. We know also that of the guarantees, amounting to 211 millions, 107 millions have been given by the provinces and 104 millions by the Dominion. We have the fact that the provincial guarantees have priority over the Dominion guarantees.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Only partly. Our $35,000,000 comes first as a first mortgage.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: But they have priority for a large portion of their bonds. We know also, though that has not been officially stated to us, that a large portion of those bonds have been pledged, among others, to the Canadian Bank of Commerce.

Now, the manifest object of this Bill is admittedly to prevent the liquidation of this company. And for what purpose? For the purpose, it is alleged, of protecting the pledgees, the guarantors, and for the purpose of protecting the provinces' and Canada's credit. My own idea is that this Bill has no further object than the protection of Mackenzie and Mann and the pledgee bank, that is, the Canadian Bank of Commerce, and other pledgees. It is surely not to protect the provinces, and I will show you why. The provinces have priority for a large portion of their guarantee, if not the total. The liquidation of the company would not affect the provinces. They would get their money, and the whole of it, if there was liquidation. Otherwise we would be driven to the conclusion that the railway company is not to-day worth the amount for which the provinces are responsible, and it is only in that event that the liquidation of this company could in any way affect the provinces. They are going to get their money no matter what happens. It does not matter whether it is liquidation, a receiver, or anything else: They come first; and if this railway is not worth the 107 million dollars guaranteed by the provinces, what sort of bargain are we making to-day with Mackenzie and Mann? So that it cannot be for the protection of the provinces. Neither can it be for the protection of the national credit, which it is said would be seriously affected by the liquidation. There is the objection of my honourable friend the leader of the Government, who said that if there was liquidation there would be great difficulty in accounting between the provinces and the Dominion, and that it would not be possible to appoint a Dominion receiver. I think my honourable friend from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) answered that by citing the text of the Exchequer Court Act under which that could be done. But there is this further argument which I hope will appeal to my honourable friend: If liquidation were decided on, what is to prevent the Dominion Government and the provinces from coming together and appointing a receiver? It would be in their common interest to do so. The provinces would be interested in having a Dominion receiver, because then they would be sure that the system would be sold en bloc, as a going concern, and of course that would be the best way of realizing the highest price for this railway; so there is no difficulty there. I repeat that this Act was not conceived and is not being carried out with any idea whatever of protecting the provinces of Canada.

Now, what about the national credit? It is said that we are going to pay this huge sum of money to these gentlemen—who I do not think are entitled to any of it—in order to protect the national credit. That is the emptiest of all the arguments that have been advanced in support of this Bill. The national credit of Canada is more or less involved every time one of our large corporations gets into difficulties. Are we going to establish the precedent that if a great corporation gets into difficulty the Government is going to come to its help to save the national credit of Canada? Is not that what we are doing to-day? This is the indefensible bargain by which we are going to add nearly $600,000,000 to the national debt of Canada, nearly double what the total debt of Canada was before the war, nearly double the value of all the assets of this railway company. Is this deal going to help us with the lending nations of the world? Is it going to help us when they look into this indefensible bargain and find that we have paid nearly double the value of this railway? Is that not going to affect the credit of Canada much more than putting this railway into liquidation would? I repeat that it is not for the purpose of saving the national credit that this Bill has been thought of and is now being pressed through Parliament by closure and the withholding of essential information.

We have been told that confiscation is absolutely unthinkable—that the carrying out of the agreement of 1914 is unthinkable, and cannot be resorted to. Confiscation was thought of in 1914. It was accepted in 1914. It was accepted gladly by Mackenzie and Mann in 1914. They wanted $45,000,000, and they knew that they could not get it unless they agreed to the terms made by the Government at that time, which were that if they made default their property would become the property of Canada. If it is unthinkable to do that, was it not unthinkable three or four years ago? These gentlemen solemnly agreed to it, and they got $45,000,000 for agreeing to it. They would not have got 45 cents if they had not agreed to those terms, and to-day if the people of Canada ask for their own under this agreement they are told that they must pay for it, and perhaps pay $200,000,000 or $300,000,000 more than it is worth. We have not heard the word "confiscation" except from the Government. We have not heard it from the gentlemen from whom this railway is being taken over. Again I say that it is merely a bogy, a pretext, in order to help this matter through Parliament.

I ask honourable gentlemen this simple question: is there any concern, large or small, which finds itself in a bankrupt condition, which would not welcome some one to come along and pay its debts without asking anything for its bankrupt stock? Is not that what we are doing? We are relieving Mackenzie and Mann of any personal liability that they may be under, known and unknown, and besides that, we are going to pay them for stock which absolutely belongs to the people of Canada, and for which no money has been paid by those gentlemen, and which is, according to the report of the commissioners appointed by the present Government, absolutely without any value whatever. Seventy-five per cent of their railway has been built with Government money. Is there in this country, or in any country in the world, any bankrupt who would not thank me if I discharged him of his liabilities without asking me to pay something for his bankrupt stock? The Government may pass this measure by closure and by refusing Parliament and the people the information to which they are entitled; but I am quite sure that there are no business men in Canada who are going to be fooled, or gagged over this. I am sure that honourable gentlemen know that what I am enunciating now is so, and that there is no answer to it. I can see before me men who have made a reputation in business in Canada, and I am sure that they know that what I am saying is without any answer whatever. The business men of Canada who are acquainted with the elementary rules of business will apply those rules when they come to size up this bargain.

I also take the position which has been taken by the honourable gentleman from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power), that by the agreement made in 1914, by which these gentlemen got $45,000,000 of Canadian money, it was provided that if they were not able to pay that money, if they were not able to put their business on a proper footing, their property and the stock for which we are now asked to pay would be the property of Canada. Under that Act, by the default, the property of the Canadian Northern automatically becomes the property of Canada. As my honourable friend put it, we are trustees and have no right to take what belongs to the people of Canada and give it to Mackenzie and Mann or to anyone else. There is not one lawyer in Canada who is careful of his reputation who would say that it can legally be done. There is no court of law or equity in Canada that would give to the bargain of 1914 the interpretation, the result, and the effect which the Government is trying to give to it.

From all points of view this measure is wholly indefensible, and I submit that it is clearly the duty of the Senate to defeat the Bill. Speaking for myself—because I do not know that all honourable gentlemen on this side of the House will follow me—I may say that my greatest objection to the Bill is that it constitutes a definite acceptance and adoption of the policy of Government ownership and operation and all which that implies. Bad as the agreement is, one-sided as it is, iniquitous as it may be, I think it ought to be condemned more because it is the definite acceptance by Canada of public ownership. We are adopting this policy of nationalization without any consideration, without any thought, without any investigation, without any of the knowledge of conditions which have applied elsewhere in the world with regard to public ownership. It is a deliberately unreasoned and unreasonable plunge into the policy of public ownership. I agree with my honourable friend from Cape Breton (Hon. Mr. McLennan) that public ownership is the last thing that Canada should enter into. We do not know, and no one has even asserted, that it is practicable here. No one has given any figures to show that it is practicable or ought to be resorted to; no one seems to have given the subject the slightest consideration; no one has favoured us with his views on the subject, except my friend from Cape Breton. But we know this, that if we acquire the Canadian Northern railway, and if we operate it as we are bound to operate it now, because it is our property, we have to operate it with a deficit of $20,000,000 a year. This means that we have to take over the Grand Trunk Pacific also, and if we are going to have nationalization, we will have to take over the Canadian Pacific railway. What does that mean? It means the addition of at least $2,000,000,000 to the national debt of Canada.

Some gentlemen in this House, and some outside of it, think that public ownership is a modern discovery, that it is the great solution of all the great troubles nowadays. Public ownership is not new at all. It is as old as the hills. There were monopolies of various kinds at all times, even before the Christian era. Pliny tells us that a bakers' union was organized about 200 years before Christ. Rome had its imperial factories, its imperial mines, and its imperial industries. The state provided the people with bread and amusement—"panem et circenses." Rome had its public lotteries, all administered at the expense of and by the state, with the result that venality, corruption, debasement of character, destruction of the spirit of industry, strikes, revolutions, and so on, were rampant. How was public ownership carried on? It was carried out by the greatest system of plunder which ever existed, and which the Roman Empire inflicted throughout its conquered provinces and by a most inexorable system of taxation of its subjects, with the result, as we all know, that it brought down the Roman Empire. As we pass on to feudal times, we find the common mill and the common wine press. The kings of England and France and the seignors of Europe encouraged these monopolies because of the use they were enabled to make of them. We all know that the guilds of England and the the hanses of France and Germany monopolized the industry, the commerce, the trade, and the navigation where the kings themselves did not do so. There was no individual enterprise, no individual initiative, no individual spirit or individual activity, with the result that we find that in the 18th century weaving was done in very much the same manner as it was done in the third century. The great industrial centres of Birmingham, Manchester, Leeds and Sheffield became possible only because they were withdrawn from the hampering influences of guilds, and because they enjoyed freedom of labour and freedom of capital. Competition with state regulation solved the difficulties caused by the monopolies, the guilds and the hanses. Individualism has been the greatest factor in England's prosperity at home and in her possessions.

If there is any people to whom the principle and practice of nationalization should be repugnant it is the British people. It is not by public ownership that Britain has taken possession of such a great portion of the world, and has established so many prosperous colonies. Sometimes we are told that public ownership or public management of public utilities has been resorted to with success in certain parts. The city of Glasgow, for instance, it is claimed, has had a great success with it. We all know why. Glasgow is a very large and most important industrial centre. Glasgow has a population of nearly a million and a half, and half the population of Scotland resides within a half hour's journey of that city. Where you have a country which is so thickly populated, such as the British Isles, public operation or public ownership may be successful. A few years ago England had a population of 558 persons to the square mile, the United States had 21, and Canada had 1.5. London has an area of 75,000 acres, and a population of nearly 7,000,000, whilst Canada, with about the same population, has an area of 3,600,000 square miles. In Canada only one-quarter of our territory is occupied. Those who talk so glibly about public ownership ought to bear these things in mind. They ought to know that in a country like Canada public ownership is and must be for many generations out of the question.

If the House will pardon me for a moment, I will read the opinion of the gentleman who is responsible for the success of public ownership in Glasgow, the only place on earth where I know public ownership to be a success. Some years ago he was sent for by a society in the United States to investigate matters and to give his opinion as to the possibility of public ownership in America. This is what he said on landing in New York—I take it from the North American Review:

> I see no reason why Chicago, or any other city of this country should not be able to own its street railways, and to run them with as much success as we have achieved at Glasgow. I admit that the proposition in Chicago is a much larger one than the one we had to tackle, but at the bottom it is the same. The people of Glasgow would not go back to the old days of private ownership for anything in the world. I am not saying that a company would not do as well by the public. I know, in fact, that it could, but it would be doing so with a somewhat different aim in view, for the company has always the shareholders to consider, and I have to admit that you will find people in Glasgow to-day—quite influential people too—who say that the street car service is not profitable.

Mr. Dalrymple went to Chicago and other places in the United States and investigated the whole subject. He made himself familiar with conditions, and before leaving for the old country this is what he had to say:

> To put street railways, gas works, telephone companies, etc., under municipal ownership would create a political machine in every large city that would be simply impregnable. These political machines are already strong enough with their control of policemen, firemen, and other office holders. If in addition to this, they could control the thousands of men employed in the great public utility corporations, the political machines would have a power that could not be overthrown. I came to this country a believer in public ownership. What I have seen here, and I have studied the situation carefully, make me realize that private ownership under proper conditions is far better for the citizens of American cities.

Now, what would public operation mean to us in Canada? It would mean, as I said a moment ago, that our national debt would be increased by $2,000,000,000 at least. It would mean that we would add about 600,000 employees to the public service, who would form a huge bureaucracy numbering one-tenth of the population and possessing more than one-third of the total national voting power, a bureaucracy with ramifications from end to end of the country and which could be easily mobilized into a solid coalition to effectively and permanently direct and control the whole governmental function. Nationalization would destroy the individualism, energy, ambition and competition which have given the country so many of its necessary or prosperous undertakings. It would mean that the Government of Canada would become the common carrier of its people on river, land, lake and ocean. It would have to operate hotels, telephones, telegraphs; it would engage in the manufacture of cars, locomotives, rails, tiles, lumber, paints, oils and other materials. It would mean that the Government's attention would be diverted from its legitimate function, which is to govern, to administer justice equally to its citizens, and to provide protection to the State, to its members and to their lives, property, health and education, for the purpose of encroaching upon the legitimate activity of the individual, and it would make practically one-half of the people of Canada the servants or slaves of the other half. Let us remember that nowhere is the burden of government heavier than it is in Canada, and that its task is nowhere more difficult, especially at this time, and that it is going to be so for generations to come. What justification is there for any increase to that burden unless it is to enlarge to a dangerous extent the activities and concerns of government and its powers and its indirect influences—unless it is desired to establish an all-pervading and omnipotent bureaucracy, to increase in a very large measure the already unbearable burden and nuisance of party patronage? It ought to be plain to any one who will work out the problem that nationalization of public utilities will inevitably prove to be a most disastrous failure in Canada and that the only policy which is suitable to Canadian conditions is government regulation and control.

I cannot understand people being so thoughtless and so reckless as to go in for such a change in the conduct of our affairs as is implied by the adoption of the principle of national operation, which is inevitable under this Act. It has been urged that this measure ought to be adopted if only to prevent the Canadian Pacific railway from acquiring the Canadian Northern and thereby exercising a monopoly in Canada. For my part I may say at once that I would rather have the Canadian Pacific own this railway than that the country should own it and go into the nationalization of railways. But there is no necessity for the Canadian Pacific Railway company acquiring this railroad. And if it did acquire it, after all, the Canadian Pacific railway is subject to control and regulation.

Honourable gentlemen, there is the crux of the whole matter. It is not nationalization that Canada wants; it is regulation and control, and we have gone a very long way in that direction by clothing the Railway Commission with the powers which we have given to it. There is no such thing to-day as the Canadian Pacific railway or any other company exercising an actual monopoly in Canada. They cannot do it any more than it is being done to-day, as was pointed out this afternoon by the honourable gentleman from Rideau (Hon. Mr. Edwards), who, I am sorry to say, does not share my views except on this point. There is, in reality, no competition to-day in the greater number of places in Canada, though we have three transcontinental railways. The only way to prevent exorbitant rates, to prevent the consequences of monopolies, is by doing that which we have done. So the fear of the Canadian Pacific railway exercising a monopoly is another one of the many pretexts invented in order to secure the passage of this Bill. If the Canadian Government is so much afraid of the monopolistic results which might follow the liquidation of this company—if the Government is so much afraid of the Canadian Pacific Railway company acquiring this road, how is it, as we have been told in this House and in another place, that, with the consent and participation of the Government of Canada, negotiations were carried on between the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian Northern for the acquisition by the Canadian Pacific of this railway? The Government would have been quite willing if the Canadian Pacific had absorbed the Canadian Northern—provided the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian Northern had been able to come to terms. To-day we are told that this measure must be passed, that the people of Canada must be deprived of their property, and Mackenzie and Mann paid countless millions for it, in order to prevent the Canadian Northern and the Canadian Pacific from combining—another one of the many pretexts invented to carry this measure.

One word more about national operation. Assuming that nationalization could ever be a proper policy for this country of ours, what possible chance could nationalization have in this country or in any country, when it is entered into in the manner which is now proposed? You are starting it with a deficit of over $200,000,000, besides all the handicaps which I have stated. You hope to make nationalization a success in Canada. Why, you strangle the thing at its very birth. Yet, with a stroke of the pen, with closure in the other House, and the refusal of all information in this House, this Bill is shoved through, and you are calling for a policy which starts off with a deficit of $200,000,000. And some honourable gentlemen are confident enough——shall I say simple enough—to assume that the Government is going to make a success of nationalization in Canada.

Honourable gentlemen, this is an inquitous measure. The country knows it is iniquitous. It behooves the majority in this House to do its duty. As has been very properly said already, the eyes of the country are rivetted on the Senate, and it is the duty of members of this honourable House to see that this measure is not passed. The honour of the Senate is at stake. Here in this House we should be free from mere party considerations.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My honourable friend laughs. I have been sitting in this House for eight years, and I challenge any honourable gentleman who has sat here during that time to say that I have ever made a party speech in this House.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: We all laugh now.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: There is a young Tory.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I do not know what the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Crosby) is laughing about.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I am laughing at this. The honourable gentleman stated that as long as he has been in this House he has never made a partisan speech. I have never heard the honourable gentleman make anything else since I have been here. What is the bilingual question, which the honourable gentleman has brought up here?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I shall not lose any sleep over any opinion, partisan or other, that the honourable gentleman may express.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Nobody pays any attention to the honourable gentleman.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It is the duty of the Senate to prevent this measure from going through. The honour of the House is at stake. Honourable gentlemen should not look at the question from a party point of view, but exclusively from the point of view of the interests of Canada. We are to-day in the position of trustees, as has been very properly said by the honourable gentleman from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power). I repeat, we are the trustees of the people of Canada. This property is theirs to-day, and it would be only by our connivance with those gentlemen that the people would be deprived of their property and the Canadian Northern Railway company paid hundreds of millions of dollars for what no longer belongs to them, besides referring to arbitration the question of the value of this $60,000,000 of stock, which, according to the report of the Government commissioners, is valueless. Surely the honourable members of this House will think twice before passing such a measure.

Hon. D. O. L'ESPERANCE: Honourable gentlemen, I had not intended to speak on this measure, as the discussion has been complete on both sides of the House. It is true that the amendment calls for more information, but I do not know what more could have been said pro and con even if more information had been given. I desire to say a few words and shall confine my remarks to the argument which has been made by the honourable gentleman from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) and the honourable gentleman from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette) to-day. In the course of his very able speech, the honourable gentleman from De Salaberry has drawn a contrast between the policy of receivership, which was so popular in the United States twenty or twenty-five years ago and the legislation now before this Parliament for the purchase of the Canadian Northern Railway stock. He told us that he had at times been the fortunate or unfortunate possessor of shares in some of the American railways which have gone to the wall but have since safely emerged under the benevolent and guiding hand of the receiver. He explained to us that he had several times been forced to put his hand in his pocket to subscribe to the call for extra capital made by the receiver in order to protect his interest in the securities of these railways which fortunately for him have since enjoyed a long period of prosperity and have seen their stock go skyward; as, for instance, the stock of the Union Pacific railway, which in 1898 sold under $20 per share, but eight years afterwards, in 1906, sold as high as $195 per share, and three years later, in 1909, reached the high mark of $219 per share. I hope that my honourable friend had a good slice of these shares and that he held them long enough to see his perspicacity rewarded. But what about the unfortunate shareholders who, some years previous, when the stock was paying 7 per cent and selling over par, had invested all their savings in these securities and who, unlike my honourable friend, had no money left in their pockets to meet the extra calls upon them when the hard times came? They were washed out, or, to put it correctly, their stock was stolen away from them by the very men who had unloaded on them at high prices some years previous and were since hiding behind the receiver to get it back at receivership prices.

I have no hesitation in saying that the schemes under which some of the great American railway systems at first enjoyed a few years of prosperity, were then brought to ruin, forced in the hands of receivers, and reorganized for the benefit of high financiers, make one of the saddest chapters in the economic life of our great neighbour to the south.

My honourable friend from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette) said it was a shame to buy the stock of a company which had not been listed on the market. Well, let us thank God that Sir William Mackenzie and Sir Donald Mann, unlike so many American and Canadian financial geniuses, did not take advantage of the boom days which this country enjoyed a few years previous to the war to unload the stock of the Canadian Northern railway on a gullible public who were then ready to buy anything at any price. The result to-day would be appalling because the Government would be unable to secure the control of the road. The Government would be unable to protect the innocent investor, the road would go in the hands of receivers, and we would see in this country a repetition of what took place some twenty years ago in the United States.

I am not here to defend Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann. One of these gentlemen I do not know; the other I have but a slight acquaintance with. I owe them or their enterprise nothing; they owe me nothing; but I have no hesitation in saying that, in my humble opinion, they have accomplished a great work for this country. They have built one of the best transcontinental railways on this continent. This is admitted on both sides of the House. Their line passes through the most fertile parts of Canada; this is also admitted; and it is also admitted that they have financed their undertaking under the best of conditions. They have failed just as they were reaching the goal; and, like every man who fails, they are being now roundly abused; but I hope they have the stout heart that great minds and great men generally possess, because there can be no compensation, it seems to me, for the situation now forced upon them. But the least that this Parliament and this country owe to them is to see that they are treated fairly.

Some of my honourable friends on the other side of the House are convinced that the Canadian Northern railway stock is worthless. Why not, then, wait patiently for the decision of the court of arbitration? Are we to assume that the honourable gentlemen on the other side of the House have no confidence whatever in the judgment and the integrity of the arbitrators?

For my part, I would be ashamed of this Government if we were to enter upon this great national undertaking through the methods which have made some American financiers famous and multi-millionaires at the expense of the innocent investors and of the best interests of their country. I do not care if a dividend is earned on the common stock of the Canadian Northern so long as the road is honestly and properly managed.

The Canadian Pacific railway is one of the best managed railways in North America; but its administrators have a duty to perform to their shareholders as well as to the public of this country. The stock pays 10 per cent dividend, but how much of this remains in this country? Out of $26,000,000 paid in dividends on its common stock, I think I am safe in stating that at least $20,000,000 go abroad.

The big men must get reconciled to the policy of public control and ownership. For my part, as one who has been employed for seventeen years on a government-owned railway, and who is still very proud to belong to one of their unions, I venture to say that the brotherhoods of railway engineers and firemen, conductors and trainmen, telegraphers, roadmen, clerks, and others, will welcome this national policy, which will make of that vast army of railroad employees not mere wage-earners, but shareholders in practically half the railway lines of this Dominion.

The day is fast passing away when a few men will control the wealth of the nation. With the rising of democracies the men possessed of large abilities will have a greater ideal before them than the mere acquisition of large personal fortunes, and more of them will be found willing, as we have found them in this war, to serve their country for the benefit of the whole nation.

Hon. ARTHUR BOYER: Just a word in answer to my honourable friend who sympathizes with those who happened to have some Union Pacific stock and were called upon to pay $300 a share when a receiver was appointed. Were those losses different from those of people throughout Canada who speculated in real estate and lost every cent they had? It strikes me that their loss is not in the least different from that of persons who put money into a railroad and invested it for whatever it could earn. If the investment is unprofitable it is their loss. The property had to be saved in some way or other, and the only way to save it was by a public receivership. It drained out of the Union Pacific every drop of water that had been put in, and it placed the railroad on a proper basis and made it one of the best paying railroads in the United States if not in the world.

My honourable friend has drawn attention to the large dividends paid by the Canadian Pacific railway, amounting to some $26,000,000 a year, of which, he says, only $6,000,000 remains in Canada. Supposing we acquire the Canadian Northern, we shall have to borrow money abroad. Will the interest remain in the country or shall we pay the interest abroad? The bonds are all abroad. Every cent that is owed by the Canadian Northern in the way of debenture debt was floated in London or some of it in Paris, so that a great deal of the interest goes abroad and not very much remains in Canada.

I have been waiting patiently for a technical definition of the words "common stock." Is it made for common people so as to deceive the public? It is a new creation of the last 20 years. In the olden days, when a company was floated, it was floated on what we called stock. You find no common stock in a bank. There is no common stock in the Grand Trunk railway. There is no common stock in the Canadian Pacific railway. Everything was honestly floated, dollar for dollar, cent for cent, and no common stock was created. This common stock, as I have already stated, is a creation of the last 20 years, made partly to deceive the large majority of investors. What is the rule followed? As a rule, large corporations in our days are floated on debentures. The Canadian Pacific railway was built on stock —not common stock. Every man who subscribed $100 got one share of stock, but there was no common stock about it. The Canadian Northern was built on debentures; it was built with money borrowed abroad, and, as a last venture, as a premium to the men who created that big railroad, $100,000,000 of common stock was put on. Was that stock ever floated in the country? My honourable friend has said no, because he stated that it would have been a loss to the investors. Well, if it would have been a loss to the investors, where does the gain to the Government come in? God knows that the Government will not make more money out of it than 100,000 investors could have made if they had got possession of that common stock. If that stock had been floated on the market and had created an interest in the Canadian Northern, it would have been almost invincible.

Those two men who have built such a railroad are, I admit, great men. The building of the railroad required genius such as one meets with seldom in a lifetime. To have been able to rope in the Government of Canada, as has been done, to rope in every province in the Dominion, as has been done, to get subsidies from municipalities, as has been done, required cunning and genius, and those men possessed it and succeeded in their venture. Now we are face to face with what is commonly caled "common stock." The Government will buy this common stock, which never was put into the company, and if my honourable friend from Quebec (Hon. Mr. L'Espérance) will take the trouble to read the report of the three gentlemen appointed by the Government to investigate those two railways, the National Transcontinental and the Canadian Northern, he will see that not one cent of this $100,000,000 of common stock was ever put into the company, but it was a sort of bonus created by those who built the road as an endowment to themselves; and to-day we are called upon to buy this common stock for the benefit of the company and to acquire another large railroad.

It is within the knowledge of every honourable gentleman of this House that we own one big railway, the Intercolonial. And God help the management of it! I think one railroad is quite enough for the Government to mismanage without saddling upon it five or six thousand more miles to mismanage. There is not a train on the Intercolonial that runs on time. There is not a train that can be depended on. Let me give you one instance of that. Some very wealthy Americans who own houses in Murray Bay closed their houses and crossed the St. Lawrence to take the train at Rivière Ouelle. They had beforehand secured their Pullmans. One special car was waiting for some American ladies, the husband of one of whom was a director of the New York Central. No ticket was taken up on the train. The train got into Montreal two hours late, and all on that train missed their connections, and had to take their children, the nurses and the rest of the company, to the Windsor or to the Ritz. Yet we laud the nationalization of railroads and want the Government to take possession of another road to be mismanaged. If you start on a journey on a railroad managed by the Government from Quebec to Vancouver you run a very good chance of being, if not six months, at least six weeks, late on the journey.

Gentlemen, this question has been thrashed out. We are quite willing to help the Canadian Northern. Why not, in helping that road, adopt the same policy as Great Britain adopted? We are in war-time; the cry is, let us use every resource of the country for winning the war. Now, where shall we get the money to pay for this common stock? The last Canadian loan raised in New York actually cost the country six and a half per cent.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: Eight, or seven and a half.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Call it ten.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: Make it seven. Are we going to raise money on a railroad that already enjoys—if it is possible to call it enjoying—a bad reputation? Then, we have surely learned this, that every bondholder of the Canadian Northern, as soon as the bonds become due, will insist upon getting his money. I know that if I were a bondholder of the Canadian Northern, the day my bond came due, whether it was in possession of the Canadian Government or the present owners of the railroad, I certainly would insist on my money being returned, and handing them their bond. But this question has been thrashed out, and whatever may be said or done will not change by one iota the vote of this House. The Government has decided to carry the measure. Then we shall wait for the people to say what they have to say on the question, and whether they approve it or not. My opinion is that they do not.

The Senate divided on the proposed amendment of Hon. Mr. Bostock, and the same was negatived on the following division:

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of this honourable House, and particularly yourself, to a provision of the rules of the Senate governing the right to vote. The provision is a short one, but effective, and reads as follows:

No senator is entitled to vote upon any question in which he has any pecuniary interest whatsoever, not held in common with the rest of the Canadian subjects of the Crown; and the vote of any senator so interested will be disallowed.

The SPEAKER: Whom do you accuse of being interested?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I am quoting the rule before I accuse. Now, I accuse two senators on the other side of having voted against the provisions of the rule of the Senate. I find that two honourable senators —Senator Nicholls and Senator Richardson—have cast votes on this measure, in which they have a direct, personal interest, according to the verified statement of the Assistant Secretary of the Canadian Northern Railway company in the last stock register taken in the month of June, together, among other names, with William Mackenzie, $10,000, and so on—Hon. Mr. Nicholls, $2,000, and Hon. Mr. Richardson, $2,000. Therefore, according to the authority, those two honourable gentlemen are directly interested in this Bill; and I ask that the Speaker disallow their votes. That is according to the law of the Senate.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What is the date of the certificate?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: June.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I beg to say that, unless there is evidence forthcoming by the statement of any honourable senator, and he takes the responsibility of the statement, that at the present time those honourable gentlemen come within the language of Rule 53, namely, that they possess a pecuniary interest, no notice can be taken of the objection. Of course, it is quite obvious that any objection which might or would prevail in June last might not obtain to-day.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I thought it was the part of the honourable gentlemen themselves to answer.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Not necessarily.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Certainly, I should ask this honourable House to ask the two members whose vote is challenged to give an answer direct, and not to accept that of any third party.

Hon. Mr. POWER: That is the practice.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: What does a third party know any more than I know? I might hold a document in my hand showing that those gentlemen are interested to a large extent. It is up to them to deny it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There is no statement before the House at the present time that they have any pecuniary interest.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved:

That the word "not" be substituted for the word "now", and the following words be added at the end of the question:

"But that, in the opinion of this House, Parliament should proceed to take over the Canadian Northern Railway system for the benefit of the people of Canada under the Canadian Northern Railway Guarantee Act, 1914, chapter 20 of the statutes of 1914, and that the capital stock of the said Canadian Northern Company be considered under the said foreclosure order as possessing no value, and that nothing should be paid therefor."

McLaren,

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT moved:

That the word "not" be inserted before the word "now" and that the following words be added at the end of the question: "but that the further consideration of the said Bill be deferred until the Senate has been assured that the Government will enforce subsection E of clause 2 of the agreement which forms part of chapter 20 of the statutes 4-5, George V, which reads as follows:

That the Contractors will not at any time make or seek to enforce any claim for contractors' profits, commissions or otherwise against the Canadian Northern, or against any of the constituent or subsidiary companies, upon or in respect of any express or implied contract, understanding, agreement, or stipulation of any kind, heretofore or hereafter made, whereby or whereunder they or any one or more of them, may now or hereafter be entitled to receive from the Canadian Northern or from any of the constituent or subsidiary companies any construction profits, in respect of work heretofore undertaken, or as consideration for transfers of properties, rights, or franchises already transferred, or to be transferred under sub-clauses a and b of this clause, or for commission or remuneration for services in financing, or for any other services heretofore rendered, and all such claims are hereby by them and each of them absolutely renounced and released.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, I should like to say a few words on this amendment. The contract entered into by Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann and the Canadian Northern in 1914 contained the very clause which has just been read by His Honour the Speaker. This clause is an undertaking by the contractors not to claim anything for commissions or services. This is clear. It is in simple and clear English. Now, the Royal Commissioners appointed by the Government have declared that the stock, the value of which is to be ascertained by arbitration, was given for services rendered and that this stock represented all their remuneration for the building of the railway as constructed. These contractors bound themselves to make no claim for services. By virtue of clause 24 of the Act of 1914, that stock can be confiscated and taken away from them by foreclosure. The gentleman who drafted this contract, then Solicitor General and now Secretary of State, declared that the contract carried a lien on the 60 per cent of the stock held by Mackenzie and Mann. To-day, we are asked to appoint an arbitration court to find out the value of the equity in that stock in order to remunerate the contractors who declared that they would set up no claim for commission or services. The Royal Commissioners have declared that that stock was held simply as remuneration for services; the honourable the leader of the Government has stated that that stock was in their hands simply as remuneration for services. Now, surely, we are not to go into the teeth of the contract which was signed by them, and in which they declared that they would set up no claim for commissions or for services rendered. They may claim it, they try to claim it, for the Government sets up such a claim for them, because we have nothing from the contractors before us. The Government states a claim for them, and says: "We will arbitrate to see what equity they may have in the stock. We know why they hold the stock: it is for services rendered. We do not know if they have not been paid otherwise." Now, we have a change, a modification of the position of the Government since that Bill was passed in the House of Commons. In reply to the question put on Friday last by the honourable member for Hastings (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell), the honourable leader of the Government said that a maximum figure would be set, beyond which the arbitrators should not go. Has the Government in mind a reduction of the payment for the services rendered by the contractors?—because these shares were simply given to them as remuneration for their services. The members of this House who believe that the contractors who stand to benefit by the arbitration, and who bound themselves to make no claim for remuneration for their services, are entitled to nothing, that those shares are worth nothing, that there is no equity in those shares, stand where the Government stood when this contract was signed by both parties. Should we not at all events know from the honourable the leader of this House, before we go further, what is the maximum that the Government has decided to fix beyond which the arbitrators will not go? The country is now apprised of the fact that there will be a limitation to the discretion of the Commissioners. What will that limitation be? $60,000,000 is the face value of those shares. Has the Government decided to put a limit of $50,000,000? Has it decided to put the maximum at $10,000,000 or $5,000,000? Let us not delude ourselves, honourable gentlemen. In spite of the reservation whichi the Government will set, we will find that the arbitrators will fix the maximum amount which the Government will allow them to set by the agreement or through the modification of this Bill, if this Chamber so decides. Is not the country interested in knowing, and is not this Senate, before voting on the second reading of the Bill, interested in knowing if $500,000 will be paid by this Government as the compensation to be given to the contractors—or $5,000,000 if the Government thinks they are entitled to that amount—or even $25,000,000? We must all accept responsibility for the stand we take and the vote we give, and the maximum amount which will be fixed will very likely be the one the arbitration will award. A certain number of senators supporting the Government on this measure would surely be influenced by the knowledge that there is a limitation. Many members of this Chamber, as I have said, have told us that the Government should stand by the contract and the contractors should stand by their own signatures. But at all events are not those members supporting the Government, and who support them in this measure, entitled to know, and is not the country entitled to know, what is the maximum figure which will be fixed and beyond which the arbitrators may not go?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: My honourable friend from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) has pointed out the effect of this clause of the contract, and I think it is one on which we should certainly have some expression of opinion from the Government as to what they are going to do. In the course of this debate certain questions have been asked the honourable leader of the Government in connection with this matter, and I want to point out now that, with regard to one of the questions which I personally asked the honourable leader of the Government, I did not receive a full answer. On page 972 of the Official Report of the Debates of the Senate will be found the following questions which I asked:

> What is the amount of loans? What is the amount of securities? Were these loans made to Mackenzie and Mann, Limited, or to the Canadian Northern railway? When these loans are paid to whom will these securities so pledged revert—to the Canadian Northern railway, or to Mackenzie and Mann, or to other parties?

The answer which I received was:

> All loans to the Canadian Northern railway are shown in the blue-book No. 237. When the loans are repaid all securities held will revert to the Canadian Northern railway.

Honourable gentlemen will see that I received no answer to the question as to any loans that were made to Mackenzie and Mann, Limited. I think that the House is entitled to know before voting on this Bill whether or not any loans have been made to Mackenzie and Mann, Limited. as we are told in a statement that has been made as to who the holders of this stock are, that Mackenzie and Mann, Limited, hold some $58,000,000 out of the $60,000,000 of stock, the loans may have been made upon that stock to Mackenzie and Mann, Limited, and we may find that, if this Bill goes through as it is, the country will be paying money that has been loaned to Mackenzie and Mann, Limited. I do not think the country is called upon to make any payment of that kind. That is one of the points which I think should be cleared up before we are asked to vote on the second reading of this Bill.

Further, I think that the answer made by the honourable leader of the Government the other day to my honourable friend from Hastings (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell), while it may have satisfied him—I do not know that it did, because I give him credit for being a shrewd and far-seeing gentleman—did not satisfy honourable gentlemen on this side of the House. If any arrangement is to be made, if any sum is to be stated as the maximum that shall be paid on the stock, I think it should be stated in the Bill itself. Further, I think that the Bill should provide that no money shall be paid over to the Canadian Northern Railway system by the Government until the Government know what are all the liabilities which they are are all the liabilities which they are assuming on behalf of the people in connection with this matter. A period should be fixed within which anybody who has any kind of claim against the Canadian Northern Railway system should file his claim, and after the date specified no claim that has not been made should be acknowledged at all, and until that time I do not think that any money should be paid over by the Government on account of this stock. If the Government is prepared to fix in the agreement the maximum amount that is to be paid for the stock, it would be very much better that they fixed it in the Bill, and told us clearly and distinctly what it is their intention to do. The country is entitled to know what is the extent of the liabilities it has to meet in this matter, and the Government should take over this railway system clear of all liabilities and all trouble.

I want to refer also to a matter connected with the title to the property. In the report made by Drayton and Acworth we find, on page 69, these words:

We find that the title to certain property which is used for railway purposes has not yet been vested in the Canadian Northern. It was among the conditions on which the Government loan of $45,000,000 was granted in 1914, that this should be done. We pointed the omission out to Mr. McLeod, the company's general manager, who stated that it was merely an oversight, and that the intention was that all titles should be got in.

It seems rather curious that a matter of this kind should be allowed to go on. The Act of 1914 was passed on the understanding that it would be enforced and everything would be put in order, and here we find the commission appointed by the Government in 1917 to inquire into this matter pointing out that within those three years they had not got in all the titles to the property. We have nothing to show what the extent of that delinquency is, or how much property there is without title. I think that this question should be settled, and it should be provided in the Bill that no money shall be paid over until those titles are absolutely made over to the Government—that the Government and the country should not be in the position of having a liability possibly cast up to them later on by somebody coming forward and saying: "Oh, but this part of the railway belongs to me; you have not got the title to it." It may be a small matter, but on the other hand it may be a very big matter and a very serious one for the Government and the country, and I think it is a matter which should be dealt with, and we should have an assurance from the Government that that will be done.

Of course, we are placed in a rather awkward position in one way, on these questions. In 1914 we had the assurance of the Government that if any fault arose in connection with this company certain action would be taken; but we are brought face to face with this situation at the present time, that although the Government acknowledges that the question of default has arisen—that, as was stated by the honourable leader of the Governement the other night, this company is insolvent—at the same time they have refused to take the action which lay to their hands and which the company thought and expected they would take, but instead have brought down the Bill now before us. I think we should certainly receive the assurance of the Government, as has been asked for in this amendment, before we proceed to deal further with this Bill.

The Senate divided on the proposed amendment of Hon. Mr. Belcourt, and the same was negatived on the following division:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK.

McLaren,

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I would like to ask the honourable leader of the Government, before the second reading is carried, if it is his intention to amend this Bill along the lines suggested in the committee stage.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I did not suggest any amendment.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: What I had in mind was that the honourable gentleman was going to answer the honourable member for Hastings (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell), and I asked him if he would not put the matter in the Bill instead of in the agreement, so that the country might know.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I did not say so.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: No, but he is asking you now.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, no.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Is it the intention of the honourable gentleman or the Government, before this Bill is adopted, to declare what maximum amount will be fixed?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I think not; not before the Bill is adopted.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: In what way will it be declared? In the Bill?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: In the agreement referred to in the Bill, when the agreement comes to be drawn.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Parliament will not be a party to the agreement.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Parliament authorizes the Government to enter into the agreement.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But does not the honourable gentleman think that Parliament is entitled to know what will be the maximum figure beyond which the arbitrators may not go?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not think Parliament will insist on that. I think they will have sufficient confidence in the Government to permit the Government to fix the amount.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I hope I shall not shock the susceptibilities of my honourable friend too much if I tell him that nearly half of this Chamber would be very insistent upon knowing what is the maximum figure.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, I think it would in all probability be 37 to 43.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I want to give notice to my honourable friend——

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order, order.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Before this Bill is read the second time I would like to give notice to my honourable friend that I intend to move in committee that the arbitrators may, if they do find that there is an equity, allow the contractors stock instead of money.

The main motion was agreed to on the same division reversed, and the Bill was read the second time.

LIVE STOCK BILL.

FIRST READING.

Bill 123, an Act respecting Live Stock.—Hon. Sir James Lougheed.

MILITARY VOTERS' BILL.

MOTION FOR SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 127, the Military Voters' Act, 1917.

He said: When I proposed the other night to move the second reading of this Bill I was asked if it was intended to practically supersede the legislation which we passed in 1915. I might say that is the case. The principle of this measure was adopted in Canada in 1915. The present Bill extends to others than members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, to which the Act of 1915 was confined. The present Bill takes in all persons, male or female, who are serving within Canadian or British military or naval forces within North America or Europe. It differs from the 1915 Act in the further respect that it makes no distinction as to the age of the voter, the sex, or the race. Indians can vote. I give these particulars to my honourable friend, as it may dispense with the necessity of going closely through the Bill, which is rather a lengthy one.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Are they all British subjects?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. Further, there has been a change as concerns the residential qualifications. Under the 1915 Act it was necessary that the voters should have been on an electoral list or should have acquired a residential qualification by at least three months fixed residence in a particular place and a longer residence within Canada. Under the present legislation "military electors," which expression includes all persons who can vote under the Act, are authorized to vote, whether or not they have been residents of Canada. The places within Canada where, if at all, they have been resident become material only with respect to the allocation of their votes. A person must vote at the place where he was last resident for four continuous months of the last year of his residence in Canada. The four months mentioned must precede his enlistment. If he has not been resident during any four months, he votes at the place where he has been ordinarily resident; and if he has not been resident at all, he votes within some electoral district to be selected by himself. There is a change, too, in the mode of polling. Under the 1915 Act the polling overseas was similar to that adopted by the present legislation. The method of polling within Canada, however, was much more complicated. It was necessary to secure in advance a list of the names of persons within camps who wished to vote on election day and of their electoral districts; to have them make declaration; to communicate with the returning officers of the electoral districts; to have ballot forms for the necessary electoral districts sent to the camps or other places where soldiers might be; to have maybe forty or fifty different ballot boxes in each camp, perhaps more; to conduct as many different elections. After the polling, these ballot boxes had to be sent out to as many different returning officers, and they had to reach the returning officers before the close of the ordinary polling day or they would be too late. The new draft provides a uniform and simple mode of receiving and recording votes of all concerned. The polling, counting and returning of ballots will be the same within Canada as overseas, but there will be only one day's polling in Canada, on the same day as ordinary polling, whereas the polling overseas will extend over a period of twenty-eight days. The nomination day will be twenty-eight days in advance of polling day instead of seven as at present, and polling may commence overseas on nomination day.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: That will be nomination day for the whole of Canada?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. Polling will cease simultaneously in Canada and overseas.

The form of ballot adopted in the 1915 Act has been preserved, with amendments designed to make it more easily understood by the voter, and a place has been added for a possible labour candidate.

The machinery for receiving, counting, and returning votes will be as follows:

1. A general returning officer will be located at Ottawa. Through this officer will come all returns, and in the last analysis he will make return for every electoral district in Canada.

2. The Assistant Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to be located in England will perform within Europe all the functions of the Clerk of the Crown in Canada.

3. The ordinary election returns of civilian voters in Canada will be counted as at present by the deputy returning officers, and in due course the ordinary returning officers, instead of making return that So-and-so is elected, will make a return to the general returning officer that So-and-so and So-and-so have received so many votes.

4. Presiding officers, who will be the equivalent of the ordinary returning officers, will have assigned to them certain military or naval areas and certain military and naval electors within these areas. The presiding officers will appoint deputy presiding officers, who will be the equivalent of the ordinary deputy returning officers. These deputy presiding officers, who will receive the military and naval votes within Canada, will not open the ballot boxes or count the ballots therein, but will send them direct to the general returning officer at Ottawa. They will be counted at Ottawa in the manner hereinafter mentioned and the results applied to the proper military district. When the general returning officer has received returns from overseas, he will add the votes received from the several sources and applicable to the different electoral districts, and make return as respects each electoral district as to what candidate has been elected.

5. Presiding officers and deputy presiding officers will operate overseas in the same way as in Canada, but at the close of the polling the deputy presiding officers within the United Kingdom will send in their ballot boxes to the Secretary of the High Commissioner's office in London, whereas the deputy presiding officer on the Continent of Europe will send in the ballot boxes to the office of the Canadian Commissioner to France in Paris.

6. The counting of the ballots as received, whether at Ottawa, London, or Paris, will be done by officers who will be known as special returning officers. These will be appointed with an equivalent number of clerks, half of each of them on the nomination of the Prime Minister and the other half on the nomination of the leader of the Opposition. They report the results of the count to the general returning officer, Secretary of the High Commissioner or Canadian Commissioner to France respectively, and the latter two named report results by cable to the general returning officer, who declares as previously mentioned.

7. Each ballot box will of course contain many different ballots to be applied to many different electoral districts. Special returning officers will perform their work by several different processes. Each different ballot will be in a different envelope, from the endorsement upon which it will be possible to allocate the vote to a particular electoral district. The first process will be allocation of the ballots to their proper electoral district. Next will be the opening of the envelopes and the placing of the ballots therein within ballot boxes appropriated to particular electoral districts. The next will be the counting of the ballots and checking the results by the poll books which will be written up from the envelopes. Envelopes will contain the name, number, etc., of the voter. Absolute secrecy is possible according to the system and directions for operation.

The reasons for the introduction of this new Act are:

1. The increase six-fold, since the other Act was passed, of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, and the taking on of Canadian soldiers within the Imperial forces and of Canadians within the navy.

2. The greater submarine peril, rendering the transmission of the actual ballots across the ocean before counting so problematical an undertaking.

3. The tremendous expense incident to the transmission of ballots and election paraphernalia from Canada to England and back again and its distribution to the electoral districts, and the uncertainly of its reaching the electoral district in time for counting and declaration on polling day.

According to the newly proposed system, all the operations of the election will be carried out in England and in France; and in Canada, the general returning officer at Ottawa will operate a clearing house, and all results will be declared through him.

A delay of about five weeks will occur in the announcement of the final results. This is unavoidable. Time has to elapse for the receiving of the overseas ballot boxes from overseas polls, the allocation, counting, etc. The Act is elastic in this respect. While it states a period of thirty days after polling as the day for beginning to count military and naval ballots polled, it enables them be to counted sooner if the ballot boxes have all been sooner received. The allocation of the ballots to their proper electoral districts is proceeding during the period of thirty days, so that actual counting will be all that will remain to be done. It ought to consume only two or three days, as returns are received by the general returning officer, who will of course declare them. There would be in all probability three different publications by him, and many intermediate publications of individual returns.

The three intermediate publications referred to are:

1. Returns of Canadian voting by civilians.

2. Returns of military and naval voting within Canada.

3. Returns of military and naval voting overseas.

Possibly the latter may be divided into three different publications: (a) returns from England, (b) returns from France, (c) returns from Bermuda.

It is anticipated, as stated, that about five weeks will elapse between polling day and final announcement by the general returning officer as to final results in all the electoral districts:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: What about returns from Salonica?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not know, except that they could come in by way of France or England.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: If there is a fight on at the front, how are you going to take the votes?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We will have to take our chances. There will be no deferred elections except in the Yukon, where deferring the election is unavoidable because of the necessary times which have to elapse because of the present provisions of the Election Act and the conditions prevailing in that territory. I therefore move the second reading.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Bostock, the debate was adjourned.

MILITARY SERVICE BILL.

BOARD OF SELECTION.

The Hon. the SPEAKER informed the Senate that he had received a message from the House of Commons informing this House that the House of Commons had passed the following resolution:

Resolved by the House of Commons of Canada, that the following gentlemen do compose the board of selection to appoint members of local tribunals under section 6 of the Military Service Act 1917:

Ontario: A. E. Fripp, M.P., Ottawa; W. A. Boys, M.P., Barrie, Ont.; Sir John Gibson, Hamilton, Ont.; A. B. Lowe, 41 Glenn St., Ottawa.

Quebec: Joseph Rainville, M.P., St. Lambert; Romeo Langlois, K.C., Quebec; Hon. S. N. Parent, Montreal, Que.; Hon. Sidney Fisher, Knowlton, Quebec.

Nova Scotia: Geo. S. Campbell, Halifax, N.S.; D. A. Cameron, Barrister, Sydney, C.B.

New Brunswick: Mariner G. Teed, St. John, N.B.; John McCaffrey, Fredericton, N.B.

Manitoba: Senator W. H. Sharp, Manitou; Sir Donald MacMillan, Winnipeg, Man.

Saskatchewan: Senator H. W. Laird, Regina; Arthur Hitchcock, Moosejaw, Sask.

Alberta: R. B. Bennett, M.P., Calgary; Alfred H. Clarke, K.C., Calgary, Alberta.

British Columbia: R. F. Green, M.P., Victoria, B.C.; Hon. James Horace King, Victoria, B.C.

Yukon: Lt.-Col. A. Thompson, M.D., M.P., Ottawa; F. C. Wade, Vancouver.

Prince Edward Island: Wm. L. Cotton, Charlottetown; James J. Johnston, K.C., Charlottetown, P.E.I.

And requesting that their honours will unite with this House in the said resolution by filling up the blank therein with the words "Senate and."

It was ordered that the said message be taken into consideration to-mororw.

OTTAWA SEPARATE SCHOOLS CASE.

DISCUSSION.

The Senate resumed from September 5, the adjourned debate on the statement and inquiry of Hon. Mr. Landry.

Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: Honourable gentlemen, when I asked to have the debate on this question adjourned, I had made up my mind to enter fully into the whole question; but as the subject is now before the courts, I think it would be injudicious and improper for this House to discuss the question. If the courts decide in favour of the contention of my honourable friend from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry) then it will be the duty of the legislature of the province of Ontario to acquiesce in whatever judgment may be rendered. At present, as I have already said, I look upon the question as an improper one for discussing. For that reason I decline to enter into any discussion on the matter.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Béique, the debate was adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until eleven o'clock to-morrow morning.

THE SENATE.

Tuesday, September 11, 1917.

First Sitting.

The Senate met at Eleven o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

DISORDER AT FORD CITY.

INQUIRY.

Before the Orders of the Day:

Hon. P. LANDRY: I want to draw the attention of the Government to an article which was published yesterday in the Ottawa Citizen. I desire only to have information. I do not want to obstruct in any way the business of this House, but I think it is a very urgent matter and we should have an explanation immediately:

Ford City, Ont., Sept. 9.—Bishop Fallon's announcement that Rev. Father F. X. Laurendeau would be installed as parish priest of the Church of Our Lady of the Lake, Ford City, even if civil authorities had to be appealed to for assistance, was verified in action Saturday when a combined squad of the Walkerville, Ford City and Essex county, with several provincial police acting under orders of the Attorney General of Canada to Crown Attorney Redd, of Essex county, forced the doors of the church and presbytery after hacking their way with clubs and billies through a mob of about three thousand people and left the unwanted rector safely in the parochial study.

I will not read the rest, except the last few words.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: Yes; it is very interesting.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY (reading):

High Constable Smith, of Essex, deplored the occurrence of trouble, but pointed out that under orders from the Attorney General, they could not fail to act.

I want to know what part the Attorney General of Canada took in this matter, and if it is true that he has sent orders to the Crown Attorney of Essex county.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am entirely unware of the Attorney General of Canada intervening in any way; and it seems to me, although I do not belong to the church of my honourable friend, that it is really incomprehensible that there should be such a happening in that church.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Pursuant to this answer, I may say that I wonder if it is incomprehensible to the honourable gentleman that a posse of 100 soldiers are guarding the church, and have been sent there by military orders. Is that impossible to comprehend?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I will make inquiries.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: If the honourable gentleman would be kind enough to make inquiry into two facts, the fact that the Attorney General, as the newspaper says—I do not say it is true—I just want to inquire.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: It was likely the Attorney General of the province.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: We shall see. Has the Attorney General of the province the right to command troops?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: No, certainly not.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I will make inquiries.

CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY ACQUISITION BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 125, an Act provinding for the Acquisition by His Majesty of the Capital Stock of the Canadian Northern Railway company. Hon. Mr. Blain in the Chair.

On section 1—acquisition of shares of Canadian Northern railway authorized:

Hon. HEWITT BOSTOCK: Section 1 of course authorizes the Government to acquire the 600,000 shares of the capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway company. I notice at the commencement that the Government, by the very wording of the clause, attempts to put a value on the shares of this company. I think that in the ordinary acceptation of the term, when we speak of the par value of stock, it means the par value of stock that has been quoted on the market and has been dealt with, and for which money has been paid. When the par value is put at $60,000,000, this would suggest to any one that this stock had been dealt with on the exchange, that a market had been found for it and that money had been paid for it. It would have been much better to have used such a term as the nominal value of the stock. However, that is a small matter as compared with the whole question with which we are dealing, and I would not take up the time of the committee with a matter of that kind further than to point out the wording of this clause. I do not think it is right to put in the statute a wording which to some persons would certainly be misleading. I think that the term "par value" should not have been used there—that is not a right expression of what the Government means.

But the objection to this clause of course is very largely the objection that we on this side of the House have raised to this Bill generally—the objection to the Government taking over the stock of the company in this way and arranging to pay money for shares which have practically no value and without knowing what are the debts and liabilities which they will assume when they become the sole owners of the stock. As has been pointed out before, the Government had a means of dealing with this matter, which was provided in 1914. Although we asked for particulars of the amount of outstanding liabilities and also for the names of the pledgees of this stock, we have so far not received that information. We desire to obtain further information before we proceed further with this clause. I asked my honourable friend again last night whether he could not give me a better answer to a question that I had asked him regarding the loans and securities to Mackenzie and Mann, Limited.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There are no loans to Mackenzie and Mann, Limited.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: There are no loans at all?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No. I may say to my honourable friend that all loans are to the Canadian Northern railway and are shown in bluebook 237, and when the loans are repaid all the securities held will revert to the Canadian Northern.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I would point out to my honourable friend that Mackenzie and Mann, Limited, are the owners of some $51,000,000 of this stock, and, as I understand, this stock has been pledged with financial institutions as security; and according to the answer given to me by my honourable friend, those advances have been made for the benefit of the Canadian Northern Railway system, although the advances have been made against the stock of that system held by Mackenzie and Mann, Limited.

There is a further point in regard to the matter—that there is no provision made in this Bill for dealing with the question of those income-charge convertible debentures. The Government, when they pay this money and take over the shares, will become responsible for those debentures.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No. They are chargeable only against the net income of the road; and I may say they are not cumulative either.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: But when the Government, under the Act of 1914, became responsible, and granted the $45,000,000 guarantee, and took security on the road and the shares and stocks, not only of the Canadian Northern railway but also of the constituent companies, they practically put themselves in the position of being respon sible for those income-charge convertible bonds, as I understand the situation.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No. My honourable friend will pardon me for interrupting him, but he entirely misapprehends the effect of the income convertible bonds. They are only a charge against the net income of the road after all the previous charges are paid. They are not cumulative. The holders of the bonds have a right to exchange them within a certain time for stock. There is little or no probability of that being done, if, as my honourable friend is pointing out, the stock is of no value.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I should like to point out to my honourable friend what is said by Messrs. Drayton and Acworth in regard to that matter at page 70 of their report, in dealing with the question of the trustees of the Dominion Board or company that they propose, to take over the Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk Pacific and the National Transcontinental. These are the words:

The trustees will also have to consider at an early date the position of the holders of the Canadian Northern 5 per cent Convertible Income Debentures. These debentures to the amount of $25,000,000 were placed in London, in the years 1911 and 1912, some of them at a considerable premium, and the company obtained more than $24,000,000 in cash for them. The trust deed under which they were issued charges them upon the assets of the company subject to existing charges, but entitles the holders to receive interest only from income if earned.

Now, if they are charged upon the assets of the company subject to existing charges, and those charges were made before the Act of 1914 was passed, therefore any charges made against the assets of the company after that would be subsequent, if I understand the meaning of the words, and therefore the Government would have to protect and take care of the income convertible bonds. Then, the report goes on to say:

Since June, 1915, no interest has been paid. The Dominion Government in 1914 recognized that in respect of capital these Income Debentures rank in front of the Government's own loans. But the income on them is not being earned. Nor is it likely to be earned, at any rate in full, in the proximate future. The fact, however, that they are a charge upon the assets, or rather upon certain assets, and upon the income, if earned, of the Canadian Northern or some portions thereof, might cause complications in the operations and accounts of the unified system. And we think that on its own merits their case is entitled to sympathetic consideration.

Then they go on to suggest what sort of consideration should be given to these bonds; but I think it is quite clear from the statements made there that Messrs. Drayton and Acworth consider that these bonds have to be taken into consideration.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Does my honourable friend see that they are only speaking of these bonds in relation to the unified system, namely, that of the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Transcontinental, and the Canadian Northern. We are not dealing with that problem. We are dealing with the clean-cut problem of the Canadian Northern. The reason that they state that they are entitled to consideration is on account of their relation to the unified system; but they are only chargeable to the income of the road, and the Government is not responsible.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The Government would be reponsible if they had to realize on their mortgage.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They cannot realize until the term expires.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The Government at the present time have a demand loan of $15,000,000 against the company, and if they wanted to get that money paid back, they would have to take action and would be placed in the position of having to recognize those income convertible bonds. This only shows what the liabilities are that the Government and the country have to consider in regard to this matter. If they take over these shares and become entirely responsible, it means that their demand loan simply becomes another $15,000,000 that they have put into the company. Of course, if they treat that demand loan in that way, they may not proceed any further, and until they do take that action I can quite realize that those income convertible bonds do not come in as here stated. I have brought this question up for the purpose of showing the position in which we stand in regard to this matter, and I wish to move:

That all the words after the words "His Majesty" be struck out and the following substituted:

"His Majesty, upon the happening of any event of defauldt mentioned in section 21, chapter 20 of the statutes of 1914, may exercise the rights and powers mentioned in section 24 of the said Act; provided, however, that the Governor in Council may grant to whomsoever may appertain the right of reviving, within a period not exceeding five years from passage of this Act, the equity of redemption mentioned in section 24 of chapter 20 of the said statutes, upon paying all advances already made or to be made by His Majesty to or on behalf of the Canadian Northern Railway company, with such rate of interest as may be determined, and on such other terms as may be deemed proper for the protection of all other parties interested in the said company."

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Under the statute of 1914 the Government took power in case of default, after the $45,000,000 had been advanced to the Canadian Northern company, to foreclose the equity of redemption. It has been suggested that the foreclosure provided for in the Act of 1914 might be considered too drastic, and that some temperament should be accorded or introduced in the exercise of such a right of foreclosure. For my part, I think that it would be rather too drastic to wipe off claims against the Canadian Northern Company taking rank after the claims which are guaranteed by the Dominion Government and by the provinces. I think that the suggestion as embodied in the amendment which has been moved by the honourable the leader of the Opposition is quite proper. The amendment says:

His Majesty, upon the happening of any event of default mentioned in section 21, chapter 20, of the statutes of 1914, may exercise the rights and powers mentioned in section 24 of the said Act.

Honourable gentlemen are familiar with section 24. Under that section the Government took the power:

To declare the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern and of all other persons whomsoever in the mortgaged premises to be foreclosed, and thereupon the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern (and of such other persons) in the mortgaged premises and every part thereof shall be and become absolutely barred and foreclosed, and the same shall thereupon be vested in His Majesty in the right of the Dominion of Canada.

Now, the temperament which it is suggested should be applied in the exercise of this right of foreclosure is the following:

Provided, however, that the Governor in Council may grant to whomsoever may appertain the right of reviving, within a period not exceeding five years from the passage of this Act, the equity of redemption mentioned in section 24 of chapter 20 of the statutes, upon paying all advances already made or to be made by His Majesty to or on behalf of the Canadian Northern Railway company, with such rate of interest as may be determined, and on such other terms as may be deemed proper for the protection of all other parties interested in the said company.

Honourable gentlemen will see that it is a temperament of considerable value. The Government would have the power to make whatever advances were necessary for the operation of the lines, for their completion, for their improvement, for rolling stock, or for any other purpose in connection with that railway system, and all parties interested would be given a delay not exceeding five years to revive their rights of redemption, and power would be given the Government to charge, if they thought proper, only a nominal rate of interest on such advances as have already been made, or which may be made, and the Government would also be authorized and empowered to do what would be necessary in equity to protect all other parties interested. I presume that what is meant by the latter portion of that is that the right of redemption should be exercised in order to protect the different classes of creditors of the company, or of the different companies, that have any rights in equity. I hope that the honourable gentleman will see that it is a proper provision, one which would protect in a reasonable measure the public interest and would at the same leave to the Government, by Order in Council, the power to deal equitably with all other parties interested in the company.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: I think the most serious proposition covered in the section is :

The Governor in Council may, as between His Majesty and the owners—

In 1914, when the Government considered the question of granting a large aid to the Canadian Northern, and decided that the situation was such that they would ask Parliament and this country to give them a guaranteed loan of $45,000,000, Parliament believed that if the company failed to carry out their obligations or to operate successfully the road, the country should step in, and at that time an agreement was made which reads as follows:

That the contractors will not at any time make or seek to enforce any claim for contractors' profits, commissions or otherwise against the Canadian Northern, or against any of the constituent or subsidiary companies, upon or in respect of any express or implied contract, understanding, agreement, or stipulation of any kind, heretofore or hereafter made, whereby or whereunder they, or any one or more of them, may now or hereafter be entitled to receive from the Canadian Northern, or from any of the consituent or subsidiary companies any construction profits, in respect of work heretofore undertaken, or as consideration for transfers of properties, rights or franchises already transferred, or to be transferred under subclauses (a) and (b) of this clause, or for commission or remuneration for services in financing, or for any other services heretofore rendered, and all such claims are hereby by them and each of them absolutely renounced and released.

Has anything occurred in the history of the Canadian Northern between 1914 and now to change the opinion which Parliament expressed when it granted the $45,000,000? We granted $45,000,000; they defaulted; we have advanced $15,000,000 more. In a sense, as far as Parliament was concerned, they admitted that if they had failed in that respect, they had sucked the orange dry. From this Bill it looks to me as though we were attempting to inject a little juice into the orange. Now, this agreement to which this Bill refers is to be made after the Bill is passed. Why is not this House taken into the confidence of the Government? In 1914 the House was told exactly what the Government and the country proposed to do in respect to this Canadian Northern proposition. I have no personal feeling against the individual members of the Canadian Northern. I regard them as exceptionally able, clever men. I have felt that they succeeded in doing what Lincoln said could be done: "You can fool all the people part of the time; you can fool part of the people all the time; but you cannot fool all the people all the time." They have been able to do that, and we are to blame. There is no question that the people or the Government of this country are to blame for the railway situation in Canada. When the Canadian Northern came before Parliament in 1914 asking for the grant of $45,000,000, the Government attached to that proposition the agreement. What was the judgment of the House in respect to the Canadian Northern if they defaulted. They have now defaulted, and we are asked to pass this Bill without reference to that agreement, or any understanding as to what the Government propose to do in respect to it after the Bill has gone through. Two days ago the honourable leader of the Government, in answer to a question of the honourable member from Hastings (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell), said this:

I may say that the Government upon entering into the agreement provided for in the Bill, will fix a maximum amount to be paid for the stock, and will further provide, of course, that the fixing of the amount shall not as an element in fixing the value.

Now, if that is true, if they are to fix the amount, and yet do not amend this Bill so as to bind the arbitrators in respect to considering the value of that stock, the fixing of the amount will not affect the judgment of the arbitrators in determining what we have to pay, for the Bill reads:

—examine witnesses under oath and hear parties by counsel or representatives, and the unanimous determination of the arbitration shall be final.

You will notice that the remarks made by the honourable gentleman are these:

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON.

The Government, upon entering into agreement provided for the Bill, will fix a maximum amount to be paid for the stock, and will further provide, of course, that the fixing of the amount shall not be taken into consideration by the arbitrators as an element in fixing the value.

But, the Bill says the value that is determined by the arbitrators shall be final. Unless the Bill is amended to say that the valuation reached by the arbitrators in determining the value of the stock shall not exceed the amount which the Government proposes to name as the maximum, I think it is necessary that section 4 should be amended to conform to the proposition made by the leader of the Government, that the maximum amount to be paid should be fixed.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The discussion of this Bill evidently revolves around the question of the value of the $60,000,000 of stock which is not held by the Government. Nobody seems to be able to get at the bottom of this question.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Who does hold that stock?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: According to the secretary of the company, it is owned by Mackenzie and Mann, 10,000 shares, and so on, and by honourable senators in this House. That was the report up to June 9th.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: That was contradicted last night.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: No, it was not contradicted; it was left uncontradicted. If you read your Hansard, you will find that my statement last night was left uncontradicted. The statement that two honourable senators in this House hold stock in this company has never been contradicted. And that brings me to the point I want to make. There seems to be a mystery about the value of this stock. On this side of the House we claim, under authority and by authority, that the stock is of no value. That authority is exceptionally official; it is from the Government itself; because, after all, the Commissioners who were appointed some time ago to investigate the financial affairs and physical condition of this road reported to the Government that this very stock was not worth a cent. The Government had accepted that report. Those Commissioners were the official mouthpieces of the Government of the day. They reported that the $60,000,000 of stock was not worth one cent. Now the Government comes before Parliament and says that this stock may be of some value; and I am with the honourable leader of the Opposition in his puzzle over the fact that the words "par value" are introduced into this Bill. Everybody who wants to be honest and fair towards the country is also puzzled. Everybody who wants to protect the interests of the country against speculators, pirates, or whatever you want to call them, is puzzled. What does the Government mean by introducing that expression "par value?"

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: That is what the arbitration is to be on.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: But the Government, through its officials, say that the stock is not worth a cent. When are we going to believe the Government. Are we going to believe the Government through its official reports, or through its Bill—its political party Bill? On which side are we going to place our belief that the Government is right. Now, to ferret out what the value of this stock is I leave it to this House. There are two honourable gentlemen of this House now, the honourable senator from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Nicholls) and the honourable senator from Kingston (Hon. Mr. Richardson), who hold over 2,000 shares of so-called par value, and what Parliament would like to know is, how much they paid for the stock.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: How did they get it?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Well, if they paid for it, then we know how they got it. Then, Parliament is also entitled to know when they ceased to be owners of that stock—ceased to be unable to vote on this measure. I believe that when the leader of the Government last night undertook to answer for them, he was within the bounds of certainty when he said that they had desisted, and had ceased to own the stock. I quite comprehend that they might have assigned.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: I do not think he said that.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: No, he did not say that; he said that I had no proof that they were owners of the stock at the actual moment the vote was given. Well, there is no doubt about that: they might have sold the stock an hour before the House met; I could not be apprised of that.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I rise to a question of order. We are supposed to be discussing the first clause of this Bill.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I would like to know where the point of order is.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Sit down.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: You cannot call in the police.

Hon. Mr. POWER: However, the Chairman can call in the Serjeant-at-Arms if I cannot call in the police. But we are not just at the present moment interested as to what certain honourable gentlemen have in the stock of the company; that is not before the House in any sense whatever, and I think it is just one of those things that any honourable gentleman with a proper feeling would wish to avoid; he would not wish to drag in the question.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Where is the point of order? Is it a speech, or what is it?

Hon. Mr. POWER: I have made my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN: The point of order is that the honourable gentleman is not confining his remarks to the amendment. My honourable friend would do that, I am sure.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I quite admit that. The honourable senator from Halifax, who has a persistent way of interrupting me especially, raises a point of order that I cannot comprehend; but the Chair is right, and I am with the Chair. I am trying to stick to this clause. I am sticking to the "par value" in this blessed clause; I am talking par value all along, and I cannot get at the bottom of it yet. I am trying to get at it through authorities. I have got, through the authority of the Government, that it is worth nothing. Now I come down to gentlemen who were directors of this company, and I want to know the value of the stock. They had occasion to sell this stock a short time ago, and they could give the House the information as to how much it was sold for. That is all I am getting at, and I think that is a good ground on which to place the value of the stock. If the honourable senator from Kingston and the honourable senator from Toronto will tell the House how much they got for this stock, it will establish a standard. I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, if this is not in line with this clause; and why the senior member for Halifax continually interrupts me with points of order I do not understand.

Hon. Mr. POWER: With the permission of the committee, I will withdraw my point of order, because the honourable gentleman has now put himself in order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I was about finishing when the honourable member rose, and I think I am putting it fairly before the House. There is no animus in the matter. Those two gentlemen are to-day the best authorities in Canada as to the value of that stock.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: And why not tell this House for how much they sold this stock, and to whom, and on what date? That is all. I do not know whether they did or not. If they do not want to answer, of course silence is consent, that the stock is no good.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The amendment proposed by the leader of the Opposition has the effect of putting into operation section 24 of the Act of 1914. I crave the attention of this Chamber upon the actual effect of putting into operation that section 24 as given by the Minister of Finance by the ex-Solicitor General, now Secretary of State, and the Prime Minister. So that my interpretation, I suppose, can hardly be met with contradiction from the leader of the Government. It is affirmed, and I believe the affirmation to be correct, that the putting into operation of section 24 when default occurs vests in His Majesty all the physical assets of the Canadian Northern system. If it has that effect, what does it mean? It means that the second mortgagee, His Majesty, takes possession of all the assets of the Canadian Northern system in payment of his claim. It means that His Majesty then becomes responsible only for the mortgages that stand in rank ahead of the Dominion mortgage. I think no one can controvert that affirmation—that the putting into operation of section 24 of the Act of 1914 has the effect of freeing the Dominion Government from all other liabilities but that of meeting the debentures which it guaranteed, and those debentures which precede the Federal guarantee.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: No, that is wrong. What are they going to do if the company does not pay its debts?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am speaking of putting into operation section 24, not of the present Bill. I believe my affirmation to be good law, and a correct understanding of section 24—that a foreclosure in virtue of section 24 gives the Government of Canada all the physical assets of the Canadian Northern, with the only obligation of meeting the debentures when they mature, which were endorsed by the Federal Government, and the debentures that rank prior to those, and which were endorsed by the provincial governments.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: And repudiate all unsecured debts?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes, that is the same; it would free the second mortgagee, which is the Government, from the obligation of paying any unsecured debts, or any debts that rank after the second Federal mortgage. I am simply examining what section 24 of the Act of 1914, which is the law that governs the parties, would effect.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I asked you about the unsecured debts prior to the guarantee.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: They could buy the railroad themselves if they liked.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They would probably do it, would they not?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am making no difference whatever. I say the Dominion Government is the second mortgagee, and would be responsible simply for its endorsation on those debentures, and for the debentures which would rank ahead.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: You mean the legal effect?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am speaking of the legal effect of section 24 of chapter 20 of George V. This is the view of the gentleman who drafted the contract and legislation of 1914, the Hon. Mr. Meighen. For the information of honourable gentlemen I make short extracts from his speech of May 13, 1914. What does the honourable gentleman say? What interpretation does he put upon his own section? Here are his words:

> Under the present Bill we have a summary method of taking over the road, a summary method which in effect gives us as security the other sixty per cent of stock. We know we have the ordinary right which any mortgagee has, and the right which any guarantor of a mortgage has, the right by subrogation of getting into the shoes of the lender and in the event of default exercising the rights of a mortgagee and taking possession of the road as a receiver; we know we have that right, but we have the additional summary remedy of proceeding by mere Act of Parliament to take over the road as the property of the people of this country and eliminate once and for all, all other parties interested in that railway.

This is the answer of the Hon. Mr. Meighen to the question put by the honourable leader of the Government just now:

And we have not only so arranged it that the interest of the Canadian Northern and all other persons whatsoever in the Canadian Northern system shall be alienated, and that in the event of default all shall be the property of the Canadian people.

Further on—and there is nothing I omit which would weaken that opinion, but I wish to shorten the quotation:

The idea of that is that we are at this time making the interested parties and all stockholders parties to this contract, and we say to them: We now and here bind you that should the day of default come you shall not appeal to the Parliament of Canada on the ground of your road being confiscated in any way whatever, but you here and now leave the Parliament of this country free from any such question and untrammelled in every way to dead with the property of the Canadian Northern as it may be advised in the interests of the people of this country. That is the summary procedure outlined here for taking over the road.

When we have that statement from the Government which brought in this legislation in 1914, which set up the machinery by which we should take possession of the road, it ill becomes that same Government to come before this Parliament and say: "We will arbitrate as to the value of any equity in common stock," which it is admitted has brought to the company nothing in the form of cash. It is a question, not of an opportunity of paying unsecured claims, but purely and simply of arbitrating an equity when we are faced with the obligation of assuming unknown or untold liabilities. It seems to me that Parliament should pause. The amendment now proposed is simply for the purpose of implementing the legislation of 1914 and giving a right to the interested parties within five years to re-enter into the property, if a means can be found by which the Government will be reimbursed for its advances.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Does the honourable leader of the Government dispute the effect stated by the honourable member for De Lorimier, as to the foreclosure?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend has asked me a very fair question, and in answer to it I would say that the legislation of 1914, section 24, made provision that the disposition of the equity of redemption, or whatever action might be taken by the Government concerning it, would be authorized by the Parliament of Canada subject to the terms and conditions which Parliament might impose in reference to the equity or the foreclosure of the various interests therein. Now, certain things have happened since the legislation of June, 1914. The war has occurred. Up to that time the Canadian Northern system had been able to finance itself, with the assistance of the various governments which have contributed for that purpose. In other words, the Canadian Northern up to that period had made no default; it had been able to meet its obligations with governmental assistance. The war immediately destroyed the market for its securities. It destroyed the European markets for its securities; it destroyed the New York market. I ask honourable gentlemen if it would be British fair play, under the extraordinary conditions which had happened, for Parliament ruthlessly to come in and by one fell swoop wipe out the equity of all parties concerned and practically confiscate this property. My honourable friend from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) says that in his judgment—and he appears to be a merciful man—those who are interested are entitled to some consideration and it should be given them. My honourable friend from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) is not so merciful. He, like Shylock, would demand his pound of flesh.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No; I beg the honourable gentleman's pardon.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is the position taken by my honourable friend.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No. I stated yesterday that I would move in amendment to allow the stockholders to retain a share in the common stock.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. Well, then, my honourable friend at once admits the defensibility of the ground taken by the Government in this legislation.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Ex misericordia.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) takes the ground that the parties owning the stock are entitled to consideration. My honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) now recedes from the ground which he took a few moments ago, and admits that they are entitled to consideration. The Royal Commission which was appointed for the purpose of investigating this whole question states unhesitatingly that they are entitled to every consideration at the hands of the Government. They say:

> We think that, on the whole, the equity of the case would be met if the Canadian Northern shareholders were permitted to retain a moderate portion of the $60,000,000 of shares which they now hold.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Hear, hear. That is my stand.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friends on the other side express very serious apprehension that the par value of these shares will be paid to the shareholders of the Canadian Northern system. We have the Royal Commission saying that a moderate portion of the $60,000,000 of shares should be paid them. Then, if their view be correct, that the value is $60,000,000 and that a moderate portion of that $60,000,000 should be paid to the shareholders of that company, how do my honourable friends justify in any way invoking the summary and extraordinary machinery embodied in section 24 of the Act? It would be rank injustice—would not be tolerated for a moment, I venture to say, by the people of Canada. Moreover, Parliament is doing to-day, in substance and in every essential, what is required by section 24 of that Act, namely, dealing with the matter and by the Bill now before us, is imposing terms and conditions as to the manner in which this equity shall be dealt with. If the arbitrators find that there is any value in that stock, the shareholders of the Canadian Northern will be entitled to it. If it is found that there is no value or simply a nominal value, then they will be dealt with accordingly. So, I ask, where is the difference? It is simply a case of tweedledum and tweedledee, if Parliament is to impose terms and conditions as provided by section 24. My honourable friend will not contend for a moment that the Government of Canada could invoke the machinery of section 24 without the intervention of Parliament; and if Parliament intervenes, as it is doing on this occasion, and departs from the strict letter of the statute respecting the character of the machinery that shall be put in motion, and says that instead of adopting the summary machinery provided therein, arbitrators shall be appointed to determine what is the value of the equity, I ask you, who will say it nay? I ask if that is not in accordance with British fair play? We know it is embodied in all British legislation.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Surely the honourable gentleman would not say that it requires an Act of the Parliament of Canada to entitle the Government, as a creditor, to put this road into insolvency. The Government is a creditor, and surely the Government has the same right as any individual would have, of going before the Exchequer Court.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Precisely. But I would point out to my honourable friend that this machinery, which is so admired by my honourable friends, which has been eulogized to the very highest degree, cannot be put in motion except through the Parliament of Canada, and that it is for the Parliament of Canada to impose terms and conditions as to how this equity shall be dealt with. We are doing so in this Bill, and I say that no fairer method can be adopted than that which is to be found within the four corners of the Bill we are now considering.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I put the question a moment ago to the honourable leader of the Government, because I inferred from the interruptions which he made when the honourable member for De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) was speaking, that he was disputing the effect, as stated, of the foreclosure in virtue of section 24 of the Act of 1914. I see that the honourable gentleman had no such intention.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I cannot dispute section 24.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: And I am going to say in what I agree with the honourable leader of the Government. Of course, every member of this honourable House in dealing with this very important question has to decide for himself in what manner the Bill should be amended; but it is important that every member of this House should fully understand the question before a final decision is arrived at. It is with the English mortgage we are now dealing. All the bonds which were issued by the Canadian Northern railway or the constituent companies created what is known as the English mortgage. The English mortgage is not, as in the French law, merely a charge on the property, but is a sale of the property itself. It is elementary for any lawyer, and for many laymen, that the foreclosure means that the mortgagee is declared the owner of the property, and he takes the property free of all charges in favour of subsequent creditors. That is elementary. I agree with the honourable leader of the Government that it would have been monstrous for the Government to declare a forfeiture, and wipe out by a stroke of the pen all debts subsequent to its lien, and that, notwithstanding the words used by the Hon. Mr. Meighen in 1914, it cannot have been the intention of the Government to deal with the matter in such a drastic way. I quite realize that when the wording in the first part of section 24 was adopted, when it was stated, "If authorized by the Parliament of Canada, the Governor in Council may, on such terms and conditions, if any, as Parliament may prescribe, exercise the right of foreclosure," it was the intention, as was stated a moment ago by the honourable leader of the Government, not merely that Parliament should intervene but that Parliament should intervene in a way which would be fair to all parties concerned. I think we are agreed so far.

The question before us now is merely what is the fair way of dealing with all parties concerned. The Government gave its guarantees to the amount of about $125,000,000. It has advanced to the company over $60,000,000 in cash. It proposes to advance may be $25,000,000 now or within a short time; and not only will it have to advance that $25,000,000, but no doubt, at next session the Government will have to be authorized to expend perhaps $75,000,000 more. There is no question about that. Anybody who has any knowledge of business, who will exercise his common sense and apply it to this proposition, can come to no other conclusion than that the Government must in the near future advance a very large amount of money to maintain this important system of railway.

Now, the question arises as to whether it would not be proper for the Government in this Bill to make provision for its being paid back its advances—and, as suggested by the amendment, it may be without interest—and at the same time to take power—the amendment does not dictate how it shall be exercised—to protect all other interests as they may deserve to be protected. Is that not fair? Is it not fair for the country, and fair to all parties interested, I ask you? And why? It is for the Government to avoid being obliged to foreclose or being loaded with amounts of liabilities which are not known, not ascertained, and which may be twice the value of the property taken over by the Government. I commend that to the attention of honourable gentlemen on this side as well as those on the other side of the House; and it seems to me that if sound judgment is exercised on the question, honourable gentlemen will see that the amendment is fair for all parties concerned.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: In order that this amendment may be properly understood, I think it is necessary that we should have a proper interpretation given to the words of section 24. As my honourable friend the leader of the Government has properly stated, the whole thing turns upon the meaning of the words, "such terms and conditions as Parliament may prescribe." What was meant by those words? If we remember that the section is one which provides for foreclosure in the event of default of payment of this loan, the immediate legal result, as explained by my honourable friend from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand), is that the Government of Canada becomes absolute owner of all the assets of this company and bound only to pay any prior secured claims, and that all the unsecured claims and all other claims would be barred, and that would be the end of them. So, as has been pointed out, the Government of Canada and the provinces who have prior claims would get this property for the money which is due to them for such claims. That would unquestionably leave a number of claims, some of them meritorious, some of them not meritorious. It would bar the claims of Mackenzie and Mann and the other stockholders, whoever they may be. It would bar also a number of claims against the company arising out of the construction or the operation of the railway. My interpretation of the intention of section 24 is that Parliament intended that the terms and conditions would be imposed in regard to the claims to which I have just referred, not simply those of Mackenzie and Mann. The intention of Parliament, as inferred from the Act and from the discussion in another place, is clearly shown to be that Mackenzie and Mann should not have any claim whatever, but that the claims of the persons to whom I have referred, unsecured creditors, men who had advanced materials to the railway company, men who had worked on the railway, and all sorts of claims of that kind, should be recognized by Parliament; That is the meaning. What other meaning can be attached to the words of the Hon. Mr. Meighen, the Solicitor General? He generally knows what he is talking about.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Of course, my honorable friend will concede, I suppose, that the claims of Mackenzie and Mann are already barred; that is, any claims which they had up to the legislation of 1914 are, under the contract, barred for all time.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Of course, that only makes my position all the stronger. It shows that Parliament never could contemplate, even in 1914, that by any provision of the Act Mackenzie and Mann should get anything at all.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: That is right.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That only corroborates my views.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But the honourable gentleman's amendment last night asked us expressly to bar the claims of Mackenzie and Mann.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Certainly.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They are all barred by the statute of 1914.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My honourable friend will see that the amendment would not have been thought of and would certainly not have been proposed but for the construction which the honourable gentleman puts upon the contract of 1914. We, here, acting for the people of Canada, thought we should propose some amendment which would make it perfectly clear that Mackenzie and Mann had no such claim. If the amendment proposed by the honourable gentleman from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) has for its purpose the protection of any claim which Mackenzie and Mann may urge, personally I am against it. However, I do not think it means that. It means that claims of others than Mackenzie and Mann are to be the subject of this legislation and this agreement, I hold strongly to the opinion, as I expressed myself last night, that Mackenzie and Mann have no claim against this country. They have been dealt with most generously by Canada, and I submit that Parliament cannot to-day, by any rule of law or morals, recognize any claim on their part. I repeat, what is the meaning of these words?

The idea of that is that we are at this time making the interested parties and all the stockholders parties to this contract, and we say to them: "We now and here bind you that should the day of default come, you shall not appeal to the Parliament of Canada on the ground of your road being confiscated in any way whatever, but you here and now leave the Parliament of this country free from any such question and untrammelled in every way to deal with the property of the Canadian Northern as it may be advised in the interests of the people of this country. That is the summary procedure outlined here for taking over the road.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED.

What clearer language is there than that? Surely that means that Mackenzie and Mann were to be debarred from any claim whatever, and had left Parliament face to face with the obligation of dealing with these other claims to which I have referred, when the property is taken over. That is what we have to do now, and nothing more. for that reason I am going to support the amendment.

On a standing vote of 33 to 24 the amendment of Hon. Mr. Bostock was negatived.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: Before the clause is passed I have an amendment to add to it; but if some other amendment is substituted for the clause I am willing to give way to some other honourable gentleman.

Hon. Mr. POWER: My amendment differs from that of the honourable gentleman from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette). The amendment which I am about to propose is to strike out certain words.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The honourable gentleman will counteract that, by adding to it.

Hon. Mr. POWER: The amendment which I propose is this:

In clause 1, line 11, strike out all the words after "thereof."

These words are: "and for a price to be determined by arbitration as hereinafter provided." These words are quite unnecessary. The clause is perfectly complete without them, and the inclusion of those words would prejudice the case of the Government when they come to take over the property. The words as at present contained in the Bill imply that the stock has some value, and I do not think Parliament should say anything about it. Let the court dealing with the matter decide whether the stock has any value or not. I think it is only right and proper that these words should be stricken out.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I object to that. If you accept the principle, the clause will stand. If you accept the clause without those words you accept the principle; so I am against the amendment.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I would suggest to my honourable friend that he might let that amendment stand for the present.

Some Hon. SENATORS: No, no.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We had better dispose of it.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The contention has been that we do not want to adopt this clause as it stands. We want to substitute something else for it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We will concede that.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: If my honourable friend goes on with his amendment at the present time, if it is agreed to, we shall be admitting that we agree to certain parts of the clause.

The amendment of Hon. Mr. Power was negatived.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I desire to move:

That clause 1 be stricken out, and that the following be substituted therefor:

"His Majesty, upon the happening of any event of defaut mentioned in section 21, chapter 20, of the statutes of 1914, may by Order in Council cause the Canadian Northern railway system mentioned in said Act to be placed under the jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court, as provided for in sections 26 and 28 of chapter 140 of the Revised Statutes of 1906."

I only want to say a few words on this question. The whole burden of my speech—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Before my honourable friend goes to the trouble and the intellectual effort of making a speech, may I point out that the amendment is directly in violation of the principle of the Bill? The Bill is for the acquisition by His Majesty of the capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway company.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I quite recognize that the amendment is not on all fours with the Bill, and I must admit that I have very little hope of the Government accepting this amendment. However, it was thought advisable that I should move this amendment, because it crystallizes the whole of my speech, in saying that this matter should be referred—as has been said a hundred times before—to the Exchequer Court. The honourable gentleman from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) explained the position of the bondholders. The position of the bondholders is a very strong one. This is not like the hypotheque that we have in Quebec. Anacarsis relates that when he was travelling in Greece he could see on the different farm posts which gave the amount of the mortgage on each farm, so that no person could possibly be deceived. People did not have to go to the registry office to find out the amount of the mortgage. Now, the English mortgage would correspond to what we call that, a sale with redemption. That is to say when a mortgage is taken on a railroad, the railroad is vested in the mortgagees. They acquire a title to it; they have a "jus in rem"—a right in the thing itself; it belongs to them; and if any one comes afterwards and offers to pay the full amount of the bonds and the coupons, the road is returned to the company; but in the meanwhile the property belongs to the bondholders. Our own Railway Act shows that the bondholders can enter into possession without even going to court. I know of more than one case where the bondholders automatically became like the shareholders of a railway company, and voted according to the number of bonds they had. The whole burden of my speech is that if the Government would, as trustees, simply put this matter through the Exchequer Court, it would not mean at all that the Government would have to take all the other creditors by the throat and say, for instance: "Here is a contractor who built a bridge; he will not be paid; the bridge will be used for the general good." That would not be the case at all. What I say is that the Government is recreant to its trust if it does not exercise all its rights. In the first place, it is in a strong position, unassailable by any creditor. First take the right, and then temper justice with leniency and mercy. If this amendment were carried, and the Bill were dealt with in this way, the Government would of course enter into possession of the property through the Exchequer Court; and their position being unassailable and having made their legal position strong they could deal with the creditors in equity. No one dreams that this Government would take possession of a bridge and use it without paying all that was coming to the man who built it. But there are lots of these claims which are not bona fide. That is where the shoe pinches.

The discussion has been about the shares. You should never talk about shares until you have dealt with liabilities, known and unknown. First deal with the liabilities. Take, for instance, the case of a man who holds $100,000 of bonds. How did he come into possession of those bonds? Perhaps, as is very often the case, they were pledged to him. Perhaps he has advanced $50,000. As holder of the bonds, he says, "I want $100,000 and all of my coupons." How can the Government refuse him? It says, "Here is your money and the coupons, up to date." When this case goes to the Exchequer Court, what takes place? The judge inquires and says, "How much did you pay? How did you come into possession of these bonds? Did you pay par value, or 85, or 80?" The man says, "They were pledged." He is asked, "For how much?" He says, " $40,000." The court says, "Very well, we will allow you to rank for $40,000, and will grant you participation for your $40,000 and interest to date." I think the amendment which I have moved is in the public interest.

THE CHAIRMAN: Under clause 74 of the Rules of the Senate which reads as follows:

> No arguments are admitted against the principle of a bill in a Committee of the Whole.

I think that I would be compelled to rule the honourable gentleman's motion out of order.

The amendment was ruled out of order.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I said last night that, if this House decided to utilize the machinery provided for in clause 24 of the Act of 1914, and if it decided not to ask for the appointment of a receiver under the Exchequer Court Act, I would move that shares be allowed to the stockholders instead of money being paid as a result of the arbitration. My honourable friend has saved me the trouble of reading the Drayton-Acworth report, which suggests that a certain amount of the stock at present held by the shareholders be allowed to represent compensation for the work they did in the building of this road. The shareholders of the company are spoken of, but the builders of the road, Mackenzie and Mann, are mainly considered. I believe that if there is one feature of this Bill which the people of this country understand well, it is the fact that the Government admits, or impliedly admits, that Mackenzie and Mann are entitled to cash compensation for their services. It is a far greater responsibility and by far a greater charge upon the country to assume all the liabilities of the Canadian Northern system; yet, what is clear in the eye of the public is, as they see it on the face of the Act, that when an insolvent estate is about to be taken over by the Government, a large amount is to be paid in cash for an equity which everybody knows not to exist. The Drayton-Acworth report says that there is no equity; but it adds that it would be fair, inasmuch as Governments in the past had dealt generously with people with whom they had dealings that we should be somewhat generous and allow them something. Allow them what? Allow them shares in the company. If the shares appreciate in value, that is their gain. If they prove to be worthless, the shareholders are no worse off to-day than they would have been if the whole organization had gone into insolvency or into the hands of a receiver. I ask any honourable gentleman to rise in his place and state that the shareholders would stand to receive anything. Such a contention is preposterous. If this company went into the hands of a receiver, and if the Government withheld its hand, the shareholders would stand to be wiped out. Is not that admitted by all? Well, if we follow the suggestion of those Royal Commissioners and withhold a share of the stock, are we not doing the right thing by them, and by the people who have to shoulder this formidable load? Holding these views. I move that the first section of this Bill be replaced by the following:

> His Majesty, upon the happening of any event of default mentioned in section 1, chapter 20 of the statutes of 1914 (4-5 George V),may by Order in Council declare five hundred thousand shares of the capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway company, being part of the six hundred thousand shares of said capital stock not now held by the Minister of Finance in trust for His Majesty, to be the property of the Minister of Finance in trust for His Majesty, and the same thereupon shall become the property of His Majesty.

It means that 100,000 shares are left to the shareholders.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I would ask the honourable gentleman what he means by this amendment.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The Government will take hold of 500,000 shares, and will leave with the shareholders the difference, 100,000 shares.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: It will be noticed that, under the clause as it was printed in the Bill, "His Majesty may acquire the six hundred thousand shares of capital stock of the Canadian Northern railway company." The amount of the stock is $100,000,000. Four hundred thousand shares are vested in His Majesty, and six hundred thousand are owned by outsiders, or pledged as guarantees of advances which have been made. There are provisions also in the charter for the issuing of $25,000,000 more, to take care, by way of exchange, of the income-charge convertible debenture stock. Those $25,000,000 of shares have not been issued; they may be issued when occasion arises. The amendment proposed does not interfere at all with them. The amendment is substituted merely for the acquiring of six hundred thousand shares, and provides for the acquiring by His Majesty of five hundred thousand shares, namely, $50,000,000 instead of $60,000,000, leaving one hundred thousand shares, or $10,000,000 par value of the stock, for the present shareholders or pledgees.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The honourable leader of the Government, when speaking a short time ago as to the position that the Government have taken in regard to section 1, quoted from the Drayton-Acworth report, showing that the Commissioners recognized that Mackenzie and Mann had some right for consideration in the fact that they had rendered services to the company in the construction of this road, and had not asked the ordinary commission usually charged by the contractors when building a road. The contention made in the report dealt with the question of giving these contractors certain interests in the future of the company. What was proposed was that they should hold a certain number of shares, the value of which would be contingent on the future of the company. After the Government had come to the assistance of the company and provided the necessary money for carrying it on, those shares might possibly become of some value, and under that arrangement these men would have something substantial. The difference between that suggestion and this Bill is that under this section the Government proposes to give those gentlemen an immediate value for their shares. It is with the object of dealing with that question that my honourable friend from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) has moved the amendment which is before the Committee. We do not want to be too hard on those men, who have shown so much enterprise and energy in building this railway and developing the country, especially the western part; but I certainly think that it is a very much better proposition for the country and for all concerned that if we are going to do anything for Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann, what we do should be contingent on the future success of this railway. If I understand this section rightly, as it stands the Government would get rid completely of all interests that Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann have in this railway company. The Drayton-Acworth report gives credit to those men for their ability in financing the company up to the time they came to the Government in 1914, and also for the way in which they succeeded in building the road at a smaller cost, possibly, than that of other roads. For these reasons it is probably only fair that we should give Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann some consideration; but I think it very much better that we should do that by giving them an interest in the future of the company in the form of shares rather than by a present cash payment, relieving them of all further responsibility and interest in the company. I therefore support the amendment.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: This is indeed a very generous provision. The fact of the Government taking over this road, paying all the liabilities, completing construction, and furnishing it with complete rolling stock and equipment, is going to make this corporation a very large and very valuable one.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The honourable gentlemen ironically call, "Hear, hear." Do they suppose or pretend that they are going to take hundreds of millions of the public money and put it into this road and not do anything with it? Is that what they mean? Is that what they intend to do? Then, if that is so, this bargain smells stronger than ever.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: The honourable gentleman said just now that it is going to be a profitable investment for the people after this, but he spent all last evening arguing that it was going to be unprofitable.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Certainly I say that if you put enough money into completing this road, if you take the people's money by the barrel and shovel it into this company, you are surely going to do something with it. If you spend $100,000,000 in completing the road, you are going to make a valuable thing of it; if not, you are going to waste all that money. Is it the intention to waste the money and not make a valuable thing of it? If you make a valuable road you make the stock valuable and those ten millions will be worth something. Otherwise the honourable gentlemen have no faith whatever in the policy of nationalization which they advocate. Either they believe that nationalization is a good thing for the country, or they do not. If they believe in it, they must admit that by putting all this money into the railway it will make a valuable thing of it. I am arguing from the point of view of the honourable gentlemen themselves, and I say that if nationalization is worth anything, it is going to make this company valuable, and ten millions of stock for Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann is a big thing, particularly when it is considered that that stock to-day is not worth one dollar. Hence I say it is a very generous provision.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Why not give them more, if that is the case?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I dare say if it were left to my honourable friend he would give the whole country. The position I take is that those gentlemen have already got too much; they have bled this country; they have been doing it for thirty years; they have bled every province; they have bled everybody they came across; they have got 75 per cent of their enterprise paid by Canada, and to-day we have to pay them all over again for it. I think the proposition is too generous, as far as I can see.

The amendment of Hon. Mr. Dandurand was negatived.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: It strikes me that this section should be put aside; but I see that the Government has decided to stand by it, and thus give some value to stock which they describe as sixty millions at par. If Mackenzie and Mann are to have something, as estimated by the declaration of the Prime Minister that the experts may go as far as $10,000,000, I am bound to say that those who should be protected and get that money are not Mackenzie and Mann, but the shareholders of the subsidiary companies. The Federal and Provincial Governments have been most generous to Mackenzie and Mann. We have to compliment those men on the work they have done; they are very clever in building railways; they have shown energy and capacity; but they ought to be satisfied with their holdings in the subsidiary companies of the Canadian Northern system. I therefore wish to add the following words to section 1, which closes with the words, "for a price to be determined by arbitration, as hereinafter provided." I propose the following addition:

And the amount which will be granted for that stock will be divided pro rata between all the shareholders of the divers subsidiary companies according to the amount of their shares.

By the statute of 1914 this Parliament declared that in equity we owed Mackenzie and Mann nothing, their stock having no value then, and still less now. I say that the larger share of the Canadian Northern system belongs to Mackenzie and Mann; they have taken all their profits and their money practically from the subsidiary companies. The shareholders of those divers companies never got a cent of dividend; we know that. The province of Quebec holds $400,000 of stock, bought and paid for at par. Quebec residents put their money into the Lake St. John railway and the Canadian Northern Quebec railway, and they never got a cent in return. It is only fair to them that if the Government is going to pay money for this stock, it should be given to the shareholders of the subsidiary companies who have not yet had a cent. I move the adjournment of the debate till the next sitting.

The committee reported progress.

The Senate adjourned until three o'clock.

Second Sitting.

The Senate met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

CORRECTION OF THE MINUTES.

Before the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I would like to draw the attention of this House to an error which occurred in the Minutes of Proceedings. Towards the end of page 849 they read:

After debate, on motion of the Honourable Mr. Dandurand, it was Ordered, That further debate on the said inquiry be adjourned to the Second Distinct Sitting of the Senate to-morrow.

I think that is an error. It was not Hon. Mr. Dandurand, but Hon. Mr. Béique, as appears in the notice given farther on, at page 852, in the last line of paragraph 4. The name of Hon. Mr. Béique should be substituted for that of Hon. Mr. Dandurand on page 849. I think the vote was followed by a question which my honourable friend from Victoria division (Hon. Mr. Cloran) put to the Chair, that is, a challenge of the votes given by two of the members of this House. The honourable gentleman stated that the two votes should be struck out.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Not struck out, but disallowed.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Yes, because they had a pecuniary interest. Nothing of that appears in the Minutes. I think the Speaker declared the motion carried as it was. The honourable member for Victoria division (Hon. Mr. Cloran), addressing the Chair, asked the Chair to declare that those two votes should be disallowed, and the Chair——

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The Chair said nothing.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY:—in giving the decision that the motion was carried, virtually set aside the challenge put by the honourable member for Victoria division. I would like to have that appear in the Minutes.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: That is right.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The Chair said, "Carried."

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: Those votes could be challenged only on a subsequent motion; otherwise the challenge would be out of order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: If you are going to stop public discussion by all kinds of points of order, I want to know where we are at. The honourable gentleman from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry) has the floor, and let him have it.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order, order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Order yourself.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: A motion may be in order or out of order. If a motion is made and is in order it is put; if it is not in order, it is declared to be out of order.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: No point of order was taken.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I want a motion considered in order unless it is declared out of order.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I believe that the objection made by the honourable member for Victoria division ought to be entered in the Minutes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Yes; that is what I ask.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: As it was put.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I would point out to His Honour the Speaker that I made no objection; I simply called the attention of this honourable House and of the Speaker to the fact. It was not an objection at all.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: It was not well founded.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I wish to tell this honourable House I made no objection whatever. I simply called the attention of the Senate and the Speaker to our rule 53, wherein it is provided that no senator having any pecuniary interest whatever, no matter how small, has a right to vote. Then I quoted the official documents of the Canadian Northern railway, which is under discussion, to the effect that two senators were interested to the extent of $200,000—2,000 shares each—in that company. I simply called attention to that fact, and made no objection. It was then the duty of these senators to say—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I rise to a point of order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Certainly you do.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am going to object to any discussion or repetition of this. The point made by the honourable gentleman from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry) was that the Minutes should record what took place. The House is desirous that that shall be done. That should be an end of the matter.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Then I am in accord with the honourable leader of the Government for a second time anyway. It should be recorded.

CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY ACQUISITION BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

The Senate again went into Committee on Bill 125, an Act providing for the acquisition by His Majesty of the capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company.—Hon. Sir James Lougheed. Hon. Mr. Blain in the Chair.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: At the last sitting, Mr. Chairman, I was just giving the reasons why I intended to move an amendment to the effect that the amount which may be granted for the stock which the Government wish to buy should be divided pro rata among all the shareholders of the divers subsidiary companies, according to the amount of their shares. I now wish to refer the House to the financial statement respecting the Canadian Northern Railway system, copies of which have been distributed to members of this House. At page 6 you will find the names of all those subsidiary companies, of which there are ten or twelve. You will find in the list the two companies of which I was speaking yesterday, and in which the city of Quebec and the province of Quebec had great interest, having given large amounts in cash and assistance in land subsidies to those two companies, which now form part of the Canadian Northern Railway system. I do not desire to say more on this subject than simply to explain to the House what I want. All the private citizens who have invested their money in those two companies have never had a cent of return, dividends or otherwise, and it is only fair that if something is to be realized on those shares of the Canadian Northern Railway system, it should not go to Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann, who must have made a great deal of money out of all those companies, but should be divided, as stated in my motion. I therefore move this amendment, seconded by the honourable gentleman from De la Durantaye (Hon. Mr. Tessier):

That the following words be added after the last word of section 1:

"The amount which will be granted for that stock shall be divided pro rata among all the shareholders in the divers subsidiary companies according to the amount of their shares."

Hon. JULES TESSIER: Honourable gentlemen, some citizens of Quebec have asked me to express the hope that the Government will find its way to protect the minority shareholders of the affiliated companies forming part of the Canadian Railway system, namely, the Canadian Northern Quebec, the Northern Consolidated Holding Co., Ltd., the Great Northern Railway of Canada, The Quebec and Lake St. John Railway, and others who, according to the statement presented to the House of Commons on the 17th of August last (Hansard p. 4807), seem to own $5,947,100 of paid-up stock of said companies, and that these holders will share rateably in the amount to be paid by the Government under the arbitrators' award for the said sixty millions of stock.

The Great Northern Railway of Canada and the Quebec and Lake St. John Railway, which comprise 500 miles of the mileage to be acquired by the Government, were built by Quebec people under the management of Mr. J. G. Scott, who is now president of the Quebec Board of Trade. I may say that Mr. J. G. Scott is an authority on railway and transportation questions, that he has devoted his life to working for the development of railways and transportation in the province of Quebec and the Dominion of Canada. Everybody in Quebec would be glad to see his talents utilized and his services recognized by the Government.

These two roads have turned out to be amongst the most beneficial public works ever constructed in Canada, and form part of the most valuable and productive mileage of the Canadian Northern system. They run through the greatest spruce forests in America, and have been the means of developing the enormous water powers of the St. Maurice and of the Saguenay to such an extent that it is estimated that eighty million dollars have been invested in pulp mills, paper mills, aluminum plants, hydraulic powers and other industries along these railways, notably at Grand'Mère, Shawinigan, La Tuque, Chicoutimi, Jonquiere, Roberval and Lake Edward—industries which give employment to about twenty thousand men. In addition to this, vast tracts of arable lands have been thrown open to settlers, and probably one hundred thousand new settlers have found homes there. It is no exaggeration to say that these two railways, settling up the north country, have been the means of keeping the population of the province of Quebec in the province, and have contributed very largely to our holding our own and more than holding our proportional representation in Parliament, under the last census.

I have personal knowledge of what I am stating, because I was a director in both railways for many years.

The Quebec gentlemen who built these roads were so engrossed in trying to do good for their country that they omitted to properly protect their own interests, and allowed the control of the stock to get into the hands of London and New York financiers who had advanced money, with the result that one fine day they found that, against their will, the controlling interest in the stock had been transferred to the gentlemen who control the Canadian Northern.

A minority of the stock is still held by the Quebec people. The statement submitted to the House of Commons on the 17th August, page 4807 of Hansard, shows that the following stock is still held by the public:

Canadian Northern Quebec—which I presume includes Great Northern of Canada—and Northern Consolidated Holding Company, $2,405,400; Quebec and Lake St. John, $521,200; making a total of $2,926,600, which I have no doubt includes the stock in these railways for which the City of Quebec paid $650,000 in cash. That is the reason why the Mayor of Quebec a few days ago sent to the Prime Minister a telegram which has been published in the papers, asking him to protect the interests of the Quebec people who are so much interested in this question. I am sure that the Government will feel that it is its duty to protect the interests that are involved, and I am sure that I have only to draw the attention of the honourable the leader of the House to these facts in order that the Government may look after the interests of the gentlemen who have done such patriotic service for their country in connection with these railways.

Now, coming to the question of the Canadian Northern stock, I think that the most reasonable settlement would be by putting the road in the hands of a receiver. In so doing, the country would not become responsible for the immense liabilities of the company, and after a few years of administration by the receiver, we should be in a position to know the real value of the stock and of the whole system.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I join with great pleasure in the remarks which have been made by the two gentlemen who have preceded me, the honourable member from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette) and the honourable member from De la Durantaye (Hon. Mr. Tessier), in moving and seconding this motion, and I hope that the Government will see its way clear to adopt such a proposal. This proposal is not opposed to the principle of the Bill; on the contrary, it accepts the principle of the Bill; but it goes further and says that the amount which will be granted for the stock shall be divided pro rata among all the shareholders in the divers subsidiary companies according to the amount of their shares. The Lake St. John railway is one of those subsidiary companies. I hope that the Government will be able to accept this amendment, which is founded on justice, and which will give to those companies a fair share of the amount that would be granted for the stock that those companies have taken in the Canadian Northern Company.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I have the misfortune of being unable to support this amendment, and for this reason: as I understand the Bill, it provides for the taking over by the Government of Canada of the shares in the Canadian Northern Company; but it does not provide for taking over the shares of any of the constituent or subsidiary companies. On the second reading, I called the attention of this honourable House to a fact which I think is very objectionable on the face of this Bill, that whereas the Government's object seems to be the control of the whole enterprise, under the Bill as it is worded the Government will control merely the stock of the Canadian Northern, but will leave in the hands of the public a large proportion of the shares in the constituent and subsidiary companies. I think this is very improper and against the public interest. But we have to deal with the Bill as it is. The Bill does not affect the stock to which the amendment refers. These shareholders will retain that stock, they will get the benefit of all the money put up by the Government from year to year, and I can see no reason why they should be indemnified when they are not disturbed.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: I am sure that the honourable gentleman from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry) is trying to force something upon the Government which will work an injustice upon the stockholders whom he seeks to benefit. As I understand it, Mackenzie and Mann are liable to get nothing at all for the stock. I believe that the city of Quebec holds some $400,000 worth of stock in the Quebec and Lake St. John railway. If I am right so far, what would it mean? It would mean this, that if they got the proportion that Mackenzie and Mann were getting, they would receive nothing for their $400,000 of stock. Assuming that Mackenzie and Mann would get $5,000,000 for $60,000,000 of stock, that would be one-twelfth; therefore the city of Quebec would be entitled to one-twelfth of $400,000, and in consideration of that they would have to hand over that $400,000 of stock to the Government. Is it not obvious to every honourable gentleman here that it is far better and more in the interests of the city of Quebec to remain in the partnership with the Government? The honourable member for Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt) this morning spoiled what I consider to be a strong speech, which he made yesterday in opposing this transaction, by intimating that after the Government got hold of this road it was going to be a prosperous and paying institution. I am quite pleased that he has come to that conclusion after reflection; and if he is right, and if we on this side of the House who are upholding this agreement are right, it is certainly in the interests of the minor stockholders to retain their interest in the road. Therefore I say that the honourable gentleman is supporting something which is not in the interests of the people whom he wishes to protect.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My honourable friend misunderstood me altogether. I was taking the argument of honourable gentlemen opposite, and I said that if their view was correct, the fact that this Government is going to put in a large sum of money in completing the road, in providing it with proper equipment and so on, whether administered by the Government or by a board, would make it of some value. It would turn a bankrupt concern into a solvent one, and by reason of that this $60,000,000 of stock will acquire a value. It cannot be supposed that a large sum can be put into this undertaking without increasing its value. Consequently, we are going to enhance the value of this stock very largely. I was putting that forward as an argument as to why $10,000,000 ought to be considered a very generous allowance in the eyes of honourable gentlemen opposite. I for one thought it was too generous. I do not think that Mackenzie and Mann should get anything for this stock, because to me it is absolutely valueless. I do not contradict the position I took yesterday. I maintain that the stock is absolutely worthless, but that the Government is going to make it valuable at the expense of the taxpayer and the people's money.

The amendment of Hon. Mr. Choquette was negatived.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: We want to try to make this clause as acceptable to the people of Canada as we possibly can. I think that an amendment in line 12 of the clause would be a great improvement, and I therefore propose that in line 12 of clause 1 the word "arbitration" be stricken out, and the words "Exchequer Court of Canada" be substituted therefor. The country has had experience of the way in which the Exchequer Court deals with railway questions, and I think the country appreciates the work which has been done by that court in the past in dealing with these matters. We have had experience of the work done by the judge of the Exchequer Court in dealing with the Quebec and Saguenay railroad, and I think every one throughout the country who has any knowledge of the way in which the court did its work on that occasion must appreciate the action of the judge, and the fair and equitable way in which he dealt with that situation. I therefore have very much pleasure in moving this amendment, which I hope we shall see adopted.

The amendment was negatived.

Section 1 was agreed to.

On section 2—transfer of shares:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: This clause provides for the taking over by the Government of five-sixths of the 600,000 shares. As I understand it, it declares that the Government can force the transfer of the balance of one-sixth of the shares to themselves. Am I correct, or will those shares still be outstanding?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: As stated in the section:

> The Governor in Council may declare the said shares to be the property of the Minister of Finance in trust for His Majesty, and the same shall thereupon become the property of His Majesty and shall be paid for pro rata with the shares so transferred.

The shares pass automatically to the Government upon payment pro rata for the 50,000 shares which will be acquired under the Bill.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Does this Act give power to the Government to compel the holders of the shares if they object to such an arrangement?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, it is a statutory declaration that they belong to the Crown.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Are we to understand that we are to go through the whole Bill without having submitted to us the draft agreement between the Government and these gentlemen?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is not proposed to bring down the draft agreement, because I presume it will not be prepared until this Bill is passed. It will be an agreement that will constitute, I presume, a submission to the award of the arbitrators. It will contain such terms and conditions as the Government may think necessary for the protection of the public interests; but I do not think it necessary that this agreement should be brought down to Parliament. It is to be presumed that the agreement will be framed in pursuance of the terms of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH: Is it proposed by the Government to give any information at all?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH: We have been like the boy on the street: we have been asked to shut our eyes and open our mouths, and see what we would get. I do not think that there is a business man before me who would put $50 of his own funds into the transaction on the information that has been given to us. I do not think that we are being treated fairly, or that the friends of the Government on the other side of the House are being treated fairly when they are asked to consent to legislation of this kind without having all the information obtainable. We are here to do the business of the country as best we can, but how are we to do it without this information?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The honourable gentleman states that he will not bring before this House the agreement that will be entered into with the Canadian Northern or Mackenzie and Mann?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I said that as far as I knew the agreement had not been prepared.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have considerable confidence in the spirit of fair play and common sense of my honourable friend. I will draw his attention to clause 24 of the Act of 1914 and will ask if Parliament is really performing the task that was provided for under that clause. The clause says:

24. If authorized by the Parliament of Canada, the Governor in Council may on such terms and conditions (if any) as Parliament may prescribe, at any time while any event of default shall exist, and be continuing, by order declare the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern and of all other persons whomsoever in the mortgaged premises to be foreclosed.

Now, of course, my honourable friend may say: "Are we not prescribing conditions? Are there not four clauses of this Act in which we are prescribing conditions under which we will take possession of the railway?" Generally speaking, the answer would be satisfactory as far as it goes; but when we come to one of the most important parts of the agreement to be entered into—when we come to the valuing of that stock and declare to the arbitrators that they may fix the amount of equity which this $60,000,000 of stock represents; when we have the statement by my honourable friend, which was made solemnly before this House in answer to a written question by the honourable senator for Hastings, that a limitation will be fixed; surely my honourable friend will not claim that this is a mere detail which should not interest this Chamber. I ask him, therefore, before we reach the third reading, to consult with his colleagues and with the Prime Minister, in order to be able to decide if Parliament and the country are not entitled to know what will be the maximum sum that the arbitrators will fix. Newspapers throughout the land stated on Saturday last that it would be provided in the agreement that the maximum sum of $10,000,000 would be the figure beyond which the arbitrators would not go. I know, and have reason to believe, that my honourable friend has said so somewhere within the last four days; I am quite sure he will not deny it. And yet Parliament and this Chamber will not, before they pass this Bill, have the figure which I am informed my honourable friend has given out as the maximum, though newspaper men have been informed, and I am told that it is no guess work on their part. Why should not the two branches of Parliament be informed before this Bill has been read the third time?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The question submitted by my honourable friend is not an unreasonable one. If there were only the viewpoint mentioned by my honourable friend there would be some force in his remarks; but honourable gentlemen have to consider this matter from an entirely different viewpoint. I might preface my reply by saying that the Government of the day is as anxious as honourable gentlemen opposite that this stock should be valued at as low a figure as possible. They are not anxious to pay out of the public treasury an extraordinary or exorbitant amount for this stock. They have to take into consideration, however, what would be the effect upon public opinion if the amount were mentioned in the Bill. What would be the effect? You would immediately divide the public into two camps, one urging that the amount is excessive, the other urging that it should be increased. It would be in the interest of those holding the stock of the company that a current of public opinion should be created to advocate an increase of the amount; that would be the outcome; consequently you would find the press and public of Canada contending among themselves as to whether it was enough, or whether it should not be greater.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Is not that element working at the present time?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If that element is working at the present time, they have not the opportunity of knowing what the amount will be. Furthermore, it is not unreasonable to say that the arbitrators might be influenced, possibly subconsciouly, by a strong current of public opinion as to what the value of this stock is. I will say to honourable gentlemen that, when publicity will be given as to the amount which will be fixed in the agreement, they will feel thoroughly satisfied that the interests of Canada are being protected.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Section 5 of the Act of 1914 referred to an agreement which was called: "The agreement the draft whereof is set forth in the schedules hereto." It was thought proper then to draft the agreement in order to put it before Parliament and to inform Parliament of its contents. I thought that was the proper course, and I would have expected and hoped that the Government would have proceeded likewise in the present instance, especially when dealing with a matter of far greater importance—with a sum exceeding $600,000,000, as compared with $45,000,000, especially in view of the fact that the Government is being committed to assuming also the debts and liabilities of other railways, such as the Grand Trunk Pacific, at a future session. But if the Government does not see its way to drafting the agreement, surely there are all possible reasons for them to say what the maximum amount is which they propose to fix to which the arbitrators may go. A moment ago the honourable leader gave the very best reason why this should be done, when referring to people exerting pressure on the one hand to have the amount decreased and on the other to have it enlarged. My honourable friend will surely see that this argument does not apply to the fixing of the maximum amount, because that would close the door to any further argument on the question; but it applies to the state of things which is now continuing because the maximum amount is not mentioned. I have no doubt there is a pressure to-day, and there will be a greater pressure to-morrow, on all the members of the Government to have this amount fixed as large as possible; and it seems to me the clear duty of the Government to make up its mind as soon as possible in determining that amount and thus close the door to this unhealthy pressure. I think that not only this House and the House of Commons and members on the Government side are interested in knowing that maximum, but also members on this side, and the country at large, which is very much exercised over the matter, and is entitled to know the maximum amount to which the country will be committed by this arbitration.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: May I be allowed to add one word in reference to the frank statement of the honourable leader of the Government, that if a figure is fixed there will be immediately a cabal, a pressure, on the part of newspaper men and by public opinion, in favour of reducing the amount, and also pressure from the interested parties to increase it. In what state is public opinion to-day? It has been apprised of the fact that a maximum figure will be fixed, but does not know what that figure is. Those interested in having the figure made as large as possible, the private interests, are on the job, and will be on the job until they sign that document. They will not leave; they will follow the ministers and be at their heels day and night. The public have the conviction that that is what will take place in the natural course of things. The interested parties will attend to their business, and, as everybody knows, Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann will be able to look after their own affairs and use the necessary pressure. Wherever I have gone and within the past few days—I have passed through two or three cities in coming here—I have heard gossip to the effect that, if the Government does not show its hand and say now what is the maximum amount, they will be facing Mackenzie and Mann on the eve of a general election, and that there will be a formidable temptation for a dicker with those people—I will not go beyond these words. We have all reached the meridian of life, and understand what this gossip means. Is it not in the interest of the Government to clear the atmosphere? Have we not enough scandal mongers in the community without adding fuel to this gossip that goes on about public men? Is it not for the better administration of public affairs that in such a large and complicated question as that of the purchase of the Canadian Northern we should not add all the suspicion that will naturally arise? I said that the newspapers of Canada have already been apprised of the figure. I have reason to believe that they know the maximum figure that the members of the Government have fixed among themselves, if it is not regularly official. I would again ask my honourable friend to seize the first opportunity, when sitting with his colleagues, to discuss again the advisability of appeasing the public mind by fixing that maximum.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Some people are wicked enough to think that the Government are very friendly with the Canadian Northern people, and that the thing which happened in the case of the Quebec and Saguenay arbitration may be repeated, when the Government's own lawyer wanted to allow $500,000 and $794,000, but the judge said, "No," and barred it out. Evidently that lawyer must have been representing his client, and must have had instructions, yet the judge actually wiped out a million and a quarter on a small amount of five or six millions. I would ask if the Government would not be wise to have the public represented on this arbitration by a public solicitor, because there is an opinion in the country that the Government are very friendly to the interests engaged in this transaction. In many royal commissions a public representative has been allowed; and, if they would permit one in this arbitration, would they not say now that they would agree to have one? I have no doubt it would be very easy to make a case for these arbitrators, and show that there is no equity at all, because the Royal Commission appointed to value this concern—although the Government employed the best talent they could get in the United States, and spent $70,000 of public money—could only find $402,000,000. Consequently it would be useless to talk about an equity, when the company is $200,000,000 shy. But if, forsooth, the Government lawyers on this arbitration happen to be like the lawyer for the Government on the Quebec and Saguenay case before one arbitrator—and it is understood that one of the arbitrators will be Sir William Meredith——

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I rise to a point of order. We have got past the discussion of the arbitration, which is altogether provided for in section 1 which we have passed.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, in section 4.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I am getting my information from the Chairman, if you please.

The CHAIRMAN: I would like members of the Committee to confine themselves as much as possible to the point.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I am just winding up, anyway. I was asking that the Government would allow counsel for the public to be retained in order to protect the interests of the public. I think the Government should welcome such a suggestion, as I believe the leader of the Government especially wants to see a fair deal. If a solicitor representing the public could be there and prove that the liabilities and charges and bonds, etc., were much more than the value of the road, then there would be no equity, and the arbitrators would find, as has been found already by Sir Henry Drayton and Mr. Acworth, that there is no equity, and thus the whole thing would be settled. I think it would relieve the public mind if the Government would say that the arbitration would be conducted openly, and that there would be some representative of the public; because, as we have seen in the instance I cited, the attorneys of the Government are not always faithful to their trust, and are willing to allow more money than the Exchequer Court would.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON I think the Government would be relieved of a great responsibility if they would come to Parliament and let us share with them the fixing of the limit for the arbitrators. If the amount were stated in Parliament and passed upon here, the Government would be relieved from agitation by newspapers and parties interested, because they could say, "The Parliament of Canada have done this, and it is not within our right or privilege to change it." I really think the Government are not treating Parliament as it should be treated. I believe the people's representatives on the floor of Parliament are the proper ones for this duty. If we had more information about this matter, we would be able to exercise better judgment than we can by merely thinking out or guessing about certain matters. In 1914 the Government frankly brought the agreement down and Parliament knew exactly what the proposition was. To-day, if the Government would only give Parliament this information, they could obtain the assistance of the people's representatives and also transfer to them the responsibility of the arbitration. As it is, we denude ourselves of the powers of Parliament, pass the matter over with confidence to the Government, and the Government themselves transfer it to an outside body whose verdict in respect to this matter shall be final. What could those newspapers do if it were known that Parliament had fixed the figure at $10,000,000? My honourable friend referred to the influences that might be exerted outside, but it would really result very similarly to what my honourable friend's associate in business said in Parliament in 1914. He said:

Mr. Speaker, those loyal, devoted Canadians who believe that democracy's mission is not fulfilled, and that popular government is upon trial, know what that means—a long protracted lobby as to how much we are going to pay to get rid of them. Do not you think you see that lobby, do not you think you see that session of Parliament and the corridors black with the lobbyists moving to and fro, trying to see that the Government does not foreclose unless it pays this much or that much. Is that the way we are going to deal with this matter? What about your unpaid contractors then—and these men are still free to contract. What about the unpaid labourers then and the unpaid equipment men? This company, and these men, are still free to run into debt, still free to create further obligations, to pledge the credit of the company, and they come to us when this Parliament is asked to authorize foreclosure. Mark you, it says: "that if authorized by the Parliament of Canada"—and they say: Behold what we have done; you must not foreclose us unless you take care of this man, that man and the other; look what we have done; all we got was common stock; do not wipe us out without something; give us something; we are the champion mendicants of our day—peradventure we starve if you do not give us something."

Now, we could relieve the Government of all that if we knew, and if Parliament knew, that $10,000,000 was the outside limit to which the arbitration could go in determining the value. If Parliament were advised of that fact, I am quite sure that the outside influence could not have much effect.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I think my honourable friend will readily admit that this Chamber could have no authority to fix a sum in the Bill. It is peculiarly a matter in regard to which the House of Commons should have acted if they considered it desirable so to do; but for this Chamber to make such an amendment would be equivalent practically to originating a money Bill and saying to the shareholders that there should be an amount not to exceed that stated.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: I think the honourable gentleman misunderstands me. I mean to say that if the honourable leader of the Government, being in a position to voice the determination of the Government, should say to this Parliament to-day that $10,000,000 shall be the maximum sum, and if this Parliament acted on that intimation, it would be just the same as if we had it in the Bill.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My honourable friend's objection will not hold, because, if it were part of the agreement, there would be no objection such as that which he has just stated.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I thought the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Thompson) was speaking about putting it into the Bill.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I do hope my honourable friend (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) will see that it is only proper and just to submit to us a draft of this agreement before the Bill passes the third reading.

My honourable friend has already stated, in the course of the debate, that the Government will see to the details, and the Government could be trusted to see that proper provisions were included in the agreement. But surely the people are interested in knowing what the terms of this agreement are going to be. There are many things which will be provided for in this agreement that are only very vaguely, if at all, indicated in the Bill. My honourable friend will see how logical it is to submit the terms of the agreement. The discussion by the public, which my honourable friend is afraid of, is taking place, by reason of the fact that the Bill has been submitted to Parliament and, in being submitted to Parliament, to the public. After all, who is going to pay for this railway? It is the people of Canada surely. Who are better qualified to discuss the terms of this agreement than the people of Canada? I cannot help being amused at the perfect candor with which my honourable friend, good Tory as he is, has expressed the good old Tory doctrine that all knowledge is centred in themselves—for instance, the statement that the Tory Government to-day can be trusted in everything and that its measures need not be discussed; the public need not know what the Government propose to do, and we may go to sleep with the perfect assurance that everything will be done properly. That is the old Tory doctrine of which my honourable friend is evidently a good disciple, and also a good preacher when occasion requires. But I submit that the very reason which my honourable friend has given, that the mention of the amount would create public discussion, is the very reason why the amount should be stated. We ought to know it. Parliament ought to be advised as to what is the public opinion in the matter. I repeat, my honourable friend must see the absolute fairness of submitting this agreement, not only with reference to the maximum sum to be fixed, but also with reference to all its other terms; and if my honourable friend is not disposed to say now that he will before we dispose of this Bill submit a draft of the agreement, I shall have to propose an amendment to the effect that any agreement to be made by the Government with those people shall be subject to ratification by Parliament. I do not think I will propose it now. I shall defer doing so in the hope that my honourable friend will see the wisdom and justice of submitting the draft agreement before we proceed much further.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I hope my honourable friend (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) will keep an open mind, to a certain degree at all events, on the question of the right of this House to fix the maximum amount when we are facing a possible award of $60,000,000. We might fix a maximum amount of $1,000,000 in cash. I said $10,000,000 in shares. I would not be so liberal with the money of the people, because I do not hold exactly the view of my honourable friend from Ottawa, that if the Government add a few hundred millions to what has already been expended, it will considerably enhance the value of those shares. A good administration may in time give some value to them, but the millions of dollars that will need to be voted will be so much more capital that will have to carry interest, and it will be a long, long time, I think, before any dividend is declared on whatever shares we leave to the shareholders, in spite of the opinion expressed by Sir William Mackenzie. But I am convinced that there is in this Chamber a majority of members who feel that the Senate has the right to reduce an amount in a money Bill which is submitted to us. I do not believe that this is a money Bill which we would be precluded from modifying in any way. I am convinced that we have a right to declare that the arbitrators may not go beyond a certain figure, and it is because I hold strongly to that view that I would like my honourable friend, when the time comes—because we may move in the matter—not to have a prejudiced mind on this question.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I think a great debt of gratitude is due by this Senate, and especially by the workers on the Canadian Northern railway, to the honourable senator from Fredericton (Hon. Mr. Thompson). In his brief remarks on this question, he has called attention to a feature which is absolutely ignored in the Bill. The feature is this, that the servants of the company, whether in the management or the operation thereof, or the contractors of that railway system, have been completely left aside. The object of this Bill, to my mind, is not so much to advance the interests of those two gentlemen, knights of the Empire, Sir William Mackenzie and Sir Donald Mann, as to protect the interests of their associates, whether in banks, insurance companies or trust companies. The Bill passing through Parliament, to my mind, has not for its sole object to increase the millions of wealth of Sir William Mackenzie or Sir Donald Mann; but it is presented to Parliament to protect the interests of their associates in this system, men whom we call high financiers. Most of them reside in Toronto or thereabouts. That is, to my mind, the object of this Bill. I really believe that Sir William Mackenzie and Sir Donald Mann do not give a rap whether this Bill passes or not. They have got their millions laid aside. But they have had friends in the banks of our country—and I will name especially the Bank of Commerce—and other financial institutions, insurance and trust companies, backing their enterprise. Their wealth is stowed away, and now they are playing the game of fair poker-players: they do not want to see their partners beaten, and they come to Parliament for power to safeguard and protect the interests of their associates—so-called financiers. Well, "financier" in its legitimate use is a good word—

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Robbers.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: But financiers sometimes are bigger thieves than the man who steals a loaf of bread to live on. Millionaires can take millions and never go to the penitentiary, but a poor man who takes a loaf of bread off a counter to keep from starving is sent to the penitentiary for seven years. These are facts, but they are facts which the Government of Canada have never dealt with as they have been dealt with in the United States.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Mr. Chairman, I think it is your duty to see that the speakers, in addressing the House, keep to the question, and my honourable friend certainly knows he is not in order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: What is the point of order? Do you not want to hear the truth? I am talking about section 2.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Put it in its right place.

The CHAIRMAN: Perhaps my honourable friend will try to confine his remarks to the clause before the Chair.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Yes. Section 2 reads as follows—I will not read the whole of it:

> Upon the making of said agreement—

My purpose is not to dispute this section. My proposition, which I hold in my hand, is not to amend the section, but to add to it; and so as to put myself in line with the ruling of the Chair, which I respect very highly—I think we have a very fair Chairman—I will move in amendment to section 2 of Bill 125:

That there be added after the word "agreement" in line one of the said clause:

"That, in any agreement to be made between His Majesty and the said Canadian Northern Railway Company and its other allied and subsidiary companies, that claims of all servants of the company, whether in the management or in the operation thereof, and all claims of contractors in the contruction of the said railway system, be submitted to the board of arbitration, as provided in this Act."

That amendment appeals to the sense of the country, if it does not appeal to the majority opposite. My first aim is that it shall appeal to the men who, I know, for the past 20 years have been working under starvation wages, from the highest to the lowest, and to contractors who have been fleeced out of their money. This amendment is not placed before this honourable House without a purpose. It is based on fact, and I hope it will be based on the justice of the Government in dealing with the matter. These men, to my own personal knowledge, have served this company for the past 20 years under starvation wages. Some of the highest officials to-day, who are the mainstay of the company and of the system, are receiving salaries infinitely lower than what any other company would pay to men of the same standing. I am not going to give you their names. Some of them have been here in the corridors. You would be astounded, honourable gentlemen, if you knew what this railway system has been paying to these devoted servants, who have given their entire time, their abilities, their talents, their work and their energy for paltry sums. So this motion is not made to placate the vote of honourable gentlemen opposite, who have decided to support the claims of the financial magnates of the company against the rights and interests of the working classes on that system. The Bill is submitted for the purpose of protecting the interests of men who are already wealthy, owning millions. All I want this Parliament to do is to give a little solace to the men who have actually built up the system and made it popular throughout the entire Dominion of Canada. That is all I am asking by this amendment, and I am not asking that this Parliament should give a certain amount on the spot. I am asking that their humble claims be considered. They are afraid to show themselves, unlike the financiers of Toronto who come down brazen-faced and demand and obtain from this Government millions upon millions, whereas the poor men who have worked faithfully and devotedly for this company for the past 20 years are afraid to show their heads. Cannot they have a single voice in Parliament, no matter how humble it may be, to present their claims for recognition? And why should the loyal Government party try to put these claims down? Have you no fellow-feeling for the people outside of this Chamber? Is the Government security here to support the claims of men who are already wealthy, revelling in luxury, and is the poor man to remain where he is? The object of this amendment is to overcome that. It is not asking too much of the Government to submit the claims of these people to arbitration, in face of the fact that the Government is asking Parliament to sanction the placing of the claims of millionaires and financial magnates. Is this Parliament of Canada going to pit the autocracy of wealth against poverty? Is this Parliament going to lead us where Russia has been led? Is this Government going to give examples of anarchy to the people of Canada, by the measures which they are forcing through Parliament, by suppressing free speech and muzzling the representatives of the people? Beware! it may not take centuries, as it did in Russia, to overthrow the whole system. It may take only a few years in this very enlightened country of Ganada to overthrow a Government which attempts such measures as they are attempting to-day. I hold that this amendment is in the right direction, and honourable gentlemen opposite, if they will only consult the interests of the people of the country, if they will only consult the future of the country—I do not want to be a false prophet, and especially I do not want to be a true prophet; but if legislation of this kind is going to be passed by Parliament, you will have a condition of things in Canada that you probably will not regret, but that your children will regret. When this Parliament is dealing with a proposition of this kind, and voting and granting millions of the people's money, undertaking obligations for the future of untold millions—unknown millions—the Government will not even let us know how many millions are involved in this problem. They refuse us information; they have refused it up to the present, notwithstanding the urgent appeals of the leader of His Majesty's loyal Opposition, notwithstanding the appeals of men who have all their interests centred in Canada. The Government sits with a number of men behind it choking off discussion, refusing light on the situation.

The Hon. the CHAIRMAN: Perhaps my honourable friend will confine his remarks to the clause. If I may offer a suggestion, I would say that I think his remarks would be more in order under clause 3. Perhaps he will postpone them until we come to that clause.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I agree with the Chairman all the time. He is the fairest man we ever had in the Chair, so far as I can see. I accept his suggestion. The only thing is that I have been a little premature in asserting these facts and expressing these sentiments. I think the honourable the Chairman will not find fault with me for defending the rights of the people. That is what I am trying to do. I am not trying to impress the other side at all. I am trying to put before the people of the country the facts as I see them, and as they see them, which have just been put into my hands within the last half hour. The motion has been drafted on statements made by officers and contractors of this company. If I could tell you all I know, honourable gentlemen, you would be surprised. The Chairman says that this motion may more properly be spoken to under clause 3. On that understanding I withdraw the amendment, and later on I will probably have an opportunity to repeat my remarks.

The amendment was withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I am glad to know that the honourable gentleman from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt) is going to make a formal motion that the agreement ought to be submitted to Parliament. That is only fair in a transaction of this kind. It is only fair to both parties representing the people of Canada. If that amendment is voted down, and I am afraid it will be, I would ask the Government why not, after the House has prorogued, submit the agreement to the leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Bostock) and my honourable friend from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt). Both of these gentlemen live at the seat of Government, and it will give the greatest satisfaction to the public at large, if Parliament cannot pass judgment on the agreement, to have the information placed before these honourable gentlemen. Even if the amendment is not carried, that would afford some satisfaction; and I daresay that some of the suggestions of these two gentlemen would be agreed to by the Government, because the interest which they have at heart is to make the agreement as fair as possible to the people of the country. I will ask my honourable friend from Hastings (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell), who had the other day to put a question to the Government as to the maximum amount to be fixed for the shares which are going to be bought by the Government, if he will permit the suggestion that this is a proper time to put his question, and to ask the Government to mention the maximum amount. Would not this be a good opportunity to put on Hansard the question of my honourable friend and the answer of the Government, which answer I hope will contain the figure talked about.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: When anything is reasonably put before this House, it should be reasonably received. I have no fault to find with the leader of the House. He thinks one way and I think another. I do not object and holloa at any honourable gentleman who is trying to make himself understood. Of course, we must make allowances for new men who are not accustomed to this Chamber, and I make that allowance. I think it would be very unfortunate if the public should get it into its mind that there is any thimble-rigging going on here, not by this House, but by those who may be trying to influence the Government. Surely it is not unreasonable to ask, before going into such a big transaction as this, that something should be laid before us. It might not be the entire scheme; a skeleton draft might be sufficient. The people will naturally say, "Why has so much time been taken in laying this before you?" The argument would be that the gentlemen who are bringing this down, or whoever it may be, must have looked into the question. Surely they would not subject the country to it if they had not. I do not think it would be unreasonable to ask the honourable the leader of the House to give us some idea as to what is done before the finality of this question is reached. Perhaps they cannot make up the agreement now. But the impression should not go abroad, as my honourable friend has said, that opinion is being stifled here, or that speech is being curtailed. Let the public know that both sides are doing their best. This is an unfortunate occurrence in the country, and we should have the benefit of the people saying, "Well, they are doing the best they can under the circumstances." That would be a desirable thing. There is a future after all, and I warn honourable gentlemen. I would try to satisfy the people that undue influence will not be brought to bear on the Government, and that the Government will give some idea of how far they will go, and will take this House into their confidence—not this afternoon, but a little later on. I consider that it is unreasonable to ask us to go on with this clause, or any other clause, until we get some information. I cannot tell the Government to bring it down. Assuming that things that are being said outside are true—perhaps they are not—there is an impression around as to the immoral procedure that has gone on in the past, and that may go on in the future if it is not controlled and in some way brought within the purview of this Chamber, which has the right to express itself so long as it does so in a moderate way.

Section 2 was agreed to.

On section 3, subsection 1—after transfer Canadian Northern Railway Company may be assisted:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would crave your attention, honourable gentlemen, for just a few minutes, to make a suggestion which I think is worthy of consideration. I put myself upon the judgment of my honourable colleagues. We are all intent upon doing the best that we can for the country, and I suppose that any proposition made in this Chamber will be received with sympathy and examined with a view to bettering the Bill, if it is possible to do so. The proposal which I have to make is, I think, in the right direction. I do not say that it is perfect, that it cannot be improved upon; but I give it as I have drafted it, and will leave it on the table of the House. I first want to draw the attention of my honourable colleagues to the fact that we are assuming, as mortgagees, second-rank mortgages, not only our own liabilities, our own obligations, but the obligations which precede us, which amount in all to $211,000,000. Besides that, we have advanced $15,000,000, which would make a total of $226,000,000 that the Government and the country are committed to. Now, when we do acquire the whole or the majority of the shares of this company, we become liable for all the liabilities, because we do not want the company to go into liquidation, and by that action we assume a further known liability, a liability admitted by the company, of $245,000,000, that ranks after our second mortgage. Now, a foreclosure would imperil, to say the least, a considerable part of those liabilities which stand behind us. It has been stated that the Government of the country could not think of wiping out all these liabilities and standing upon its rights as second mortgage creditor. The majority in this Chamber is intent upon endorsing the principle of the Bill. I suppose every honourable member will admit that as second mortgage creditors, if we turn towards the unsecured creditors—at all events creditors unsecured by the guarantees of the provinces or the guarantees of the Dominion—and tell them that this company stands within the grasp of the receiver, liable to be liquidated, but that the Government has decided to purchase all the shares and to develop the system and administer it, and that the Government will pay to all those unsecured creditors 100 cents on the dollar plus interest, of the actual money advanced to the company, ranking after the mortgage which the Government of Canada has obtained by the Act of 1914, the Government would be doing the right thing, and would be acting right royally towards those unsecured creditors?

It has been said in this Chamber that the creditors who stand behind us to the amount of $245,000,000 have not paid more than 75 per cent over to the company for the paper or the notes or bonds that they took from them. If that is true, should we not devise a scheme by which the Government of Canada and the people will have only to repay those people the amount actually advanced by them? With that idea in mind, I suggest that we add the following words to the first subsection of section 3:

> And provided also that, as regards any indebtedness for moneys advanced to the Canadian Northern Railway Company or to any company included in the Canadian Northern Railway system, and taking rank after the mortgage held by the Minister of Finance in trust for His Majesty under the Act of 1914 (4-5 George V) no payment be made of such indebtedness beyond the actual amount received by said company or companies, with interest; said amount thus received to be ascertained by the Exchequer Court of Canada.

If 75 per cent of the face value of the $245,000,000 admitted liabilities were all that the Government were obliged to pay thereon, it would represent a saving to the people of Canada of $61,000,000. Why should the people enrich the holders of those securities to the tune of $61,000,000 if 75 per cent is the outside figure that the holders of those securities paid for them?

Hon. Mr. GORDON: Why should you say the company have only received 75 per cent of the face value of those securities? Where do you get such figures?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My general knowledge of the financing of that railway.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: Which railway?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The Canadian Northern, as well as my knowledge of many other public corporations, which leads me to believe that this company has not received for its unsecured paper and its short notes more than 75 per cent; and I am told that in very many instances it received less. If that figure is somewhat unjust, let us say that it was 80 per cent that they brought to the company; is it not worth while that the Government, when facing such immense debts, and not morally obliged to pay those debts, and able to foreclose by virtue of the Act of 1914, should not pay more than the people advanced?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: My honourable friend has only to refer to the report of the commissioners to obtain an answer to that question. They found that whereas the debt of this railway amounted to over $600,000,000, yet there was only $370,000,000 invested in the enterprise.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: So that you get there the difference between what the company owe and what was really expended.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: I think you will find from the Drayton-Acworth report that the $370,000,000 was after deducting depreciations for a certain number of years.

Some Hon. SENATORS: No, no.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: I think that report shows that the cost of the road, in addition to the rolling stock, was something over $400,000,000. Now you are using the depreciation for the purpose of showing that the bonds were sold at 25 per cent less than their value.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I think if we go into the figures given by the Royal Commissioners, it will easily be found that there is at least that margin between what was really expended and the liabilities of the company. Whatever may be the margin, is it not well that we should provide only for the payment of what has actually been received for those securities outstanding, and which we are not obliged to protect? I draw the attention of my honourable friend to page 44 of the report of the Royal Commission, wherein I read:

> We find, then, $370,000,000 to be the maximum possible cost of the Canadian Northern system as at present existing.

I think it would be possible, on examining into the financial operations of the company, to find that those outstanding securities, which rank after the second mortgage which the Government of Canada has by virtue of the Act of 1914, have not brought more than 75 per cent of their face value; and, if so, should the holders of those securities not consider themselves very fortunate indeed to get back their money with interest thereon without getting a margin which the Government is not obliged to pay, a margin which they themselves did not pay? I leave it to you, honourable gentleman. You all know in what situation the Government of Canada is—its difficulties in financing, the high rate of interest we are paying, our heavy obligations pertaining to the war, in doing all we can to bring it to a victorious end; and should we not take some precautions to see that that large amount be not paid recklessly to people who are not entitled to it when facing the Government of Canada as second mortgage creditors? For that reason I move the amendment.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: May I say to my honourable friend that he entirely misapprehends the situation. He seems to attach to the management of the Canadian Northern railway system a simplicity that is childlike. One would fancy that they are being taken advantage of daily by their creditors—that to raise 75 cents they pay a dollar, and so on. Now, if my honourable friend, instead of working himself up into the state of indignation with which he is flagellating himself, would only look into the balance-sheet in blue-book No. 237, which is in your hands, he would see precisely the financial condition of this company. He would observe that, so far as floating liabilities are concerned, the current liabilities of this company amount to $12,000,000 odd. Those floating liabilities are current liabilities, made up of pay-rolls, audited vouchers, and other floating liabilities. This is not an extraordinarily large amount for a railway system covering over 9,500 miles. And I would furthermore say to my honourable friend, for the purpose of giving him the necessary assurance which might bring some comfort to his harried soul about those unsecured liabilities, that the Government of Canada for the last two years has followed with the closest investigation the auditing of those accounts. They have been audited not only by the shareholders' auditor, but by Marwick, Mitchell, Peet and Company, who are admittedly the leading auditors in Great Britain and in the English-speaking world.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK:: Has the honourable gentleman got that statement?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They conduct a monthly audit of all the affairs of the Canadian Northern system. Then, that is further checked by all the experts of the different departments of Government whose duty it is to give attention to those matters—the experts of the Railway Department and of the Finance Department, and we have also the assistance of the experts upon the Railway Board. My honourable friends on the opposite side seem to think that the Government has absolutely gone asleep; that they are forgetting the fact that there is a Canadian Northern system and that the country is a very large creditor of the system; and to hear my honourable friends addressing the House, one would fancy that they are the personification of vigilance, and that nobody else in this vast country has thought of making inquiry into these matters. My honourable friends talk glibly of the liabilities of this country, and of the Government assuming no less than $600,000,000 of liabilities, which is all nonsense. If my honourable friends would only cencentrate their attention for one hour, say, upon the bluebooks, and upon the information which has been laid upon the Table, instead of thrashing space as they are doing in the discussion of this matter, their souls would be comforted in knowing precisely what the liabilities of this company are, and they would know that the Government of Canada has reduced this matter down to a certainty. We know precisely where we stand. As I say, the liabilities of this company fall slightly below $400,000,000, and if my honourable friend will look at the——

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Did not my honourable friend the other day hear the honourable member for Kingston (Hon. Mr. Richardson), who is the representative director of the Government on this Board, say that the liabilities were $510,000,000?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, because my honourable friend, in looking over the list of liabilities, included the $100,000,000 of stock; but of course that is not a liability.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It is included in the statement.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Of course, in a formal statement prepared by any auditors all stock is put down as a liability; but if my honourable friends will check up this bluebook they will see that they are relieved of, I suppose, $150,000,000, if they eliminate all the items which are really not liabilities. My honourable friends must exercise some little intelligence in looking over a balance-sheet of this kind; they must scrutinize it; they must examine it with the intelligence of business men, and not simply jump to the conclusion that because they find the figure of $500,000,000 that means $500,000,000 of liabilities.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: Is that $100,000,000 an asset?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Let us eliminate it, if you will; it is not a liability.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: Is it an asset?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The Canadian Northern system is in no way liable for the payment of $100,000,000 of stock. Furthermore, if my honourable friends will examine the Drayton-Acworth report, they will very clearly observe that the value of the road, in round figures, is $400,000,000, and the obligations of the road are $400,000,000; and they admittedly did not include all the assets contained in the list of assets on page 1½ of bluebook No. 237. If my honourable friends will spend sufficient time in examining that report, they will see clearly that those assets are not included. They include such items as deferred payments and accrued interest on sales, $7,000,000; cash with the National Trust Company; nearly $2,500,000; lands unsold represent nearly $20,000,000; current assets, cash account, over $20,000,000; and the value of material and supplies and other miscellaneous accounts reprensent $35,000,000.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My honourable friend told us the other day that the company was insolvent.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, I say that. Did my honourable friend never learn of a company that might have assets representing more than 100 per cent of its liabilities and yet be insolvent, and unable to meet its immediate demands? My honourable friend knows, as a lawyer, and cannot controvert the proposition, that immediately a company cannot meet its obligations, no matter what its assets may be, it is insolvent.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: There is a difference between being insolvent and being unable to meet one's obligations, and as a lawyer I need not say that the law treats them in a very different way. If my honourable friend said that the Canadian Northern was unable to meet its obligations, I could understand that, and that would be consistent with what he tells us now; but he said the other day distinctly that it was insolvent.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend very well knows that if a transportation company cannot meet the interest on its bonds, no matter what its value may be, you can place it in liquidation and it is regarded as insolvent. Now, I have no intention of going into any very lengthy analysis of the enormous financial affairs of this company except to say this. My honourable friends are skeptical as to where all this money has gone. We are not in a position to examine critically the application of every dollar that was raised by this company; but is it not sufficient for them to know that the Canadian Northern Railway company has constructed a transportation system that is the equal of the National Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific systems, at one-half its cost? Is that not the test? When I say one-half, I am not quite accurate. that is but approximate.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Would the honourable gentleman allow me?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Is not the railway spoken of by Mr. Tye in his report, and by the members of the Royal Commission, as a commercial and earning concern equal to almost any other railway in Canada? These are the tests as to whether this money has been properly expended or not. Why should we spend our time, hour after hour, day after day, in threshing out questions relating to a critical examination of affairs about which we know nothing, when there are those great central facts presenting themselves to our minds: that these people have raised by their financial transactions loans on a much more satisfactory basis than the Government of Canada could to-day negotiate a loan; that they have built a transportation system, commercially equally to any in Canada, and costing approximately 50 per cent less than the Dominion of Canada, represented by the Government of my honourable friend, had to pay in constructing the National Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific system. I think these central facts should be sufficient to convince honourable gentlemen who are dealing with this question to-day that this great undertaking has been carried out economically. Time and time again you will find the three members of the Royal Commission speaking of the economical management and the economical ability which were exercised in the carrying out of this huge enterprise. Notwithstanding the condemnation, the wholesale condemnation and denunciation of my honourable friends opposite of the promoters of this great system and of the system itself, I say that there is not a tittle of evidence adduced since we commenced the discussion of this matter as to bad faith having been shown by those men in carrying out this great enterprise.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Will the honourable gentleman allow me to ask him this question: is it not acknowledged that there is a floating debt of over $98,000,000? That is admitted. I think the honourable gentleman will admit it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It was stated by the Minister of Finance.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, but we have securities for it.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: No; it is acknowledged that there is a floating debt of $98,000,000.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: What page?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: It is on page 8 of the financial statement. Now, will the honourable gentleman show me in the balance-sheet, among the liabilities, where this amount appears.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is included in the item of $285,416,264, the fourth item on the right-hand side of the balance-sheet.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I would point out to the honourable gentleman that it cannot be included there, because the item to which the honourable gentleman refers is funded debt and the other is floating debt, which are quite different and cannot be included in the items. It cannot be found there.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But will my honourable friend draw a distinction between the securities which have been issued? Those are the securities which are outstanding, and for the debt itself we have securities representing that amount, and it is all under the funded debt—funded in the way of securities.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: No. The honourable gentleman refers me to the item of $285,000,000, which is the funded debt, and I am drawing his attention to a floating debt of $98,000,000, which is something altogether different. Therefore, the honourable gentleman cannot find the $98,000,000. Of course the two statements are not of the same date; one is the balance-sheet to June 30, 1916, and the other is a statement dated June 15, 1917, a year later, and my understanding is, though I may be mistaken, that very likely it is for securities that have been floated subsequently to the making of the statement of June 30, 1916. Apart from that, I draw the honourable gentleman's attention to this. Let us take, if he likes, the balance sheet. He says quite properly that the liabilities mentioned as $578,000,000 comprise $100,000,000 of capital stock, which represent no liability in the sense that he mentions. Has the honourable gentleman another answer to give me after consulting?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They are all in that column which I have pointed out to my honourable friend, beginning with the "Funded debt" and the other obligations mentioned immediately underneath it. All the obligations of the company at that time are in that column.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Of course, it is not in the common stock. Then, there is the item, "Five Per Cent Income-Charge Convertible Debenture Stock." It cannot be in that.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, it is not there.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Then, there is the "Funded debt—Canadian Northern railway, schedule A," $162,000,000; I take only the round figures. It cannot be that. Then, "Funded debt—Affiliated Companies, schedule B," $123,000,000. It cannot be in that, and there is the list. And you will find in the Commission's report the list of all those securities, and—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If my honourable friend will read the balance sheet he will find the item:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED.

Equipment trust obligations..	$16,862,500 00
Temporary loans against deposit as collateral of inter alia Government guaranteed securities, etc..	55,912,961 80
Due to other companies on construction account..	16,666,957 26

And there are securities for all those.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: These amounts do not compare at all.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They do approximately.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: No, not approximately. They do not compare at all with the amounts which appear on page 8. But I am going to take for the moment the figures on which the honourable gentleman relies, which are to be found in the balance sheet, showing liabilities to the amount of $578,747,291.25. From that amount is to be deducted $100,000,000 capital stock.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: There remains $478,000,000 in round figures.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Would my honourable friend also deduct "Capital stock—affiliated companies, less held in treasury, $5,872,000?" Then, my honourable friend will deduct, turning over the page: "Affiliated companies, advance account, $10,250,506."

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: That is just a cross-entry.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is just a cross-entry. My honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Béique) will deduct that. And he will deduct $39,823,459.20, which is "Surplus land account and railway account." He will then find that the total liabilities will be about $417,000,000.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I do not admit that

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Oh, the honourable gentleman will not admit it.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I think I am not in the habit of talking for amusement. If the honourable gentleman will bear with me for one moment and follow the remarks to which I direct his attention, I will invite his answer to them, if there is an answer. I do not admit the deductions. But I am quite willing, for the sake of argument, to take the figure which he mentioned, $417,000,000. How will the honourable gentleman reconcile that with the statement of the commission, appearing on page 43 of their report? We find there $370,000,000 as being the maximum possible cost of the Canadian Northern system as at present existing. How does he harmonize this figure with his $417,000,000?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: In this way. If my honourable friend will look at "assets," he will see that the property investment represents $594,112,489.43. My honourable friend must know that those bonds do not sell at par.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: That is exactly what I understand.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Then you have to take what the proceeds were.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: That is exactly my understanding of it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Then there is the accumulated interest, commissions, etc. So what would apparently be a discrepancy, such as pointed out by my honourable friend, will be seen when examined into, to be a charge that was quite legitimate.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If my honourable friend desires, he may answer my remarks. It is claimed that the financing of the last year of the company has been very costly to it; that it has not in many instances received 75 per cent for its paper. Whatever the amount may be, I am sure the Government could save millions by agreeing to limit its obligation to pay those liabilities still outstanding to the amount actually advanced. That is my proposition. Is there any harm in surrounding this transaction with such a safeguard? Is there any harm in trying to save the country even if it were but a few millions by declaring that those unsecured liabilities will be paid at only the amount which has been advanced upon them?

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: Honourable gentlemen, I desire to call attention to a remark made yesterday by the honourable gentleman from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt) which I am sure he would not have made had he read my remarks carefully. He mentioned several times that I had stated that the liabilities of the Canadian Northern Railway company amounted to $510,000,000. I was referring to the figures given by the honourable leader of the Opposition, but I did not at all acknowledge that the debt amounted to that figure.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My honourable friend mentioned the figure $510,000,000, and I took it from the Official Report.

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: If the honourable gentleman will refer to page 957 he will see exactly what I said.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Before we leave that question, I want to draw the attention of the honourable leader of the Government to this balance-sheet, which is one issued by the chartered accountants, not one for which the commission or Sir Henry Drayton or Mr. Acworth are in any way responsible, but a totally different thing from the statement made in the Drayton-Acworth report. In this balance-sheet, which is vouched for by the chartered accounts, Messrs. Webb, Read, Hegan, Callingham & Company, there is included as assets a sum amounting to $20,000,000. I take one of the items, about which I know perhaps more than about any other: "Province of British Columbia, $6,403,989.06." As I understand it, that is money which is now lying in the bank to the credit of the province, which was obtained by the flotation of the branch lines bonds.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: And some of that money, of course, has been used in the branch lines, but the rest of it should not, I think, be taken in as an asset until the road is actually built. The answer that I received the other day from the honourable leader of the Government with regard to these branch lines was that on account of the war it was not intended to proceed any further with them—that the work was now practically at a standstill. Yet when I compare the statement of these chartered accountants with the statement I read to the House the other day, made by the chief accountant of the road, I find that the amount of $1,678,000 has been paid out between June 30, 1916, and April 30, 1917, but so far as I am aware there has been practically no work done on those branch lines. I fail to see how they can claim that they are entitled to include that money in the balance sheet as an asset of the company, because they have to do that work in order to earn that money before they can receive it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The answer is quite manifest. My honourable friend is basing his valuation upon the valuation made by the Royal Commission. That valuation must, of necessity, be based upon the physical work as it appears. If that money is standing in the bank to carry out additional work, it is quite obvious that it is an asset which is to be applied in adding further value to the road. Furthermore, let me say this. We have those securities charged as liabilities against the company. If they have not been fully expended, the unexpended portion will appear as an asset on the other side of the ledger. But my honourable friends proceed to charge up against the company the whole of the obligation for the securities which have been issued by the company, notwithstanding that many of them have not been marketed but are still in the treasury, and consequently they should of course appear as an asset on the other side of the ledger.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I cannot follow the reasoning of my honourable friend in that matter. He states that this amount of the funded debt is the amount of securities; but those, I take it, are the securities actually issued.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, they are not. When we speak of the funded debt, or, if you omit the other items, they are the securities which have actually been sold.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The securities have actually been sold. Then, another item which we come to is:

Temporary loans against deposit as collateral of, inter alia, Government guaranteed securities, the value of which, at current prices, exceeds the amount borrowed, $55,912,000 odd.

I take it that that amount is the amount actually borrowed and that might be included in the amount, on page 8, of $98,000,000; but it is rather difficult to see exactly how it comes out, because if we turn over to page 8, we find that this $98,000,000 is divided into four different items. I will not bother about the figures of the first three items. They are secured against bonds that have been pledged as collateral against advances. The last item, amounting to $24,289,000 odd, put down as temporary loans and advances, covering interest, construction, betterment and equipment, etc., amounts due to construction contractors; amounts due on sundry accounts, pay rolls, audited vouchers, etc.; coupon warrants, etc. Therefore, these temporary loans in the list of liabilities do not appear to agree with the temporary loans shown on page 8. That is one of the difficulties of understanding the statement in this blue book which is published for the information of the House.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would like to make a last appeal to my honourable friend before this question is put to the House. I said that I was laying before the House a proposition that could be transformed, could be modified, by some better proposition, and I wonder if the Government would not welcome some proposition that would protect it and protect the treasury against the claims of thousands of people that will arise from the Atlantic to the Pacific—the people who, knowing that the Government is in possession of this road, will try to get the pound of flesh. We all know the ambition of people when they think they can press a claim against the Government. They will be ten times more insistent than they would be in pressing a claim upon an individual. Inasmuch as we are assuming the administration of a railway system—of twenty-six companies—which has brought to us a statement showing liabilities to an amount which they disclose when there may be thousands of other claims, it seems that we should try to devise a scheme by which these can be liquidated in a way that will be fair to the people of Canada. The fair way would be the valuing of those claims and the paying of the moneys that have been advanced and nothing more. This is my amendment:

Provided also that as regards any indebtedness for moneys advanced to the Canadian Northern Railway company or to any company included in the Canadian Northern Railway system and taking rank after the mortgage held by the Minister of Finance in trust for His Majesty under the Act of 1914, 4 and 5, George Fifth, no payment be made of such indebtedness beyond the actual amount received by said company or companies with interest; said amount thus received to be ascertained by the Exchequer Court of Canada.

The amendment was negatived.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I intend to divide the House on this amendment on the third reading.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I will not take up the time of the House. I will simply move an amendment to add, in the seventh line on page two, after the words "million dollars," the following:

And provided also that no part of the said sum of $25,000,000 shall be used in payment of debts incurred by others than the Canadian Northern Railway company, or of any company included in the Canadian Northern railway system, and incurred for the exclusive benefit of such company.

The amendment was negatived.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Mr. Chairman, in reply to your kind suggestion, I now think it devolves upon me to propose an amendment. The honourable the leader of the Government has told the Senate, particularly this side of the Senate, that we were threshing thin air and space. I think the word "space" was used. I hope by this amendment to offer something more than thin air and space. I will give the honourable gentleman some stiff wheat to thresh. It is a pity that men such as are on this side of the House should be told that they are only threshing space. I move in amendment to this clause:

That in any agreement to be made between His Majesty and the said Canadian Northern Railway company, and its other allied and subsidiary companies, the claims of all servants of the company, whether in the management or in the operation thereof; and of all claims of contractors in the construction of the said railway system be submitted to the Board of Arbitration, as provided in this Act.

I hope the honourable the leader of the Government will not find that to be threshing space or thin air. I hope the honourable senator from Welland (Hon. Mr. Robertson) is here. He is the representative of labour, the representative of hard-working men. I believe he is here to see that their rights and their interests are protected. I hope he will take this amendment to heart. It is not an amendment to the Bill, it is an improvement and an addition. I am speaking for the class that he directly represents, and I am asking for them the same recognition at the hands of the Government that is given to their masters who own the wealth of the nation and the wealth of the corporations for which the labourers whom the honourable gentleman from Welland represents are working day and night. I hope that he will rise in his place as the representative of Canadian labour and plead with the Government to accept this as an addition to the Bill. I am not asking for immediate action. I am asking that the claims of these people be submitted to this Board of Arbitration. I think I have done my duty, not being the direct representative of the labour people. God knows that heart and soul, I am their representative on the floor of this House. I am not their direct representative. If I were, the Government would not act as it is doing. I speak here on behalf of my fellowman in this country, whom I know, with whom I am in touch and I must say that I am more in touch with him than the men who pretend to be their masters and their slave-drivers and I ask the honourable senator who represents the labouring class to take up their rights and have them protected by this Government.

The amendment was negatived.

Subsection 1 of section 3 was agreed to.

On subsection 1 of section 4—arbitrators, appointment of :

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I want to propose the following amendment:

That section 4 be amended by striking out the first subsection thereof and substituting therefor the following: The senior judge of Exchequer Court of Canada shall act as one arbitrator, another arbitrator shall be appointed by the said owners and pledgees, and the two arbitrators so appointed shall appoint a third, or, failing agreement as to such appointment, the third arbitrator shall be appointed by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada.

The amendment was negatived.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK. Although we do not seem to get very far, I desire to move an amendment. We do not know who these arbitrators will be. On section 1, I moved to have the words "Exchequer Court" substituted for the words "by arbitration." I did not succeed. I now propose that subsection 1 of section 4 should be amended by striking out all the words after "another" and substituting the words:

"The senior judge of the Exchequer Court of Canada shall act as the third arbitrator."

Honourable gentlemen will see that the clause will then read:

The Governor in Council shall appoint an arbitrator, a majority of the said owners and pledgees shall appoint another, and the senior judge of the Exchequer Court of Canada shall act as the third arbitrator.

I think this is a more satisfactory way of providing for the third arbitrator. I think it is better that we should say in the Bill who the third arbitrator will be. As I have already said, I think the whole country has confidence in the senior judge of the Exchequer Court, and in the way in which he has carried on the business of that court in similar matters to this.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I draw the attention of my honourable friend to the fact that the Governor General has the appointing of one arbitrator. It has been said, I think—I stand to be corrected—that Chief Justice Meredith will be the arbitrator representing the Government.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The owners of the stock and pledgees shall appoint another, and it is added that if the two so appointed cannot agree upon a third arbitrator, he shall be appointed by the judge of the Exchequer Court of Canada. I am convinced that the country would view with favour the appointment in person of the judge of the Exchequer Court. We are giving him the right to appoint the third arbitrator in case the others do not agree. Should we not make sure of the services of the senior judge of the Exchequer Court, whose principal business has been to attend to matters of arbitration and the liquidation of railway companies? Then we should have Chief Justice Meredith, the senior judge of the Exchequer Court, and an arbitrator appointed by the owners and pledgees. It seems to me that the public would have confidence in a tribunal so constituted.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Has it not occurred to my honourable friend that the Government would then be appointing two of the three arbitrators? The Government is now appointing the Chief Justice of Ontario as representing their interests. My honourable friend proposes that the Government, or Parliament—which is practically the same thing—should appoint a second arbitrator, namely, the judge of the Exchequer Court. Of course, he generously allows the shareholders to appoint a third arbitrator. There is nothing to prevent the Government arbitrator and the arbitrator representing the shareholders from appointing the judge of the Exchequer Court.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I suppose it does not matter very much, but I must say that I cannot agree with my honourable friend. I do not agree with the Government in appointing the Chief Justice of Ontario as one of the arbitrators. I dissent from that. I think it is very bad policy. It is not long since we discussed the propriety of appointing judges as commissioners, and passed a law——

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This is an arbitrator.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I helped to pass a law a few weeks ago to prevent judges acting in this capacity. I protest against the appointment of the Chief Justice of Ontario or any other judge. I cannot agree with my honourable friend from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) that the Exchequer Court Judge should be appointed.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Before the motion is put, I should like to say that the honourable the leader of the Government pointed out that the Governor in Council would appoint one arbitrator. That is, the Government is to be represented by the man they appoint. Then, we give the owners and pledges a chance of appointing their own arbitrator; and, inasmuch as this is to some extent a carrying out of the Act of 1914, which said in section 24 that Parliament should agree to terms and conditions—that is, presumably, that Parliament should arrange on this occasion to appoint one of the arbitrators,—I do not see that it would be any injustice to the owners and pledgees of that stock that the arbitrator should be appointed in that way. I think the recommendation we make is a suitable one, and I would say to my honourable friend from Ottawa that I would make an exception in the case of the judge of the Exchequer Court, because a good deal of his work is in the nature of inquiring into matters and practically the work of a commission.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I could present an excellent reason for sending the whole matter to a judge of the Exchequer Court as a judge, not as an arbitrator. Leave the whole matter to the court.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: For that reason I do not share the same objection that my honourable friend from Ottawa raised to the judge of the Exchequer Court.

The amendment of Hon. Mr Bostock was negatived.

On subsection 2 of section 4—how shares to be valued:

Hon. Mr. POWER: On the second reading of this Bill I directed the attention of the honourable the leader of the Government to the desirability of making some change in lines 25 and 27, which read:

> The said arbitrators shall determine the value of the said six hundred thousand shares as of the date of the said agreement.

One can see that that opens the door for a very great increase in the amount for which the country is likely to be made liable. I have no doubt that the stock of the Canadian Northern company, which at the date of the report of the commissioners was worth nothing, has by this time developed a certain value, and if this Bill in its present shape becomes law, that stock will have developed a very much larger value, and the difference will probably amount to millions which the country will be obliged to pay. If this valuation is to bear the date of the signing of the agreement, which cannot properly take place before the 1st of October, then the country will be called upon to pay the value of the shares at that date, which I think is more than it should be asked to pay. If two parties were dealing with one another in a businesslike way on equal terms, they would select some date anterior to the making of the agreement—some date so much before the date of the agreement as to ensure that the valuation would not be influenced by the knowledge that the agreement was made or was to be made. I think that in the present case a suitable date would be the first day of May, 1917. At that time there may have been some little talk of this arrangement, but it had not assumed any very concrete form; and I think it is our duty, representing the country at large, to amend this subsection so as to provide that the valuation shall take place as of the first day of May. I therefore move to strike out the words, "date of the said agreement" in line 2, and substitute therefor the words, "first day of May, 1917."

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I consider this is the strongest point that has been made against this Bill; and that in moving this amendment the senior member for Halifax has rendered a service to the country. The country will know that this Government is prepared to pay after parliamentary action is taken in boosting the stock from no value to par value. According to the commissioners' report, that stock was not worth a cent on the dollar on the date of that report. By the action of the Government, Parliament undertakes to give value to that stock, and puts the holders of that stock in a position to make all that can possibly be made out of it by fixing the date after the people who speculate in stock will have a guarantee that what they can buy for five cents on the dollar will be worth anywhere from 25 to 50 or 100 cents on the dollar after the sanction of this Bill. What right has the Parliament to play a flim-flam game like that against the people of Canada? I would suggest to my honourable friend, in order to make his amendment more forcible before the public, that the date be fixed as that when the Government accepted the report of the Drayton-Acworth Commission—the day that report was signed. I do not believe that the stock went up after that report was made and the Government accepted it, but it has been going up since this Bill has been introduced; and when the speculators will have a certainty that the Bill has passed, that stock will jump as much as any in the country, and the taxpayers of Canada will have to pay for that. The proposition of the honourable senator from Halifax is fair and proper, and in the interest of the taxpayers of this country. Why should we who are here vote away millions to a dozen or twenty financiers? Cannot you consider yourselves able to play fair with the people? Why do you want to play generously towards these men? Their stock is worth nothing, and you are going to put it in their power to create a value that does not exist. Why does not the country wake up and chase this Parliament out of power at once? I make my last appeal on this measure—

Some Hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Oh, you unrepentant sinners, you will die nailed to the cross on the seventh of October. You cannot die before, because the constitution will not allow you to die—not us; but I wish the constitution could put us out of business right now. This body is not like a body representing the voice of the people. I say that the amendment proposed by the honourable senator from Halifax should appeal to the members of this House; but I know it will appeal to the taxpayer and to the labourer of this country.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: In all fairness, in all seriousness, will my honourable friend the leader of the Government, who is responsible for this measure, not give a second thought to the amendment now before the House? The other day the venerable member for Hastings appealed to my honourable friend for something to render this Bill more acceptable to the people of Canada. He acceded to the request of the honourable member for Hastings, and agreed to put in the agreement, not in the Bill, some provision which would in a measure protect the public interests. Now, we on this side, with all the urgency and all the seriousness of which we are capable, appeal to the honourable leader of the Government to afford to the public of Canada the protection to which it is manifestly entitled. There is not one honourable gentleman in this House who is not quite certain that this stock has very appreciably increased in value since this Bill has been introduced into the House, by reason of the Bill itself, and no one in this House or outside of it can seriously deny that that stock will be greatly enhanced in value on the day the Governor General gives his assent to this Bill. I leave it to my honourable friend if that stock has not now been greatly enhanced by this measure, from a cause which does not emanate from the gentlemen to whom this money is to be paid. This Bill proposes to pay 100 cents on the dollar for stock which a few months ago was not worth one cent, and, if I am not mistaken in that, surely my honourable friend will give some attention to this amendment. I may be accused of speaking from the party point of view or from the standpoint of what the ultimate result may be; but from the point of view of our duty as guardians of the public interest, we ought to provide some measure of the kind proposed in the amendment. We are not doing injustice to those gentlemen. This agreement with them was made some months ago, I do not know when. They agreed to this Bill; a definite agreement was made. Why and by what rule or principle should the day on which this agreement was made be the one upon which the value of this stock shall be determined? I most earnestly appeal to my honourable friend to prevent the certain perpetration of a great injury to the Canadian public, and I think on reflection he must admit we owe the people of Canada protection against having to pay one hundred dollars where one dollar would be sufficient compensation. I think I voice the strong, earnest feeling of every honourable gentleman on this side of the House in addressing to my honourable friend this appeal not to dismiss this amendment without giving it serious consideration, and I hope that he will do that. If he give the matter the reflection and consideration that he generally gives matters of this sort, I think he must come to the conclusion that he must adopt this amendment.

At six o'clock the Committee took recess.

The Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: When the Committee rose at 6 o'clock, we were discussing the amendment moved by the honourable senator from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power), on subsection 2 of section 4, to strike out the words, "the date of the said agreement," and substitute therefor, "the first day of May, 1917." The object of that amendment is to fix a date anterior to the introduction of this legislation, which honourable gentlemen on this side of the House maintain has given a certain value to the stock of the company. On section 1 I raised the question as to the statements made by the Government regarding the par value of the $60,000,000 stock. I contend that the very fact of this legislation being passed, and this Bill becoming an Act of the Parliament of Canada, practically states that the Government consider that this stock has a par value. Further than that, when the blue-book, sessional paper No. 237, was issued, it was issued with the imprimatur of the Government. It sets forth a balance-sheet signed by chartered accountants, in which they put this stock down as a liability of the company of $100,000, again practically endorsing the idea that this stock is worth par. We on this side of the House have contended that there is very little, if any, value in this stock, and until this legislation was brought in I do not think anybody considered that there was very much value in the stock. There may be a future value, but at the present time the value would amount to little, if anything. As showing the kind of effect the legislation of this Government which is now before us has had in regard to securities connected with the Canadian Northern railway system, I would like to draw honourable gentlemen's attention to a paragraph that appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of August 4, 1917, which was headed: "G. T. P. and C. N. R. Stocks Soared in England." This purports to be a telegram from London, dated August 3:

> The feature of the trading on the Stock Exchange to-day was a sharp rise in Canadian rails on reports of the Government controlling Canadian Northern and financing Grand Trunk Pacific.

It shows that as soon as ever the word went abroad to the financial markets of the world where the securities of the Canadian Northern system were held, the persons holding those securities or trading in them realized that they had a much greater value than before this announcement was made. I do not myself quite see how this present legislation is going to increase the value of these securities very much, except, of course, that the fact that the whole of the stock of the company being in the hands of the Government, and the Government being practically the owners of the road, will give the securities a better value in the eyes of the public. But if that is the case with regard to these securities, it must be more so with regard to the stock of the company; and, as honourable gentlemen know, the Government is not getting the whole of this stock; there are also stocks belonging to some of these constituent companies, which are also outstanding at the present time. Further, I have here another quotation, one from a paper published in England, the Westminster Gazette of August 7, 1917, in which the rise in the value of the stock is referred to as follows:

> Naturally the rises ranging from 2 to 15 points in the prices of Grand Trunk, Canadian Northern and Grand Trunk Pacific issues have been due to the market estimate of the change in the situation and not to any rush to buy the stocks. Quotations were raised automatically excepting in a very few cases, e.g., Grand Trunk Ordinary and Third Preference, where the shadow of a market still exists. Canadian Northern Land Mortgage Bonds jumped 15 (points) because the Government's action confirms the expectations or hopes of those who had looked for something of this kind, although their faith was not robust enough to make them support the bonds at 75. This particular issue has passed through a lean time ever since it came out a few years ago at 95. The bonds never got comfortably placed, underwriters stock hanging over the market from the time of the allotment. On paper the security was excellent and the yield very attractive with redemption at par in 1923. Now the holders may be congratulated upon the remarkable change of front that is reflected in the market price.

That refers more particularly to the land bonds, which do not seem to have been very freely taken up when they were placed on the market in London. My contention is that in this clause we certainly should make the amendment which has been moved by my honourable friend from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power), so as to ensure as far as possible that no fictitious value shall be given to the shares of this stock owing to the action of the Government, and that the judgment of the arbitrators may not be influenced by the fact that people consider that this stock has a certain value to-day. I hope that the honourable leader of the Government will see his way to accept this amendment.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, I should appreciate the anxiety shown by my honourable friends opposite that the public interest should be protected in the way indicated provided there were grounds for their apprehensions. It seems to me that my honourable friends are starting off entirely from wrong premises. They are assuming that this stock has been put upon the market, that a market has been created for it, that it is a marketable commodity—

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: No.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: —that it has been allocated amongst a large body of shareholders, and that there have been transactions in it, thus fixing a value for it. Now, none of this has happened. This stock has never been quoted upon the market; it has never been placed upon the market; it has never been subject to any stock transactions. My honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Bostock) is placing this upon a parity with the other stocks to which he has alluded, and which have been quoted on the stock exchange—which have long been marketed, are marketable commodities and possessed of a fixed value on the stock market. This issue of $100,000,000 of stock is nothing more or less than evidence of the title of the equity or the corporate control of that particular company. It is nothing more than that; it is purely an evidence of the equity. We might have put this in some other form.

My honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Power) who has moved this amendment speaks of the desirability of going back to May last. If this stock had a value, it was more valuable the farther back you go. You could have realized more for this stock if it possessed a value in June, 1914, when the legislation in question was passed by this Parliament, than you could to-day. There is $50,000,000 held by the pledgees of this stock. There is $10,000,000 outstanding distributed among a small group. Let us assume that a transaction in that stock were to take place to-morrow. Can my honourable friend conceive of any one buying it and holding it for a rise in value? There are two reasons why that could not be done. In the first place, the legislation provides that the outstanding $10,000,000 of stock shall be in the same position as the $50,000,000 which we are acquiring. Immediately the $50,000,000 of stock is acquired, the outstanding $10,000,000 becomes impressed with the provisions of the Act, whereby it becomes the property of His Majesty, and its value is fixed on the pro rata basis of the $50,000,000 of stock which we have acquired. My honourable friend who has moved the amendment based the alleged increase of the value of the stock entirely on the provisions of this Bill. The Bill renders it valueless as a marketable commodity. It cannot possibly pass into the hands of purchasers for value, and assuming that it did pass into their hands, no matter what they gave for it, it would be impressed with the pro rata value which we pay for the $50,000,000 of stock. As I said before, if the stock ever did possess any value, it was in June, 1914; but since that time it has lost any value of which it might be possessed. In fact, it may be said it has lost any potential value, for this reason: that liquidation faced the company immediately default was made, and none of us can conceive of stocks being seriously quoted upon the market, or transactions in them being made, concerning a company that is about to go into liquidation or that has placed itself in such a position that its creditors may put it in liquidation. Therefore, if the ground existed which my honourable friends have maintained, one could very well appreciate the solicitude which they show for the legislation being surrounded by proper safeguards; but, with all due deference to the presentation of the case as made by them, I submit to honourable gentlemen that there are no grounds whatsoever for the apprehension they have expressed.

Hon Mr. BEIQUE: Will the honourable gentleman allow me to ask why the date of the agreement is not fixed in the Bill?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would say that in any legal transaction the date of the transaction, or of what is contemplated in the agreement arrived at between the parties, would be fixed as the date of the agreement. In the first place, the agreement cannot be prepared, nor can a date be fixed until this legislation is passed. Then, presumably, the agreement will, in pursuance of this legislation, be at once drafted and entered into, and the date will be the date when the agreement was made. I really cannot appreciate, I regret to say, the points which my honourable friends have been so desirous of making in that respect.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Does not the honourable gentleman realize this possibility: that when the arbitration takes place the owners of the stock may be able to prove that sales of the stock were made, say, previous to the 1st of May last, at, say, 10 cents on the dollar or 5 cents on the dollar, and that after the passing of this Act sales have taken place at 25 or 30 cents on the dollar? The honourable gentleman cannot say that is an impossibility. If that possibility should be realized, if the interested parties were able to show that sales of that kind had been made, would not the honourable gentleman appreciate and understand that it would have a very serious effect on the valuation which would have to be made of that stock?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, I should say not. I should say to my honourable friend, in the first place, that there is no probability of that $10,000,000 stock being placed on the market, because it has been distributed amongst a group which must necessarily hold it; and immediately negotiations took place between the Government and the two groups, namely, the pledgees for $50,000,000 stock and the other group, the whole of the $60,000,000 would become impressed, with the result that the whole would pass over to the Government.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The fact that the whole passed over to the Government in virtue of this Act does not prevent it being sold from A to B, again and again. It is sold subject to being thus impressed; but it may be sold and re-sold, and the Government will have to deal with the last purchaser, and in the meantime those who have sold the stock will have received the price of sale of the stock. I fail to see the force of the argument which is made by the honourable gentleman, that because the stock is impressed by this Bill it cannot be sold. Surely that is not the case. The stock can be sold as freely as if this Act had not been passed, subject, of course, to its being taken over at such valuation as shall be made by the arbitration. I hesitate to offer any amendment. We have tried to discharge what we consider to be our duty to this Parliament and to the country in devising, not party amendments, not critical amendments for the purpose of obstruction, but amendments which should commend themselves to the judgment of the Government, if, as the leader of the Government stated this afternoon, the Government is really desirous of paying as little as possible for this stock.

Hon. Mr. POWER: In dealing with this question the honourable leader of the Government has shown the astuteness and the capability for executing remarkable intellectual curves which characterize the company with whose stock we are dealing. I hope that association with them has not in any way interfered with his usual integrity and clearness of vision. The honourable gentleman told us, as I understand, that the whole of this stock which will be held by the Government when this Bill goes into operation, is really of no value. It is not a thing that can be quoted on the market; it is a thing of no value. It seems to me, honourable gentlemen, that the leader of the Government has proved a little too much. What does the first clause of the Bill say? It says:

> His Majesty may acquire the six hundred thousand shares of capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway company (par value, $60,000,000).

Now, if the stock is not worth anything, why should we say that the par value is $60,000,000? Then the Bill goes on to say:

> —on such terms and conditions satisfactory to the Governor in Council as may be set out in an agreement to be made between His Majesty and the owners and pledgees of not less than five-sixths thereof, and for a price to be determined by arbitration as hereinafter provided.

If the stock is a non-marketable commodity and practically a non-existent commodity, how are the arbitrators going to determine the price? I think that is a conundrum which the honourable gentleman will find it a little difficult to answer. Then, dealing with the 100,000 shares that are transferred by the first clause of the Bill, it says that they shall be paid for pro rata with the shares so transferred. Although the honourable gentleman does not seem to think that the shares are worth anything, the Bill in all its clauses treats them as of value. Of course, deals in these shares can take place and probably are taking place just now. Judging from the extracts which have been read by the honourable the leader of the Opposition from English newspapers, it would appear that transactions have already taken place as a direct result of the proposed action of the Government. The clause which we are dealing with says:

The said arbitrators shall determine the value of the said 600,000 shares as of the date of the said agreement.

In order to remove any doubt, the amendment suggests that we substitute the first day of May, 1917, so that people who do not understand the stock market will not be induced to value it more highly than it should be valued. I fail to see the slightest objection to the amendment which I propose. I quite agree with the two honourable gentlemen on this side of the House that the results of this provision of the Bill may be very serious and may involve a very serious loss to the treasury of Canada.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I do not agree with my honourable friend from Halifax. The value of the stock of any company depends upon its assets and its liabilities.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Does not the honourable gentleman think that the fact that the Government is taking over the road is a valuable asset?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: It affects the general situation, of course. You cannot do anything without having some result; but the value of the stock depends on its assets and its liabilities. If you go back and fix the date as of the 1st of May, some of the assets of that company may disappear or go bad or, on the other hand, new liabilities may arise between the 1st of May and the date of the agreement. There may be a change in the affairs of the company, and the honourable gentleman will cut the Government out of taking advantage of them. You have to fix some date, and the later you fix that date—

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The worse for the Government.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Not at all; the better for the Government. I regard the proposed amendment as a distinct injury to the Bill, and as being entirely against the interests of the people of this country. The confusion, I think, arises from attaching some value to the word "stock" that it has not got. A certificate or stock is no more than the deed to a man's house. The value of the deed depends on the house. If I have shares in a company the value of those shares is not determined by the mere piece of paper with $100 written on it; it depends upon what assets and what liabilities there are in the company. This provision gives the Government an oportunity to take advantage of the changes, and to charge the company with any diminution of assets or any increase of liabilities when they start the arbitration.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I take it that the Government will not accept the amendment.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No.

Hon. Mr BELCOURT: May I ask if it is still the intention of the Government to set a maximum figure beyond which the arbitrators will not be allowed to go.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I made that statement the other day.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That holds good.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That holds good.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: If that is so, I take it that we may hope that the amount to be placed as the maximum will be proportionate to the estimate which my honourable friend has just now placed on this stock. My honourable friend has told us that the stock is worth nothing.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend does not do me justice. I said the stock, as stock, was not worth anything. I said it did represent the title of the company, the control of the equity, and the equity may have some value.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I do not intend to misconstrue what my honourable friend has said; but I think it is a very fair inference, from what he has said, that the stock is to-day worthless, and I hope when the Government fixes the maximum beyond which the arbitrators will not be allowed to go, that that valuation will prevail and that the maximum will be probably a few dollars.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I shall remember my honourable friend's views.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: There are lots of people in this country who are ignorant of what is going on to-day, there are many of them, millions of them. What the people of the country want to know to-day is, if by passing this Bill the Government becomes the owner and proprietor of the Canadian Northern railway system and the allied and subsidiary companies. I ask the leader of the Government that question. Does the Government become the proprietor and owner of the whole system?

Some Hon. SENATORS: Question.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: No answer from the Government. No answer from the Government to a pertinent question. This is not an impertinent question; it is a pertinent one. By this Bill does the Government become the owner and proprietor of the Canadian Northern railway system? No answer from the Government. None.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The honourable gentleman can judge that from the Bill itself.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I want an answer from the Government. There is no answer from the Government, and yet the Government asks us to place this tremendous burden upon the shoulders of the people. No answer from the Government, Mr. Chairman. What do you think of them? I ask a fair question on behalf of 7,000,000 of people of this country. Why does not the Government answer? The Government does not answer the question as to whether it becomes the owner and proprietor of that system of railways, and still the Government is asking the people of Canada to find funds for that company which, as the leader of the Government said, is bankrupt to-day.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Question.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Now, Mr. Chairman, I hold, and many of my fellow-citizens think, that we are entitled to all this information; but we cannot get anything out of the Government. I say that if this Bill is passed it will saddle the people of Canada with a tremendous debt and leave the same men in control of this system. Is not that an awful state of affairs? Mackenzie and Mann have done their best. I do not deny it. I am one of the first to acknowledge their ability and cleverness. Their ability is without question. Their cleverness has been too much shown, especially against the interests of this country. Now, Mr. Chairman, what I am asking from the Government is refused. Let it go on the records of this country that a plain question put by a representative of the people was refused an answer by the Government of Canada to-day. I want that to go on record. "Refused an answer." The people who are to pay what this Government is asking them to pay are refused an answer. That is on record. Now, Mr. Chairman, we are not opposed, at least I am not, and many of my friends on this side of the House are not opposed to any fair play or any measure of justice that can be accorded to Mackenzie and Mann; but we are opposed to any measure of injustice against the people of Canada in this transaction. There is the difference. Gentlemen on the other side of the House are in favour of full justice to men, who, apart from Lord Mount Stephen and Lord Strathcona, who built the Canadian Pacific railway, are among the most able men in Canada. I hope the day will not finish before these gentlemen are made barons of the Empire, or something higher. I hold, Mr. Chairman, that we are entitled to this information, but we cannot get it from the Government. Let the Government be responsible. I wash my hands of it.

Hon. Mr. LAVERGNE (translation): As the honourable senator from Victoria has said, the country will lose $60,000,000. This is a robbery. The Government has taken the precaution to gag the representatives of the people in the House of Commons, not allowing them to discuss this nefarious bill for grabbing the money of the country. The Government have acted like bandits in first gagging their victims and then taking their money. The passage of this Bill will be a disaster for the country, and I will certainly vote against it and against tbe clause now under discussion.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I do not rise for the purpose of moving an amendment, but to ask the honourable leader of the Government to throw some light on a point which does not seem perfectly clear. At line 33 it is stated that "the unanimous determination of the arbitrators shall be final." Then, in subsection 3 of section 4 it is stated that "the amount of the value so determined shall be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund." So that the language of the Bill is clear and definite. On Friday last, however, the honourable leader of the Government, in reply to a question of the honourable gentleman from Hastings (Hon. Mr. Mackenzie Bowell) said that in the agreement a maximum amount to be paid for the stock would be fixed, but that the fixing of that amount would not be taken into consideration by the arbitrators in fixing the value, if any, of the stock to be acquired. Here we have the Bill making a clear and definite statement, and then we have the honourable leader making a verbal statement in direct contradiction of the language of the Bill. I think it is only right that the honourable gentleman should explain.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am at a loss to appreciate the point which my honourable friend has made, with all due regard to his question. Explain what?

Hon. Mr. POWER: It is stated in the Bill that the unanimous determination of the arbitrators shall be final

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, that is all right.

Hon. Mr. POWER: And that the amount of the value so determined shall be paid.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Then, the honourable gentleman stated on Friday that the Government would fix a maximum amount. But suppose that the arbitrators, under the authority given them in the Bill, should fix the amount higher than the maximum amount named by the Government?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They will not do that.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Will not the language of the Bill take precedence of the language used by the honourable gentleman?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, because in the language of the Bill, whatever the value is will certainly be below the maximum fixed in the agreement for determining the value.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: May I ask my honourable friend just what is meant by the words in line 32, "hear parties by counsel or representatives"? Is it intended by the Government to appoint counsel before the arbitrators? Or will the arbitrators be authorized to recognise counsel that may appear there on behalf of the public?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The parties interested, both parties to the arbitration, namely, the Government and the shareholders, presumably will be represented by counsel. If there are others with claims against the system who have to be examined I presume they will appear by counsel before the arbitrators, who will hear evidence as to all claims that may be sought to be arbitrated.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Then, what is meant by "representative"?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The representative need not be the counsel. A corporation may appear by an agent representing them.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: Can the public be represented? Suppose a lawyer appears and asks to show cause why the stock is of no value, say on behalf of ratepayers of Montreal or of Quebec, can a citizen of this country generally have a right to appear before that tribunal?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not know; the arbitrators will determine that.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Parliament should define that, not the arbitrators.

Subsection 2 of section 4 was agreed to.

On subsection 3 of section 4—payments out of Consolidated Revenue Fund:

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I wish to offer an amendment to this section, to add the words:

The award shall be subject to the approval of Parliament.

I have paid a good deal of attention to this legislation. I have heard the arguments advanced in this House for and against this Bill, and have also read most of the debates in the House of Commons. I was a little surprised this afternoon at the action of our usually genial leader of the Government in this House in criticising the Opposition very severely for not reading between the covers of the bluebook laid on the table of this House. He rather had the advantage of the members in that little controversy, as he had not only a brief prepared for him, but I suppose had the bluebook as well as the gentleman behind the bar, whom he consulted very frequently. That being the case, I think he ought to allow a little latitude to members on this side of the House when they want a little information in regard to this Bill. A great many suggestions have been offered in all sincerity by the members of this House in an attempt to make the Bill more perfect, and not one of those suggestions has been seriously considered by gentlemen on the other side of the House. Last night, when a gentleman on this side suggested that a certain amendment be made and asked whether the Government would consider it or not, the answer was that it would likely be number 3347. That was the answer one of the gentlemen sitting behind the honourable leader—not a very complimentary answer, for they voted as if they were used as rubber stamps by the leader of the Government to record their vote. I do not think it was very complimentary to the Government's followers.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order; withdraw.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I do not think the honourable gentleman has any right to characterize the members on this side as rubber stamps. If anybody in this Senate is to be characterized as a rubber stamp, it would be the honourable gentleman who is on his feet at the present time.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I have been in this Senate for some eighteen years, and I think that any honourable gentleman who has the same standing in the Senate after eighteen years may be able to compliment himself.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: The honourable gentleman also has a record as Minister of Public Works in the Province of Manitoba. Perhaps he will not refer to that.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: My record in public works in Manitoba was a good deal better than that of the Minister of Public Works whom the honourable gentleman supported in the legislature. This Bill affects the province of Manitoba and the Northwest Territories, Alberta, Saskatchewan, and British Columbia, more than it does the East, and it involves the principle of government ownership, which should be very carefully considered. There is a very strong sentiment in the Northwest in favour of government ownership; but the people there should be consulted before a policy of that kind is adopted by the Dominion Government, especially with such a railway as the Canadian Northern, which serves so much of the territory of the Northwest. The year 1896 was the first year of the Canadian Northern railway, and it has just reached its majority, and now, as one of the proprietors told me the other day, he was down at Ottawa to attend the funeral of the Canadian Northern railway. Why should that railway be put out of existence at the present time? In my judgment, the Canadian Northern is one of the best organizations in the Dominion of Canada; I think I can defy contradiction on that point. Sir William Mackenzie has the faculty of bringing about him the best possible men he can have to attend to that particular kind of business. I will name three executives, whom I have known intimately since the inception of that road, and they have been with it practically ever since. The first is Vice-President Hanna, who was taken over from the Manitoba and Northwestern railway at the inception of the Canadian Northern. As he tells us himself, he and nine men and a boy formed the total staff of the Canadian Northern and operated that railway the first year of its inception. At that time the construction of that road was guaranteed by the Manitoba Government to the extent of $8,000 per mile. And the very first year of its operation it paid its interest. The next gentleman, who has been with the road almost from its inception, was taken from the Canadian Pacific railway, and is one of the best traffic men in Canada; I refer to Mr. Shaw. The next man I shall mention is Mr. McLeod, the general manager, one of the highest class engineers in Canada, and he has proved himself a first-class general manager of that road. We were told to-day that this road was built for about one-half the cost of the Transcontinental, and I think my friend would agree to add the Canadian Pacific railway. I have no hesitation in saying that there is no transcontinental railway in Canada that has as good producing territory as the Canadian Northern. It occupies a territory between the open plains, sometimes called arid, and the timber country, and it matters not whether the season is dry or wet, that country pays. It is a country peculiarly adapted for mixed traffic. Hardly a farmer on that line can boast more than half a section; most of the farms are quarter-sections, 160 acres; hence the settlements are dense and pay well. That being the case, why does not that road pay, with all its favourable conditions? I think it is on account of the fact that the Canadian Northern, or rather Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann, and probably Sir William Mackenzie rather than Mr. Mann——

Hon. Mr. SHARPE: I would like to raise a point of order. This speech would be quite in order on the second reading of the Bill, but it is out of order on this section. I would like the Chairman's ruling.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Any fool can get up and raise a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment is: "The award shall be subject to the approval of Parliament." My honourable friend will try to confine himself to the point.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: The western country has not to-day full representation in the House of Commons. It has four representatives in the Senate, because they are appointed. I hope that what I am saying to-day will reach the western country. I say that one of the reasons why this Bill is here is because less men have gone out of the field of railroading and into other enterprises. It seems to me that if I make a point there, I am arguing the very question before this Parliament to-day, as to why this company is insolvent—why it is here and cannot pay its debts. You can hardly name any kind of enterprise in Canada with which Sir William Mackenzie has not been connected—the Toronto Street railway, the Winnipeg Street railway——

Hon. Mr. SHARPE: Mr. Chairman, I object to this entirely. As whip of the Opposition in this House, the honourable member knows just as well as anybody in the House that he is absolutely out of order, and I ask for your ruling if these matters can be discussed on subsection 3.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would draw the attention of the honourable member, who has been sitting for some time in the other House, to the fact that the rules of debate are far less stringent in this Chamber and that far greater latitude is given to the members here. We generally address ourselves to the question, and not to our electors, since we have none. Our debates are short; we do not prepare essays independent of what has been said before; we simply generally answer the arguments that have just been made; and for many years since I have been here we have gone on without members being called strictly to the observance of the rules. Sitting in front of my honourable friend is one of the veterans, whom we all admire and respect and love, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, and he could say that ever since he has been in this Chamber we have proceeded, although having our rules for debate and discussion, with far greater latitude than is allowed in the House of Commons.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: I must confess that I am quite in accord with the honourable gentleman's remarks that we have paid very little attention to rules of order in this House. We have acted more like the ordinary electioneering boors in a bar-room than we have in accord with the dignity of the Senate Chamber of Canada. No one knows better than my honourable friend that, so far as rules are concerned, we have paid no attention to them; not only that, but we have allowed members to go on in the most flagrant manner. For example, to-day every single member has been quoting the actions of the House of Commons. My honourable friend knows very well that we have no right in this House to refer to and comment on the actions of members of the House of Commons, nor has the House of Commons, under the rules of Parliament, both in England and in this country, the right to refer to and comment on the actions of members of the Senate. And yet we are doing it all the time, and the sooner we put a stop to it and adopt a system more dignified, such as used to characterize this Senate some twenty or thirty years ago, the better for us. The rule of debate is so plain that the newest member, if he reads it once, will understand it. In Committee of the Whole we have no right to discuss the general principle of a Bill. Permission to do so may be given before the Bill is referred to the committee. The principle of a Bill may be discussed and affirmed or rejected on the second reading. We are violating that rule all the time. We have had an instance of it here to-day when the Chairman had to rule out a motion which was offered by one of the most eloquent and most active members of the Senate. My honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) appealed to me. You will excuse me for saying it, but I have remarked to a number of members of the Senate, particularly the older members, the difference there is in the dignity, behaviour and decorum of the Senate at the present time as compared with the time when I entered the Senate, many years ago. The sooner we return to our old habits and practices the more credit it will be to the honourable members of this House.

Hon. Mr. SHARPE: Mr. Chairman, I ask for your ruling.

The CHAIRMAN: Since objection has been taken, I shall have to ask the honourable gentleman who is addressing the House (Hon. Mr. Watson) to confine his remarks to the clause, and I am sure my honourable friend will do so.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I have been doing that, and cannot conceive how I can possibly do it more closely. My motion is that the findings of the arbitration should be referred for concurrence to the Parliament of Canada, and it seems to me that in showing reasons why that should be done I am dealing with the question before the House. I am rather surprised that the honourable gentleman should have taken this particular occasion to advocate a stricter adherence to the rules of the House, because I am not in the habit of being unruly in this Chamber and this is, I think, the first time I have been called to order. However, I congratulate myself that the honourable gentlemen who are raising the point of order have not been very long in this House.

I was enumerating some of the businesses which I believe to be the cause of the present bankrupt condition of the Canadian Northern I believe it is due to their outside relations. I believe that if Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann and the Canadian Northern had confined themselves to the railroad between the head of lake Superior and the Rocky mountains, the Canadian Northern would be today one of the richest corporations in the Dominion of Canada; but they reached out too far. They have invested a great deal of money, which must have gone somewhere. I know they have received enormous amounts of money from Provincial governments from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and from the Dominion Government. They have received more money, I think, than they have ever put into the railroad. I think some of it must have been put into these various enterprises; and I was naming some of the enterprises in which I know they are interested. I think I referred to the Toronto and Winnipeg street railways. They are interested in the development of power, the Toronto Foundry, the General Electric, coal mining, lumbering, acetylene carbide, which Sir William Mackenzie has controlled for a number of years, whale fishing, and fishing for subsidies. I may say that in fishing for subsidies they baited their hook for both political parties and have had the confidence apparently of both in getting subsidies.

Hon. Mr. SHARPE: Mr. Chairman, I would ask if this has anything to do with section 3.

The CHAIRMAN: I expect the cooperation of the members of the Senate. I am a new member myself. I shall have to ask the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Watson) to confine his remarks to his own motion, the motion being that the award shall be subject to the approval of Parliament. I think my honourable friend would be justified in——

Hon. Mr. WATSON: In giving the reasons——

The CHAIRMAN:—in giving reasons why the award should be subject to the approval of Parliament. I do not think my honourable friend would be justified in enumerating all the transactions of the Canadian Northern Railway company.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I think the honourable gentleman who has been speaking——

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I am nearly done.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: At all events, if the honourable gentleman cannot proceed further, he might keep his speech for the third reading. At the third reading he has a perfect right to refer to the principle of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: That is right.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Give us the light now.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I have finished the enumeration. Now, there is a point which bears directly upon the motion I have made. The western provinces are unrepresented in Parliament to-day. For the past two or three years there have been 23 additional parliamentary representatives due to the western provinces, and they have not got them. There are also three vacancies, two for Manitoba and one for Saskatchewan. Consequently there are 26 seats that should be filled by representatives of the western provinces. I say it is unfair to deal with a matter of such great importance to the Northwest without its having a full representation in Parliament, and for that reason I say that the report of any arbitration that is made ought to be submitted to Parliament when the people of the West will be properly represented in Parliament. Now, I am not going to take much time——

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Take all the time you want.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: No, I do not want to take up any more time. I have tried to confine my remarks to this one point. I preferred to submit this amendment in Committee, in order that the Government might have an opporunity of considering it. I think if they consider it fairly, they will give the western provinces the opportunity to be fully represented when the entirely new policy of government ownership of railways is being decided upon.

I am not here to criticise Mackenzie and Mann. They are enterprising men; I wish we had more men of that description in Canada; but I do not see that they have acted wisely in the spending of the money. I believe they have entered into too many enterprises. As I said before, if they had confined themselves to a railroad from the head of lake Superior to the Rocky mountains, they would be one of the richest firms in Canada to-day and would not be here seeking assistance.

I have nothing more to say. I am satisfied that I have not irritated very many members of the Senate by my remarks. Some honourable gentlemen from the West do not appear to appreciate them, but so far as I am concerned, my conscience is perfectly clear. I feel that I have at least done my duty in bringing this matter before the Senate and before the Government, and I trust the Government will give it some consideration.

I think that some of the amendments which have been suggested by the Opposition should be carefully considered by the Senate. My honourable friend from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power), I think, moved an important amendment, which ought to be given very careful consideration. I do not think we have money to throw away. We are undertaking an enormous liability on behalf of this Dominion of Canada at this particular time. So far as I am personally concerned, I would say to the Government, give Mackenzie and Mann some aid to tide them over their difficulties temporarily, because I am satisfied that they could settle with their creditors for a much lower sum than the Government could do. I think the present proposition is a most extravagant one to introduce under the present circumstances, when money is so scarce. We are going to encourage all who have a chance to put in a claim to come before the Dominion Government and demand payment. And no doubt they will get it. So I believe it would be better in the interests of the Dominion of Canada to-day to give Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann some consideration, sufficient to tide them over for two or three years, until after this war is over and we can square up, than to undertake this legislation at the present time.

The amendment of Hon. Mr. Watson was negatived.

Section 3 was agreed to.

The Bill was reported without amendment.

CORRECTNESS OF THE MINUTES.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Honourable gentlemen, before proceeding to the next order of business, I would ask the permission of the House to make a correction in a statement which I made this afternoon, when the honourable member for Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry) raised the point that the objection made by the honourable gentleman from Victoria division (Hon. Mr. Cloran) yesterday was not entered in the Minutes of the House. I was then under the impression that the honourable member for Victoria had made a formal motion, which is the only way to call the attention of the House to the votes of members who are alleged to have a pecuniary interest in a question before the House. In fairness to the Clerk of the House I must say that he was perfectly in order in not mentioning in the Minutes the objection made by the honourable member for Victoria division. I see in Bourinot at page 183:

> In recording the minutes, the clerk must always wait for the directions of the Speaker. Consequently the clerk cannot record any motion until it is formally proposed from the Chair.

I find also that Hatsell says:

> The rule is to wait for the directions of the Speaker, and not to look upon the call of one member, or any number of members, as the directions of the house, unless they are conveyed to the clerk through the usual and only channel by which he can receive them.

I find also in Bourinot, Third Edition, page 511:

> An objection to a vote on the ground of personal interest cannot be raised except upon a substantive motion that the vote given be disallowed, and cannot be brought forward as a point of order.

So I believe that our Clerk was perfectly right in not mentioning the subject.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I do not want to discuss the point of order at all. I think it is a correct one. I want only to call the attention of this House to the fact that the House has not reversed its decision, but His Honour the Speaker has reversed his.

Mon. Mr. CLORAN: What is it?

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I stated that the clerk was correct.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Do I understand that according to the Speaker's decision I should have made a motion? If that is his decision, then it is open to me to make a motion. I shall do so at the first opportunity available. I thought that under rule 53 all I had to do was to call the attention of the House. That was my impression. I was wrongly impressed. The Speaker tells me I should have made a substantive motion. I accept the ruling of the Chair, and I can assure this honourable House that at the first opportunity I will make a motion.

MILITARY VOTERS' BILL.

SECOND READING.

The Senate resumed from September 10 the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed that Bill 127, the Military Voters' Act, 1917, be now read a second time.

Hon. HEWITT BOSTOCK: Honourable gentlemen, I have not had an opportunity of perusing the statement of the honourable leader of the Government (Hon. Sir James Lougheed), made last night, as for some reason the official report of the debates of yesterday has not been received; so I cannot deal with his statement as fully as I should like to do. The Act which is now before us is one which affects the members of the other Chamber much more than it does honourable gentlemen in this House, but for that very reason the members of this House are, I think, in a position to give to a Bill of this nature a consideration which is free from prejudices that might arise when honourable gentlemen in another place were discussing it. The Bill is not altogether new to us, inasmuch as a Bill of a similar nature was before us in the year 1915, when the Parliament of Canada first adopted the principle of giving votes to men who were on military service for their country. This Bill has in it many clauses which will require a great deal of consideration, and we can, no doubt, deal with it much better in Committee than at the present stage; but I think it only right to point out that there are certain questions in connection with the Bill which deserve particular consideration.

In the first place, I would refer to a statement which was made by the Prime Minister a few months ago with respect to the question of soldiers voting. He then took the stand that it was very difficult indeed to take the soldiers' vote, and cast cold water on the idea of attempting to take a soldiers' vote in Europe; but since that time he has apparently changed his mind, and as a result the Government have brought in this Bill which, I understand, is for the purpose of enabling them to deal with the question more easily and under better arrangements than were provided in the Bill which we passed in 1915.

The taking of a soldiers' vote has been dealt with by some of the provinces since we passed the former Bill. And I must say that the taking of the soldiers' vote under the Act passed in the province from which I come was not a very great success. Under that Act we found a considerable amount of difficulty. There was a great deal of discussion, and a great deal of fault was found with the way in which the vote was taken. It may have been due to the fact that much time was allowed to elapse from the commencement of the taking of the vote until its termination. The results obtained in the working out of the Act, I think it may be said, were very unsatisfactory. It led to a Commission being appointed and sent to England to inquire into alleged irregularities in taking the vote. The result was that when the Commission returned to British Columbia they struck off the register between 3,000 and 4,000 votes that were cast, not in connection with the vote on an election but in connection with the question as to whether a Prohibition Bill should pass in the province of British Columbia.

I think that honourable gentlemen will agree that the question as to whether a certain law should be placed on the statute book subject to a referendum, would not create the same excitement, or should not necessitate the same restrictions that would be necessary in the case of an election, when very often party feeling runs high and people sometimes consider that they are justified in doing things that they would not otherwise do. In this particular case there was a great deal of dissatisfaction as to the way in which the vote was recorded, and as I have said, the result was that a large number of votes were thrown out when the matter was inquired into. I mention this to show the necessity of looking very carefully into this Act to see that every possible safeguard is provided that the vote shall be properly and straightforwardly recorded and that there shall be no opportunity for such occurrences as happened in the case which I have mentioned, when men were allowed to vote several times over in certain places.

I do not see any provision in the Bill whereby soldiers who have joined the Canadian forces and who were afterwards transferred to the British forces can vote. As I understand the Bill all the men who joined the Canadian forces in this country and afterwards proceeded to England and joined the British forces will be unable to vote.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I think my honourable friend is mistaken. The Bill takes in all persons, male and female, who are serving in Britain, North America, or Europe.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: It includes all Canadians?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: So I am informed. If my honourable friend will look at line 10 on the second page of the Bill he will see:

> Every person, male or female, who, being a British subject ordinarily resident in Canada, whether or not a minor or an Indian, is on active service in Europe in any other of the forces or services, military or naval, of His Majesty or of His allies.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: That is the interpretation clause dealing with who is a military elector.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I presume that will cover who the electors are.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Will it enable men to vote who are at present in British regiments?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If they can get to a voting place, yes. Details of that kind are very difficult to go into.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Of course, we will take them up in Committee. I think that subsection 4 of section 3 will require a great deal of consideration. Subsection 1 of section 3 says:

> Every military elector shall be qualified and entitled to vote at a general election.

Subsection 4 of section 3 says:

> If he cannot, because of non-residence or otherwise, so state or specify, he shall be deemed an elector of, and his vote shall be applied to, such electoral district as he may indicate.

That leaves it open to the elector to say in what particular part of Canada he wishes to have his vote recorded. I think that a man who has just come to this country to be enrolled, and who has probably remained here a very short time, knows next to nothing about Canada or the condition of things in Canada, and he will have a very slight knowledge of any of the candidates who are standing in the different constituencies. It will be very difficult for him to say where he wishes to have his vote recorded. These men will very often submit their judgment to the recommendation or suggestion of someone who might possibly have a better knowledge of the country and of the different candidates. I think that when we come to that section we shall have to consider this question very carefully. If I interpret it correctly, it leaves the door open to very serious trouble. I think that we can probably discuss the other sections of the Bill very much better in Committee than at the present time. I therefore do not propose to take up the time of the House except to refer to the case of presiding officers. The deputy presiding officers, who, I understand, are the men who will take the vote in France and England, will be provided with a locked bag for the purpose of taking the vote. If I am not mistaken these men will be in a position to take the vote at places where there may be very few electors, or practically no one to assist in the taking of the vote. I understand that each deputy presiding officer will have a clerk with him, and that these two men will go to the places appointed to them. It is going to be difficult for the scrutineers to follow up the deputy presiding officer, who, I understand, will be travelling from one place to another. When we reach the Committee stage we shall be better able to consider just what danger there is of any irregularity occurring in connection with handling of the vote in this regard. I do not purpose discussing the measure further at the present time.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Honourable gentlemen, I wish to call attention to two points in connection with this Bill which I believe are of considerable importance. In my opinion some of the provisions of the Bill are ultra vires of this Parliament, and in violation of the Constitution. Before taking up that point, I desire to call the attention of the House to the last line of section 1 of the Bill. Section 1 says:

> This part of this Act shall apply only to a general election held during the present war or after the conclusion of peace, but before complete demobilization.

Of course, the Conservative party is now in power, but we are on the eve of a general election, and the Conservative party may be continued in power or the Liberal party may come into power. I think that both parties are interested in closing the door to any abuse being made of a bill of this kind. I call the attention of this honourable House to the fact that it would be very easy for a Government, whether Conservative or Liberal, to continue this Act in operation by delaying the demobilization of part of the forces. Therefore, I think that when we deal with this Bill in Committee we should agree to fix a date, after the conclusion of peace to discontinue the Act. The main point to which I desire to direct attention is the fact that this Bill qualifies persons as voters who are not resident in this country and who have never been residents of this country. I will try to show that this is a violation of the Constitution. The definition which is to be found in paragraph c of section 2 says:

"Military elector" means and includes every person, male or female, who, being a British subject, whether or not ordinarily resident in Canada and whether or not an Indian, has been, while within or without Canada, appointed, enlisted, enrolled or called out for and placed on active service as one of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Militia on active service, or the Royal Naval Canadian Volunteer Reserve, or has been, while within Canada, appointed, enlisted, or enrolled as one of the British Royal Flying Corps, Royal Naval Aviation Service, or Auxiliary Motor Boat Patrol Service, whether as officer, soldier, sailor, dentist, nurse, aviator, mechanician or otherwise, and who remains one of any such forces or services or has been honourably discharged therefrom, and every person, male or female, who, being a British subject ordinarily resident in Canada, whether or not a minor or an Indian, is on active service in Europe in any other of the forces or services, military or naval, of His Majesty or of His allies.

The only qualification is that a person be enlisted, whether in service or not, and that he be a British subject; therefore the qualification applies to a person who has not resided in Canada at all. This provision might as well embrace the whole population of the British Isles, or of any part of the British Empire. If Parliament can make voters of people such as are defined in this paragraph of section 2, it would be open to Parliament to qualify, as voters in this country, the whole British army and the whole British population all over the world, and it would be possible to qualify any person, whatever might be the residence of that person.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: Does the honourable gentleman understand that residence is an essential qualification for voting in all the provinces?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Yes.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: The honourable gentleman's understanding is incorrect. In Nova Scotia residence is not necessary.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: If the honourable gentleman takes the trouble to hear the point which I propose to make, he will understand the distinction between the Constitution of Canada and the Constitution of any of the provinces.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: I merely wished to tell my honourable friend that there might be 10,000 people who never resided in Nova Scotia but who might be qualified to vote there.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: There is no question that in any of the provinces of Canada it would be open to qualify any person as a voter. They may not be residents at all. The legislature is the absolute master of the subject under the Constitution, in fact, the legislature may change its constitution; but Parliament cannot change its constitution. Of course, all members of this House are aware and realize that by virtue of the Canadian Constitution we are under a federal system. It is a kind of partnership between the different provinces, which form one Parliament, the House of Commons and the Senate of Canada. I desire to call attention to the following sections of the Constitution. Section 8 says:

In the general census of the population of Canada which is hereby required to be taken in the year one thousand eight hundred and seventy-one, and in every tenth year thereafter, the respective populations of the four provinces shall be distinguished.

I draw your attention to the wording "the general census of the population of Canada." That is not the population of any other part of the world. Then, section 37 deals with the House of Commons:

The House of Commons shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, consist of one hundred and eighty-one members, of whom eighty-two shall be elected for Ontario, sixty-five for Quebec, nineteen for Nova Scotia, and fifteen for New Brunswick.

Then section 40:

Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick shall for the purposes of the election of members to serve in the House of Commons, be divided into Electoral Districts as follows:

And then follow the divisions in different provinces:

Quebec shall be divided into sixty-five electoral districts, composed of the sixty-five Electoral Divisions into which lower Canada is at the passing of this Act divided under chapter two of the Consolidated Statutes of Canada, chapter seventy-five of the Consolidated Statutes of Lower Canada, and the Act of the Province of Canada of the twenty-third year of the Queen, chapter one, or any other Act amending the same in force at the Union, so that each electoral division shall be for the purposes of this Act an Electoral District entitled to return one member.

Then the Constitution proceeds with Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Under this part of the Constitution, the House of Commons was composed of 181 members, with 65 in Quebec; and it is provided by the part of the statute which I have read that the membership of Quebec is the standard, which cannot be increased or decreased. The numbers to be elected in the other provinces are based upon the population of Quebec as compared with the population of each of the other provinces. Therefore it would not be open to Quebec to qualify as voters persons who would not form part of the population of Quebec. Doing that would be decreasing the representation of the other provinces. Surely it would not be open to this Parliament to permit of people in the United States or British subjects outside of Canada to be treated and counted as forming part of the population of Quebec. The necessary qualification for the vote is that the person must form part of the population, be a resident of the province.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But it does not increase the representation.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The representation is based upon the census, which has to be taken every ten years. Representation in every province is based on population; therefore you cannot increase the population at the will of this Parliament. You are restricted by the Constitution, by virtue of each province the electors must be residents of that province. Now, this Bill goes still further, and let me show how unconstitutional is the procedure. When we come to subsections 4 and 5 of section 3 what do we find? I will read the whole section:

3. (1) Every military elector shall be qualified and entitled to vote at a general election.

(2) If he can state the electoral district wherein he last continuously resided during at least four months of the twelve months immediately preceding his appointment, enlistment, enrolment or calling out on active service, or so particularly specify a place or places within an electoral district whereat during such period of time he so resided that such electoral disttrict can therefrom be ascertained he shall be deemed an elector of the electoral district so stated or to be ascertained, and his vote shall be applied thereto.

I do not take exception to subsection 2. Then number 3 reads:

(3) If he cannot state or so specify an electoral district or place wherein he has so resided for the time and within the period mentioned in subsection two but can state an electoral district or so specify a place within Canada wherein he has at any other time resided, he shall be deemed an elector of the electoral district so stated or made ascertainable and his vote shall be applied thereto.

Again the qualification, that he has been a resident for at least four months. I do not take exception to this paragraph, but I take exception to number 4:

(4) If he cannot, because of non-residence or otherwise, so state or specify, he shall be deemed an elector of, and his vote shall be applied to, such electoral district as he may indicate.

(5) No person shall be entitled, because of anything in this Part contained, to vote more than once at any election

Under subsection 4, he is not required to have been a resident of any district, therefore not a resident of any part of Canada, and he may vote for any district. He may vote for the province of Quebec, and thereby increase, so to speak, the population of Quebec for the purpose of representation by fifteen, twenty, fifty, one hundred thousand persons, and increase the quantum represented by each member of the province of Quebec and thereby decrease the representation in all the other provinces. Surely that cannot be done. If it can be done for a British subject, it can be done for an American or anybody else. I submit that that is clearly a violation of the powers of this Parliament and of the Constitution. I repeat, we are under a written Constitution; we must remain within the four corners of the Constitution; it is a federation, a kind of partnership between the different provinces, and the representation of each province is based on the number of population of such province. The population in one province for the purpose of representation cannot be used from one province to another, and the population outside of the Dominion cannot be imported for the purpose of representation, into this country. I therefore hope that the honourable leader of the Government will give his serious consideration to that part of the Bill, and be prepared to alter it accordingly.

Another point, of minor importance, is this, that under this Act provision is made for the taking of the vote of military electors within or without Canada within the twenty-eight days following the nomination. There is a provision calling upon the electoral officers to post up the names of the candidates in the camp or wherever the voters may be. But under the first subsection of section 8 it would be open to allow the electors to vote the very day after the nomination, and therefore before the names of the candidates have been posted and made known to the electors. That might lead to very serious trouble and abuse, because parties who would desire to take advantage of the Bill might on the very day after the nomination day, and before the names of all the candidates are made known by the proper officer, to induce the electors to vote for one of the candidates. They may be told that the candidate is so-and-so, or that there is only one candidate, and they might be asked to register their votes, and the votes would be perfectly legal although given in ignorance of other candidates at the time.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: When do I understand my honourable friend to say that polling may take place?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: On the following day.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: So that no polling shall take place before the day following the nomination.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: That is too soon. I think it should be, not before the names of the candidates have been posted, or so many days after the nomination.

I omitted to refer to two other sections which have some bearing on the point, sections 51 and 52 of the British North America Act. Section 51 reads:

On the completion of the Census in the year one thousand eight hundred and seventy-one, and of each subsequent decennial Census, the representation of the four Provinces shall be readjusted by such authority, in such manner, and from such time, as the Parliament of Canada from time to time provides, subject and according to the following Rules:—

(1) Quebec shall have the fixed number of sixty-five members:

(2) There shall be assigned to each of the other Provinces such a number of members as will bear the same proportion to the number of its population (ascertained at such Census) as he number sixty-five hears to the number of the population of Quebec (so ascertained):

(4) On any such re-adjustment the number of members for a Province shall not be reduced unless the proportion which the number of the population of the Province bore to the number of the aggregate population of Canada at the then last preceding re-adjustment of the number of members for the Province is ascertained at the then latest Census to be diminished by one-twentieth part or upwards:

(5) Such re-adjustment shall not take effect until the termination of the then existing Parliament.

52. The number of the members of the House of Commons may be from time to time increased by the Parliament of Canada, provided the proportionate representation of the Provinces prescribed by this Act is not thereby disturbed.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: The statement by the honourable member for De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate, is to the effect that under section 3 the whole British army might be made electors of Canada. I cannot see where the honourable member finds any reason to make that statement with reference to section 3.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The honourable gentleman did not understand me. I say that if we go to the extent allowed by this Bill, in the section to which I referred, it could be extended so as to cover all British subjects in the British Isles.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I entirely disagree with the honourable gentleman, because there is nothing in this section that I can see that would bear out any such contention. In paragraph c the honourable gentleman will find that military electors are divided into three classes. The elector in the first of these classes whether or not ordinarily resident in Canada, must be a British subject and must be a member of the Canadian Expeditionary Force. The next class includes those who have been " while within Canada, appointed, enlisted or enrolled as one of the British Royal Flying Corps, Royal Naval Aviation Service, or Auxiliary Motor Boat Patrol Service." Then there is the third class:

Every person, male or female, who, being a British subject ordinarily resident in Canada, whether or not a minor or an Indian, is on active service in Europe in any other of the forces or services, military or naval, of His Majesty or of his allies.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Go on. That is not the clause.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: The second or intermediate class must be enlisted in Canada. They are practically residents. The first class may be resident in Canada or not, but they must be members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Residents or not.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: It appears to me that if they are members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force they are good enough citizens for us to recognize and to give the vote to them.

Hon Mr. CLORAN: No.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I cannot for the life of me see where the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Béique) has the reason of right to make the statement that under that clause we could give the vote to any part of His Majesty's army.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, it is obvious that under that section containing a definition of "military elector" recruits from the British Isles who join the Canadian Expeditionary Force, the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian Militia on active service, or the Royal Naval Canadian Volunteer Reserve would become ipso facto electors of Canada.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Yes, but they must be members of the Expeditionary Force.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: They must, but does not my honourable friend think that it would be going far to get electors for Canada, when these same persons were already electors elsewhere—In their own country?

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I think that if they are good enough to fight for us they are good enough to vote.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I am not taking exception to the Bill because it would not be advisable to enroll them as voters, but because I claim that we have not the right to do so. That is the only point I raise.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am following my honourable friend from St. John (Hon. Mr. Daniel), and I say that my honourable friend is labouring under a misapprehension when he thinks that those recruits who happen to be in the Canadian Expeditionary Force and fighting in France would be entitled to a vote in Canada because they are defending Canada. Surely my honourable friend realizes that in defending Great Britain and the whole Empire, they are doing so not because they happen to be in our Naval Forces, our Canadian Expeditionary Force, or the Aviation or Flying Corps. They may have joined our Canadian Expeditionary Force in order to get better pay. Should they for the reason that they have crossed from Great Britain to Flanders be entitled to vote in Canada? They have seen nothing of this country. They are electors in their own country. Why should they have a second vote here? By what principle should those persons who are British electors in their own land be made Canadian electors?

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: They may not be British at all.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: All the worse.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am speaking of British subjects, because under this, as my honourable friend will see, only British subjects can vote in Canada. Consequently I say it is a wrong principle to declare that a British subject, because he has enlisted in the Canadian Expeditionary Force should by that fact alone be made an elector of Canada. I do not know how many there are in the Canadian Forces, but there may be 5,000 or 10,000 British subjects who have never seen Canada, who have crossed the Atlantic from Great Britain to the United States. They have been enlisted in the United States and been taken overseas, or have joined the Naval Service and gone on board a steamer at Portland or New York. There may be some who have gone overseas from Newfoundland or who went from Newfoundland to the United States and enlisted there. We know there are thousands of Newfoundlanders who have never set foot on Canadian soil. The bill provides that such persons, even though they have never set foot on Canadian soil, but because they are members of the Canadian Expeditionary Forces, have a right to vote in Canada. Newfoundlanders who have enlisted in the United States may have a vote in Newfoundland. Britishers may have decided to join our forces because that was the easiest way for them to return and fight for their country—for Great Britain. They are likewise fighting for Canada, because it is part of the British Empire, but my honourable friend and many others are under a delusion if they think that these men are fighting for the love of Canada. Surely the men from Newfoundland or from Great Britain are fighting primarily for their own homes and for the Empire at large. But why make them Canadian electors when they are already electors in Newfoundland or Great Britain?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Or in the United States.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Our own Canadians who are to-day in Great Britain and not made British electors because in fighting for the Empire they are at the same time fighting for Great Britain.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Do not omit France.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But is France giving the right to vote to the members of our Canadian forces who are defending her soil? Are the French people giving a right to vote to the Belgians, the British, the Portuguese and the members of the Russian Expeditionary Force who are on their soil—because they happen to be in France?— It is preposterous. Has Great Britain placed on her voters' lists the Canadian soldiers who have now been overseas for a year, who may be there longer, perhaps until the end of the war, who have gone to the defence of Great Britain as well as Canada—Great Britain rather, because Great Britain is the more exposed? I put the question to my honourable friend.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I do not see what that has to do with the matter. It is not what Great Britain has done or is going to do; it is not what France or any other country has done. The question before us is what we think ought to be done in Canada.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: And that is why my honourable friend will allow me to tell him what I think. I will listen to him stating his own views, provided he will kindly consent to allow me to express mine. There are other objections to giving the vote to British subjects who have lived in the United States but have never been in Canada, and who may have votes in their own land. There is an objection in the fact that they are unable to select a riding in which to cast their vote. What does this Act say? They may elect to poll their vote in any one of the 235 ridings which we shall have at the next elections. What will be the effect of that choice which is given them? There are in all of the provinces a certain number of ridings where the vote between the two parties is very close. Lists will be made up in each province by the two organizations, Liberal and Conservative, of all the close counties. Friends will be found within the Expeditionary Forces who will have those lists of close counties, and American citizens or British subjects hailing from the United States, will be chased for their vote by the friends of both parties and asked to poll their vote in one of those close ridings. That is what will take place throughout Flanders and France. I wonder if that is proper, if it is decent even.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: It is not.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Should we sanction or allow such a state of affairs? There are, I suppose, among the 350,000 soldiers overseas some men with strong political tendencies. Should those soldiers be allowed to go about amongst the British-Americans to solicit them to poll their vote in a certain close riding? Members of both political parties will be doing it. What will be the effect in a county where the majority may be only 50 and may swing from one side to the other? The effect will be that one candidate may corral 75 out of 100 of the votes of those British-Americans and by that vote may be elected.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: It is a good vote.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is a good vote, but it is no better than the vote of the Canadian soldiers who belong to that riding.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: It is better than the vote of the fellows who have stayed at home.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will simply compare it with the vote of the Canadian soldiers from that same riding.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: What about the slackers?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There may have been 300 votes from members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force belonging to that riding. The majority of those 300 may have favoured one of the candidates—for instance, the Conservative candidate, for all I know. Those 100 British-Americans—

Hon. Mr. TANNER: Nothing like that happens in any of the constituencies in Canada. There is no chasing after voters in Canada, is there?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: In Canada the voters know something of the candidates and something of the questions of the day. British-Americans who know nothing of Canada may be chased by their comrades and drawn into one camp or the other according to their friendship for a comrade. Is that a proper way to carry on an election? Of course, the honourable gentleman from Pictou (Hon. Mr. Tanner), who is interrupting, is thinking simply of the possible party advantage. I am absolutely indifferent to that. Let us try not to lose our senses—

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: That is good.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: —and not be carried away by hysteria. Let us see what is the proper sort of legislation in order that the elections throughout Canada may be conducted in a proper manner.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: My honourable friend should not allege that I am carried away by a desire for party advantage just because he is.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend should not be so sure of his affirmation. When he has lived for a few more sessions in contact with his collegues, he may find that they are perhaps not so subservient to party feeling as he seems to think at this moment.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: Does the honourable gentleman not think that this system is preferable to the one which provides that all the overseas forces shall vote in two or three ridings and thereby disturb what the result might be in twenty or thirty ridings?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My idea would be that the system adopted in one of the Western provinces—I do not know whether it was Saskatchewan or not—

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: Alberta.

Hon. Mr. DAUDURAND:—would perhaps be a more healthy form if we are bound to have those strangers vote. They are strangers to Canada. If there is a majority in both branches of Parliament that thinks those strangers, who may have votes elsewhere in their own country, should express an opinion on Canadian matters, then my answer is that if there are, say, 5,000 or 7,000, or double that number, would it not be better to have them represent the unorganized districts of Canada? I recognize that we could not add one riding to Ontario, nor one to Quebec. We must find some other territory to which we have a right to give representation. I wonder if it would not be better to form a riding and to give them one or two constituencies in the unorganized districts of western Canada? I throw out this suggestion because it seems to me that it will have less demoralizing influence and it will create less friction and recrimination.

Hon. H. J. CLORAN: Honourable gentlemen, I think this is one of the historic occasions in the life of Canada. Parliament is asked to transfer its civil and political rights to a body of men who know not Canada, a body of men who have never lived in Canada, who know nothing of its economic conditions, know nothing of its policies, know nothing of its traditions, know nothing even of its geography. By this Bill Parliament is asked to transfer the rights and the privileges of the people of Canada to a body of men who, although fighting for the Empire are so ignorant as that. Really, as a Canadian, I feel oppressed. I feel it in my bones, in my heart and in my soul that the Parliament of this country, a free, independent country, should be asked by the Government of the day to transfer the power of government to a body of men who are as ignorant as that; and, after all, this poor, moribund, dying, dead Parliament is going to transfer that power from the living people of the country to strangers. It is true that these men are 4,000 miles away, fighting for the flag, fighting for democracy, and that we are here debating this subject.

A similar measure concocted by the Minister of Public Works, Hon. Robert Rogers, was introduced for the purpose of a general election. The Parliament of Canada condescended to give votes to the 30,000 men who at that time had gone over from Valcartier under the orders of Sir Sam Hughes. We had no very great objection to that, and Parliament, even the Senate, acquiesced in the demand of the Government of that day. The vote was asked for in view of a general election which was to be sprung on the country in the fall of 1915. Parliament gave the vote to these 30,000 young Canadians. They were all Canadians. They were all residents. There were no Britishers to come over and enlist in Canada at the time. There were no Americans to come over and enlist, and to go down to Valcartier camp. Parliament was proud to say that those 30,000 voters could have the vote. They were all voters when they enlisted. They were residents and workers in Canada. They threw up good positions in banks, in law offices, in insurance companies, on the farm, in the workshops, on the fields of the West, to go to fight for our cause, and Parliament had no objection to granting them a vote, even for the purposes of Mr. Rogers, then the Minister of Public Works, and head organizer of the Tory party, who was wanting a general election. Matters had gone so far that ballots were prepared, and over thirty cases, each six feet square, were sent to London. We were a party to that. The election did not come off. Why? Well, I will leave that to some of the younger members. I suppose the elderly gentlemen of the Senate would not remember that, but the younger members who have been brought in here must remember these facts. The election was called off. The power which Parliament gave to the Government to take the vote of that Expeditionary Force dropped because the political and party schemes of Mr. Robert Rogers and his colleagues dropped too.

I may state an incident that happened in connection with the discussion in the Senate and the vote that was taken thereon. The Royal Family was pretty well represented. I think the Duke of Connaught, the Governor General, was then here. There was a very high official on the floor of the Senate. I am not going to name him. He was high up in the army. Notwithstanding that the measure brought down by the Government was then very popular in the country, because it was giving votes to our own, I said to myself, "Why should I make the boys, my boys, play the game of politics when they are at the game of war?" That was the sentiment that was dominating my mind and dominating my heart, and I opposed the measure. I was one of the few that opposed that Bill. I opposed it, not because the boys did not deserve a vote, but because I felt in my soul that a man who is fighting at the front, aiming his gun at the enemy, has no right to be touched on the shoulder by a returning officer and asked, "Who are you going to vote for?" A soldier should play one game, the game of war, and not the game of politics. The King's Regulations and Orders throughout the entire world are against politics, and no soldier of the King can attend a political meeting or cast his wote while in uniform. These were the scenes before my eyes at that time. These were the considerations that influenced me. The measure was carried. On leaving the Chamber I passed this venerable officer, and I said to him, "Did I do wrong, or did I do right?" He said: "You did right. Soldiers should not take part in political affairs. Their duty is to attend to war." That was right from the Royal household. I have not forgotten that lesson. To-night I am here, not to tell the soldiers, the boys who are fighting for me and fighting for my country, that I will not let them vote. No, I will tell them: "Boys, keep your guns straight on the enemy and I will not trouble you about the political, domestic, and economic questions of Canada. Keep your guns turned on the enemy and not on either party in the Dominion of Canada." That is my position. Should we introduce the game of party politics into the army? England does not do it. France does not do it. Germany does not do it, Austria does not do it. Italy does not do it. The United States does not do it. Is it right that a soldier with his gun trained on the enemy should be tapped on the shoulder and asked how he is going to vote? Australia has given the right to vote the same as we did, under a misapprehension of what she owed the soldier. There is one country to-day fighting the battles of the world that has given the soldiers the vote, and what country is that? It is Russia. What is the result? Revolt, rebellion, revolution, rioting in the ranks of the army, because they are involved in politics as well as in war. Look at the example, honourable gentlemen. The only country on earth to-day fighting the battles of civilization and of humanity that gives the right to vote to the soldiers is Russia, and what do you find? Every morning you rise from your bed and find that there is nothing but rebellion, revolution, discord, riot, and outrages right in the ranks of the blood of men that has flowed on the the game of politics into the game of war.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: You have not a very high conception of the Canadian army.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I have a high conception of the human race as represented by the different countries who are fighting the battles of humanity and democracy, and I have a higher conception than you have of the blood of men that has flowed on the battlefields of Europe and that is still flowing both on sea and land. What has the honourable interrupter to say to that? I do not know who he is. Who is he? That is my answer to him. A high conception of the Canadian army? My endeavour here is to protect the Canadian army from the nefarious influence of party politics. My effort here to-night is to protect the soldiers against both parties of this country. What has the honourable gentleman got to say to that? Is that conception high enough? Let him answer. I do not know who he is. Is he silenced? These are facts which are not contradicted and cannot be contradicted. I hold that this Bill is a most mischievous and baneful one. Dear knows, we had a strenuous enough time during the past three days in regard to a fiscal bill, to save a few millions to the people of Canada. Honourable gentlemen know what I mean—the Canadian Northern Railway Bill. We have had a most strenuous time in trying to safeguard the interests of Canada on a small fiscal matter of $60,000,000 or $100,000,000. I say small, because millions to-day are like dollars in the past. My stand here to-day is taken in order to protect the army against the nefarious influence of politics in its fighting against the enemy and in its administration. I have no further object than that, and I say, and I say it again with the consent of soldiers at the front, that they do not want to be troubled with considerations of this kind when they are lying dying in hospitals. They do not want to be confronted with these questions and be asked to solve them when they are on the firing line and in the trenches. The soldiers themselves do not want to be confronted with these questions when they are in the training camp in England, or even in Canada, where we have probably 50,000 or 60,000 in training camps from Vancouver to Halifax. In a hospital on the other side somebody asked Sandy how he was going to vote, and Sandy had a conversation with Paddy Sheehan and Baptiste Philteau who were in cots near him. Paddy said he could not vote at all, for he had lost his arms, but Sandy told him the returning officer would sign the ballot for him. After a full discussion about Borden and Laurier, they all decided to vote Grit, as they had done in Canada, and the Frenchman decided that he would vote in Toronto, as he had no home in Canada, having lived in the United States. He decided on Toronto so as to give the vote there some little flavour of the Canadian. Among the 350,000 of our Canadian boys in the army, there are many good conscientious Conservatives and as many conscientious Liberals, and many good independents, tied up with neither party, and very many of them good Labourites, as well as a considerable number of Nationalists, disciples of Bourassa. By throwing this Bill, this bomb, into their ranks, you are going to disrupt the entire Canadian army. Has the Government no foresight no sagacity, no conception of what the country needs—union in the army? As soon as this Bill is passed and transmitted to the front, you will have Grit soldiers and Tory soldiers and Labourite soldiers and Nationalist soldiers all fighting politics, just as we are doing on the floor of this House. If the British War Office could make its voice heard here, the order would come to this Government not to perpetrate such an act against the union and discipline of the army as you are attempting to do by this Bill, and which you will do. The British War Office would send that word to the Government, but it does not take it to task because Canada is a free, independent colony. In the conduct of a very serious war this measure is very unwise and very mischevious. The boys at the front who are fighting have enough to play the game of war without being asked to play the game of politics, but this Government is forcing on them this game. What is the object of the game? It is not so much to give our men the right to vote as to obtain for the present Government the balance of power by giving the right to vote where they please to men who have no residence in Canada, who know nothing about Canada or its conditions, economic, political or otherwise. If that is not an outrage against the franchise of a free and independent people resident in the country, I would like to know where one could be found. Is it not an outrage to give to any man or any number of men the right to cast their votes where they please, or where they will be directed to cast their votes? How many of you on the other side of this House, running in a close constituency, would like to have votes of that kind cast against you? Not one. But by your votes on this Bill you are going to force other candidates to submit to what you do not want to submit to yourselves. Is there any justice or fair play in that attitude? Can you justify that action before the electors of Canada? No later than yesterday, when I was in Montreal, strong Conservatives who have never voted Liberal in their lives, wealthy men and merchants, said: "We are beginning to lose faith in the Government, in its cry of patriotism; we cannot understand that the Government of the day shall give to strangers in this country the right to cast their ballots in any constituency they want to indicate, or that the deputy returning officer will indicate for them." That is the sum and substance of this Bill, and you honourable gentlemen on the other side are giving sanction to this statement.

I think this demand was originated by your ex-Minister of Public Works, the great organizer of elections in the Dominion of Canada, the Hon. Robert Rogers, and it fell into the hands of one just as capable, and I think more devilish, the Solicitor-General, now Secretary of State. This Bill has been hatched in iniquity, in a desire to defeat the popular will, to prevent the people of Canada from returning the Liberal party to power, and from chasing unworthy representatives of the people from power who have been there too long, and who have only three weeks and a half to live. Oh, if I only had five or six men of my stamp here. I tell you it would not be a dissolution you would have; you would die a natural death. I feel in my body and soul strength enough to stand up for the rights of the people. I am not standing here to-night for my own health.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Nor for ours.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I am not standing here for my own health, or my own pleasure. I am here on behalf of the people, and on behalf of my sons and my brothers and all my relatives in the army, to protest against this Bill. What more does the King want from me than to give him my blood on both sides of the Atlantic? If he wants me, I will go, but not under the patronage of a Government of this kind. All my family on both sides of the Atlantic are shedding their blood for the defence of the King and Empire, and for the trimph of democracy, and I am faced here to-day with the most reproachful measure against democracy. Why have I not the right to speak? Why have I not the right to protest against this thing of my vote being submerged by volunteers' votes? True, they are fighting for the country, but I will go further: before the vote is taken let every man on the firing line, in the hospitals and the camps of England, France and Flanders, and on the seas, declare where they will vote before the vote is taken. Is that not a fair proposition? Can the honourable gentlemen there who wish very often to keep me from speaking say anything to that? You may put this measure through, and you are going to do it, but let me tell you the Nemesis is at hand, the day of judgment is coming fast, and when the trumpet will be blown and the call will be made—well, it cannot call us because we go on forever; but when it calls the Government and representatives of the people from their deadly slumbers, there will be an awful awakening, and the angel will say, "Those who did such and such a thing, get on that side," and I think you will all be there. I am not going to send you to the infernal regions, remember, when you get on that side.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Send them to purgatory.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Well, purgatory would be too good for them. Anyhow, the people are going to open their eyes to the transactions in this House. Do not imagine that what we say here is confined to the empty array of benches. It must go to the whole country. I do not suppose the Conservative machine will make use of any of my speeches in their literature, but I hope that the Liberal machine will have a few spaces left for me. As the honourable leader of the Government said this afternoon, we are threshing space. In the meantime, we are threshing space with a vengeance, to get the good wheat in.

I tell you, honourable gentleman, right here, that this Bill does not appeal to the good sense, the honesty, and the patriotism of the electorate of Canada. The Government to-day is travelling under false pretenses. Patriotism, as a great American orator said one day, is the last refuge of scoundrels, of men who wish to evade public criticism. The Government to-day, by several of its measures, is travelling under the guise of patriotism. Take, for instance, the 37 on this side of the House as against the 43 on the other. Are not the 37 as good friends of King George, of the Empire and of the cause of democracy as the 43 on the other side? But you all claim the monopoly of patriotism. You put all the Liberals of the country down as rebels, traitors, slackers, and so on. It is easy to say so, but you cannot make the Liberals of the country, who are eight out of ten to-day, believe that. We are as good friends of the Empire and as good supporters of the King as any Tory that ever existed. We do not brag about it; we do not put it up as a fence mark; we do not roll ourselves up in the British flag with all our sins, and say, "I am a supporter of the Empire; therefore touch me not, criticise me not." We do not roll ourselves up in the flag and tell the people, "We have done this, and that, and you must forgive us because we are the patriotic supporters of the Empire." We Liberals do not do that. Such conduct is left to you, honourable gentlemen opposite, representing the Tory brigade outside this House.

I feel that we owe it to the people of Canada to make these remarks on their behalf. I feel that when this Bill passes it will not result in such a disastrous way as the Government expect it to do as against the Liberal party. I have hope if the members of the Liberal organization will work together and spread the literature necessary among our troops, our boys, my boys, at the front, will know how to vote. Let us give them both sides of the question. Oh, I do not want to befool the boys at the front. If the Liberal organization has fair play in the spreading of campaign political literature in the trenches, in the hospitals or in the camps, I will venture to say that, after considering the situation as best they can, with the little opportunity given to them, seven out of ten votes of the boys at the front will be cast against this Government. If the opportunity is not given to them—if, after being away one year, two, or three years, they remain in the dark, not knowing what has gone on—for instance, not knowing what has transpired in the House this afternoon when the Government by one of its Bills has sanctioned a practical steal of over $60,000,000—of course, they will not know how they should vote. If the boys at the front do not know under what conditions the Conscription Bill was put through, how are they going to cast a ballot? And then the Franchise Act, which is to come down, with provisions to give votes to the mother, the sister and the daughter. Well, I am in favour of that, but with the additional provision that the mother-in-law get the vote as well as the mother, and the sister-in-law and all the step-mothers and all the step-sisters. These are the measures which the Government are bringing before Parliament in order to capture the next election.

My last word is this: give the boys at the front a fair chance to know what is going on in Canada, and I will venture to say that seven out of ten will vote against the present Administration.

Hon. WM. ROCHE: I would like to ask the honourable leader of the Government, as this is a very late hour, and several other gentlemen want to speak, if when the Bill goes into Committee he would allow in the discussion of the clauses some reference to the principle of the Bill. This Bill is an amendment of an Act, and a proper understanding of it could be arrived at only by comparison and by carrying along the principle of the Bill into the discussion of the clauses. If the honourable gentleman would allow some slight reference to the principle of the Bill, I would not intrude any remarks upon the House at this late hour of the night, because I know that honourable gentlemen have been wearied by the three sessions which we have had. If the honourable leader of the Government would consent to that, I see no object in endeavouring to prolong this sitting. The honourable gentleman from Hastings (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell) this afternoon announced very positively that after the principle of a Bill had been discussed it could not be discussed in committee when the clauses were being considered. I would like to ask him this question: suppose the clause of a Bill flatly and diametrically opposes the principle of the Bill, how could you show the inconsistency of that unless you referr d to the principle of the Bill and contrasted it with the clauses? So, although the principle of the Bill may not be formally discussed, or cannot be the subject of the debate in committee, certainly according to all processes of reasoning or logic, and parliamentary conduct, the main clause must be considered in connection with the subordinate clauses to carry it into effect. But I would ask the honourable gentleman (Hon. Sir James Lougheed), when the clauses are being discussed in Committee, to permit some slight reference to the principle of the Bill. If the honourable gentleman will do that, I shall not intrude any remarks upon the House at this time.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is entirely for the House to decide how far they will allow the discussion to go in committee. But the principle of the Bill will not, I fancy, be controverted for a moment. The principle is that the soldiers at the front should have a vote. If my honourable friend intends to controvert that principe, I prefer that he discuss the question now.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: I did not wish to controvert the principle of the Bill. What I have asked is that in the discussion in the committee we may be allowed to allude to it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We have never dealt harshly with honourable gentlemen in committee.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

MILITARY SERVICE BILL.

BOARD OF SELECTION.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved that the Senate unite with the House of Commons in the following resolution by filling up the blank therein with the words "Senate and":

Resolved by the.....House of Commons of Canada, that the following gentlemen do compose the board of selection to appoint members of local tribunals under section 6 of the Military Service Act 1917:

Ontario: A. E. Fripp, M.P., Ottawa; W. A. Boys, M.P., Barrie, Ont.; Sir John Gibson, Hamilton, Ont.; A. B. Lowe, 41 Glenn St., Ottawa.

Quebec, Joseph Rainville, M.P., St. Lambert; Romeo Langlois, K.C., Quebec; Hon. S. N. Parent, Montreal, Que.; Hon. Sydney Fisher, Knowlton, Que.

Nova Scotia: Geo. S. Campbell, Halifax, N.S.; D. A. Cameron, Barrister, Sydney, C.B.

New Brunswick: Mariner G. Teed, St. John, N.B.; John McCaffrey, Fredericton, N.B.

Manitoba: Senator W. H. Sharp, Manitou; Sir Donald MacMillan, Winnipeg, Man.

Saskatchewan: Senator H. W. Laird, Regina; Arthur Hitchcock, Moosejaw, Sask.

Alberta: R. B. Bennett, M.P., Calgary; Alfred H. Clarke, K.C., Calgary, Alberta.

British Columbia: R. F. Green, M.P., Victoria, B.C.; Hon. James Horace King, Victoria, B.C.

Yukon: Lt.-Col. A. Thompson, M.D., M.P., Ottawa; F. C. Wade, Vancouver.

Prince Edward Island: Wm. L. Cotton, Charlottetown; James J. Johnston, K.C., Charlottetown, P.E.I.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until eleven o'clock to-morrow morning.

THE SENATE.

Wednesday, September 12, 1917.

First Sitting.

The Senate met at Eleven o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

STAFF OF THE SENATE.

PROPOSED PROMOTIONS.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I have the honour to place upon the table of the House the following recommendation:

Ottawa, 12th September, 1917.

Sir:—

I have the honour to recommend that the salary of the First Clerk Assistant be increased from $3,300 to $3,500, to date from 1st April, 1917.

A recommendation to a similar effect was made on March 10 by the then Clerk of the Senate.

Mr. Young has been of great assistance in connection with my work, and in consideration of his long and faithful service, I earnestly hope the increase will be granted.

I also recommend that Mr. A. H. Hinds, Chief Clerk of Committees of the Senate, be promoted from subdivision B to subdivision A of the First Division, to date from 1st September instant.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
A. E. Blount,
Clerk of the Senate.

His Honour the Speaker,
The Senate.

I concur in the above recommendation, and submit the same for the approval of the Senate.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I move that the Senate concur in the recommendation. I make this motion because there is no probability of the Internal Economy Committee meeting before the end of the session.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I have great pleasure in seconding the motion made by the honourable the leader of the Government. The report deals with two of our most deserving servants.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: This is the first that we have heard of these changes. If we are going to increase the pay of these officials, I may say that there are other officials whose claims ought to be considered. I do not think that we should make distinctions of this kind without referring the matter to the Internal Economy Committee. I heard the name of the first gentleman named in the recommendation, and I may say that I am in hearty sympathy with him. But there have been applications from other officers which should be considered. I mention one in particular, the curator of the reading-room.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: As the honourable the leader of the Government has said that there is no time for the committee to meet this session, I suggest that the motion stand, and perhaps my honourable friend will meet with the Speaker and add other names to the recommendation, and this afternoon the motion with the amendment might be carried.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: So far as I am concerned, there is no use in doing that.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Pending further consideration, I move that the recommendation lie upon the Table, until it can be taken up again.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I do not see that anything is to be gained by that course. The honourable gentleman behind me (Hon. Mr. Watson) recognizes the fact, I think, that the motion is a proper one. He thinks that certain other officers or servants of the House should be considered too. Something depends on the date of prorogation. It is my desire that we should have a meeting of the committee. There are some other matters to be considered, and then the cases of these one or two other deserving servants could be considered by the committee, and the committee could report to the House. There is no question as to the merits of the gentlemen recommended by His Honour the Speaker. I think the right course is to dispose of these cases, and then try to do justice to the others.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am not exactly au fait of the discussion. I am only seized of the motion that we adopt the report of the honourable the Speaker increasing salaries. We who have been in this Chamber for twenty years, and have seen abuses through the lobbying of senators during that time, came to the conclusion that we would allow no surprises to be sprung on the Senate, and that every proposal of this kind would have to go to the Committee on Internal Economy, where it would be examined, and where justice would be done. That has been my position since I saw abuses creeping in. I do not even know the names of the persons mentioned in the recommendation.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: They are two good men.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It seems to me that we should stand by the decision to examine into proposals for increases of salary.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Then, I withdraw the motion which I have made, with the consent of my honourable friend, providing that he sees his way to calling a meeting of the Committee on Internal Economy. I move that the recommendation be referred to that committee.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I am glad that the honourable the leader of the House at last takes that position. It is his right to take a hand in that business and to conduct it as he likes. I could never see why any honourable member of the Opposition, when a motion of this kind was placed in the hands of the Speaker, should have taken the matter into his hands and directed it to one committee or another. The honourable gentleman speaks of what took place during twenty years, but what are our powers? We refer all these things to the committee, because the House wishes to do it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Absolutely.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: But we are not bound to do it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Certainly not.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: An Act was passed in the House of Commons, amending all preceding laws, and we accepted that, and are bound by it. Any motion regarding the conduct of business in this House should be made by the leader of the House. His motion may not be sustained by this House, because we are an independent body, and are not bound to accept all the suggestions made, either by the leader of the House or by the leader of the Opposition; but we may accept such suggestions, and I think the least we can do in cases of this kind is to follow the leader of the House in matters of form, and not usurp his power. We may in the committee deal with the matter on its merits; I do not know what the motion is.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I do not know what honourable gentlemen are laughing at. What I mean to say is that I do not know what the object of the motion is. It is said to be for an increase of salary. I will not go into the merits of the question. Honourable gentlemen are all too intelligent not to have understood me. I only heard the honourable minister say that he wanted to withdraw the motion which he has made, and substitute another one referring the matter to the committee. I abide by the decision of my honourable friend.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Did I understand that the honourable the leader of the Government had moved that this report be referred to the Committee on Internal Economy?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, if that is the feeling of the House.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I think that will be the best way to deal with the matter. There will be plenty of time for the committee to meet.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I suppose the Chairman of that committee will call a meeting.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I move that the matter be referred to the Committee on Internal Economy, it being understood that there will be a meeting of that committee, and that a report will be presented this session.

The motion referring the recommendation to the committee was agreed to.

THE SENATE AND MONEY BILLS.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE APPOINTED.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved:

That a special committee be appointed to consider the question of determining what are the rights of the Senate in matters of financial legislation, and whether, under the provisions of the British North America Act, 1867, it is permissible—and to what extent—or forbidden, for the Senate, to amend a Bill embodying financial clauses (Money Bill), the said committee to report to the Senate as soon as possible, and that it be composed of His Honour the Speaker of the Senate, and of Honourable Messieurs Sir James Lougheed, Bostock, Ross (Middleton), Dandurand, Sproule, Belcourt, Power, Béique and the mover.

He said: In proposing this motion, honourable gentlemen, I want to have an opportunity given for the views which have been laid before this House by the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) to be studied, and a report by the persons named in this motion to be made to this House. In the House of Commons a discussion took place on the Income Tax Bill in which it was urged that that House should assert its privilege against any amendment made by this Senate. As the honourable gentleman from Middleton said, Bills for purpose of appropriating any part of the public revenue, or imposing any tax or impost, must originate in the House of Commons. That is according to section 54 of the British North America Act. Money Bills dealt with by the House of Commons originate in a definite way, which is set forth in section 54:

It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any vote, resolution, address or Bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue or of any tax or impost, to any purpose that has not been first recommended to that House by message of the Governor General in the session in which such vote, resolution, address or Bill is proposed.

A money resolution must be recommended by the Crown, and when it is adopted by the House of Commons a Bill based upon it is introduced, and it follows the course of ordinary Bills. That Bill may be amended. The amount of money involved cannot be increased, because the sum has been fixed by the resolution of the Crown; but the House of Commons may decrease the amount.

What are the privileges of the Senate? What are the privileges of the House of Commons? They are set forth in section 18 of the British North America Act, which reads as follows:

The privileges, immunities, and powers to be held, enjoyed and exercised by the Senate and by the House of Commons and by the members thereof respectively shall be such as are from time to time defined by Act of the Parliament of Canada, but so that the same shall never exceed those at the passing of this Act held, enjoyed and exercised by the Commons House of Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and by the members thereof.

So we cannot exceed the powers that were enjoyed by the House of Commons of Great Britain at the time of the passing of the British North America Act in 1867. That is as I understand this section. Moreover, the privileges of the House of Commons and the Senate, according to the British North America Act, are to be defined by Act of Parliament; not merely by a rule or regulation adopted by the House of Commons, but by an Act of Parliament.

The House of Commons have passed a resolution or rule—I think it is rule 78 or 79—in which they claim that the Senate cannot amend a money Bill, but may accept or reject it. That is only a regulation; it is not a law. It has not been provided for in a Bill passed by the House of Commons and accepted by us. So the rule or regulation of the House of Commons cannot be invoked against an Act which gives us the powers which the British House of Commons had in 1867. We have those powers. I am just explaining the matter as I understand it, and it will be discussed in the committee. Consequently, if we have the powers that the British House of Commons had in 1867, we may amend a money Bill, because the House of Commons of Great Britain has that power. Our powers are not the powers which the House of Lords of Great Britain had in 1867, but the powers of the "Commons House of Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland."

With these few remarks, I hope there will be no objection to the appointment of the proposed committee, and that the question will be submitted to the committee, so that it may be studied more thoroughly, and we may arrive at a decision which will govern the whole question whenever it may come before us.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I would suggest to the mover of this resolution that he amend it by adding after the words "to amend" the words "or reject."

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Why not leave to the committee the whole question of ascertaining what are the powers of the Senate in this matter? Why limit it at all?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I think the proposition of my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Belcourt) commends itself to this House, and I would withdraw any qualifications contained in the motion.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: And leave the question to be dealt with broadly?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Yes.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: The question as to what are the powers of this Senate.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: I would suggest to the mover of this motion that the committee should be composed a little differently from what he has suggested. It is usual in such cases as this to have on a committee a majority composed of members who are looked upon as sympathetic with the Government. We have on this committee—

Some Hon. SENATORS: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: We have on this committee four gentlemen who are looked upon—whether they are or not—as being Liberals and four who are looked upon as being Conservatives. We have on the committee one who is always against everything which the Government does.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Who is that member? Name him.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: In all fairness, the mover of the resolution should eliminate the name of the member who is always opposed to the Government.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would suggest to the honourable gentleman that the names of two other members could be added.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Leave it as it is.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: The difficulty could be overcome. This is the first time I have heard in this House that a question of this kind should be decided in a partisan way. I hope that the Government will not endorse that view. At all events, I am willing to withdraw from the committee.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: I am sympathetic with the Government, especially now, but I cannot vote with it.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I have no objection at all to the committee; but when we are doing something in this House we should try to accomplish something practical. What would be the result of that committee? Suppose the committee reported that the Senate had the right to amend or reject a money Bill in any way, what would be the effect of that on the other House? The other House might assert its right to deal exclusively with a money Bill; so that nothing would result from the work of this committee. I would suggest that this committee should be formed and that the other House should be notified of the fact and asked to appoint, a similar committee, so that they might jointly discuss these matters. Then the House of Commons committee could report to the House of Commons, and something might result. But the mere discussion of a report from a committee of this House will have no practical effect at all.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I think the report of the committee may have the effect of guiding this House as to the position to be taken on such matters in this House. Of course, the House will not be obliged to adopt the report of the committee, whatever it may be; but if the House adopts the committee's report, that will be a guide for future action. I do not want to discuss the merits of the question; I desire merely to say this, that I understood that the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) the other day took a much wider ground than that taken by the honourable gentleman from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry). The honourable gentleman from Middleton took the ground, as I understood, tnat the powers of this House in these matters are established by the constitution, and that it would not be within the power of this Parliament to abridge any of those powers, and in that view I entirely concur.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: It is a matter of utmost satisfaction to myself personally that this matter is brought formally before the House. For the past 14 years, I have urged on this honourable House its right and its power to amend Bills called, and ruled by the Chair to be, money Bills. I understand the constitution as well as any other honourable senator in this House. I have lived up to the constitution and intend to live up to it. The constitution says that all money Bills or Bills by which taxes are imposed must be initiated in the House of Commons, that we have no power whatever to increase taxation or originate it. That is a proper provision in the British North America Act. But that provision does not exclude the right of this House to amend these Bills for the benefit of the people. As I have stated, we have, according to the constitution, no right to originate, initiate or propose taxation on the people; but it is our right, I claim—and I think the honourable senator from Middleton will agree with me in this—to diminish the taxation. What are we here for except to give our advice to the Government along constitutional lines? I have urged for 14 years, without any result, that this honourable House had a right to amend so-called money Bills. The abuse of that term has gone so far, sustained by the rulings of all Speakers of this honourable House, that a Bill containing any financial proviso could not be amended. I have been called to order, and have been refused permission to speak on amendments to Bills of that kind. I felt that that was not right. I felt that limiting the powers of this Senate to look after the welfare of the people was not in the general interest—that the fact that there were two or three financial provisions in a Bill did not make it a money Bill according to the sense of the British North America Act, or the intention of that Act. The views which for the past 14 years I have expressed on this question have been unheeded. The Senate has abdicated its rights, sacrificed them, I do not know why or for what purpose. In nearly all Bills there are financial provisions. The acceptance of such a doctrine by this honourable House precludes us from amending such a Bill. As I asked the other day, what is the use of an intelligent body of men, such as we are supposed to be—and as we are—discussing a measure if we have no right to rectify any error in it, to amend it in a proper sense, in the interests of the people? I ask, what in the name of common sense is the use of discussing Bills of that kind?

You simply make a mockery of free and public discussion, and we make fools of ourselves in discussing a matter that we cannot amend, to rectify or improve. The proposed motion is a proper step to remedy the present situation, and I hope the committee will report to the effect that this Senate is not debarred by the British North America Act from amending Bills containing financial provisions, even budget Bills and those imposing taxation, and that it lies within the power and jurisdiction of the Senate to decrease such taxation if thought necessary in the public interests to do so. If the committee so reports, then it will not be in the power of any Speaker to rule out of order a member who attempts to amend a so-called money Bill. It will be time enough to meet the House of Commons after we have exercised our due powers under the constitution and expressed our will on the floor of this House; and if the Senate will only look after its own dignity and rights and powers according to the letter of the constitution, we shall triumph, and we shall not be considered by the people of Canada as a useless body. I hope past proceedings and authorities will not take the place of common sense and judgment of to-day. I have great respect for authors who are dead and buried, but I have more respect for the judgment of the man of the day, for past authorities were not acquainted with the conditions that exist to-day. Times change, conditions change, and antediluvian decisions should not prevail against the representatives of the people here. I hope the committee will come to these conclusions. The only regret I have, and probably it is a little personal, is that the mover of the motion did not put a man on the committee who is in favour of the views which I hold.

The motion was agreed to.

MILITARY OFFICERS OF SUPERIOR RANK.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN inquired of the Government:

1. Militia Act, page 677, section 43, says: "Whenever the militia is called out on active service during an emergency the Governor in Council may appoint officers to a rank superior to that of colonel." When was the militia called out on active service? What was the emergency that is referred to by this section as stated by the Hon. Sir James Lougheed in Hansard—the Debates of the Senate No. 51, under heading Military Districts and Commanding Officers, replying to inquiry of the Hon. Senator Cloran. Question No. 5. How did the rank of brigadier-general originate in Canada and for what service performed and on what authority?

2. The quarterly militia list corrected to 1st April, 1917, page 26, Military District No. 6, makes no mention of any brigadier in New Brunswick as having any such rank on the staff or otherwise. What was the reason for the omission, or why or what Brigadier-General is employed in New Brunswick and in what capacity? What was the emergency calling for the necessity of conferring such rank and on whom was it conferred and on what date? And for what service?

3. Who is the officer in New Brunswick who signs all official documents in the department as "Brigadier-General Commanding G.O.C., Canadian Expeditionary Force?"

4. If such officer is on the Canadian Expeditionary Forces how is it he is doing duty in Canada?

5. Did he ever go overseas or serve on the forces doing duty at the front, or to join and do duty with the overseas forces at the front? Does he draw overseas pay and allowances?

6. If so, what allowances for pay-chargers and groom-servants, forage-motors and gasolene, entertainment or other allowances?

7. What was the date of his appointment and what is the total amount of pay and allowances drawn by him to date? Is he a member of the House of Commons?

Return to the House of Commons in response to an order of the House dated June 21, giving names, rank, pay, nature and place of employment of officers, etc.

Major General T. Benson, G.O.C.M.D. 6 Halifax draws pay $3,675. Brigadier-General H. H. McLean, C.O.C., New Brunswick, draws $6,012. Why does the junior officer draw pay greater than his senior officer? Why does his name not appear in the Militia List of the command in New Brunswick?

8. Is the Government aware that no officer with the rank of brigadier will be accepted by the Imperial authorities at the front without preparatory duty to qualify him for such rank? If so, why is he on the overseas list for service, pay and allowances?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1. A considerable number of units of the Active Militia were placed on Active Service by virtue of an order by His Royal Highness the Governor General in Council, No. P.C. 2068, dated the 6th of August, 1914, and made under the authority of section 69 of the Militia Act; and at frequent intervals since that date additional units of the Active Militia have been added to those placed on Active Service. The emergency referred to is the present war.

2. The Militia List showing the staff of M.D. 6 is complete and no omission has been made of the name of any Brigadier-

General serving on that staff as a militia officer. Colonel (temp. Brigadier-General) H. H. McLean, M.P., is employed in New Brunswick as "G.O.C., New Brunswick Troops," to command New Brunswick troops, C.E.F. The brigading of the New Brunswick troops was evidently considered by the late minister as creating the necessity of conferring the appointment of Brigadier-General on Colonel H. H. McLean, with effect from the 24th May, 1916, for the purpose of commanding New Brunswick troops, C.E.F.

3. Not known. Colonel (temp. Brigadier-General) H. H. McLean is designated as "G.O.C., New Brunswick Troops."

4. Brigadier-General McLean is detailed to command Canadian Expeditionary Force troops in New Brunswick.

5. Draws pay and allowances of Brigadier-General in the Canadian Expeditionary Forces.

6. No allowances paid him for chargers, groom, servant, forage, motors, gasolene or entertainment.

7. (a) 31st January, 1916.

(b) Total pay and allowances to August 31, 1917, $8,203.50.

(c) Yes.

(d) The return brought down in respect to the matter is misleading. The pay and allowance of the Officer Commanding at Halifax is $4,600 per annum. General Benson receives that salary, but certain deductions are made on account of house rent, fuel, light, etc., bringing the amount down to $3,675 per annum. The return is misleading also in reference to Brigadier-General McLean. The amount, $6,012, included separation allowance at $720 a year, which Brigadier-General McLean does not draw, but which all married officers of his rank on the Canadian Expeditionary Forces are entitled to. Brig.-General McLean is on the Canadian Expeditionary Forces and receives the pay of a Brigadier-General. He is temporarily employed, receiving the same pay as an officer overseas.

(e) This officer's name is shown in the proper place in the Militia List under heading "General and Field Officers Actively Employed." He is not a member of the District Staff, Military District No. 6, which includes New Brunswick, and, therefore, is not shown under that heading.

8. The Government is aware that no officer, no matter what his rank may be, is sent to the front until considered qualified to perform the duties of his rank. Brigadier-General H. H. McLean is an officer on the strength of the Canadian Expeditionary Forces, which includes certain troops now in Canada as well as those in England and France, and is available for service wherever detailed, and, as such, he is entitled to the rates of pay and allowances authorized for the Canadian Expeditionary Forces.

DISORDER AT FORD CITY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I would like to ask the honourable leader of the House if he has any answer to give me to my inquiry of yesterday, relating to the despatch from Ford City, Ontario, published in the Ottawa Citizen stating that soldiers and several provincial police under orders from the Attorney General of Canada to the Crown Attorney of Essex county had forced the doors of the Church of the Lady of the Lake in Ford City in order to install the parish priest.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would say to my honourable friend, in regard to the troubles which have apparently arisen at Ford City, Ontario, that the report as to the Attorney General of Canada having intervened is entirely inaccurate, and the Department of Militia is unaware of any troops having been called out for the purpose of settling the trouble. It is to be pointed out, however that under the Militia Act the mayor of the city might appeal to the militia and call them out, but up to the present time the Militia Department is unaware of that being done.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: That is, the Government of Canada would not be responsible for the act.

CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY ACQUISITION BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the third reading of Bill 125, An Act providing for the acquisition by His Majesty of the capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway company.

Hon. J. H. LEGRIS (translation): Honourable gentlemen, this measure for the acquisition of the Canadian Northern railway is so important that I feel in duty bound not to allow it to pass without protesting against it with both my voice and my vote. I desire to register my strongest protest against the measure, for several reasons.

In the first place, it has been and still is a grave cause of disunion in the country, and much more serious than many people believe. I may quote the words of the Prime Minister of England, Mr. Lloyd George, which have been repeated by the press, uttered at a meeting held at Manchester a few days ago:

> Any one who promotes national disunion at this moment aids the enemy and is a traitor to his country.

These words apply perfectly to us in the present case. It seems to me that no one can ignore the fact that this measure is one which tends greatly to bring disunion among the citizens of Canada. It cannot be otherwise when one considers the enormity of the transaction, when one considers the ignorance of the facts with which the two chambers have proceeded, when one considers that in this Senate, where there is supposed to be no political partisanship, explanations asked for by the honourable senators from Lanaudière (Hon. Mr. Casgrain), from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt), from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette), from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique). What answer has been given to the serious arguments advanced by these honourable gentlemen? Only answers which either are childish or are outside of the question. Is it not evident that there is something crooked in this transaction—that there is an attempt to impose on the Canadian people?

But to demonstrate further all the apprehensions and objections which we have to this transaction, I am going to quote some very serious and important opinions. Only this week we have seen published in the newspapers the following particularly interesting declaration of Mr. J. C. Watters, the President of the Trades and Labour Congress:

> Mr. Watters yesterday evening denounced in vehement terms the scandalous purchase by the Government of the Canadian Northern. This declaration made before the Trades and Labour Council of Ottawa was very explicit, and was followed by this statement: "Sir Thomas White, Sir Donald Mann, Sir William Mackenzie, and the Canadian Bank of Commerce have never done otherwise than exploit Canada for their immediate profit."

When we find a man of the position and standing of Mr. Watters expressing himself thus, can we doubt for an instant that this measure is a most disadvantageous one, which the people of Canada should oppose with all their power, as promotive of disunion among the inhabitants of the country?

The other day a man who has made his mark in federal politics, a friend of honourable gentlemen opposite, expressed himself in vehement terms, in opposition to this transaction. I refer to Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, who, in a speech at Chilliwack, in the province of British Columbia, according to the Ottawa Journal, spoke thus:

> Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, K.C., speaking at a patriotic gathering at Chilliwack, B.C., on Labour Day, said that though the Borden Administration had many sins of omission and commission to answer for and though in ordinary times the Canadian Northern deal would bring shame, ignominy and defeat on the Government, he would, nevertheless, support the present Government at the coming election because it stood for the immediate enforcement of the conscription measure. The election must be a straight fight between the Conservatives under Borden and the Liberals under Laurier, he maintained. Independent and union candidates might be the means of defeating the Government candidates and allowing Laurier supporters to be elected.

This shows that the sole object of the Government in this transaction is not the advantage of the country, but simply to find means for carrying the next elections. That is the whole question.

But, honourable gentlemen, we have heard another and much stronger voice than that. A group of twenty-five financial men of Montreal have set forth, in a manifesto addressed to the Prime Minister, the strongest reasons against this transaction. I will not quote this document in full, because it has already been quoted by the honourable senator from Lanaudière; but I can state that these men are among the greatest and most intelligent business men of the country, and they are all Conservatives with the exception of perhaps one or two. They must have regarded this transaction as a most outrageous one to have set forth in this public way the reasons for their opposition to it. What reply has been given to these men? None ,so far as I know. This document has been read in this chamber, but we have not heard a single word of response. And the Government imposes this transaction on the country, by means of the closure in the other chamber, and by a different means in this chamber to obtain the same result, at a time when the financial position of the country is almost depressing. The Minister of Finance has just made in New York a loan of $100,000,000, for which he has been obliged to pay eight and a fraction per cent of interest; and this sum will not last long until we shall have to effect another loan. So the financial position of the country does not warrant such extravagance, or rather such a spoiliation of the public treasury.

The friends of the Government have been willing enough to shout "carried" or "lost" each time the minister has given them the command. Now, I protest with all the energy of which I am capable against this scandalous transaction—a transaction which is going to impose on the people of this country a debt of about $100 per head of the population, for the taking over of a railway which the Government should have been able to dispose of otherwise. The Canadian people are ready without a murmur to bear the sacrifices and the expenses of the war. But beyond that, this Government propose to impose upon them an enormous burden of six or seven hundred millions of dollars for the purpose of favouring friends. It is incredible. The Government has never been willing, at our demand, to give us the information which would warrant the people in accepting so heavy a responsibility.

Before I take my seat I may be permitted to quote the conclusion of an article published recently in a Montreal paper, which reads as follows:

In epochs of "barbarity" the bandits of high station and the ordinary highway robbers watched the moral and physical commotions of the world. Stormy nights favoured assaults on towns and chateaux. On days of riot or revolution plundering barons and independent companies made rich hauls. Under the favour of storms the sea pirates and the robbers of wrecks secured their finest harvests. With the "progress" of the times, the brigands, the true brigands, the great brigands, have singularly extended their fields of action: they operate over whole countries.

Is this not exactly our case?

Hon. Mr. LAVERGNE: It is.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I must remind the honourable senator that he has not the right to use words insulting to the other chamber. He has not the right to impute motives to the other chamber.

Hon. Mr. LEGRIS: There is not a man in this chamber more disposed to accept the decisions of the honourable the Speaker, but I believe that the words I have just quoted do not apply, either in the article or in my mouth, to the members of that chamber. (Reading):

Thanks to the venality of the press and of parliaments, thanks also to the gullibility of the public, they excite popular emotions and profit from the general aberration to plunder the nations. And what further proves their immense superiority over the plunderers of former times is that in this game they risk only the skins of others.

The stroke of the Canadian Northern is truly one of the most successful, both in the largeness of the result and in the fine audacity of the proceedings. After having cunningly whipped up the popular passions with the spectre of conscription these operators organize everywhere win-the-war conventions, talk of coalition, of national government, of extension of parliament, then of sudden dissolution—always, be it understood, for the safety of the empire, of democracy, of superior civilization. Then, when Parliament, enervated by the heat and the uncertainties of the political situation, is no longer in a condition to do anything sensibly, they carry the place by storm. The good people, hypnotized by conscription, already caught in the thicket of electoral disputes, permit without a word their backs to be laden with a burden equal to the half of the war cost and double the national debt accumulated in half century before the war.

I will not go further. This quotation expresses perfectly my thought. I conclude by saying that I believe my duty would not be accomplished if I did not raise my voice to protest against the draconian measure imposed upon us, a measure which the country condemns, but which it will have to bear, and which, especially in the existing circumstances, cannot fail to be a financial disaster for Canada, which the Government is actually dragging into bankruptcy.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I desire to move that this Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole, with instruction to amend section 1 of the said Bill by leaving out all the words after the word "Majesty" to the end of the clause, and inserting the following:

Upon the happening of any event of default mentioned in section 21 of chapter 20 of the statutes of 1914, may exercise the rights and powers mentioned in section 24 of the said Act.

Provided, however, that the Governor in Council may grant, to whomsoever may appertain, the right of reviving, within a period not exceeding five years from the passage of this Act, the equity of redemption mentioned in section 24 of chapter 20 of the said statutes upon paying all advances already made or to be made by His Majesty to or on behalf of the Canadian Northern Railway company, with such rate of interest as may be determined, and on such other terms as may be deemed proper for the protection of all other parties interested in the said Company.

The Senate divided on the proposed amendment, and the same was negatived on the following division:

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I wish to say that I did not vote on the amendment, and will not vote on other amendments, because I am paired with the honourable member from Kingston (Hon. Mr. Richardson). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Hon. Mr. L'ESPERANCE: I am paired with the honourable member for Sorel (Hon. Mr. Wilson). If I had voted, I would have voted against the amendment.

Hon. Mr. McLEAN: I am paired with the honourable member from Charlottetown (Hon. Mr. Prowse). If I had voted, I would have voted against the amendment.

Hon. Mr. YEO: I am paired with the honourable gentleman from Russell (Hon. Mr. Edwards). Had I voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I have now to make the same motion that I made yesterday, and I do not think it can be ruled out of order on the third reading of the Bill. I may say that the motion was drawn by some very clever lawyers. When I looked at it first, it looked as if it might be out of order in committee, but on second thought it appears to me that it is not opposed to the principle of the Bill. The principle of the Bill, I take it, is the purchase or the acquisition by the Government, of the Canadian Northern railway. Whether that is done in one way or another does not affect the principle of the Bill, and I think the ruling of the Chairman was wrong.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: However, there can be no question about that now. That is my opinion.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: You should not express it in that way.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I am not convinces, yet. As I am informed that we shall probably have another opportunity to discuss this matter, I will take only a few minutes of the time of the Senate. I move that the Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole House, with the instruction to strike out clause 1 and substitute therefor the following:

1. His Majesty, upon the happening of any event of defaut mentioned in section 21, chapter 20, of the statutes of 1914 (4-5 George V), may by Order in Council cause the Canadian Northern railway system mentioned in said Act to be placed under the jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court, as provided for in sections 26-28, both included, of chapter 140, of the Revised Statutes of 1906.

The amendment was negatived on the same division.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I beg to move that this Bill be not now read a third time, but be re-committed to the Committee of the Whole House to be amended by leaving out all the words after the word "Majesty," in line 4 of the first clause, so that it will read:

His Majesty, upon the happening of any event of default mentioned in section 21, chapter 20, of the statutes of 1914 (4-5 George V), may by Order in Council declare 500,000 shares of the capital stock of the Canadian Northern Company, being part of the 600,000 shares of said capital stock now held by the Minister of Finance in trust for His Majesty to be the property of the Minister of Finance in trust for His Majesty, and the same thereupon shall become the property of His Majesty.

All I wish to say in support of this amendment is that if this Senate is disposed to adopt the principle of the Government taking over the road, the principal owners of the common stock be allowed to retain a certain proportion of the stock instead of being given a cash payment or a cash bonus by arbitration. By the Act of 1914, the owners of that stock have consented to foreclosure if they were unable to carry on the enterprise. That state of default has happened, and the country will not understand why they should be given any money for an equity which, as is admitted by all, is non-existent. Between man and man, no one in Canada would think of allowing a debtor who was in the condition in which the Canadian Northern railway is, any kind of a bonus for shares that are worthless. I have stated before, and I want to repeat that there was in this Chamber, I strongly believe, a majority of members against the Bill as it came into this Chamber. There is now no such condition of things. On the contrary, there is a majority of senators in favour of the adoption of this Bill. How has that change come about? A telegram sent to the newspapers, which I take from the Montreal Star and which may give the key to the mystery, reads as follows:

Ottawa, September 7.—It is reported to-day that when the agreement based on the Canadian Northern Railway Bill is drawn up, a provision will be inserted fixing a maximum value of ten million dollars on the capital stock of the company.

Mackenzie and Mann and their interests would receive 60 per cent of any award made with the above figure as an outside, but not necessarily the minimum valuation.

The rumoured decision is attributed to objections to the Bill, voted in the Senate Conservative caucus. It would not be made as an amendment to the Bill itself, but would be inserted in the agreement after the Act passes.

Sir James Lougheed declined to-day either to confirm or deny the report. "All I can say," he told the Star, "Is that when the agreement is made the public interest will be amply safeguarded."

During the debate in the Committee of the Whole we asked for a statement from the honourable gentleman who leads the Government in this House as to the maximum figure which would appear in the agreement to be made between the Government and the parties interested. We have not been able to obtain that figure, although the representative of the Government stated that a maximum figure would be fixed. Why is that figure not disclosed? I will state what I sincerely believe to be the reason: it is the fear that there will be an outcry from the public at large if the sum of $10,000,000 is mentioned. The people of this country will not stand for allowing Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann $5,000,000 apiece for an equity which does not exist, and in consideration of work which they may have done in building up this system. They will not stand for $10,000,000 going to these men, because it is not fair, it is not common sense. In ordinary walks of life, a man builds up a fortune, but he takes whatever risks he may encounter in building up that fortune. I have said, and I repeat that, since the war and before the war, hundreds of men who had amassed fortunes by as hard work put into their private affairs as Mackenzie and Mann have ever put into theirs, and who, carried away by the wave of optimism that swept this country, went into real estate ventures and were caught by the depression which followed, have seen their fortunes wiped out. They could not turn to any paternal Government and ask it for a grant. They have stood their loss. They were left at the foot of the ladder struggling to get on their feet again. Here are Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann, in a similar position. Can it be contended that they are in need of one, or two or four millions of dollars, or more, to add to their present fortunes? Can it be contended that their position can be compared with that of hundreds of men in Canada who have gone down? The Hindus have a special prayer which will appeal to many: "My Lord, I do not ask any wealth; I only pray that you place me by the side of those who have." Early in their youth Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann may have prayed for such a state of things. They did not look for wealth, but they got near those who had it—the provincial governments, the municipalities, and the Federal Government. They got in contact with the wealth; they got the support of the municipalities, the provinces, and the Federal Government. With the hundreds of millions that they had to do with, they succeeded in building up private fortunes. Their position is not like that of an ordinary man who has had to struggle along. That is the reason why the Government is afraid to disclose the fact that they will place at the disposal of those two men $10,000,000. They are afraid to do so. I venture to prophesy that they will not disclose that sum before the electors go to the polls. They may sign the agreement before, but they will not disclose the fact that those men will have within their graps $10,000,000 of the people's money. We have just passed a Bill by which we have conscripted wealth in order to carry on the war, and now this Government is conscripting the wealth of the people to put $10,000,000 in the hands of Mackenzie and Mann.

Hon. Mr. GLORAN: Is there any answer from the Government?

The proposed amendment was negatived on the same division.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I propose to move an amendment that will definitely put the House on record, and I am sure it will be seconded by the honourable member from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross), judging from his remarks two weeks ago on the Judges Bill. I move to strike out the word "arbitration" in the twelfth line of section 1, and replace it by the words "Exchequer Court of Canada." It is now necessary to send the Bill back to the committee for the change of that word. The honourable member for Middleton two weeks ago in this House drew attention to the question of judges leaving their judicial duties in order to act as commissioners, a practice to which he seriously objected. I took the same view, and said it was very prejudicial to the judges themselves to act as commissioners in matters which are often political. This very Bill is a political Bill of the worst kind; and to bring down a judge from the Bench, as it is proposed to do with Chief Justice Meredith, will tend to make the public lose the confidence they ought to have in that judge, whatever be his position or his impartiality in matters coming before him in Toronto. I am sure that the honourable member from Middleton will feel as I do, that judges should not be mixed up in commissions especially in cases like this one. I think it ought to be sufficient to refer to the legislation that has been passed in the direction I have mentioned some days ago, and that amendment should carry.

The proposed amendment was negatived on the same division.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I would move to amend clause 3—

The SPEAKER: I would draw the honourable gentleman's attention to the fact that he has already made a motion and spoken to it.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: I move that section 3 be amended by adding in the seventh line, on page 2, after the words "million dollars," the following:

And provided also that no part of the said sum of $25,000,000 shall be used in payment of debts incurred by others than the Canadian Northern Railway company, or of any company included in the Canadian Northern railway system, and incurred for the exclusive benefit of such company.

The proposed amendment was negatived on the same division.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I move that the following section be added to subsection 3 of section 4:

Provided further that the contractors, as defined in the agreement annexed to chapter 20 of the statutes (4-5 George V), will not at any time make or seek to enforce any claim for contractor's profits, commissions or otherwise against the Canadian Northern, or against any of tthe constituent or subsidiary companies, upon or in respect of any express or implied contract, understanding, agreement, or stipulation of any kind, heretofore or hereafter made, whereby or whereunder they, or any one or more of them, may now or hereafter be entitled to receive from the Canadian Northern, or from any of the constituent or subsidiary companies any construction profits, in respect of work heretofore undertaken, or as consideration for transfers of properties, rights or franchises already transferred, or to be transferred, or for commission or remuneration for services in financing, or for any other services heretofore rendered, and all such claims are hereby by them and each of them absolutely renounced and released.

The proposed amendment was negatived on the same division.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I move to substitute the word "first day of May, 1917" for the words "date of the said agreement" in lines 26 and 27, section 4 (2).

The proposed amendment was negatived on the same division.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: I desire to move an amendment, because I believe that when a man gets back all money that he has put into this enterprise, with interest added, this country has done all that British justice should demand, and I believe the sentiment of the country is behind that position. My amendment is to add the end of section 3 (1), line 11, on page 2, the following:

An provided also that, as regards any indebtedness for moneys advanced to the Canadian Northern Railway company of to any company included in the Canadian Northern railway system, and taking rank after the mortgage held by the Minister of Finance in trust for His Majesty under the Act of 1914 (4-5 George V), no payment be made of such indebtedness beyond the actual amount received by said company or companies with interest, said amount thus received to be ascertained by the Exchequer Court of Canada.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I proposed this amendment in committee, and I have the honour of seconding it before this Chamber now. I desire to repeat this simple fact, that I am duly informed by men who know the situation that if this amendment were passed from $25,000,000 to $50,000,000 would be saved to the people of Canada.

The proposed amendment was negatived on the same division.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I wish to submit the amendment that I proposed last night in committee to add, after the word "property" in line 45, section 4 (2), the following words:

The award shall be subject to the approval of Parliament.

It seems to me that that amendment ought to be accepted unanimously by the honourable gentlemen of this House, because it means that we should trust Parliament. I speak on behalf of the western portion of the Dominion of Canada, which has not the representation in Parliament to-day to which it is entitled. Parliament to-day, we might say, is sitting as a moribund Parliament, after their time for election is past due twelve months; they are sitting here by the grace of their own votes in Parliament extending their own time; and I say that the people's representatives should be consulted in a matter of this great importance. The western portion of Canada is more vitally interested in the Canadian Northern railway than any other part of the Dominion, and we should have that representation in the House of Commons before this matter is decided on. The Government is embarking on a new policy, government ownership of railways, and they are doing that without any license of the electors of Canada. If there is any one thing that should commend itself to the members of this House it is that Parliament should be consulted on this award. I am not going to criticise the gentleman who is nominated as arbitrator, the Chief Justice of the province of Ontario, but I know that in another place a gentleman who had some experience with him on a commission a few months ago said that he was one of the most unfit men for that position. There appears to be a lack of confidence in that gentleman for that position. I believe that the Exchequer Court, which was established especially for determining matters of this kind, should deal with this matter. We have had evidence given here by the honourable gentleman from De Lanaudière (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) that in the Quebec and Saguenay railway arbitration, notwithstanding that the Government's counsel admitted evidence in regard to claims amounting to a million and a quarter dollars, the judge of the Exchequer Court decided against the Government's representative and saved the country that large amount. That goes to show what evidence can be submitted to a commision of that kind, a commission in which the people have no confidence. This Government has been governing by commissions in the last few years; if one did not suit them they appointed another, and they kept on appointing commissions until they got a report that suited them. I have no doubt, from the debate that has taken place here and the attitude of the supporters of the Government in this House and in the other Chamber, and from what we have heard from the Government, that the cue will be given by that Government to the board of arbitrators as to what the award shall be. It has been suggested to this House that we should fix a maximum. So far as Mackenzie and Mann are concerned, I expressed myself last night. Those men are enterprising, but, as has been explained, they are not entitled to any particular consideration at this stage of this particular game. They have had large amounts of money placed at their disposal by municipalities, by provincial governments, and by the Federal Government from both political parties; and if those gentlemen had applied to the railroad all the resources that they received they would not be here to-day in a bankrupt condition. If we are going to start out with government ownership of railways, we should make a good start. In Manitoba we had some experience of government ownership when the Government bought out the telephone business from the Bell Company without consulting the people or the legislature, paying at least a million dollars more than it would have cost to purchase a telephone service. It will be the same with this railway; if it costs more than it should, the people will have to pay. Canada has had experience of government ownership in the Intercolonial railway, which has never paid, and, as I am assured, is never expected to pay; and, from what we hear from honourable gentlemen from the Maritime Provinces, they do not get as good a service from the Intercolonial as from private-owned lines. I have no hesitation in saying that I am not in favour of government railways, but I believe in government control not only of railways but of other things. I believe that individual enterprise is stifled by governments taking hold of such things. I am in favour of government control of railways and other utilities for the comfort and benefit of the people of Canada, and of government control of rates and regulations for those services, and I am firmly convinced that with a strong railway commission such as we have had in the past, the people would get a better service by government control of those different lines of railway operated by private enterprise. I have no hesitation in saying that the amount named by my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) is correct, and that if the holders of unsecured claims are dealt with by arbitrators, as suggested in this Bill, this railway will cost this country fifty or sixty millions more than it should. Every honourable gentleman in this House, who has had to do with prosecuting government claims of private individuals, knows that as a rule the Government is an easy mark. Whether by commission or otherwise, they get the Government to yield to the demand. Why should we pass legislation that gives an opportunity for lobbying through claims, when we have it within our power to take possession of this road under the legislation passed in 1914? I trust that this House will adopt this amendment, and that the award will be submitted to Parliament for ratification when we have a full representation of our western provinces, and when other provinces of the Dominion will be represented as they should be, because at the present time they hold eight seats more than they should, which means that the West is handicapped, so far as this legislation is concerned, to the extent of thirty-three votes. If this important matter is to be dealt with fairly it should be dealt with by a Parliament that fairly represents the people.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Cloran, the debate was adjourned.

CANADJAN NORTHERN RAILWAY ACQUISITION BILL.

THIRD READING.

The Senate resumed the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed for the third reading of Bill 125, an Act providing for the acquisition by His Majesty of the capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway company, and the amendment of Hon. Mr. Watson.

Hon. H. J. CLORAN: I wish to address myself not so much to this honourable House as to the Government. During this debate questions have been asked for the purpose of securing information, which, if answered by the Government—and I think they will be—will be for the benefit of the taxpayers of this country. I have been asked whether under the provisions of this Bill the Government becomes full and sole proprietor of all the properties of the Canadian Northern system, including the allied and subsidiary companies. My answer to the citizens of Canada, who have asked that, was that I was under the impression that such would be the case. But I am not positive on the point. I told them that I would try to secure from the Government a clear, plain, and concise declaration of what the Government was coming into possession of after the passage of this Bill. That is a fair proposition. The humblest citizen of Canada has a right to ask his master what has become of his wages, and that is the position that we are in here to-day. Even a cat may look at a king, and I hope that in Canada, a democratic country, the humblest citizen thereof may look the Government in the face and ask for information. Under the terms and provisions of this Bill does the Government undertake, the ownership and proprietorship not only of all properties belonging to the Canadian Northern system, but of those of the allied companies or subsidiary companies, or of any other company connected with the railroad system? If so, does the Government intend to operate this railroad system in its entirely? Does the Government intend to assume all responsibilities of this ownership on the passage of this law? These are questions which have been put by very humble citizens, and which I have the honour to put to the Government on their behalf.

Another question is this. When the Government takes over all the properties of railways and other institutions, will the Government operate the same in the same manner as the Intercolonial railway is operated? The taxpayers of Canada are entitled to that information, and I really do not think their master, the Government, should refuse to give that information.

Another question was asked: what are the properties to be acquired by the Government under the terms and provisions of this Bill? I could not answer that question. I said that I would ask the Government and get an official answer. I ask the Government for a complete list of the properties owned by the Canadian Northern Railway company, its allied and subsidiary companies, what under the provisions of this Bill are to become the properties of the Dominion Government, I ask that we should get a detailed, clear, precise statement of those properties, so that the people will be able to judge how much value they are getting for this delivery of the Dominion's money over to Sir William Mackenzie, Sir Donald Mann and their associates. These are fair and proper questions. These are questions that every subject, every taxpayer of Canada, has a right to put to the Government, and it is the duty and obligation of the Government of the day to answer the men who have kept them in power for the past six years.

We have a form of democratic government. It is true that the men who hold the reins of office are the administrators, but the real masters in a democratic country are the humble voters, the poor taxpayers. They are the real masters of the situation, and why the servants of the people should refuse this information is more than I can understand. I am not going to presume that the Government will refuse to its master what he has a right to know, for what he is paying his taxes. These are questions altogether apart from party interests or partisanship. They are simply business questions, and I hope the leader of the Government will make an effort to obtain from his colleagues, or from whatever department is in control, the information required by the common people of the country. I know that the honourable the leader of the Government in this Senate cannot answer questions offhand. The way in which he does answer questions is simply marvellous. He answers questions relating to some fifteen or seventeen departments in a way that is simply amazing, and I hope he will take this in good part on behalf of the people whom he represents and that this information will be given to the country. I can assure honourable gentlemen that I have absolutely no party motive in putting this question. I simply ask the Government to put itself in a position of self-defence. I am trying to aid the Government to strengthen its case in demanding that this Bill should be passed by Parliament. That is all I have to say. I think it is quite sufficient to cover the demands made upon me, which I have been unable to answer, and which I ask the Government to answer for me in the name of the people of Canada.

The proposed amendment was negatived.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Before the motion for the third reading of the Bill is put, I want to say a few words, and move possibly the last amendment to this motion.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Honourable gentlemen seem very pleased to think that they will have got rid of these amendments. They may have been troublesome amendments for honourable gentlemen, but they have been moved for the purpose of putting on record the views held by honourable gentlemen on this side of the House as to the way in which this legislation should be amended in order to safeguard the interests of the country in dealing with this question.

When this Bill was introduced into this Chamber, we approached it with every desire to make this legislation as perfect and defensible as possible, and for that purpose we asked that we should have an opportunity of obtaining all the information that could be obtained in regard to it. Unfortunately the leader of the Government did not see his way to meet us in that matter. Therefore, when we came to the committee stage of the Bill, we moved these amendments for the purpose of amending, if we could, the Bill in such a way that the interests of the country would be safeguarded. I presume that our powers of persuasion have not been sufficiently strong to persuade a sufficient number of honourable gentleman to share the views that we placed before this House so that this legislation might be strengthened. We have dealt with this matter from the point of view that the Government in coming to the assistance of this company, should follow out the recommendations made to them by the commission especially appointed by them for the purpose of inquiring into the railway situation in Canada. We took the stand that the Government should follow the recommendations of that commission in placing a value upon this organization and should have followed the procedure outlined in the Act of 1914, under which they had every power to deal with this situation, and by which they were placed in a position to safeguard the country from having to pay for liabilities and indebtedness, which so far have not been disclosed. We dealt with the question of the balance-sheets that have been brought down and presented to the House and to the people, and I think we may claim to have shown that a great deal more information should be given to the country with regard to these balance-sheets before the people will be in a position to understand what liability they are incurring in taking over this railway. We have tried by these amendments to ensure that no liabilities other than those that can be properly charged aganist the Canadian Northern Railway system shall be paid for by the Government. There has been a suspicion in the minds of a great many people in the country that there are other liabilities outside of those that are legitimately chargeable to the Canadian Northern railway system, and which, if the Government is not very careful in dealing with this matter, they may find that they will have to pay; and that the country will consequently be called upon to pay not only liabilities that may possibly be fairly and squarely charged up against the Canadian Northern railway system, but also other liabilities that should not be taken into account at all. Further than that, we have tried to show to the House that the question of payment to Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann for services which they claim to have rendered in the past, should not be taken into consideration in as much as a special arrangement was made in the Act of 1914 that in case of default they would not be allowed to take those matters into consideration. But we have not met with any success in trying to amend the clauses of this Bill in the way in which we think it should be amended. We have found that honourable gentlemen on the other side of the House were satisfied with the statement made by the leader of the Government that in the agreement which is to be made between the Government and the members of this railway company, certain conditions and terms will be placed. I want to point out to the honourable gentlemen who are satisfied with an arrangement of that kind, that this agreement which is to be made between the Government and the men interested in this railway is more or less of a private arrangement. An agreement of this kind cannot have any hold further than the assurance that has been given to us by my honourable friend the leader of the Government in this House. While we thoroughly believe that he is honest in the statement he has made and desirous of carrying out the terms as he has stated them to the House, at the same time we know that he is only one of the members of the Cabinet, and it is sometimes difficult for one honourable gentleman to force his views on his fellow members; and we have found that the Cabinet has not been able to carry out, or at any rate has not carried out, the statements they made to the country in 1914 when they brought down the Act granting to these people the $45,000,000 guarantee. So, although we give the honourable gentleman credit for doing all that he can, it is with great hesitation and doubt that we view the drawing up of this agreement, and we shall have to hold those honourable gentlemen who appear to be satisfied by the statement made by the honourable leader of the Government, responsible to see that these sections are carried out in the agreement and that the country is safeguarded as we consider it should be.

To show how this question is viewed in the country I want to read a statement that appeared in a Toronto paper, Saturday Night, of September 8th. I do not know who the editor of this paper is, but I am told the paper is friendly to the Government and is widely read throughout this country. The article is as follows:

> By means of Governmental procedure greatly in vogue in circles favoured by the Kaiser, the Canadian Northern Purchase Bill has been shoved through the House. Debate upon the Bill was summarily cut off by closure proceedings. We are going to acquire the Canadian Northern railway, which in itself is all right, but we do not know what we are going to pay for it, which is all wrong. Why this unseemly haste? If there are financial irregularities back of this deal, as so many seem to think, all the more reason for taking our time over its consideration. Why are the people footing the Bill not entitled to the fullest information? For two months or more the National Service Bill was before the House. Was a closure introduced to shove through the measure, when unquestionably such a proceeding would have been in the public interest? It was not. But when we come to the purchase of a transcontinental system we railroad it through at express train speed, regardless of expense. We do not even inquire what it is going to cost.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: May I be permitted to remind the honourable member that he is not in order in reading from a paper printed outside reflecting upon anything being done in the House.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Since when?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: But this is dealing with the Bill that is before the House.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Go ahead.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Antiquated.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: You may say, "Go ahead," but if you will excuse me I think it is the duty of every member to maintain as far as possible the rules of the House, and I could not allow this to pass, coming from the high source that it does, without reference to it, so that at least it would be known.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Go on.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: We want to hear it if you do not.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The article continues:

The whole proceeding is so utterly absurd that it seems almost impossible to believe that a man of Sir Thomas White's business experience would have been a party to it. Would Sir Thomas White buy a trust company or acquire a controlling interest in a bank by the same method? Would he say, "We will take over the securities which you have in the safe, and as for the stock we will just appoint a few arbitrators to fix the price," not knowing whether the price is to be "one dollar and other considerations," or sixty or possibly a hundred millions.

Probably there was no more surprised man at the manner in which this Bill was jammed through Parliament than Sir William Mackenzie himself. Never in his wildest flight of imagination did Sir William anticipate so favourable a deal. In proof of this it may be stated with authority that Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann, and the interests which they represent would have been content with much less than is now in prospect for them. Eliminating the hope of further financial assistance from the Government to tide them over their immediate difficulties, Sir William Mackenzie, facing the inevitable, would have deemed the deal satisfactory had an "honorarium" of very modest diminsions been passed on from the Government into the coffers of Mackenzie and Mann. A few millions would have turned the trick so far as the builders and nominal owners of the Canadian Northern railway are concerned.

That gives an idea of the way the people in the country are looking at this transaction.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Or rather the way Saturday Night is looking at it, not the people.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Well, that paper as representing the city from which these gentlemen—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, it is simply Saturday Night looking at it in that way.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The views of a paper published in the city of Toronto, in which these gentlemen live, and a paper which I think is widely read not only throughout Ontario but also in the West. This transaction, if it goes through, will render the country liable for a large sum of money, and increase the liabilities of Canada. During this session we have been increasing the taxation on the people to a considerable extent for the purpose of enabling the country to prosecute the war and pay the enormous expenses that the country is called on to place upon itself for the purpose of prosecuting the war; but if the Government is going to use this money for the purpose of helping out this railway and the people connected with it, I think the country will look with very great jealousy on money being spent in that way. We have to remember that one of the provinces has already been brought into a very serious financial position because of the amount of assistance it has given to this and another railway. I think if the people of that province had an opportunity to-day of retracing their steps, they would rescind the action they took some years ago when they agreed to make themselves responsible in the way they did for liabilities in connection with this railway. They are finding to their cost that the policy pursued at that time is now coming back on them and causing them to pay taxes that they never dreamed of when they agreed to that policy being carried out. If this transaction is not handled properly and very carefully, I fear very much that we shall find the Dominion of Canada placed in the same position as that province occupies to-day. I think we should have put into this legislation the proper restrictions to safeguard the country from such a thing happening. With these remarks I propose to move:

That the word "not" be inserted before the word "now" in the motion, and that the following words be added thereto: "but be read the third time this day six months."

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: This Bill has been passed without Parliament receiving what I would call the essential elementary information without which this Bill could not have been intelligently understood and discussed. But that information will have to be given some time or other, soon or late —the sooner the better. When it is given, and when the public of Canada becomes apprised of the real terms and conditions under which this agreement has been made, and under which it is going to be consummated, I have not the slightest doubt that the revolt against this Bill which was shown only a few days ago by the leading business men of Canada in the metropolis of this Dominion will extend very largely throughout the country; and I feel quite certain that the next Government, whatever may be its composition, will be driven to the necessity of considering the obligation of remedying, so far as can be done at that time, the evils which will have been caused in the meantime by the passage of this legislation. I think that the people of Canada generally and especially those who seek to secure to themselves the benefits of this Bill, ought to understand that they will be called upon to give an account of whatever may have been done thereunder; and I should think and hope that the next Government will call for a very strict account of what may have been done with the money of the people of Canada under the provisions of this Bill, passed in the way I have said. At a date not very far off this matter will have to be investigated and the iniquity perpetrated under it will have to be remedied as far as that can be done. I think I voice the feelings of gentlemen on this side of the House in saying that they will press on the next Government the necessity of repealing this legislation as far as possible or of remedying the evils under it. I think the people of Canada ought to understand that. I think that gentlemen who are going to act or speculate under the provisions of this Act ought to know that the matter is going to be subjected to investigation and to strict accounting later on, and even to complete repeal.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Nobody seems to want to rise on the other side of the House. We have been like anglers, casting our flies across, but we are not getting a rise. I always understood that the word Parliament, which is an old French word, meant a place where men talked. In French we have the words "parlement" and "parlementer," which means to debate; so honourable gentlemen on the Government side should talk up and try to defend this Bill if they can possibly do it. It has been my privilege in this House to make very lengthy remarks and give very long statements of figures. I gave those figures the greatest amount of consideration, and I was very careful, because I was sure that not only the leader of the Government but other gentlemen here were versed in figures. I see the honourable gentleman from Amherst (Hon. Mr. Curry), who handles millions, who presents to his shareholders great balance-sheets, and then to think he does not say a thing about this matter. Now, this is the last call I make about it. I want the honourable gentleman to tell us whether we are all wrong. He said we should get an accountant to show us. This is the last call, because we are going to have a third reading and the thing will be all over.

I would not have risen to say very much on this occasion if the honourable member for Kingston (Hon. Mr. Richardson) had not, after saying something complimentary about my speech in this House, said that I partly spoiled it by making a charge against the present Minister of Finance, Sir Thomas White. Well, I do not take back the words I said. I read extracts from the Toronto Globe of a letter written by Mr. R. J. Reid, K.C., of Toronto, a well-known Conservative worker, and I said that what he had written was prophetic, for things had turned out exactly as he said. I do not go back on that; on the contrary, I reaffirm that I believe every word he wrote, and in the bright sunlight of to-day I think we have the very best proof that he knew exactly what he was saying. It is no disgrace to the Minister of Finance if he was not always a Conservative, if he belonged to the Liberal party. It shows that there must be some very good men in the Liberal party, according to the gentlemen on the other side, when they think that the only man they can trust with the key of the strong box is a Liberal. They had looked in vain from the boisterous and steep shores of the stormy Atlantic right to the Pacific where the balmy breezes blow, and from the international boundary between Canada and the greatest republic to the south of us on which the sun ever shone, away back to the frozen ocean at the North Pole. There in that immense space stood Robert Laird Borden, with his arms folded, looking up and down the country for one good, honest Conservative that he could trust with the keeping of the money of Canada. He looked over New Brunswick, but found none there. Then he looked over Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, but there were none. He just jumped over Quebec because there were only Nationalists there, and he would not trust his allies, for he did not know the time they might go back on him. Then he went to Ontario, where he had seventy-three followers, but he would not trust any of them, although there were some who had stood by the Liberal-Conservative party, and some who are here now, suggested Hon. Mr. Foster—he was not Sir George then; but Mr. Borden said that would never do—there was the story of the Union Trust Company, and he could not have him. Then he went to Manitoba. Somebody in a whisper said, "There is the Hon. Robert Rogers." He replied: "Oh, that would never do; we will have to let him by." Then they went to Saskatchewan, but they were all Liberals that had been elected. Alberta was the same. In British Columbia all they could find was a nice, polished gentleman and they made him Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Burrell, a nice, quiet man who never offended anybody, never set the Thames on fire, and never will. Mr. White was looked upon. Nobody had ever heard much about him, he had made one speech in Massey Hall in which he said he was a Liberal, but he was not very well known in the Liberal party either; he was not even a candidate. However, it is a historical fact that Sir William Mackenzie came down to Ottawa at the formation of the Borden Government, and camped right here and stayed with the job, and he had many of his own men, of his own best friends, put into the Government. It is no disparagement to the Minister of Finance that he had some friends to suggest his name to the present Prime Minister; if he had had no friends he would never have been chosen. Now, who were his friends?—that is the question. In the first place, Sir William Mackenzie; in the next place, Mr. Lash; then, his own uncle, Mr. Fleming, the manager for Mackenzie and Mann; then there was Sir Edmund Byron Walker. Those were his friends, and there was Mr. Flavelle, commonly called Lord Bacon. Those were the gentlemen who recommended him, and he has been faithful to those gentlemen. He has gratitude of the heart, and every session since he has been Finance Minister he has given them abundantly, as everybody knows.

I could recite all the money that has been given to this undertaking year in and year out; and when we gave the larger amount, guaranteeing $45,000,000, I said from my place in this Senate that I believed that would not save the enterprise. At that time I thought, as did many others, that it was doomed; it was bound some time to become insolvent; and to-day we have a verification of my words out of the mouth of the leader of the Government, who admits that it is insolvent, though not bankrupt. Well, there is not very much distinction between the two words. I believe the Government has gone about this matter in the wrong way from the start. Before talking of giving value to the stock, I think an inventory should have been taken of the liabilities. That would be elementary. If the liabilities had been taken, and an amount fixed, showing that the road was worth so much, then after that would come the equity, whatever it might be; but some amount should have been fixed. Suppose we counted the liabilities at $400,000,000, which would be a good price to pay for that road, and then said that anything above that figure we would allow on the stock. But if no amount is fixed, and the liabilities should run up to $500,000,000 or $600,000,000, as the matter stands to-day we are still to have a discussion about the value of the equity in the stock. When you are buying a property of any kind you look at the amount of the mortgages on it; but this transaction has been arranged as if the seller of a house or a farm should say to you, "Oh, never mind the mortgage; how much are you going to give me?" By this Bill we say: "We do not mind the amount of the liabilities; we will arbitrate to find the value of the equity." But before you arbitrate you ought to fix a price. Though I have waded through a thousand columns of Hansard in the other House I have never been able to find that the Government have said: "We will have an equity above a certain amount; we will fix the amount, and then if the liabilities do not run up to that amount, anything above them will be arbitrated, and we will give something for the stock." That has not been done.

The honourable senator from Lethbridge (Hon. Mr. De Veber) showed how the promoters of the Edmonton and Calgary railway, some of this same group, had managed to build that road for less than $10,000 a mile, and had bonded it for over $18,000 a mile, and received 6,400 acres a mile of land subsidy, and how they made a clean profit of $8,000,000 out of that one enterprise, and still owned the road. That showed that roads on the prairie could be built for $10,000 a mile.

Suppose we put this road in at even a high price. There are 9,513 miles of which 3,200 miles are main line. Suppose we put the main line at an average of $60,000 a mile, a very fair price, that makes $192,000,000. If you put the branch lines at $25,000 a mile—150 per cent more than it cost to build the road we heard about—you will get a price of $157,825,000; making a grand total of $349,825,000 for the whole thing. Now that is putting it at a good price. I could tell you of railways that have been bought by practical men and what they paid; and when the Drayton-Acworth report puts the value of this road at four hundred and two million dollars they give a good round figure. That valuation was made much more carefully than the one I am giving you now, yet the difference between them is not more that 11 per cent. The valuation made for the Drayton-Acworth report was very thorough, over 120 men having worked for three months on it, with professor Swain at the head of the staff. He is recognized as an expert in the United States, and he associated with himself the best engineers, with first assistants of his own, and the others were engineers taken from Canada. They were sent from one end of the Canadian Northern to the other and were told to find out exactly the value of the right of way, of the work, of the stations, and even of the property in the city of Montreal. The Government might have said: "We will accept the report as far as that valuation is concerned; we have this amount of $402,000,000; now, if your liabilities do not run over $402,000,000 we will arbitrate and see what the stock is worth; if your liabilities run over that we cannot arbitrate about the stock." That would have been a fair and honest proposition. But they did not do that at all; they simply went it blind, and refused absolutely to disclose any amount of the liabilities.

There is one point in reference to the financial group who are the friends of Sir Thomas White. Honourable gentlemen need not believe that this money is going to Mackenzie and Mann. I know whereof I speak when I say that neither Sir Donald Mann nor Sir William Mackenzie was specially anxious to have this deal go through; but the financiers and the Shylocks got them by the throat and said: "We want to realize our money; we have dragged this along, and now is the time to pass it, when everybody is thinking about the war, when some of us do not know whether our sons and brothers are alive at the time we are speaking." If the people of this country were in their sober senses they would not think of such a thing; But under the shadow of this war and with a majority in both branches of Parliament, now is the time to put this through. It is not for Sir William Mackenzie and Sir Donald Mann. No. They cherished their enterprise. They had worked at it for 25 years. Their dream was to have a transcontinental railway with a large mileage and operate it. They could have dealt with the present situation for at least 60 cents on the dollar less than it can be done under government control. They could do as much for one dollar as the Government could do for two. However, it is the group that was persistent to have their own Finance Minister, even if he had to be taken from outside of the Conservative party, or the party which carried the election—and he has been faithful to them, so far as he is concerned, they have nothing to complain of. That is the group; it is not Mackenzie and Mann.

One further word before I close. We know that if the Government takes over this railway, as the Canadian Northern runs from Winnipeg to Quebec, and as the Government has taken over the National Transcontinental railway, there will be two railways running between the same two points. The mileage on the Transcontinental railway is 1,351 miles. The other day I asked for the official figures, and I have got them. The mileage by the Canadian Northern railway between Quebec and Winnipeg is 1,641 miles—a difference of nearly 300 miles. Now, I ask, is there any sane man who will say that the Government, owning both lines and consequently having the choice in shipping either way, will ever think of sending any freight by the Canadian Northern 300 miles further than necessary, when there is a better route with easier grades? I have not been given figures as to the adverse grades; but I state here on my reputation as an engineer that the grades are much easier, much less adverse, by one-half at least, on the National Transcontinental than on the Canadian Northern. I have not been successful in obtaining figures, although I asked for them more than three weeks ago. What will be the use of that other line, the Canadian Northern, in the hands of the Canadian Government when the Government have the National Transcontinental, which is 300 miles shorter, has better grades, and is a better road? Will they ever send one car over the Canadian Northern between Winnipeg and Quebec? If they do send any Canadian Northern freight between those two points, it is simply a waste of money to haul freight 300 miles for nothing. I do not believe they will do that.

I regret having taken up so much of the time of the House; but before the third reading is given to this Bill, if honourable gentlemen on the other side would rise and discuss this matter for the last time, perhaps they might find some arguments which we on this side of the House have so far failed to find in defence of the proposal.

Hon. ROBERT WATSON: At the risk of wearying the House I propose for a few minutes to make some further remarks in reference to this Bill. I do so inasmuch as it happened to fall to my lot to be present apparently at the funeral of the Canadian Northern railway as I was present at its birth. I happened to be a member of the Manitoba Government who signed the first guaranteed bonds that were ever given to the Canadian Northern railway. I believe those bonds were the first bonds ever signed in Canada for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a railway. We adopted that policy because we were poor and did not have sufficient money to give cash, but our credit was good and we were able to give the guarantee. For these reasons I claim the indulgence of this honourable House for a few minutes in giving a little of the history of the Canadian Northern and of railroading in the West. I assure you I will not take long, and my only purpose in taking up the time of this House is to give some information which I have been asked for in regard to these matters.

In 1881 the Canadian Pacific railway charter was granted. It included a monopoly clause, section 15, which gave the Canadian Pacific railway a monopoly in the province of Manitoba and the Northwest Territories for 21 years. That clause was very objectionable to the people of Manitoba, and a vigorous fight was made at the time. However, it was passed.

I was elected a member of the House of Commons first in 1882, and fought against that monopoly, because the province of Manitoba was insisting on the passing of a charter for a railway in that province, which was disallowed by the Federal Government. We were determined to have railway competition. It is not necessary to say that the freight rates of the Canadian Pacific railway were very exorbitant. I myself was in the milling business and could have my freight carried by ox-carts and ponies more cheaply than over the Canadian Pacific railway, which was the only railway in the country. Westward as far as Minnedosa, a distance of 85 miles, freight was carried by teams at a lower rate than that of the railway. Those were the conditions existing in Manitoba. Western Canada did not exist at that time, so far as population was concerned, and even in Manitoba the population was sparse. In the province of Manitoba the excitement was very intense, and so determined were the people of the province to have railroads that the Government themselves undertook to build a railroad, known as the Red River Valley railroad, without granting any charter. Unfortunately, the Government could not finance the enterprise, and they failed. The Norquay government was defeated—went down and out.

The Greenway Government came into power in 1887 and they took up the fight. They built a road from Emerson to Winnipeg and financed it? They also built a railroad from Winnipeg to Portage la Prairie. In 1887 they negotiated with the Northern Pacific, which was a most convenient road for them to connect with to the south. The fight continued in 1888 and Manitoba was almost on the verge of rebellion. Men actually went out with arms to force a crossing at a place known as Fort Whyte, at the crossing of the Canadian Pacific railway and the Southwestern, in the Red River valley, and troops were called out for the purpose of defending that crossing. That was the condition of affairs in Manitoba.

The Greenway Government when it came into power negotiated with the Northern Pacific and arranged for them to extend their lines into Manitoba. In 1888 the Federal disallowance of our railways was done away with, the Federal Government giving the Canadian Pacific railway a guarantee of $15,000,000 in consideration of the abolition of section 15. We had reason to believe at that time, and I believe still, that Lord Lansdowne was the man who took a hand in effecting that settlement. Then the Northern Pacific came in and built lines of railway in Manitoba for a cash subsidy of $1,750 a mile. It was a low subsidy at that time, but they were anxious to make a connection and get business. They had the friendship of the Government. For a time the people of Manitoba had the advantage of the competition between the Northern Pacific and the Canadian Pacific, and from that we derived a benefit in rates and service, which was doing the country a great deal of good. Of course, the Red River Valley railway was turned over to the Northern Pacific when it came in. That provided competition and gave a better railway service to the central and southern portions of the province of Manitoba. There was at that time no settlement in Saskatchewan. The northern portion of Manitoba wanted railways.

Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann at that time were building the road which was referred to the other day by my honourable friend from Lethbridge (Hon. Mr. De Veber), the Calgary and Edmonton railway. They were railway builders. They came to Manitoba and made a proposition that if they could secure a charter that was then in existence, the charter of a railway known as the Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal company, which was then controlled by Mr. Charles Mackintosh and the Davises of Ottawa—if they could secure that charter and a guarantee, by the Manitoba Government, they would complete the road. They secured what was known then as the Hudson Bay railway charter, which carried with it a subsidy and land grant; and they secured from the Ottawa people the charter of the Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal Company. The Manitoba Government guaranteed the bonds for the building of that road, $8,000 per mile, at 5 per cent. They proceeded to build the road. Of course, there was at that time opposition, as might be expected. It was said: "We shall have to pay the interest." But, as a matter of fact, that road paid interest from the first year of its operation under the present vice-president of the Canadian Northern railway system, Mr. D. B. Hanna, as general manager. Mr. Hanna will tell to-day that he operated that road of some hundred miles, when the staff consisted of himself, a boy, and nine men, including the train crew, section men, and all the rest, and got enough freight to make the road pay.

That was the condition of affairs until the campaign of 1899, when Hugh John Macdonald succeeded in defeating the Greenway Government, of which I was a member. The main cry of Hugh John Macdonald at that time was government ownership of railways, and when Hugh John Macdonald came into power, he, honest man as he was, immediately proceeded to carry out his pledge; and he made a contract for a Government-owned railway from Winnipeg to Duluth. They were to get certain aid from the province and certain aid in Minnesota. I have seen that contract. It was a good contract, honestly drawn in favor of the province of Manitoba, and we had that promise of government ownership of railroads.

Hugh John Macdonald was put aside by some manœuvres and Mr. R. P. Roblin came in as Premier. Shortly afterwards he called to his assistance Mr. Rogers, the late Minister of Public Works in the Dominion Government, as the Minister of Public Works for Manitoba. The Government gave guarantees for the extension of the Canadian Northern, but not at $8,000 per mile. For a road which had paid its interest the Government increased the guarantees to $10,000 per mile. A very peculiar thing in connection with the agreement—

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: If I understand the situation, the Roblin Government ceased to grant cash subsidies, and instead of granting a cash subsidy they gave a guarantee of the bonds of the road.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: If my honourable friend will just listen to me he will understand. I have said that in 1896 the Government guaranteed the bonds at $8,000 a mile.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: You gave the money; the Roblin Government gave a guarantee, on which they were never called upon to pay.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: The honourable gentleman is mistaken.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I am not mistaken.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: We gave a guarantee to the Canadian Northern of $8,000 per mile. We gave the Northern Pacific a cash subsidy of $1,750 a mile. As I have just mentioned, the Greenway Government was the first government to secure the construction of railways in Canada by the guaranteeing of bonds.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I think the honourable gentleman is mistaken. His government gave a cash subsidy.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I am satisfied I am not mistaken. The Roblin Government increased the guarantee to $10,000 a mile, but, strange to say, they gave that additional guarantee of $2,000 a mile on a road already built on a guarantee of $8,000 a mile. Why it was done is a mystery, or perhaps these gentlemen can explain it. They did more than that. The Greenway Government had absolute security. The roadbed, track, stations, terminals, locomotives, rolling stock of all descriptions, were our security for the $8,000 a mile. The Roblin Government released the company from those securities, and all that the bondholders and the Government had for the guarantee were two streaks of rust, the dump, and the right of way. More than that, the Government guaranteed $1,500,000 on the terminals in Winnipeg.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Have they ever paid a cent on it?

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I am telling the honourable gentleman what happened. They gave that guarantee. They gave a guarantee also, you will find, on all the Canadian Northern rolling stock—locomotives, coaches, and so on—though these were the property of a rolling-stock company and not the property directly of the Canadian Northern.

Those were the conditions which prevailed with respect to the railway situation of Manitoba.

Now, here is a point to which I want to direct the particular attention of the Government. Some people fear that the whole truth is not being told with reference to these railway deals. Hugh John Macdonald attained power on the question of government ownership, but Roblin succeeded him and took Hon. Robert Rogers into his Cabinet. They proceeded, on the pretext of government ownership, to purchase the Northern Pacific system in Manitoba, which was giving good service in that country. I have here the statute which provided for the acquisition of the Northern Pacific by the province of Manitoba, under the pretext of government ownership. It is dated the 15th day of January, 1911. You will note the date particularly. This is chapter 38 of the statutes of the province of Manitoba, and is entitled: "An Act confirming a certain agreement therein referred to." This confirms an agreement for the purchase by the Manitoba Government of the Northern Pacific railway at that particular time. You would naturally suppose that the province of Manitoba was coming into its own and would have government ownership of railways, knowing that Hugh John Macdonald had carried the province on that platform, and knowing that Roblin had succeeded him as Premier. This agreement is signed: "Mellen, President of the Northern Pacific and Manitoba Railway Company." There are several corporations included—the Winnipeg Transfer Railway company, Limited, signed by Mellen, President; the Portage and North-Western Railway company signed by Mellen, President; the Waskada and North-Eastern Railway company, signed by Mellen, President; and, on behalf of the Queen, the agreement was signed by whom? The Hon. Robert Rogers.

I may say that one of the mysterious things about this matter was when it was inquired into—honourable gentlemen will recollect it was the subject of discussion in Manitoba—it was learned that when Messrs. Roblin and Rogers went to conclude this deal on behalf of the Manitoba Government with the Northern Pacific railway, they for some reason registered in St. Paul under assumed names. In the investigation held afterwards the register was produced and it was found they had registered under assumed names. The mystery is perhaps cleared up by the subsequent Act of the Manitoba legislature, chapter 28. Would you believe that, notwithstanding the fact that the Government of the province of Manitoba won the election on the policy of government ownership, those men carried out their pledge by transferring that portion of the Northern Pacific and Manitoba railway in Manitoba under the statute from which I have quoted, and in the very next chapter of the statutes, chapter 39—

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The same year?

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Yes; in the same year, 21 days later, a statute was enacted which transferred this Northern Pacific railway to the Canadian Northern—to Mackenzie and Mann. Within twenty-one days after the purchase of the Northern Pacific, ostensibly for the province of Manitoba, in accordance with the policy of government ownership of railways, the road was transferred to Mackenzie and Mann, the Canadian Northern. It may be interesting to know that the agreement is signed by Mr. R. P. Roblin, Railway Commissioner for Manitoba, and our friend Mr. Frederic Nicholls for the Canadian Northern railway, as president.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: A similar thing happened in Quebec, you know.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD: What were the terms of that agreement?

Hon. Mr. WATSON: The terms are set out here in the Act. The honourable gentleman can read it.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD: Is it not correct that one of the terms of that agreement was a special arrangement for a reduction in the rates to be applied between Winnipeg and Fort William, and which was subsequently applied to the Canadian Pacific railway, and subsequently, by order of the Railway Commision, was extended to the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta? By that arrangement millions and millions of dollars were saved to the farmers of Western Canada.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: The statement about the millions and millions being saved to the farmers is very questionable. There is no doubt at all that the freight rates were

Hon. Mr. LAIRD: That was one of the concessions made at the time—the reduction of rates, and it has saved to the farmers in all the western privinces millions of dollars.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Will the honourable gentleman pardon me? A condition of that bargain was this, that the Manitoba Government should have exclusive control of the freight rates, and when that went into force the Canadian Pacific, which had opposed it so bitterly, was forced to reduce its rates, and that brought about the celebrated rate of 10 cents a hundred pounds, which meant a saving to the people of Manitoba and Saskatchewan of millions of dollars; and this is to-day the basis of the reduction of freight rates. The bargain made at that time was the best bargain ever made in the Dominion of Canada.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I think my honourable friend is entirely mistaken as to the ten-cent rate on the Canadian Pacific railway. The ten-cent rate is embodied in a Dominion statute, and was secured when the Government came to their aid in building the Crow's Nest Pass railway.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD: If the honourable gentleman will allow me, I may say that I took an active part in the famous freight rate case in Saskatchewan, and one of the arguments used was that this rate was confined exclusively to the province of Manitoba. We took the ground on behalf of Alberta and Saskatchewan that the reduction of rates applied to all the western provinces, and by the decision of the Railway Commission that claim was upheld. The result is that in all the western provinces the people have been able to take advantage of that reduction in rates.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: These interruptions do not affect my argument at all. If honourable gentlemen want to consider these two Acts, they are to be found in the statutebook. I am not going to take up the House in discussing rates. I am simply stating what occurred with regard to the transfer of property by the Northern Pacific railway to the Canadian Northern railway.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD: Give us all the facts.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I say that with all the facts before us we cannot be surprised that the people of the West become alarmed by these railway deals. The Government apparently is taking carte blanche to do what it likes with the Canadian Northern.

Is the Canadian Northern railway going to merge with the Grand Trunk Pacific or with the Canadian Pacific railway? Apparently the Government does as it pleases with it. I urge now, as I urged before, that in my humble judgment the Government should not deal with this matter in this way. It should be left until the people of the West have a fair representation in the House of Commons. The West is not represented. The East will lose 8 members and we in the West will gain 22, besides which there are three vacancies, which makes a total of 33 seats. An honourable gentleman on the other side of the House told me yesterday that he did not like this Bill; but he said, "I take it as a war measure." The people of this country are getting rather tired of this sugar-coating, and being told that everything is a war measure. The sugar-coating of the pill is not going to be accepted by the people of Canada. There is a future after the war is over. and we have to look to the future. That being the case, I say that the Government should think of these things carefully, and give the people fair representation. The Government is doing a lot of things that will require a lot of sugar-coating before the people will accept them. I am in favour of prosecuting the war to the limit, but under cover of the sugar-coating you should not rob the treasury, and you should not make these bargains to bind the people of the Northwest without giving them fair representation in Parliament.

I am not going to take any further time to discuss this matter. I thought it well that I should make these representations. As I said before, I was at the birth of the Canadian Northern railway company; and apparently now I am at the funeral twenty-one years afterwards.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It will now have a glorious resurrection.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I do not know how that will be. It will probably be after the next election. I do not think that there will be any resurrection of the dead bones of this House at the present time, because it takes a great deal to stir them up. In my humble opinion, it would be much better for the Government to grant some relief to the Canadian Northern and allow these matters to be settled when we have a new Parliament, because the time of the present Government is up. They are in power by their own action. The people have not been consulted for six years.

I am not going to deal with figures, but it is admitted that this matter will involve $600,000,000, and before you undertake these great obligations may I say that I believe that the management of the Canadian Northern railway can operate this road at much less cost than the Government can. My honourable friend has said that it was built at half the cost of the Transcontinental railway. It is not so good a road, but it is here. There is no doubt of the fact that the Canadian Northern railway passes through the most fertile territory in the Northwest. It passes through a country with a large population, a country which lends itself to mixed farming and small farms. If the Canadian Northern had confined itself to the road between Fort William and the Rocky Mountains or Edmonton, it would be one of the best railroad properties in America to-day. I think that the gentlemen in charge of it were over-zealous and tried to accomplish too much. I do not think that they have put all the money that they received in the way of grants into the roads.

Hon. L. McMEANS: Honourable gentlemen, I did not intend to take up the time of the House in discussing this Bill; but I desire to correct a few of the statements which have been made by the honourable gentleman from Portage la Prairie (Hon. Mr. Watson) in regard to the railway situation in Manitoba. He has taken up the time of the House in giving us a detailed statement of the railway situation, that would lead us to believe that it was owing to the fact that the Roblin Government had bought the Northern Pacific Manitoba railway which caused so much trouble and so much commotion. Let me explain the situation, as I have a very clear recollection of it.

The Northern Pacific Manitoba railway came into Manitoba at the request of the Government, as the honourable gentleman stated, about the time of disallowance. They were induced to come in then by the Greenway Government, which advanced a cash bonus of so much per mile. The people of Manitoba were crying out for railroads, and the Greenway Government refused to give any further extension to the road, and it was crippled. The issue was brought before the people, and the Greenway Government was put on trial, not, as the honourable gentleman has stated, on the ground of public ownership. They went to the country on their record, and their record was so bad that when the returns came in there was not a corporal's guard left.

Let us see what the Roblin Government did with regard to the Northern Pacific Manitoba railway. The Northern Pacific railway said: "We will not build any more in Manitoba, because the Government has not treated us properly." There was an attempt made by the Canadian Pacific railway to get control of this road, but the Government stepped in and took a lease for ninety-nine years, which was turned over to the Canadian Northern company within a few days. In turning over that road to the Canadian Northern, the Roblin Government, or the Macdonald Government, reserved to itself the absolute right to fix the railway charges and the freight rates on that road. The result of that was that the freight rates were immediately reduced to 10 cents per 100 pounds, and the Canadian Pacific railway had to reduce their rates to the reduction made by the Northern Pacific Manitoba Railway company, which saved to the people of Manitoba and the people of the western provinces many millions of dollars. That was the reason why the freight rate of 10 cents per 100 pounds to Fort William was obtained.

There is another chapter to this history of the Greenway Government. After the Greenway Government went out of power the people were amazed to find that while the Greenway Government had refused to assist in any way the Northern Pacific Manitoba railway, they had passed a secret Order in Council by which they were giving assistance to the Canadian Pacific railway. Does the honourable gentleman from Portage la Prairie deny that?

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Secret? I do.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: The honourable gentleman does not remember the secret Order in Council which Hugh John Macdonald had to cancel after he became Premier?

Hon. Mr. WATSON: What was contained in it?

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Granting aid for an extension of the Canadian Pacific railway, called the Snowflake branch. I have not gone into ancient history as my honourable friend has done. These facts are fresh in my recollection, because at that time this was a matter of importance. That secret Order in Council was passed. It had been stated to the people of Manitoba that no further aid would be given to railways, and the Northern Pacific railway had been driven out of Manitoba. That Government went before the people, and the people gave their verdict, and the Government was hurled from power. The Roblin Government took the matter up, discovered the secret Order in Council, and immediately made a deal with the Northern Pacific Manitoba Railway company by which they got this reduction of freight rates.

The honourable gentleman has said that the province of Manitoba has given no bonuses to railways. There was a change in the policy of the Government at that time. They said they would give no cash to any railway company, but would assist them by guaranteeing bonds under circumstances. They guaranteed bonds, and I am happy to say that the province of Manitoba has never been called upon to pay one cent in pursuance of the policy laid down by the Roblin Government.

The honourable gentleman has stated that he is a great opponent of public ownership. He thinks it is wrong. I will not argue the question with him, because I join with the majority of this House in saying that in normal times and under normal conditions it might be unwise, perhaps, to take over the Canadian Northern railway; but being, as we are, the endorsers of their bonds, the question naturally arises, what is best to be done under the circumstances? I want to ask the honourable gentleman about his opposition to public ownership. He talks about the telephones of the province of Manitoba. He would have you believe that some great error was made. Let me tell every honourable gentleman on the other side of the House that if he went into Manitoba to-day, and had the temerity to get up and say that the telephone system now owned by the province should be put back into the monopoly of the Bell Telephone company, he would be looked upon as a man who was not possessed of good judgment. At no time have the people of Manitoba and Saskatchewan received a greater blessing than they did when the Government of the day, in order to break the monopoly of the Bell Telephone company, took over the telephone system. They started out first to erect their own lines, because the telephone company would not sell to them. To-day those provinces enjoy all the blessings of a public service. Let me tell the honourable gentleman from Portage la Prairie that if he went into the city of Winnipeg and said that the ownership by the city of Winnipeg of the electric power should go back into private hands he would be looked upon as fit for the insane asylum at Selkirk. The city at one time paid 20 cents per kilowatt hour for electric power. They determined to go into the distribution of power themselves. The street railway company said that they would prevent them from doing so by reducing the rate for power to 10 cents per hour. What was the result? The people of the city to-day are paying 3½ cents an hour for electricity for lighting purposes and 1 cent per hour for domestic purposes, and manufacturers are getting power at very much less. Not only is the electric power of Winnipeg being run, and all costs paid, but in addition a sufficient sum has been set aside from year to year to provide for depreciation and still leave a handsome profit.

I want to remind the honourable gentleman that if there is any place in Canada that will benefit by this Act, it is the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta, where the Canadian Northern has its lines spread out like a gridiron over a map. When the Government owns these lines, surely that part of the country will benefit to a greater extent than any other part.

Hon. RAOUL DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, this morning I read to the House a telegram which was published in the Montreal Star last week, which explained that the Conservative members of the Senate in caucus had succeeded in getting an assurance from the Government that a maximum amount would be fixed beyond which the arbitrator should not go, and consequently that a limitation would be put upon the liabilities which the Government would assume. The Montreal Star of Saturday last, commenting upon these disclosures, made the following remarks:

> That there was widespread dissatisfaction with the Government Railway Bill was evident. The chief objection, as was pointed out in The Star, consisted in the absence of sufficient safeguards respecting security for possible undiscovered liabilities.
> The Government now announces a commendable change in the Bill to cover this feature.

I draw attention to these words. I continue:

> The railway legislation by the proposed amendment will be robbed of its most objectionable features.
> The Government can and should go further by providing, either in the Bill or in the agreement, for the protection of the Dominion against a possible existence of undisclosed assets as well as undisclosed liabilities. Provide for these two important features and most of the objections to the measure will disappear.

I shall not dilate upon this further than to say that I suppose it means that precautions should be taken to see that all the assets are gathered in. However, that is not the point to which I wish to draw the attention of this Chamber; but it is to these two facts, which seemed to engross the minds of the honourable gentlemen opposite when they meet their leader in caucus. It is said in that despatch to Montreal that they were very much alarmed at the idea of having arbitrators go to the limit of $60,000,000 and accept the opinion of Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann that that stock was worth 100 cents on the dollar. The second objection they had was that there would be undisclosed liabilities, perhaps running into millions, for which the Government would be responsible. Now they seem to have been given some assurance that satisfied and squelched their qualms of conscience, for we see them surrounding the leader of the Government, and adopting every clause of that measure, and rejecting every safeguard that the members on this side of the House have suggested. What are the safeguards which they wrench from the Government? Here they are; I find them in the answer of the honourable leader of the Government in this Chamber to the questions put by the honourable senator for Hastings on Friday last. Now, this is no accidental and informal query. The stage was set for the Government to go on record, in order to assure its friends in this Chamber that proper safeguards would surround this agreement. I read from the Senate Debates:

Hon Sir Mackenzie Bowell: I asked as to whether it was the intention of the Government to fix a maximum amount to which the arbitrators would be restricted. That is a question which has been raised, not only in the discussion here, but also by many members of the other House in discussing the provisions of this Bill. I think that if the members of this House were in possession of that information it would enable them to come to a better conclusion as to the merits of the Bill.

And the second question the honourable gentleman put was:

Also may I ask whether it is the intention to take steps in order to ascertain the liabilities which are not disclosed if any, to the arbitrators?

The answer of my honourable friend is the following, which apparently has satisfied the members who surround and support him; I will read it and see what it does give:

Hon Sir James Lougheed: I am very glad that the honourable gentleman from Hastings (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell) has asked this question, and I therefore answer it. I may say that the Government, upon entering into the agreement provided for in the Bill, will fix a maximum amount to be paid for the stock, and will further provide, of course, that the fixing of the amount shall not be taken into consideration by the arbitrators as an element in fixing the value, if any, of the stock to be acquired. As to the second question, I may say that the Government will provide in the agreement that any obligations of the company not disclosed to the arbitrators will, upon being established as valid claims, within a period to be fixed after the award is accepted, be paid out of the money so awarded, if any.

We have contended on this side of the House that no value should attach to that stock; that there was no equity. We hope that if a proper investigation is held the arbitrators will so decide. If they decide that there is no equity, that there is nothing due either morally or legally to the builders of this road, then what will remain to be set against the undisclosed liabilities that could appear after this agreement is signed? I draw the attention of the honourable gentlemen of this Chamber to the fact that they have obtained practically nothing by the assurances that the Government have given them through the lips of the honourable leader of the Government in this Chamber. If there are undisclosed liabilities, the award will stand as a protection for the Government, and will be reduced in consequence. But we claim that there should be no award—that it is preposterous for any arbitrator looking into this transaction, into the state of this company, to allow anything for that stock. Being convinced of that fact, what remains of the assurances of the Government that for any undisclosed liabilities the amount of that award will be a protection for the people of this country? I say there is no satisfactory guarantee that the millions of liabilities will not be unburdened on the public treasury. When we suggested that as to all liabilities that rank behind the second mortgage of the Government, the Exchequer Court should pass upon them so as to find exactly what was received by the Canadian Northern for those liabilities, we were providing a safeguard which is a serious one, while this one will not stand the light of day. One look at the answer of my honourable friend shows that his friends who surround him have been satisfied with very little indeed, and this is one of the very many reasons for which I intend to support the amendment asking for the six months hoist.

The proposed amendment was negatived on the original division.

The motion for the third reading of the Bill was then put and declared carried on the same division reversed, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

MILITARY VOTERS' BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into committee on Bill 127, the Military Voters' Act, 1917. Hon. Mr. Daniel in the Chair.

On section 1—application:

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I moved an amendment yesterday to that clause. I meant to draw attention to the fact that by demobilization of men the Government might extend indefinitely the operation of this law, by delaying the demobilization of a regiment, or part of a regiment, or even a dozen men who had been enlisted. I therefore move to amend section 1 by striking out all the words after "all" and substituting therefor the words:

Within one month after the complete demobilization or the signing of the treaty of peace between the Allies and the Central Powers.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Of course, the honourable gentleman will understand that the complete demobilization might take six or eight months afterwards.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Yes, but if one of the two courses is followed, the section would have no effect.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: It is one of the two, but they would not be obliged to do it.

Hon Mr. POWER: Under the amendment the Government of the day, which might not be the present Government, could act either on the complete demobilization, or, if it chose to take the other alternative, it could wait till the treaty of peace had been signed. The difficulty would be removed by striking out the word "complete" in the amendment, and then as soon as there is a general demobilization the Act ceases to operate. I think that would be the fair means.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I might point out that the Department of Justice, in giving an opinion on that, interpreted this to mean the disbandment of the military forces which were called together. Complete demobilization must necessarily mean the return of all the forces to Canada. You mobilize men for a particular purpose, and then you demobilize them, that is, you break them up.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: You do not break them up altogether.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Surely the Government of Canada is not going to leave an army on the continent.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: No, but you need to transport them back here, and it will take two or three years.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Of course, the Government is not going to leave a whole army there, but it might leave one regiment over there, and then it would not be complete demobilization. It would be better to take out the word "complete" and say "before demobilization."

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That would be all right, if you strike out the word "complete."

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I consent to that, and move the amendment with the word "complete" omitted.

The amendment was agreed to, and section 1, as amended, was agreed to.

On paragraph c of section 2—military elector:

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I would like to ask the leader of the Government what is intended by the words after the words "discharged therefrom":

Or in the case of an officer has been permitted to resign, or without fault on his side has had his services dispensed with.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The words "discharged therefrom" apply to a private or a non-commissioned officer, but they do not apply to an officer, who does not obtain a discharge in the same way as a private or a non-commissioned officer. He is always permitted to resign.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I will suggest that this clause be suspended, so that it may be taken up with subsection 4 of section 3, because I propose to offer two amendments, one of which will affect paragraph c of section 2, and the other subsection 4 of section 3. I would ask that the section be allowed to stand at present, until we come to subsection 4 of section 3.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is quite satisfactory; but, while I have this amendment in my hand, I may as well put it. I move that the words. "or, in the case of an officer, has been permitted to resign or without fault on his part has had his services dispensed with," be inserted after the words "honourably discharged therefrom." Then, on the same page, line 13, strike out the word "other," which is unnecessary there.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I have in mind the case of a soldier who may not have been discharged, against whom an accusation may have been made. How would that affect him ?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If he is not discharged he would be entitled to a vote; he is still undischarged. This is simply to include those who have been honourably discharged.

The amendment was agreed to.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The word "Aviation," in line six, should read "Air." It is the Air Service, not the Aviation Service. This is simply a clerical error.

The amendment was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: May I ask if the words, "active service" would include nurses, for example, who are working in connection with such organizations as the Red Cross?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Not unless they were under military command. The Red Cross is an independent organization; but where those nurses have passed over to military command they would be included.

Section 2 stands.

On section 3—voting by military electors:

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: When the principle of the Bill was under discussion, having regard to the lateness of the hour and the condition of the House, I deferred making some observations I intended to make. Since then I have read through this Bill, and I think I am able to condense the remarks I intended making. With your kind permission I should like to look back to the first clause of this Bill.

The CHAIRMAN: The honourable gentleman can do so only by unanimous consent.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I think it was understood last night.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend is not going to take long ?

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: No, only a very short time. If I might anticipate something that is included in this present one, I will not trouble the House with any further remarks on the subsequent clauses.

The right to the franchise. By it the individual in the community relinquishes part of his liberty and control of his property to the majority. Therefore, the person whom he selects as his representative and to control his interests should be one of his choice. Much depends upon the selection of the individual, his character and reputation, and other elements. Secondly, he should protect his vote, which is a sacred right in the community, by not admitting to the franchise any person unworthy of it, or who would not discharge the duties which an elector owes to the community or which a representative has to devote to his constituents. Everybody admits, I think, that any soldier who is entitled to a vote in Canada should not be deprived of his vote if the conditions were the same, wherever the soldier may be, as they are in Canada. That proposition would be unobjectionable; but the conditions surrounding soldiers in the field and also in England and other countries where they may be to some extent reduce the security of that vote and place it under circumstances different from those under which the vote would be registered in Canada. According to the usual procedure in elections, bribery is prohibited and the elector who presents himself to vote has to take oath that he has not received anything to warp his judgment or cause him to vote for any particular candidate.

I am informed that some of the soldiers included in the class enumerated before have been promised in England that they will receive grants of land in Canada, that they will receive places in Canada which have been vacated by men who have lost their lives in the field—that they have been promised places in the Civil Service. All of these things are direct inducements to vote for Government candidates, and they are conditions not at all analogous to the conditions surrounding the ordinary voter in Canada. You will observe by that first section that men who have joined the Expeditionary Force and women who have joined the Expeditionary Force, His Majesty's subjects belonging to the British Isles, exercise the franchise although they have never resided in Canada.

Further, under the conditions of our franchise in Canada, it is intended to apply to freeholders, persons with property, and others whose names are vouched for or proved in various ways, and the list which is prepared and posted up is liable to objection. Under this Bill the vote is to be given not only to males, but to certain females, nurses in England who have joined the Canadian Expeditionary Force but have never been in Canada, and to men from the cities in England who, under the inducements specified, have joined the force. They are to become electors in Canada by virtue of the legislation now before us. Furthermore, minors are admitted. Under the election law men who vote must be of the full age of 21 years and are supposed to have judgment in electoral matters. This Bill mentions minors, and the age is not specified. The Scouts may be put on the voters' list in Canada if they join the Expeditionary Force. I have seen passing through the streets of Halifax boys of fifteen, sixteen, or seventeen years of age, every one of whom is entitled to vote, according to this Bill, and his vote will cancel or nullify the vote of the ordinary elector resident in Canada who may have voted for ten, fifteen, or twenty years. Each vote by a minor can cancel the vote of one of our electors who has given his age to the country and is a citizen of repute and reliability.

I have observed that in Canada the electors have to vote for persons; they do not vote for a Government. A Government is, after all, only a committee of the Houses of Parliament. The electors have to vote for members who represent them as individuals, as persons known to them, and with a certain status in the community and with guarantees given that the representative will discharge the duties of his position.

Now, in this ballot, to which I will refer later on, an elector can either vote for a person or vote for the Government or the Opposition. Where he has to vote for a person he has to write down the name of the person on the ballot. We know from experience in our elections held in Canada, that a great many of voters are illiterate, and some who cannot write do not admit that they are illiterate, and ballots are marked frequently with a cross placed against the names already printed, and sometimes those crosses are placed over the line, and the ballot has to be thrown out because it is uncertain for whom the vote is intended. But here the additional responsibility and difficulty are placed upon the soldier, because he has to write the name of the candidate in the place allowed by the ballot ticket. Therefore it is placing such labour, such delay, such uncertainty, upon the ballot that it is an allowance which should not be made when the soldier is voting for an individual.

Secondly, allowing the soldiers to vote for the Government or the Opposition admits of improper influences being brought to bear upon the elector. He will have to submit to the jeers and sneers of his comrades if he opposes the Government, because a man who opposes the Government is a rebel, an opponent. In these times you have no privilege or right to vote for the Opposition; you must support the Government which has promised so much and which is carrying on the war; so under that provision the Opposition would be placed at a great disadvantage. All improper influences should be withdrawn from the voter. He should be allowed freely to express his opinion. There should be no impediment, no influence, no subjection to any rule or authority which would in any way convey his vote into the channel of voting for the Government when he did not wish to do so. I am familiar with soldiers. I have been amongst them. I know exactly their sentiments on such subjects as this, and no soldier in the ranks dare vote against the opinion of the officer, or he might just as well go and commit suicide.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: The great majority of the officers of the Expeditionary Force are Conservatives.

Some Hon. SENATORS: No, no.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: They are. It can be proved by going over the list. I do not say that the officers would use their personal influence to coerce a soldier to vote in a certain way. Probably they will be indifferent on the subject. But a sergeant or other subaltern, and even the comrades of the soldier himself, will exercise such an influence over him that he dare not vote for the Opposition. His only recourse, when he cannot put in the name of the individual for whom he votes, will be to put in the Government, in fear that by putting in the Opposition he will subject himself to all the ignominy and all the disabilities which officers can put upon the soldiers when they please.

I do not wish to prolong my remarks. I do not wish to appear to be in hostility to this Bill; but I point out evils that will inevitably occur if the elections are conducted on the principles that are set out in the Bill; and I say this, that it is unfair to the electors of Canada, because a drummer-boy in any of those regiments is able to nullify the vote of a colonel, and every one of them is able to nullify and make ineffective the vote of the best elector there is in Canada, and two drummer-boys will outvote him. So I say that to protect the interest of the home electors, the great bulk of the electors, this Bill should be so modified that the conditions prevalent in Canada shall be extended so far as possible to those soldiers of the Expeditionary Force who have gone over to England or Flanders or anywhere else where the war is being conducted. There are a great many soldiers in England, a great many of the young men of whom I have spoken, a great many ladies who have become nurses, and many others, who will be able to vote, and every one of those votes will counteract and nullify the vote given by the very best elector in the Dominion of Canada.

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: Before my honourable friend sits down, may I ask him a question?

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: Are we to understand the honourable gentleman to say that in his opinion an officer of the military forces overseas would persecute a member of his company because the member did not vote as the officer voted in the election?

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: I do not say that. My honourable friend misunderstands me. I have said what the soldiers have told me, that they dare not vote contrary to the wishes or will of their officer.

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: Why not?

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: Because the officer can make it so undesirable for them, can apply persecution to them in a thousand military ways, and they dare not vote against the known will of the officer. These men will be conducted in squads to the polling place, wherever it may be.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I must take exception—

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: One moment, if the honourable gentleman will allow me. I shall have done in one minute. I am only replying to the question by my honourable friend. He used to be a member of the House of Commons with me, and he and I have a sort of brotherly feeling, and we supplement one another. What I say is what I have been told by officers. I do not say that the officers will take any advantage in that way, but there will be subalterns and others who will influence the soldiers and will bring those influences to bear upon them.

Hon. Mr. SHARPE: May I ask the honourable gentleman if he would disfranchise soldiers and officers who are overseas?

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: That is not the question at all. I am simply expressing the idea that I would not allow any person in Canada to lose his vote in consequence of going into the army.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I should like to ask what the honourable gentleman means. If he says that it is undesirable that they should have the vote because of oppression by the officers, does he mean to deprive them of the vote? In the first place, the honourable gentleman gets his information second-hand. I do not know the person who told him what he has been told, but it is a gross libel upon the officers of the Expeditionary Forces. As an officer of the Expeditionary Force, I do not propose to sit silent—although I have not spoken before in this House— and hear my brother officers maligned in this way. Of course, these remarks come from a gentleman, an honourable gentleman—with emphasis on "honourable"—whose proclivites are not supposed to be entirely in line with those of the electors of this country who are desirous of winning this war.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: Is that the question you are asking?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Therefore it would have very little effect on the members of this House in inducing them to deprive the men who are to-day fighting to keep this country what it is, a free and independent country. But lest it might have some effect, I desire to say that in my opinion a statement of that kind is so grossly false as to be a libel upon the officers of the Expeditionary Force. I say this, and I say it with knowledge of the facts, that I do not believe there is one man holding an office in the Expeditionary Force who would in the slightest way attempt to interfere with any soldier casting his ballot. If such were the case, it would be a very simple matter for the soldier to hold his tongue and cast his ballot, because the ballot is a secret one. He can cast his ballot without any officer—if there were such a brute—knowing for whom he was voting any more than an employer of labour in this country knows for whom his employee is voting. I think the honourable gentleman from Halifax is an employer of labour to some extent himself, and he would have quite as much control over the men who worked for him, and would have more opportunity of depriving them of their livelihood than an officer at the front would have with his men. Therefore the honourable gentleman practically says only employers should have votes lest they should coerce their employees. If no better argument can be brought forward to deprive of the franchise the men who are to-day upholding the burdens of the Empire, I think this Bill will go through and become law.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: I have heard what the honourable gentleman has said, but he has not told us that the ballot cast in Canada is a secret ballot. I will presently quote some documents to show him what can be done during an election, and what has been done.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: No one knows better than the honourable gentleman what can be done.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: No, because for a time my honourable friend was my secretary.

Subsection 1 of section 3 was agreed to.

Subsection 2 of section 3 was agreed to.

On subsection 4 of section 3:

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: In discussing the second reading of this Bill I took exception to this clause, because under it this Parliament will be qualifying as electors non-residents, persons who have never resided in Canada, and would be giving to such electors the right to determine in which riding their vote should be counted I will not go over the argument which I offered to this honourable House yesterday. I will merely state in concise form the proposition on which I base my point.

Under our federation pact, as embodied in the British North America Act, the legislative power being entrusted, as far as the House of Commons is concerned, to a given number of members elected in each province by such of the inhabitants as may be granted the right to vote by this Parliament, and the representation of each province in the House of Commons being based upon the population or the number of inhabitants in such province, it is not within the power of the Federal Parliament to import any of the electorate of one province into that of another, and much less to import into the electorate of any of the provinces the votes of British subjects or of foreigners who have never resided in such province or even in the Dominion of Canada. In other words, my contention is that the representation in the House of Commons is based on the population of each province, and that the population of all the provinces, or of any one of them, cannot be artificially increased for the purpose of representation, as is sought to be done by this Act, by giving to non-residents the right to vote in any province they may choose. If that could be done, Parliament could a fortiori grant to the residents of one province the right to vote in another province.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What is the section of the British North America Act to which the honourable gentleman refers?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The honourable the leader of the Government asks what are the sections which support this contention. I think he will find that in sections 8, 37, 40, 41, 51 and 52. I suggest and propose for the consideration of this House that paragraph c of section 2 be amended by making it read as follows:

"Military elector" means and includes every person, male or female, who, being a British subject and ordinarily resident in Canada—and so on. I would strike out the words "whether or not" and replace them with the word "and," and strike out paragraph 4 of section 3. This matter is deserving of the consideration of the Government and the Department of Justice. I would suggest that my amendment be put in, and that the section be deferred until to-morrow, or some later date. I have given careful attention to this matter. I am not influenced by any party consideration. I have examined this question, by the light which I may possess, from the point of view as to whether it is within the power of this Parliament to enact legislation of that kind, and I have no doubt whatever in my mind that it would be entirely ultra vires of the powers of this Parliament to extend any such power of voting to persons who are non-residents of this country. If Parliament could go so far as it would appear that they can go under section 4 as applied to the wording of subsection c of section 2, it would mean that it could go to the further extent of being able to authorize any person in any foreign country to register his vote in any of the provinces of the Dominion.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: With a view to having a proper appreciatoin of the importance to be attached to the amendment of my honourable friend, I prefer that it should be discussed now. At the moment I cannot follow the reasoning of my honourable friend. In no part of the British North America Act is recognition given to the principle of residency as constituting a fundamental requirement for an elector. It seems to me that if my honourable friend's argument holds good, we must start from the point that that is an indispensable qualification of an elector. Now, as I understand it, in most of the provinces of Canada we give recognition to non-residency. I understand that even in the province of Quebec there are conditions under which a voter may vote having a property qualification, and yet not be a resident of that province. I understand that to be the case in the Maritime Provinces.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: It is in Nova Scotia.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: For instance, under the Dominion Elections Act, section 30, we have this provision:

> The provisions of the law of the province as to the places where non-resident electors shall vote shall apply mutatis mutandis to any Dominion election, and the returning officer at such election shall have the power and be charged with the duties—and so on. There is a recognition under the Dominion Elections Act of a non-resident being entitled to vote, and unless we are to import into the consideration of this question an element which to-day is not recognized, that of residency or non-residency, I regret that I cannot attach importance to the objections made by my honourable friend, and cannot follow his reasoning. If my honourable friend starts from the premises that he has laid down, that there must be residency, of course his argument is entitled to every consideration; but if we are to hold with my honourable friend, then we are to ignore practically the principle laid down in the Dominion Elections Act. It is not an unreasonable thing to say that a member of the Expeditionary Force, a non-resident of Canada, who belongs to an organization for the defence of Canada, who is prepared to sacrifice his life, or to place himself in jeopardy, in the defence of Canada, should have the right to vote.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Does the honourable gentleman say that British subjects in the United States who have enlisted here should have the right to vote?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Precisely. We have to presume that when they join the Canadian Expeditionary Force and are prepared to assume all the responsibilities and all the jeopardies of the members of that force, they are doing it in all sincerity. I cannot imagine any greater test than a man placing himself in the position of being prepared to make the supreme sacrifice in the defence of the country.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My objection is that the men come from the British Isles, and they are returning to defend their homes, which, surely, are more sacred to their hearts than Canada. I do not say that they do not defend the Empire.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend at once denies to the man the fruit of the sacrifice which he has made, and which he is prepared to make for the organization to which he belongs.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Certainly not.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He belongs to the military organization of Canada; he is fighting for Canada; he is standing shoulder to shoulder with the members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force; and therefore to say that he has some ulterior motive is to do him a great injustice.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: His first motive is to defend his home country. He may be an elector in Great Britain.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He chooses to do his fighting with the Canadian forces, and a man who is prepared to make that sacrifice should be entitled to a vote.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: The honourable gentleman spoke of the Maritime Provinces. In New Brunswick a man's name must be on the reviser's list before he can vote, and he cannot get his name on that list unless he is a property-owner. If he is registered as a property owner and is on the reviser's list he can vote, no matter where he lives. I am not objecting to the soldiers getting the vote. Some people seem to think that we are persecuting the soldier. We are not doing it. I for one am not doing it. I have not heard any expressions that we want to prevent the soldiers from having votes. I entirely agree that if they sacrifice their lives they should have every consideration. I would be the last man to throw any difficulty in the way. But when you come to establish a franchise, where is the provincial Act on which we all vote? We vote on the provincial lists. Now you are destroying these lists, because the qualification there is that a man must have property in the province before he can vote. As to the sons of British parents, what object would they have in voting in this Dominion when they have no stock in it? Many of them may have taken the oath of allegiance in the United States; we do not know.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, they must be British subjects.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: We know many people who have gone to the United States and qualified there, and then come back and become British subjects.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: As long as they are British subjects, all right.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: What object is there in affording this boon to vote in our affairs, taking part in the administration of the country; interfering, as the case may be, with our own vested interests here, when they have no interest in the country?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I want to make myself very clear. Take the case of a Britisher who has passed a few months in the United States. He may come from Newfoundland or the British Isles. He may be on the list in Newfoundland; elections may take place there on the same day as our elections. He is in the Canadian Expeditionary Force, or on a Canadian ship—and we know that quite a number from Newfoundland have joined the Canadian navy. He has the right to vote in his country; and we are now giving him the right to vote in our country. Why should he have that advantage over a Canadian citizen, a Canadian soldier, his colleague in arms, who can only have one vote in Canada? Nobody has gone around Newfoundland or Great Britain to qualify Canadian soldiers to vote in those two countries. That Newfoundlander and hundreds of others who are in the Canadian navy will have a right to vote at home and also have a right to vote here. A man from the British Isles who has been only a short time in the United States may still be qualified to vote in Great Britain. He votes there, and is qualified here. Why give him that advantage over our Canadian-born soldiers—because they are on an equal footing. If my honourable friend ran in Calgary for the House of Commons, and felt that he had the confidence of people who knew him, who have surrounded him with their sympathy, and felt that he had a clear majority of 400 or 500 on which he could rely, and he went to the polls and obtained that majority, and a bag should come from the other side in which would be found 600 votes of Newfoundlanders which would defeat him, that would be in favour of his opponent. It is just a possibility, but I have that possibility before me.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I would ask if the honourable gentleman is in favour of alien enemies voting in this country—people belonging to a country that is the enemy of ours—who happen to be settled in this country, whether naturalized or not? Is he in favour of them voting?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We could perhaps discuss those two questions separately. I could not answer that question, because I do not know of alien enemies in Canada who are not interned in the internment camps. We have taken care of the alien enemies and put them into camps.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: No.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes, there are a number of Austrians in Montreal? They are well behaved, and are pledged to accept the regulations that govern them, and I suppose the Government is satisfied to leave them at large. I recognize that.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: And some escape occasionally, do they not?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Of course, I am not discussing that. I suppose my honourable friend refers to aliens whose countries are at war with us and who have been naturalized in Canada. Well, I would not call them alien enemies, and I think my honourable friend is wrong, and has gone beyond his thought in calling them alien enemies.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: You say they are not enemies of this country?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Does my honourable friend say so?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I say they are, many of them.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am not discussing that. Now, my honourable friend is coming down to particular cases, but is he ready to say that all the people who have come from Austria, with all that Austria means—and my honourable friend has travelled enough to know what it means—

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Yes, I have travelled in Austria, too.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: And in Germany—that all those people who are in Canada should be treated as alien enemies and qualified as alien enemies?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I say so, too.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Then that is at variance with the whole policy of this Government.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I do not think so. I do not care what the policy of this Government is; I care about my own.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But it is at variance with the whole policy of the people of Canada as represented by these two Chambers. But I suppose the honourable gentleman does not accept that policy. This Government has a franchise Bill in the other Chamber which arbitrarily fixes fifteen years of naturalization, outside of which the people who have come from these enemy countries are declared to be good voters and good Canadians.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I would not fix a limit.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Perhaps so; but now my honourable friend rises when I am discussing another question, and thinks he can spring a formidable problem which will stun me, in asking me if I am willing to allow alien enemies to vote. No, I am not ready to allow alien enemies to vote; but I am not even disposed to treat as an alien enemy a man who has been naturalized fourteen years, when I do not treat as an alien enemy one who has been naturalized fifteen or sixteen years. You draw the line at fifteen years.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Do not say that I draw the line.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, I do not say that; but I say the Government draws the line there.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I am opposed to that.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: So that my honourable friend will see that the question he puts is a pretty complicated one, in which I draw support from the Government of the day, in saying that a man coming from those countries, if he has been naturalized fifteen or sixteen years, is a good Canadian who can cast his vote at the next election, while the one who came within the last fifteen years must be treated, not as an alien enemy—you will not get that statement from the Prime Minister of Canada—but with a certain amount of suspicion.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Is the honourable gentleman aware that the great majority of that entire foreign immigration has come in within the last fifteen years?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, I am not aware of that. I think any representative from Ontario would answer in the negative as to that.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I am speaking of the West.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: We have heard a very impassioned argument from my friend, who is always impassioned, and who fancies that storm and bluster count for argument. They do not. If the honourable gentleman had a more melodious voice, we would not mind his loud talk; but his voice is so unmelodious that his talk is grating on the nerves.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have often been told that.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Yes, it is the truth, too. The honourable gentleman has told us that the Government is very much to blame for not having fixed an arbitrary point.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have not said that.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I understood him to say that.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, I answered my honourable friend by citing the arbitrary rule fixed by the Government.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I say that so far as I am concerned I would not fix any arbitrary point or rule at all; but I would simply say that those people who were born in the countries against which we are fighting for our lives and for the liberty of the world should not be permitted to vote in an election, which means so much, because never in the history of Canada has there been held an election which means so much as the present election does. And it is a sad thing to me to see so many men taking views, and giving expression to them, which in my opinion are at variance with that high duty which we owe to-day to this country. As to permitting those men who have been born in Germany, Austria, Bulgaria, or Turkey to vote, I would prevent them all from voting. What do we find to be the fact? We find that men who have lived here in Canada, who have shared with us our privileges and rights, who have enjoyed Canadian institutions, and have learned what Canadian institutions mean, who have taken the oath of citizenship in Canada, have gone home at the call of their native country to fight against us, to fight to enslave us, and they have been captured by our men.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: How many of them?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Many of them. How many, this gentleman from Moncton asks; by the hundreds, I say to you, and I know whereof I speak. They have not only been captured, but, thank God, they have been killed as well.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: Were you at the front?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I was at the front. Do not make any mistake, or do not make a statement like that to me. Don't you dare to make a statement like that to me, sir. Why do you say that I was not at the front?

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: That is the general impression, that you were not.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Well, that is a very false impression. But that is the sort of impression that a gentleman like you would gather quickly, because if it is evil of someone, that is your favourite delight.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: Thank you.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Yes, I say it, and that is all you are fit for. That may not be parliamentary, but when I am interrupted by a gentleman of the calibre of the gentleman from Moncton he will be apt to get what he is entitled to.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I have not interrupted him, when he has bored this House with his talk. I have not imposed upon this House to any extent, and I would not have risen or spoken on this matter at all if it had not been for what came from the member for Halifax.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: Why did you not state what I said? Why did you put in my mouth what I never said, and what I disclaim?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I did not do so. You had better take your seat if you know when you are well off.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I heard my friend say he was at the front. Would the honourable gentleman please tell us what battle he was in?

The CHAIRMAN: This entire discussion is away from the subject before the House, which is the amendment by Hon. Mr. Béique. I would like honourable gentlemen to keep to the point.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I would like to answer my honourable friend from Quebec; I do not know where he is from, but he is very well known.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: Thank God.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Thank God; it is a good thing for the country they do know him. I want to say to the honourable gentleman that if he had been at the front, as I have been, and under fire, as I have been under fire at the front, 25 feet under ground would not be quite enough for him to get.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: What battle were you in?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Never mind what battle I was in; that is what I say to the honourable gentleman—he would get so far under ground that he would not be seen again.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is getting warm, and I suggest we call it six o'clock and go where the air is cooler.

At six o'clock the Committee took recess.

The Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Honourable gentlemen, I rise, not for the purpose in any way of discussing the principle of the Bill. The Bill passed the second reading in this House without any amendment and without anyone disputing the principle of the Bill. I take it that on the general principle we are all agreed. My purpose in rising at this moment is to discuss the constitutional point which has been raised by my honourable friend from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique). With regard to subsection 4 of section 3, which purports to give to non-residents, men or women, in military service the right to vote in any electoral district selected by them, my honourable friend claims that that is an excess of the powers of this Parliament. I must say that I agree with him, but not on the two grounds that he has stated. I rather disagree with him on the first ground which he mentioned, but I agree with him that that provision would be beyond the powers of this Parliament on the second ground urged by him.

We must bear in mind that Canada is a federation. The four provinces which were federated in 1867 and the other provinces which came in subsequently have the right to determine their representation in this Parliament, not only as regards the number of their representatives. The number of their representatives, as we all know, is determined by a sort of rule of three, a calculation with which every member of this honourable House is familiar. Whilst this provision would not in any way affect the numerical representation of any of the provinces of Confederation, it might affect the opinion prevailing in the provinces, or in any one of the electoral districts; and, Canada being a federation, each provinc has the right to be represented in this Parliament not only by having a certain number of representatives, but by having as representatives members who correctly reflect the opinion of that particular province. The basis of representation is population. If you add any other element such as the one which it is now proposed to add, the element of non-residence, the result is that it is not representation by population. I quite agree that the number of men or women who are not residents in any one of the provinces is not going to change the number of representatives from a particular province at any forthcoming election; because 15,000 or 20,000 non-residents of Ontario may vote at this forthcoming election in the province of Ontario, or in the province of Quebec, and it will not change the number of men who will represent Ontario or Quebec in the next Parliament, because the representation of the province will be determined, as at present, by the next census. But here is where I think the proposed legislation is faulty: you are going to introduce an element which may affect the opinion prevailing in any one or more of the provinces.

Let me illustrate. Let us take for instance the smallest province in Confederation, because the illustration will probably be more apt, or it will at all events facilitate my argument. Take the province of Prince Edward Island. That province has four electoral districts. Let us assume that at the forthcoming election there is a bare majority in every one of those four electoral districts in favour of the Conservative party. The result of this legislation might be that, by concentrating in each of those four electoral districts a number of the votes of the non-resident soldiers, you would completely change the result, and make every one of those four electoral districts, which would otherwise be Conservative, Liberal constituencies. I might go on and illustrate by one province after another, but the effect would be exactly the same. Take the province of Ontario; what may happen there?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: What happened in British Columbia?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The same thing may happen in British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: It did happen.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My honourable friend says it did happen in British Columbia. Let us assume that in the province of Ontario there is a majority of the people in favour of conscription. There may be among these soldier voters a number of men who are against conscription, and, by concentrating that vote in a given number of electoral districts in the province, the opinion of the province, which, as I assume, is in favour of conscription, might be seriously disturbed. Any legislation we pass here which would have the effect of altering the numerical representation from any one of the provinces, or would prevent the free expression of the public opinion in Parliament of any province, would be ultra vires.

The answer of my honourable friend (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) to the proposition was this, that non-residence is not the test, because, he says, and quite correctly, in the province of Quebec residence is not required as a qualification for voting. I believe that is the case also in the province of Nova Scotia. We have been told that. But that is not the point. The province of Quebec is master, just as the province of Ontario is, of its own representation, and if the province of Quebec chooses to say, "This province shall recognize the right to vote of people who do not reside in the province," that settles the position. Quebec has the right to do that. Ontario has the right to do likewise so far as the representation of Ontario is concerned. By section 41 of the British North America Act it was provided that:

> Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, all Laws in force in the several Provinces at the Union relative to the following matters or any of them, namely,—the qualifications and disqualifications of persons to be elected or to sit or vote as Members of the House of Assembly or Legislative Assembly in the several Provinces.

All the provinces are absolute masters as to their own franchise, and if a province chooses to say that non-residence is not a bar against exercising the franchise in that province, that is its own business. But if the province of Ontario should say, for any reason whatever, that any British subject in Canada should have a right to vote in that province, we have nothing to say about it. The province is the absolute master in that matter. But there is a difference between the provinces deciding for themselves that non-residence is not going to be a bar to exercising the franchise in the province, and this Parliament legislating that for the provinces non-residence will not be a bar. We have not the right to impose that on the province. That is where I think my honourable friend's argument is faulty.

I repeat, in order to make myself clear, this is a federation, not a legislative union. If this were a legislative union, instead of a federation, possibly we might do this without contravening the British North America Act. The provinces came into the federation with the right of having the opinion prevailing with the population in any one of those separate entities but yet members of Confederation expressed by a certain number of men elected by the inhabitants of that province. That is what we are going to destroy. If we say that people who are not residing in Canada, British subjects, for instance, who are residing in the United States, may come and vote in any one of the provinces of Canada, what is to prevent this Parliament, on the same grounds, from saying that the people of Quebec, for instance, may vote in Ontario? There is absolutely no difference. It seems to me that that illustration brings the argument home very forcibly, particularly in view of the opinion sometimes expressed in this province against the province of Quebec. Some gentlemen in Ontario would not contemplate that with very great complacency, but that is possible if you can do what is proposed now. There is absolutely no difference between the one thing and the other. The point I wish to make is that we cannot do anything that is going to affect, not only the numerical representation of any of the provinces, but we cannot do anything which is going to hinder, affect, alter or prevent, the expression of the opinion of that province through the members which the Representation Act gives to the inhabitants of that province.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: Does not the honourable gentleman think that when we enlarged the province of Quebec twice in succession we were doing something that would disturb the basis of representation and interfere with the British North America Act to a greater extent than this does? By dividing the population of Quebec by 65, one arrives at the basis of representation for the other provinces. If the additions which were made to the province of Quebec since were to be settled with a population equal to the present population of Quebec, the unit of representation in the other provinces would be twice what it is to-day, and therefore the number of members would be reduced by half. In my judgment, that would be a very great disturbance.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: As a matter of fact, was that done?

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I think not.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: I was in the House and took part both times, I think, when it was done. We first extended the boundaries of Quebec to Labrador, and the second time we took in the additional portion of territory between Port Arthur and Winnipeg.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That which my honourable friend has described was done by an Imperial statute.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: I do not think there is any Imperial statute of that kind. The boundaries of Quebec were enlarged, and as Quebec is the pivotal province in determining the unit of representation, it cannot be enlarged if it is settled up, without disturbing that unit.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That was done by Imperial legislation, which I think is a complete answer to my honourable friend. There may be many occasions when we went beyond the powers conferred upon us by the British North America Act, but that would not bring this Bill within it if it is clearly outside of it.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: I am not contending that it would.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I would not make this all right just because we had sinned before. We are either within or without the powers of the Act of 1867. I do not think that I need say anything more than that I agree entirely with the honourable gentleman from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique), as I say, not on the first ground upon which he based his argument, but on the second ground.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: This is the Act passed and assented to on the 1st of April, 1912. It is called an Act to extend the boundaries of the province of Quebec. That extension was made subject to the following provisions:

That the population of the territory hereby added to the province of Quebec shall be excluded in ascertaining the population of the said province for the purposes of any readjustment of representation of the other provinces consequent upon any census.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: I know that proposal was debated, but I was not aware that it was included in the Act.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I have been trying to follow the honourable gentleman from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt) and the impression which I got was that the province of Quebec, for instance, could pass a franchise Act which would entitle the people of Ontario to vote in Quebec if they chose. Is that correct?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I say that the determining of the provincial franchise for provincial purposes is entirely governed by section 41 of the British North America Act, which provides:

Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, all Laws in force in the several Provinces at the Union relative to the following matters or any of them, namely, the qualifications and disqualifications of persons to be elected or to sit or vote as members of the House of Assembly or Legislative Assembly.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: The honourable gentleman draws a distinction between the rights of a province to enact a franchise law and the right of the Dominion Parliament to enact a franchise law. My impression was that, if a province could enact a franchise law empowering a man from without that province to vote therein, the Dominion could enact a similar law.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That is the whole question. Evidently I made no impression. Either the honourable gentleman misunderstands my argument, or else he is against my proposition.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I understood you to state that while the province had a right to pass a franchise Act of that nature, the Dominion had not that right.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I think there are two points to consider. The first is whether or not subsection 4 of section 3 of this Bill is constitutional. Then, assuming that it is, the next question is whether it is proper or fair legislation.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I did not argue the fairness or the unfairness of it. I was purely and simply making a legal argument. I expressed no opinion.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I did not say that. I said that I understood that the matter before the House involved two questions. Now, with regard to the first point, as to whether it is within the power of this Parliament to do what is suggested, I wish to direct the attention of this House to section 41 of the British North America Act, which has been partly read by the honourable gentleman from Ottawa. Section 41 provides for the vote at the first election of the Dominion Parliament.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I would ask my honourable friend to consider section 92, which I had intended to read.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Section 92 gives the province the power to amend its own constitution. Section 41 says:

The qualifications and disqualifications of persons to be elected or to sit or vote as members of the House of Assembly or Legislative Assembly in the several provinces, the voters at elections of such members, the oaths to be taken by voters, the returning officers, their powers and duties, the proceedings at elections, the periods during which elections may be continued, the trial of controverted elections, and proceedings incident thereto, the vacating of seats of members, and the execution of new writs in case of seats vacated otherwise than by dissolution,—shall respectively apply to elections of members to serve in the House of Commons for the same several provinces.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Go on and read it all.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (reading):

Provided that, until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, at any election for a member if the House of Commons for the District of Algoma, in addition to persons qualified by the Law of the province of Canada to vote, every male British subject, aged twenty-one years or upwards, being a householder, shall have a vote.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Two votes.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: That is an exception dealing with the district of Algoma. But the first part of the section provides that, until this Parliament passes a law with regard to voters at elections, they should use for that first election the provincial franchise. Now, granting that the provinces have the right to fix their own franchise under section 41 the section would give power to the Parliament of Canada to adopt its own franchise and to say who would vote at an election. There seems to be some confusion between the census and the voters' list. The decennial census fixes the number, of members to be elected making 65 for the province of Quebec, as the unit. But there is nothing that I know of in the British North America Act that requires that we shall take into consideration or reject the census. Up to 1912 the province of Quebec allowed non-residents to vote, not only once, but I do not know how many times more. Up to 1910 the province of New Brunswick allowed non-residents to vote. Men from Maine and the adjoining New England states came over to vote in New Brunswick, and at the last Dominion election 2,000 non-residents came into the province of Nova Scotia and voted.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: What was their qualification?

Hon. Mr. ROSS: In Nova Scotia, so far as I know, it is a land qualification. But if it is within the power of the provincial legislature to fix its franchise, it may take as a basis land, or horses, or cows, or cash in the bank. For a short time we had our own franchise and reviser's lists, and which gave very great satisfaction to both parties in the province of Nova Scotia. That, of course, is gone, but when the Laurier Administration came into power it went back to the provincial franchise. Now, through adopting the provincial franchise, you have for years allowed thousands of non-residents to vote at the elections.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That is so, but it does not affect the question.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: I am assuming now that this Parliament had the right to do that, and I have not yet heard any argument which would lead me to the conclusion that they could not. There is nothing in the British North America Act that puts any limit at all upon the powers of the Parliament of Canada to say who shall vote and who shall not vote at Dominion elections. Now, the Bill says that British subjects—I do not know that they need necessarily be British subjects; but the Bill says that British subjects who are in the army may vote. It provides for three classes: those who have a domicile in the country, those who had a domicile at one time, and those who are not able to indicate any place where they were, as I might say, domiciled.

Hon. Mr. TALBOT: They never left Canada.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: It is in the power of this Parliament to allow men to vote. The first question is, whether it is a wise thing to give them a vote, and the next is, where are they going to vote? I would take my stand on section 41. It gives the Parliament of Canada the absolute right to say who can vote and who can not vote at a Dominion election. I cannot see that there is the slightest unconstitutionality. As to the other question, from the earliest times in the history of the human race the man who was allowed to vote was the man who fought, and he was the only one. Those military times have passed away, and now civilians vote along with soldiers. I venture to say that a British subject who takes the oath of allegiance and enters the Canadian Expeditionary Force, and goes to France and fights not only for Canada but for civilization, has a better claim to a vote in Canada than tens of thousands who stay at home and work land and try to make money.

Hon. Mr. TALBOT: Or make munitions.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: Yes, or make munitions; who stay at home to make money, and are simply having the benefit of the lives and the blood that is being poured out there by soldiers. I would not waste another word in arguing as to those men having the right to vote; I am only too glad to vote for the proposition to give them a vote. There is no difficulty in voting the first two classes in this section. Then we come to subsection 4 of section 3. Assuming that they have the right to vote, this is the method that was adopted at the conference of the two parties in the other House.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: I understand that there were some men from both parties who practically settled this, and I got the names.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I think it was only a clause on which they would not agree.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: If I am right in assuming that those men are entitled to vote, it is for those who object to suggest a better way of locating that vote. I have not heard any suggestions yet that would show a better way.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If those people who would fall under subsection 4 came in numbers—it would not matter whether there was one or a hundred—electors from Newfoundland, for instance—and entered the naval forces, what reason would you advance for making them electors in Canada also?

Hon. Mr. ROSS: I give them the vote here for what they do abroad; that is their qualification; and I do not care if they have the right to vote in a thousand other places. The provision is all to be read with the main proposition—a British subject comes here and lives, and goes and fights for us, is he worthy of a vote to elect a member of the Canadian Parliament?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I answer affirmatively. My honourable friend says, if he comes here; but this clause covers those who do not come here.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: I did not say a man who comes here to vote; I say a man who lives here. It is drawing a herring across the trail to say a man has a vote elsewhere.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Would my honourable friend consider it constitutional—I have an open mind on this point—for this Parliament to adopt a provision that would give the soldiers a number of representatives in Parliament?

Hon. Mr. ROSS: There is an express provision in section 52 of the British North America Act as to how representatives in Parliament shall be elected; there is where your difficulty arises.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I have followed pretty closely the argument of my honourable friends on my side, but they have not convinced me. I am afraid that, though this clause is constitutional, all the arguments made by my honourable friend from Ottawa could be taken to show that this section is unfair, unjust, and partisan. I do not see how we can say that such a person cannot vote in such a place, because it may influence the result of the election in changing the totals in a polling division. There is nothing unconstitutional in it, provided it does not change the number of representatives in each province. I object most strongly to this clause because it is unfair, unjust, and partisan. Take an example. Suppose in a county where one side has a majority of 25, 30 or 100, the colonel of a regiment who has some influence, who is the friend of the candidate on either side, goes into the trenches and says to the soldiers: "Look here, you are or are not from Canada; you have a right to vote because you are in the war; will you please give me your vote and say you vote in Quebec county?" That would change the result. A colonel or a captain or a popular man among the soldiers might get fifty open votes which would be put into the ballot-box. That is why I say it is unfair, unjust, and I may say unpatriotic, as well as being a especially partisan. As to the question of giving the soldiers a number of representatives in the House of Commons, I am as anxious as anybody in this House that the soldiers should not only vote but be represented in the Commons. Parliament has the right to increase its representation, and I think it will be much better and more in the interests of this country and of the soldiers if, instead of arranging for soldiers' votes, as in this Bill, we should give to the soldiers at the front at least four members at large in Parliament, one representative for each 100,000 soldiers. I would be willing to vote for that at once. It would be ten times better to have four soldiers who have been at the front, and in the trenches who know all about the war, to give their views and their advice, and tell us what it is best for this country to do, than for the votes of soldiers to be given for 15, 20 or 25 members in the House. I do not think it would be fair to recognize officers who have never gone to the front and fought, but who have come back to this side after a picnic on the other side. On the contrary, some of them should be deprived of the right to vote, because they have not done their duty. I would just cite a few lines taken from the Quebec Chronicle of the 29th August. The Chronicle is a good Tory paper, the property of General Watson, one of the best officers of Quebec at the front. Here is the paragraph:

A Shameful Thing.

An unusually large number of officers returned from England to Quebec yesterday. While some of them were casualties, there is no doubt that very many of them were men who would not revert or sacrifice a grade in rank in order to go to the front. Quite a few of them have been kept in England fo many months at Government expense. In fact, we believe that the cost of paying officers that never intended to go to the front has been appalling and we are convinced that the matter should be aired in Parliament at an early date. These are the first men that conscription should reach out and gather.

These men will have a right to cast their vote in any place in this Dominion. We were told this afternoon that we must recognize bravery. That is right. There is no man I admire so much as the man who goes to the front, in spite of my opinion about conscription. I have never said a word against recruiting, and have always refused to attend meetings, even when advertised to speak, because of my admiration for those who have voluntarily gone to the front to sacrifice their lives. Neither have I gone on a hustings to induce them to go, for I believe in liberty for everybody. There is no man in Quebec who has done as much as I have to see that the soldiers were well treated. Very often in my official position I have helped to bring them back, or have seen the colonel and got them a chance, and I have got men out of jail because they were willing to go to the front. I never said a word against those who were going; on the contrary, I have always preached that those men should have the respect and admiration of everybody. I would say, give the soldiers representation in Parliament, but do not use their vote for partisan political purposes. We have said this afternoon that the right to vote is the reward for the bravery of the soldiers; but I say that is not enough. We ought to do more, and give them representation. Many officers are drawing big salaries, and, as the ex-Minister of Militia said in the other House not very long ago, have been going to picnics. One day he went to the camp and found that out of 1,500 officers there were only about 16 there; the rest were off at picnics in the mountains around Valcartier or elsewhere. That statement which the ex-Minister of Militia made in the other House is true. We have had experience of the same thing in Quebec. Are we going to give votes to such men, who go across to the other side, and who parade in London streets, in the threatres and cafés, and refuse to go to the front, because they were captains and will not go as lieutenants, because they were majors and will not go as captains, because they were colonels and will not go as majors? If these men are really loyal, if they are really sincere in the desire to win the war, they, as officers, who have tried to make a showing in times of peace ought to be the first to go to the front and stay there. But what have we seen? What has happened in Quebec? I speak of my own province because I am better acquainted with the conditions there. But I am glad to say that there are a vast number of officers from the province of Quebec, whether French or English, who have gone to the front and have taken part in the fight—men like Watson, Turner, Landry, Tremblay, Barré, Chassé and others, and have shown courage and ability. They have been in the fight, and their achievements in battle will go down in history as the deeds of brave men. They were not men who simply drew big salaries and strutted around with plumes and swords in times of peace, but who in time of war went overseas and came back without going to the front. Our men from the province of Quebec, as those like them in other provinces, have my admiration and my sympathy, although I may sometimes disagree with their views with regard to Canada's participation in this war; for on this question I stand in the position which Sir John A. Macdonald took when he spoke on the question of Confederation. Therefore I say that if we desire to reward, as they deserve to be rewarded, these brave soldiers who are ready to give up their lives, and are in the firing line to-day, we would do better by giving them, not a vote that will be canvassed by this man or that man, for this county or for that county, but by giving them representation in Parliament so that at the next session, when, I am afraid, the war will not have ended, and we shall still be engaged in it—so that at the next session they may have at least four or five representatives on the floor of the other House, who will be in a position to advise the Government and the country, and whose advice, I dare say, by reason of their sincerity and their knowledge of what is going on at the front, and by their deeds, would have a good effect in this country. But, honourable gentlemen, why should the people be bluffed? Why should there be all the talk of loyalty and the flag? Such talk is done by men who have never gone farther than London and who, according to published accounts, have been drawing salaries of $5,000 to $6,000 all the time, though they have been doing nothing in the war. I would rather deprive such men of the vote, and would rather give the vote to the soldiers who have done something for their country, and done deeds of which they may well be proud, and who will go down in history as men who have done their share, their great share, in the war.

So, honourable gentlemen, with reference to this clause I say that I agree with all the arguments which have been advanced by my honourable friend. I do not need to repeat them. This sub-section 4 of section 3 should not be left in the Bill, it should be eliminated. The soldier should not be given the right to apply his vote in any electoral district, in this place or in that place. That would be a temptation to the soldiers and would defeat the purpose of the Bill, because the ballot would be placed in the hands of a canvasser, an officer of a battalion, and the soldiers will not be free. But, honourable gentlemen, if you give the soldiers the right to elect representatives to this Parliament, and leave them to themselves, I am sure that the members of the other House would be pleased to welcome their representatives. For these reasons, honourable gentlemen, I object to subsection 4 of section 3.

Hon. Mr. DONNELLY: The honourable gentleman from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette) has expressed in very strong language his desire that the soldiers should be properly represented in the next Parliament; and to carry out his desire he suggested that they be given four representatives in the next Parliament. Now, there are some 400,000 soldier electors, and it would mean one representative for every 100,000. The average vote, I think, in the ridings of the Dominion of Canada is about 8,000.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Much more than that.

Hon. Mr. DONNELLY: I am speaking of the electors.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Fifty or sixty thousand.

Hon. Mr. DONNELLY: I am speaking of the voters, not of the population. If we follow up the honourable gentleman's suggestion, we would increase the representation in Parliament by about 50 members. So evidently his view of the right the soldiers have to be represented is that it would take the vote of 12 soldiers to equal the vote of one civilian.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: That is not fair at all.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I do not propose to detain the committee long. The honourable and learned and eloquent gentleman from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette) has made a very fine speech, and there is apparently a good deal to be said—at least he thinks there is—for his proposition that there should be, say, four seats in Parliament set apart exclusively for soldiers. I think that if the honourable gentleman had inquired, he would have found that more than four soldiers have already been nominated for the next general election. The truth is that the people of this country appreciate what their soldiers have done, and I shall be very much surprised if at the next general elections there are not at least 50 military candidates in the field. So I do not think it is necessary to take any such step as the honourable gentleman proposes.

I may be permitted, as other honourable gentlemen have been permitted, to go a little aside from this subsection which is before the committee. Something was said with respect to the increase in the territory of the province of Quebec and how unfair that might be to some of the other provinces. As a matter of fact, honourable gentlemen, I do not suppose that there are 1,000 persons in the whole of Ungava, the region which was added to Quebec.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Less than that.

Hon. Mr. POWER: The honourable gentleman who knows better than I confirms my statement; he says there are not a thousand.

Hon. Mr. POWER: So honourable gentlemen who say that the addition of the barrens and swamps of Ungava to the province of Quebec was going to upset the balance between various provinces in the Dominion are quite mistaken. They need not lose any sleep over that.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But I would inform the honourable gentleman that they are not counted; by the law they are excepted from the count.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: But then, in the law of 1897, when the boundaries were extended, no such exception was made.

Hon. Mr. POWER: The thing really amounts to nothing at all; it is a mere tempest in a teapot.

Then, something was said with respect to non-resident voters being allowed to vote in Nova Scotia. That is true, but the non-resident voter must have a property qualification in the province, which is a totally different proposition from allowing a man who was never in Canada and who has no property qualification here, to vote. The subsection which we have passed, subsection 3, is very liberal. If the military elector:

> ... cannot state or so specify an electoral district or place wherein he has so resided for the time and within the period mentioned in subsection two but can state an electoral district or so specify a place within Canada wherein he has at any other time resided, he shall be deemed an elector of the electoral district so stated or made ascertainable and his vote shall be applied thereto.

It seems to me that is very liberal, because a man who ten years ago lived for six months in some constituency of Canada could, if he happens to come within the military class, vote in that constituency. But with regard to subsection 4, I do not believe that any honourable gentleman can point to such a qualification as that in the law of any country:

If he cannot, because of non-residence or otherwise, so state or specify,—

An electoral district wherein he at any time resided:

—he shall be deemed an elector of, and his vote shall be applied to, such electoral district as he may indicate.

It comes to this, honourable gentlemen. There are, I think, about 5,000 United States citizens in the Canadian Expeditionary Forces. Under this provision, those 5,000 United States citizens who have perhaps never been in Canada except on their way to the front, can be put on the list as voters in any electoral district into which their officers choose to put them. Naturally, the gentlemen under whose auspices the election will take place will see that these votes are put in the place where they will do the most good for the party; and, as I say, I think that this proposal to give a vote to a man who does not know enough about Canada even to indicate a constituency in which he would like to vote, is a most extraordinary and unprecedented thing.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I will not be dragged into the discussion which has taken place as to the advisability of subsection 4. I have limited myself at this moment to the constitutional question and propose to continue to do so. I have a great deal of respect for the opinion of the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. Mr. Ross), and it might have shaken my own opinion if he had attempted to discuss the question. But I think he will admit that when he said that heretofore the Dominion of Canada had adopted the franchise of the provinces, and that as a matter of fact the franchises of the provinces included as voters other persons than residents—I think the honourable gentleman will admit that that is not a legal argument. I am sure he did not intend to present it as such. I would ask the honourable gentleman and all other members of this House to consider this.

The Dominion Parliament is, of course, the master of the franchise. The Dominion Parliament may pass an Act to-morrow, to adopt universal suffrage in its most extensive form—to give the right to vote to every citizen of the Dominion. I think this proposition will not be disputed, that it is open to this Parliament to-morrow to adopt such a franchise. I would like to know if this proposition is questioned by any honourable gentleman. I assume that it is not. Suppose that that were done, could this Parliament, as a second step, say that it would be open to any elector in the Dominion to decide for which electoral district his vote should be counted? Would it be claimed that it would be open to the Dominion Parliament to do anything of the kind? Would it not be the destruction of that part of the Federation Act which gave to each province a stated number of representatives, of members of the House of Commons? by giving to each province a certain number of representatives is it not implied that these representatives shall be elected by the people of the province? It seems to me it is unquestionable, and, you see, the moment you depart from the true principle that residence, or, if you like, the holding of property, is the necessary basis of the qualification to vote, then you are carried away to such extremes that you fall into absurdity. It would violate the very principle of representation.

Hon W. B. ROSS : The honourable gentleman is making the same kind of argument as that which he accuses me of making, namely: he has confounded the constitutional right to say who shall vote with the consequences of passing a bad electoral Act. The two things are different. Parliament can pass a law to chop a man's head off, but the fairness of doing so is another question. We must assume that Parliament in the exercise of its right to fix the franchise, will exercise that right as fairly as it can. A mere legal power is not destroyed by saying that the unconscionable use of that power will result in a catastrophe.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE : I am not confusing anything in the argument which I am offering. I know perfectly well that it would not be a good argument to say that the law would be an absurd one. when the law is within the power of Parliament, however absurd it may be, it is binding upon the people; but I say—perhaps I did not use an apt expression—that it would be repugnant to the principle of responsible government.

I desire to call the attention of this House and of the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) to this. The basis of our constitution is responsible government, is it not? And is it not a fact that responsible government implies residence or a property owner? It implies that the vote shall be given to persons who can be taxed, but not to aliens, non-residents, persons altogether outside of the territory, who may be living in India, or in any other part of the world. Should they have the right to vote if they have no interest whatever in this country? Is that not repugnant to the principle of responsible government?

Of course, the honourable gentleman took this position that if I was unable to show a text in the constitution limiting the rights of this Parliament, the rights exist. I think that that proposition is too broad, and I have no doubt that the honourable gentleman did not intend to have it understood as broadly as that. The true doctrine, which will not be disputed, is laid down in Lefroy's "Canada's Federal System," page 17, where he says:

> Again, the British North America Act, although upon it is established the Constitution of a vast Dominion, is, after all a statute, and Courts of law must treat its provisions by the same methods of construction and exposition which they apply to other statutes, no matter how great the constitutional importance of questions which may be raised. As the Privy Council say in their very recent judgment in respect to references by the Dominion Government to the Supreme Court of May 16, 1912: "In the interpretation of a completely self-governing Constitution founded upon a written organic instrument, such as the British North America Act, if the text is explicit, the text is conclusive, alike in what it directs, and what it forbids. When the text is ambiguous, as for example, when the words establishing two mutually exclusive jurisdictions are wide enough to bring a particular power within either, recourse must be had to the context and scheme of the Act. Again, if the text says nothing expressly, then it is not to be presumed that the Constitution withholds the power altogether.

I think this is the true principle for the interpretation of the statute. Now, I agree that I must find in the text or in the context of the Act, or in the principle upon which the constitution is based, elements to support my proposition. I think I find them in the economy of the Act itself. The Act is not that of a legislative union, but of a federation; and because it is a federation, each province is given a certain number of members in the Chamber who are entrusted with the legislative power. This legislative power and the determination of the number of representatives who are to be elected by each province depends upon the population of each province. This, I claim, indicates that the intention of the Act is that the representation should be based on the population of the province, and that in the interpretation of the Act due regard should be had to the population of each province. Then, I claim that if it is permissible to import foreigners or non-residents and give them the right to vote, and allow them to assign their votes to any of the electoral divisions in Canada, it is repugnant to the principle of responsible Government, and would defeat the entire economy of the Act.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The many differences of opinion which have been expressed with regard to this subsection must lead one to the conclusion that it would be utterly impossible to devise a provision which would appeal to all. The honourable gentleman from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) has advanced certain propositions of constitutional law which are not agreed to by the honourable gentleman from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt), who is regarded as an authority on constitutional questions. The honourable gentleman from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette), who occupied a position in the judiciary of this Dominion for some years, differs entirely from the honourable gentleman from De Salaberry and also from the honourable gentleman from Ottawa. Likewise, there have been different expressions of opinion as to the policy which should be pursued.

In the first place, it is admitted that this provision does not interfere with the representation of each province. Consequently there is no disturbance of representation. I tried to follow the argument of the honourable gentleman from Ottawa up to a certain point, when it occurred to me that he considered himself to be on somewhat thin ice and did not pursue it further. My honourable friend admits that each province has the right to govern its own qualifications for voting, and that in many of the provinces, if not in most, non-residence is not a disqualification for a voter. The honourable gentleman from Ottawa went so far as to say—at least I so understood him—that the province of Quebec might legislate, and has legislated, to the effect that residents not only from the different provinces of Canada, but from alien countries could come into Quebec and vote on a property qualification.

If a property qualification constitutes a qualification for voting, it must necessarily follow, if it is not altered by statute or by the Constitution, that any other basis would form a qualification. I ask if national service to the state is not a greater qualification than that of property. The very life of the state depends upon the national service which is rendered in the defence of the State, and, if you weigh the qualifications, it can not be contended for a moment that the property qualification will be more than an infinitesimal part of the qualification by national service.

If the provinces have the right to establish a franchise under which non-residence will permit a man to vote, then let us follow that line of argument into the Dominion sphere. The honourable gentleman from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Beique) has not yet been able to show anything within the four corners of the British North America Act, by which that proposition can be controverted. Now, we face the condition of this being the law of the Dominion of Canada for years. Non-residence has been imported into the Dominion Elections Act, as I told my honourable friends before adjournment. Now, is it because the provinces passed it?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I did not catch that remark.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I cite to my honourable friend section 30 of the Dominion Elections Act, which says:

> The provisions of the law of the province as to the places where non-resident electors shall vote shall apply mutatis mutandis to any Dominion election, and the returning officer at such election shall have the powers and be charged with the duties of the sheriff or returning officer under such provisions; but nothing herein shall enable any person to vote by schedule or otherwise than by appearing personally.

Hon. Mr. TALBOT: That does not apply to non-citizens of Canada.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If my honourable friend had followed carefully what I said before adjournment, he would have found out that it relates to non-citizens. A man living in the United States can vote in Nova Scotia or Quebec or any of those provinces where property is the qualification, provided that he is a British subject. We are not permitting any one to vote who is not a British subject.

It is because the Dominion Elections Act has adopted the franchise of the provinces, not because the Dominion Parliament has not the right to incorporate or import into its Election Act the provision that non-residence will not disqualify a voter. Because it has adopted the franchise of the provinces, it does not follow that the Dominion has not the same power. The Dominion exercises precisely the same power, but for convenience says that when a province has a certain franchise on the statute book, we will adopt that franchise, and we have adopted it, and those provinces have accepted this declaration of policy and of right by the Dominion Government. Notwithstanding any question which my honourable friend may bring to bear on it, we cannot controvert the fact that we have legislated along that line for years. Hence, it seems to me that not only constitutionally have we this right, but that on the merits of the case there was never a greater right placed upon the statute books than the right to vote given to those who at the present moment, at this most crucial time, are fighting for the defence of Canada. It therefore seems to me that honourable gentlemen should be only too glad to join the Government in giving recognition to those who are rendering service of such an invaluable character and say to them: "No people in the Dominion have a greater right than you, who are fighting not only for civilisation, but for the defence of the country in which you live."

Hon. Mr. DAVID: Does the honourable gentleman contend that the Canadian Parliament would have the power to give the right to vote to any man rendering service to Canada?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There is a difference between the right and the exercise of the right. It seems to me that the honourable gentleman from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) has confused absurdity and constitutionality. He pointed out certain propositions, and asked if it would not be repugnant to the Constitution to crystallise those absurdities into law. It might not be unconstitutional for the Parliament of Canada to resort to the most absurd legislation. It might be perfectly constitutional, but we have to assume in all things, that average intelligence shall be exercised. My honourable friends did conjure up certain contingencies that might happen: all those non-resident voters might be marshalled together and driven like so many sheep to the polling places, and their votes distributed, thus undermining the votes of certain districts in Canada. Honourable gentlemen must not come to the conclusion that anything of that kind will be done.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Is it not repugnant to the Constitution, to all constitutions, to have the votes of 10,000 or 50,000 Canadians nullified by the votes of 10,000 or 50,000 non-residents?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I will answer in this way. It would do violence to the constitution perhaps to do that under certain conditions, but we are facing conditions to-day that have no analogy in history. We are facing conditions which, if they reached their fruition, so to speak, would result in the destruction of all our institutions, and we have to adapt our legislation to national conditions which arise from time to time. And if, at this time of extraordinary happenings, we adjust our constitution to the extraordinary conditions which have been pointed out this afternoon and this evening, and which are associated with the protection of our own institutions, honourable gentlemen must not express the horror which they are doing that the Constitution is being trampled upon and destroyed.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I do not wish to discuss the constitutional aspect of this question. I think we should take it for granted that the members of this House and the members of the other House want to do justice by the soldiers. What we are trying to do is to prevent a man putting on a uniform to-day, voting to-morrow, and taking it off the next day. That might be termed legalised personation, if you wish to put it that way, because we know that improper practices are carried on during elections. Would it not be well to allocate the soldier and give him the full franchise?

The Hon. the CHAIRMAN: We are discussing paragraph c of section 2.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: They go together. If you follow the suggestion of the honourable gentleman from De Salaberry, you will also strike out subsection 4 of section 3. Is it not worth while considering whether we should allocate these men to the place where they enlisted, where they mobilised, or to an unorganised territory where they might elect, say, two representatives, instead of dividing them up in this way, otherwise there is a stigma attached to the soldiers' vote. It will be said that you are going to allow some 12,000 or 15,000 men who have no residence in Canada to vote, and that their votes can be applied to any place in Canada. If they are confined to the centres where they have been recruited, that stigma will be removed. It seems to me that that is about the only criticism which I have to make of this Bill. We are not objecting to giving the soldiers a vote, if the vote is fairly distributed. It is claimed that it is the intention of the House of Commons and of this House that it should be fairly distributed, and the criticism is for the purpose of attaining that end, and to try to do the soldiers justice.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: If one did not know something about the soldiers, who are supposed to come mainly from Canada, one would be of the opinion that they were a pack of heathens, an utterly unintelligent lot of people, incompetent to discharge the duties of citizenship, more ignorant than any class of people which can be found in the country. I think that anyone who knows anything about them will credit them with being among the most intelligent people. I should look to put a concrete case before honourable gentlemen opposite. I should like, for instance, to take them to New Glasgow, where there is a great amount of munition work going on. Men have come in from the United States and elsewhere to work at those plants. Men also have come to Nova Scotia who have resided for years in the United States, but have retained their British citizenship, and they have enlisted and are now overseas. These men are fighting in the trenches and possibly losing their lives to-night, while we are quibbling over constitutional questions as to whether they should or should not vote. I have known men who came all the way from Texas to enlist, who formerly lived in Nova Scotia, and are now overseas. They had no residence at the time, but they came over to Pictou and enlisted there.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: If my honourable friend will look at section 3, he will find that those sections provide for any man who has ever resided in Canada.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: I am talking about section 3 as well as section 4. Take the case of a man who did not reside in the country before, and who comes, perhaps at this time of the year, and enlists. Another man comes over and brings two or three hundred dollars worth of furniture with him, and takes employment in a munition plant, and settles down to draw his $6, $7 or $8 a day at that work. That gentleman will go on the list and have a vote, but the man who came over and enlisted in the forces of the country, and who goes overseas will not have a vote, if honourable gentlemen opposite could have their way. In Nova Scotia it is not necessary to possess real estate in order to qualify for voting.

A man may come into a county there in December, may rent a little building and pay $5 or $6 a month; and in the following month he becomes an elector, and would be entitled to vote in this election. The son of that man would be entitled to vote, or if he got himself assessed for a little personal property he would be a voter. The question of residence is not fundamental in Nova Scotia, nor is it fundamental throughout Canada. In regard to the men we call income voters, residence is essential; they have to be within the county for a certain length of time; but under the Nova Scotia law, as it has been amended since the breaking out of the war, a man who did not have a residence in the province before, but who comes in and stays for a few weeks and enlists and goes overseas, is a voter, his enlistment and his services being made equivalent to residence in the province. So that if this law is not adopted, the result would be the shutting out of a large number of Nova Scotians and other Canadians, British subjects, who have been in the United States, as well as a few British subjects who perhaps never resided in Canada at a previous time. It seems to me most unseemly for this House to be debating and splitting hairs about questions as to the construction of the British North America Act, as to whether we will let those British subjects vote who have come into this country and joined hands with us in its defence, and who are to-day in the trenches fighting the Germans and dying to preserve this British North America Act.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: We all agree that those men who are fighting and shedding their blood for us should vote, but where would the honourable gentleman suggest or think that they should have votes given?

Hon. Mr. TANNER: I suggest just what is in the Act, that they should be permitted to choose their own constituency.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: They do not know; they have not been in the country.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: How does the honourable gentleman understand that they do not know? Honourable gentlemen not only presume that they do not know, but they go so far as to presume that those men will be driven to the polls like a pack of sheep—that they will be dominated by their officers. I would like to see the officers who could dominate the class of men that have gone over there.

Hon. Mr. TANNER.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Nobody suggested that they would be driven. All I want to find out is the construction of this Act as to where they shall vote, not, as we say in New Brunswick, "swamp voters." Let us arrange the place where their votes should be.

Hon. Mr. FOSTER: I want to put myself on record as being absolutely opposed to the views expressed by some honourable gentlemen from the province of Quebec on the other side of the House. So far as I am concerned, and the people I represent in this House, we do not believe in a single word that the honourable gentleman has said concerning this Act. So far as the Constitution is concerned, this House is at liberty to say that a man or a woman who pays $2 a month rent or owns $150 worth of land can vote. That being so, it follows that it has the right to say that a man, no matter whether he lives in Canada or not, who is fighting for my home or his home, is entitled to say what man shall represent him and me in this Parliament of Canada. The proposition made by the honourable Senator from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette), of herding together the men who are defending us, and making 2, 3 or 4 divisions—goodness only knows where he would put them, in Alaska or Labrador, or where—and shoving them off to a corner of this country, saying that this is where they live and that is their home, is repugnant to me. I say that when the boys who have gone from my district to the front come home, whether they lived there as their home, or came in from the United States and joined our boys, I want them to come back to Brome and Sherbrooke and Compton, and not have them shoved off into the north part of this country. I say that we are entitled under the law of this country to say to those men who have gone and fought for us, that they are entitled to vote, and that they may have some discretion as to the place in which they can vote. I hold up both hands for that clause as it is, and so far as the large proportion of the people in the province of Quebec are concerned, I am certain they are in favour of this war and want to do everything they can to compensate the men who have fought for us. I favour the clause as it is.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: My honourable friend is turning this into a popular vote. Suppose they should all go to Sherbrooke, where would the rest be? I do not think that is the interpretation to be placed upon the section. Under this Act they could be all herded together in one place. I do not say they will do so, but it would be well to define the matter. Supposing a certain percentage were given to New Brunswick, a percentage to Nova Scotia, and so on, or that there should be some sort of selection of their own. Would it not be well to alter this in some shape so that the difficulty would not arise as to their being herded in one place or another?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I think there is some misapprehension in the minds of some honourable gentlemen as to just what we are doing in regard to this Bill. The honourable gentleman from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) has moved to strike out the words "whether or not" in paragraph c of section 2, and substitute therefor the word "and," which would make a military elector, being a British subject, ordinarily resident in Canada. If I understood the honourable gentleman from Brome (Hon. Mr. Foster), he was dealing with men who were entitled to vote and were resident in Canada; but we have already passed the two subsections of section 3 that deal with that situation, and the leader of the Government allowed this definition of a military elector to stand until we got to subsection 4 of section 3, which deals with the question of men who are British subjects but have never been in Canada, or have been here such a short time that they cannot describe any district in which they wish to vote, and therefore they have not been in Canada long enough to be entitled to vote in any particular district, or cannot specify any electoral district or place wherein they have resided so that they might vote in it. These men, who are British subjects, and are qualified under subsection 2 or subsection 3 of section 3 are the only ones we are dealing with at present.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It seems that when legislation is brought into this Chamber from the other House, if it refers in any way to the conduct of the war or to military matters, or to privileges to be given men who have fought, we must all close our eyes and open our mouths and swallow. It would seem as though that were in the minds of some honourable gentlemen who say, "People are fighting in the trenches to-day, and here we are discussing constitutional questions." Well, the soldiers are in the trenches to fight; and are we not here to make legislation? It seems to me that we should approach these questions with an open mind and discuss them, as it is our duty to do. Here we are, the revising body; legislation is brought to us from the House of Commons; is it not our duty to examine it in calmness, with a judicial mind if we can offer it, and reach the best possible conclusions for the country? No one in this Chamber objects to the soldiers voting. Two or three years ago, in 1914 or 1915, we unanimously passed that law. There were some amendments made to the Bill that came from the House of Commons. Those amendments were discussed in the House of Commons. When we returned the Bill there, I remember perfectly well the Minister of Justice coming over to see some members of the Senate and discussing with them an adjustment of the difference of opinion between the two Chambers, and we came to a conclusion. It seems that when we are performing the same duty, of examining a law, and we do so with no spirit of recrimination or obstruction, all suggestions that may tend to ameliorate or improve the law should be accepted. If they are not deemed acceptable, well, the majority rules.

Hon Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Up to the present time we have accepted your proposals.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We are discussing the propriety of adding British subjects who have enlisted in the Canadian Expeditionary Force, say from the United States, and who have never set foot in Canada, or who have done so just during the time of examination by the military authorities, and being sworn and leaving for the other side, and giving them a vote in Canada. I confess that no argument so far has been advanced to satisfy me that it is the correct thing to do. Take a British subject in the United States, who has been living there either three months or three years; the war is on; he is impelled as a British subject to offer his services to the British authorities, he is impelled to go and defend his King, his flag and his country, and liberty and democracy, if you will, in the bargain; he desires to enlist, go over and fight. I will appeal to the judgment of every honourable member in this Chamber, for whom is he primarily fighting? Is he not fighting for the British Crown, for his King and his country? What do these words mean—his country—to his mind and imagination? Is it Australia which he has never seen or gone into? Is it Canada, which he has never entered? It is his country, his home, the land of his ancestors, the land where he was born. Is that not logical? He goes to fight for his country and all that it represents. Well, if he happens to have a vote in England, where he comes from, or in Newfoundland, where he comes from, would he think for a moment, because he enlists here in the Canadian Expeditionary Force, at the nearest point where he can enlist, of asking for the right of expressing an opinion in the election in Canada over Canadian matters? If no news of what we are now doing reaches the trenches before the returning officer goes there, and one of those British citizens who came from the United States and had enlisted here was asked to give his vote on Canadian matters as between the two parties or between two candidates, he would say, "Well, that is not for me; I am not voting there; I have no interest there. That is not my country." He would express surprise and would feel that was not doing the right thing. He would say: "Surely not —I am from London," or I am from Newfoundland," or "I am from the United States; why do you want me to express an opinion in Canadian affairs?" That would be the first remark if he had not heard that we had done this extraordinary thing. The honourable leader of the Government admits that it is extraordinary, exceptional legislation. If it is, is there anything wrong in our discussing this extraordinary legislation, unheard of in the world up to the present time? Does it suffice to say that we are at war and these men are fighting in the trenches for us? I beg to differ. They are not fighting for us. We perhaps think that in the minds of those men we are playing a great role. No; let us be a little more modest. They are not fighting for us; they are fighting for their homes and for the Empire, for Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, as well as for Canada. But would it be thought that they should be given a vote in those colonies besides having a vote in their own land? I put these arguments because it does not seem to me that these men should vote. We are too grateful to them. There is no one in this Chamber who desires more than I that we should do all we can to win the war, but I wonder if we are doing the right thing.

Hon. Mr. GORDON My honourable friend is very much accustomed to splitting hairs, and for that reason I would just like to ask him this question.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes, providing the honourable gentleman proves that I am now splitting hairs.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: Yes. If the soldiers whom the honourable gentleman is pleased to call the British Americans who are serving in the Canadian Expeditionary Forces, went overseas to help Great Britain and not Canada particularly, what difference to Canada would that make in the result?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The general result?

Hon. Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: None whatever, but that does not mean that the whole British Army should be asked to vote in Canada.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: They are not.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There would be as much reason in that. We are all fighting for the same cause, but the Canadian soldier who is stationed in England and may be for one reason or another—I take it, for a good reason—retained for a year in some part of England, at Shorncliffe or elsewhere, will not be given a vote. Such a proposal will not enter the mind of any British statesman.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: That has nothing to do with the matter.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But our soldiers are in England. They went across the Atlantic to defend Great Britain, the Empire, the world. They are in England, but there is a distinction made between those who have interests in the country and those who are transients, and are there accidentally. My honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Gordon) asks, "What will be the difference?" I thought he was going to ask what would be the difference in Canada if they do vote. This brings me to one aspect of the question on which I would like to say a word, the constitutional aspect. In the Confederation pact it was declared that each province should have a certain number of representatives. Prince Edward Island was allowed six representatives. It has four. Let us say that it was allowed four representatives, that Prince Edward Island has a right to four representatives in the House of Commons. What does that mean? It means that those representatives shall be elected by the majority of the electors in that province, since the system of majority rule is that which prevails in Canada. The people of Prince Edward Island expect that in virtue of the contract entered into they are entitled to elect four representatives. Suppose that in Prince Edward Island there were open voting, such as we had up to 1871 or 1872. I do not know if it is not still open voting in that province. Suppose the majority in Prince Edward Island choose four representatives. The people of Prince Edward Island, in virtue of the Federal pact, have the right to send those four representatives to Parliament, for they have been chosen by the electorate of Prince Edward Island. Say the majority is 50 or 100. The British Americans have voted and their votes have been put in special sealed envelopes and can be distinguished, and when the envelopes are opened those four representatives chosen by the people are found not to have been elected at all, because 100, or 200, or 300 of those British Americans have been pleased to select the four constituencies of Prince Edward Island in which to cast their votes. Is not that repugnant to the whole economy of the British North America Act?

Hon. Mr. GORDON: No.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If the majority of the people of the province of Prince Edward Island find that by reason of the principles obtaining in Canada, they have not been able to give effect to their wishes, if the will of the majority of the people is defeated by those British Americans who have selected those four constituencies, that strikes me as being a violation of the spirit, if not of the letter, of the constitution. We must examine the situation from the point of view of the constitution. It seems to me that we are breaking faith with Prince Edward Island, to which province we promised four representatives, to be elected by the majority of the people. The vote of the majority may be wiped out by the imported vote of persons who have never been in touch with Prince Edward Island. This is where it seems to me there is a violation of the compact entered into by the various provinces.

Hon. G. W. FOWLER: Mr. Chairman, I notice that the honourable gentleman from Portage la Prairie is in favour of the soldiers having votes, considering that military service is at least equal to the property qualification. The only distinction he makes is that they should be segregated in some out-of-the-way districts cut out of our Northwest territory which is yet unorganized, and have representatives elected for those districts by the soldiers' votes. Does it not follow that if a man has the right, which he certainly has, to make a choice of the constituency in which he shall purchase his property, he has therefore the right to select the constituency in which he shall vote. As military service is equivalent to property qualification, surely the man who has qualified by military service has the right to select the constituency in which he shall cast his vote; he is as much entitled to do so as the man with the property qualification. My honourable friend from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) goes further, though; he denies the right of the soldier to vote at all.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, not the right of the soldier.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I mean the soldier from outside of Canada.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Who has never resided here.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: But who is a British subject; because only a British subject can vote; and British subjects are interested, if they are true British subjects. They have shown their devotion to the Empire to which they belong by enlisting for service.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Therefore we must say they are true British subjects. If so, they are interested in this part of the Empire as well as in the sea-girt island, or in Australia or any other part of the British Dominions. I think my honourable friend from De Lorimier cannot say that these men are without interest in the matter. My honourable friend must presume that these men are not intelligent, that they have no minds of their own, that they have no spirit with regard to this thing. I say to my honourable friend that those men who get a vote by reason of their military service will appreciate that franchise just as much as the men who acquired the right to vote by renting a place at $5 or $6 a month, as the honourable gentleman from Pictou (Hon. Mr. Tanner) has said. They will appreciate the honour that has been conferred upon them in giving them the franchise in Canada; they will take it as being in some way a reward for what they have done in enlisting in our Canadian Forces and fighting for the Empire; and, appreciating that honour, they will guard it just as sacredly as would other men, who may not vote according to their conscience, but rather according to inducements. That being the case, I do not think my honourable friend need be apprehensive that these men are going to be herded and placed in certain constituencies where, in political parlance, they may be said to do the most good. They will select with intelligence the constituency for which they wish to vote.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That is just the difficulty: they do not know.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: But they do know. My honourable friend must not think that Canada is an unknown land—that nobody knows about it. These men knew enough to come to Canada. They know where the constituencies are in Canada. They may not know the exact subdivisions, but neither do you, honourable gentlemen, nor I know the exact subdivisions throughout the country. These men will know how to cast their ballot, and will cast it intelligently. They will cast it without coercion, because, as I say—and I think my honourable friend will see the force of this argument—they will naturally appreciate the honour, as I may call it, which has been conferred upon them in granting them the Canadian franchise. They will appreciate it so much and hold it so sacred that they cannot be coerced or purchased and will cast an honest ballot according to their conscience.

The amendment of Hon. Mr. Béique was negatived.

On subsection 4 of section 3—voting by military electors:

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Mr. Chairman, I move that subsection 4 of section 3 be struck out.

The amendment was negatived.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I think that on this subsection we want a little further discussion. Of course, I am quite in favour of the soldiers having a vote, but I am not in favour of this subsection 4 of clause 3, because I think it leaves the matter altogether too wide open. I think it would be well if we could devise an amendment that would enable a man who has gone to the front and who has rendered service to the country, or even a man who has gone to Europe, to record his vote. But as I understand subsection 4 of section 3, it allows a man who is enrolled as a soldier, and who may have been in Canada only a day or two before the election, to vote. He may be discharged three days afterwards or may be disqualified on account of being medically unfit or for some such reason, but in the meantime he will have voted. I do not see that that man has rendered much service to his country. He may have been willing to do so, but he certainly has not succeeded in doing it. I think that this subsection is too wide to be left in the Bill. I suggest that it be amended so that, at any rate, the men who under this subsection are entitled to vote shall vote in certain districts, and I would therefore move:

That the words, "to such electoral district as he may indicate," in line 37, after the word "applied," be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

In the electoral district in which is situated the headquarters of the military district in which he was attested or taken on the strength of a unit.

So that the clause would read:

If he cannot, because of non-residence or otherwise, so state or specify, he shall be deemed to be an elector of, and his vote shall be applied in, the electoral district in which is situated the headquarters of the military district in which he was attested or taken on the strength of a unit.

I think that defines as well as possibly can be done the district in which the vote should be applied, and I think it will assist in preventing those votes from being all cast in any particular district, or in a way that would not be fair to the people of the country. I mentioned before that in the province of British Columbia we had some experience of trouble with the soldiers voting and that I think we should try to do everything we can, in dealing with this Act, to remove any abuses that might arise.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Mr. Chairman, my objecton to the amendment is that it gives only a qualified vote to the soldiers. It discriminates against the qualification of military service in favour of a mere property qualification. It must be remembered that many of these men, British subjects, speaking our own tongue, understanding our institutions and trained along the same lines as ourselves, have been performing military service for Canada for three years. On the other hand take the case of a man raw from Galicia, from Russia, or from Italy. He does not know our language, he has not been educated as we are, he does not understand our institutions, and yet, he is made a British subject and given an unqualified vote. He is given the opportunity of selecting where he shall pitch his vote, where he shall pitch his residence. Is that quite fair? Is that reasonable? Are we not discriminating unduly in favour of the uninformed stranger and against our fellow-subject? If we are going to extend the franchise to these men, we should not be niggardly in doing so. We should do the decent thing and give them the full franchise, the same as we would to the wild, haired denizens of the forest of Galicia who comes to this country. That seems to me to be a reasonable proposition. Honourable gentlemen should not always be watching for the joker in the pack. I am afraid that is what my honourable friends are thinking about. They should divest themselves of that idea. There is no intention of that kind on the part of this Government. The fault which I have to find with this Government is that it is too simple, too easy-going with its opponents. This Government is actuated by one desire, to win the war, and to do the right thing by those who are helping to win the war. We all want to do that. I think we should all try to do that. Do not give a qualified franchise to the men at the front, let our gift be full and free, and the new voter will cast his vote independently and honestly.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: I point out to the honourable the leader of the Opposition the utter absurdity of the amendment which he has proposed. Military district No. 12 extends from Port Arthur on the east to Regina on the west. The headquarters of that military district is in South Winnipeg, and as I understand the amendment, the whole thirty battalions in that district would vote in South Winnipeg.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: The headquarters of each regiment.

Hon. Mr. KING: It was not my intention to take part in this discussion. I have been forty years in politics, twenty years in the Senate, and I should have been in the House of Commons for the other twenty years if I had got fair play in my elections. I am surprised at the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Fowler), who stepped out into the middle of the floor and talked as he has talked. I do not want to sail under false colours, and I am not going to. I want it to be understood from one end of my province to the other, and from one end of Canada to the other, that if I had been here I would have voted for conscription. My honourable friend Senator McSweeney and I went home. We paired. I was delayed in returning on account of a wash-out on the railway, and did not get back here in time to vote. Had a vote been taken on the third reading I would have voted in favour of conscription. I have sat in my seat and held my tongue, and what have I seen? I was not surprised at the vote on the Canadian Northern Railway Bill. I am not going to impute motives to any one. I did not expect anything better. The honourable gentleman from Kings (Hon. Mr. Fowler) has now the honour of representing the county in which I was born and in which I lived for a few years. To-day that county is united with the county in which I now live. We are likely to have an election, and what is likely to happen? I do not want to impute any wrongdoing to the honourable gentleman from Kings (Hon. Mr. Fowler). He has been overseas; he says he has been at the front. I do not want to contradict him.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: You had better not.

Hon. Mr. KING: But I do not know.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I do know.

Hon. Mr. KING: To-day I have four grandsons taking part in the war. One of them has been at the front for three years. His mother has seven daughters. This boy, an only son, has been fighting for three years—longer than my honourable friend—and at $1.10 per day. What has my honourable friend been getting? Has he drawn his pay as a member of the House of Commons? Is he drawing pay to-day as a member of the Senate?

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order.

The Hon. the CHAIRMAN: I must call the honourable gentleman to order.

Hon. Mr. KING: Call him to order as soon as you like.

The Hon. the CHAIRMAN: He has no right to make personal speeches.

Hon. Mr. KING: I am asking a question.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: Will the honourable gentleman resume his seat and allow me to answer the question? I am surprised at the honourable gentleman, who says he comes from the same county that I come from, making this attack upon me. I do not know what I have done to invite it. I want to say to the honourable gentleman, who is so inquisitive with regard to my pay, that I sacrificed a very large professional income, a much larger income than I have received by reason of wearing a uniform. I abandoned large business interests in order to go and do my duty to this country. The honourable gentleman cannot understand that. There are certain men who are of so small a type that they cannot understand that.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order, order.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I am making a general remark.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The honourable gentleman was going to answer a question.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: I am going to answer the question. Some men are so small that they cannot understand a man being actuated by a high and noble motive. They are always looking for something sordid, because their natures and their lives are so sordid. While Iam a member of this Senate I am receiving no pay whatever from the military authorities. That is my answer to my honourable friend.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I rise to a point of order. The honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. King) had the floor. He has it now. We cannot have two speakers at one time.

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: He asked a question and I answered it.

The Hon. the CHAIRMAN: Order, order. The honourable gentleman from Queens (Hon. Mr. King) had better proceed with his speech and not make personal remarks.

Hon. Mr. KING: Mr. Chairman, I think that this is bad legislation. I do not impute to honourable gentlemen on the other side of the House any desire to take advantage of this legislation. I am quite sure that with my experience, which I will not refer to—I was cheated out of four elections—I could deal with this Bill to-night, but I do not propose to do so. I had hoped that on a question of this kind there would be some honourable gentlemen, one or two or three, who would have seen the fairness of amending this Bill so that men who do not belong to Canada, men who have never seen Canada, men who never expect to see Canada, should have some place assigned to them to vote, so that their votes will not be spread broadcast wherever they may be expected to defeat a Liberal candidate. My honourable friend from Kings (Hon. Mr. Fowler) is in a position to cultivate some of his friends on the other side and thus defeat the Liberal candidate in the county which he has represented for a long time. I am not saying that he did not represent it fairly, but I know that he will turn every effort in that direction. It is not fair to take advantage of this provision in that way. I have already stated where I stood on the question of conscription; but if I had known the character of the legislation which the Government was going to attempt to railroad through both Houses since that vote was taken, I would have opposed conscription.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order, order.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: That question is not before the House.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK.

Hon. Mr. KING: I am not in the habit of speaking, as may be judged from the way in which I have expressed myself to-night, but at the same time I know what I want to say, and, Mr. Chairman, if I do not comply with what you think is right, I am willing to withdraw. Let me point out the effect that this Bill will have. Right alongside of me sits a gentleman from Prince Edward Island (Hon. Mr. Yeo). There are four seats in Prince Edward Island, and the probability is that 50 votes would change the result of an election there and send four Conservatives straight to Parliament instead of the representation being half and half, as it has been of late years. There are men who would think there was no harm in collecting those votes for that purpose if they had the opportunity to do so. So far as I can see, the country is now scarcely worth saving. In view of the efforts which are being made I would not be at all surprised to see the Government returned. I would be very much surprised, however, to see them govern the country long after Parliament meets.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: I merely want to ask the leader of the Opposition if he has thought of the effect of his motion if it is carried. 92,000 men joined battalions in Toronto in military district No. 2.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: They would not come under this clause.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: If the honourable gentleman will have a little patience I will explain. I think I am quite capable of telling my own story; and if I do not tell it correctly I shall be very glad to hear from the honourable gentleman and his friends behind him. Among those 92,000 men who enlisted in that district there are thousands who come from different parts of the country. Some of them come from as far away as Texas. If this amendment were carried all these absentees who enlisted in Toronto would be herded together and would cast their vote in one district. The case I mention is stronger than that mentioned by the honourable gentleman from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. McMeans). It is much better to leave the Bill as it is unless you want not only to influence but to carry your riding. Apart from what I have already said, there are two or three thousand men who have enlisted in Toronto from other districts in Ontario. Under the Bill they could cast their votes in those districts.

The amendment of Hon. Mr. Bostock was negatived.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: What is the object of inserting those words "or other places" in paragraph d when the definition of "camp" in section 2 b mentions base, barracks, rest station, ship, dockyard, hospital or other place? Would not that definition cover?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No; there might be a place that would not be within the meaning of that definition; for instance, if men were "assembled under a commanding officer for the performance of any military or naval duty." These words are inserted simply to cover some unlooked for place where men may be found.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The places where the votes are to be taken are designated by the presiding officer, are they not?

Hon Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They are to take those votes wherever they are, but this paragraph simply provides that they may exercise their power in designated places or other places.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The language seems to be very general. The men are usually in some designated place.

Hon Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: You cannot be sure of that at all times in a condition of war. It is simply for caution.

On subsection 2 of section 5:

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: The difficulty I see about that is that there is no way of rectifying afterwards anything that might occur in reference to the ballots and envelopes.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not see any other precaution that we can take. We have to take some chances.

On section 6—information as to candidates:

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: I was going to suggest that this would delay the fighting if they have to get boards and put them up. They would not be able to fight like my honourable friend from Kings (Hon. Mr. Fowler).

On subsection 1 of section 8—conduct of polls:

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I would suggest changing "the day" on line 7 to "two full days," so as to enlarge the time before the polling commences and give time to have the posting done. It is incumbent upon the officers after the nomination day to telegraph the names of the candidates; but that might take twenty-four hours. Then it is incumbent on the officer also to post in the camp the names of the candidates. It would be better to allow one full day after the nomination.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We might let that stand until we can look into it.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: There is a difference of five hours in the time, so that if the polls here closed at five or six o'clock it would be eleven o'clock in the evening there, and they would have no time at night to put out those bulletins.

Section 8 stands.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Under section 8 the polls are assigned to the charge of presiding officers, but there does not seem to be provision for assigning those polls, unless it be in paragraph d of section 4.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Let that stand, and I will get the information.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: I desire to call attention to the question of the ballot boxes.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What is it my honourable friend desires to know?

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: The question of the ballot boxes is mentioned in e and g, also in b. We have had a very sad experience in that respect. In New Brunswick we have known of ballot boxes disappearing. I have in my pocket affidavits, but I do not want to produce them.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would say to my honourable friend that the ballot boxes are those approved, as I understand, under the Elections Act. I know of no other ballot box that will be used than that sanctioned by law.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: That is the point that I am making.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What is the point?

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: That care should be taken to see that the ballot boxes cannot be moved out.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is reasonable.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: We had this question of loose ballots to deal with before.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: If the bottoms were fastened with copper, would that do?

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Yes; but the man in question is sitting in the Government today, in the other House.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Mr. Chairman, I would draw the attention of the honourable leader of the Government to paragraph e:

The voters shall fold the ballot, place it in the envelope, securely close the same and hand it to the Deputy Presiding Officer.

The same system, I believe, was adopted with regard to the voting in British Columbia:

Hon. Mr. WATSON: This is for the voting in France.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: There were brought to notice afterwards a number of cases where, when the envelope was handed over to the returning officer, no ballot was found in it. It would be a good thing, I think, if we could provide some way to prevent that. It might be necessary to provide that the deputy presiding officer should see the ballot placed in the envelope.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That has always been very much questioned, because it is susceptible to interference with the secret voting. The voter himself places the ballot in the envelope. Of course there is no means of compelling a voter to put a ballot in the envelope. He may, as many a voter does, wish to escape voting. He may seal the envelope, keep out the ballot, and hand the envelope to the deputy returning officer. I do not see how we can overcome that. Many a voter is under the impression that the voting is not secret and for that reason he withholds the ballot.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: It is all a question of whether fraud may be undertaken or not. We are entirely in the hands of the Government, with their subordinates, to see that every care is taken that the ballot shall not be tampered with.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We will try to see to that. Both sides of the House, I think, have together worked this out.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: They might get together—I have seen them get together in a polling district.

On section 8—polls and voting:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: May I return to section 8 for a moment. The presiding officers are appointed by the Governor in Council.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Are they assigned to certain districts?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, to particular districts, just as any returning officer would be assigned to a constituency. I may say that I saw the Prime Minister about this a few moments ago. The object of fixing the commencement of polling for "the day following" was this, that it was desirable that as much time be given to the men as possible. If we make it the second day after, these men may be ordered out on an assault or may be ordered into action. We cannot tell. The assumption is, in fact, that they cannot vote unless they have the names. Therefore, it is very desirable that whatever time can be given to the vote should be given, and if the names come the day following, as is provided in section 8, the day "following that of the nomination of candidates," they should use that time at once. That would be the object, because one cannot say at what moment they will be ordered to move.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: But I understand that the point made by my honourable friend from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) was that in the case of the names not arriving——

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I have asked the Minister of Justice to come over and explain to me any of these points.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: He would be welcome here to explain this himself.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: A new member.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have been advocating for the last eight or ten years the idea of having the Ministers from the other House come over here and take part in our debates in presenting their own measures. I welcome the honourable the Minister of Justice.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I wish my honourable friend had continued to press for that.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The point made by the honourable gentleman from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) is that if the voting starts the day after nomination, the names of the candidates will not have reached the other side, nor will they have been posted. He thought if 24 additional hours were given after which the voting would start, there would be time for the transmission of the votes to the other side.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It seems to me quite manifest that polling cannot possibly take place until the names are received officially—

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Why does not the Bill say so?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: —because the polling is conducted under duly authorized officers and according to duly authorized methods, and if those names have not reached there the day following, the polling cannot proceed until they are received. But the principal consideration in the House of Commons, as has been stated to me by the Prime Minister and now by the Minister of Justice, was that immediately the names are received—and they will be forwarded the moment they can be—no time should be lost, on account of the uncertainty of the time at the disposal of those men. They may be ordered into action.

Brigadier General Hon. Mr. MASON: On account of military exigencies.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Military exigencies may demand that they use every moment at their disposal.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: There is a difference in time between this country and Europe.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is to our disadvantage.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: It seems to me the voting should not take place before the names of the candidates are made known to the members of the camp, and as the subsection is drafted I think there is no guarantee at all that the voting will not take place. We must remember the difference in time.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: That and the difference of 24 hours make two days.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It gives 27 days in which to enter the voting.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: As I have already said, the exigencies of the situation may be such as to deprive the men of the ability to vote.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: If I am not mistaken, further down in the Bill there is a provision allowing the vote to be taken in case of emergency.

On subsection 2 of section 10—military elector resident in Canada:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There is an amendment which I wish to make in line 45 of section 10, page 8. After the word "service" I wish to insert:

> or in the case of an officer the official letter or document from competent authority releasing him from service.

That is practically a repetition of the amendment which is made on page 2.

On subsection 1 of section 11—forwarding the ballots:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I should like to ask the leader of the Government how this officer is going to put the documents in the box. If my understanding is correct, the keys are in the hands of the officer to whom the box will eventually be sent. The presiding officer cannot put the documents into the box through the slit where the ballots are inserted.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If my honourable friend will look at paragraph a of section 2 he will find out how it is done.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The slit will be big enough to put in an envelope containing a ballot paper; but will it be big enough to put in the documents?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They will be forms which may be folded up and put through the slit.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: From what I have seen of these matters I think the opening in the ballot box would be too small.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It has already been demonstrated that the slit will be sufficiently large to permit of the entry of the forms which will be used.

Subsection 1 of section 11 was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: I would remind my honourable friend that the half-hour which he mentioned has gone by.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Would my honourable friend prefer finishing to-night or sitting to-morrow morning?

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: I would rather sit to-morrow.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Then we will rise and adjourn until the morning.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There is very little on the Order Paper for to-morrow afternoon.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If my honourable friends wish to rise, I would prefer to sit in the morning.

Progress was reported.

LIVE STOCK BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 123, an Act respecting live stock.

He said: This is a bill to provide for the establishment of live stock exchanges throughout Canada wherever there are stockyards. It practically proposes to place the administration of the stockyards, so far as the exchanges are concerned, in the hands of the Department of Agriculture. Licenses will be issued to persons wishing to conduct an exchange business, which will greatly facilitate all transactions in live stock.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned until eleven o'clock to-morrow morning.

THE SENATE.

Thursday, September 13, 1917.

First Sitting.

The Senate met at Eleven o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

MILITARY VOTERS' BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE. AND REPORTED.

The Senate again went into committee on Bill 127, the Military Voters' Act, 1917.—Hon. Sir James Lougheed. Hon. Mr. Daniel in the Chair.

On subsection 3 of section 12—opening of envelopes, and deposit of ballots in boxes:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Is this a sorting of the ballots? How is that done in the first instance? Do they take all the ballots out of the boxes and sort them out first of all, and then are they sent to other places to be counted?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The envelopes are allocated first. The ballots are then removed from the envelopes and counted.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The envelopes are first sorted out according to constituencies?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The removal of the ballots from the envelopes and the counting of the ballots are separate operations. First, the envelopes are allocated; then the ballots are taken from the envelopes, which is another operation.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: That is all done by the deputy presiding officer?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, special returning officers. Those are selected by both political parties, so that one will be a check upon the other.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Who are selected—the special returning officers?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Those who allocate and count the ballots represent both political parties, half being selected by the leader of the Opposition, and the other half by the Government, no two of the same political party working together. That is provided in an earlier section of the Act.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: If in any constituency there are five candidates, what takes place?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: In paragraph e, subsection 1 of section 4, my honourable friend will see that:

> Six scrutineers, three to be appointed on the nomination of the Prime Minister, and three on that of the leader of the Opposition.

Then, in paragraph c of subdivision 1 of section 4:

> A sufficient even number of special returning officers, and the same number of clerks, of whom one clerk shall be assigned to each special returning officer.

You will observe that under paragraph c of subsection 1 of section 4 this selection is to be made by the representatives of both political parties, so as to assure absolute fairness and the elimination of all early activity on the part of the officials. It seems to me we have enough trouble in making provision for the two parties without taking into consideration a third party.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: It is very well for the two dominant political parties in Canada to look after their own interests, but what about the other parties who have some substance and who have been strong enough to maintain this Government in power for the past six years? What about their rights and their interests? Should they not have representatives? That is a fair question.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The answer to that is that Parliament gives official recognition to only two parties. Parliament has already made provision for the recognition of the leader of the Opposition and he is designated and recognized in the same way as the Prime Minister, as being the leader of that particular party. Then of course there is the Government party. Outside of that we simply have to adjust ourselves to any unlooked-for conditions that may arise.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I saw the other day in the press a statement from the Prime Minister that the Tory-Nationalist coalition was off, that he had repudiated his allies; so that at all events they are now recognized as a third party.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend is drawing on his imagination when he speaks of a Tory-Nationalist party.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It was not imagination on the night of the last elections.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If my honourable friend referred to the Liberal-Nationalist party he would be in line with the facts.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: Suppose that the next general election is of the same kind as we had in 1911, with Tory candidates and Tory-Nationalist candidates?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Subsidized by the Tory funds.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: Subsidized by the Tory funds and supported by the Tory organization in Quebec, which, as is generally known, gave their money. If a vote is given—

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I think we are getting away from the point.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: Suppose a vote is given—

The CHAIRMAN: I think the honourable gentleman is not sticking to the clause before the committee. We are on subsection 3 of section 12.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I think I was perfectly in order in raising the point. I want scrutineers for all who are interested. I am prepared to have the Government's proposal accepted as far as it goes, but I feel that throughout the country there are other interests besides the Conservative and Liberal interests. There is the Labour interest; there is the Independent interest; there is that Nationalist interest, which is quite a strong one—strong enough to be allied with the great Conservative party of this country to maintain power. Is it not fair for the Government to take precautions to give to their allies, the Nationalists, who have kept them in power—is it not fair for the Government to give them proper protection in this election? In 1911 nobody knew what was going to happen. The Nationalists put into the field some 35 or 40 candidates and they captured 27 or 30 seats.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Perhaps it would be a relief to my honourable friend if I pointed out to him that on page 17 of the Bill there is a ballot which makes provision for the Independent candidate, and provision for the Labour candidate.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: But where are his scrutineers? He will not have any.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He will have to look out for scrutineers.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I would point out to my honourable friends that the Government apparently has given some recognition to the idea of there being an Independent or Labour party, because in subsection 5 of this same section, that question is dealt with:

> Such recognition shall be made in the case of the Government party by the Prime Minister, in the case of the Opposition party by the leader of the Opposition, and in the case of any Independent or Labour party by the recognized leader of such party.

But no provision seems to have been made for an Independent or Labour party being recognized at the time of counting the ballots.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER: What about the women's party?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I have nothing more to say. We have done all we could.

Subsection 3 of section 12 was agreed to.

On subsection 7 of section 12—ballot not rejected for uncertainty if intentions of voter can be seen on mere inspection:

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Does not a danger lurk in this clause? A ballot need not fully describe the candidate; his Christian name may be badly spelled or may be omitted. Who is going to identify such a man if a full description is not given? It has happened before now that a man whose name was not on the ballot-paper has claimed to be elected. The voter may say, "I vote for Mr. Smith," and there is no indication of who Mr. Smith is. How is he going to be identified? Any old Smith can come along and claim the election.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The language is quite clear. The ballot is not rejected if it is possible to ascertain the intention by mere inspection.

Hon. M. CLORAN: But if the intention of the voter becomes apparent, the special returning officer decides.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: We are not fighting on party lines. I am asking for information so that this clause may be made clear. I am surprised that the gentlemen behind the leader of the Government are not as considerate as he is. He is quite willing to give the information.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am glad to answer.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: All I have to say is that there still exists a lurking danger. Such things as I have mentioned have happened, not only in time of war but in time of peace, and men have claimed elections because the candidate was not properly described.

Subsection 7 of section 12 was agreed to.

On subsection 8 of section 12—ballot-box not received on time, or appearing to be opened, defective certificate, or envelope appearing to be opened:

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: That means the box would not be examined at all.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: That is what it says.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: It would be thrown aside and not considered.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If it appears that the box has been tampered with it will not be used, and the reason why it has not been examined will be stated.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: Will it be thrown aside definitely?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: It should be ascertained who has tampered with the box.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If it has been tampered with, it is useless to examine it.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: The only inference I can draw from that section is that a person having a knowledge of the contents of the box might do damage to it if he were not in sympathy with the contents.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The same condition might arise from various causes. Assuming that any one wanted to destroy the result of the vote contained in the box, he might destroy the box.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: I do not think it ought to be thrown absolutely to one side. I think it should come forward to this country or to some place where it could be looked into.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It will come forward, but it will not be looked into by the overseas officers.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: Do I understand, then, that the votes will be lost, or can we get an order from a judge in that district to open the box?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The boxes will be sent to Canada. They will be amongst the documents of the election returns, and it will be for the Government or Parliament to determine what is to be done with those boxes.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: Would not the result of the election have been declared and the candidates elected before such dealing with that box could have any influence upon the election?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: This Bill is going to open up a very fat field for lawyers in contested elections. The lawyers throughout the Dominion of Canada are going to have a nice time of it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They have to live, you know. My honourable friend belongs to the legal profession.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I do.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If the honourable gentleman looks at the last part of subsection 10 he will see that the boxes are to be returned to Canada.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: Does not the Secretary of the High Commissioner's office practically handle the elections over there, and does he not determine the results of the vote before he returns the ballots to Canada?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, but in any contested or controverted election the results may be finally changed after the boxes are sent to Canada, and after the recount.

Subsection 8 of section 12 was agreed to.

On subsection 10 of section 12—ballots, after counting, to be sent by commissioners to general returning officer at Ottawa:

Hon. Mr. POWER: The honourable the leader of the Government said there was a provision that the ballot-boxes which had been tampered with would be forwarded to Canada. That provision would naturally come under subsection 10.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Will my honourable friend look at clause e of subsection 10? It says: "Any other documents—"

Hon. Mr. POWER: A ballot-box would not be a document.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The contents would be.

Subsection 10 of section 12 was agreed to.

On section 13—duty of every returning officer, under Part III, to send certificate, ballots, etc., to general returning officer:

Hon. Mr. POWER: The committee have already made one or two slight amendments to this Bill. Therefore I think the leader of the House will probably be willing to accept any suggestion which would really be an inprovement. Commencing at line 22, this section says:

—the report required by section 213 of Part III, and after the sixth day after he has made such final additions, transmit to the general returning officer—

Would it not be well to insert the word "immediately" before the word "after," because "after" might mean six months after?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I have no objection to that, although this is the language of the Elections Act.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I move that the word "immediately" be inserted before the word "after" in the 23rd line.

The amendment was agreed to, and, section 13 as amended was agreed to.

On subsection 1 of section 15—final addition and recount by judge under this Part:

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: Is not four days too short a time? That is the number of days mentioned in the Dominion Elections Act, but in this case there has to be communication with the other side. Why not say six or eight days?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Under subsection 2 of the same clause authority is given to the judge if application is made, to extend the time.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: Yes, but application will have to be made. Those who are interested in a party here may want to make application.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: All those proceedings take place on the other side of the water.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: Those supervising the proceedings may not want to take on themselves the responsibility of asking for a recount.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This is a rather extraordinary proceeding in the case of the ballot-boxes being lost in transit to Canada. If it is thought advisable to have a recount, they will exercise their own discretion. I am afraid the time would be very short for that.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Do I understand that the boxes from France go first of all to the High Commissioner's office in London, and then from there to Canada?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If it is desirable to have a recount on the other side, the ballot boxes would have to be sent from France to England, but only for that purpose.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: How will you count the votes if the soldiers die in the meanwhile?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: So long as the votes are recorded by living men they are good.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: It does not make any difference whether they die or not?

Hon. Mr. JAMES LOUGHEED: We would all be very sorry for that.

Section 15 was agreed to.

On Form B—certificate to be endorsed on the ballot envelopes:

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: What would occur within those twenty-eight days if there were a change of Government?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We would simply have to recognize it with the Christian resignation that always characterizes the Conservative party.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: If a man says, "I vote for the Government," and there is a change of Government, what would happen?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The new Government would get the advantage of it.

Form B was agreed to.

On Form D—oath or affirmation of honourably discharged military elector:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I should like to make a change in this form to harmonize with the other I made, by inserting in the sixth line, after the word "discharge," the following words: "or, if an officer, I produce the official letter or document from competent authority releasing me from service."

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: But the oath does not recite what has taken place.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is proposed to amend it by this recital.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: A man who is rejected as being medically unfit is discharged?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He never becomes a member of the Force.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: Suppose he is two or three months in Canada and is trained, and then reported for medical unfitness, he goes out, would he get an honourable discharge?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: And if he goes to the front anywhere, he would get a vote under this Act?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: And his relatives would get a vote under this Act?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Not under this Act.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: What is the object of that amendment? Is not a soldier just as good as an officer?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend was not here when I explained yesterday that under the Militia Act a private or a non-commissioned officer receives a discharge on leaving the service. An officer does not; he is simply relieved or released from service. This amendment provides that that shall be equivalent to the discharge of the private.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I understand that now. I want to point out that when a soldier is discharged he has no more pay and no more honour. When an officer is discharged, you let him down easily. Does that officer remain under pay?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, he goes off the list.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: If he were in the Senate he would still draw his pay.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No.

The amendment was agreed to, and form D, as amended, was agreed to.

The Bill as amended was reported.

LIVE STOCK BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE AND REPORTED.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into committee on Bill 123, an Act respecting live stock. Hon. Mr. Thompson in the Chair.

On section 5—live stock exchange at stockyards:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Is there any provision in this Bill that will prevent these live stock exchanges becoming close corporations in time?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The matter is entirely in the minister's hands. My honourable friend might look at section 4.

The Bill was reported.

OTTAWA SEPARATE SCHOOLS CASE.

DISCUSSION CONTINUED.

The Senate resumed from September 10 the adjourned debate on the statement and inquiry of Hon. Mr. Landry respecting the Ottawa Separate Schools case.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I have only a few words to add to this debate. I agree entirely with every word that has been said by the honourable member from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt). The Act as passed by the province of Ontario is in complete disregard of the judgment rendered by the Privy Council and in violation of the most sacred rights. I had hoped that a few voices at least would have been heard in this House amongst the honourable members speaking the English language, who would have resented legislation of that kind, which treats the judgment of the Privy Council as a scrap of paper. When the venerable member for Hastings (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell) adjourned the debate, I hoped, appreciating as I do his sound judgment, his great experience, the full possession which he has retained of all his faculties—I was hoping that with the serenity of judgment pertaining to his great age he would have found in his good heart the proper expression with which to qualify legislation of this kind. I must confess, however, that I was disappointed, and the only word that I desire to add is to say how depressing such a state of things is for anybody who entertains the proper ideals of the future of this country.

Hon. P. A. CHOQUETTE : I had expected the other night that the honourable member for Hastings (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell), who in the opinion of all is a very wise, honest and impartial man, would have given his views on this question. After the very eloquent and convincing argument advanced by both the honourable member from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry) and the honourable member from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt), he said, if I remember correctly, that there was another side to the question, and he moved the adjournment of the debate in order, as I thought, that at the next sitting he might deal with the other side of the question. When the honourable gentleman stood up I was on my feet, but I was glad to resume my seat in order to give him the opportunity to speak first and answer the argument put forward by the two honourable gentlemen whom I have just mentioned. I would have been particularly pleased to hear the reasons and arguments of my venerable friend on this question. I feel very strongly upon it, but my mind is open, and I would have heard with interest any reasons the honourable gentleman might give. I do not know why he has not given the reasons he intended to adduce. At the last sitting he said that the case being before the court, it was not proper to talk of it. Well, I think he is mistaken, and on that point I would take issue with him. The case as put forward by the honourable gentleman from Stadacona is not, as a matter of fact, before the court. It is before the Government of this country. The sole question to which the honourable gentleman from Stadacona has directed the attention of this House is the fact that the two Acts of the Ontario legislature to which he referred were now before the Government in the form of a petition asking for their disallowance. So the case is not before the courts, but before Parliament, and this was the proper time and the proper occasion for the honourable gentleman to give to this House his opinion. As I have said, my mind is open; and, knowing the honourable gentleman as I do, knowing what he has done in the past, knowing that he has even suffered from his own friends—his nest of traitors, as he said, because of the position he took on a somewhat similar question—I think, a correct one—the members, especially those on this side of the House, and above all the French Canadian members, would have been glad to know the reasons of my honourable friend; and I am sure that they would have carried some weight and might perhaps have removed some prejudices. So I am sorry that the honourable gentleman did not think it proper to speak. He has, then, withdrawn from the field of battle.

Now, honourable gentlemen, I do not want to go at length over this question, for I could not advance stronger reasons than those brought forward by the two honourable gentlemen whom I have mentioned. I desire only to give some proof of what they have said, to show that fair-minded men, educated men in Quebec and Ontario, professors in universities, are against what is going on now in Ontario and are implicitly asking for the disallowance of the Acts passed by the Ontario Government, saying that those measures, even if ultra vires, are unfair, unjust, despotic and Prussian-like. And I will give some proof of that.

The honourable gentleman from Ottawa, in arguing the case following the address by my honourable friend from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry), has shown how the French people have been deprived of their right to their own language and have been condemned to pay heavy penalties or be sent to jail, simply for having, as school trustees in Ontario, permitted the teaching of the French language in schools where the majority of the pupils, if not practically all the pupils, were French. We have always been told that Ontario was the specially loyal province of this Dominion. In fact, the people of Ontario seem to believe that they have the monopoly of loyalty, that they always obey the laws, that they always respect the British flag and always stand by it; and naturally they say the French Canadians, from Quebec above all, are against all that; that they are disloyal, they do not like the British flag, they are jealous of the English people, and so on. Honourable gentlemen, let us see who are the men in this country who are loyal to the Empire and always ready to submit to the law of the land, to the decision of the highest courts, not only in Canada, but in the Empire, and who would never speak a word of defiance against this highest authority. I do not wish to go back and refer again to the time of the cession of Canada to the British Empire and bring up the report of General Murray, the first Governor General of Canada after the cession, in which he stated that the English of the time were causing all the trouble, because they were trying to deprive the French Canadians, who were then in a large majority, of their rights and to prevent them from holding any public office or even from sitting on juries. We all remember that General Murray stated that the then few English residents were the most immoral collection of men in the country; that they had their fortunes to make, and few of them were solicitous about the means when the end could be attained. Later on it was such people who attempted to burn the parliament buildings because the Governor General was going to sign a Bill which had been passed by Parliament to give justice to those to whom justice was due. In that instance again, you do not find the French Canadians defying the law or throwing rotten eggs at the Governor. No; it was the English people, who then were signing petitions for annexation to the United States. You have never heard of the French Canadians doing that.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I do not see why the honourable gentleman is mentioning all these things, which are not relevant to the present discussion. I think the honourable gentleman should confine his remarks to the subject of the motion made by the honourable member for Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry). It is not necessary to say anything injurious to anybody in the discussion of that question.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: With reference to the motion asking for disallowance, I was going to say that this Act of the Ontario legislature ought to be disallowed, because it has been passed in defiance of the decision of the highest tribunal of the Empire, the Privy Council.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: That is merely the honourable gentleman's statement. It is not correct.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: The facts are there. The facts are that a law has been re-enacted after a similar law passed by the same legislature had been declared unconstitutional, ultra vires, by the Privy Council. Now they are defying the judgment of the highest court in the land. These facts cannot be denied, and it would seem to be customary in Ontario to do such things. Not later than last week there was read in the Railway Committee a telegram from the mayor of Toronto; I am glad to say it has since been withdrawn; but the mayor of Toronto telegraphed to the committee not to pass a certain law; that if any such law were passed he would defy it; he was prepared to call out the whole police force of Toronto, and if necessary the militia, in order to prevent those who had rights under the law from doing any work in the streets of Toronto.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Order. I repeat my warning that the honourable gentleman has no right to depart from the question before the House.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I am only speaking of defiance of the law and have been citing all these bad examples given by loyal Ontario, and I claim that these instances have a bearing upon the motion which is now before the House, that these Acts of the Ontario legislature be disallowed.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The motion itself covers two pages. Surely that is enough for my honourable friend.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I think that if the honourable gentleman would take the trouble to read the motion again, he would see—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: These questions are not referred to in the motion.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: At any rate, this Act ought to be disallowed, because it is in defiance of the decision of the highest tribunal in the land. I will go further: I say that in passing that law, in depriving men who are paying taxes from the right to be represented on the Board of school trustees of Ottawa, we are going back to the dark times when those who paid taxes had no representation. We know that many battles have been fought in every country, especially in England and in this country, to obtain representation for those who pay taxes. The slogan has been, "No taxation without representation." Now, what is the effect of the law which the petitioners are asking to have disallowed? It is a law which takes from the taxpayers of Ottawa the right to elect their own representatives. Those persons belonging to a certain class, and paying taxes in this city, had the right under the constitution of the province of Ontario to elect their own trustees. They are deprived by this law of those rights and their elected representatives are replaced by a commission appointed by the Ontario Government. Those ratepayers have been deprived even of the right to dispose of their own money. Is not that a fact? Then the petitioners say, "We ask that this law be set aside by the Dominion Government for these reasons," and I think they are very good reasons.

Now, as the honourable gentleman from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt) said, let us suppose the case reversed. Take the law passed by Ontario on this subject, and particularly regulation 17, and change the word "French" to "English" and put that law in the statute books of Quebec. What would be the result? The honourable gentleman said very truly that there would be a revolution in Quebec; the English-speaking people would certainly fight that law. However, I dare say there will be no revolution, because never would a government in Quebec think for one moment of doing such a thing. But if it were done, what would be the result? I will quote to this honourable House the words pronounced by a gentleman well known in Quebec, one of the brightest judges, the Hon. Mr. McCorkill, who had long been a member of the local House from the Eastern Townships of Quebec, who has been provincial treasurer, a member of the Legislative Council, and a member of the Protestant Committee of Education, who adorned the Bench of Quebec for many years. A dinner was given by the Canadian Club of Quebec to the Hon. Mr. Belcourt, of Ottawa. He was asked to put plainly before the people of Quebec the question of the bilingual schools in Ontario and especially to explain the famous regulation 17. The Hon. Mr. Belcourt came to Quebec, both French and English-speaking men were gathered at the meeting, and the Chairman was, I think, Mr. Justice McCorkill himself, though I am not absolutely sure. At any rate, Judge McCorkill listened to the able address which was delivered by the honourable gentleman from Ottawa on the same lines as he spoke here, giving a synopsis of the Ontario Bill and explaining particularly regulation 17. After his forceful and eloquent speech, Mr. Justice McCorkill was called upon to offer a vote of thanks. Let me read to you what he said:

> They have adopted our system, but there are two things they have clung to, their religion and their language. I believe that their national sentiment—

He was speaking of the French-Canadian people.

> I believe that their national sentiment is stronger even than their religious sentiment. I really believe so. The national feeling amongst them is intensely strong. But I would ask you, English, Irish and Scotch descendants born in this country and brought up here, supposing a regulation similar to No. 17 were passed in the province of Quebec, what do you think our duty towards it would be? Supposing Sir Lomer Gouin—I cannot imagine it, but suppose he did have the courage, or the nerve so to speak, to pass a regulation of that kind, there would be a rebellion in this province, I think. And here we have our French Canadian brethren of the sister province who, by constitutional means, are trying to obtain the repeal or the modification of the regulation, or some other settlement of the question which would be satisfactory to all concerned.

This is the language of one of the most prominent Englishmen in Quebec, a member of the Protestant Committee of Education. He says that if a by-law like regulation 17 passed by the Ontario Legislature were passed by the Quebec Government against the English-speaking people, there would be a revolution in Quebec. Is it not sufficient to cite that to show that this law, including this regulation, and all similar laws passed by that Government, ought to be disallowed by the Federal Government even if they were constitutional, because, even if constitutional, they are against the good feeling which ought to prevail in this vast Dominion? They are unjust to nearly half of the population of this country, and prejudicial to the welfare of the country and of the Empire itself.

Now, I may be permitted to cite the language of Professor Squair, formerly a teacher of the French language in the Toronto University. I quote from a Toronto paper:

> Prof. Squair urged that the flexible and expressive French language be taken up as a serious study in Ontario schools. Hitherto it had been treated as though fit only for ladies. He said that men could surely not wish any more virile vehicle of thought than that used by the heroes of the Marne and Verdun, who had held back the Huns and saved civilization. French had always been, and still is, the language of diplomacy and the highest type of literature.

Why pass by-laws depriving the French people of the use of their language, which, as Professor Squair says, is the language of diplomacy.

Now, at a meeting of the English Public School Committee in the city of Ottawa, one of the inspectors or professors said that a kind of referendum had been taken among the students with regard to the teaching of the French language. I am glad to say that the people of Ottawa are not as bigoted as some other people in Ontario. This gentleman said that 90 per cent of the English students asked that the French language be taught in the schools I think that if this legislation were disallowed, it might teach a lesson to the Ontario legislature, and show them that they could not defy the judgment of the Privy Council by re-enacting such legislation. They might well take into consideration the opinion expressed by Professor Squair and the students in Ottawa, and say, "Let us have the French language taught as much as possible." They might tell the people to follow the example which has been shown to them in Quebec. There is not a college or a commercial school in Quebec where the students are not obliged to learn to speak and write the English language. In the classic and commercial college curricula there is a special clause saying that English will be taught. Why is this? It is because we in Quebec are not afraid of the English language. On the contrary, we desire it. Everybody is anxious to learn English, because they know that a man who can use two tools is of more value than a man who can use only one. They know that in this country, with its mixed population, a man who can speak two languages is more useful than he would be if he could speak only one. A commercial man, a business man, a member of the House of Commons or of the Senate, is a better man if he can speak both the official languages of the country. When occasions arise, as when we receive in this House prominent men of England or prominent men of France, those of us who understand both languages can listen to them with pleasure, and are not obliged to ask our neighbour, "What is he saying?" Do you not think, honourable gentlemen, that it would be better for every man in this country to understand both languages?

I do not urge that the French language should be used more than the English, but I say, put them on the same footing. As I say, all the French professors in our province invite their pupils to learn the English language, and advise all young men to speak it, because it is just as important as French and because in doing that they will be able to earn a better living, they will be better men, and more opportunities will be open to them.

Therefore I say this law should be disallowed, and the provincial authorities should be asked to think a little more. If the example of what Quebec has done were pointed out to them, it seems to me that all men of good judgment and intelligence in Ontario ought to be convinced that that law is wrong, and should be repealed, or at least that Ottawa and all French districts should be exempted from its operation, though it will again be a mistake to keep it in force anywhere.

Now, all my authorities have been English, and I will cite some more. There is another gentleman well known in Quebec, a member of the local House representing the Eastern Townships, Mr. Bullock, who was a Protestant minister in these townships until he resigned the ministry, ran for a seat in the local House, and was elected. I have in my hand a report of a lecture given at Quebec by this gentleman. This report appeared in the Quebec Chronicle, which is a good Conservative paper, in its issue of April 1, 1916:

> Mr. Bullock was asked to give a lecture at the Morin College Hall. He accepted the invitation, and delivered a strong speech before a large and representative audience of both French and English speaking citizens. Mr. John Hamilton, one of the prominent men of Quebec, occupied the chair, having introduced the speaker, stated that in the large audience present there were many who did not know much about this burning subject. Mr. Hamilton counselled both French and English-speaking citizens to be cautious in the way they discussed this important subject and in introducing Mr. Bullock to the meeting said that he was sure they would know something more about the question after listening to the speaker of the evening than they did before coming there.
> Mr. Bullock, who was received with applause, informed his audience that a few days ago when he accepted the invitation to address the Quebec people on this great question he was under the impression that there would be other speakers, but this was his mistake and not the fault of those who invited him to come. Since he had made his speech in the Legislative Assembly on this question he had been told he should mind his own business and not that of the people of Ontario, but, he retorted, while we do not wish to interfere with the people of Ontario in their affairs we at least have a right to think about the question, and to let the people of Ontario know how we feel about the matter.
> If the legislature of Quebec passed an act such as was passed in the Ontario legislature, with regard to school questions, would not the English-speaking people of Ontario express their opinion and lend such help as they thought necessary to the people in the Ministry in this province, and who, they thought, were unjustly treated.
> Before the year 1841 education in these two provinces was not very flourishing. When the two provinces united in 1841, the great question of education began to be studied.

From 1841 to 1867 education and education laws were very much advanced, to such an extent, however, that when Confederation took place, the school system we have to-day was not definitely established in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. There was no more great or more important question at the time of Confederation than that concerning education. Three or four politicians were opposed to Confederation on the ground that the minority of both provinces would suffer in this respect. These gentlemen foresaw all sorts of dangers for the minorities in Quebec and Ontario. At that time Sir John A. Macdonald assured them that the Act of Confederation would be carried out in such a way as to ensure that the rights of the minorities would be preserved. We all know how the province of Quebec, in this respect fulfilled its obligations from the first to the present time.

He also quoted regulation 17 and showed the disadvantages which the French Canadians were laboring under with respect to it,—with respect to having to be taught in a tongue foreign to them after they had passed through form I, and contrasted the position which the English-speaking minority of Quebec would be in if such a rule was passed in regard to their schools.

Mr. Bullock stated emphatically that the question was not a religious one or a fight between public schools as some people thought, but was simply a laudable desire of the French Canadians to retain their mother tongue to a large extent, a national issue between two races belonging to the same faith.

"What are the French Canadians asking?" demanded Mr. Bullock. "Let me tell you."

1st. The respect of their rights for the education of their children in schools supported with their money.

2nd. The efficient teaching of the two official languages of Canada during the whole primary course in the schools or classes attended by their children.

3rd. The teaching of their children through the natural vehicle: the mother tongue.

4th. The grouping by schools or classes of the children to which their parents wish to have the two official languages taught.

5th. Competent teachers capable of teaching the two official languages of Canada to take the management of schools or classes attended by the children whose parents require teaching of French and English.

6th. Their part of school grants voted each year by the Legislative Assembly.

7th. One inspection, Franco-English, of separate schools attended by their children.

8th. One inspection. Franco-English, of public schools attended by their children.

9th. The granting of certificates to bilingual teachers who have successfully passed the examinations required by the Department of Education.

Mr. Bullock could see no wrong in these demands.

The French in Ontario, said Mr. Bullock, were open to learn English in Ontario, none know better than they the value of learning this language, but they could not be expected to lose their native tongue in so doing. He knew from experience the benefit of learning two languages and the people who had a knowledge of the French and English languages were better equipped for life's battle than those whose knowledge was limited to one tongue.

The speaker showed how successful separate schools had been in his own constituency, where there were French Canadian, English Protestant and Catholic schools.

During the course of his lecture Mr. Bullock said:—

II. Let us look at this matter historically.

1. The history of the educational question dates back to 1841, at the time of the Union of the two Canadas. It would be too long to go into this otherwise than to say that during this period education in both provinces made good progress and many progressive changes were made. Nearly every session brought amendments. Early during this period a system of separate schools was established of nearly all. In 1841 there were in the two provinces 550,000 English and 450,000 French-speaking.

2. At Confederation. Among the many difficulties was that of education and the rights of minorities.

All was not plain sailing, three men in Quebec, especially opposed the measure, Dorion, Joly and Laframboise. They feared practically just what is now happening. Destruction of the race.

Quotations from Macdonald and Cartier: Life of Sir Etienne Cartier by John Boyd, p. 243-4. This is what Mr. Boyd says: It was also explicitly stated by both Cartier and Macdonald during the discussion that steps had been taken to guarantee the continued use of the French language. Dorion had expressed the view that there was no guarantee for the continuance of the language of the French Canadian, but the will and forbearance of the majority. John A. Macdonald in answer to this emphatically declared that it had been proposed and assented to by the deputation from each province that the use of the French language should form one of the principles upon which Confederation should be established and that its use would be guaranteed by Imperial Act.

And Cartier added: That it would also be necessary to protect the language of the English Ministry in Quebec because in the local parliament of Lower Canada the majority will be composed of French Canadians. The members of the conference were desirous that it should not be in the power of that majority to decree the abolition of the use of the English language in the legislature. And gentlemen we all know how this has been kept.

Now as a result of all these conferences read the British North America Act.

British North America Act. Article 93.

93. In and for each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education subject and according to the following provisions:

1. "Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law in the province at the Union."

2. All the powers, privileges, and duties at the Union by law conferred and imposed in Upper Canada on the Separate Schools and School Trustees of the Queen's Roman Catholic subjects shall be, and the same are hereby extended to the Dissentient Schools of the Queen's Protestant and Roman Catholic subjects in Quebec.

I leave to the consideration of the members of this House these important remarks of Mr. Bullock. In perusing them at leisure

I am sure honourable gentlemen from Ontario will be convinced that the French Canadians of Ontario are justified in claiming their rights and in asking for the disllowance of the Acts mentioned in the motion of the honourable gentleman from Stadacona. Furthermore, can there be any better proof of the benefits which may be derived from the teaching of both official languages in all the provinces of this Dominion? Can there be stronger proof that the French Canadians of Ontario are not asking that English be not taught in the schools, but that both languages be put on the same footing, as in Quebec, and that they have the right to learn in their own language first, because it is easier for them to begin to learn in their native tongue than in the English language? Is not that a fair demand? Is there anything wrong with that? If not, why slander us as we have been slandered? Why slander those who have been asking for equal rights in this Dominion?

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: Why does not the honourable gentleman use his eloquence and influence in the Ontario legislature, which has all power in regard to educational matters?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Would my honourable friend allow a question? Does he not think that it is for him to do so, rather than for us from Quebec?

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: The province of Ontario and the Ontario legislature are eminently fair with all classes of people. My honourable friend knows as well as any man in this House knows that regulation 17, of which he and his friends complain, was enacted for the express purpose of helping the French people rather than for taking away anything which they possessed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: The honourable gentleman might add that the province of Ontario has spent public money for the purpose of educating teachers in the French language.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I am quite willing to accept the suggestion of my honourable friend (Mr. Blain). I am willing to do what I can in that regard.

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: Permit me to ask if it has never occurred to my honourable friend that since the agitation began with regard to regulation 17, which has been going on for so many years, there has never been a leader of his own in the Ontario Legislature who has dared to suggest that the regulation be repealed. If the honourable gentleman thinks the Ontario Government, composed as it is of Conservatives, is unfriendly, does he not think that his own party would be willing to listen to suggestions made by him? I do not subscribe, and I do not think my honourable friend subscribes, to the doctrine that the Protestant people of Ontario are anxious to take away the rights of the French-speaking people of that province. I do not think that the agitation of my honourable friend and his remarks from time to time will help his cause. The people of Ontario on both sides of politics are sensible people. They have the reputation of being eminently fair to all classes, and it was owing to the condition of the French schools in Ontario that regulation 17 was enacted. The late Sir James Whitney was so fair about the matter that he established special schools to train teachers in order that they should teach the children under that regulation.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I am sorry that the honourable gentleman has not spoken before. What he has said is in defence of the law.

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: Perhaps the honourable gentleman will answer my question.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: May I first say that if I were permitted to go to the Ontario legislature, I would do so with the greatest of pleasure, and if my honourable friend will invite me, through his friends, I will do so; but I think it would be better to invite at the same time the honourable gentleman from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry) and the honourable gentleman from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt) and we would try to persuade the Ontario legislature.

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: My honourable friend can communicate with the leader of his party there.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I did that, and I have not yet received an answer.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: Sometimes leaders have to follow, as they cannot lead. I am willing to believe in the good intentions of my honourable friend. Hell is paved with good intentions, but as the facts are to-day, we cannot for one moment but believe that this law was passed to hurt the French Canadians and blot out their language.

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: Does my honourable friend deny that it was enacted to help the French people?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: Yes; quite the contrary. I understand that some people in Ontario—my honourable friend may be one of them—have good intentions; but the law is there.

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: The Prime Minister, who introduced the law, made the statement clearly and distinctly to the legislature and to the people generally that regulation 17 was enacted for the express purpose of assisting the French people.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: It may have been done with the best of intentions, but as I said, hell is paved with good intentions. If what my honourable friend says is so, the effect of this law is contrary to the intention, and when the law was declared to be ultra vires, what was the reason for re-enacting it?

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: Regulation 17 was carried to the highest court in the Empire, and that court has declared that the Provincial Government had the right to enact such a regulation.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: Yes, I remember the two judgments, but they were not as my honourable friend says. My honourable friend says nobody in Ontario opposed this law. But is it not a fact that there are four or five French members in the Ontario House, Liberals and Tories, all of whom spoke and voted against it? I am sure that if the French members in the Ontario Legislature had believed for one moment that this law was good for them they would not have opposed it. Is that not sufficient to show how absurd it is to pretend that the law was passed for the good of the French people? As I have said, the French people wish to learn English, but they also wish to retain their French language, and all who have spoken on the subject in Quebec and Ontario have said that this ought to be so. I believe that the fair-minded and honest men of Ontario wish no harm to the French people; but the French people are not satisfied with this law, and if it was a present, as my honourable friend said a moment ago, it was a bad one. Suppose you make a present to a man, and he says: "I don't want it; it is no good to me; it is bad;" would you still persist in pressing it on him? If this law was a present to the French people from the Ontario House for their benefit, they would be very foolish not to accept it; but they fought it because it was against their interest. There would be a revolution in Quebec if a law like that were passed by the Government of Sir Lomer Gouin. It was said by Judge McCorkill that the French people of Ontario would not make a revolution, but they ask for justice as long as they do not get it. The French Canadians are the best judges of that matter, and they say that regulation deprives them of their rights to their language. They have fought a very hard battle in every way, being even ready to go to jail; but do you believe for a moment that if it was to their interest, as has been foolishly said, they would do that? My honourable friend may think it; but Dr. Merchant, the High School Inspector of Ontario, made a report that contradicted the good intentions of my honourable friend. So I conclude that the French Canadians are not satisfied; they are suffering from this law; they appealed to the courts to repeal it; yet in spite of all that my honourable friends and the Ontario Government persist in imposing and re-enacting it.

Well, I will bring another proof. There is a man in Quebec of the name of Mr. John Boyd, a well-known journalist, author of the Life of Sir George Cartier. He is a good Tory, but a clever and educated man, and he speaks good French. He has been in Ontario especially to study this legislation. He looked over all the statutes, and came back to Montreal and wrote an article entitled, "A Plea or Argument in favour of the French Canadians." It was published in the Montreal Gazette, and was written in answer to an article sent to the New York Times by a journalist of Montreal, whom we all know, who is supposed to be friendly to the French, but who is a hypocrite, abusing the French people in New York papers. Mr. John Boyd, who knows well what he is talking about, wrote that article on the French question and the war, and his conclusions are to the very same effect as those drawn by the Hon. Mr. McCorkill and by Mr. Bullock. This article is too long to be read here, but I will just cite the following extract:

> French Canadians, as a matter of fact, do not object to learn English. They fully realize the importance in their own interest of knowing that language. It is taught in their schools, and the great mass of the French Canadian people know English. The best proof of this is the far greater number of English Canadians who are able to speak English than there are English-speaking Canadians who can speak French, which to the mass of the English-speaking people of the Dominion is practically a dead language. What French Canadians do object to is that their children should be deprived of having instruction in their mother tongue, which it must be remembered has been recognized in Canada since the Cession and was specifically recognized by the Canadian Constitution framed in 1867 as one of the two official languages of the Dominion. It is rather late in the day to seek to deprive the French Canadians of their language, the language of one of our great Allies in the struggle for freedom, liberty and democracy. When a writer seeks to compare the language of a people to such a thing as slavery, it only shows to what lengths he is prepared to go.

The few facts that I have cited are sufficient, I believe, to show how baseless as well as unjust are the general conclusions which the writer of "Peril of Civil Strife Arises Anew in Canada" parades with so much assurance in order to make out a case against the French Canadians. The fact is that the French Canadians are being systematically maligned. A few ignorant, narrow-minded individuals would apparently like to see them deprived of their language and their religion, and Anglicized and Protestantized. These people seem to forget that the forefathers of the French Canadians were the discoverers and colonizers of Canada, that the French Canadians themselves with their fine qualities and virtues, are a most valuable asset to the Dominion, that they have given to Canada some of its greatest men, that they form a bulwark of our national life, and that anything that would injure them would damage the whole fabric of Confederation.

The expression of opinion with which the Times article concludes: "We will some day or other have to take up arms to show Quebec that Canada is an English and Protestant country and is not going to allow itself to be led by a priest-ridden province;" and: "We may allow our loyal troops from Ontario and the Western Provinces to stop long enough in Quebec on their way to Europe to practise on the French Canadians what they will afterwards give the Germans," is a good illustration of the style of reasoning of certain extremists. That attitude, however, savours too much of that "Prussianism" which all the free nations are fighting at the present time, and will be condemned by all right-thinking people.

Civil war in Canada might serve the purposes of certain extremists, but it would be both criminal and suicidal.

French Canadians number over two million souls in Canada and nearly three million in the whole of North America. For nearly four hundred years they have been here, and they are here to stay. They cannot be suppressed or Anglicized against their will. The more that is attempted the more will they be solidified and sundered from the other elements that go to make up our population.

Again I ask, can the French people of Ontario be so foolish as to refuse to obey a law which was passed entirely in their interest? That may perhaps be said in good faith; but surely no sane man would pretend that the Frenchmen and Frenchwomen of Ontario feel that this was a favour done in their interest by the Ontario Legislature. These laws ought to be repealed.

As Mr. Bullock said at Quebec, a man is a better man if he can understand both languages. I have a letter from an Ontario soldier who has been in the trenches, telling his parents how glad he was to have learned a little French in Ontario, how useful it had been to him in this terrible war to be able to converse with the French people in France; how often he had been called upon to interpret for his comrades from Ontario and the West in order to get some favour or privilege for them, and how he blessed the Providence that had enabled him to learn to understand the French people in that far country, and that was a great consolation to him in his hardship. This is a proof of how useful the French language is, and I cannot understand how a word can be said against the teaching of it in Ontario, or how a regulation can be put on the statute book to prevent the French people and also the English from learning that language.

If the Ontario people wish to do a favour to the French, let them do it rightly. My honourable friend says they intend to do them a favour by improving the French schools and helping them to learn the French language. If that is true—and my compatriots think it is not the right way to do it—why not grant the favour in a way that is better for them, and even the English people of Ontario would get the benefit of it; and later on, as Sir George Foster said in Toronto, they would be very glad to speak and understand the French language, and would not blush as he did in Paris. At the Toronto Canadian Club Sir George Foster, on coming back from the Paris conference, told how sorry he was to feel that he had to be dumb at that conference, not understanding a word.

In conclusion, let me say that if my remarks and the speeches of my honourable friends from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt) and Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry) shall have the slightest effect in Ontario, especially on my friend over there (Hon. Mr. Blain), in whom I have faith, and who has a good feeling for us, I shall be very glad, and shall feel repaid for my efforts.

Hon. Mr. DONNELLY: I did not have the privilege of hearing the addresses of the honourable member for Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry) and the honourable member for Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt); but in listening to the honourable member for Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette), I gather that he holds their view, that the people of Ontario have a great aversion to the French language, and desire to suppress it in some way. Living in the province of Ontario as I do, I desire to dissent entirely from that view. He argues on the ground that conditions in Quebec and Ontario are similar. The conditions are not the same.

In Quebec both languages have equal standing in the courts, in the legislature and in commerce. But it is entirely different in Ontario. There English is the language of the courts, of commerce, and of the legislature. The people of the province of Ontario feel that it is desirable for every child who goes through their schools to get a knowledge of the English language that will equip him to take his proper place in that province when he grows up. We have no desire to suppress the French language. I consider it a great accomplishment. I am paying to have three of my children taught in that language; I have no objection at all to it. My honourable friend argues that Regulation 17 was passed in order to suppress the French language. It was passed in order to give French a legal standing in the province of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: It has not had that effect.

Hon. Mr. DONNELLY: Well, that was the intention. My honourable friend tells us it was passed for political effect. I dissent entirely from that view. This agitation was started two or three years ago around Ottawa for political effect. The Liberal party, feeling that they had got into power in 1896 on the school question, thought they would be able to put themselves again into power on that question, and the agitation was started for that purpose; but having started it, they find that it is growing to such a size that they are unable to control it, and it has created a great deal of dissention between the two parties in the province of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I want to say a few words in answer to my honourable friend before moving the adjournment of the debate. He says that no person in Ontario desires to eradicate the French language from that province—that on the contrary, they are desirous of developing the use and teaching of the French language, and that regulation 17 was passed in order to give legal standing to the French language in Ontario and promote its teaching and development. Well, the way in which that regulation was carried out was very unfortunate; for if the intention was kindly, as my honourable friend states, it has produced the very contrary effect upon the very people who stood to be benefited by that legislation. As a matter of fact, I think that the Act and all that preceded the passing of the regulation occurred on somewhat different lines from those which my honourable friend has stated, and I will simply tell him the impressions I have received from reading what took place when regulation 17 was projected. That regulation came into life upon the assertion that the English-French schools did not teach sufficient English, that the children who came out from those schools did not sufficiently know the English language; and my reading of the events which surrounded the passing of regulation 17 is that the regulation was made for the avowed purpose of strengthening the teaching of English in the French-English schools. Now, if that regulation had been carried out in a way not to offend or hurt the French Canadians in their innermost feelings, I would have said amen, and so would everybody. Everyone in the province of Ontario would say amen if the Ontario legislature should enact regulations to the end that every child in every school of Ontario should learn English. It is in the interest of every man to learn a second language, and all the more so in a country where that second language is the tongue of the vast majority. That stands to reason. No one will for a moment dispute that affirmation. If we are all agreed upon the very great importance to Canada of our children learning the English language—I am not speaking for the moment of the French language—and if that was the intention, and the sole intention, of the Ontario Legislature, they were very unfortunate in the method of carrying out of their intention.

Hon. Mr. DONNELLY: Is it not a fact that regulation 17 provides that where French has been the language of the school, in the higher classes, if the parent of the child desires, one hour shall be given in each school day to the teaching of the French language? And is not one hour in the six sufficient to give to any subject?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Not in all the schools.

Hon. Mr. DONNELLY: I said in the French schools.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The effect of the regulation is that French may be allowed for one hour as the language of communication for the children in the first and second forms when it is found that they do not understand the English language sufficiently to make any progress. This is how I view it. In order that the honourable gentleman may understand the feeling of the French minority in Ontario, I would ask him to enter with me into one of those English-French schools where, as in Ottawa, for instance, the number of children would be from four to six hundred, divided into a great many classes, the number of pupils being sufficient to separate them, putting the English under one roof, and the French under another. Let us observe the spectacle of a woman teacher having fifty pupils under her charge. We enter a school where teacher and pupils are all English-speaking. I reverse the proposition, so that my honourable friend may learn the feeling of that class, and see how he would feel himself. In this school regulation 17 applies to the English minority, and the teacher being English, and addressing English pupils exclusively, would start the class by saying: "Mes enfants, nous allons maintenant étudier la grammaire anglaise;" and she would continue in French teaching English grammar for an hour in the presence of my honourable friend, and that class would wrestle with the difficulties of the English grammar, through the medium of the French language, imperfectly known by most of the children.

Hon. Mr. DONNELLY: Do you assume that the limitation of an hour is applied to the first and second forms? That is only applied to the higher classes. The first and second forms may be taught in the language to which they are accustomed.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, I assume that the hour is limited to the first and second forms.

Hon. Mr. DONNELLY: I think the honourable gentleman is wrong; I think that applies to the higher forms.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The inspector may allow an hour in the other forms, but it is discretionary with him. He may or he may not. I take it for granted that the men of Ontario who are leaders of the people are mostly men of good will, and that they would not willingly be unjust towards the minority if they were not hampered by a certain section of the community which is governed by sectarian views and narrow prejudices.

Now, this re-enactment of the law by the Ontario Legislature does not settle the question. The grievance which the minority feels that it has is not removed. I know quite well that the discussion in this Chamber will not change the law. On the contrary, certain sections of the community, which are led by a fanatical press, will make use of this discussion to say that Quebec wants to impose its views upon Ontario. But I speak now, not for the immediate effect that my speech may have upon the Ontario Legislature. I rise simply to ask that the representatives of Ontario in this Chamber, after the next general elections have taken place, at which it will be in order for party purposes to accentuate the differences between the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, to consider this question carefully. It is clear—we can see it in every line of a certain section of the press—that whatever advantage the racial cry may bring to one party or the other will be used to the extreme limit. But when all this has reached an end, when the ballot boxes have been closed, I would ask that the representatives of Ontario look into this question and see if there is not some way of settling the matter so as to bring the two races of the country together and remove that grievance, or what the minority feels to be a grievance. The solution which I suggested two or three years ago I now repeat. Let the good men of Ontario examine the situation, and try to enact a regulation which will decree that half of the time shall be given to the English language as a language of communication in the bilingual schools, and the other half of the time to the French language as the language of communication. I have said that if you divide the seven or eight hours of the day and give half to the English language and half to the French, the French boys after four or five years at school will know the English grammar better than their own French grammar, because in that length of time they will not have mastered to the same degree the French grammar, which is much more difficult than the English. It has been my experience, and the experience of all of us who have attended a bilingual school, in Montreal, that after four or five years the boys are able to write the English language correctly. They will not have mastered the genius of the language, but they will carry on their commercial correspondence in English, and will not attempt to write it in the French language, because it is necessary to continue a few years longer in order to learn French thoroughly. So I offer this very easy solution of the difficulty. Not to-day. I know that what we are saying now will have no immediate beneficent effect. But I would beg of my friends in this chamber, who have influence in Ontario, that within the next six months or a year they get together and see if they cannot remove what the French minority, which represents at least a quarter of a million of the population of Ontario, feel to be a grievance.

I close with a quotation from a well-known philosopher of modern times, a French philosopher, Gustave Lebon, who looks at things from a point of view which shows that he is not influenced by any sectarian feeling. I have made a free translation of this statement on "the Errors of Psychology in Politics":

The great driving forces in the conduct of peoples are religious beliefs and self-interest. As beliefs cannot be eradicated or crushed out by reason or by coercion, the governing powers must limit themselves to conciliating the conflicting interests. Centuries of persecution and of bloody wars have only succeeded in establishing the orthodoxy of this psychological principle.

Exceptional measures imposed upon a political, religious or ethnological group have but succeeded in strengthening it; isolated through the inequality of treatment, the persecuted group increases in cohesion, whilst it dissolves when these inequalities come to an end. It is in virtue of this psychological law that the Jewish race has maintained through the ages its individuality. It is because this same law has been disregarded that the Austrian Empire will inevitably see the breaking away of its provinces. The real statesman will utilize the illusions which many souls cannot be without. The inexperienced statesman will persecute them and will be the victim of his persecution.

I close with this statement in answer to my honourable friend, who says: "But Ontario is not persecuting the minority." My answer is that the minority thinks it is persecuted, and we who read that regulation from the French viewpoint hold the view that it is an unfair regulation, and I appeal to the wise men of Ontario to see that that regulation is modified. They will understand the French Canadian point of view if they simply strike out from regulation 17 the word "French" and put therein the word "English," and apply the regulation to one of their own schools. The two races are in Canada to stay. There are 2,000,000 of French descent. Say what you may, this is a fact which cannot be overlooked. The Ottawa river separates us. We have, under the wise guidance of good and true men in the past, shaken hands across this river, and have worked together towards the development of Canada's destiny. Surely the men of this generation and of the morrow will not be found inferior to those of yesteryear.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I would ask the honourable minister if he could give me an answer to section 4 of my questions.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I submitted the answer to my honourable friend, but I understand it does not quite supply the information he wants. If he would be good enough to state it, I will see that he shall get the additional information.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: If nobody wants to take the floor on this question, I will move the adjournment of the debate, and I will give a few words of reply at the next sitting.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Crosby, the debate was adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until eleven o'clock to-morrow morning.

THE SENATE.

Friday, September 14, 1917.

First Sitting.

The Senate met at Eleven o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THE NEW PARLIAMENT BUILDING.

SPEAKERS' QUARTERS.

Before the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I want to draw the attention of the honourable the leader of the Government to a discussion which occurred in another place yesterday on the question of the location of the Speakers' quarters in the new building. I think it would be well for members of the Senate to express an opinion in regard to this matter. I understand that no decision has yet been come to by the committee which was appointed by both Houses to deal with the question of the new Parliament Building. I think it would be of great advantage to the House of Commons and to the Senate that the Speakers should have proper quarters in the new building, as was the case in the old building. I think, for the convenience, first of all, of His Honour the Speaker, and, secondly, for the benefit of the members of the Senate, that it is the best policy to pursue. The duties of the Speaker, outside of his duties in the House, can be very much better performed if he has proper quarters in the building.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: I can only speak of the convenience or inconvenience of the custom, with reference to the Commons; but I assume, from my knowledge of the two Houses, that the same applies equally or almost equally to the Senate. To me it would be a matter of regret if it were decided that the Speakers were not to have accommodation in the new building. The Speaker is practically at the head of a department, and his services are called into requisition so frequently during all hours of the day, and often during the night as well, that it would be very inconvenient if his quarters were removed from the building. His books, papers, records, and so on, are at his hand when he is in the building, and are all available for reference when information is desired by members. The customs and practices of our houses of Parliament change very little from generation to generation and from age to age. There is a dignity that attaches to them from the sacredness of age that I think should not be overlooked or disregarded. The practices and customs which have obtained in our houses of Parliament since Confederation have been established along the same lines and upon the same principles—so far as they are applicable to our situation, which differs from theirs in many particulars—as those of the House of Commons and the House of Lords in England. In keeping up those customs and practices, it seems to me that we are not only maintaining the connection with the general principles which, when learned by public men, are so easily kept in mind and so easily followed, but as time goes on we are adding a greater dignity and influence to the houses of Parliament than they would have if we were constantly changing from one condition to another. Judging from my experience in Parliament—and I am in my thirty-eigth consecutive year, and I think —I may be pardoned if I say that I have given fairly close attention to the business of Parliament and to the duties of the members of both Houses—it would be a mistake to depart to any great extent from what has been our regular custom and practice heretofore, in having the Speakers' apartments in the building instead of outside.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: Honourable gentlemen, I concur most fully in the observations made by the two honourable gentlemen who have preceded me. This is not a time when any of us are willing to advocate unnecessary expenditure, but I do not think that what has been proposed would increase the cost of construction to any appreciable extent. I think it is highly desirable and fitting to continue the old practice of having accommodation in each House for its Speaker. While I am a pronounced radical, I believe in a certain dignity being maintained; and I think it would be a serious departure from the dignity of the House of Commons and of the Senate to discontinue the practice of having the Speakers' quarters established in the building. Many members have almost continuous business with the Speaker, and it would be a great inconvenience to them to have to go perhaps to some remote part of the city. I sincerely hope that the committee having this matter in charge will not depart from the old practice, and that accommodation for both Speakers will be provided in the building.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I am the next speaker here for the moment, but I am not the next Speaker.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: You are the ex-Speaker. It sounds very much the same.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I may say that my sentiments are in accord with those expressed by the honourable gentlemen who have spoken; but what is the use of my expressing an opinion now? What is the use of trying to preserve our ancient customs? We are in a time of war, and everything that is conservative in our usages we put aside; but one thing continues—the plan of the new building provides ample accommodation for the future; and, if so, I do not see why we should not avail ourselves of the accommodation, and, as the honourable gentlemen who have preceded me have said, retain a usage which is for the common benefit of the House itself and of the honourable gentlemen who will adorn the position of Speaker in the future.

Hon. J. W. DANIEL: I do not think very much would be effected merely by giving expression to views. I think what would be effective would be for the Senate to pass a resolution stating that in their opinion the Speaker's chambers ought to be provided in the new building. Apparently the Government have come to the conclusion that they are responsible for the quarters of the Speaker and that it is the duty of the country to provide quarters for him. I think we may take that for granted, because the Government are now paying for the quarters of the Speaker outside of the building. So that part of the matter is settled. Then, if the Government is responsible, what is the best way of fulfilling that responsibility? I think it would be the general view that the best way of carrying that out would be by providing chambers in the new building, or attached thereto in such a way as to conform with the architectural features. I think that if the Senate takes sufficient interest in the matter and has formed a strong opinion upon it, it should be put in the form of a resolution, and it would then be likely to have some effect.

Hon. ROBT. WATSON: I am sure that my colleague on that committee, the honourable leader of the House (Hon. Sir James Lougheed), will be pleased to have this expression of opinion from the Senate. This matter has been discussed by the committee and up to date the feeling of the majority of the committee has been that the Speaker's quarters should not be in the building. That question was discussed more from the point of view of economy than any other, the committee feeling that at every change of Speakership the Speaker's quarters have to be practically renewed.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Especially in the Senate.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: And the cost of renewal has been discussed more or less.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: When I was made Speaker of the Senate I think no change was made in the Speaker's quarters.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: As a rule, the Speakers ask for a change of furniture, decorations, etc. The Public Works Department, which pays the expenses, has so reported. However, that difficulty might be overcome, because there is, I believe, a feeling growing in Canada that the Speaker should be permanent. In England they have a permanent Speaker, not by law but by practice. The United States have practically the same thing.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: No; the Speaker of the United States is elected by vote.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: But they have the same Speaker.

Some Hon. SENATORS: No, no.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS. With a change of administration in the United States, the Speaker always changes.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: It depends on the vote.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Very well. I concur with what has been said by the honourable gentleman from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry) that there is ample space in the new building for Speakers' quarters, and it is only a question of deciding whether the Speaker shall have them or not.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Would the honourable gentleman like to be Speaker?

Hon. Mr. WATSON: No, I would not. This expression of opinion will, I have no doubt, be taken into serious consideration by the honourable leader of the House and myself as members of the Committee. The Senate appears to be in favour of the quarters being in the building.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, in this connection I may say as member of that Committee that I am very glad to have the opinion of the House expressed upon this subject. The architect has intimated to-day that he is very desirous that members of the Senate should look over the plans of the Senate section of the building. The plans will be here this afternoon placed upon the table of the news room. He will be very glad indeed if honourable gentlemen will look over the division which he has made. Of course, that division of accommodation, for Committee rooms, offices, and rooms for members, is only suggested.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: Do the plans make provision for apartments to be provided for the Speaker?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I really do not know; I have not seen them.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: The space is there.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: As the honourable gentleman from Portage la Prairie (Hon. Mr. Watson) has stated, there is ample space for the accommodation of the Speaker. However, if honourable gentlemen will avail themselves of the opportunity of looking over the plans this afternoon when they are placed upon the table in the news room, and will make any suggestions either to myself or to the honourable gentleman from Portage la Prairie we shall be only too glad to convey those suggestions to the committee.

MILITARY VOTERS' BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the third reading of Bill 127, the Military Voters' Act, 1917.

Hon. HEWITT BOSTOCK: Before that motion is put, I want simply to emphasize the fact that in any criticism which was made on this side of the House with respect to this legislation, honourable gentlemen on this side were only anxious to see that every precaution was taken in this Bill and every method adopted whereby the soldiers' vote could be fairly and straightforwardly recorded, that every opportunity should be given to the men who are so nobly defending this country and doing their duty to the Empire, to record their vote as they may see fit. Any amendments that we moved were moved with that object in view. We desired in every way to assist in the proper taking of this vote, and every suggestion that was made was for the purpose of giving every opportunity for that vote to be taken and recorded as it properly should be.

Hon. H. J. CLORAN: The discussion has changed from a plain one dealing with kitchen and domestic matters, the Speaker's chambers, etc., to a discussion of high Imperial and continental issues. The Bill now before us is one which is going to pass by a very small majority in the Parliament of Canada, a majority composed of packed members. I use the word deliberately, so that the fact may be known not only here in Canada but throughout England, France, and the other Allied countries. This voters' Bill will therefore pass under this packed majority, against the rights of the Liberals of the Dominion of Canada. The positions of ancient Liberals in this House have been filled by good, honest, reliable—especially reliable—sturdy supporters of the Government. The Government has availed itself of a technicality in the agreement which was made between the Opposition and the Government when this war broke out, that members whose seats became vacant on either side of the House should be replaced by members of the same political faith. By some looseness of contract the Senate was not included, and this Government, through its Prime Minister, availed itself of that looseness in the contract by filling the places of stalwarts of the Liberal cause with stalwarts of the Conservative cause—to my mind the most flagrant breach of the truce that has obtained in this country on behalf of the winning of the war by Canada as far as it could go. I say that the present Government is responsible for the condition of things that exist to-day—that it cannot obtain a union or coalition Government. What Liberal will join a party that has been discredited in the past by its own members—discredited by Hon. Robert Rogers, ex-Minister of Public Works; discredited by the ex-Minister of Militia; discredited by the departure of Mr. Patenaude—discredited by their own friends.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Well, now, what right has the Speaker to intervene?

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order, order.

The Hon. the Speaker: I would call the attention of the honourable gentleman to the fact that the question before the Senate is the third reading of the Military Voters' Bill, and he has no right to speak on other questions. He has used the expression "packed majority."

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: And I stand by it.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: The honourable gentleman has no right to use that expression.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Well, I will not say "packed majority," then; I will say loose majority. I suppose that will cover it. But I am giving reasons now why this Bill should not be passed.

Hon. Mr. POWER: The honourable gentleman is going a long way.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The honourable senator from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power), who has been 45 years in this House, ought to know that young men have different ideas from his. He has lived in the past; let me live in the present. It is about time for the honourable senator from Halifax, who has been in this House 45 years or 50—I don't know which—to give the young men of Canada a chance to have a say. I respect his grey hairs, or those that are not on his head at all.

Some Hon SENATORS: Order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: And I respect my own intelligence and my own devotion to the people.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order, order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: There would be order if there were no such interruptions. I am giving reasons why this Military Voters' Bill should not be passed by a loose majority. We have the honourable senator from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry), the honourable senator from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Beaubien), I think, and the honourable gentleman from Shawinigan (Hon. Mr. Montplaisir). That is a loose majority, so it is not a packed majority. I beg pardon.

When this Bill passes, what happens? A delegate will have to be named by the Government, either through the mail to send or personally to bring this measure over to the War Office in England. It is presented to the Minister of Overseas Military Forces. When the War Office receives the Act, with all its provisions, it will transmit it at once to the Commander in Chief of the armies of Great Britain, Ireland and the Empire. What does he do? He takes up the Act and reads it, and he sees that the soldiers are going to be interfered with, in all branches of military life, in the army of Great Britain, Ireland and the Empire. He stands aghast at the Act. He says: "I am Commander in Chief of the Army for military purposes, and I will not allow any disturbance of my military orders on account of any political, civil or other affairs. The men under my command are here for military or war purposes and these alone." That will be the decision of the Commander in Chief of the British armies, at the present time General Haig. Will he be right in stating so? All men who are not tied up with partisanship and other views regarding party will say: "Certainly; the Commander in Chief is master of his men, and if he thinks that the introduction of civil, political or domestic questions is going to interfere with his right of command over these men, why should he not have the right to say to any Government on earth. You shall not interfere with my command; if I allow domestic, civil, political, labour or other questions to be discussed in the ranks of my army, where is my control to begin or to end?" Therefore, the Commander in Chief of the British forces under the King's orders and regulations governing military practice, military service, military obedience, military discipline, will say to the man who presents this Act: "Get away from me; get away from here; I want no interference in the conduct of my army for civil, political, domestic or any other questions; all my men are here for is to obey my orders and to fight the enemy." It is admittedly an elementary military principle in England that no man in military service can participate in the discussion of public or political affairs. And here, a little colony called Canada, with six or seven millions of people, intervenes to tell the British Empire that it is going to rule the discipline of the army. What attitude do we assume before the civilized world? The idea of a little colony like Canada, with only 7,000,000 people, dictating to the Commander in Chief of the British Forces what he shall have his soldiers do. That is the effect of this Bill. France is the country that is suffering most, the one that is spilling most blood on behalf of democracy, and is losing a large portion of its historical buildings, of its fruitful lands, of its courageous people. Our emissary goes over to France, goes to General Petain, and says: "We have a certain number of Canadians in the army on the soil of France and in Flanders, and we want you to introduce this question of politics into the army, and we want to have these questions discussed in the trenches, so that the soldiers will be able to cast an intelligent vote; and we want our soldiers in the hospitals and camps to be able to discuss all the economic and political questions of Canada." That is the mission of the Canadian emissary to the Commander in Chief of the French army.

Nor does the French Republic, any more than England, give a vote to the soldiers, those gallant men who are dying by the thousand every day. But little Canada, with seven millions of a population, goes over to the Commander in Chief of the French forces and says: "We are going to go into your ranks and preach politics, preach elections, and so on." What attitude does Canada assume before the great French Republic? Why, that of sham patriotism from bottom to top, claptrap legislation to protect the present Tory party, which hopes to get votes from that source.

The great powers in this war are against this policy of introducing politics into the ranks, into the trenches, into the hospitals, into the camps of the Allied armies; yet we are going to persist. Italy gives no votes to its soldiers on the firing line, neither does Austria or Hungary, neither does Germany, above all. There is only one country on the firing line of this universal conflict that to-day gives the right to the soldiers to vote, and that is poor Russia. With what result? That there are rebellions, riots, the chasing of ministers from office, and even the Commander in Chief of the Russian army taking over that army to fight the present Government—all on account of the soldiers' vote in the trenches.

Can you face these facts and decide in your soul and conscience and heart, on behalf of Canada and the Empire, and the cause for which we are fighting, that this is democracy, that this is wise legislation? Is it wise in connection with those sacred causes affecting the best and most vital interests of humanity? This Bill is intended to promote simply the vital interests of the Tory party, which expects to get an undue vote from these sources. Honourable gentlemen, you are made up of the same blood as I am; you have the same ambition for Canada's progress and security as I have; why not drop party pride, party interests and fight for that unity and progress of Canada that we all desire? But no; the Government of the day, composed of persons who come and go, and honourable gentlemen of the highest intelligence, men who have had experience in the world, men who have developed the interests and advanced the progress of this country, are willing to sacrifice all that for the sake of the little party interests which, in the long run, are only ephemeral. Why not stand to the colour of the country and the Empire instead of standing by the colours of party, whether a small low-lived party or a high-living party? I appeal to you in all sincerity, as a Canadian loving his country, wanting to see it progress and be united, and willing to shed my blood now, old as I am, as the younger ones of my family have shed their blood, in favour of this cause. I say this Bill is not destined to promote the unity of our Canadian boys in the army in England. Remember that out of 350,000 who are at the front there are many good Liberals' sons just as there are good Conservatives' sons; and do you mean to tell me that by introducing this Bill among them you are going to promote the harmony and unity that have existed up to the present time, when they have been fighting shoulder to shoulder just as the Orangeman of Ulster and the Irish Catholics of the south of Ireland have been doing on the battlefield of Europe on behalf of democracy? I appeal to you in all sincerity. The Irish Ulsterites and Orangemen have been fighting shoulder to shoulder with the Irish Catholics of the balance of Ireland for the same cause, and there was no Bill of this kind sent among them asking, "Are you going to vote for Home Rule, or are you going to vote against it?" If there had been such a Bill there would have been an immediate disruption. Ah, but the statesmen of Great Britain are wiser than our paltry little men here in Canada; they have a greater grasp and a deeper foresight as to what will happen. Yet this Parliament is called upon not only to condone, not only to sanction, but to adopt, measures that are diametrically opposed to the best interests of Canada and calculated to endanger the cause of the great consecrated Allied powers—Great Britain, Italy, France, Russia and the other nations. I do not expect that my words will kill this Bill, but I wish it to go on record for the present and the future that I had courage sufficient to speak what I have said.

The motion was agreed to, on division, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN.

LIVE STOCK BILL.

THIRD READING.

Bill 123, An Act respecting Live Stock.—Hon. Sir James Lougheed.

OTTAWA SEPARATE SCHOOLS CASE.

DISCUSSION CONTINUED.

The Senate resumed from September 13 the adjorned debate on the statement and inquiry of Hon. Mr. Landry respecting the Ottawa Separate Schools case.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I moved the adjournment of the debate yesterday, not because I had any intention of making extended remarks, but only for the purpose of saying one or two words on this subject. It is a matter wholly and solely between the province of Ontario and the province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Not the province of Quebec; the Federal Government.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: The Federal Government has nothing to do with it. My honourable friend knows as much about that as he does about other things.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: More than you do.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: That would not be very complimentary to me, or to the little I do know. The matter is wholly and solely to settle a contention caused, apparently, by the people of the province of Quebec misunderstanding—

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: No.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: The conditions in the province of Quebec—

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I deny that it has anything to do with the province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: That makes it more substantial. That makes it unanimous.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: Let him go on.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: We have had this school question before us in the different provinces of Canada for a great many years. I am glad and proud to say that in my province, Nova Scotia, we have some school districts wholly and solely peopled by French residents, many of the older ones not being able to speak any English at all. But if those people were to ask us to adopt what I understand to be the contention of some honourable gentlemen in this House, namely, the education of the children in both the French and the English language, you can see how difficult it would be for us to have our children taught anything at all by the time they left school at the age of fourteen. I consider that the French people in this country have a great advantage over the English-speaking people, because they have not only their mother tongue, but they also have the opportunity of going to the English schools and getting a splendid foundation for learning the English language, which they can master by the time they are fourteen years of age.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: They learn English in all the French colleges, not in the English colleges. Some of them go to the English colleges, but generally they go to the French schools to learn English.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: For the purpose of my argument I do not care where they learn it, whether it is in a college or in a school. For instance, take a man who has four or five or six or seven, or even ten children—

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: They would be French.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Oh, they might be Irish if my honourable friend were around. The point I want to make is that in the province of Nova Scotia, where the limit for school attendance is fourteen years of age, if you take a child beginning school at six or seven years of age, who belongs to a farmer or a fisherman or some other of the working class, and who has to acquire a good start in English and French, it would be impossible for him to learn both English and French grammar by the time he was fourteen. Therefore, I say that if you are going to have French and English taught to the children in the schools, you must raise the school-leaving age limit to sixteen or eighteen. We know that the classes from which the best men in this country come are the farming classes and others who have to work pretty hard for their living; hence it is necessary that their children should have some good starting point. The child who is born of French parents has that great advantage over the child of English-speaking parents, that he first learns his mother tongue, then goes to the English school and learns the English language, while the English-speaking child has not the opportunity of learning French because his parents are not able to send him to a French school, and he has not the time to learn that language. I venture the assertion that there is not a man in public life or playing any part in the business of Canada who would not sacrifice a great deal for the ability to speak the French language if it could be bought with money; but that cannot be done. I have gone through most of the British possessions in the West Indies, there I found the French language spoken to a greater extent than the English language. All through Demarara, British Guiana, Trinidad, and Jamaica, which are all British islands, and also in the Bahamas, and on the mainland, you find French spoken very much more than English. I do not say it is the real French. So that we English-speaking people are under the great disadvantage I have mentioned. It would be well for my honourable friend from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette) to exercise his eloquence, his ability and energy, in trying to bring about a better situation. I am afraid my honourable friend sometimes becomes too enthusiastic. There is nobody I have ever met in this country who is opposed to the French language.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Yes, there is.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: No, we are all for the French language. My honourable friend from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) is smiling; he has the great advantage of knowing that language; I wish I could speak in French half as well as he can speak in English. It is the English-speaking people who are a good deal in the dark by not having the advantage of knowing the French language. If I were going to be born again and had any choice of a mother other than the one which, thank God, I had, I would choose a French woman. I would not choose a Frenchman as my father; I would dispense with a Frenchman; but I might possibly look for an Irish father.

I do say, honourable gentlemen, that there is a great deal of misunderstanding in these matters. The honourable gentleman who introduced this question is a very energetic and progressive man, and is bound to carry out what he has in his mind, no matter whether he is right or wrong. I am glad to say that in my opinion he is right on this occasion in trying to get this matter understood—and I believe he is trying. While I have been in Parliament I have met many men from Ontario, and, judging from the statement made yesterday by the honourable gentleman from Peel (Hon. Mr. Blain), I believe that the people of Ontario are anxious to do everything they can to give the French people fair play, so that the language may be taught to their children.

There is another side to this question, however. If my honourable friend from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette) were bringing up his boy, who could speak the French language well because he had learned it from his father and mother, and if he knew that that boy was going to remain at school until he was fourteen years old, and that he would then have to earn his living, in Canada, in the United States or elsewhere, I am sure that he would come to the conclusion that in order to prepare that boy to take his place in the business world of this American continent, where the English language is prevalent, he would say: "I will do the best I can to give my child an English education." The French boy who learns the French language from his parents is very well equipped in that regard, and he has an opportunity of picking up French grammar as he goes along. The province of Ontario is mainly an English-speaking province, but there are a great many French Canadians in Ontario, as there are in all the provinces. In our province we have a large French population, and we have some school districts where nothing is spoken but French.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Will the honourable gentleman permit me to suggest that this is a matter which can be discussed later? There is an important meeting of the Railway Committee about to take place, and I think this matter might be postponed.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I have nearly finished. I will not take further time. I have said practically all I have to say.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Move the adjournment.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: On condition that the honourable gentleman will allow me to follow.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I am more willing that my honourable friend should follow me than that I should follow him.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Not at present.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I just want to say in conclusion, that I liked the speech made by the honourable gentleman from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand). It was a speech which was made with the intention of getting the people together in order to arrive at a better understanding of this question. I say, let us try to get this bilingual question settled. Surely we can get together and come to a better understanding. Why should we take diametrically opposite positions? Why should we take sides on this question? Certain views are sometimes expressed in the press, or by public speakers, simply for the purpose of creating agitation, but whatever our views are we can get together and solve the difficulty. I only rose to make a few remarks. I hope that the remarks of my honourable friend from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) will result in a better understanding.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I wish to move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: Order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I moved the adjournment of the debate. I have the right to do that. What is the use of calling "order" when I am in order?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: If the honourable gentleman from Victoria will withdraw his motion I think we can conclude this discussion in a few minutes. As a personal favour, I ask the honourable gentleman to withdraw his motion.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The honourable gentleman from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry) will conclude his remarks in a very few minutes, and I ask that the question be disposed of now.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I withdraw my motion, but I do not sacrifice my right to answer any other speaker who comes before me.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I think it should be understood that my speech will end the discussion. If not, I consent to the question being put.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: If that be the case, and if it is the intention of the honourable gentleman to make his speech now, I should like to say something on this question.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I have not much to say on the question, and I am prepared to let the honourable gentleman from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry) proceed, because he is more au fait of the whole question, which is one that I consider more important than any little railway. If the honourable gentleman from Stadacona wishes to go on, I am prepared to withdraw my motion to adjourn the debate. If I withdraw the motion, what will happen?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I will reply, and the answer of the Government will be given.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Then I cannot speak. I have only a few words to say, and the honourable gentleman can follow me.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: If the motion is not withdrawn with the understanding that the debate will be closed now, there is no use in withdrawing it. We will adjourn the debate to another day.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Adjourn the debate to another day.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I am going to withdraw my motion. All I ask is that the French people in Ontario be treated in the same way as the English-speaking people are treated in Quebec. That is all I have to say.

The motion to adjourn the debate was withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: I did not intend to say anything on this subject, but owing to the course of the discussion and the number of questions involved in it, it seems to me that a member from the province of Ontario ought to know more about the question than the average member, is justified in saying something upon it.

In the first place, in my judgment a discussion of this kind in this House at the present time is very much out of order. The rule is laid down—and it must be known to the honourable gentleman who started this discussion, because he is a comparatively old parliamentarian—that it is not the practice to import questions into this House and discuss them while they are before the courts. This question is before the courts, and therefore in my judgment it is very much out of order and very improper for us to discuss it here.

In the second place, the question of education is one which undoubtedly pertains to the exclusive rights of the province, unless there is involved in it an element which brings it within the rights of other provinces. That is the way in which minority rights are interfered with. As this is a matter of education, and as it is being dealt with by the province in such a measure as the people of the province believe they have an undoubted and exclusive right to deal with it, it seems to me it would be very much out of place for the Federal Parliament to take it up, discuss it or interfere with the rights of the provinces in connection with it. Let us reverse the situation. Let us suppose that this a question that pertains to the undoubted rights of the province of Quebec. Let the question be brought into this House, and let an agitation be raised and be kept up from time to time. Such action only continues the disturbance in the country and draws public attention to it. It improperly accentuates the matter and creates a feeling that would otherwise not exist. I say again that this question should not be imported into this House except at a proper time and under proper provocation, which is not to be found in the question that is now engaging the attention of this House. The importation of these disturbing questions only keeps up trouble, and ought to be avoided as far as possible. This question is always raised under the plea of rights denied. Very often claims are put forward with regard to rights which are not proper claims at all. We believe that in connection with this matter there are put forward many claims which should not be put forward.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Who is to be the judge?

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: We are told that they are minority rights. We admit the minority rights which are granted under the British North America Act; but we deny that these minority rights should be so insisted upon as to interfere with and prevent the possibility of the majority rights being enjoyed by the people. This is exactly what we claim is being done in connection with this question. If the minority rights are enforced as the minority desires them to be enforced, this prevents the possibility of the majority enjoying their undoubted rights.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The enforcing of a minority right never interfered with a majority right.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: I have the floor, and only claim—

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: That shows a lot of intelligence.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order, order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: That shows a lot of intelligence.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Order.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: When I have the floor I claim to have the right to express my views, and to have the common courtesy of quietness on the part of honourable gentlemen extended to me.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I did not make the row.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: What is the situation in Ontario? If time permitted, and if it were necessary, I could quote sworn evidence substantiating the allegation that I am about to make, that, in schools where the two languages are to be taught, and where the rights of the minority—if you call the French the minority—are being enforced, unfortunately the minority will not be satisfied with the management and conduct of the schools in such a way as will enable majority rights to be enjoyed by the majority. Let me give an example. The law provides that in schools where the two classes of children are found, teachers who can teach both languages shall be employed. But in a school where there are French pupils they are not satisfied with the French-English teacher there is in the country, though he may have a certificate from the Normal School or some other school as an evidence of his qualifications. The minority refuse to accept him as capable of teaching the language of the minority. What is the result? They are not satisfied unless the teacher is one whose language is their mother tongue; and when such a teacher is employed, it may be found that he is not sufficiently conversant with the English language to be a competent teacher of English. Therefore, the English pupil in that school is entirely deprived of the right of the majority. That is where the trouble is imported. The provincial minister on this occasion exercised his undoubted right in trying to make regulations which would do no injustice to the minority, but which at the same time would give to the majority the rights which they are entitled to enjoy. That is what has been done by the Minister of Education. Then we have this agitation imported into this House. It is also actually extended to the province of Quebec, where a Bill is brought into the legislature for the purpose of raising money to fight the province of Ontario. Ontario is doing what it has an undoubted right to do, that is, controlling education, and does not desire to interfere with the rights of the minority. These are the troubles with which we are confroned to-day, and I say, from my knowledge of the situation, that the Government of Ontario is honestly desirous of doing, and is trying to do, what is conciliatory, what is generous to give to both the minority and the majority their rights. The province is working out its educational system, as it has the right to do so long as it is not improperly interfering with the rights of the minority as provided for in the British North America Act.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Will the honourable gentleman allow me to ask him two questions?

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The first question is this: will the honourable gentleman admit that it would be within the power of the province of Quebec to enact a regulation similar to No. 17 in that province?

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: I am not sufficiently conversant with the laws of the province of Quebec and the respective rights of the minority and the majority to be able intelligently or wisely to answer that question. Therefore I must decline to do so.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Is not the honourable gentleman aware that it is the same law, the constitution, which applies to both the provinces of Ontario and Quebec?

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: But the educational system of the province of Quebec is worked out by a Board of Education surrounded by many provisions and restrictions which have a bearing on the subject and which I do not understand.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: But the constitution is the same for both provinces?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: If no other honourable gentleman desires to speak on this question, I shall conclude the discussion. My honourable friends from the province of Ontario and the province of Nova Scotia, have put forth a plea, which I accept as the expression of their ideas on this question. They take for granted that the regulation is in favour of the French language being taught in the province of Ontario. That is what they understand. That is what they say. But what are the facts? When you go before a court, the court gives a judicial decision and that decision is binding. The members of the Privy Council in England, in their findings on the case which was brought before them, said that regulation 17 was no doubt enacted to banish the French language from the province of Ontario—or something to that effect; to prevent the French language from being taught in the province as we desire it to be taught.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: As far as I am aware, there was no such decision given by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The decision was entirely on another subject.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Read the decision.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: It deals with the liberty or power of the province of Ontario by an Order in Council to substitute a School Commission for a Board of Trustees. That was it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I trust the honourable gentleman will permit me to differ with him entirely on that point. We are going to get the judgment of the Privy Council, and I will try to convince my honourable friend from Grey that the judgment of the Privy Council is on the lines which I have just stated. Moreover, the judgment of the Privy Council stated that the regulation was couched in such obscure terms that they could not find what its real meaning was.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: Then they could not say it was to prevent French from being taught.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Well, get the judgment.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: At all events, your own judges in the province of Ontario have condemned our teachers to jail or to certain penalties because they were teaching French one hour a day in the schools.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: Sent them to jail for teaching an hour a day?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Yes.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: That is not so.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: That is the case. That is the interpretation given by the Ontario courts to that regulation. In interpreting it they said, "You must not teach the French language." I am speaking of the Green Valley case.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: The honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Landry) has made a statement which is an allegation of fact, that is, that the teachers were condemned and sent to jail for teaching French one hour a day. I deny that, and challenge the statement.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: What do you deny?

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: I deny that it ever occurred.

Hon. Mr CHOQUETTE: Do you deny that the penalty was imposed?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: In the Green Valley case, to which I am alluding, here are the facts. Green Valley is not one of the schools which have been declared to be bilingual schools. You know that under regulation 17 the first thing that is done in order to apply the regulation is that the Minister of Education announces each year which schools are to be considered as bilingual. A school not included in that declaration by the minister is not regarded as a bilingual school. Take Windsor, for instance. In Windsor there are three schools: one has a French attendance of 45 per cent, the other has 65 per cent of French pupils, and the third has 85 per cent. The minister's promulgation declared the first of these to be bilingual, the one in which 45 per cent of the pupils were French; and though there are in the same locality a school where the French attendance is 65 per cent and another where it is 85 per cent, these are not bilingual schools, because the minister refuses to issue a proclamation which would make them bilingual and subject to regulation 17. So the first requirement is the good will of the minister. We cannot get it. The school at Green Valley could not get it. They asked for it, as the schools of Windsor asked for it, and they could not get it. Do you see where the difficulty comes in? In the case of a school which is not bilingual, it comes under regulation 12, under which German or French may be taught one hour per day in such a school. The Green Valley was not a bilingual school, and there regulation 12 was in force. Under regulation 12 the teacher tried to teach French during one hour. The Green Valley case is a special case. Do you know what the teacher was teaching in that hour? He taught catechism for ten minutes of that time. Catechism is with us a religious matter; it is the teaching of our religion. That was brought before the courts and the courts decided that, as it was not a bilingual school, the teacher had no right to teach any French in the school for one hour because the French did not prevail in the district and moreover because during this hour the teacher had taught catechism, which was not one of the subjects he was allowed to teach. In a Catholic minority school—

Hon. Mr. GORDON: Was that a mixed school or a separate school?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: It was a separate school—a Catholic minority school.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: What was the number of French pupils and what was the number of English pupils?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: In that school the totality was French Canadian.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Dear, oh, dear; and yet they were not allowed to teach French. That would not happen in Germany.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Would the honourable gentleman allow me to go on? I have not his talent, and I want to follow up my argument.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I am backing you up.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: The honourable gentleman is backing me too much. You see how the matter stands. We are willing to try to have the parties come together to discuss this question.

I praise my honourable friend from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Crosby) for the good disposition he has shown at this time. We are willing to confer and try to devise means of reaching an understanding. We are not opposed to the study of English in those French sections. Our own interests require us to learn English. We are not trying to avoid that, the agitation is being kept up by certain people giving the country the impression that we do not want to learn English. We do want to learn English, and we accept any regulation which requires the study of English in those French schools; but what we do not want is the banishment of the French language. We want to retain the language which we have inherited from our mothers. That is a natural sentiment. Cannot we get together and find some means to adopt that proposition? I think we should.

The honourable gentleman from Peel (Hon. Mr. Blain) yesterday said: "You know that in the Toronto House not a voice was heard against those regulations." No, not a voice was heard against those regulations, because they were adopted on the last day of the session, when it was not known that they were coming up. But at the last session what took place?

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: My honourable friend knows that there have been several sessions of the Ontario Legislature since regulation 17 was adopted.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I know that.

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: Therefore it could have been done.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I am going to answer that immediately, to show the disposition of the Ontario Legislature. At the last session that question came up.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Before the last session.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: A Bill was presented, and what did our friends do? They voted against the Bill. Moreover, they introduced an amendment, asking that that law be submitted to the Supreme Court in order that its opinion might be had on the constitutional aspect of it. Nobody listened to that request.

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: My honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Landry) has misquoted me not intentionally. My point was this. I asked why did not my honourable friend use his influence in the Ontario Legislature, which had the power to correct these wrongs, if they were wrongs?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: He was not there.

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: His friends were.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: The honourable gentleman asks why I did not use my influence. I wrote to the Prime Minister of Ontario three times. I wrote to honourable Mr. Hearst when he came into power. That was about October, 1914. I have not all the dates here, but I could give them. The first time I wrote Mr. Hearst, his secretary answered that he was away, but that as soon as he returned I should get an answer. I waited a month without receiving an answer; so I wrote the second time, renewing my request. I did not get an answer; so I wrote him the third time.

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: No answer to the letter?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: No. My letter was acknowledged, but when I say I did not get an answer, I mean I did not get an answer to the request I was making.

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: My honourable friend, of course, would give to the Prime Minister of Ontario the credit of having been courteous in acknowledging the communication?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Yes. I am not complaining on that ground, but I say I had no answer to the question I put in the letter. I asked him to fix a date for an interview, in order that we might go to Toronto to see him and discuss the question. I never received an answer to that proposal.

My honourable friend from Grey (Hon. Mr. Sproule) says that this is not a question to bring up here, because it is before the courts. I think my honourable friend does not realize what question is before this House. It is not a question to ask the opinion of this House on the bilingual matter. The situation is this. After the judgment of the Privy Council in England was rendered, the legislature of the province of Ontario passed a new law, re-enacting the former legislation, giving the Government power to appoint a new commission if the present School Board did not obey the law. That is the effect of the Act. At the same time, a second Act was passed by which all indebtedness incurred by the Government Commission would be imposed on the appellants themselves, not on those who were defending their case before the Privy Council.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: On the ground that the expenditure was illegal?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Yes. They wanted to indemnify those who had been condemned by the Privy Council to pay the costs of the case which had been sent to London. This in face of the judgment of the Privy Council, and in face of the fact that it was interfering with the rights of the minority. I will answer that second objection in a moment. We have asked the Dominion Government to disallow that Act. That is the question which is now before this honourable House, and my inquiry of the Government is, as you may read in the order paper: "Is it the intention of the Government to disallow the legislation?" We have a right to ask that whether it is interference with the rights of the majority or not. By the British North America Act the British Government has the right to interfere with and to disallow a provincial law.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: I admit that, but I want to point out this fact, that while that is the question which is being asked, the history of the whole agitation is being set out on the records of this House, and then the honourable gentleman avails himself of the right to debate the whole question and to import into it what, in my judgment, it is not for this House to deal with.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I agree with the honourable gentleman, and I think it is the only way to come to an understanding. The honourable gentleman says: "Oh, if you keep quiet, if you bow to those who"—he did not say persecute—"if you bow to those who are not of the same opinion, if you accept what they say and do, peace will be maintained in this country." I know that; but when you interfere with what we think are our rights, with what we claim as our rights, well, leave us at least the liberty to complain; leave us at least the liberty to ask the Government, in view of the judgment of the Privy Council, to interfere. The Privy Council has declared that that legislation is ultra vires, but you are coming back with it. It is you who are agitating the public mind on questions which have been decided and settled by the highest tribunal of the Empire. I think it is the duty of the Government in these cases to interfere and disallow the Act. If the Government does not want to disallow it, in the face of the threats which to-day menace the existence of our minority in school matters in the city of Ottawa, well, the Government will take the responsibility of its refusal. But we will go on agitating, and trying to get justice, and in those efforts I hope we shall meet with the good-will of our friends, and shall one day come to an understanding. That is what we want; we want to come to an understanding. If you say, honourable gentlemen, that your desire is not to choke the French language in the province of Ontario, give us a chance to speak it.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: It has never been interfered with.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: No, except that the teachers in our schools and our trustees are condemned to imprisonment or to pay a fine.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: If they obey the law, they are all right.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: If that is the law, we are asking you to amend it, if your intention is not to prevent the teaching of French in our schools.

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: It does not.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Why will you not be as generous to our people as we are to yours in the province of Quebec?

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: We are.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: We think you are not. Why do we not come to an understanding? I do not want to defy the English-speaking population in the province of Ontario; I want that we should live together in peace and harmony. My honourable friend said that I was urgent in my claims, that I was sticking to my guns. I will stick to my guns and do all I can to have justice done to my people; and I am addressing myself to your generosity. Surely cannot you do something for us? If your intention is that we should have something to do with our language, in our province, give us your assistance.

Hon. Mr BLAIN: I venture to say that my honourable friend actually refuses to give credit to the Government of Ontario of having passed the regulation for the express purpose of assisting the French people. My honourable friend has no word of commendation for such a Government, but rather uses his influence for its condemnation, and further suggests to those who disobey the law that they should continue to disobey it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I will answer that. What does the Government of Ontario do for the purpose suggested by my honourable friend? They vote certain sums of money for the education of French and English teachers of the normal schools.

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: For special schools.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Yes, for special normal schools. Well, the honourable gentleman would be amazed if he knew that those at the head of those schools for teaching French do not speak a word of French, and do not understand that language. Here in Ottawa there is a school like that, and there is another one at Sturgeon Falls.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: That is not the case there, though.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I said in Ottawa. The principal does not understand a single word of French, and the French that is taught there is taught in English.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: French is taught in English?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: French is taught in English. You will see the difference between that—

Hon. Mr. GIRROIR: Is there no French teacher in that school?

Hon. Mr. GORDON: In regard to the Sturgeon Falls school—

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I am speaking of Ottawa; I do not know about Sturgeon Falls.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: But you intimated that the normal schools—

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: If my words gave that impression to my honourable friend, I will withdraw them.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: Because they re all French teachers at Sturgeon Falls.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I am answering the objection of my honourable friend, and I am talking of the city of Ottawa. I know that some of those schools are in other parts of the country, as well as at Sturgeon Falls. There is one at Vankleek Hill, or somewhere thereabouts.

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: Does my honourable friend say that the special school established in the city of Ottawa for the purpose of turning out teachers in the bilingual schools does not teach French?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: They are taught French in English.

Hon. Mr. GIRROIR: Who are the teachers? Are they English teachers?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: English teachers.

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: Give us their names.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I do not know their names.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Are there no French teachers there?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: There are no French teachers there. If there is a French teacher there, he is bound to teach French in English. Now, let me give you an exemple. Let us say that you want to learn the Russian language, and you go to a Russian school, where you are taught the Russian language, but in the Russian language; what progress would you make?

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: My honourable friend knows that is going on all the time.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Not all the time. I will tell you one thing; those who learn English in the French language are able, after two or three years, to get on with your pupils who are always taught in English, and to beat them in the schools.

I want to make good the assertion I made just now, by reading what the Lord Chancellor of the Privy Council delivered in reference to regulation 17:

> The objects of the circular is to restrict the use of French in those schools, and to this restriction the appellants, who are the Board of Trustees of the Roman Catholic Schools of the city of Ottawa, assert that they are not obliged to submit. It therefore becomes necessary to examine the different terms of the circular, in order to ascertain the nature and the extent of the restrictions imposed. Unfortunately it is couched in obscure language, and it is not easy to ascertain its true effect.

That is what the Privy Council has decided. Evidently the Privy Council found that the object of the regulation was to restrict the use of the French language. That contradicts your idea, because you thought it was not to restrict.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: My contention was that the restriction was only when the right which ought to be employed was being exercised in a way that was extending it beyond what it ought to be. It was restricted to a certain time.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: My honourable friend said that the legislature was supreme.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: One hour of the day instead of six or eight; that was the only restriction.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I am very glad to have gained that point, then. My honourable friend said that this question is before the courts. It is not before the courts at all; it is before Parliament; but the question is brought up before the courts by the refusal of the Bank of Ottawa to pay the money which the court in England ordered it to pay. I admit that the question of education is exclusively within the competence of the provincial legislatures, but only within the provisions of the Act; if a legislature goes beyond those provisions it is no longer supreme. Legislatures must not interfere wih the rights of the minority. They have a perfect right to do as they please as to regulations, provided they do not interfere with the rights of the minority; but if they interfere with those rights they are not supreme. It is for that reason that we are asking that this law be disallowed because the Privy Council has decided that the nomination of the new commission by the Government of Ontario was an interference with the right of the minority, because the Act of 1863 declared that the minority had the right to choose their own trustees.

I thank you, honourable gentlemen, for your kind attention, and I hope that this agitation will be a fruitful one, and that it will bind together people who before had not the same conception of regulation 17 and of the laws passed by the Ontario Legislature. Let us join our hands, the two parties who are dissenting to-day, and find a way of bringing peace and harmony to this country. I hope that this agitation of to-day will be blessed by all people, by the French Canadians of the province of Ontario, who are willing to learn English but want to keep their French, and by the population of the other provinces, who feel annoyed to-day because they cannot understand French. Let them come into the province of Quebec, and we will give them all the French teachers they want, to induce them to learn the French language.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Landry) placed upon the motion paper the following inquiries :

(a) Is the Government aware that under the provisions of the British North America Act, they have the absolute and indisputable power to disallow any Act passed by a Provincial Legislature?

(b) Does the Government intend to accede to the request which was addressed to them to exercise this power, and will they, without further delay, disallow both chapters 59 and 60 of the statutes of the last session of the Legislature of Ontario, which are manifestly unjust, iniquitous and unconstitutional, and the existence of which, if it is prolonged by the non-intervention of the central power, constitutes an outrageous defiance of the judgment of the Privy Council, and an immediate and continual menace to the general peace and interests of the country

(c) In the event of, by their refusal to exercise their right and their duty to intervene, the Federal Power assuming the grave responsibility of contributing to this nearing, and inevitable receivership which would close the schools of the Catholic minority, and throw on the streets the ten thousand children who attend the same, what other solution to the embarrassing problem could they offer to preserve to this minority the advantages which it has a right to claim in virtue of the final judgment of the highest tribunal of the British Empire?

The answers of the Government are:

(a) The British North America Act speaks for itself.

(b) The Government is not at liberty to say what advice will be tendered to His Excellency in due time.

(c) Answered by a and b.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Do I understand that the Government are not at liberty, or that they cannot take the liberty?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: As to the advice to His Excellency, or as to the action that would be taken on the legislation in question. Of course, the Government is not giving publicity as to what that advice will be.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow morning at eleven o'clock.

THE INSURANCE BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON presented the report of the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, to which was referred Bill 53, an Act respecting Insurance, and moved that the report of the committee be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON moved that the Bill be now read the third time.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, I move that Bill 53, an Act respecting Insurance, be not now read the third time, but be amended as follows:

That on page 65, line 34, the word "twenty" be substituted for the word "thirty."

This amendment was carried in the committee yesterday, but on reconsideration, fearing that possibly it might not pass the House of Commons, owing to shortness of time, we reversed that decision, and left the Bill as it was. Now I am assured that there will be no difficulty with respect to the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Would the honourable gentleman kindly explain the meaning of the amendment?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It has reference to the length of time during which notice may be given to a company in the case of an accident. Heretofore no time was mentioned. Representations have been made that thirty days would be too long a period, because advantage might be taken of the full time, and companies might thus be prevented from making a fair examination into whether the accident really did happen or not. The contention was that the length of time was a premium on fraud being perpetrated.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: I may say, in seconding that amendment, that the matter was brought before the committee and the amendment was approved of. The amendment provides that twenty days shall be allowed to elapse before the policyholder loses his right by notice to his claim for insurance; but the next section provides that in the event of failure to make application within 20 days his claim shall not be invalidated if he can show good reason why he did not give notice during that period.

The amendment was agreed to, and the Bill was then read the third time, and passed.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON.

WAR-TIME ELECTIONS BILL.

FIRST READING.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 133, the War-time Elections Act.—Hon. Sir James Lougheed.

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved that the Bill be now read the second time.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: It cannot be read now. We have not received it. What is the use of passing a Bill of which we know nothing?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I would point out to the honourable leader of the Government that so far we have seen this Bill only in the form in which it was presented in the House of Commons. I do not know whether any amendments have been made in the House of Commons or not.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not expect the members of the Senate to absorb the Bill until they have had a reasonable time to digest it. I proposed simply to move the second reading of the Bill and explain it, so far as I can, in order that it may be discussed to-day. We can take it up again on Monday.

Hon. Mr. POWER: With the understanding that members of the House will not be precluded from discussing the Bill generally in committee.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I object to that, and I object on good grounds. I have not got the Bill as it was passed by the House of Commons at three o'clock this morning. I think it is unfair on the part of the Government to ask Parliament to pass judgment on a Bill of which they know absolutely nothing.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: As I have explained to my honourable friend, we do not propose doing that.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The honourable leader of the Government says he will give his views on this Bill, but while he is discussing it we shall not be in a position to contradict him on anything he says. We must have the Bill in order to see that what he displays before this House as the policy of the Government is correct. He will give an explanation of this Bill—and I have no doubt he will do it ably; but that does not deprive us of our right to have the Bill in our hands.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I have been informed by the Clerk of the House that the Bill has been distributed in both languages.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I have no doubt about that; but we have had no time to read it. I am not stating that the Bill was not distributed, but I say we have not had it in our hands long enough, as the honourable leader of the Government says, to digest it. My proposition is a fair one. I ask the honourable leader of the Government, who I know is a fair-minded man, to defer the second reading. He now asks us to pass judgment, or to listen to a speech, on a Bill which we have had no time to read or digest.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: As I have explained to my honourable friend, it is not my purpose to ask the House to take any action upon the Bill to-day.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I am receiving the Bill now.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It may possibly assist my honourable friend if I make some explanations upon the second reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I have no objection to that.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Then my honourable friend will be able to spend a quiet and reflective day to-morrow in perusing the Bill.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I will take it to church with me.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: And on Monday he will be au fait with its principles, its policy and all its particulars.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I will bring it to church with me to-morrow. That will be a good place to read it.

Hon. Mr. LAVERGNE: No, it is not. The honourable leader proposes to give the explanation to-day and to have the discussion on Monday? Is that his intention?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. With the permission of the House, I would ask that the Bill be allowed to stand for a few minutes, and in the meantime we will dispose of the other items on the Order Paper.

Hon. Mr. LAVERGNE: I was asking the honourable leader of the Government if he would defer it until Monday.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No action will be taken on the Bill to-day. It is needless to say that we shall be very glad to have views expressed by any honourable gentleman who wishes to speak upon it to-day. It may be a relief to many to get off their minds any particular feelings which they may have, either in favour of or against the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LAVERGNE: Without having read it, I think it is a very bad Bill. Anyhow, we must read it carefully.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend entirely misunderstands the Bill if he has come to that conclusion.

The motion for the second reading of the Bill stands.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT. (INSURANCE) BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 54, an Act to amend the Criminal Code (respecting Insurance). Hon. Mr. Thompson in the Chair.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I may say that this Bill has been held over pending the consideration of the Insurance Bill which we have just passed. It is the complement of that Bill; in fact, it is a transfer to the Criminal Code of the sections formerly contained in the Insurance Act.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Why is it necessary to proceed in that way?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: On account of the action of the Privy Council. Instead of placing the penal sections in the Insurance Act, we can only exercise our jurisdiction by incorporating them in the Criminal Code.

On section 508 D—offences:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I am unable to see why this provision is necessary. As I understand this clause, it is intended to prevent an agent making a reduction in the first year's premium to the insured. Has any abuse in this regard come to the attention of the Government?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It practically means that a rebate is made. In modern business, particularly on the part of large corporations, nothing has been more vicious than the allowance of rebates. By this practice agents attempt to outdo one another in giving away that which should be compensation for the services which they render, and as a result they have to be reimbursed in some other way, which lays a heavy burden upon the insurer or the insured and prevents uniformity being maintained. Without a law of this kind we cannot maintain a low level of insurance rates.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: If the agent has to be reimbursed in some other way I can understand the necessity of such a provision; but if he is giving up something to which he is entitled, I do not see why we should interfere. Is this a new clause?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, it is clause 508 D. This is practically a transfer of the clause to the Criminal Code.

Section 508 D was agreed to.

The Bill was reported, read the third time, and passed.

WAR-TIME ELECTIONS BILL.

SECOND READING MOVED—DEBATE ADJOURNED.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 133, the War-time Elections Act.

He said: In moving the second reading of this Bill, which is very properly entitled the War-time Elections Act, I need scarcely say that, from a perusal of the Bill, honourable gentlemen will readily observe that it is somewhat of a departure from established lines. This is not to be unexpected. All measures of this nature, growing out of a condition of war, are approached with more or less caution and sometimes with distrust; but the conditions with which we have been confronted since the beginning of the present war have familiarized us with the principle that extraordinary conditions require extraordinary measures. In dealing with such measures, particularly those affecting the usages and practices of Parliament, we sometimes forget that most of the usages which we look upon to-day as being bulwarks of the constitution originated in times of national upheaval, storm and stress; and so the conditions we are facing to-day compel us to place upon the statute-book measures of an extraordinary character with which many honourable gentlemen are not in sympathy. In considering measures of this character, it is quite natural that there should be a difference of opinion between the Government and its critics or opponents. In the first place, the Government of the day is charged with the administration of government under very trying circumstances. They find an upheaval, not only in public opinion, but in respect to almost every condition of life, by reason of the titanic struggle in which the whole world is now engaged. In the beginning of the war we were called upon to adopt measures to meet the military requirements of the moment and all the exigencies which arose, and we approached that situation with great caution, with some distrust, and with much uncertainty. As the war proceeded, we realized that war is ruthless—that there is no condition in life so ruthless as a state of war. Hence those charged with the responsibility of administering government in war-time very soon realize that the conventions which restrain us under normal conditions, and the sanctity with which we regard the traditions which we have venerated for generations, are not to stand in the way of our meeting the situation which faces us, and which has been brought about by war conditions which they cannot avoid. The critics of the Government, no matter what that Government may be, have not the same experience, through observation, or through actual knowledge of the situation that has to be met, as the Government has. Therefore there are two viewpoints in regard to the legislation which we are called upon to enact from time to time in order to deal with war conditions.

It is not unexpected that the Government of the day has to prepare a Franchise Act, and that that Franchise Act may possibly not meet the views of its more critical opponents. In the early part of this session the Government anticipated that it would not be called upon during the present session to bring down any legislation looking to the holding of a general election. There was an expectation, and properly so, that Parliament would be fairly well united upon the necessity of prolonging the life of Parliament during the war—that both political parties in Canada would recognize the necessity of united action and united sympathy, in prosecuting this war to a successful conclusion. But as time went on such a diversity of opinion developed upon this subject that, desirable though it should have been regarded by all who were in sympathy with our attitude in the war, it soon became obvious that it would not be desirable to ask for a further extension of the life of the present Parliament, notwithstanding the resolution adopted by the House of Commons in favour of that course. The Government therefore had no alternative other than to make preparation for a general election, and the Franchise Act which we are now submitting to Parliament is the outcome of that conviction.

I think it is regrettable that at such a crucial time in our history the two great political parties in Canada should be facing each other in a general election. This is a time when they should stand united, both in sympathy and in action, in prosecuting this war to a successful conclusion. Under such conditions, therefore, it is natural that the franchise law of the country should reflect the public sentiment of the day with reference to the men who are fighting not only the battles of Canada but the battles of civilization, and placing themselves in a position in which many of them are sacrificing their lives for the protection and the sanctity of our homes and our country.

The Bill is well termed the War-time Elections Act. It gives special recognition to the claims of the soldier upon the legislation which we are enacting to-day. It is not necessary for me to say that military service has long been recognized. Centuries ago it was practically the only service recognized by the autocratic or despotic governments of the age; and from early days down to the present military service in time of war has been regarded as having the first claim upon the Government of the country, no matter what that Government may have been. We need not recall those early days when military service was recognized as giving the soldier the right to loot—the right to act upon the old maxim that to the victor belongs the spoils. We do not need to go very far back in history to reach the time when lands were divided amongst those who were successful in military conquest, and when all possible recognition was given to the heroic soldiers, by monarchs, governments and parliaments. Consequently, when we come down to this day, we find the same principle asserted and crystallized in much of our legislation, and it is not unfair to say, particularly in regard to elections, that those who fight for the country should be the first to receive recognition. If this principle is found to run through the Bill now before us, it is because of that peculiar sense in human nature which, no matter how we try to suppress it, finds its origin and development in those considerations which always appeal most strongly to our sympathies.

This Bill is an amendment to the present Dominion Elections Act. That Act as it stands to-day upon the statute book, with the addition, in italics, of the provisions of the Bill now before us for consideration, has been distributed amongst honourable gentlemen.

This Bill will not be easily understood unless its scheme of construction is first explained. It consists of three sections only. The first section supplies amendments and additions to Part II of the Dominion Elections Act. The second supplies amendments and additions to Part III of that Act. The third is an application section. There is nothing permanent about it. It is a purely war-time measure. Honourable gentlemen will note that section 1 commences with the declaration that "for the period of the war" the Dominion Elections Act shall be " deemed " to be amended in certain respects, and proceeds to indicate in what respects. Each amendment or addition to or change in the Dominion Elections Act is indicated by a letter of the alphabet in brackets. In section 1 these run from a to t. In section 2 they run from a to h.

Twelve years ago, under the previous Administration, the present Part II of the Dominion Elections Act was enacted. It applied to Saskatchewan, Alberta and the Yukon Territory. The system of list-making provided thereby is one of great simplicity, and it possesses the merit that it can be very expeditiously carried out. For this reason, in view of the necessarily restricted period of time that will be available for list-making if a winter-time election is to be avoided, the system of list-making provided by that part has been adopted in the present Bill. In a general way it may be taken that the list-making provisions of Part II of the Dominion Elections Act, which formerly extended only to the provinces and territory mentioned, have been extended to all Canada. There are certain partial exceptions which will be noted at a later stage.

There was a real necessity for this War-time Elections Act, aside altogether from what is contained in it. For Saskatchewan, Alberta and the Yukon it was necessary to prepare voters' lists in any event. The present law so compels. A recent Act of the province of British Columbia, entirely apart from the fact of the inclusion of the names of female voters on the lists of that province—because, as honourable gentlemen know, the franchise has been extended to women in many provinces—had so provided concerning the allocation of the names of the voters that the application of such names to polling divisions for the purposes of Dominion elections was practically impossible. Hence there has to be more or less elimination in reference to those lists. In the province of Ontario an analogous condition existed. As the result of a change in the provincial law made this present year there exist no voters' lists for that province which can be legally used for the purpose of a Dominion election. In addition to these necessities and complications, the provincial voters' lists of British Columbia, Manitoba and Ontario contain the names of female voters who, as the law officers of the Crown advise, are not in consequence qualified to vote in Dominion elections.

The necessity for list-making being established, the next consideration naturally was the franchise and qualifications of voters. Except where the necessities of the case demanded the application of a different principle, the provincial qualifications have been preserved.

The franchise is proposed to be extended to certain relatives of members of the military and naval forces. It being obviously impossible to apply to such persons the income and property qualifications which are required by certain provinces, only the provincial qualifications as to age, race and residence have been applied to women voters.

In order to make easier the understanding of the admittedly complicated provisions of the Bill, there have been provided in both languages printed copies of Part II of the Dominion Elections Act as it will appear when the amendments, additions and subtractions provided by this Bill have been made. Added matter is printed in italics. The amendments to Part III of the Dominion Elections Act almost all appear in full in the Bill.

The Bill suspends Part I of the Dominion Elections Act for the period of the war, but certain sections of it have been transferred into Part II.

So much for the structure of the Bill. Now as to its contents.

As stated, it preserves as far as possible the provincial qualifications of voters.

It admits to the franchise the mothers, wives, widows, and daughters of all persons who are on active service in the Canadian and British military forces outside of Canada, or in the Canadian or British naval forces within or without Canada.

The principle upon which the extension of a limited franchise to women is based is dual in character. The first consideration is the compensation of those who have undertaken military or naval service. There is a moral certainty that many of them will be unable to poll their votes at the election, and an actual certainty that none of them will be able to exercise their personal influence over others. It goes without saying that the—approximately 400,000 men who are overseas—will not be in Canada for the purpose of exercising either their own voting power or the influence which they would have over an election. It is, therefore, not unreasonable that that same influence should be delegated to those of their families who are permitted to vote.

The second consideration is the recognition of the sacrifice made by those to whom the franchise is so extended. That is to say, by extending the franchise to their relatives, we embodied in this Bill, the recognition of the services which they are contributing to this country.

The Bill disqualifies a number of classes of persons: first, conscientious objectors against combatant military service. If a man objects to fight he should not be permitted to vote. I think that goes without saying. The Bill also disqualifies such Mennonites and Doukhobors as are exempt from military service, excepting such as have volunteered for such service, and naturalized British subjects who were born in an enemy country or whose mother tongue is that of an enemy country and who were naturalized subsequent to the 31st of March, 1902. There are some exceptions, and all who are disqualified from voting and their minor sons are by the Bill exempted from combatant service. As honourable gentlemen will doubtless recall, some years ago we exempted the Mennonites and the Doukhobors from military service on account of their having conscientious convictions upon that subject.

All persons who actually vote at the election become ineligible for exemption from combatant service on conscientious grounds. If a man wants to vote, therefore, he throws off any exemption which he might otherwise claim as a conscientious objector, and becomes subject to military service.

It will thus be seen that the general principle of the Bill is that liability and willingness to serve the state imperilled is the test of the right to the franchise in time of war.

The voters' lists in the four western provinces, Prince Edward Island, and the Yukon Territory will be prepared entirely by enumerators according to the system hitherto in force in Alberta, Saskatchewan, and the Yukon Territory, but with certain added safeguards making possible a judicial revision. The lists of male voters in Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, except in the cities of Ontario, will be those in force within the respective provinces. In the cities of Ontario there will be an enumeration followed by a judicial revision. The female voters in all the provinces will be enumerated according to a system which will be explained as the Bill is read.

With these explanations, honourable gentlemen, and feeling assured that the principle which we have embodied in this Bill should appeal to every loyal-minded citizen of Canada, I move the second reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: If no other honourable gentleman desires to speak at the present moment, I would like to move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. RATZ: Before we adjourn, I would like to ask the honourable leader of the House a question. I understand that the Mennonite Church is disfranchised under this Bill; is that correct?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. RATZ: But there is another sect called the New Mennonite Church; would they be disfranchised also?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If they do not come within the provisions of the Bill they would not be. My honourable friend will doubtless recall the fact that assurances were given to the Mennonites when they originally settled in Canada that they would be exempt from military service. I think that was done by Order in Council. As to whether the class mentioned by my honourable friend would come within that order I am not prepared to say; that is a matter that would have to be investigated.

Hon. Mr. RATZ: Whether this Bill would disqualify them because they belong to what is called the New Mennonite Church I am not prepared to say. I think it would be wrong if it did. The New Church is an offspring of the old Mennonite Church.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If they are not entitled to exemption they will not be exempt; I mean to say, they will be subject to military service. If they have been exempted by the Order in Council, or come within the guarantees which were given by the Canadian Government at the time the Mennonites came here, of course they are exempt from military service, and they will be exempt from exercising their franchise under the Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: Can the honourable gentleman inform the House in what respect the new sect differs from the old? Do they hold the same views with reference to military service, or do they bring themselves under the general laws of the country?

Hon. Mr. RATZ: I am not prepared to speak as to the views they hold; but they cannot be exempt by the Order in Council, which I think was passed about 1873, exempting the Mennonite Church.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I think it was about that time. It was passed when they first came to Canada.

Hon. Mr. RATZ: This new Mennonite Church was born since that date; it is not over ten or fifteen years old, possibly twenty at the outside. If this Bill is made law, and disqualifies what are called Mennonites, these people would be disqualified when they should be legally entitled to vote.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That would be for the returning officer to determine when he comes to make up the lists. It will be for him to ascertain what the qualifications or disqualifications of the electors may be.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Can the honourable gentleman tell us whether the difference between the new and the old Mennonites is theological or political, and, if theological, in what way does the theology differ?

Hon. Mr. RATZ: It is not political, because the Mennonite Church. as a rule, takes very little interest in politics. Up to the present time, though some of them have voted the majority have not done so. The difference between the two sects is theological. The New Mennonite Church is more in the form of the Methodist Church.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Then they will be prepared to fight, I fancy.

The debate was adjourned until the first sitting on Monday.

Hon. Mr. LAVERGNE: I would ask the leader of the Government to fix the time for three o'clock in the afternoon. I am speaking for others.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There is no reason why we should not make use of the morning sitting. We will also sit in the afternoon, as the debate will continue all day, I fancy. Of course, there is no necessity for its continuing that long, but I would not be surprised if it did.

The Senate adjourned until Monday next, at eleven o'clock in the morning.

WAR-TIME ELECTIONS BILL.

MOTION FOR SECOND READING—AMENDMENT PROPOSED BY HON. MR. BOSTOCK.

The Senate resumed from September 15 the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed for the second reading of Bill 133, the War-time Elections Act.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Honourable gentlemen, in introducing this measure the other day, the honourable the leader of the Government referred to it as a war-measure—a measure that was introduced under exceptional circumstances. He remarked that it was unfortunate that such a measure should be enacted at the present time. His words were:

> I think it is regrettable that at such a crucial time in our history the two great political parties in Canada should be facing each other in a general election. This is a time when they should stand united, both in sympathy and in action, in prosecuting this war to a successful conclusion.

I have to take exception to this statement of my honourable friend, because it leaves upon the minds of the people the impression that both parties in Canada are not anxious to prosecute the war to a successful conclusion. I think that both parties in Canada are anxious to prosecute the war to a successful conclusion. The only difference between them has been as to the methods which should be adopted. Difference of opinion has arisen over the question as to whether men can be got to serve their country better by compelling them to come forward than by leaving it to their own good judgment, their own good sense, and their realization of what we are fighting for, and what it would mean to this country and to the rest of the world if the forces against which we are fighting should be victorious and be in a position to enforce their will upon the world. The situation, as I see it, is so serious that I cannot imagine any man not being inspired with the idea that Canada has to do her utmost to bring this war to a satisfactory conclusion, a conclusion whereby the Allies will be in a position to dictate the terms of peace. This is one of the reasons given by my honourable friend for the introduction of this Bill. It is unfortunate, possibly, that no agreement could be arrived at between the parties; but the method that was adopted by the Government in trying to come to an arrangement was not altogether wise or diplomatic. Had the question been approached in a different way, I think that a different result might have been brought about. But we are not dealing with that question now, and we can only look upon it from the point of view of those who were not immediately consulted in the matter. The question of the extension of the term of Parliament never came up in this House, and therefore we did not have to deal with it.

The Bill before us goes very far in dealing with the franchise. Honourable gentlemen may say that the question of the franchise does not concern members of this Chamber very much. We in this Chamber do not have to go back to constituents to ask for an endorsation of what we have done during the life of Parliament; but we have to consider whether the policy embodied in a Bill such as this is for the benefit of the whole country, is going to appeal to the people's sense of right and justice, and will tend to promote unity in the country; or whether it will tend to disrupt and injure the people, and possibly bring about a condition of things that may be of detriment to the country for many years to come. I think that we on this side of the House are practically agreed that the step taken by the Government in this measure is not a wise one. We think that the Government has not been wise in proposing to disfranchise, as this Bill does, a large number of voters who for many years have been privileged to cast their votes and take part in the public affairs of the country, and to say by their votes what they think of the way in which the affairs of the country are being carried on, and whether they approve of the policy of one party or the other. They will resent greatly the taking away from them of this privilege at this time. The leader of the Government in another House has never pretended to say that the people who will be disfranchised by this Bill have done anything but behave themselves in a manner that has been on the whole satisfactory to the country. In discussing this question during the short session of 1914, he said:

> We have no reason to believe that those people are inspired by the militaristic tendencies which influence the German Government at the present time, or the Austrian Government for that matter. We have no reason to doubt, and we do not doubt, that these people will be absolutely true to the country of their adoption.

Therefore at that time he had apparently no thought, no suspicion, that any trouble would be created by these people. Then, again, in the succeeding session of 1915 the Prime Minister, in referring to the Austrian and German-born population, said:

> So far as the others are concerned, I repeat what I said in August last, when we were considering matters connected with the war, that those of German birth and those born in the Empire of Austria-Hungary who have come to this country to be citizens of Canada have with very few exceptions borne themselves worthily and well. I believe that I can speak with peculiar knowledge as to this, because it has been part of my public duty to make myself acquainted with their sentiments and with the part which they are taking at this juncture of our affairs.

Honourable gentlemen will notice from the statements made that the Prime Minister speaks practically from personal knowledge. He has looked carefully into the matter and realizes that these people are behaving themselves as good citizens of the country; and up to that time he thought there was no reason to introduce legislation of this kind. Again, when discussing this question during the present session, when this Bill was before the other House, he said:

> I have not a word to say against the loyalty to Canada of these men.

Then, we have the statement of the Secretary of State, who, I think, was responsible for introducing this measure into the House of Commons. He said:

> I am quite free to admit that, taken all in all, those who come from alien enemy countries have, in the main, during the progress of this war, conducted themselves satisfactorily within lines of obedience to the laws of Canada. It is not based on any complaint of that kind that the principle embodied in this Bill is adopted.

Honourable gentlemen will see from those statements, first of all by the Prime Minister, and afterwards by the Secretary of State, that the extraordinary causes which have been suggested as the reasons for adopting a measure of this kind are not due to the way in which the voters who are to be disfranchised have behaved since the war began. I think that if honourable gentlemen will consider the position in which these people have been placed—that they came to this country to get away from conditions which they found irksome, which they disliked, and for the purpose of benefiting themselves and living under conditions which seemed to them more true to the course of life which they wished to pursue—they will realize that these men have a better appreciation, possibly, than even native-born Canadians have of what it would mean if the forces of Germany and Austria were to gain the mastery in the great contest in which we are now engaged. They have been under the yoke; they have known what it is to be ordered around and made to do, not what they thought was right, but what they were told to do, without having any voice in the affairs of their country. Therefore it would come home to them possibly more than to other persons, what the result to this country would be if Germany were to win this war and be in a position to dictate to us what we must do, and take away from us our franchise.

Immigrants have come to this country under arrangements with the Government. The Mennonites and the Doukhobors were brought here under special conditions, and it was guaranteed to them that they should not be called upon to perform military service—that they should not have to fight, as that was supposed to be against their principles. But we know from the records that some of the men—I have not the figures, but no doubt they can be obtained—have volunteered to fight and help to defend this country. Those who have not enlisted, ought, I think to receive consideration from the fact that some of their men anyhow have done so. These people are all to be disfranchised under the proposed Act. A large number of people of other races have been brought to this country. They have come from parts of Europe which are, it is true, under the rule of Austria or Germany at the present time, but they belonged to a nation which has been fighting for its freedom for a great many years, and they are not in sympathy with the ideas of their rulers. They were opposed to the coercion which was placed upon them in their own country, and they would naturally object to being brought back under the rule from which they escaped when they left Europe. Therefore I think that the Government is making a great mistake in proposing to disfranchise these people at the present time. I think that if the matter were properly placed before them, they would realize that it is to their own interest to do everything they can to help this country in winning the war, and would be possibly the last people who would want to vote for a party which they thought were opposed to this country doing their utmost to win the war.

I would like to refer, honourable gentlemen, to the arrangement that was made with such people at the time they came to this country. The Act, chapter 77 of the Revised Statutes, has a certificate which is given to them on their entering this country. The certificate contains the following words:

> This is therefore to certify to all whom it may concern that under and by virtue of the said Act.....has become naturalized as a British subject, and is, within Canada, entitled to all political and other rights, powers and privileges, and subject to all obligations to which a natural-born British subject is entitled or subject within Canada, with this qualification that he shall not, when within the limits of the foreign state of which he was a subject (or citizen) previous to the date hereof, be deemed to be a British subject unless he has ceased to be a subject (or citizen) of that state, in pursuance of the laws thereof, or in pursuance of a treaty or convention to that effect.

After they receive that certificate they are British subjects except when they go back to their own country. It is assumed that when a war such as the present one breaks out, if these people wanted to retain their citizenship of the country from which they came, they would naturally try to go back to their own country. As I understand, the laws of the country from which they came require that they shall go back to fight for their country; and, if they do not go back at the present time in order to assist their own government in carrying on the war, they deprive themselves, so to speak, of citizenship in their own country. Honourable gentlemen no doubt have met at different times, men from European countries who have stated that they could not go back to their own country because they had left it in order to escape the obligation to perform military service, of which they did not approve. Such men, by not returning to their own country at the present time, have practically cut themselves off from citizenship in that country, and therefore they are all the better citizens of Canada.

Further, section 24 of the Naturalization Act, which is headed, "Rights of Aliens Naturalized," reads:

> An alien to whom a certificate of naturalization is granted shall, within Canada, be entitled to all political and other rights, powers and privileges, and be subject to all obligations, to which a natural-born British subject is entitled or subject within Canada, with this qualification that he shall not, when within the limits of the foreign state of which he was a subject previously to obtaining his certificate of naturalization, be deemed to be a British subject, unless he has ceased to be a subject of that state in pursuance of the laws thereof, or in pursuance of a treaty or convention to that effect.

The certificate is worded practically according to the section of the Act. When we passed that Act we guaranteed to these people that they should have > "The rights, powers and privileges, and be subject to all obligations, to which a natural-born British subject is entitled or subject within Canada."

As far as I know, there is no reason why those persons should not be performing the obligations that are imposed upon them. If it is necessary under the Conscription Act, there is no reason why they should not be called upon to perform their duties just the same as any other citizens.

Further, these men in any event, even if they are not called upon to go and fight for this country, are subject to taxation. They must bear their just and fair share of taxation which is necessary in order to provide the Government with funds for carrying on the war.

These men, I understand, have also been prominent in raising money for the purposes of the Red Cross Fund, the Patriotic Fund, and such other funds as have been raised throughout the country since this war began. Therefore, as far as such duties are concerned, they have been prepared to do everything they were called upon to do, and they have, I think, done their fair share—in some cases possibly more than other classes of people.

In bringing forward this measure, the Government have dealt with certain classes, but I want to tell the honourable leader of the Government here that my experience in the province from which I come has been that there are other classes of people who have shown that they are not altogether in sympathy with this war. Not that they are opposed in any way to Great Britain, but they are opposed to the treatment which they have received in the past from some of our Allies. In their behaviour those persons are, if I may say so, just as dangerous as anybody else in Canada. Yet, as I understand it, this Bill does not deal with that particular class of men; they will be entitled to vote just as they have always been. If there were any real, solid, sound reason for bringing forward this Bill to penalize certain classes of people in the manner proposed, it should have been made wider than it is in order to safeguard the country from the votes of all these people, if that is the purpose for which the Bill has been introduced.

In regard to another class of persons dealt with under this Bill—I refer to the women voters—I think that the Government is going to cause a great deal of trouble throughout the country. In the West there are now four provinces which have given votes to women, and in one of them there is already a lady member of the legislature. In all probability, had it been possible, there would before now have been ladies as representatives in one of the other provinces. I ask the members of the Government whether they think that women who have been granted the privilege of voting on provincial matters and have been agitating for the privilege of voting in Dominion elections will be well satisfied with the limited kind of franchise which is being granted to women under this Bill.

A large number of the women most prominent in the organizations which have been started in the various provinces to agitate for women suffrage are women who will not be entitled to vote if this Bill becomes law. These women have taken a very prominent part in Red Cross work, in work for the Patriotic Fund, and in the various societies which have been organized for the purpose of assisting in this war. They will naturally feel that they have done as much as the women who are to become entitled to the vote because some of their men have gone to the front or some of their sisters have gone overseas as Red Cross nurses. The women who are not granted the right to vote will naturally feel that a kind of stigma is being placed upon them, implying that they have not done as much as women who have gone to England and acted as nurses or taken up other work of that kind. I think that if the Government was prepared to give the vote to women it has been badly advised not to give it to all the women of the country.

In connection with this matter there is the further question whether, under the Dominion Elections Act, women who have the right to vote in the provinces are not entitled to vote at a Dominion election. Section 10 of the Franchise Act, which is headed "Qualifications," reads:

> The qualifications necessary to entitle any person to vote at a Dominion election in any province shall, except as herein otherwise provided, be those established by the laws of that province as necessary to entitle such person to vote in the same part of the province at a provincial election.

The Government proposes by this Bill to use the provincial lists. The women's names will be on those lists; therefore, as I understand it, the enumerators in making up the list for the Dominion election will strike off the names of all women whose sons or husbands were not in a position to go to the front, although these women may have done a great deal more work in Canada to assist in carrying on the war than some other women who have had sons or husbands to go to the front. I know it has been held that that clause of the Franchise Act does not qualify women to vote; but the question turns on the narrow interpretation of the word "person"—whether or not the word "person" includes a female person as well as a male person. The legal interpretation that women are not included is a matter which, I submit, would not appeal to the ordinary person in Canada, and when it is brought home to the women of Canada that that is the interpretation placed on the clause they will feel that the Government has done them a great injustice in not allowing them to vote in those provinces in which they already have the right to vote in provincial elections.

I have endeavoured to point out that the introduction of this Bill, has in my opinion, not been considered as carefully as it should be. The Government, in following up their action in bringing down a Bill to give the soldiers a vote, might consistently have carried out the principle that none but those persons immediately concerned in the prosecution of the war should have a vote, in which case they would have excluded every honourable gentleman in this Chamber, because we, on account of physical conditions are exempt from taking an active part in the war.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: What about Colonel Fowler?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Had they followed out that principle, it might have been regarded as at least a reasonable excuse for them, and it would have accorded with the principle referred to by my honourable friend (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) in his speech the other day, that military service had in the past been held as the best qualification for the vote. We have gone a great deal further in Canada than has been done in England in giving votes to our soldiers who have gone to the front. As far as I am aware, no question has ever been raised in England about giving the soldiers at the front a vote. The law in England to-day, I understand, is that a soldier has the privilege of exercising his franchise only as a civilian. He cannot in his capacity as a soldier go and vote at an election. I think that is due to the old tradition that the people of England were always very chary of allowing any such organization as an army must naturally be to cast their votes and possibly affect the opinion of other people in the country. I think it is well to point out to honourable gentlemen this fact, although I quite agree that, considering what the soldiers are doing for this country, the Government has done the right thing in giving them an opportunity to vote. However, the Government has not adopted the principle that only those who are engaged in military service shall have a vote. When we look at the clauses of the Bill, it appears that the Government have proceeded on an entirely different principle. They have done away with the provincial lists, and have provided for special enumerators to be appointed for the purpose of compiling the lists for the elections. These men will strike off such names as they think should be struck off, and will put on names which they think should be put on the list. It lies practically in the hands of these enumerators to make up any kind of list which they think is advisable. It is only natural to assume that these men will be appointed by the party that is in power, and therefore their sympathies will be with that party, and they will naturally try to do all they can to put on the list the names of those persons whom they know to be favourable to the party in power.

The practical effect of this Bill, as I see it at the present time, will be that we shall have lists which have been compiled beforehand for the purpose of returning to power the present Government. I am not saying that the present Government should not be returned to power, but I do say that the Government should be prepared to take the fair sense of the people in an election on a just and equitable basis. It does not look like fair play, or, as we say in England in games, it does not look like playing the game to start in and make up the lists first of all and say, "You must vote on those lists." I think the sense of justice and fair play in the minds of the people from one end of this country to the other will make them consider that the Government, in bringing down this measure, has not given them a fair and square opportunity of expressing their opinion of the way the affairs of this country have been conducted in the last six or seven years. They will, feel that it is not playing the game for men who naturally will be in favour of the party that is in power to start in and compile the lists.

I think one great danger of this Bill is that, instead of helping the Government, as they must have thought it would do when they brought it in, it will militate against them. A large number of people, who thought that the Government had tried to prosecute this war to a successful issue, will be led to consider that if the Government have to go to such a length in order to retain power there must be something wrong with their administration, and that they are not capable, as they should be, of sizing up the situation properly in the country and of realizing what the people of Canada to-day are thinking about. The Government do not seem to think that the people of Canada as a whole are in favour of winning this war, when they deem it necessary, in order to carry on the war, to adopt measures that we might have expected the Kaiser himself to adopt. The Government are not prepared to give the people a chance of expressing their opinion fairly and squarely; but they want to arrange that only those who they think are favourable to themselves should have a vote. I do not think we can turn to any phase in the history of the world when that kind of policy pursued by any government has been a success. The people naturally revolt against any such thing; they do not like to be told that they must do this thing or the other thing; they much prefer to be free to use their own judgment and opinion, and to vote as they think best in the interest of the country.

Therefore, I think the Government will find the great danger from this legislation is that it will not accomplish the object for which it has been introduced. I think honourable gentlemen will see, from two telegrams I have personally received from the women of British Columbia, that a very strong agitation will arise there when this Bill has become law. On the 8th September I received the following telegram from the United Suffrage Societies of British Columbia, signed by the lady Secretary:

Have wired premier following: United Suffrage Societies protest against Election Act now before House re women suffrage, which disfranchises women of British Columbia. Object to any extension of franchise to women except on same terms as to men. Demand federal franchise to women who are qualified as men are qualified.

Then on the 8th September I received this further telegram:

Women's Liberal Association, Vancouver, desires to record extreme disapproval War-time Elections Act. While warmly approving of the proposal for according franchise to near women relatives of the soldiers, we regard the refusal of the vote to the rest of the women of Canada as a breach of faith on the part of the Government and an unpardonable affront to every elector.

(Sgd) Annie C. Wilkes.

Those two telegrams show the feeling of the women in British Columbia to-day in regard to this legislation which the Government has thought well to bring down. I do not think it a wise policy, in the Government's own interest, that they should set those associations of women throughout the country against them. So far we have not had enough experience of women's influence in elections, when they have a vote and taken a keen, active interest in it, to know exactly what that influence will amount to, or how far it will extend. But I think if the Government succeed, as they seem to be succeeding, in setting against them those women who take a prominent part in the discussion of these questions, they will find that they have stirred up a very powerful and effective force which will not assist them in attaining the object they have in view, but will be very much of a detriment to the Government.

With regard to the Bill itself, I propose to refer to certain portions. First of all, on the question of registration, I find that under this Act no notice is given when the enumerator starts to make up the list. The enumerator in the Yukon Territory has to give notice that he is about to compile the list, so that the public may know, first of all, who the enumerator is, and, secondly, where he is to be found at certain times, and that he has started to make up the list. But that provision only applies to the Yukon Territory. In the rest of the country the enumerator has not to give any notice to the public until ten days, I think it is, before the day of polling, when he has made up the lists, and is prepared to receive protests from people who claim that their names have been improperly left off the list. I think it would be very much better if the public knew at once, as soon as those enumerators were appointed, who they were, also where their office was, and when they were to start on the work of making up the lists.

Again, I think it would be very much fairer if it could be arranged that the enumerators should compile the lists finally on a certain date. As I read the Act, the enumerator is on hand on the polling day, and a voter who is left off the list can go to him on that day; but there is a confusion of terms in the Bill, as it appears to me, for I cannot see how the enumerator is to be simultaneously at every polling station in a riding. If there is to be an enumerator appointed for every polling station throughtout Canada, I do not know whether the Government will be able to get a sufficient number of enumerators to fill the positions; if they do, there will be very few except enumerators left to vote. The difficulty will be considerable, unless, of course, the Government are prepared to appoint ladies as well as men to act as enumerators. The list is really not final until the day of polling; and at that time a voter whose name has not been placed on the list can obtain a certificate and vote upon that. But the objection comes in that if an enumerator is not altogether satisfied with the statement made by the voter, he gives him a certificate in a certain form, which I understand is not counted at the time of the election, but becomes what is called a "tied ballot" in the western provinces, where this system of voting has been carried on in the past. That tied ballot is taken by the deputy returning officer and put on one side, to be used at a later stage if a recount of the votes is demanded. It simply means that the man whose vote is left off the original list, or is not added to the list before polling day, has to wait about for perhaps a fortnight, three weeks, or a longer time in order to come before the judge at the recount. I think that is a very objectionable method to pursue at the present time, because it either means that such voters will be kept away from their regular work for a considerable period, or that their votes will never be produced on any recount at all; because if the voters have to wait about in order to attend this court, they will not know for some time whether there is to be a recount or not, and that will very materially interfere with their work and business. I do not think we should adopt an arrangement of that kind at the present time, when the Government should be doing everything they can to assist the voters in carrying on the necessary work of the country. Honourable gentlemen know that from one end of Canada to the other we are short of labour in every walk of life; we require more help to carry on the business of the country; and if men are to be taken away from their ordinary vocations, and in order to get their votes in, have to wait around to ascertain whether there is going to be a recount of the vote or not, a very great mistake will have been made.

I have tried to show that this is not the kind of measure that we should be putting through this Parliament. If the Government realize what has been going on in the rest of the Empire since the war began, and what it has meant for the British Empire to have a man like General Smuts going to England and taking part in the Imperial conferences that were held in the beginning of this year—a man who was fighting against Britain in the South African war, but is now fighting for the Empire and has been doing some of the finest work, that has been done by any General—I think they will realize that a policy of the kind embodied in this Bill is a big mistake. I think the greatness of the men of the British Empire was shown after the Boer war, when they turned around and gave the people of South Africa a federation, at a time when it might almost be said their rifles were still smoking; but those men have appreciated the freedom and privilege then given to them, as shown by the great work they have done for the British Empire in South Africa in consequence of having been treated with justice and consideration, and as honourable and straightforward men, and not as men who could not be trusted to do their best to develop the resources of the country which was given into their charge.

I therefore think that the Government has made a very great mistake in bringing down a measure of this kind at the present moment, and I desire to move:

That this Bill be not now read a second time, but that it be resolved:

That, in the opinion of the Senate, it is not desirable, as provided by the said Bill, to disfranchise large numbers of the people of Canada who have taken the oath of allegiance, have been guaranteed the rights of citizenship in the name of His Majesty the King, and have not failed to discharge all the obligations of citizenship;

And further, that it be resolved, that any measure granting the franchise only to a limited number of women as provided by the Bill is not in the public interest, and fails to recognize the splendid patriotic work that has been performed by the women of Canada generally during the present war.

Hon. L. G. POWER: The honourable leader of the House gave a somewhat interesting account of the reasons which had led to the introduction of this measure. Now honourable gentlemen, I purpose to give the causes which in my opinion, have led to the introduction of this measure. In order to form a correct opinion on that subject, I think we should go back to the election of the year 1911, and consider how that election was won. For one thing, it was held that the Conservative party were on the side of loyalty while the Liberal party were the disloyal party. At the same time that cry was raised in certain part of the country, particularly in the province of Ontario, there was, in the province of Quebec, supporting the Conservative party, a body of men known as Nationalists, whose leaders professed to be disloyal, and one of whom, who afterwards became a minister, proposed to shoot holes in the British flag. These two parties, who differed very much in alleged principles, had one bond of union: they were bound to down the Liberal Government and some of them, particularly those who came from the province of Quebec, were determined to oust Sir Wilfrid Laurier from office.

From the year 1866 this country had been most anxious for a renewal of the reciprocity treaty of 1854, or for some measure approximating to that treaty. Up to the year 1911 Liberals and Conservatives unanimously and strenuously advocated reciprocity with the United States. In that year the late Minister of Finance, Mr. Fielding, and his colleagues succeeded in coming to an agreement with the United States, which was practically a renewal of the old reciprocity treaty. I remember when the agreement was laid on the table of the two Houses, that, there was a feeling of surprise that Mr. Fielding had succeeded in making so advantageous an agreement. When the agreement was laid on the table of this House, a senator from New Brunswick, who is not now in his place, said to me: "That measure will add $50 to the value of every acre of cultivated land in New Brunswick." As I have said, there was surprise that so advantageous an agreement should have been arrived at. At first the Opposition of that day were apparently dumbfounded. There was a meeting held, I understand at Toronto, which was attended by a gentleman whose name has figured somewhat in the newspapers of late. I refer to the knight who has been writing letters to the papers, contradicting statements made by independent gentlemen respecting what he has said. That gentleman, it is understood, was the great mover in preventing the people of Canada from accepting the reciprocity agreement. Honourable gentlemen who are old enough will remember that during that campaign the British flag was waved—that is, in the regions where it was safe to wave it—and an appeal was made to the loyalty of the people, not to deal with the Americans, or, as the expression was, "to have no truck or trade with the Yankees." These appeals were successful in a way—to a certain extent at any rate. Men who did not recall the prosperity which had accompanied the old reciprocity treaty did not realize how important the new agreement was; the appeal to their loyalty carried them away; and large numbers of people voted against the Government of the day on the question of loyalty as against reciprocity. That is one of the causes which led to the defeat of the late Government. While in the province of Quebec it was thought that the Government of the day was too pro-English—not sufficiently French—in the province of Ontario there was a good deal of work done by trotting out what was called the Ne Temere decree. The Ne Temere decree had nothing to do with politics, and was laid aside immediately after it had done its work in helping to win the election for the Conservative party. Another of the grounds on which the Conservatives asked the support of the electorate was the extravagance of the Laurier Administration. As a result, the Conservatives won, and I remember thinking that a victory gained by such means would probably not prove very lasting.

I have tried to put in a rather rough way the expressed policy of the Conservative party before the election. Now, what were the results? One of the first things that happened after the election was that these gentlemen, who were so keenly British and loyal, cut down the British preference to almost nothing. In addition to that, they increased the duties on British goods. Then, whereas we were to have nothing to do with the great republic to the south of us, this Government has had far more to do with the United States than any previous Government in Canada. They have been mixed up with the United States in an unprecedented way, financially and otherwise. The gentlemen who complained of our extravagance, have increased expenditures to an enormous extent in every way. Take, for instance, the cost of civil administration in the various departments. Within two years after the election, the cost of running some of the departments had increased 50 per cent. I am not given to talking about corruption and that sort of thing, but undoubtedly there was a great deal of graft and a great deal of improper dealing in connection with financial matters. In addition to that, honourable gentlemen, the Government showed a great want of capacity in dealing with everything, more particularly dealing with the war. That, of course, is the thing which hurts them most now. As a result of the conduct of this Government, unpopularity developed, and if, at any time after the year 1915, the Government had gone back to the electorate which elected them in 1911, they would have been defeated. For a while I think the Government were not aware of the fact that their popularity had disappeared; but by the beginning of the present year they had become perfectly satisfied, I think, that if they went to the country on their record —the same country that had elected them in 1911—they had no chance of success; and, honourable genlemen, it is unnecessary to say that they were not prepared to accept, if they could avoid it, an election in which they were sure to be defeated. There was a good many years ago a member representing an Ontario constituency who used in the House of Commons an expression which has occurred to me a great many times, and with which several honourable gentlemen here are no doubt familiar. It was Mr. Joe Ryman as he was generally called. He said, speaking of the Liberal-Conservative party, that a she-bear, robbed of her cubs, was mild when compared with a Liberal-Conservative out of office. I do not say they have perjured themselves, but they have violated their promises; they made promises which they never intended to keep, or at any rate did not keep; and then, when they found that the time had come when they must go back for re-election, they had to resort to various devices to bring themselves back into power and to stifle the voice of the people who elected them in 1911.

The first step was the Conscription Act. That Act was not necessary as I think we made clear a couple of months ago. The leader of the Government had declared, in the year 1916, that there was no intention of introducing any such measure. At the time that measure was introduced, the number of recruits, quite appreciably exceeded the number of casualties, and there were 100,000 odd Canadians in reserve in England, so that there was no necessity for conscription; but it was supposed that the Conscription Act afforded an opportunity of damaging the Opposition of the day and of strengthening the Government.

The Military Voters' Bill, which followed conscription, is in some respects fair enough, but in other respects it is very unfair and very objectionable. Honourable gentlemen will see that that Bill allows a man to vote who has never been in Canada, who knows nothing about Canada, who cannot indicate a constituency in Canada in which he resides, or in which he wishes to vote. It enables the Government practically to handle all those votes, and to utilize them—for the purpose of retaining themselves in power. As I said the other day, I understood that there were at least 5,000 citizens of the United States in the Canadian military forces, and those men will all have votes which will be put just where they will do the Government the most good. Then there was the Canadian Northern Railway Bill. The conduct of the Government in forcing that measure through is inexplicable on any other supposition than that they expect to get a "quid" for the "quo" that they are giving the Canadian Northern Railway company. I think it is not to be supposed that business men like the present Government would press a measure of that kind through if they did not expect to be reimbursed in some way.

They have capped the climax with this Bill. I do not propose to go over the ground so well gone over by the honourable the leader of the Opposition. I shall not say very much about the measure; but I call attention to this fact, that the war is supposed to be a war to put down militarism, and to secure freedom, individually and collectively—freedom of speech and freedom of action. Is that the character of this Bill? On the contrary, this Bill is Prussian in its character. It disfranchises unjustly and enfranchises unreasonably.

I shall call attention to two or three features of this Bill which bear out what I have just said as to unreasonable enfranchisement. I do not propose to repeat what has been so well said by the honourable gentleman who preceded me (Hon. Mr. Bostock), but I call the attention of the leader of the Government to a couple of points wherein I think the Bill is at any rate susceptible of improvement. On the first page of the Bill, by clause 33A, every female person is given a vote who is the wife, widow, mother, sister or daughter of any person, male or female, living or dead, who is serving or has served without Canada in any of the military forces, or within or without Canada in any of the naval forces of Canada or of Great Britain in the present war. I think a good many honourable gentlemen are under the impression that this authorizes only one female relative to vote; if they will examine the Bill carefully, they will find that it means more than that. By passing the Military Voters' Bill, we did the best we could to give to the soldier who was actually in the field an opportunity to cast his vote. There has been no objection to that. There might be something to be said in favour of giving a vote to the nearest female relative of that soldier; but this clause that I am speaking of now gives the franchise not only to the nearest female relation, which I think is the proper expression, but to the wife, widow, sister, mother or daughter of any person, male or female, who is serving or who had served, without Canada in any of the military forces, or within or without Canada in any of the naval forces.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: What about the grandmother ?

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: It should have been their sisters, their cousins, and their aunts.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I am glad that the honourable gentleman has called up his Pinafore recollections. That is just what occurred to me. A man's wife may vote, his mother may vote, his sister may vote, his daughter may vote.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: And his widow.

Hon. Mr. POWER: A friend to whom I was talking the other day said, "Under this Bill we shall have seven votes." He is a good Liberal, too. He had a son at the front, and as a result he and his wife and several daughters have the right to vote.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Would the honourable gentleman ask if a divorced wife can vote? There are so many divorces in the Senate I would like to know.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I think the honourable the leader of the Government must see that that is a most objectionable thing. You add half-a-dozen voters in the case of a man who has gone to the front, and you take away the vote from a deserving class of the population who do not happen to have gone to the front. I cannot understand why, for instance, the Mennonites and the Doukho-bors and other people like those should be disfranchised, or why the conscientious objectors should be disfranchised.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: What about Mormons?

Hon. Mr. POWER: They are not disfranchised. As I say, I cannot understand why those classes should be disfranchised. The conscientious objector has always been excused from serving in the militia or from going to war, and this election does not deal simply with the war. The Government have to appeal to the country on their record, and the war feature of their record is only one of the features; and to disfranchise a number of citizens who have conducted themselves properly and who have for years been exercising the right to vote, because they have a conscientious objection to taking an active part in war is something that I cannot understand. These same people, as I understand, have subscribed towards the Patriotic Fund and the Red Cross Fund and have done a great deal of valuable work in that way.

The honourable gentleman who preceded me quoted something from a speech of the right honourable leader of the Government telling how much he appreciated the foreign voters, persons of enemy nationality, and how satisfied he was with their conduct and all that. Well, that was very pleasant, I have no doubt; but that language of the right honourable leader of the Government, when taken in connection with this Bill, reminds me very much of a quotation that a former colleague of mine was rather fond of:

> 'Tis all very well to dissemble your love,
> But why do you kick me down stairs?

I do not propose to speak any longer, and I am not likely to take a very active part in the committee stage; but I think that in the first clause that the word "complete" before the word "demobilization" should be stricken out. We struck it out of the Military Voters' Bill. The clause should read:

> During the present war and until demobilization after the conclusion of peace.

That is quite enough. Leaving in the word "complete" might lead to difficulties, trouble, and misapprehension. It occurs again in the second clause. "Demobilization after the conclusion of peace" is sufficient without the word "complete".

I desire also to call the attention of the honourable leader of the Government to the character of the penalty provided in subsection 3 of section 2:

> Any person, who being disqualified from voting—

By any of these paragraphs, that is, any Mennonite or foreign-born voter who is not supposed to be qualified under this Bill when it becomes law, is:

> —guilty of an offence and liable upon indictment or summary conviction to a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars and costs, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years; or to both such fine and such imprisonment.

Fancy a poor, ignorant man in a remote district, a foreigner who has been in the habit of voting and is not familiar with the contents of this Bill. He goes up to vote, and if he happens to get in his vote he is liable to two years imprisonment and a fine of $500. I think that is a most objectionable and outrageous provision.

I do not think, honourable gentlemen, that I shall trouble the House any more just now.

Hon. H. J. CLORAN: May I ask the honourable leader of the Government if any of the supporters of the Government are going to give their views on this measure? I would like a little inspiration.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Inspiration, did my honourable friend say?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I am not quite finished. What I would like to know is this: whether or not the supporters of the Government have been counselled not to give or have been debarred from giving their views on this question?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, they have not been debarred.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Have they been counselled not to do so?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They all so heartily agree with the Bill that they may not wish longer to defer it.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Does the honourable leader of the Government agree with it? He spoke for half-an-hour, but his heart was not in the exposition of the subject, as I listened to it last Saturday. I have just been reading it now. The honourable leader of the Government in disposing of government measures generally does so with earnestness, with force, and with fire. Take, for instance, the Conscription Bill. Never was a Government Bill put before this honourable House with more vim, fire, force and earnestness than were shown by the honourable leader of the Government in introducing the Conscription Bill. In his exposition and explanation of the provisions of this Bill there were none of these elements whatever. He seemed to be at a loss, notwithstanding his ability, his capacity and his brightness, to say what ought to be said to convince an intelligent body of men of the necessity and propriety of this Bill. I do not blame him. I believe the honourable leader of the Government is too honest a man to have his heart in a measure of this kind, although he may put it before this House owing to his obligation as a minister.

This measure, to my mind, is both impolitic and unrighteous, and, if I may be allowed to use the word, it is a fantastic measure in every respect.

The measure is impolitic. Why? Because the provisions of this Bill make for the undoing of a united people in Canada. This Bill is impolitic, for it makes against the growth and development of Canada in the future. It is impolitic because it introduces into our legislation distinct elements of injustice, distinct elements of unfairness, distinct elements of betrayal by the Government of the day, against the citizens of this country. It is impolitic all along the line. It is impolitic because it makes for the disruption of the people of Canada, by disfranchising good citizens of ten, fifteen, twenty or thirty years standing, who have worked here day in and day out, year after year, developing our farms, cutting down our forests, delving in our mines, running our banking and other financial institutions, insurance companies and others, men who have attained high positions in all the professional walks of life—in medicine, in chemistry, and in law. At all such men—and there are thousands, probably hundreds of thousands, in this country—the finger of scorn is to be pointed by their fellow-citizens. They are to be told that the Government of Sir Robert Borden has suspicions of their fidelity to the Crown and their devotion to their country. They must be regarded as parasites, as men unworthy of public confidence, although they have enjoyed public confidence for the past twenty years in public positions, in provincial legislatures, in municipal councils, even on the floor of this Parliament. After all that service, this Government dares come before the country and tell such persons that they are no longer to be trusted, that they are to be treated as slaves were treated under the Roman Empire. What does the Government mean?

This measure will have the effect of stopping the growth of Canada. Sir George Foster, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, an able, far-seeing man, has often stated during the past three years, while he was roaming over the face of the earth in connection with trade matters, that after the war, in a year or two, Canada would have a population numbering from 15,000,000 to 20,000,000 or 25,000,000. He did not have this Bill. This Bill will be a great advertising poster in European countries. Sir George Foster did not have the provisions of this Bill placarded on his private car, or in his office, telling the people of Europe: "You can come to Canada, but your rights, power, privileges and liberties as citizens of Canada will not be guaranteed." That is what this Bill says. How many European men, who are fighting to-day to do away with the terrible curse of militarism and autocracy, will come to Canada, with this Bill in force, stating that their rights as free men, as independent citizens, cannot be guaranteed for 24 hours; that their naturalization papers in Canada are no more than was the treaty between Belgium and Germany—" a scrap of paper." Why, Germany was guilty of no other crime when this war started. Germany was guilty of only one crime, and that was the crime of having disregarded the treaty between the powers and Belgium, and of Bethmann-Hollweg saying to Sir Edward Grey: " That treaty is only a scrap of paper." That was the initial crime, the crime which has brought about all this disaster, this flood of blood and treasure.

What is this Bill going to do? Every certificate of naturalization is to be thrown into the waste-basket as a scrap of paper, because the Government of the day is afraid to trust those to whom naturalization was granted. I ask that Sir George Foster, the next time he goes on one of those roaming trips in favour of immigration, trade and commerce, will fully explain the provisions of this Bill, to be fair and frank. We want no false pretense or deceit to inveigle Europeans into this country. Defeat and false pretense are no foundation for statesmanship—none whatever; and this Government has given us examples, under very grave circumstances, of deceit and false pretenses. If there is a crisis to-day in one portion of this Dominion, it is not due, as Colonel John Currie said, to lack of patriotism or loyalty on the part of the right honourable the leader of His Majesty's loyal Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). That was a contemptible remark to make and I fling it back in his face, and say: "No; if there is a crisis to-day in certain quarters of the province of Quebec, if there are outlaws, or violations of the law, they are due to the deceit and false pretenses of Borden's Conservative and Nationalist Government. The ministers and emissaries of the Government, seven months ago, went into the province of Quebec and told the public men of that province, and told the hierarchy of that province, that if the people of Quebec would sanction and abide by the National Service Act there would be no conscription. That is a statement of a fact. They deceived the hierarchy. Not that I claim for the hierarchy of the province of Quebec any more rights than I would claim for the moderator of the Methodist Conference or the Chairman of the Presbyterian Synod or any other synod. I do not claim for the hierarchy of Quebec any more right or privilege or power than I would claim for the Grand Master of the Orange Order. I do not claim that the hierarchy of Quebec have any more right to take part in public affairs than the heads of any other church in the Dominion of Canada. But what I do claim, what we will have—and what we have we hold—is that the hierarchy of Quebec have equal rights and equal privileges with the heads of all other church unions. Sir Robert Borden, through his ministers and emissaries, went into the province of Quebec and cultivated a feeling among the French Canadians of that province; but they found that when they were deceived and betrayed and lied to. The other day on the train, a prominent archbishop was approached by one of the Government officials on the floor of the House, who offered his hand, when the archbishop said: "No; I shake hands with no man who lies on public matters as you have lied to me."

There is the condition of things, brought about by the deceit, the treachery and the false pretense of the Borden Government, of which you are all mute defenders. Oh, honourable gentlemen, it is not pleasant for a man to address a deaf and dumb institute such as you constitute here to-day. You are both deaf and dumb. You have no opinions to offer on these important questions. You had none on the Military Voters' Bill. You had very little, if any, on the great public steal of the Canadian Northern Railway Bill. You had a little—well, some of you had some good opinions on the Conscription Bill. On all these Bills which have been staged on the parliamentary platform of this country you have been silent actors. What is it they are called on the stage? They have a name for a man who is a silent actor. You are all silent actors. Nobody knows what they think, what they feel. Now, is that not hard for a country to look at—a deaf and dumb party on the floor of this Parliament?

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: You are not one of them.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: There is the position. This measure is politics in every sense of the word. But is it righteous? Well, I do not think you will find it very right that the first ladies of the land, the wives of the knights of the Empire, will have no right to vote. The wife of the right honourable the Prime Minister of Canada will have to remain at home, while her maids, her servants, go and vote. The wife of the right honourable Sir Wilfrid Laurier, leader of His Majesty's loyal opposition, will have no right to vote. The wife of the right honourable Sir George Foster, Minister of Trade and Commerce, will have no right to vote. The wife of the great Lord Bacon —no, Lord Flavelle, the baron—will have no right to vote. The wife of Lord Atholstan, the proprietor of the Montreal Star, will have no right to vote. And so on, and so on. Is that right? Why does not the deaf and dumb institute answer? Is that right? I could go on and enumerate many ladies of high degree, of distinction, and many notable women apart from being titled—noble young women and noble matrons, the cream of society, not only in Ottawa, but in every fairly large centre in the Dominion of Canada, who are working day and night for the welfare of our boys at the front, knitting socks, making shirts, cutting out this and that for the welfare of the boys, sending them literature, magazines, and so on, sending them a little chocolate once in a while, and a few cigarettes—these women and their daughters, spending their time, energies, talents, devotion, for the work of the army, and to help in the prosecution of the war—the deaf and dumb institute will not give them a vote under this Bill. Is that right? And this Conservative party will not give the right to vote to the hard-working wife of the farmer along the concession lines, working from four and five in the morning until late in the evening. She has no right to vote; and not only the wife, but the daughters and the sisters have no right to vote. The wives and daughters and sisters of munition workers have no right to vote under this Bill. So I denounce this Bill before the country as a most unrighteous and unfair Act. The Citizen of Ottawa this morning tried to justify this Bill on the ground that the Government could not grant equal suffrage to all women at once. Then, why not give it to women who have earned the suffrage by their meritorious work, their intelligent and devoted work in the cause, instead of to girls and widows and women who never worked except to go and draw allowances and contributions from Patriotic and Red Cross funds? The Citizen argued that this was a war measure; but a war measure should have applied to those people who will be in a position to vote intelligently because they know the economic conditions of Canada, who keep posted in the political affairs of this country, who are in touch with its public men and know what is going on. If any one is able to vote, it is these intelligent, educated women, brought up in the turmoil of public life, we may say; yet they are refused a vote, while poor little things, sisters of soldiers, or widows, who have never gone outside of their own little homes, and probably never read a newspaper except "Confessions of a Wife" or some such small things, who know absolutely nothing of the economic conditions of this country, who do not know the difference between Liberal and Tory, if they know that there are two such parties—those are the females who are entitled to vote. I do not like that word "female", my wife objected to it yesterday when I was reading the Bill, saying she did not like to be called a female. However, that is what the Bill calls them; lady or no lady, it calls them females. The vote is to be given to the classes I have mentioned. I say it is not fair. The Bill is a fantastic one in every sense of the word.

Now, I have alluded to nearly all the speakers before me; I have referred to the disfranchisement of thousands and tens of thousands of good citizens of Canada—call them alien if you like; but once they have worked in the interest of the country they are no more aliens. What will happen? Those people during the last sixteen years have voted in four general elections. They voted in the federal general election in 1900 and in all by-elections in that period; they voted in the general election of 1904 and all the by-elections, following. They voted in the general election of 1908 and in all by-elections in that period; and they voted in the general election of 1911, with the result that by their votes the Conservative party was returned to power. Now, what a nice way to pay a debt of gratitude to those people! The Conservative party is now turning around and telling those very same people that they are not to be trusted in this general election. Is that not a nice way to treat them? It is certainly impolitic, and the Government will hear of it, for every one of those people must have friends amongst straight-born, British subjects, and there is no doubt that the balance of their influence will this time be cast, not in favour of the Conservative party, but against them.

And where is the danger in allowing, say, a straight alien to cast the vote? Please tell me. Casting a vote simply means that he votes for the Government or for the Opposition, or, if there happens to be in his constituency an independent candidate, a Laborite or whatever you want to call him. What is the danger of that man casting his vote on one side or the other? In the name of common sense will you tell me where any danger lurks in the casting of the votes of those men who have been voting for the past twenty years? Oh, it is not the danger. I can see the brain with which this Bill was concocted; I have seen it before, seven years ago, in shady transactions. This Bill is concocted to stifle the free voice of the people of Canada, to capture the polls if they can, and which they are in a good way of doing, as pointed out by the leader of the Opposition; they are pretty close on to victory with their enumerators fabricating lists at their own sweet will, where they want it, when they want it, how they want it; and all that the candidates are entitled to is that when those lists are supposed to be completed they shall be posted fifteen days before polling day. There are a good many of you gentlemen on the other side who have gone through elections, and from your own experience as electioneers you know that the first thing you secured was the electoral list, the voters' list, so as to check it. As soon as the House dissolved, and the election was proclaimed, the first thing that the candidate or his agent did was to apply for any number of voters' lists six or seven or eight weeks before the elections; but in this coming election these lists are not posted; but a copy is to be sent to each candidate, and a copy to the returning officer. Now, is that fair to the candidates? It is not fair either to the candidates or to the people. I ask in all fairness if candidates and the people should be treated in that way, being deprived of the voters' lists by which they are able to control the vote in their constituencies? And remember, every constituency is not made up of a little town district or ward which can be covered in a few days, or sometimes even in a few hours; but we have constituencies in this Dominion of Canada which run anywhere from one hundred to five hundred miles in length and over. How are the people of that constituency to become acquainted with the list of that district, when a copy of it is only sent to the candidates fifteen days before polling? What does the Government mean? As was well said by the leader of the Opposition on the floor of this House, this is Prussian legislation; not the slightest doubt of it. What will be the view and the judgment of the people in this matter, of course remains to be seen, for the vast bulk of the people have no knowledge of the provisions of this Bill, and will have none for some time.

What will be the view and the judgment of the public press of this country in regard to this Bill? Well, the view will vary according to the political colour of the writers. But what will the press of Great Britain, France and the other Allied nations fighting for democracy, fighting for the independence of free parliaments, say when the vicious—oh, I should use a stronger word—the vicious provisions of this Bill are placarded in the camps and hospitals and trenches of our forces? The boys will have to know what is going on, and I for one will take good care that they do know. Those provisions will be published in the British, French and other newspapers of the Allied powers, and what will their judgment be? It will be one They will simply say: "What? we are fighting for the freedom of parliaments; we are fighting for the overthrow of autocracy; and here in Canada, while the blood of her sons is flowing on the fields of France and Flanders, is a defunct Government, a dead Government, a discredited Government, passing a most nefarious measure against the free privileges and powers of a free and independent people." And what will the Kaiser and his press say? The Kaiser will say: "Why, I would not dare, even with my Imperial Chancellor and council, to introduce a measure of that kind in the Reichstag. Why, they charge me with autocracy; they charge me with suppressing freedom of speech; they charge me with interfering with intelligent people and the voters of my country; but I never got so low as that Bill puts the Canadian Government." I move the adjournment of the debate.

The debate was adjourned until the next sitting.

The Senate adjourned at one o'clock.

Second Sitting.

The Senate met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

WAR-TIME ELECTIONS BILL.

SECOND READING—CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE AND REPORTED.

The Senate resumed the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed for the second reading of Bill 133, the War-time Elections Act and Hon. Mr. Bostock's amendment thereto.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Honourable gentleman, when the Senate adjourned this morning, the debate on this Bill had arrived at the point where it involved the freedom and the guarantee thereof to the subject of an independent country under constitutional government. I think that is the link between what I was saying at the last moment before adjournment and what I am about to say now.

I have been devoting my time since this Bill was placed in my hands last Saturday, not to an attempt to digest it. If I had attempted that, there is not the slightest doubt that by this evening or this morning I would have been on a stretcher, dead from acute indigestion.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It may be hard to swallow.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The Bill is so meatless of justice, fair play and honesty that I would not attempt and did not attempt, after reading the first page, to digest it. I said to myself: "I had better analyse and dissect it." That is a safer method of dealing with the subject. I did analyse it, and I have had some experience of analysis, not of dead bodies or things of that kind, but of laws, of their wording and framing, and of their intents and purposes. I defy any man to question that. I have been forty years in the business, and have been called upon to analyse and dissect laws passed by parliaments, provincial legislatures and municipal councils, when they were just as clear as mud, much to the disgust of the judges on the Bench. So, when I undertook the analysis and dissection of this Bill, I was prepared for a fair feast along that line. Well, really, gentlemen, I am not going to give you this afternoon results of my analysis. I understand that some honourable gentlemen want to get away, or want to get to a committee meeting. I assure you that the result of this analysis of mine led me to the three conclusions that I offered to this House—not to this House, because the offer would not be heard and would not be considered. As honourable gentlemen on the other side of the House belong to a deaf and dumb institute, I offered it to this side of the House, and through them to the country. I said that this Bill was a fantastic one, that it was a very impolitic one, and that it was a very unrighteous one. Now, to make these three charges against the Bill is a serious matter. They can be borne out only by a complete exposition and consideration of the various provisions in the Bill. I do not want to frighten you unnecessarily. To do that would take not only this afternoon, but two or three other afternoons of this week, and of course the Government would not like that. I do not intend to enter into a complete disquisition on the subject at the present moment, but reserve my right to do so when the different provisions are brought to the attention of this honourable House.

The first thing that struck we when I took this Bill up was the heading, "A War-time Franchise Act." I said, "A War-time Franchise Act?—for what purpose and for what reason?" I asked myself, as a voter in Canada for the past forty years, if the old Franchise Act passed by this Parliament years ago was not good enough to-day, even during war-time. I wondered and I queried why it was that the good old Franchise Act of the Dominion was cast aside, ignored, disowned by its own parents. We have been told in the public press and by public men that once a law is passed no one has a right to criticise, oppose or denounce it; and yet here is the Government itself, for no earthly, visible reason, coming in and slaughtering its own child in the Franchise Act of past years. If the Franchise Act, which has governed all general elections for the past twenty-five or thirty years, had become a monster and had been unfair to the people of Canada, then I would say that the Government had a right to chloroform it and put it out of business; but who has proven that the old Franchise Act of Canada is a monster and opposed to the interests of the people of Canada? Who has said that it has given votes where they should not be given or that it has taken votes from where they should not be taken? Not a soul that I know of. Of course, I do not expect anything from the deaf and dumb institution on the other side; but in the House of Commons they attempted to prove that such was the case. The first question that struck me, and I have not solved it yet, was, why should this measure be called the War-time Franchise Act? I have solved it. Instead of being a War-time Franchise Act, according to truth, according to a fair construction of the provisions of the law, it should be entitled "The War-time Robbery of the Rights of the People." That would be a more appropriate title, and therein I have to differ with my honourable friend the leader of the Government, who, in his very remarkable speech in introducing this Bill, said that the term, "The War-time Franchise Act," was a most appropriate one. Now, the leader of the Government does not often make mistakes in declarations of public policy. I do not believe that he has ever been guilty of that. I do not believe the honourable leader of the Government has ever attempted to lead the country astray in regard to public and national legislation. Being a little exasperated at times, he may have said things in regard to certain measures which I think he regrets to-day; but I cannot forego my duty of calling his attention and the attention of the country to the following declaration of policy in regard to this measure. He may have forgotten the words. His words are to be found in Hansard, on the 3rd or 4th page of Saturday's debates. It is worth quoting, because if the opinions and sentiments expressed in this half-column are real opinions, then I am completely at sea, completely at a loss to know where we stand. I will summarize what the honourable leader of the Government said. I know it nearly by heart, though not word for word. The honourable leader of the Government told us, in a very deliberate way, that one of the reasons for the introduction of this Bill was that it followed ancient precedent, that is, in rewarding military service. He stated that under the ancient law, in the dark ages, soldiers were nothing but mercenaries going from one army to another, irrespective of their fatherland or the cause they were fighting for. That was the condition of armies, especially those of southern and central Europe—not so much the armies of northern Europe. The armies of those days were composed of mercenaries who went from the Florentine army to the French army for pay of two or three pence more in the day. What was the result? The result was that the generals of those armies had to promise their soldiers that if they won the battle, they would be entitled to loot, that the old Roman maxim would be brought into play, "to the victors belong the spoils;" and that if they conquered the territory of the enemy the general would divide it up among them. The honourable leader of the Government asks this Parliament to sanction this Bill on that ground—that military service must be recognized as it was recognized in old barbarian days.

Why, honourable gentlemen, it is awful to think of it—to have such a doctrine laid down in a free, democratic Parliament, just as if this country were not sweating its brows off in working to produce food crops and munitions for the boys at the front. The men at home working are no slackers. The men at home working on the farms, in the mines, in the forests and in the munition shops are doing as much work as the boys at the front, and without their aid and support our boys would be starving; instead of being killed they would be starving; and why should the men who are left behind doing this war-work be ostracised, be left out in the cold, so as to give loot or territory to the soldiers who have been in camp or on the firing line? No, honourable gentlemen; this Government has undertaken a wrong policy, and is endeavouring to put it through by wrong methods. The Government is appealing to that glorious sentiment which should be pure and sincere in the heart of every man who loves his native land—appealing to that holy sentiment of patriotism, hiding itself in the folds of the flag, to perpetrate outrages against the nation, against the Allies, and against the boys at the front. That is an awful state of things to have to contemplate. It is a state of things that we on the Liberal side in this House cannot remedy; all we can do is put in an objection, and we are met by a deaf and dumb majority, who are trying to stifle and kill the aspirations of the Liberal party of Canada, and are in the same breath denouncing them as unworthy, of the confidence of the masses of the Canadian people, as being unwilling to defend the King and his flag, unwilling to defend the rights of Canada. That is told us every day from the other side of this House, in the other House, and in the Conservative press of the country. Have we not stood these opprobrious epithets and charges against our Liberal friends, fathers, sons and brothers, fighting overseas for this country and for the Empire? Have we not stood them long enough? By this Bill it is intended to capture a vote to which you are not entitled. By this Bill you intend to deprive good, honest citizens of votes which might come, probably would come, and certainly should come, to the cause of Liberalism, which stands for right and fair play under all circumstances, for all races and for all creeds in this Canada of ours. That is what this Bill is driving at.

Honourable gentlemen, it is a sad day for Canada to have these matters discussed in open Parliament, one charging the other with disloyalty, one charging the other with being a traitor, a rebel, and a slacker. It is a pitiful thing, and it goes to prove that there is no real national sentiment in Canada. If that Bill were presented on the floor of the Chamber of Deputies in Paris, against the electors of France, the man who would dare to present it, or the men who would dare to support it, would be riddled with bullets. Present a Bill of that kind on the floor of the mother of parliaments, the British House of Commons, and see what a reception it would get. Ask yourselves, you British subjects, you so-called British loyalists, who are waving the flag all the time, ask yourselves what would become of a Bill of that kind introduced by Mr. Lloyd George or any other stateman. He would be driven out of power before the moon would rise or the sun would rise. And this Government, defunct, decrepit, depleted, depreciated, discredited, comes to this Parliament and asks us to pass legislation which would create a revolution in England and would drive men in France to the wall, and all because there is public feeling and national sentiment in England and France and the other Allied nations against measures of autocracy, against measures of trickery against measures to purloin the public vote. They would not stand for it 24 hours. But poor Canada! through a majority that has nothing to say the Government is going to pass this Bill. Poor Canada! with the majority in the House of Commons muzzling the Opposition, forcing the Bill through Parliament in spite of the will of the people. And we here, who are supposed to be free men, independent, bright, intelligent—we swallow this, as against the policy of the war—democracy, independence, free parliaments and free speech.

What are the functions of a government? What are the functions of an opposition? The functions of a free government are based on three principles: right, privilege, and power. A government of a free people, when it takes hold of the reins of office for a definite and stated period, at once becomes the owner of the national treasury and the dispenser of the public funds. That is the first function of government. The second function of a government is to originate or initiate legislation public, national legislation for the benefit of the people they govern. That is their privilege. Then, the third function is to administer the affairs of state. The government becomes the master of the administration of public affairs. These are the three functions of the government of a free, independent people, constitutionally governed.

On the other hand, there is in parliament, besides the government and its supporters, what is usually called under British practice and British rule, a loyal opposition. The sun never sets on British territory, and the King has no parliament on the face of the globe in which the word "disloyal" is applied to the opposition. He calls it his loyal opposition. That is what the King does; that is what the statesmen around him do; but our petty, picayune politicians in Canada get up and charge the loyal Opposition with disloyalty, and even go so far, as I said this morning, that a member dares to charge the venerable leader of the Opposition in the other House, the grandest old man from a political point of view that Canada has ever produced, Sir Wilfrid Laurier —dares, at two o'clock in the morning, to rise in his seat and say: "You are responsible for the outrages committed recently in Montreal." What are we to think of that kind of a government? What are the people going to think of it? Will this Bill prove a boomerang?

Now, I have pointed out to this House the functions of a government. The functions of an opposition are, like those of the government, based on three principles: duty, right, and privilege. They are master of nothing. The opposition has to keep a constant watch on the national treasury. The opposition must see to it that all laws shall be wise. Therefore they are made, under the constitution, the critics and opponents of all undue and unwise legislation. The third function, based on the principle of right and privilege, is to be the advocate of upright, fair and impartial administration of the public affairs. Three functions: watchdogs of the treasury, critics of legislation, and advocates of fair and impartial administration. Who in a free country can object to that? We on the Opposition side do not oppose the Government because it has in its possession the national treasury. That is the right of the Government. And in a free, constitutional country, we admit that it has the privilege of initiating or originating what I call national or public legislation along constitutional lines. We do not dispute that. Then, we do not dispute the fact as long as they are in power, they are the masters of the general administration of the public affairs of the country. We accord to the Government all their privileges, rights, and powers.

What does the present Government do in regard to the sacred duties of the Opposition, or their powers and privileges? What has the Government done during the past two months? Is it necessary for me to recite, to depict, to relate the lamentable things which this free, independent country was witnessed on the floor of the House of Commons, and, unfortunately, much to our discredit and our shame, is witnessing today on the floor of this Senate? What has the Government done in regard to Bills considered to be unwise or undue? They have deliberately muzzled the representatives of the people in the House of Commons as if they were vulgar curs. They put the muzzle on every Opposition member of Parliament from the leader of the Opposition down to the humblest member, and in particular they have muzzled them on this Bill.

What will the Kaiser say? Oh, our own friends will be ashamed of the manner in which the thing will be done; but the Kaiser will gloat over the fact that Canada: which is supposed to be one of the freest and most independent nations on earth under the British flag, is doing worse than was ever done on German territory or in Central Africa. What did the Government do in the House of Commons in regard to this Bill and others? The critics of the Government were perfectly justified in criticising the measure, just as the honourable leader of the Opposition here did today, and the senior member for Halifax, and as I am trying to do, in order to remedy the defects of the measure and to put a little virtue in it where there is sin, to give fairness where there is unfairness, and to give equal rights to all instead of taking from some and giving to others; but what happened? The criticism was set at defiance and the mouths of the critics were stopped with the closure. And when the House of Commons wanted to demand a fair administration, even of this malodorous Bill, this mischievous Bill, when they were advocating the rights of fair play in administration, they were put out of court by the present Government. Gentlemen, is that a fair condition of things? Is that the position in which this Government want to place the country in view of a general election? If it is, I have only to quote the words of the old Latin philosopher-poet: "Those whom the gods wish to destroy they first make mad." And the Government, in proposing this legislation and other Bills they have passed, are fulfilling the terms of the ancient Roman philosopher: they are mad; then the gods want them destroyed, and the gods will be the people of Canada before the first of April next. The mills of the gods grind slowly, but they grind as surely; and, as a Canadian loving my country, wishing its honour maintained at home and abroad, I cannot see where the Government of this day can expect support from a free and independent electorate. I cannot see how the editorial writers of the press, highly educated men, or historial writers, magazine writers, professors of the universities, can take up this Bill and read it without condemning it. I do not know one who will take up this Bill and analyse it as I did, and say: "The Borden Government has done an act of justice; the Borden Government has given a proof of its loyalty; the Borden Government has given a spectacle of patriotism to the Empire." Give me the name of one writer, outside of the party press—I am not talking of the party press of Canada; take the great newspapers of England and of France and of Italy; get one of them to pronounce faithfully on this Bill and say whether it is just, fair, or right. You cannot do it, nor can you find members of this House to do so. How can you expect the outside public to say it is fair and proper when the supporters of the Government itself dare not say so? How can you go abroad and ask men of intelligence, as you are, to endorse a thing that you will not endorse except by your vote—and that is no endorsation. We want the views of your constituents, not your own personal views, we want you to express the views of the people you represent. Individuals count for nothing. I would like to hear from my friend for Cape Breton, and many another able man on the other side of the House, quite capable of putting before Parliament and the country the views of the people they represent. But not one of them will arise, or has arisen, on all these important Bills. Well, if you do not dare to endorse the Bill openly in Parliament, how can you expect the people in the country to do so? How can you expect foreign opinion to admire Canada in enacting Bills of this kind? You cannot expect it. Therefore I am with the leader of the Opposition in saying that this Bill, instead of advancing the cause of this Government, will tend to overthrow it.

Honourable gentlemen, I really feel ashamed to-day. I did not feel so a few months ago, when our boys were dying on the battlefields; I felt proud of them. But when this Bill passes—oh, I hate to say the word, but my duty and my conscience force me to say it—I will be ashamed of being a Canadian. The fact of destroying the foundations of our freedom and of our independence, abolishing free speech in Parliament, and preventing its supporters from giving the views of the people they represent, creates an awful state of affairs; and all this for a paltry, mean, low-lived object—to hold on to the reins of office.

I have spoken on this Bill from a general standpoint, avoiding partisan issues; but I ask you in all sincerity, if the Liberal party were in power, would it not be of advantage to this country under present conditions? You have a Government that admits its own incompetence; you have a Prime Minister who says that his Cabinet is not fit to run the affairs of the country. That has been his admission for the past two months. He has been reaching out by telegram, by letter, by travel, personally and by his ministers and his emissaries, seeking for men to replace the ministers he has in his Cabinet. Is that not a confession of weakness? Is that not a confession before the nation that the present Government is not fit to administer the affairs of the country? Why, the very fact of his running after this one and that one to get him to join his Government is a most damnable proof against himself and his colleagues. If I were a colleague of his, and he were running around like that looking for a man to replace me, I would throw the portfolio in his face; if I were not considered good enough I would not stay. But that is what he has been doing for the last two or three months.

And now, gentlemen, we are being asked to endorse this measure because that kind of a Government has put it before Parliament. We should not do it; but it will be done. I hope the House to-night will be largely attended when the vote is taken, and that many members who are opposing this measure for the sake of the honour of their country and its future development will protest against it in order to guarantee to the peoples of Europe that, if they come to our country to work our farms and our mines, and to become good law-abiding citizens, their new birthright in this country will not be taken from them, and they will not be driven on to the highways and byways of Canada almost as prisoners. They would be better off in a penitentiary than to be walking free over the highways and byways of this country dubbed and scorned as suspected traitors, rebels and otherwise enemies of the Empire. It is an awful state of things to create. I cannot remedy the situation at this hour, either by my word or my vote, but I hope that the people of Canada and the boys at the front will open their eyes and cast their ballots according to right and justice.

I would close with this. I have determined to send a war-message to boys of mine, to relatives and friends in the army. Those boys will be called upon to vote, many of them having been away for the past two or three years, and knowing little or nothing of the condition of things here in Canada, and I do not think I overstep the mark in cabling this war-message to the boys:

To soldiers of Canada at the front and overseas, all hail ! The defunct Conservative Government of Canada calls upon the soldiers of the Canadian army to cast their votes at the coming Federal election. This measure is in direct violation of the King's regulations and rules governing discipline and order in the British army and navy, and is also against the discipline and order of the Allied armies, with the exception of that of Russia, whose soldiers are given votes with the result that chaos reigns in the ranks of the army and in the country.

This is a warning to the boys at the front.

The game of war is none too healthy without enticing the soldiers into the unhealthy game of party and political warfare. When you cast your ballots, do not betray your fathers and brothers in Canada, who in fields and forests, in mines and workshops are working hard to produce food and make munitions for your upkeep at the front. By voting for the Government you approve of and even applaud all extravagance and unwise legislation, and all general maladministration so detrimental to the interests of the boys at the front, their dependents, and to working classes in Canada. A change is needed for a united Canada.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN.

Hon. WM. ROCHE: My excuse for troubling the House this afternoon is that I think that everybody who disapproves of this Bill ought to express his opinions on this subject with the utmost candour and with as great emphasis as he can apply. I am perhaps physically unfitted for speaking this afternoon. Probably I may have to follow the remarks of some of those gentlemen, my elders, who have preceded me; but I think the importance of the occasion justifies everybody who at this time expresses his disapprobation of the measure.

I believe we are agreed upon this one point, that important revolutionary legislation of this kind should not have been introduced at the last hour of the session. We had abundant leisure in the early part of it thoroughly to discuss the question, and to have matured views upon its propriety or impropriety. Now we have had the speech of the learned leader of the Government in bringing in the measure, and to some extent in discussing and developing it; but we have not had the benefit of the intelligence and eloquence of the gentlemen opposite in further illustration of the Bill. This confines us in our remarks to concentrating our observations upon the speech of the learned leader of the Government.

In looking through this Bill I could discover very little principle in it. I thought the leader of the Government saw very little principle in it, and I think with great appropriateness we can style it an unprincipled Bill. The leader of the Government, in his prologue,—an ingenious and skilful prologue, I quite admit—went back to the dark ages and to the methods by which military leaders, conquerors and others rewarded their soldiers by the device of the division of the spoils and by other methods. Did any sovereign or any conqueror in history reward his soldiers by purely civil rights, by the electoral franchise, or anything resembling the measure which is before us? We remember in history that Marlborough was rewarded by the British nation with Blenheim palace—erected by a Dutchman, by the way; and how the British Parliament and nation rewarded the great Irishman, the Duke of Wellington, with Strofelstaye; and we remember how he was rewarded out of cannon and other military spoil. The soldiers were rewarded also in proportion to their ranks. There was no thought of giving them the electoral franchise. What do the soldiers want? Do you think you have satisfied a soldier by telling him when he comes back from the war: "Your sister, or all your sisters, or your mother, were given votes at the elections." What do they want? They want something substantial. They want to rise, they want a grant of land, they want money or they want something that is substantial recognition for the sacrifices they have made, for the battles they have gone through, for the blood they have shed, and for the dislocation of their business, and, it may be, the frustration of all their prospects in life. My honourable friend hands out a vote for each sister, a vote for the mother, and the soldier has a vote for himself. Is that all you are going to give him? You are going to reward him with a civil franchise for the sacrifices he has made, and for which he will demand substantial recognition. I think, honourable gentlemen, that a great injustice has been done to the ordinary voters, the ordinary members of society and subjects of the nation. Look at the position. Although a military man may be a mere boy, he has a vote, and the right to vote may be given to six or seven in the family in consequence of his services. Then, the vote is given to naval men who have come into this country, who have served in the naval forces of Great Britain, here or abroad, it is true, but who are not Canadian citizens. These men will bring out their families. Some of them have families here already, and it may be that six or seven votes may be cast by the families of those people who have not been citizens of the country of twelve months' residence and thirty days' residence in the place where they vote. I ask all fair-minded men, and many Conservatives are fair-minded men, if it is fair and just to disparage the citizens of this country and put this stigma upon them? They have each only one vote in this community, while the man who came in twelve months ago has six or seven votes or more. Is that a tribute to the men who have assisted in building up this country, who have toiled in various professions and occupations? You stigmatize and disparage the farmer, the merchant, the professional man and the labouring man, and you elevate and reward the citizen of another country and give him a preponderance of voting power; and in this way the vote and influence of the man who is identified with the country is totally nullified and overborne. Is this fair and just to the citizens of this country whom we are supposed to represent? Is it just that we should take that civic privilege and give it to others, while our own sons, our own associates, our own neighbours, and our friends who are associated with us in upholding and upbuilding this country, are put down to the lowest level and stigmatized?

I shall not go over what has already been dealt with. I shall not try to expand what has been too justly said. I have regard for the feelings of those around me, and shall not at this late hour expand the subject at all; but in its simplicity as a naked proposition I put it before men with fair minds, intellectual men well calculated to judge, whether it is just under these circumstances to elevate the stranger and put down our own citizens.

This Bill contains the principle of spoliation. I know the Galicians as well as anyone in this House. I have seen them when they have come in the ships; I have seen them when they landed from the ships; I have been among them when they have been in the immigration sheds; I have seen them bring out their utensils and farm implements, and have seen them prepare for active citizenship in Canada. They were promised citizenships by the British Government. They were induced to come to Canada by the promises and stipulations made to them under authority, that they should have the rights and privileges of British subjects. These men belong to the old kingdom of Poland. Galicia is a portion of Poland which fell to Austria under the partition of Poland. Every Polander feels to this day that his country was dismembered, that he was conquered by the superior forces of Austria, and he is not friendly to the authority of that country. These people left their own country in order that they should not be conscripted into the army of Austria. They came to Canada in good faith under promises and stipulations that they might become citizens of Canada and that they would not be compelled to go and fight on behalf of the overpowering Government to which they were unfriendly. They rejoiced in the opportunity to escape from that rule.

A gentleman in this House—and I think I can trace his fine Italian hand in some writings in the press elsewhere—has attempted to say that my views and sentiments on this and other occasions were warped by the fact that I was an agent for the Hamburg-American line. The Hamburg-American line brought out the majority of these Galicians and Bukowinians and landed them at Halifax. I was the agent for that line for forty years. Two years before the war, the Hamburg-American line amalgamated with the Netherlands-American line, which took control of the immigration of the three combined lines. They managed the whole of the immigration into Canada, and, two years before the war, they dismissed me from the position of their agent. Under such circumstances as that, an agent or an employee has umbrage against his employers, and is not supposed to be very friendly to their interests or their sentiments. I could not have any subordination to them in any way. I could not be influenced by them in my opinions or actions. I did not sympathize with the German Government. I did not sympathize with those who were supposed to be my employers and who were supposed to have influenced my opinions. I say this: I am as loyal as any man in Canada; I am as loyal as any man opposite; I am as loyal as any man here, and I have rendered as important services to the British Government as any man in Canada. I do not want to brag about what I have done. I do not want to proclaim my loyalty from the housetops; but I and my father and my grandfather risked their lives for the British Government on many occasions. We have been loyal for three generations and I do not know for how many generations before that. I do not yield to any one in that regard. I do not want to say that I am superior, but I put myself on a parity with any man in Canada from Cape North to Vancouver Island. So, without placing myself on any other level than that of a citizen of Canada, I say that I am as loyal to the British Government as a British subject should be; but I hold my individual opinion and I am not afraid to express it. I do not coincide with all the silly and detrimental movements that have been made, and have not taken part in many of them. I know that some action has been taken and some deeds performed that are injurious to the interests of the British Crown. I have not approved of them; I have not taken part in them. I have held my own opinion. My country was at war, and I thought it was my duty to hold my tongue and keep quiet, even when I saw actions and measures taken that were injurious to the British Empire, to the reputation of the British Crown, and to the sentimental regard which the citizens of Canada ought to pay to the Motherland and the sovereign at the head of the nation.

I do not know how these men who have come into the country have voted. I do not know whether they voted Grit or Tory. I am told that they voted Grit in some places and Tory in others. I think it is very probable, judging from their sentiments and habits, that they voted for individuals, for men they knew, and in whom they had confidence. It may be true that they know very little about the history of Canada. I know this: they are averse to war.

My honourable friend uttered the sentiment that a man who did not wish to go and fight should have no vote. That is not rewarding peaceable citizens for their actions or services. Our men went over to fight against militarism. That was the motto inscribed upon their banner. But what is my honourable friend doing? He is depressing civil life, civil services, honourable citizenship, brotherhood, neighbourhood, peace, order and good government; he is building up a military caste in giving additional rewards to the soldiers, and placing the laurels on the brow of the militarists. I do not object to military men receiving a due reward for their services. Mark these words: I do not object to any rewards that a grateful country will give to them; but I say that the first duty of Parliament, under our civil institutions, is to honour and reward the peaceable citizen who performs his duty in the community, who regards his neighbour as himself, who is industrious and God-fearing, and who discharges his duty, both in voting and in acting, in his own interest and in the interests of his neighbours around him. I regret that these poor men who have voted, who have expressed by their actions and by their words their desire to be good citizens of Canada, should have this stigma, this insult, this opprobrium, put upon them; that, because they do not wish to go to war, because they do not wish to shed blood, they should have this mark of obloquy and contempt cast upon them, that they are not fit to vote, not fit to be citizens, not fit to take part with the other citizens of the British Empire.

Hon. L. O. DAVID: Honourable gentlemen, I have not spoken on many of the Bills which have been brought before us this session. I wish to say only a few words about this legislation. The Military Voters' Bill which has been passed this session gives the right to vote to thousands of people who are foreigners, who have no residence, no property, no interest in our country—only because they have fought for the Empire. The Bill before us disfranchises a great number of our people who are good citizens, who have always fulfilled their duties of citizenship, paid their taxes, and done everything to prove that they were good citizens, because they are suspected of not being loyal, although there may be amongst them a great many people who could not be accused of any such thing. This Bill gives the right to vote to the wives, widows, sisters and daughters of men who have never lived in the country. The Government should have added mothers-in-law, nieces, and cousins. The Bill is not complete: it should be amended in that respect.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: And grandmothers.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: And the grandmothers should be added, no doubt. These two Bills have the same object, simply to increase the number of voters who it is supposed will vote for the Government. They are contrary to all principles of justice and fair play, and are contrary to our constitution. The right to vote belongs to those who live in a country, who are citizens of that country, who pay taxes, who have property, who are interested in the destiny of the country. The right to vote is an attribute of citizenship. If it is true to say that there is no taxation without representation, it is not less true to say that there must be no representation without citizenship. Is there a country in the world that has given the right to vote to foreigners, to people who were not citizens of that country, simply because they have served the country? During all the great wars in which England has participated since the establishment of constitutional government, did the statesmen of England ever think of giving the right to vote to the soldiers who engaged in those wars? When I read the great speeches made in the House of Commons and in the House of Lords by great parliamentarians like Pitt, Fox, Brougham, and Gladstone, when they protested against any violation of what they thought was an essential element of the British constitution, I say to myself, if they were here in this Parliament, with what fervid eloquence they would denounce such legislation as this.

This legislation strikes at the very foundation, the root, of constitutional government.

I, like the majority of my countrymen, have always been a great admirer of the British constitution; but when I see, and when our people see, that under the cover of that constitution such legislation may be passed, the effect naturally will be to make us believe that that constitution is not as nearly perfect as we thought. So in the interest of our connection with Great Britain, in the interest of our country, in the interest of the respect which we owe to our constitution, I regret such legislation, which cannot be defended in any way.

Hon. P. A. CHOQUETTE: Honourable gentlemen, I had expected that after the castigation given to the honourable gentlemen on the other side, after their being referred to as members of a deaf and dumb institute, they would resent the imputation, and some of them at least, by a political miracle, would have recovered their voice, and would have stood up and said: "We will answer, if not for the Government, at least for ourselves." But I am sorry to say they have not dared to do so. The word, or rather the order, given to them, must have been very peremptory, for I see on the benches opposite gentlemen who are always on their feet calling us to order, very often for nothing, and who are always ready to speak. On this occasion, when a most stupid Bill is before the House, they do not dare to say a word.

I remember a parallel case which occurred some thirty years ago in Quebec, when a Bill was being forced through the Legislature by Mr. Chapleau, who was then head of the Government. It was, if I remember well, a Bill for the sale of the North Shore railway to the Government, somewhat like the Canadian Northern Bill. Many friends of the Government, a Tory one, were against the Bill, and there was great opposition to it. In the slashing indictment of it which was made by the Liberals at that time in the House, the members of the Government were asked: "Why do you not defend the measure? who gave you orders not to speak?" and they asked the honourable leader of the Government, Mr. Chapleau, to let his followers speak and defend the measure. I remember, as if it were to-day, that at last Mr. Chapleau stood up in a rage and said, "We will answer you by the vote." That was the only answer he could give. To-day my honourable friend who leads this House does not get into a rage, does not become angry, keeps smiling all the time, but turns around to his friends and says: "Do not speak; do not lose your heads; we will answer by the vote." I am sure that is the only answer that can be given; and, in spite of all the strong arguments which have been advanced against this Bill, and in spite of the good amendment which my honourable friend the leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Bostock) has put before this House, the amendment will be defeated and the Bill will be carried. So it is practically of no use to discuss this measure; it is just as well to say that we will not waste our time with it, because it is already decided that the answer shall be given by the vote. You have the majority, and you will carry the Bill, and we may just as well let it go. But, honourable gentlemen, the people throughout the country would not be satisfied with that. They would not feel that we had done our duty if we failed to express our views and enter our protest against this legislation.

As far as I am concerned, I am not so much afraid of the effect of this Bill in the elections as of the idea which is behind the Bill. I would be satisfied with the result of the Bill if the law were properly carried out, because I am sure, from information which we have, that not only those who resent the measure, but the great majority of all who are given the right to vote—the wives, mothers and sisters of the soldiers—will vote against the Government. That is according to letters we receive in this country from persons on the other side. So I am not afraid of the Bill in itself. What I do fear is the idea behind the Bill, like the idea behind the Conscription Bill—the stealing of votes. This Bill is not a franchise measure introduced in order to give all those mentioned the right to vote and thus express their views. It is rather an attempt by the war-time Tory machine to get votes. That is their idea; that is their intention. But, as I say, if the law is honestly carried out, I shall not be much afraid of that, for I am sure that the Government and their Tory friends will be greatly disappointed.

In any event, we have to take the Bill as it is and discuss it for the moment, particularly to show the absurdity of some of its provisions. I may say at once, as I have stated on a previous occasion, that far from objecting, even to soldiers who are not citizens of this country having a vote, I think its effect may be after all not so bad, though it is a bad principle, as my honourable friend from Mille Isles (Hon. Mr. David) has just stated, because before the right to vote is granted the right of citizenship should first be accorded—the voter should be a citizen. After all, I would not find so much fault with the granting of a vote because of the fact of a man being at the front; but what I object to is giving the vote not only to the soldier, but also to all his family—to his wife, his mother, his daughters and his sisters. Let me give an illustration to show how ridiculous it is and how far it may go. I may point out that the right to vote will be given also to a soldier's wife who is a nurse. How will they stand in reference to this Bill? First, the soldier will have his vote; his father will have a vote; his wife will have her vote as a nurse; he may have three sisters—it is very common in Quebec for a man to have three sisters, or even more; he may have three daughters—it is also common in Quebec for a man to have three or more daughters. My honourable friend here (Hon. Mr. David) has nine daughters. But let us suppose there are three daughters. The vote of the soldier and the votes of his wife, his mother, his father, his three sisters, and his three daughters will total nine. His wife may have her mother; she may have four sisters; her daughters I have already mentioned as having the vote; but she will have her own vote and the votes of her mother and her four sisters; that will make six votes for the wife and the nine votes for the husband, which will make fifteen votes in the one family. Is that not sufficient to bring ridicule upon the Government? I appeal to my honourable friend (Hon. Sir James Lougheed), who is a serious man, if that is not enough to ridicule and discredit his Government? I know of a case in Quebec of a soldier whose wife is leaving shortly as a nurse, and in whose family there will be fifteen persons having the right to vote, whereas a naturalized citizen who has lived fourteen years in this country will not be able to vote, nor will his children have a vote. It seems to me, honourable gentlemen, that it is sufficient to bring that instance before the House and the country to prove the absurdity of the Bill. These facts are absolutely correct, and may be corroborated and proved any day, if honourable gentlemen will only look around.

Let us take another instance, which is still more striking. The Bill states that the vote shall be given not only to the relatives of men who are on service, but to the relatives of a man who has come back from service, though he may have gone no farther than London. There are many, officers especially, who have gone overseas, have remained in England, and have come back without having been on the firing line. There are in the other House twenty members of Parliament who have gone overseas, and none of whom, except perhaps Mr. Carroll, a good Liberal, have got into the fight. It has been shown by the public accounts that such men have drawn $5,000, $6,000 or $7,000. They have gone on a picnic to London, have come back here and been "honourably discharged," as it is said. They have pocketed so much money, and they did not see the fight; at least, if you ask them what battles they were in, they go away and are too much ashamed to answer. Under the Bill, these men who have been picnicing in London for months and have been pocketing thousands of dollars and have come back to this country and been discharged, are given the right to vote, and the vote is given to their wives, daughters and sisters—and, as an honourable gentleman on the other side said, they ought to have added their cousins and aunts, as in the well-known comic opera Is it not ridiculous? Is it the reward of bravery? I say in this case that it is the reward of cowardice; and, as the Quebec Chronicle said the other day, these gallant officers who have so returned from overseas without having gone to the front ought to be deprived of the right to vote, and I hope that an amendment for this purpose will be introduced in the Bill, and I will vote for it. The Quebec Chronicle, I may say, is a good Tory paper, the organ of General Watson, who has been at the front for three years and has so distinguished himself there that he has been rewarded in many ways. But the fact is that officers who have been overseas without being at the firing line, and who after having had a good time have returned with money in their pockets, are rewarded under this Bill with the same number of votes as those who have been at the front fighting, who have been wounded and probably disabled for life. Is it just? Is it fair? Is it a measure of which the Government ought to be proud? As my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. David) says, eight votes which these men will have will cancel the votes of eight citizens of this country who have perhaps done more in their own way than all these men together.

Honourable gentlemen, I do not intend to discuss this Bill at any length, because it is of no use; but I desire simply to enter my strongest protest, and show the ridiculous aspect of it. There is, however, another feature of the Bill which is more serious than the rest: it is what will happen at the polls. Take the case of an election held under this Bill. What will happen on polling day? for we must consider this Bill in connection with the Election Act. All soldiers, especially those who are not citizens and whose names are not entered on the voters' lists, will have the right to go to the returning officer or to the enumerator, and ask for a certificate of their right to vote. Long proceedings will have to be taken for that purpose. A man will have to write down a great deal of information, as required by the schedule. After having done all that, the soldier will be required to state what he has done in the war. He will get a certificate entitling him to vote, though his name does not appear on the list. This man will go to the poll with that certificate? What will happen there? The same procedure will have to be gone through again. The two representatives of the candidates will have the right to discuss that, and perhaps it will take half-an-hour to settle the case. The Government will have the power to appoint its own friends as returning officers. That is what is ordinarily done. I do not say that all Tory returning officers are dishonest; but we know from past experience that a great many of them are. Suppose this officer, though not dishonest, is very partisan and he is appointed for a poll where there is a great majority of Liberals, say ten to one in 200 voters. I know polls, in the city of Quebec particularly, where the Tories will not get ten votes. The Tory officer, realizing that his party will get very few votes in that poll, will advise that many names on the voters' list be disputed; or if a man says, "My name is not on the list, but this is my certificate," the other party will say, "Well, I challenge your vote." That is done. The returning officers must take notice and provide a special ballot, put it in an envelope and keep it there. What would be the result? In country places the poll is open from 9 o'clock until 5, generally. If there are 200 votes to be polled, the returning officer, with all the different things that have to be done or may be done under cover of the law, may prevent many votes from being cast at that poll. He may, under this law, spend 15 or 20 minutes on each name on the list; because the enumerators have the right to add what names they want, and if a name has not been added any man may come to the poll during the election and claim the right to vote; and, if several are not friends of the Government then they will be prevented from voting because of all the objections and specially if they arrive late at the poll, the returning officer taking up a quarter of an hour or twenty minutes to dispose of the objections, etc., in order to prevent them from voting. These things can be done under this Bill and they will be done. Discussions will be raised—not by friends of the Liberal party, because in Quebec particularly the voters will be all Liberals, and there will be no Tory party, though there may be some Nationalists who may perhaps be provided by many allies with money and with subscriptions to Le Devoir to try to defeat the Liberals; Nationalist candidates may be put up by the Tory party, but the voters will be all Liberals and the Tory party's friends will have no show. There may be candidates under false colours, as there were in the elections of 1911, and the inducements will be for these candidates to make trouble at the polls, and prevent men from voting. So I say that even this feature of the Bill is bad, as an inducement to illegality and fraud. That is why I have stated that the purpose of the Bill is not an honest one; but that the Bill is an attempt on the part of the war-time Tory machine to get votes and nothing else.

Now, honourable gentlemen, it is and has been claimed all along, and especially during this war, that we fight for democracy, that democracy is the watchword of the twentieth century, that democracy must rule. But, as a French writer once said, "O liberty, how many crimes have been committed in thy name!" I may say, perhaps with still more force, "O democracy, how many crimes have been committed by the Tory Government and these war profiteers in thy name!" Democracy is what we hear of to-day, but it is democracy only in the mouth; because autocracy in the hand, in the mind, is everywhere seen in the action of the Government. This word "democracy" is used for the purpose of casting aspersions on the Liberals. Democracy is used now as often as the word "loyalty." But, honourable gentlemen, real democracy is set aside, and autocracy is carried to its extreme limit. Not only does autocracy reign at the present time, but it has reigned since the extension of the term of the present Parliament, since members of the Government have retained their seats by their own vote. It would seem that because these honourable gentlemen have elected themselves and have been sitting back in their seats for one year, they have got the idea that they are there forever, and while they make use of the word "democracy," democracy is superseded in their actions by autocracy.

This word "democracy" is like the word "flag": it is used for the purpose of covering a multitude of sins. Speaking about flags, and in order to show what is very often covered up by the British flag, I cannot but refer to what happened last week in the loyal and puritan city of Toronto. A merchant—he must have been a Tory; I do not know, but only a Tory could invent such a thing—had many thousands of old diaries of 1913. He could not use them; so last December he got an artist to make little British flags about four inches square and stuck them on the old diaries, covering the figures 1913 with the figures 1917, and sold them to the good men of Toronto as diaries of 1917; and when the good, loyal purchaser went to use the diary, he found to his disgust that the flag had covered the 1913 when it was sold for 1917, and that the diary was of no use. That shows what use men who are not loyal, who are not sincere and honest in their hearts, will make of the British flag. Men like myself may be open to criticism, but we have the courage and sincerity to give our opinions, though we may sometimes be wrong; but we do not want to hide always behind the flag. We have a right to be suspicious of the man who is always boasting of his loyalty, of his honesty, and of his religious ideas; for honesty, loyalty and religion are in the heart, not on the lips, and those who are always using those expressions are the worst thieves, the least pious and the least honest. It is a good thing to be for the flag; I believe in upholding the British flag as well as I can in this country; but I do not believe in using the flag to cover thieving or bribing or scandalous measures. I may have my opinion about the way the flag must be maintained in this country; but I do not want to wrap myself up in the flag and say, "See me, how loyal I am!" There are too many men doing that; they have the flag in one hand, and they have their other hand in the pocket of their neighbours. Evidently it makes some people blush to support such a measure as this, and it makes us suspicious when there is not a word said by honourable gentlemen on the other side of the House in support of this Bill. In regard to other bad Bills, some members have stood up in their places in this House and at least have said: "This Bill is distasteful to me, but I must support it." But with this Bill they are not going so far as to say even that much. Though distasteful to them, they have to support the Bill all the same, and say nothing, because it is the Tory machine Bill.

Coming now to the amendment of my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Bostock), it seems to me that it ought to appeal to everybody in this House. It says:

> That in the opinion of this Senate it is not desirable, as provided by the said Bill, to disfranchise large numbers of the people of Canada who have taken the oath of allegiance, have been guaranteed the rights of citizenship in the name of His Majesty the King, and have not failed to discharge all the obligations of citizenship.

Well, the Government says that the people of Canada are fighting to maintain their honour, and so on—are fighting the Germans because they said that a treaty was only a scrap of paper. But is it not a most serious thing to disregard the treaty made by the Government of Canada with its citizens from abroad, which was put upon the statute book and on official notices, stating that in this country they would not be subject to conscription as they were in the old country; that if they came to this country we would establish them on the land; that they would be naturalized and put on the same footing as our own people and have equal rights with citizens of this country? On the faith of this contract or treaty with the Government of Canada, which gave them the promise that they would get all the privileges of Canadian citizenship, those men came to this country; and what do we see? After they have been here for fifteen years, and have done their best to increase the value of this country, and develop the great Northwest, we say to those citizens: "It is true we have said all those things; it is true we promised you that once you settled here, you would not be subject to conscription; it is true that we granted you all those privileges of citizenship of the Canadian people; but now that is only a scrap of paper. We destroy these solemn promises. You have been here, it is true, for fifteen years as a citizen; we have nothing against you; but you will not have the right to vote, though you are paying taxes and paying for this war, paying to the Patriotic Fund, paying for all the work that has been done in this country." Is it surprising that some men in this country will say: "Why, you are no better than the Germans; this Government is no better than the Kaiser; the Kaiser may have some public reason to say that treaties are only scraps of papers, and he pretends that when he passed through Belgium he was told that Belgium had agreed to let the French and English pass through that country." The Kaiser may have that reason, and, though I do not think it, it was at least a public reason. But what reasons have we in this country to say to those people that they have no right to the vote? And why should we trample on the rights we gave them? The Government is doing this in order to keep themselves in power, when they say that without this Bill the aliens would be fighting for their own fatherland. I say the contrary is the case, if I read correctly the speech made in another place by the German member from Waterloo county, who said there are thousands of Germans now fighting over there with the British against their own people, because since they came to this country they wish to uphold the British flag, as they have sworn to do. I repeat that the Government has treated this contract with these foreign immigrants as a scrap of paper, and I say that to-day, politically speaking, the Government is no better, but is worse, than the Kaiser, because he pleaded at least a public reason for putting away a treaty, while this Government has nothing but political reasons and selfish reasons for doing that.

Another point of my honourable friend's amendment is this:

That any measure granting the franchise only to a limited number of women, as proposed by the said Bill, is contrary to the public interest, and fails to recognize the splendid patriotic work which has been performed by the women of Canada generally during the present war.

This is true to the letter. The Government states that they give the franchise to women because they are relatives of soldiers; yet they withhold the vote from women, either married or single, who have done perhaps ten times more in the work of helping the soldiers at the front, furnishing them with delicacies, sending money to have soldiers properly nursed over there. Why are those women not allowed votes? They are not recognized in the good work they have done, and this refusal will be resented by them. As the honourable gentleman from Victoria said this morning, Lady Borden and Lady Laurier will have no right to vote because they are not the wives of soldiers who are or have been at the front, or who have been discharged. Do you mean to say that their husbands have not done as much as soldiers at the front? Do you mean to say that Sir Robert Borden and Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the two leaders of the parties, have not done as much work as any officer at the front, or as much work as officers who have returned from London, not having been at the front? These facts show once more the absurdity of this Bill in not giving the right to vote to the first ladies of the land, who have spent their days and their nights in the hospitals and in every kind of work for soldiers and the Patriotic Fund, as also the Daughters of the Empire and others who have done everything to help the soldiers. But these have no right to vote, because their husbands or brothers have not been at the front and come back here, while the wife, mother, sister and daughter of those who have not seen any war, who never saw a trench, who never saw a fight except behind a barn or a tank will have votes. Well, that is one-sided, and such treatment will bring this Bill into discredit, and I do not see how a serious-minded business man can support it.

This amendment ought to commend itself in every word to the intelligence of this House. I am told that it was offered in the other House, and I am sorry that it was not accepted there, because that was the place where it should have been received. Franchise Bills should be considered in the House of Commons rather than in the Senate, for it is proper that such Bills should be studied and debated by those who are going to be elected or defeated under them. I would not have been inclined to fight this Bill at all if it had been an ordinary franchise Bill declaring that the voters would be those inscribed on the provincial lists, with the addition in a general way of the names of the soldiers. But, although the other House has not seen proper to accept this amendment, it would seem to me to appeal to every sincere man, and we in this House ought to accept the amendment, recommend it to the other House, and ask them to reconsider their decision and accept it. Thus not only would the country feel better, but there would be an improved franchise Bill, and foreign countries would have a better opinion of our legislation, as the honourable member for Victoria has said.

In looking over this Bill and this amendment, we cannot refrain from being somewhat disgusted that a Bill like that should be carried in this House without having a word of defence from the other side. It seems to me that this is a sort of insult to the country, and even to this side of this House, when we take the trouble and the pains to call attention to some parts of the Bill that may not appeal to the other side. If honourable gentlemen on that side do not wish to pronounce against the Bill, for which they have to vote because their friends want them to do so, they might say, as the honourable member for Cape Breton did the other day, that there were some things in it that he did not like. By saying nothing, they occupy the position of members of a deaf and dumb institute, as the honourable member for Victoria has said; and it seems to me that that is not what honourable gentlemen on the other side ought to be. But that is their own business. We have done our duty; we have raised our protest; and if honourable gentlemen will only answer by a vote, as has been done in the past elsewhere, I just appeal to the electorate of this country to answer them with the vote, and I hope that vote will be the strongest condemnation, not only of this measure, but of some other very bad measures which we have been called upon to pass this session.

Hon. F. L. BEIQUE: Honourable gentlemen, I will detain you but a very few moments. If this Bill dealt with the franchise in an ordinary manner, I would deem it my duty to vote on it silently, to pass on it very quickly, because I consider that it is a subject which belongs to the House of Commons rather than to this honourable House. But this measure is of such an extraordinary character that I would feel that I was not discharging my duty if I did not raise my voice against it for one moment at least. The honourable leader of the Government has stated in presenting this measure that it was a very extraordinary measure, and he almost sought to justify it by going back centuries, when wars were not carried out by free men but by mercenaries, and when, as he very properly stated, as a recompense for carrying on the wars they were given the privilege of looting the country which had been conquered. I do not think that we should go back so many centuries in order to find such examples, and to adopt, not the practice followed in those days of looting the territory conquered, but that of plundering the people at large in this country of the privilege which they possess. This measure is nothing short of that. As was very properly stated by the honourable gentleman from Mille Iles (Hon. Mr. David), heretofore, not only in this country, but in every civilized country in the world, the privilege of voting has appertained to and has been the exclusive privilege of citizenship or of property-owners in the country. It is given exclusively to people who have an interest—not merely for a moment, not in the Empire at large, but a permanent interest in the country in which they are called upon to exercise the privilege of casting their vote. They have this privilege because they are supposed to have the proper information to cast a vote, because they are supposed to have followed or to have been able to follow the course of events and to be able to pass judgment upon the Government which has carried on the administration of the country. Honourable gentlemen, I ask you, in all sincerity, whether a large number of the persons to whom votes will be given by this Bill will have had such an opportunity. They have enlisted, a large number of them, two or three years ago. They have been out of the country; they have discontinued following politics in this country. This applies to a great many. But a large number of them have never had any interest in this country. They are strangers, they were never citizens of this country; and they do not know the first word of our politics and yet they are given, as was very properly stated, not one vote, but half-a-dozen or a dozen votes. Honourable gentlemen, have you ever heard of a franchise of that character anywhere? Does it not violate all the principles which appertain to a law of that kind? In the South Africa war there were hundreds of thousands of soldiers engaged. They went into that war voluntarily. They were as deserving as those who have enlisted in Canada; but when there was a general election in England during the war, it did not occur to any statesman in Great Britain to grant a franchise of that kind to any of the soldiers engaged in that war. I have no hesitation in saying that this measure is without precedent, and, in the words of the honourable Minister of Trade and Commerce, it is intended to perpetuate the present Government in power by all means possible. He did not use those words, but what he said amounts to that. In other words, it is intended to deprive a large portion of the citizens of this country of the legitimate enjoyment of the right to vote, and that right has been transferred to people who have not the qualifications to exercise that privilege.

Honourable gentlemen, we in this House are the natural guardians of the respectability at least of all laws that are passed by this Parliament. We are the natural guardians also of the good faith of the Crown to every inhabitant of this country, and this is what you will be called upon to vote for in a few minutes. The good faith of the Crown is very seriously compromised, because, after having imported a large number of citizens into Canada, after having given them the promise that they would be given the rights of citizenship when they were naturalized, the Government now takes those rights away from them, unless they have been naturalized for over fifteen years. Those whose mother tongue is either Austrian or German are affected, although they may have no affiliation whatever with those countries, and although their ancestors may have been in this country for half a century or even a century. For my part, I repeat that I cannot vote on a measure of this kind without entering my protest against it.

Hon. ROBERT WATSON: Honourable gentlemen, I do not feel disposed to give a silent vote on a matter of this kind that affects so many of the settlers in Western Canada as this Bill does. This Franchise Bill might be termed a domestic affair for the House of Commons, as was stated by the honourable gentleman who has just taken his seat (Hon. Mr. Beique); but it is to this body that some people look for the guarding of their rights and interests in Canada. In my opinion, this is the most vicious legislation ever brought before Parliament. I have been coming to Ottawa for the past thirty-five years, and I venture to say that no more far-reaching or more vicious legislation was ever introduced.

This legislation undertakes to disfranchise British subjects, immigrants who have come to Canada trusting in the good faith of the Government, people who have come here to become citizens of the country, and as such are entitled to the rights of citizenship. No reason has been given us why those people should be disfranchised. So far as we know, they have been law-abiding people. I know a number of these people personally, and they have been good citizens. A number of them would willingly go back and fight for Great Britain and for Canada; but I have never met a man of them who would fight for Austria or Germany. They left those countries and came to Canada because they wanted to get away from the militarism of Germany and Austria. They came here, and now forsooth they are disfranchised and their privileges are taken away. What are we at war for to-day? We have heard a great deal about "a scrap of paper." These foreigners have heard about it, and they became British subjects as soon as their three years time was up. I know of one constituency in particular in the Northwest, where 30,000, or 40 per cent, of the electors will be disfranchised, and their representative was one of the strongest supporters of compulsory enlistment in the House of Commons. I refer to the constituency of Humboldt. We have to look to things after the war. This sugar-coating of "win-the-war" is used too much. We must look ahead. We in the great Northwest, in order to meet our obligations after the war, have to have more people, and it will be a poor advertisement to say that these people who have come to this country have been disfranchised, and for the purpose as was very well stated by the honourable gentleman from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Beique) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, of getting a bigger push behind the Government in Canada. The portion of the Dominion that is most affected by this disfranchisement is the Canadian West, because immigrants have come there, more particularly within the last fifteen years, and the representatives of those people in the House of Commons voted for conscription. Why should the Parliament of Canada come to the conclusion that those people are in favour of such legislation as this, when the only representation they had voted for conscription? Their representatives also stated in the House of Commons, as you will see if you have read the debates, that some of these foreigners were the largest contributors to the Red Cross Fund, and still you disfranchise them. If a referendum were to be taken on conscription, I could understand the Government wanting to disfranchise some of these people; but conscription is the law of the land. By the passing of this Bill, which disfranchises the foreigner, you are placing upon every Liberal in the country the stamp of disloyalty.

By this Act you are disfranchising, I should say, in the neighbourhood of 1,000,000 women who are entitled to the franchise to-day. The franchise was extended to the women of Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, and the Government is placing these loyal women, who have been working so gloriously for the relief of the boys at the front, in the same class as the so-called alien enemy. The question arose some time ago as to whether women had a right to vote in a Federal election. There is no question in my mind that they would have been allowed to vote if it had not been for this Administration, notwithstanding that the Minister of Justice, in placing an interpretation upon the word "person," said that a woman was not a person. I find that the Secretary of State in this Bill says, "a male person," and "a female person." Consequently a woman must be a person, and would be entitled to vote under the Dominion Franchise Act.

Another bad feature of this Bill, coupled with the Military Voters' Bill which we passed the other day, is the disfranchisement of quite a number of constituencies throughout the Dominion, because, by introducing non-residents into those constituencies, you poll a vote which should not be polled there, and in that way you disqualify electors now entitled to vote. It is not fair, it is not just. Take the case of a close constituency. It will be possible to import into that constituency one hundred or two hundred votes which will be at the disposal of the Government, and thus defeat the wishes of the electors. I understand that about 15,000 votes properly distributed would carry about 100 seats. Is it fair? This Bill was prepared by the Solicitor General and his followers in the House of Commons simply for the purpose of returning the Conservative party to power.

There are other questions which will interest the people during the coming contest. They want to win the war. The win-the-war Liberals are just as desirous of that as the win-the-war Conservatives; but there are other issues. It seems to me that the cry of "win-the-war" is intended to deceive the people of Canada for the time being into thinking that the Conservative party are the only people who are going to win the war. They are trying by means of the win-the-war cry to cause the electors of Canada to forget all the scandals which have been brought to light in connection with the war: the shoddy shoes made of split leather by the Ames-Holden Company, which they claimed were better because they were made of split leather, glued together with rubber cement and waterproof; the old horses; the Ross rifles; the bad ammunition. It is expected all these matters will be covered up. I can inform honourable gentlemen that such will not be the case. The people in Canada are not stupid, and will remember these things when they come to mark their ballots.

We have heard a great deal about Prussianism; but Prussian militarism is being introduced into Canada at the present time in this very contest. Good, loyal citizens, men and women, are being disfranchised. I do not intend taking up any further time of the House in dealing with this matter. I should like to have heard some of the reasons given on the other side of the House why this legislation should pass; but, as my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Cloran) has stated, the members opposite have acted as if they were in a dumb institute, and we have heard nothing from them except what has been stated by the honourable leader of the House. As a representative of the West, I say that this is one of the most objectionable pieces of legislation ever submitted to Parliament. There are in the West a large number of people who have come from foreign countries. We were pledged to give them full citizenship when they came to this country. I know many of them occupying positions in municipal councils, members of the Grain Growers' Association, first-class farmers, and they are being disfranchised. I think it can be imagined how a neighbour who has the franchise will feel when he comes in contact with a man with whom he has been doing business for a number of years, and who is disfranchised as being an alien enemy. I say it is a mistake. Everything that is possible should be done for the foreign element, to make them feel at home in Canada and show them that we have the fullest confidence in them and make them loyal citizens. If we disfranchise them it will have a very bad effect upon them, which it will take years to overcome.

In the House of Commons the suggestion was made that demobilization of the army might last three or four years. If this is a war measure its effects should cease when peace is declared, and if a war Parliament is in existence at the time of the declaration of peace it ought to cease when the war ends, so that we may have a fair voters' list and a full franchise in sending representatives to Parliament to do the business of the people of Canada. In the interest of the Canadian people these things should be done, and we should amend this Bill at least to provide that it shall cease to be effective when peace is declared.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I think it does.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I do not think so. I have read the remarks of the Secretary of State and cannot find any statement to that effect.

Hon. A. BOYER: The Government having dropped the old cry of "win the war" for the more modern cry of "win the elections at any cost," we are to-day confronted with a Bill which in the House of Commons was declared to be incomprehensible even to a Philadelphia lawyer. When it is presented to the lay mind, how are we to be expected to understand any clause of it?

I can well remember the old Franchise Act of 1890, which was fought out in the House of Commons for almost an entire summer. When it was put into force it was declared to be almost incomprehensible, and the trouble it gave throughout the country is within the memory of every one of us. I can well remember the old officer of 1890, a gentleman who was chosen on account of his political acuteness, on account of what he would do for his party and what he would do against the other party. I can well remember the revising officer in the county in which I was interested, with a smile on his face, doing everything he possibly could for the boys who would ask him if so-and-so and so-and-so, who were Liberals, were put on the list. We had his word; it was the only thing we had to depend on; but when the lists were printed and the time had expired, the names were not on the list. The gentleman had forgotten them.

In this Bill we are confronted with the same gentleman, only under a different name—an "enumerator." What is he doing to enumerate? The number of Liberal votes that can be thrown aside and the enormous number of Tory voters he can falsely put on the list? Is that the true meaning of the word "enumerator"? I take it to be that. He is to be a revival under a new name of the troublesome individual of 1890 called the revising officer.

In this Bill we give the right to vote to everybody—to our cousins and our aunts. As a witty Irishman remarked to me in Montreal on Saturday last, the only thing that has been forgotten is to give the right of voting to the war-babies. When I asked him how it was to be done, he said: "Surely every one of them has a nurse; the war-babies have been forgotten."

The Government have thought of everything except one matter: they have forgotten those ladies who have worked night and day in the cause of our boys abroad, but who have no relatives at the front. These ladies are deprived of the right to vote, while one whose husband or son or nephew has enlisted may have fifteen, sixteen, seventeen or twenty votes. You are robbing Peter to pay Paul. You are taking the vote from people who are entitled to it—thousands of people who have emigrated from Europe to Canada. I can well remember the cry which was raised by some friends of mine, Hungarians, that we in Canada were actually depopulating the country around certain towns of Hungary because we promised the people there that conscription would never exist in Canada. Conscription has come. These men, before conscription became law, complied with all the demands of the Canadian nation of which they are now citizens. Suddenly a reason is found, which cannot be explained, why these men should be disfranchised.

Let me read to you what a minister of the Crown had to say no later than February 10, 1916. The Hon. Mr. Hazen, Minister of Marine and Fisheries, said in the House of Commons on that date:

Mr. Speaker, as a matter of privilege, I desire to refer to a subject that, I think, is of sufficient importance to justify me in asking the indulgence of the House for a few minutes. My attention has been called to an article appearing in the Ottawa Evening Journal of February 9, headed: "Germans have access to Confidential Papers in Ottawa," and reprinting an article contained in the Toronto Star of the same date which, among other things, says this:

"Probably the most conspicuous case on record is that of Gustav Heidmann, secretary of the Minister of Marine, and Naval Service, Hon. J. D. Hazen. Mr. Heidmann was born in Germany, and no doubt has relatives fighting here. He has been a long time in Canada, and is reputed as an able and efficient secretary. His name appears on the most recent list issued from the Secretary of State's Department as having received full naturalization. But Mr. Heidmann has access to all correspondence connected with Canadian coast defence, wireless, harbour patrols, and marine matters which come to the office of the Minister of Marine and Naval Defence. It is not conceivable that Admiral Von Tirpitz would be so trustful, in connection with the administration of his department."

I think it is desirable that I should state the facts to the House. My secretary, Mr. Heidmann, who has been my secretary since November, 1911, was born in Germany, and, when an infant in arms only a few weeks old, came to Canada with his parents who were dissatisfied with conditions in Germany and sought Canada with a view to making their home here and becoming citizens of this country. The father settled in Toronto, and, soon after taking up his residence there, applied to an alderman of that city for naturalization as a British subject, and received a certificate which he believed conferred upon him the rights of a British subject, but about which there may be some question as the preliminary steps were not entirely complied with. However, for over thirty-two years Mr. Heidmann's father has engaged in manufacturing business in Toronto, has voted at elections from time to time, and has taken such part in the affairs of the city as a good citizen ought to take.

Mark the words: "as a good citizen ought to take."

Mr. Heidmann, my secretary, was brought up in Toronto, educated in the common schools there, and, after having received his education, was appointed as private secretary to Mr. H. S. Strathy, General Manager of the Traders Bank of Canada, which bank, I believe, has since been amalgamated with the Royal Bank of Canada. In 1904 Mr. Heidmann came to Ottawa as a member of the Civil Service of Canada, and he continued in the Service until 1911, being at that time assistant to the secretary of the National Transcontinental Railway Commission. In 1911, I selected Mr. Heidmann as my secretary out of a number of applicants, because I thought him eminently fit for the position. Before making that selection, I made inquiries regarding Mr. Heidmann's character and standing, from persons in the city of Toronto, who knew him and his family well; in whom I had every confidence, and in whom the members of this House would have every confidence if I were to mention their names, as they are among the leading citizens of that city. The reports I received from them were of the most favourable character, with regard to Mr. Heidmann's character and abilities, and also with regard to the standing and reputation of his family who had been living in Toronto, as I have said, for thirty-two years. Since then Mr. Heidmann has acted as my secretary and has done so with great acceptability to myself, because of the industry and ability with which he has discharged his duties. I may say for the information of the House that one of his brothers, soon after the outbreak of the war, enlisted and is now a trooper in the third troop, "C" squadron, Second Brigade, Fourth Canadian Mounted Rifles, which has since been reorganized into an infantry brigade under the command of General Victor Williams.

He goes on to give the very best recommendation to this gentleman:

My secretary, until a short time ago, believed that he was a British subject. Believing that his father had been naturalized, and he himself, having lived in Toronto since he was an infant, he considered that he was a British subject. But there being some legal question about it, he applied for, and obtained full naturalization at the time of the outbreak of the war. I think it is only right and fair that I should make this statement to the House in view of the article I have read from the Toronto Star, and which was copied last evening into the Ottawa Evening Journal. I would like to say further, that after the war broke out, when rumours became current in Ottawa in regard to Mr. Heidmann, and on different occasions since, he has come to me and told me that if, in the slightest degree, I felt embarrassed in consequence of his connection with me as private secretary, he would at once, and without any feeling, tender his resignation and seek to make a living in some other way.

He ends his statement by saying:

I feel that a very cruel injustice is being done to my secretary by the publication of such articles as appeared last night in the Ottawa Journal, and an injustice which must bring sorrow and tribulation not only to himself, but to his wife and members of his family. Therefore, I deem it my duty as his chief, and as one whom he has served with the greatest possible loyalty and fidelity during the time I have been Minister of Marine and Fisheries, to say these few words to the House, not only as a matter of justice to my private secretary, but in order that there may be to some extent removed from the public mind the unfortunate conclusions that have been drawn from evidence and facts that are entirely insufficient to justify even the slightest suspicion being attached to Mr. Heidmann's loyalty and fidelity.

Notwithstanding this strong recommendation, Mr. Heidmann is to-day disfranchised because, thinking himself a British subject, he got his naturalization papers only in 1914, and the law states that any man naturalized after 1904, though he remains a British subject, having lived in Canada and having voted at all municipal, parliamentary and other elections, yet that man is disfranchised. Why? Because the Government is bound to win the elections.

A suspicion has gone abroad that men who came from the different countries of Europe might vote against the Tory Government—that they might have suspicions as to how this war has been conducted and might be suspicious of what would happen in the future. These men, when they were asked to come to Canada, were told: "There is no conscription in Canada; there is no income tax in Canada; Canada is a free country; we want men of your stamp; we want men to come to Canada to help us build up a great nation; we want the very best." God knows we took every precaution that no man who was an undesirable should enter Canada. But to-day we tell all such men, who were picked out as amongst the best, that we have no confidence in their loyalty, and as a recompense for having come to settle amongst us we intend to take away from them what I consider to be one of the greatest gifts of manhood—the right to have a vote in the election of the Parliament of one's country, the right to vote on what the country's policy shall be by selecting the men who will frame that policy. These men are deprived of all such rights—why? Because the great cry has been raised, "Let us win the elections." We have during this discussion heard nothing of the old cry that it would be shameful to have elections in war-time. If it was shameful two years ago, it is just the same to-day.

In reply to this argument, you may say that an extension of the present Parliament was refused. It was refused for just cause; it was refused because those who held power abused it. Those who had the conduct of the war mismanaged affairs, as has been proven time and time again. When these gentlemen got into power in 1911 what wonderful things they were going to do. They were helped into power by an element in Quebec which to-day the Prime Minister of Canada has repudiated. The first thing that element was going to do if they got into power was to repeal the Naval Act of the Laurier Government. The only repeal they made was to buy two submarines in British Columbia that would neither dive nor float.

Hon. Mr. PLANTA: That is false.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: They have dived. Did they come up?

Hon. Mr. PLANTA: Yes, they did.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: That was at one trial. Were trials made twice?

Hon. Mr. PLANTA: The honourable gentleman has made the statement that the submarines would neither dive nor float. I simply say that is not correct. It is absolutely false.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: One of them dived, but it had to be brought up by hydraulic jacks. Of course, it came up again. But that was the kind of naval repeal they had —buying two submarines; and the transaction was so openly, so publicly done that a royal commissioner had to go to British Columbia to investigate the transaction. Then these men, who had complained about the tinpot navy of the Laurier government, were very glad to use the Niobe.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: She was tried; but she came back; and they could not take her out any more; and she is down there at the wharf in Halifax.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: She was used for a purpose for a year.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: No, she is tied up; the crew refused to go in to her.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: The Niobe went out to sea, because I know for a fact that some friends of mine coming up from Bermuda, when about seventeen or twenty miles outside of New York, were stopped by a British warship, and they said: "Fancy our astonishment; it was our good old Niobe, so much decried as a tin pot."

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: That is what she is. She is tied up at the wharf. The honourable gentleman sitting right in front of my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Power) knows that what I say is true. The crew would not go out in her, and she is tied up at the wharf. She was in commission for probably two months.

Hon. Mr. POWER: The Niobe is now used as a sort of receiving ship, but she did navigate, as the honourable gentleman from Rigaud (Hon. Mr. Boyer) says. For some time she served a useful purpose.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: She navigated as long as the crew would go with her. The ship is now used as a boarding-house, and a very poor boarding-house.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: Anyhow, she did go out, but the Tory party was so anxious to show that she was not useful that they tied her up at Halifax and used her as a receiving ship.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Receiving what?

Hon. Mr. BOYER: Receiving Tom, Dick and Harry of the Tory party all round Halifax. That is the way it was done. Then, we had another ship out in British Columbia, the Rainbow, another tin pot, which has given a very good account of herself, while my friends have only to their credit two submarines that have given an endless lot of trouble to the party.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: We would have three good ships only for you killing the Bill here in the Senate.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Order, order.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: My honourable friend is always shouting order.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: Another trouble was that the Laurier Government was doing a great injury to the country in subsidizing graving docks; but the Tory party, as soon as they got into power in 1911, simply let the matter hang in the balance and would not let the great graving dock that was built in Quebec and towed to Montreal be rented to an American concern. It was only by the intervention of Providence that that graving dock remained in Montreal, but ever since the war has broken out it has been a continued success, and the means of refitting and helping British war vessels that could find no other graving dock, for before the United States joined us in the war they were not allowed to go into any American ports to be refitted, or into any dry dock. They had, therefore, to come to Montreal, and I cannot remember a single month in which there had not been one, two, or three warships waiting either in Quebec or Montreal to use this dock, which, according to our friends opposite, was to be perfectly useless.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: The ships could have gone to Halifax; we have a good graving dock there.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: It is too small for the purpose.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: No, it is as big as the one in Montreal—over 700 feet long.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: Let it go at seven hundred; but I know one thing, that we are getting the business in Montreal.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: The dock in Halifax is 575 feet long.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I say it is 675 feet.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: I say it is not.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I say you do not know what you are talking about.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: Now we have the ball rolling.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Yes, it has been rolling a long time.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: The honourable gentleman who has the floor should not be interrupted unless by a member who wishes to ask him a question.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: It is immaterial to me. Now, on this famous Bill that is before us, let us read some criticisms—what the friends of the present Administration think of it:

> The Franchise Bill is one of the worst pieces of aggregation ever brought to the attention of the Canadian Parliament. It is bad in principle and scandalous in detail. It has no principle underlying it except that of giving an advantage to the party in power. It disregards sacred obligations made by the nation to loyal Canadians.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: What paper is that?

Hon. Mr. BOYER: That is the Morning Albertan, of Calgary. Then, there is another paper, the Morning Leader, of Regina, which says:

> British subjects in Canada have cause today to hang their heads in shame because of the utterly un-British action of the Borden Government.
> In the sacred name of Patriotism the Borden Government has proposed to a British Parliament that it deliberately violate a pledge given in the name of the King to the men who were invited to come to Canada, make their homes here, this not a matter of party politics, it is a matter of principle.

Then, there is the Edmonton Bulletin, of September 7:

> The Act appears to be a statutory declaration on behalf of the ministers that they have lost the confidence of the existing electorate and also of the women. Wherefor they propose to disfranchise part of the present electorate and refuse to enfranchise the women.
> What further measures they may have in mind for stifling the expression of public opinion and re-establishing themselves for another term it remains to be seen. Whether the public apprehend the justice of the measures is not a matter seemingly, of any great concern, nor whether these accord with the elementary human rights for which our men are fighting in France and our people are being mortgaged for generations to come.

Then comes the great Calgary Herald:

The Solicitor-General does well when he affirms that the first consideration of the Government in framing a war-time election franchise bill to provide as nearly as may be possible for the overseas soldiers the fullest exercise of their franchise.

With that we agree.

Very many of the overseas soldiers will not be able to vote at all, the new franchise act gives them a certain vote by proxy and to this proposal surely there can be no objection. As to the disfranchised citizens of enemy birth or near extraction, the easy way out of the difficulty is the way the Government has taken.

That is to say, we have no confidence in them, although we support them for the hour, giving our secretary of German extraction the very best qualifications, that of a great patriot; still we had no confidence in his vote. Then, the Saskatoon Star:

In regard to the disfranchisement of the aliens, the Saskatoon Star, while admitting the quality of justice in the proposal, declares that though the men will keenly regret the necessity for it on two grounds, first, that a great many at least of the Austrians and Germans took the oath of allegiance and accepted the rights and responsibilities of citizenship in good faith and are to-day loyal Canadians, who would be willing to fight for their country; second, that it will make the task of melting the polyglot races in Canada into a united, loyal English-speaking nation after the war more difficult.

We invited to this country these men of European nations to help us build a great country. They have given the very best of their talents. From them we have picked up many a point. We have found them men devoted to their new country, good citizens, willing to live in Canada, notwithstanding all the hardships of immigration. Yet to-day we tell them, without a blush on our faces, "You may be as good as you please, you may be as honest as you like, but we have no confidence in your vote, because there is a suspicion that you will vote against the Tory party." I say this, that the effect will be that those men, disgusted with the treatment they are receiving, will, as soon as the occasion offers, go south of us. They will say, "Here is a nation to which we came, here is a country that invited us to settle in Canada, offering us all the liberty that we could possibly enjoy, and on account of a vague idea that we might oppose the Government on certain measures and on certain questions, we are disfranchised; every promise made us has been forgotten, has been blotted out; there has been one road left to us it is to go back to the United States." Let us wait a while and see if the United States will act as Canada is going to do, and disfranchise over ten millions of German who are in that country. In the United States they have taken the right way: they have seized and confined in concentration camps all those who were subject to suspicion. What have we done in Canada? We have allowed these men to roam abroad. We have built concentration camps. I know of one in the province of Quebec, at Spirit Lake, where at one time there were over 1,200 men, mostly Austrians, but also a few Prussians. They have all been scattered; they have all been rented to different industries in Canada; some have been sent to the coal mines and some to large public works that were being built in the province of Quebec. Those men were once under suspicion. They have since then proven their loyalty by earning fair wages, and no trouble has arisen; yet to-day, by a measure of this kind, we are telling those men that they are not fit to be trusted. If they are not to be trusted, and the vote is therefore taken, from them, I say that the Government has not done its duty in allowing those men to roam abroad; that the Government has been remiss in putting into force the laws that we passed in the short session of 1914, when the most drastic powers were given to the Government to confine and punish suspects. We have dozens of cases of men having actually established stations by which German and Austrian persons who lived in Canada before the war but who could not get away before the war broke out, secured means to go to the United States, that country at the time not being at war with Germany. One man was arrested in Montreal, and it was proven that he had established posts in different parts of the country as far as the boundary line. When the case was brought before the judge, he dismissed it because it was wrongly entered. A new charge was made against the man. This time he was brought before the criminal court—the last court for a trial of that kind, where the feelings of the jurors are so much played upon—and the jury threw out the case. That man to-day is practising the same trade in Montreal. And have you any idea how much it cost the country for that tremendous success of arresting an alien, a man who was caught red-handed, helping his fellow countrymen to leave the country so as to join either the army of Germany or the army of Austria? It cost the country over $6,000 for the tremendous success they had in having two lawsuits thrown out.

Honourable gentlemen, this Bill has been criticised in the House of Commons. Of course, it does not concern the Senate; but we are allowed in the Senate to express an opinion, and I say that it will pass down to posterity as being the most iniquitous Act ever enacted by the Parliament of Canada.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: I have been requested over the telephone by the honourable senator from DeLorimier èHon. Mr. Dandurand), who is unavoidably detained, and who will be here this evening, to move the adjournment of the debate on his behalf.

The debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock, the Senate took recess.

The Senate resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. GEORGE McHUGH: Honourable gentlemen, it was not my intention to say anything on this Bill; but, as the speaker who was to have continued the debate has not turned up, I will for the moment say a few words. I feel a keen interest in the Bill. I feel that it is a Bill that contains perhaps as much with regard to the business of the country as any Bill that has come before Parliament in many years. I am not going to deal with more than one or two clauses of the Bill, as they have been fully dealt with already. The first clause of which I will speak is that which disfranchises quite a number of British subjects who are now residents of Canada, and who have been in enjoyment of the rights of the franchise for some years under the terms of an agreement made with them by the Government of Canada. We all know that the reason Great Britain is engaged in this war at the present time is because of Germany's breaking a contract with the Belgian nation. If the breaking of that contract was sufficient to drive Britain into war, what must you think of the Government of Canada breaking a solemn contract with a lot of our own people? These people were invited to this country, and when they took the oath of allegiance and became British subjects, they were promised that they would be granted all the rights of citizens of Canada; but the Government comes down, and with one stroke of the pen says, "We will break that solemn contract." I should think that the Government would hesitate before perpetrating such a crime as that on people who have not shown any disloyalty, people who have not in any way broken the law, but who have lived up to their agreement to the fullest extent. Is the Government of Canada not strong enough to say that so long as these people keep their part of the contract, the Government will keep its part? If these people are to be disfranchised, then this Bill should go one step further and relieve them of taxation; because without representation taxation is a very dangerous thing. We know that the American revolution was brought about by taxation without representation.

Hon. Mr. GILLMOR: It was brought about by a German too.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: So much the better.

Hon. Mr. GILLMOR: He could not talk English.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH: Some members of the Government to-day are acting very much like Germans, or we would not have any legislation like this. By the vote in this House on the Canadian Northern Railway Bill, these people are subjected to untold millions of taxation, and the Government says to them: "We have done that, but we are not going to let you have a say as to our conduct or in condemnation of that act.

I say that they should be relieved of taxation so long as you deny them the right of the franchise. The Government could very well employ their time in a way which would be much more commendable to the soldiers in the trenches and the people of this country, if they were to take up and deal with the problem, which they will have to face before very long, of devising some means of taking care of the returning soldiers. I am sure that would go much farther towards winning the war than this Bill would. This is called the win-the-war Bill; but I think it has been brought in from some ulterior motive, and not to win the war. Causing disunion amongst the people of this country is not the way to win the war. If the Government have money, instead of voting away untold millions, as they did the other day, they could make provision for the better care of the soldiers when they return.

As I said, I did not intend to speak on this question at all; but these things have just occurred to my mind. This Bill, I think, could well be laid aside, and the soldiers, who have been given the vote, can safely depend upon the Canadian people, the British subjects in Canada, to pass judgment upon the other acts of the Government during the last six or seven years. The Government are afraid of the condemnation of the people of the country on their past acts, and they therefore raise the cries of "loyalty" and "win the war." Who on that side of the House will say he is more loyal than the members on this side? No man on this side would dare charge any honourable gentleman opposite with disloyality; and yet we have just as good reason for doing so as honourable gentlemen opposite. The honourable gentlemen opposite have no patent claim on the loyalty of this country, and they never had, though they make a loud cry of that kind. I say we are all willing to do all we can to win the war, and I claim that to disfranchise any British subjects in this country in the way which is proposed will do harm, more harm perhaps than honourable gentlemen conceive. These people have been good contributors to the Red Cross, the Patriotic Fund, and all that.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: And to taxation.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH: And they have had to pay their taxation. I suppose they continue paying taxes, but who can blame them if they resent legislation of this kind by withholding the voluntary contributions they are called upon to make to funds such as the Red Cross, the Patriotic Fund, and such like? By the proposed legislation you are doing more harm to the soldiers in the trenches than you are conferring benefits. I would like to see the honourable leader of the Government take into consideration the request that the Government forego the many vexatious clauses in this Bill, and try to keep the people united. The people would all cheerfully do in the future as they have done in the past: they would put their hands into their pockets when any call is made upon them for any contribution to help in winning this war.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: What has the Opposition to say to that? Are they still deaf and dumb?

Hon. RAOUL DANDURAND: It will be recognized by all that the franchise is the essential foundation of democratic institutions. What distinguishes democratic institutions from autocracy if not rule of the majority of the people? If a Government claiming to be the expression of the popular will can tamper as it likes with the franchise, then to my mind, and to the mind of every right-thinking man, democracy is gone. If absolute equality among the people of a particular country is disturbed through arbitrariness, by the manipulation of the franchise, then what results if not autocracy? Surely the majority rules no more; and if the people of a country come to realize that the majority will not rule any longer, will not the Government authority fall into disrepute and contempt? If the Government can, by enfranchising or disfranchising at its will certain groups of the population secure re-election, can it not continue that process indefinitely? And if it can do so, then will it be claimed that we are living under democratic institutions? What difference would there be between that system and kaiserism, which we are now denouncing and fighting against?

The new Franchise Act, as we have it, secures the soldier a vote, but allows at the same time the male civilian his vote. So far so good. But it proceeds to give the soldier's mother, wife, sister, or other relative a vote, while it refuses a vote to the rest of the female population. Since on the feminine side only the relatives of the soldiers will be allowed to vote, why not be logical and on the masculine side stop at the soldiers? If on the masculine side you not only give the vote to the soldiers, but go beyond that, why should you not, in dealing with the feminine side, go beyond the soldier's family? What difference is there between those two parts of the electorate—the feminine and the masculine? On the masculine side all may vote, soldiers and civilians; on the feminine side the soldiers relatives may vote, but not the rest of the female population. I ask, why not do the thing entirely? Why not carry the principle to its logical conclusion, and prevent the male civilian from voting and allow only the soldiers and their relatives to vote? That would be in accordance with the procedure in the time of the decadence of Rome and of the Roman cohorts, which imposed their nominee upon the nation. The Canadian cohort then would select its ruler.

We are told that this Act has for its aim simply to give a preponderance to the soldier and his family. Is this not a very arbitrary rule, and is it not somewhat tyrannical towards the rest of the population? I said that we would have an extraordinary franchise. There is still a worse element: it is that while men in Canada must all vote in their own ridings, strangers to Canada may vote where they please. Is this not the worst form of electoral practice? We have devised all kinds of penalties to prevent ballot-plugging and ballot-switching. Are we not now, by allowing the non-resident elector to switch his vote to where he pleases, making an attempt to organize the non-resident soldiers into a ballot-plugging and ballot-switching brigade? I am convinced that if the non-resident voters are made aware of the role which this Act intends to have them play, they will refuse to play it. The non-resident electors cannot vote intelligently without being coached, or else they will not know where to poll their votes. I would ask any member of this honourable House, if he were called upon to poll a vote from his place in Halifax in one of the ridings in British Columbia, not knowing anybody there, and not knowing the constituency, how would he be directed except by a friend who would coach him? If I were asked to poll a vote in Nova Scotia, I would know about Halifax, but I would not know the candidates nor the conditions. Yet by the franchise which we are now creating we legalize the worst practice. 10,000 non-residents, duly coached, may contribute 500 votes to each of 20 doubtful ridings and tip the scale, which it seems to me is loading the dice with a vengeance.

I cannot help stating that I believe these two measures, the one which was passed last week and this one, to be bad in principle and bad in aim. "But," we are told, "you must not judge this measure in the light of ordinary commonsense or ordinary practice; it is a war-time measure."

An Hon. SENATOR: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: An honourable gentleman says, "Hear, hear." I desire to draw the attention of my honourable friend to the fact that in war-time, when the Government of a country asks its people to make the supreme sacrifice, the Government should then, if ever, have the respect of the people. It will have that respect only if it plays the game fairly and does not manufacture for itself and according to its fancy a special electorate. What strength would the Government have to order men to cross the Atlantic and risk their lives that democratic principles may survive, if the Government holds power through the violation of those very principles?

In another place a cabinet minister expressed the hope that through this measure the win-the-war party would succeed—he meant his own party. This verily lacks modesty. The record of the present Administration for the past three years hardly justified such bumptiousness.

Have we not the official statement that a coalition was offered to the leader of the Opposition, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and is there not in that an admission that the Opposition and its leader can help to win the war? It is only too true that a commoner may be tempted into presenting amendments to the Franchise Act in order to make his return easier; but why has the Senate of Canada been created or constituted, if not to try to hold the scales even between the diverse sections of the population? If we fail in that essential duty of ours, will not the people ask what is the extent of our usefulness? I know that when men go back upon their past history and examine into their conscience they recall actions of which they would not boast after 25 or 30 years; and I am convinced that no one who took part in the gerrymander of 1882 to hive their opponents and so distribute the vote as to have a minority maintain the Government would to-day admit that this was a proper action; and, although I am not ready to sit in judgment upon them as Commoners fighting the battle of their party in the other Chamber, I feel that the Senate did fail in its duty in 1882 in passing such an Act, which had the effect of giving a minority of the electorate control of the Government of this country for the following parliamentary term.

In the present instance, on the eve of an election, we on this side of the Chamber are lookers-on, and we behold the manufacture of a franchise for the ostensible purpose, as stated by the framers of the Bill, of making the way clear for the Government of the day. Well, as has been stated by my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. McHugh) who has just preceded me, the only one I have had the pleasure of hearing, to govern is to foresee, and one who wishes to play the part of a statesman must think of the morrow. Have we thought well and seriously of the effect of this legislation upon the country in general and upon a number of people who have come into this country within the last 20 years, in order to settle here and make this country their home, and who are disqualified by this Act? I would draw the attention of my honourable friends to paragraph h of the proposed section 136, which says:

> Every naturalized British subject who was born in any European country (whether or not the sovereign or government thereof is in alliance with His Majesty in the present war) whose natural language, otherwise described as "mother tongue," is a language of an enemy country, and who was naturalized subsequent to the 31st day of March, 1902, is disqualified from participating in the election. This, on the face of it, states that British naturalized electors who belong to countries that are fighting on our side are disqualified, if they happen to speak the German language. That includes Russians who are fighting our battles, the Russian Poles, and a number of Poles from Austria and Prussia who have been in open rebellion against their own country.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Greeks; the Balkan states.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It takes in the Serbians and the Roumanians, a great many of whom speak the German language.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Italy.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: And at the same time it disqualifies people of a nation which has been given privileges in this country since the war began, whose citizens have not been interned, but have been treated as Allies, the brave little Czech nation, hemmed in between Austria and Germany, and with its leading parliamentary representatives in jail, condemned to death, some of them executed, and many of them refugees in Paris, New York and Chicago, editing newspapers defending the Allies and pleading for the independence of Bohemia. It includes the Italians of the Trentino and Dalmatia, in and around Triest. I wonder if, instead of working towards the unification of this country, we are not rather sowing seeds of discontent and division which may unfortunately be of lasting effect.

For these reasons I intend to support the amendment of my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Bostock), and I ask the majority in this chamber which supports the Government in this House, to ponder over their own responsibility, which has been transferred from this side of the House to their shoulders. They have come here, a number of them, under the ægis of the truce which allowed to this Parliament another year of life. They have had during that year the good-will of the leader of the Opposition and the Opposition itself in the House of Commons. This should show them that there has been a sentiment of union permeating this country, and should remind them of the danger of tampering with the franchise, and doing so in a way to create rancour in the minds of a portion of the electors. I know that they are sufficiently fair-minded, if not too much tied down by party feeling and party affiliations, to look with favour upon any amendment which would improve this Bill.

The amendment of Hon. Mr. Bostock was negatived on the following division:

The main motion was agreed to on the same division reversed, and the Bill was read the second time.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into Committee on the Bill. Hon. Mr. Daniel in the Chair.

On section 1—Part I of the Dominion Elections Act suspended, and Part II to operate as amended:

Hon. Mr. POWER: When the Military Voters' Bill was before us we struck out the word "complete" before "demobilization," and I trust that the leader of the Government will not object to striking it out in the present case. The word is the less necessary now, because if left out the clause would read:

During the present war and until demobilization after the conclusion of peace.

I would move that the word "complete" in the fourth line be stricken out.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We accept that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The section as amended was agreed to, from line 4 to line 15.

On subsection 2 of section 32 of paragraph c:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The word "Canada" in the twenty-eighth line should read "the province."

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I have been very serious about this Bill all day. I want to poke a little fun at it now. Does the Government contend that thirty days residence is sufficient to qualify a voter? In years past every member who has gone to the House of Commons has known that it has taken a year's residence to qualify. Is the Government now going to provide in a Bill that any stranger, any straggler, can settle down in a shack or a boarding house for thirty days before the issue of the writ, and in that way become entitled to a vote? Let us poke fun at that. Of course, the Bill is going to pass.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If my honourable friend is going to indulge in an exercise of that kind, I direct his attention to the fact that we are serious.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: But the Bill is not serious in giving the right to any man to vote after thirty days' residence. A man may be there for that purpose and put in thirty days at a boarding house. I have seen it done in the city of Montreal, in municipal elections. An alderman would go to a hotel and engage thirty or forty rooms, and get every clerk he could get hold of to register there for thirty days. This is the same thing. It is ridiculous.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I beg to move that the following words follow after the word "election" in line 30:

Provided that the requirements of this section as to domicile shall apply only to such provinces as by their law applicable to provincial elections require domicile as one of the qualifications of an elector.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: What is the qualification of the different provinces now with regard to residence?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Each province will have its own qualification. Some of the provinces require domicile and others require residence.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: In the province of British Columbia it is only six months. How would this provision work out? Would it make it necessary to be there a year?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is only in the event of the provincial law not making any provision.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I should like to know why the province of Quebec is excepted in this.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am informed that the reason is that the province of Quebec has its own law respecting domicile and not residence.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: That is no reason for excepting it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: As I understand, there is no provision as to residence under the Quebec law.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: You have both residence and domicile in the section. Quebec has its provision with respect to domicile or residence.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We except the province because it has not the two qualifications.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I cannot follow my honourable friend at all.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Does my honourable friend say that the provincial qualification in Quebec is that of residence, or that of domicile?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: There are dispositions with regard to both.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Subsection 1 and subsection 2 seem to be all right.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: All I can say is that we are advised by the law officers of the Crown that it is necessary, and I am going to ask that it be put in the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Cannot the honourable gentleman let that clause stand until we have further information?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not mind letting it stand.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Subsection 1 is a general section, and under that section Quebec is taken care of. Subsection 2 does not relate to Quebec at all. It relates to the other provinces.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Why does it not relate to Quebec?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Quebec does not need this exception at all.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Why not?

Hon. Mr. POWER: The section only applies to a province where there is no relevant or applicable provision to the contrary. Where there is no provision with respect to residence—of course, it does not apply to Quebec.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Quebec is fully provided for.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Where there is no provincial rule about it, it shall be residence for one year in the province, and residence and domicile in the electoral district for thirty days. I think that is perfectly clear.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Why make fish of one and flesh of the other? If it is going to take a whole year's residence in Quebec to have the right to vote, why would it not be the same in the other provinces?

Hon. Mr. POWER: So it is.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: "Thirty days."

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: That is in the riding.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: It takes a whole year in the province of Quebec in the riding. A man has to be on the municipal list. He has to be in the municipality a year before he gets on the municipal list. In the province of Quebec it will take a whole year and in the other provinces a man will be able to go and sit down for thirty days, probably go to a fishing club or a hunting club, and he will have the right to vote. It is not fair play to the people of Canada. I think the leader of the Government should find out where he is.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: Subsection 3 of section 32 says:

In the province of Quebec, notlithstanding anything in this Act contained, the qualifications as to domicile of female voters shall be domicile on the date of the said writ of election.

If the lists were made about eighteen months ago, would that disqualify all those who were domiciled in a certain place and who since that time have changed their domicile?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If my honourable friend will look at the amendment he will see, if he is correct, that this will not alter it in any way. It simply makes it doubly certain that the requirements of the law shall guide us.

Hon. Mr. POWER: The point raised by the honourable gentleman from Mille Iles (Hon. Mr. David) deals with the question of female voters, of whom there are only a very few in the province.

The amendment was agreed to, and subsection 2 of section 32 as amended was agreed to.

On paragraph d of section 1, (subsection 1 of section 33A)—qualifications of female voters:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am going to ask that an amendment be made to this paragraph. It is made at the suggestion of Mr. Bureau, who, in the House of Commons, asked the Government to have it made clearer. It is proposed to strike out all the words after the word "war" in the 13th line of page 2, and to substitute the following:

Provided that this section shall not apply to the wife, widow, mother, sister or daughter of a person no longer serving as aforesaid, unless such person has died in or has been honourably discharged from such service, or, in the case of an officer, has died in or has been permitted to resign from such service, or has been dispensed by competent authority from further service, or, in any case, has died after honourable discharge, resignation by permission or dispensation from further service, as aforesaid.

Mr. Bureau seem to think that the language used there is somewhat complicated and has suggested this section, which we have accepted.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It is the same idea. I cannot see any difference.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He seemed to think that the language was somewhat complicated, and would lead to difficulty, and suggested that the clause be redrafted.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I move that the same clause be further amended by adding the following:

And provided, further, that one vote only shall be allowed for any one person who is thus serving or has served as aforesaid, and that such vote shall be restricted to the person first above enumerated who happens to be qualified as aforesaid.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am sorry I cannot accept my honourable friend's amendment.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The object is to give one vote instead of giving half-a-dozen or a dozen votes. For my part, I think it is objectionable to give so many votes. A large number of persons who have enlisted in this country have done so because the pay was higher than they would obtain in the United States or in Great Britain. In the United States the pay is only $15 a month, as compared with $1.25 a day here. In Great Britain the pay is still less, or about the same—one shilling a day, I think. So we are dealing with a number of persons who have enlisted here because the pay is higher, and we are giving to these persons a large number of votes.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I quite agree with the honourable gentleman from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) that this change should be made. I had an amendment to suggest, which perhaps the honourable gentleman would be willing to accept, and which I think is more easily followed. My impression is that the intention of the draftsman of the Bill was that only one female person should vote; but the wording of the clause is such that it would let in the wife, the mother, the sister, the daughter, perhaps half-a-dozen sisters and daughters. What I think was the intention was that the nearest female relation should vote. If the honourable gentleman from De Salaberry does not mind, I would suggest that we strike out from the eighth and ninth lines the words, "wife, widow, mother, sister or daughter," and insert instead the words, "nearest female relation." That would give a vote to the nearest relative, whether she is a wife or mother or whatnot. I trust that that was the intention of the draftsman of the Bill.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He does not seem to have expressed himself so.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Because I hardly think it could be the intention to allow half-a-dozen women to come in and vote besides the man himself.

Hon. Mr. GILLMOR: Is only one sister to vote, or can three or four sisters vote?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The whole dozen.

Hon. Mr. GILLMOR: All the sisters?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Yes.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is just as expressed in this Bill.

Hon. Mr. GILLMOR: It says, "sister"; it does not say "sisters."

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The amendment proposed by the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Power) would not be acceptable, and I will tell the honourable gentleman why. He does not say one vote to the nearest relation, and it would be possible for several sisters to have votes. I think my amendment is quite correct.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I think the only way to decide is to accept neither.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: If the committee would take this clause into grammatical consideration, they would find that the draftsman of the Bill, whoever he may be, meant that only one female vote should be allowed in the case of each soldier. What is the construction of that phrase?

> Every female person shall be capable of voting and qualified to vote who.... as the case may be, is the wife, widow, mother, sister or daughter.

She cannot be all at the same time; she cannot be a widow and a wife at the same time. Therefore the clause does not say the vote is for both the wife and the widow, but the wife or the widow; wife, widow, mother, sister—and now we find the essential disjunctive conjunction "or." From the grammatical point of view, any educated man on the Bench will seize the point that only one of five females would have the right to vote. If the clause said, "wife, widow, mother, sister and daughter," then, according to the grammatical construction of the phrase, the whole five would have the right to vote; but, according to the grammatical construction of this phrase, owing to this disjunctive conjunction, only one of the five has the right to vote. That is my view. This question will have to be submitted to the courts, and it will depend upon what kind of man there is on the Bench—whether he knows his grammar or not. If he does not know his grammar, he will allow the votes of all five; if he is an educated man, knowing his grammar, he will say only one, because the wording is, "wife, mother, sister or daughter." Any honourable gentleman in this House who knows his grammar will agree with me with regard to that. While I am on my feet, may I make another remark. I think the honourable leader of the Government, who is an educated man, will admit that there is a piece of bad grammar in this:

> Every female person shall be capable of voting and qualified to vote at a Dominion election in any province or in the Yukon Territory who, being a British subject... is the wife, widow, mother, sister or daughter of any person, male or female.

Now, how can a female be the wife or the widow of a female? That word "female" ought to be struck out. There is no sense in it. I would ask the honourable leader of the Government to have that word struck out. We do not want it supposed that the Senate of Canada is composed of men who do not know their A, B, C's. I think some of you gentlemen ought to go to the bilingual schools and learn them.

Hon. Mr. POWER: The honourable gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran) said a while ago that he proposed to have a little fun with this Bill.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: So I am.

Hon. Mr. POWER: And, as he says, he is having it now.

Every female person shall be capable of voting... who is the wife, widow, mother, sister or daughter of any person, male or female,

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: How can she be her own wife?

Hon. Mr. POWER: She may be either sister or daughter. Of course, there is an objectionable point, that all of these persons, the wife, widow, mother, sister and daughter, may vote. The qualification is that the voter must be the wife, mother, sister or daughter; but if there are half-a-dozen different daughters, they will all vote, because each one of them can say that she is the daughter of a male voter.

The amendment of Hon. Mr. Béique was negatived, and subsection 1 of section 33A was agreed to.

On subsection 2 of section 33A—part of naval forces excepted:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: What is the object of the reconstruction of this clause? Why is there any more objection to giving them the vote if they become members after the passing of the Act than there is to giving them the vote if they become members before?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: To stop the manufacturing of votes, that is all.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I thought the purpose of the Act was to get as many votes as possible?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: There is a limit.

Subsection 2 of section 33A was agreed to.

On paragraph e of section 1—provincial disqualifications not adopted:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: These are in the present law.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: What effect would that have with regard to the law in the province of British Columbia?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The law is to be as the Chairman has just read.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: But the difference, as I see it, is that in the ordinary way we take the provincial voters' lists, while under the proposed Act these lists are to be made up by an enumerator, if I understand the situation rightly.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Then, if the enumerator thought it was of advantage to put Chinamen and Indians on the list, he could do so.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend ought not to have any apprehension in that respect, because the questions of age, race and residence are all decided by the provincial law.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: But you exclude that, under paragraph iv.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Under the law of the province of British Columbia:

Every male of the full age of twenty-one years, not being disqualified by this Act or by any other law in force in this province, and—

(a) Being entitled within this province to the privileges of a natural-born British subject; and

(b) Being able to read this Act, or any portion thereof, to the satisfaction of the Registrar, if required by such Registrar so to do; and

(c) Having resided in this province for six months, and in the electoral district in which he claims to vote for one month of that period immediately previous to sending in his claim to vote as hereinafter mentioned; and

(d) Being duly registered as an elector under the provisions of this Act,— shall be entitled to vote at any election.

There is a clause further on specially excepting Chinamen, Japanese, Hindus and Indians.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If my honourable friend will look at line 3 on page 2, he will see that:

Every female person shall be capable of voting and qualified to vote at a Dominion election in any province or in the Yukon Territory, who, being a British subject and qualified as to age, race, and residence as required in the case of a male person in such province.

Clause 32 of section 1 makes provision as to the qualifications.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK (reading):

No Chinaman, Japanese, Hindu, or Indian shall have his name placed on the register of voters for any electoral district, or be entitled to vote at any election.

But a number of these Chinamen come from Hong Kong and are practically British subjects, and a number of them can read. If the test of the Act were applied to them, it would be found that they could read, that they have been in the district six months and in the province a year; so that their names could be put on the list, and they would be entitled unless they were specially excluded.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It all depends upon the law of the province. If the law excludes them they cannot be put on.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The law of the province clearly excludes them as a class, but under paragraph iv of 33B the exclusion is not to obtain.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: That is how I read it.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Let me read 33B:

> No person possessed of the qualifications generally required by the provincial law to entitle him to vote at a provincial election shall be disqualified from voting at a Dominion election merely by reason of any provision of the provincial law disqualifying from having his name on the list or from voting.

So that if it were not for this paragraph iv they ould be disqualified from voting; but I understand this paragraph removes that disqualification.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, if it were not for 33 B there might be some probability of their being entitled to vote. The whole policy of the Act is to maintain the qualifications enacted by the provincial legislation.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Then, if my honourable friend's contention is right, the other clause of the provincial Act, which includes:

> No sailor, marine or soldier on full pay in the imperial service whose name is placed on the register of voters for any electoral district, save and except those who live in houses or rented apartments and not within barracks or navy yards—would work disqualification in that way.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If the provincial statute enacts a non-qualification, then we cannot qualify them. The first duty of the enumerator will be to ascertain what the qualifications of provincial voters are, and to embody them as the basis of his list.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Then those sailors or soldiers who happen to be in Esquimalt at the time of voting will not be qualified to vote?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I think they would be.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Section 33 B of the present law is in exactly the same terms as the amendment proposed. Why, then, is this section, with i, ii, iii, iv, included in the present law?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Because this comes from Part I of the Dominion Elections Act, which is suspended under section 1 of this Bill; consequently we take this from Part I, and put it into Part II.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It is word for word the same.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is meant to be. The whole of Part I of the Dominion Elections Act is suspended; consequently we carry the clauses that are necessary to a proper enactment of this law to Part II.

Hon. Mr. POWER: The honourable leader of the Opposition suggests that under iv a Chinaman or Indian might vote, and I think he is right.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: He could not vote if he were not qualified under the provincial Act. These paragraphs, i, ii, iii, iv, are simply repetitions of what is in the Act now. They were passed simply to get clear of the provincial legislation that was passed in Nova Scotia, when the anti-Confederation party was in power, which referred to any person under pay or working for the Intercolonial railway, and all that. That is what this provides for. If you have the qualification of the Provincial Act, then you are not to be struck off for any of these reasons.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: If a person is qualified as stated in 33B, but disqualified under the provincial Act, then he is qualified under this section.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Yes.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: No matter what disqualification there is under the provincial Act, whether he is a Chinaman or anything else, he can vote under this Act if he is possessed of the qualification required to make him a provincial voter.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If he is possessed of the required qualification he cannot be disqualified. If he is non-qualified by the provincial Act it is quite plain that he cannot be qualified by this Act.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Does that man you speak of vote at a Dominion election?

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: He does not, because he is disqualified under the provincial law, for some reason and for certain purposes, but he has the necessary residential qualification.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Assume that he is qualified to vote at the provincial election, if the provincial law says that a man working on the Government railway or holding an office in the Marine and Fisheries Department, and so on, shall not vote, he will get in under this law.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: What about the Chinaman?

Hon. Mr. ROSS: This does not let in a Chinaman.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend fails to draw the distinction between non-qualification and disqualification. Now, a Chinaman is non-qualified. A voter may be disqualified, for instance, because the provincial statute may say that a Dominion employee in British Columbia shall be disqualified from voting, but that enactment would not disqualify him from voting in a Dominion election; that is the distinction.

Hon. Mr. POWER: It is just as well to let the Chinaman vote, anyway.

Section 33B was agreed to, to end of paragraph iv.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I wish to move an amendment to section 33B, which will be known as subsection 2 and come in after line 39, page 2, as follows:

(2) No person whose son or grandson is serving or has served as in section 33a provided shall, by reason of the lack of any income or property qualification required by the provincial law, be deemed non-qualified to vote at a Dominion election, but all such persons, being otherwise qualified as required by this Act, shall be entitled to vote at any Dominion election.

I understand that in the province of Nova Scotia, for instance—I am not sure as to the other provinces—there is an income qualification and a property qualification. Now, we are making provision that the persons mentioned here shall not, by reason of not having the income required by the provincial franchise, be disqualified to vote at the Dominion election.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That is confined to soldiers?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

The amendment was agreed to.

On paragraph f—posting proclamation:

Hon. Mr. POWER: What is the effect of that?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is to lengthen the time allowed for the posting of the proclamation from eight days to ten days, before the day fixed in the writ for nomination of candidates.

Paragraph f was agreed to.

On paragraph g—subdivision of electoral district into polling divisions:

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I wish to move an amendment to this paragraph g. At present all the provinces, with the exception of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, have a judicial revision of the list, either before or after the election.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Is my honourable friend speaking of revision, or registration?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I am speaking of the preparation of the lists. They have such a revision in Ontario and Quebec, the lists being closed at a time before that. In the western provinces and in Prince Edward Island the lists will be made by the enumerator, taking the provincial lists as the basis to start from; but in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia there are certain revisers to prepare the lists; and there is an appeal from these revisers to the sheriff, and then the list is closed. Once on a time the sheriffs in Nova Scotia were appointed by the judges, and were non-political appointments, and good men remained in office permanently; but some twenty-five years ago the provincial legislature took the appointment of the sheriffs out of the hands of the judges, and since that time they have all been political appointments. Now, the only remedy we have against that in Nova Scotia is that where the sheriff leaves you off the list—one need not say wrongfully—he is liable to a fine of $200 if it is done wilfully; but there has never been a conviction.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: There could not be.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: All that I ask for Nova Scotia and New Brunswick is that they be given a judicial revision—a chance to go before a judge. In asking that, I do not ask for anything for one political party that the other political party does not get. Both parties would be on a basis of perfect equality, and I cannot see why there should be any objection to that. Prince Edward Island has had it, and I think New Brunswick and Nova Scotia should have the same. By striking out the words "Nova Scotia and New Brunswick" we will get this result, that every province in the Dominion, so long as this Act lasts, will have a judicial revision of the list, either before or after the Dominion election. I therefore move that the words "Nova Scotia and New Brunswick" be stricken out.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Subsection g does not in any way deal with any kind of revision; it merely has regard to polling divisions.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: It all comes to the same thing.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: If the honourable gentleman moves the amendment to subsection g of section 33, he may compel us to vote against it; but if he moves it later on we may support it. Section 65A deals with the lists of voters. That is the only place where my honourable friend can propose the amendment which he now suggests.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I am satisfied that the three sections should be taken together. I want this amendment made on page 2, again at the foot of page 7, and again on page 9. The sections are all interlocked.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I understand that the honourable gentleman wants to put the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick in the same position as the province of Prince Edward Island and the four western provinces.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: If I can understand this Bill—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I should have thought it would have been a Bill after my honourable friend's own heart, it is so complicated.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I have no objection to this, but let it apply to all the provinces. If you leave the enumerator in one province to strike out names or add names to the list, without any judicial control—

Hon. W. B. ROSS: They would all be on the same footing—Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and the western provinces.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I trust that the committee will not accept that amendment, because there has been no complaint as to the operation of the existing law in Nova Scotia. Under this Act, we have the provincial lists to go by. As I understand the amendment, it would be a sort of a go-as-you-please for the enumerator.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I do not agree with the honourable gentleman that there are no complaints in the province of Nova Scotia. To my certain personal knowledge, there have been complaints for over twenty years.

A great deal of dirty work has been done by partisan sheriffs, and there has been no way of getting at them. I would not make any proposal that was not fair to both parties. The proposition which I am making, if anything wrong is done, gives the Liberal party the same right and the same position as it gives to the Conservative party. There is not a jot or tittle of difference between the two. There is elaborate provision made for enveloping votes and for allowing candidates and their agents to make objections. It would give uniformity and would be a much more satisfactory and judicial way of dealing with the vote.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I cannot agree with my honourable friend at all. He is not going to accomplish the purpose he has in mind, if he does what he proposes. Subsection g deals with polling divisions, not with voters, and includes Quebec and Ontario.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: What I want is to have Nova Scotia and New Brunswick on the same footing as Prince Edward Island, and as Alberta and the other western provinces.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: With regard to what?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: The polling division, the vote, and the judicial review.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: What have the sheriffs in Nova Scotia to do with establishing polling divisions? My honourable friend tells us that in Nova Scotia the sheriffs are partisan, and are tinkering with the lists. What has that to do with polling divisions?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: May I draw the attention of the honourable gentleman to the fact that he jumps with both feet into a clause, and on the pretext of uniformity asks us to strike Nova Scotia and New Brunswick from the clause which was passed by the House of Commons when members from those provinces seem to have taken no objection. He asks us to go it blindly, without understanding the first word about it.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I do not exactly understand this. The honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. Mr. Ross) talks about a judicial revision. If I understand this Act at all, there is no provision for a judicial revision. The enumerator makes up the list and posts it at the post office or some other place under this Act, and, if your name is not on the list, the only thing you can do is to protest five days before polling day.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: That is what I say. There is no judicial revision. In the province of Prince Edward Island and the western provinces the judicial revision takes place after the election. If a man is struck off and claims that he should be on the list, he makes a certain affidavit and his vote is taken and put into the box. If there is a man on the list who the candidate thinks should be struck off, the judicial revision takes place on the recount. In Ontario and Quebec they have what is called a closed list. There is a day fixed, the review takes place on that list, and that is closed and forms the list for the election. The question of the polling booths is mixed up with the question of the lists that are now in existence, and under subsection g the returning officer will make the polling stations accord with the new lists as made up by the enumerator. The enumerator can take the provincial list and take any information he can get, and when he gets his list made up and posted, the returning officer can provide his polling stations to suit. If this amendment is not made in this section as well as elsewhere in the Bill, what I am asking for cannot be accomplished. What I want is a judicial review.

Paragraph g of section 33B, as amended, was agreed to.

On paragraph i—lists of voters by enumerators:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The last word in line 21 should be "division," not "district."

Paragraph h, as amended, was agreed to.

On paragraph i—lists of voters by enumerators:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am going to ask that another subsection be inserted at the end of this section, which will be subsection 3:

> Whether or not resident within the polling division, the enumerator, if qualified as an elector of the electoral district, shall add his own name to the list of voters, and he shall vote within such polling division, if at all, and at no other place.

This is to permit of this officer voting in the polling division where he spends the day.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Mr. Chairman, I want to draw the attention of the honourable leader of the Government to this. Section 45 of the Act reads:

> In the Yukon Territory, the enumerator, forthwith after taking the said oath, shall post up in six of the most public places within each polling division.

That is a provision making it necessary for the enumerator to give notice to the public that he is commencing his work; but it seems to be confined entirely to the Yukon. I was going to suggest to the honourable leader of the Government that he should adopt an amendment striking out the words, "In the Yukon Territory," and make the section applicable to all districts. It seems to me it is a desirable thing that the public should know that the enumerator has commenced his work.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Have we come to that point yet?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: We are dealing with section 46 of the Act, but this is section 45.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That is dealt with in section 48, is it not?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: No.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That proposed amendment is entirely unnecessary, because what is analogous to this is done in the other districts. I understand that the enumerator in other districts does the same thing in the last 15 days as the enumerator in the Yukon does in the 30 days. That is provided for in the Act.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: No; excuse me, There is no provision in the Act with regard to the other parts of the country.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Will my honourable friend look at paragraph j of section 1 of the Bill, amending section 48 of the Act.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: But 48 deals only with the enumerator after he has compiled his list and signed his name at the bottom, and sticks up a copy of the list in the post office. Then there are 15 days during which any person who finds that his name has not been placed on the list may apply to the enumerator and bring to his attention the fact that the name has been left off. But that is a different thing from what is provided for in section 45 with regard to the Yukon Territory.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Where is the difference?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The difference is that under 48 the enumerator takes his provincial list and proceeds, at his residence or somewhere else, to revise that list, but nobody knows what he is doing, or who he is or anything about him; whereas in the Yukon the enumerator puts up a notice first of all, when he commences his work, to say he has been appointed as the enumerator for that polling division. I think it is very desirable the public should have such notice in the other provinces as well.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: In the Yukon the enumerator does that as a preliminary, in an out-of-the-way place; but in the other provinces the enumerator prepares his list and signs the copies of the list 15 days before the polling day; two of the said copies he posts up in the most public places within the polling division, and another copy he retains for revision. The Act then provides the machinery for revising the list. It seems to me the provisions are most elaborate.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: As the honourable leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Bostock) has pointed out, section 45 provides for one thing and section 48 provides for an entirely different thing. Section 45 provides that, so far as the Yukon is concerned, the enumerator must not only give notice of his list when it is completed, but must also give notice of the fact that he has been appointed an enumerator and notice to the voters to come to him and have their names entered on the list. That is an entirely different thing from the notice the enumerator has to post up according to section 48.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Of course, the conditions are somewhat different in the Yukon.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: But, as pointed out by the honourable leader of the Opposition, if the provision is necessary in the Yukon, it must be necessary also in many other parts of Canada, where conditions are similar to those of the Yukon.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But my honourable friend will see that greater precautions, if such are regarded as necessary, are taken in the other provinces, on account of the difference of conditions. In the other provinces the enumerator posts up the actual list. He does not do so in the Yukon; he simply posts up a notice that he is going to prepare the list and that a revision of that list will take place at a particular time. In the various provinces the enumerator, 15 days before the polling day, posts up two copies of the list within the polling division, and he keeps a copy of the list and gives notice of a revision; so every precaution is thus taken. It seems to me that the precautions are much more elaborate in the provinces than in the Yukon.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I have had no experience in this matter of posting up lists, but I have known of such things as notices being posted up in a school house or a post office and being taken down again. In case the list posted up happens to be destroyed the public has no notice.

Hon Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But the candidates also are furnished with copies of the lists.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: In a large riding like Yale-Cariboo, the candidate would have a lot of trouble to notify all the people.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would ask my honourable friend if he would prefer to have the machinery which we have provided for the Yukon applied to the provinces, instead of what is provided for in section 48. Would he exchange?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: He wants both.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Why should the provinces not have the additional precautions?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If the honourable gentleman is satisfied with the Yukon provisions, we will take them.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I understand there is a difference as regards the provinces. In certain provinces there is a provincial list, as in Ontario and Quebec; but in the case of the western provinces, where there are no lists, I think the provisions should be similar to that for the Yukon, because the list has to be made up in toto, and therefore the officer who is called upon to prepare the list should give notice similar to that required in the Yukon.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: What is the objection to giving the notice? Would it do any harm to anybody?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It simply adds to the time. In the Yukon the election is a deferred election, and consequently additional time is given, but it is not so in the provinces.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: No complaint has arisen in the West.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This is the machinery under which we have carried on our elections in the Northwest in the days when they were the Northwest Territories. To-day they are Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I understand both parties in the West are thoroughly satisfied with the present arrangement?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: The thing is done out there as it was done under the late Government.

The amendment of Hon. Sir James Lougheed was agreed to, and paragraph i, as amended, was agreed to.

On subsection 1 of paragraph j—list to be posted up at post office or other conspicuous place:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: When are polling stations established? If there is no post office, the list has to be posted up in a conspicuous place "outside and adjoining the main entrance to such polling station." As I understand, it has to be done 15 days before the polling?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: But the polling stations are not established 15 days before?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED: Yes. They are ready before nomination day.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: "Polling stations" are not defined in the Bill. Should they not be defined?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The meaning is very well known.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: We have "polling division" defined as including "any polling subdivision, polling district or sub-district or territorial area for which there is a separate voters' list or in which a poll may be held." Now we import "polling station," and there is no definition of it.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: The polling station is where you vote.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I presume the honourable gentleman is reading paragraph f of section 2 of the Dominion Elections Act?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Yes, but should there not be a definition of polling station?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: No, because the term "polling division" is defined by parapraph f of the Act. In section 5 of the Bill the term "polling division" is used. If there are separate lists for two portions of the division, then each of them is to be treated as a polling district.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: Another provision in the Elections Act makes it necessary to announce these at the nomination. They are all read out at the nomination, and an announcement is made as to the building in which the voting shall take place. That is done in Ontario at least.

Subsection 1 of paragraph j was agreed to.

On subsection 3 of paragraph j—notice of place where enumerators may be found:

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Will the honourable leader of the Government allow me to call his attention to section 46 of the Act? In this copy of the Act, containing the amendments which have been adopted to section 46, are to be found in italics the words "at least," in line 29, but these words are not found in Bill 133. They have been left out of the Bill, and should be there, because more than three lists may be required. There may be several candidates, and two copies of the list must be posted up, and there may be four or five copies required.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: Where does that come in?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: It would come in at paragraph i, which we have passed.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If my honourable friend will look at the bottom of page 11, in paragraph t, he will find that the amendment has been made:

by inserting between the words "make" and "three" in the fifth line of section 46 the words "at least."

It is in pursuance of that amendment which my honourable friend has just read.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: How is it that it does not come in after section 42?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It was done in the House of Commons. The amendment was inserted after the Bill was drafted, and it relates back to that particular section.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Could the honourable leader of the Government give us any further information touching clause 3, regarding notice of place where enumerators may be found? An enumerator may be off in the woods or at some place where nobody could find him.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: He gives notice of where he can be found.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: That would not help matters if he were off in a swamp.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We must asume that when an officer is appointed to an important position of that kind he will not trifle with the public interest.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: It has been done.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The enumerator will have to designate the place where he may be found. It seems to me that we have to place reliance upon an enumerator to perform his duty. An officer who is manifestly derelict in his duty may be punished.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I have known of enumerators to go out of the way, so that they could not be reached.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: The Bill says the enumerator must designate "a place within the polling division and a time where and when electors may conveniently find him."

Hon. Mr. WATSON: How is he to be found if he is off in a swamp?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: That would hardly be "a convenient place."

Subsection 3 of paragraph j was agreed to.

On paragraph k—correction of voters' lists:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I understand from this paragraph that within five days of the election it cannot be done?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: So it must be done five days before the polling day, or it cannot be done at all.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That will be the tenth day of the fifteen days prior to the election; that will be the fifth day before the election. He posts up the list 15 days before, and the change must be made within 10 days.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Then, if he does not make the change within the 10 days, the only thing the elector can do—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He swears in his vote.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: On the polling day.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. So he is not deprived of his vote.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Is it open to the enumerator to make a change within four days of the election?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, I think not.

Paragraph k of section 1 was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. WATSON.

On paragraph l, section 1—attestation of lists and delivery to deputy returning officers:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: We would like to know what that means?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If my honourable friend has a copy of the Act before him, he will see the application of this amendment to sections 50 and 51. It simply extends the provisions that hitherto applied to the other provinces and places them in the same category.

Paragraph l, section 1, was agreed to.

Paragraph n, section 1—returning officer may act as deputy:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: What does that mean?

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: The returning officer may act as deputy, that is all.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He exercises that right in the western provinces, but it is now to be extended to the Dominion in cases where the returning officer sees fit.

Paragraph n, section 1, was agreed to.

On paragraph o, subsection 2—issue of certificate, entry in poll-book, and name added to voters' list:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The words in lines 43 and 44, "such person shall be permitted to vote in the ordinary manner," mean that he simply receives an ordinary ballot and puts it in the box in the ordinary way; it is not put in an envelope?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Not this.

Subsection 2 of paragraph o was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Does my honourable friend intend to go on through this Bill to-night?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: If my honourable friend from Middleton (Mr. W. B. Ross) is going to insist on the amendment which he proposed to paragraph g, I propose to discuss the matter at length. I am told that that amendment is in breach of an agreement that was made in the other House.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Certainly I intend to insist on the amendment.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I understand that the Nova Scotia Conservatives are very much excited over the undue advantage that they would get by these amendments.

I have seen sufficient of the game as it is played around the lobby just now to be convinced that there is an attempt at an undue advantage to be obtained in the closing hour of the session on this Bill, that has been rushed through the House of Commons by the closure.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Perhaps the honourable gentleman will be able to show me where one party gets the advantage of the other.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will answer my honourable friend by telling him that he has spoken of section 65A, which he wants to amend by striking out the words, "Nova Scotia and New Brunswick." Those are the provisions wherein the lists of Nova Scotia, Quebec, Ontario and New Brunswick are accepted as a basis, and the lists to which the enumerators may add. Now, the Hon. Mr. Meighen said in the other House:

We, however, extend that safeguard much further. Not only may a man vote to whom the enumerator has refused a vote— his vote to go in an envelope and he afterwards judicially reviewed, but the vote of any man who is put on by an enumerator and who the agent of any candidate claims should not be put on may be challenged by that agent by affidavit asserting his belief that the voter has not the right to vote and giving the reasons. If the agent does so that vote also goes in an envelope and is subject to the very same review. Consequently it will be seen that, while we adopt the provisions of the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta which have been in effect by Dominion legislation since 1905, we adopt safeguards against any work of the enumerator that might be objected to, with the ultimate result that the whole of the enumerator's work may, if desired, be subjected to judicial revision. It will, I think, appear to all that the objections that have heretofore been levelled, with some force, against the list-making provisions enacted in this House and applicable to Alberta and Saskatchewan, are eliminated in this Bill, and that such safeguards are provided as will render the making and operation of those lists absolutely fair.

I have covered the method so far as it applies to the four western provinces and Prince Edward Island. There are left the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. In those provinces the women are not on the list last made up. In the province of Ontario the list last made up was prepared last fall and completed, I believe, in December. It is only a male list. That list has also been judicially reviewed according to the Ontario law, and there is no reason for throwing that list away and making a new list by enumerators. This year's list will, of course, include some names of women. My words in that regard apply only to the counties of Ontario and to towns up to 9,000 population. In towns over 9,000 and in cities, there are no completed lists. Consequently, as to towns and cities in Ontario, another method of making the list has to be devised. First let me deal with the counties of Ontario. In the counties of Ontario there is a list covering all places except towns and cities over 9,000 population. That list has been made up and was revised judicially last December.

In Quebec, in the cities of Montreal and Quebec, there are also completed lists, and in all the rest of Quebec there are lists now approaching completion, and to be completed this month. Those lists should be kept in mind in conjunction with the Ontario lists in counties, because all are treated the same. Similarly in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia there are lists now complete.

The lists so made up of male voters all judicially revised in Ontario and Quebec and revised by the provincial methods in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, are by this Bill adopted, so far as they go. The only requirement as to them is to add such of the women as by this Bill are to be entitled to vote and to substract such of the men, if any, as, by reason of alienage, should not be entitled to vote. This is done by means of a system of enumeration similar to that adopted in the other provinces. The names of women are enumerated along the lines of the present Ontario Act. I am not speaking now of the cities of Ontario. I shall ask hon. members to keep the cities of Ontario until I get through with the counties of Ontario and with the provinces of Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. As regards these latter the lists are adopted and the enumeration only goes to the adding of the names of the additional women now entitled to vote and to the striking off of those who by reason of alienage, and nothing else, are disentitled to vote. That is the province and duty of the registrars or enumerators, whatever you call them, and that alone. They cannot in other respects affect those lists. The work of the enumerators to that extent, namely the adding of the women and the taking off of the men by reason of alienage, is subject to the same safeguards on election day as obtain in the four western provinces and in Prince Edward Island. That is to say, any one who is taken off by the enumerator and claims the right to vote, may, by taking the necessary oath on election day, vote, and his vote goes in an envelope.

This is a clear statement of the honourable the Secretary of State. Now, my honourable friend wants to strike out Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, in which lists are made, and wipe out the lists that are already made in order to give the enumerators the whole field over new lists to come.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Exactly what I said. t the honourable gentleman is stated in the extract he has just read. In Quebec and Ontario the lists are closed; there is a judicial revision. The method referred to by the Secretary of State is that the lists are made in Nova Scotia, starting about the 20th January, and are closed somewhere about the 15th of March. I do not know whether the honourable gentleman was in the House when I explained that there were revisers who do this work. Then there is an appeal from the revisers to the sheriff. I explained who the sheriffs were. At one time they were appointed by the judges and were fair-minded men. Nearly twenty-five years ago the provincial legislature took the appointment of the sheriffs out of the hands of the judges, and they are now political appointees, and the appeals on the lists in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia are from the revisers to the sheriff, and there is no judicial review at all. I have nothing to say against the statements of the Secretary of State, but I want that Nova Scotia and New Brunswick shall have the judicial review of the lists, just as Prince Edward Island, Alberta, Saskatchewan and those other provinces have.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But the lists are made.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Certainly, the lists were closed last March, and they will begin to make lists again some time in January next year. I say again that I cannot see, and it has not been suggested to me, how one party gets the slightest advantage over the other; that is to say, once you admit that you want fair play. But if there are persons who think that they have got the dice loaded, I do not think it is worth while considering them.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: If I were trying to load the dice in any way I could see the objection, but I am not asking for a single thing that does not operate as much for one side as for the other.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: How does my honourable friend explain the fact that this legislation, which was made and brought into the House of Commons under the supervision, and certainly with the solicitude, of the members sitting on the right of the Speaker, has not attracted the attention of the members of that House from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick as constituting a grievance for them? And when the Bill has been thus passed in the other House, and the lists as made and closed are accepted, why should we, when we are not au fait with the situation down there, spring any such important amendment? I could understand my honourable friend if there were a federal list, wanting to see to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick lists being on a line with those of the other provinces. But what I complain of now is that at this late hour, when the honourable leader of the Government is asking that we should go on with this Bill to-night because the Governor-General may be here in a day or two to sanction it, my honourable friend should bring in an amendment which may be of vast consequence, without this side of the House being informed at all as to the effect it may have.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I have no objection at all to the honourable gentleman discussing it as much as he likes, but what I want is that some person should point out what inequity there is in what I am proposing. It is a perfectly fair thing, and puts New Brunswick and Nova Scotia on the same footing as the other provinces.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My honourable friend's challenge is one that he knows we cannot accept. What does my honourable friend from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) or myself know of the conditions in Nova Scotia? What do we know about partisanship? What do we know about what he calls loaded dice?

Hon. Mr. W. B. ROSS: I did not say loaded dice; I said if a man had loaded dice.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: If he did not mean that somebody had loaded dice in Nova Scotia I do not know what he meant. The whole of the franchise under this Bill is predicated on the ground that we are to adopt the provincial franchise, but now my honourable friend comes at this hour and wants us to review the whole of the conditions in Nova Scotia, and to say that the mode of making the provincial franchise in Nova Scotia is not the correct one. He wants us to change that. He wants an exception made in regard to Nova Scotia, when it is admitted in regard to all the other provinces that the provincial franchise shall prevail; and he comes and insist that all that shall be done over again at this last moment, and done over contrary to what was done in the House of Commons, contrary to the distinct statement made by the honourable Secretary of State, which my honourable friend from De Lorimier read, and which I find in three or four other places in Hansard. It is in breach of what was done in the other House, of what appeared to be a distinct understanding with the members from the province of Nova Scotia.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I do not know of any understanding.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I object as strenuously as I can to the proposed amendment. My honourable friend wanted to start in early in the game, and was so anxious to get this thing through that, as I pointed out to the committee, he proposed this amendment to paragraph g, which has nothing to do with the selection of voters, makes no reference to voters, and deals exclusively with polling divisions. I say it is most unfair at this stage to propose such an amendment, and I hope that my argument will commend itself to the leader of the Government, and that he will not change the basis of this whole Act in order to accept the amendment of my honourable friend from Middleton, the effect of which will be to change completely the order of things in the province of Nova Scotia. I appeal to honourable gentlemen in this House, how many are there who know anything about the making of lists in the province of Nova Scotia except my honourable friend and other gentlemen from that province? He knows all about it, and we do not. Does my honourable friend think it is a fair game to propose something which only he himself knows anything about—to change the whole basis, the whole principle, of this legislation? I submit to the committee that it is most unfair.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: There might be something in the charge the honourable gentleman is making against me of hurrying if I had gone away from section 65A; but if he reads those sections where these words occur he will see they are all interlocked. As I explained, the key to the change I want is in 65A, but those polling divisions have also to be regulated under the Act in order to work out the change that I would ask for in 65A, which we have not got yet at all.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Does not the honourable gentleman admit that he alters the whole economy of the Bill as concerns New Brunswick and Nova Scotia?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: No, I do not. All I do with regard to those provinces is to provide that there shall be a judicial review there, as there is in Prince Edward Island and the western provinces. The amendment does not change the qualifications; but it gives us equality in the two provinces in the whole Dominion that have not got it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Does the honourable gentleman claim that he accepts those lists as of the 22nd of January?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: It may affect those lists. The enumerator might subtract from those lists, or he might add to them. What I say about that is that a Liberal can add to or subtract from that list just as freely as a Conservative; therefore he has nothing to complain of.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Except that the enumerators to revise those lists will be appointed by the federal government, will they not?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Under the Act as proposed, all that the enumerators can do in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia is to add the female voters to the list as already made; is that not so?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: That would be the change if you talk of fixed and closed lists.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The purpose of my honourable friend is not to accept the lists, but to make lists anew.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Yes, to add to and subtract from them. If they are loaded, nobody ought to complain.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I can understand the objections of my honourable friend if it were possible to exclude voters from the list; but under no possibility can a voter be excluded from the list, according to the methods laid down here. In the first place, he has the right to appeal from the list. The list can be added to or subtracted from. Then, in the next place, if a voter does not appear on the list, he can swear in his vote. He can go to the polling booth and tender his vote, and his vote is placed in an envelope there.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: And tied up.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, not tied up. Machinery is furnished for the opening of those envelopes.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: When?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Immediately after the election.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My honourable friend says that the lists in Nova Scotia are revised by sheriffs, and he objects to that. He says they are partisans.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He puts those two provinces in the same category as the other provinces.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: He says the sheriffs are partisans, and he wants new people to make the lists.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: With the right of appeal from the enumerator to a judge.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That is a departure from what we are doing in the other provinces.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: In Ontario and Quebec they have judicial revision.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My statement is that with regard to this Bill we accept the procedure adopted in each province as binding.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Are you doing that in Prince Edward Island?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My honourable friend says that is not satisfactory with regard to Nova Scotia, and he wants to set aside the provincial machinery and substitute machinery of his own—enumerators appointed under this Act. We do not do that with regard to Quebec, Ontario, or any of the other provinces. Why should we do it with regard to Nova Scotia? We do not know anything of the conditions which my honourable friend describes. They may be as he says; the sheriffs may be partisans; but we cannot go into that here.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: You can depend on a judge.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If my honourable friend desires to be consistent, why does he not take exception to doing this in British Columbia?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I do not know anything about Nova Scotia sheriffs or voters' lists.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We are doing the same thing with regard to British Columbia, Prince Edward Island and Manitoba. This machinery is absolutely new in those three provinces.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: It was new before.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Why could it not extend to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick? We are not changing the qualification.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That is not my complaint. My complaint is that you are discarding the provincial system.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We are discarding it in other provinces too.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, there is no provincial list; but there is in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. The lists are made by special machinery, emanating from the municipal councils, and when those lists are made by the municipal councils—and no one knows better how they are made than the honourable gentleman from Middleton—then there is an appeal to the sheriff. Those lists emanate from the municipal authorities. They are the basis of the lists. My honourable friend complains of the appeal to the sheriffs, because he thinks the sheriffs on certain occasions have been or may be partisan. He says: "I ask to wipe out those municipal lists which are the basis of the lists which will be used at the next election, and start anew with special enumerators." I draw the attention of the honourable gentleman to the fact that this Chamber is facing a most complicated Bill which was passed under closure in the other Chamber. It revolutionizes our whole electorate and franchise. My honourable friend comes here with a majority supporting the Government, and appetite grows as one eats. Surely my honourable friend will draw the line somewhere, and remember that in the dictionary there is such a word as decency.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend works himself up into a state of righteous indignation over something that seems to me to be absolutely inconsistent. He sat silent while we dealt with this same question in regard to other provinces.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: What provinces?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: British Columbia, Manitoba and Prince Edward Island. We are absolutely ignoring their lists. We are introducing the machinery on the statute book in Saskatchewan and Alberta, and are making it applicable to the other provinces. My honourable friend must see that new lists have to be made because we have introduced a class of voters, namely, the female relatives of these men, and so on, and these names have to be added to the lists. It is like putting new wine in old bottles. Why not apply the same machinery to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick that is applied in the other provinces? Has any reason been pointed out why the same machinery should not be applied? Is not uniformity desirable? Is not uniformity desirable, particularly in Dominion elections? Is there any good reason why this Parliament should not say that uniformity shall prevail throughout the whole Dominion in reference to the preparation of its lists, particularly when we have introduced elements into the franchise such as have been introduced in this particular Bill? It seems to me that to charge either the Government or my honourable friend with an absence of decency in this matter is not only exaggerating the situation, but aggravating it to a degree that is entirely indefensible.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend may try to save his face and that of his friends by holding seriously to the position that this is a fair treatment of the question and of the electorate. I still hold that it is not. My honourable friend, representing the Government which presented this Bill in the other Chamber, now takes the stand at this late hour that anything to ditch their opponents would be a fair thing—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, I do not say that.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: And, since things have been going easy, why not go the full length? My answer to my honourable friend is that of the Secretary of State, which I have read. So we have in the House of Commons a Bill presented by a representative of the Government who declares that the economy of this Bill is to accept the lists where they are made and closed. He says we shall disorganise the system as little as possible, simply adding the names of the women, and striking off those that he mentions. Now, this Bill had its three readings and went to the Committee under the twenty-minute-speech rule, and the gong sounded twice at two o'clock in the morning. This Bill has been pushed through, and it is very difficult of understanding. After this has been done my honourable friend says that it is fair to disarrange the economy of the Bill and that some advantage may be obtained by wiping out the old lists in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick and reverting to the enumerating system for making new lists.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: I should like to know if the honourable gentleman knows anything about the franchise law in Nova Scotia.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I wish I knew more about it.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: Judging from the honourable gentleman's remarks, I should say he does not know anything about it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I saw such a large smile coming over the face of my honourable friend, and the faces of his friends from Nova Scotia, that I realised right away that there must have been some political advantage in the proposal.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: The honourable gentleman has been consulting people outside of this House. The information he is getting is entirely inaccurate and unreliable. It comes from an unreliable source, as I could prove to my honourable friend in a few minutes, by documentary evidence. I advise him not to depend too much upon the statements made to him in regard to voters' lists. Take the case of the income voter who qualifies on residence and income. If you persist in excluding the operation of this law, you cut out every person—and there are thousands in the province—who qualifies on income and residence from the first day of January, 1917—practically a whole year's crop of voters.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend simply establishes the fact that there is a desire to alter the municipal lists as made and completed in Nova Scotia, if not in New Brunswick. My honourable friend is from Nova Scotia. The Secretary of State says that we accept those lists as the basis of the lists to be made; we will simply add the women's vote and take off the names of certain persons under this Act. We accept those lists, and I object very much to a revolution being brought about in those two provinces at this late hour by wiping out all those lists which have the municipal lists as their basis. When these lists are completed, there is an appeal to the sheriff.

Hon. Mr TANNER: Does my honourable friend call that an appeal? An appeal from three laymen to one layman—a partisan layman at that?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Under the Conscription Act I think there is an appeal from two judges on the exemption tribunals to one judge. Such a provision does not surprise me in a municipal matter such as the fixing of lists. That is what is ordinarily done throughout the country. The sheriff is a person who is out of politics.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: An absolute partisan.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Or who should be out of politics. The judge to whom my honourable friend would prefer to appeal is out of politics, or should be out of politics. I have sometimes heard that judges are not absolutely devoid of political feeling.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: Senators are, are they not?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: They should be. Now, I appeal to my honourable friend, who should be divested of partisan spirit. This Bill was prepared by the Government, surrounded by the best advisers they could get from each province, and the Government decided that the lists in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick should be the basis, and that under this Act there should be additions thereto and subtractions therefrom. Now we are asked, at this hour, to abandon the whole economy of the Bill, to strike out the lists of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick and allow the enumerators to make new lists. I say it is going rather far at this moment, when the Government has adopted and declared its policy and under that policy has carried the Bill through the Commons. The members from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick were there; Nova Scotia and New Brunswick are represented by Conservatives as well as Liberals, and they accepted that machinery. Why should the Senate now proceed to wipe out the lists in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick if not expressly to give a further party advantage? It seems that when you hear Conservative members in the other House saying, "Well, this is a peach of a Franchise Act," the line should be drawn at this point.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I was going to suggest that this clause be reserved until tomorrow, so that we may see whether we cannot make some suggestion which would be acceptable to both sides. I think it is rather unfair at this hour that, without proper information, we should be obliged to deal with this part of the Bill.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What I would be willing to do would be to go on with the Bill and reserve the amendment which my honourable friend has moved.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: That would be satisfactory.

The Hon. the CHAIRMAN: There has been no amendment moved to the clause under discussion.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No; we wandered away from it.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The honourable gentleman from Middleton might state the amendment which he proposed.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: To strike out on page 2, lines 47 and 48, the words, "Nova Scotia and New Brunswick." Then the last word on page 7, and the first words on page 8, "Nova Scotia and New Brunswick." Again, on page 9, in 65A, subsection 1, the first line, to strike out the words, "Nova Scotia and New Brunswick."

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: And the same words in lines 10 and 11?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. We will allow that proposed amendment to stand.

On subsection 3 of paragraph o, section 1 —Judge to decide as to right to vote:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved in amendment that on page 7, in line 33, after the word "division," the following words be added:

In recount proceedings it shall be presumed that any person to whom an enumerator has refused to issue a certificate of such person's right to vote in a polling division was not entitled to vote therein, and that any person whose name appears on the voters' list of a polling division was entitled to vote thein, and in the absence of any or of sufficient contrary evidence the judge shall decide and shall deal with the envelopes which contain the ballots of such persons, and with such ballots, in accordance with such presumption.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Will my honourable friend explain what is the object of that? I was not able to grasp it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It deals simply with the burden of proof in the case of those envelopes which are tied up. It states what in the absence of evidence the presumption shall be; that is to say, if the enumerator has refused to give a certificate to the voter, it shall be presumed that he was not entitled to vote. On the contrary, if his name appears on the list, it will be presumed that he had the right to vote. The case goes to the judge and the judge decides, but this amendment is for the purpose of getting the matter before the judge. The burden of proof must be fixed one way or the other.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: That does not do away with the necessity of the man whose vote is objected to being present. He would be kept waiting around just the same. The amendment would not make any difference in that respect?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No. If he does not appear, it simply states what the presumption shall be, and then the question goes before the judge, and is one entirely for the judge to decide.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I would suggest adding to the amendment, after the words "in recount proceeding," the words, "it shall be prima facie presumed that."

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We will accept that.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I would understand the amendment if it were in subsection 1, or subsection 2, where the vote is provisionally admitted, but I do not see why it is to be inserted in subsection 3.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend will see that we put it with the provisions respecting recount proceedings.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: But the amendment declares that it shall be prima facie admitted. The first part of the amendment is all right, but I am uncertain as to this part: "and that any person whose name appears on the voters' list of a polling division was entitled to vote therein."

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is a matter of procedure more than anything else, and is for the purpose of arranging for the procedure to be followed in dealing with the ballot itself.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Why does my honourable friend bring in this amendment?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Suppose a person who set this machinery in motion, whose vote is contested and is contained in the envelope, does not appear, or suppose that the person who challenges the vote does not appear. There is an envelope with a vote in it. What shall the judge presume? It is simply to lay down the rule of evidence; that is about what it amounts to.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: But it is provided in the first part of subsection 3:

If the enumerator is not satisfied as to such person's identity or qualifications he shall deliver to him gratis a signed declaration in the form W2.

That is in case the person applying cannot satisfy the enumerator that he is entitled to vote. Nevertheless, you give him the right to vote unless somebody can prove that he is not entitled to vote.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, he is entitled to vote, but his vote is sworn in and is placed in an envelope. There are the two kinds of cases; one is where the enumerator resists a person's assertion of his right to vote, and the other is where the enumerator is willing, but the vote is challenged.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: But we are dealing with the class of persons who are unable to satisfy the enumerator that they have a right to vote.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: In that case the vote is put in an envelope, so that the voter may, before the judge, if there is a recount, establish his right to vote. That is, it seems to me, the proper procedure. But by the amendment which the honourable gentleman moved that rule is reversed, and when the case comes before the judge this party will not have to establish his right to vote. His right to vote will be prima facie presumed, and it will be for the other party to prove that he was not entitled to vote. I think that is not the proper way to proceed.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It deals with both classes. There are two distinct classes of votes which may be placed in envelopes. There must be some presumption as to each. The burden of proof must fall on some one, and supposing the person does not appear, the judge must have the right to presume one thing or the other, for the purpose of determining the matter.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I would suggest that my honourable friend allow that to stand, so as to give us time to consider it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: For the purpose of continuity I should prefer to have the amendment carried, and if my honourable friend wants to go back to it later, I am quite willing that he should do so.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: It is difficult to understand. This whole Bill is difficult to understand.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It will be printed to-morrow, and if my honourable friend wants to reconsider that amendment, I am not going to raise any objection. But for convenience and continuity it is better to carry this now. It has been well considered.

The amendment of Hon. Sir James Lougheed was agreed to, and subsection 3 of paragraph o as amended was agreed to.

On subsection 4 of paragraph o, section 1 —challenge on ground of non-qualification or disqualification:

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: That is reserved.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Will the honourable gentleman allow the whole of that to stand?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We will adopt it as it is, and we can go back to it later. My honourable friend from Middleton will probably ask to-morrow that it be reconsidered.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But we are not adopting the amendments of the honourable gentleman from Middleton?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No; we are adopting the clause as it stands.

Subsection 4 of paragraph o, section 1, was agreed to.

On paragraph r, section 65A, subsection 2—basis of list of voters in Ontario:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: What is the effect of these references to Chapter 6 of the Revised Statutes of Ontario, 1914, and Chapter 4 of the Ontario Act, 1917?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They refer to towns of 9,000 and upwards.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I understand you disregard the Act of 1917, and stand on the Revised Statutes?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: What is the reason? If you adopt the provincial list, why not adopt it as it has been amended by the province?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There are no lists.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: The Act of 1917 provides an entirely new method of making up the lists. The last revised list is under the old Act, and was made by the municipal councils and revised by the judge. That is taken as the basis.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I understand that the list as it exists was made under the Revised Statutes of 1914 previous to these amendments?

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Cities and towns having a population of 9,000 and over are excepted; under what provision?

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: The provision of the old law was that in towns of over 9,000, before an election, there always shall be enumerators, and that is continued. In towns or cities there is no list made up from year to year, as in rural municipalities.

On subsection 3 of paragraph r, section 65A—Ontario voters' lists:

Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved to amend subsection 3 at line 13 on page 10, after the word "Act" by adding the words:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED.

Except the issuance in any necessary case of a certificate in form W3 under paragraph g of section 67.

The amendment was agreed to.

On subsection 3 of paragraph r—voters' registration boards to be boards of appeal:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: What are these?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They are the duly-constituted boards in Ontario—provincial boards. This whole clause is according to the provincial regulation.

On subsection 3 of paragraph r—delivery of lists to returning officers:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: What is section 62, referred to here?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is relating to the "tied ballot." That is the ballot that is placed in the envelope.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Is it not somewhat late to deliver lists to the deputy returning officer before six o'clock in the morning of polling day?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is pretty early to get up in the morning.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It strikes me that the deputy returning officers will receive the lists just as the poll is opening, or thereabouts, and that there will be very little time for the candidates to verify the authenticity of the lists.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They are delivered forthwith. If that is not done, we make provision specifically that they must be in the hands of the returning officer.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: This section seems to imply that the lists are closed four days before polling day.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The language is very ambiguous. It should be said that all such lists should be deemed closed four days before.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The Clerk of the Board of Appeal, four days before, must hand the lists to the returning officer, who has to return them to the deputy returning officer.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Why not say all such lists shall be deemed closed four days before polling day?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They are closed long before that. This is simply the appeal. The Clerk of the Appeal shall, four days before polling day, do so and so.

Subsection 3 of paragraph r was agreed to.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I wish to add as paragraph u, at the end of page 11, the following words:

He shall also on the same day deliver, or mail by registered letter to each of the candidates, a statement of the additions made to and of the changes made in the list posted pursuant to section 48 during the course of the revision.

Paragraph u was agreed to.

On section 2—Part III to operate as amended:

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I move that the word "complete" be struck out of the first line on page 12.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: What would be the interpretation of the section after striking out the word "complete"?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It would read: "During the present war and until demobilization."

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Would that be immediately after peace was declared? It might take two or three years to demobilize.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is the phraseology that has been used right along with regard to this and other Bills.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: What would be the minister's idea with regard to that? At what particular date would that take place?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We could not fix a date for that. It will have to be carried out as speedily as possible. It would depend almost entirely on transportation facilities. I should say that after the terms of peace are declared the demobilization would be the disbanding of our forces and placing them on a peace basis.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There surely must be a legal interpretation of the word "demobilization" among the warring nations in Europe.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I suppose they cease to be belligerents. They are disbanded and disarmed, and cease to be organized for warfare.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I suggest that the honourable gentleman think over the question as to whether the word "demobilization" should not be defined in the Act. I think it would be better.

The amendment of Hon. Mr. Béique was agreed to.

On paragraph a of section 2—where electors shall vote:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Evidently there is something wrong with the wording of this section.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is a misprint. It should read:

Except as otherwise provided in this Act, each elector shall be entitled to vote at the polling station of the polling division, or of one of the polling divisions, upon the list of voters, for which his name is entered as such elector, and at no other.

On paragraph b—hours of polling:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I move that the following words be added after the word "Sherbrooke":

Windsor, Ontario; Chatham, Ontario; Lethbridge and Medicine Hat.

The amendment was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: I move that the following words be added after the word "Lethbridge":

Sydney, Glace Bay, and Sydney Mines, Nova Scotia.

The amendment was agreed to.

On paragraph c of section 2—provisions as to election officers or agents entitled to vote:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would move that section 2, paragraph c, of the Bill be amended by striking out the words and figures, "and 247" at the end thereof and inserting instead the following:

"153, 154, 155, 156, 176 and 247 and inserting as sections 153 and 154 the following:

"153. Except in the Yukon Territory an elector, if required by the deputy returning officer, the poll clerk, one of the candidates, or an agent of a candidate, or by any elector present, shall, before receiving his ballot paper, take an oath in form Z No. 1, Z No. 2, or Y, as in schedule one, or all of them.

"154. No voter who has refused to take any oath or affirmation or to answer any questions, or produce any evidence, as by this Act required, shall receive a ballot paper or be admitted to vote."

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: What becomes of section 154 of the Act? Is that struck out?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This is substituted in lieu thereof.

The amendment of Hon. Sir James Lougheed was agreed to, and paragraph c of section 2, as amended, was agreed to.

On paragraph f of section 2, subsection 2—refusal to answer, or unsatisfactory response:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: In that subsection it is stated:

If such person refuses to answer fully such questions, or by his manner shows—

It seems absurd to suggest that his manner would show he was born in an enemy country.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is a mistake; the word "manner" should be "answer." I had an amendment to propose. My honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Bostock) is to be congratulated on the close way he is following this. I move that clause 2 of paragraph f of section 2 be amended by striking out, in the second line, the word "manner" and inserting instead the word "answer."

The amendment of Hon. Sir James Lougheed was agreed to.

On paragraph g of section 1—subdivision of electoral district into polling divisions:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Do we understand that paragraph g, on page 2, has been agreed to? How does that stand at the present moment?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Is it carried without the amendment of the Hon. Mr. Ross of Middleton?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, it was carried without amendment. It is understood that it can be taken up to-morrow.

The Bill was reported with amendments, and the amendments were concurred in.

The Senate adjourned until eleven o'clock to-morrow morning.

THE SENATE.

Tuesday, September 18, 1917.

First Sitting.

The Senate met at Eleven o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

COST OF PUBLIC PRINTING.

CONCURRENCE IN REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS moved that the fourth report of the Joint Committee of both Houses on the Printing of Parliament be now concurred in.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I rise simply to express my satisfaction with the character of the report which we are asked to adopt. As every honourable gentleman knows, there has been a very great increase in the expenditure for public printing and the distribution of printed matter during the last few years. Either last session or the session before, the Joint Committee on the printing of Parliament presented an elaborate report showing how a considerable sum of money might be saved if certain changes were made. That report came in at the close of the session; and, although the leader of the Government in the House of Commons intimated that he approved of the report, still his view was that the departments should be consulted. Of course, honourable gentlemen, you cannot get a minister to concur in anything that will take away the kudos from his own department. I am glad to see that, although no very decided action has been taken since last year, some action has been taken, and that the joint committee has persisted in recommending further action, and, as a practical step has proposed a commission, I think one may call it, of three experts to deal with this matter. I am glad to see anything done which tends to reduce the useless expenditure of money.

Now, I may make one or two observations of a more or less general character with respect to the departments. Every one knows that the work of the Department of Trade and Commerce and that of the Department of Customs are very largely the same, and that the reports of those two departments overlap each other, the same statistics being given in both. Moreover, the Department of Trade and Commerce is very much addicted to the issuing of supplementary reports—weekly, monthly and quarterly; and those reports are very little used or read by any one. The Department of Agriculture is also a great sinner in this respect. It issues a number of expensive publications, among them what I think is called the Agricultural Gazette. I happen to have one or two farmer friends to whom I should like to send anything that might be useful to them. I have looked over this Agricultural Gazette, and really, as a rule, I have found nothing in it that would be of any use to a practical farmer. I make the suggestion to the committee or to the Government that that periodical, which is issued at great expense, should be dispensed with altogether.

I suppose this is not the time to deal at any length with a subject of this kind; but there is one other point which I should like to emphasize: I refer to distribution. Every honourable gentleman must feel that numbers of blue-books are sent to him for which he has no use, and which are either disposed of to charitable institutions or used to light the fire. A very simple way of preventing the unnecessary distribution of documents or of blue-books would be to have a list of the reports which are to be published in the ensuing year distributed to the various members of the two Houses, say in the month of September, and to ask each member or senator to indicate the reports which he wishes to have. In that way it would be possible to prevent the circulation of fully two-thirds of the reports which are now circulated, and after a time it would be possible to cut down the printing of blue-books in the same proportion. I commend that suggestion to the honourable the Chairman of the Committee (Hon. Mr. Dennis), and I trust he will be good enough to submit it to the gentlemen who are to investigate and deal with this subject.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Before the motion is carried, I may tell my honourable friend that the suggestion which he has made has been carried out, I think, for two years. During the recess we generally receive a printed list of all the blue-books that are to be published, and we are asked what books we want.

Hon. Mr. POWER: If there was one sent to me this year, I did not get it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I suppose it was thought that the honourable gentleman would not read it as it was a parliamentary matter. What I complain of is that French documents are not given with the same generosity as English copies. Take, for instance, the Minutes of Proceedings of this Chamber. There are, I suppose, seventy copies in English given to members, and probably seventy more kept for distribution. There are, I think, twenty-six French members in this Chamber, if I am not mistaken, and there are probably twenty-five copies of the French issue of the Minutes given to those members. We cannot get any extra copies, unless we send to the Bureau to Mr. Paradis.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That is a matter that should be easily adjusted.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Yes, but if no one complains it never will be adjusted. I believe in the policy that if we want a thing we must agitate for it. I do not wish to throw blame on any one, but simply desire that some solution should be offered.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Who decides as to the number issued? Is there a special regulation?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I do not know. I know that the number of copies we receive is one less than the number of French members, and that when we want to get one or two or three additional copies, they are not here nor upstairs; we must send to the Printing Bureau.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: With regard to the observations of the honourable gentleman who has just taken his seat, I should like to say that one of the troubles we found in the House of Commons was that many of these reports were demanded in large numbers in both French and English. We found that some of these French reports were left lying in the House of Commons—between one and two tons of them—and we could not get a Frenchman to take them. They insisted on the reports being printed, but you could not do anything with them after they were printed, and they were left lying around until they were burned up in the Parliament building fire. That is one of the reasons for the increasing cost of printing.

What I rose more particularly to say is that, if it is desired, and I assume that it is, to economize in the cost of printing, both Houses should abandon the common practice, when some one desires some document to be printed for distribution, of moving the suspension of the rule and having so many copies of the document printed forthwith. In the mind of the person who makes the motion there is a great urgency; but the matter should go to the Joint Committee on Printing, which should exercise its judgment as to what number should be printed. The practice to which I have referred is more prevalent in the other Chamber than here. When I was Speaker of the other House I regularly drew attention to this fact, but found that it was almost impossible to control the matter in any way. The argument was advanced that a document was wanted immediately, and the committee might not be called together for several weeks. This is one of the constantly-occurring reasons for the greatly increased cost of printing, that might, in my judgment, be absolutely avoided if such matters were decided by the Joint Committee, which is designed to economize as much as possible the public money in that respect. There is also the duplication of reports. Take the commercial monthly report. We have had it for years. It is duplicated in the annual report. Then we have it again in the report of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the report of the Minister of Customs. That is embodied again in the sessional papers, every member getting two copies of each one. These documents are piled up hundreds and thousands, and as members have said to me, "I would need to build a new house to hold my parliamentary literature; I cannot distribute it and it is of no use to me." Notwithstanding all the efforts and substantial efforts were made the cost of printing for the present year will show an increase over last year of about $450,000, speaking from memory. It is said that three-quarters of that increase is due to the increased cost of paper, so that figure does not represent quite as much as would be supposed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: Wages are double.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: I do not think they are quite double, but they have increased considerably. If we adopted also the innovation, which has been suggested many times in both Houses of reducing the length of speeches, we could economize time and labour, get better results, and greatly reduce the cost of printing Hansard. I am still in favour of some record of the Houses of Parliament; but the burden of expense has become onerous. From my experience of the last year or two—although I was formerly very strongly opposed to it—I have reached the conclusion that it would not be an unmixed evil if we amended our rules in both Houses—especially in the other House, because we do not indulge in very long speeches here—to provide some limit to the length of the speeches that are read to the House, and are embodied in Hansard at an immense cost to the country, and in my judgment for no good purpose whatever.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: I am under the impression that the suggestion of the honourable member for Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) has already been adopted, inasmuch as the members are always informed of the publications which they may have on application. It has been said by some that this practice has effected quite a saving; but in my opinion it has not effected any saving whatever. It only means that now, instead of those publications being stored in the places indicated by my honourable friend, at home and elsewhere, that they are stored here in Ottawa. Therefore there is no saving effected other than the cost of transportation to the destination to which the reports might have been sent.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: The suggestion of the hounourable gentleman was to ascertain from the experience of a year or two what reports the members desired, and from that knowledge to cut down the number of reports to be printed.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: But may I tell my honourable friend where the scheme falls flat? In order to make any saving at all, the members should know, before the publications are printed, what ones they may desire, and only that number should be printed, or a few extra ones, if that were thought desirable. If this is not done, we save only the cost of transportation from Ottawa to the different members.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: Notwithstanding the remarks of the honourable member for Nipissing (Hon. Mr. Gordon), there has been a great decrease in the number of the various blue-books printed last year, although there is room for still further improvement in that respect.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: What was the reason for that?

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: The reason was that the Joint Committee, acting with the heads of the various departments, decreased the number.

A year and a half ago the Joint Committee on Printing made a number of recommendations to Parliament, with a view to combined efficiency and economy. That report included the following recommendations: that, instead of the reports, publications, etc., of the score or more of departments and branches of government being distributed by and from each individual department, all distributions should be centralized at the Printing Bureau and sent out from a branch post office in that Bureau on mailing lists that would be revised annually, thereby saving a vast amount of labour, unnecessary trucking to the central post office and other inexcusable wastage of time and energy. The same practice was recommended to be pursued with regard to sending out bound volumes of sessional papers. And instead of indiscriminate distribution of bluebooks, sessional papers, etc., to persons who have no use for them, and who could never read them—and in a great number of cases, probably a majority of cases, never looked at them—the idea of charging the general public for departmental bluebooks and special publications was urged to be rigidly adhered to. A number of other recommendations were made. Some of these were too drastic to be immediately adopted. But the prosess of education is going on, and the fourth report, the adoption of which I am now moving, tells to what extent the various departments are co-operating to carry out the recommendations of the committee and the policy of the two Houses of Parliament.

Within five years the cost of public printing has almost doubled. This is due to two reasons:

1. The enormously increased legitimate requirements owing to the war and the general increase of the public business in many departments;

2. The increase of wages and the extraordinary increase in the cost of paper. Out of a total increased cost of $420,000, for public printing for 1917 over 1916, the increased cost of paper alone represents $377,000.

The report now before us shows material savings in the decreased number of pages, changes in type, rearrangements of matter, and the decreased number of copies printed of various reports. But, as the Joint Committee's report points out, I believe there is still room for sweeping reductions by the omission of unnecessary, if not practically useless details and "padding" that practical printers cannot but regard as expensive absurdities. In this connection I call special attention to those sections of the committee's report referring to the expenditure of the Mines Department—which has jumped from $41,000 in 1912 to $135,000 in 1916. The report expresses the opinion that "many of the publications of this department are not of public interest." It is to be hoped that the new Secretary of State will embrace the earliest opportunity to give his personal attention to the whole question of public printing, and how the expense can be curtailed without detriment to the public interest, and I think he will find the extraordinary increase in the public expenditure of the Mines Department a good starting place for investigation. The report expresses the opinion that the public interests do not at this time demand the annual publication of the Hydrometric Survey reports. If this opinion is based on practical business judgment, a saving of $30,000 can be effected in this one instance. As an illustration of this point, I call attention to 450 pages of the blue-book containing Hydrometric Survey reports of British Columbia for 1915, printed in French, the cost of which, including translation, is estimated to exceed $4,000—probably $100 a copy for every person who reads it in French, or was ever interested in reading it.

Then there is the matter of the 3 volumes of High Cost of Living reports containing the voluminous evidence taken two or three years ago. These three volumes cost $16,500 to print in English. The English language edition of Vol. 1 cost $5,300. The same volume translated into and printed in the French language cost $10,000—almost double the English edition. If the other two volumes are printed in French, at the same ratio of cost, the total will be $40,000. I venture to say that all the salient facts ascertained by that commission, together with their recommendations, could have been summarized in one compact readable volume at one-twentieth of the cost that the 3 volumes in English and French have involved.

As another illustration, I hold in my hand "Bulletin No. 75—the Mining of Thin Coal Seams as applied to the Eastern Coal Fields of Canada," of which 4,000 copies were printed—when 400 in all human probability is all that will ever be needed—at a cost of $1,590 for the English language edition. When printed in French the approximate total will be $3,600 or $3,800, which I venture to assert that all practical men interested in the contents of that book will agree is an unjustifiable expenditure.

There are other features of the report that I might dwell upon; but, as I before remarked, it speaks for itself in no uncertain language. But I may be permitted to read and emphasize the committee's recommendation for largely remedying the laxities and unnecessary expenditures complained of and for greater efficiency and economy in the public printing:

> The Committee feel, however, that unless Parliament provides some stringent form of supervision over the fountains from whose sources so many volumes of useless literature flow, there will be a continuous increase in the printing bill of the country, which increase in recent years is alarming. These taps must be turned off by somebody, and it is too much to expect that ministers, working under tremendous pressure as they have been for years, should give attention to all routine details in their departments.
> The most effective way to bring about economies in Canadian Parliamentary and departmental printing is, in the opinion of the committee, to create an editorial board of three members of the Civil Service, thoroughly conversant with public affairs, and with a knowledge of departmental workings. This board should have plenary powers to order such excisions of "copy" of departmental reports, leaflets, bulletins, memoirs, etc., or to refuse to sanction the printing of any report if, in their judgment, the public interest would not be seriously affected by such refusal.

It would be the duty of this board to call upon the deputy head of any department or branch of the public service created by Parliament, whose requisition and "copy" for printing were under consideration, to show cause why any proposed reductions in "copy" should not be made or the printing thereof suspended entirely, and only upon the direct written authority of the minister of the department interested should the decision of this board of auditors be countermanded.

The board should present a report of its operations annually to Parliament within three weeks after the opening of each session thereof, such report to give the dates when first and last "copy" of every department report is received, and specifying the reductions in text, and the reasons therefor. In cases where the decision of the board has been overridden by the minister of any department, Parliament shall be advised.

The board should also have authority to "spur up" the prepation of departmental reports, so that work at the Printing Bureau may be more evenly distributed throughout the year.

The recommendation is a drastic and far-reaching one; but conditions demand drastic action.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: When you speak about the cost of these publications, does that mean only the actual cost of paper and printing, or does it take into account the overhead expenses?

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: No. This is the actual cost, as I understand it, of typesetting, make-up, paper, binding, etc.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: So that it really costs very much more?

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: Oh, yes, very much more. The figures given do not include the overhead expenses.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Nor do they include the editorial work?

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: No. (Reading):

The Committee is of opinion that no steps can or should be taken to diminish the size of this report. It is the greatest guarantee that the country possesses against improper expenditure. The Committee would suggest, however, that steps be taken to amalgamate the English and French editions, as has been done with the Civil Service List, the report on Unclaimed Bank Balances, List of Bank Shareholders, etc. To secure the amalgamation of the two editions into one it is suggested that all headings in the Auditor General's Report should be bilingual; all the statistics should be printed in two or three volumes as at present, and the correspondence in both languages. This will obviate approximately the setting and printing of 2,800 pages of "copy" for French version, and saving over $14,000.

The Committee feel however, that unless Parliament provides some stringent form of supervision over the fountains from whose sources so many volumes of useless literature flow, there will be a continuous increase in the printing bill of the country, which increase in recent years is alarming. These taps must be turned off by somebody, and it is too much to expect that ministers, working under tremendous pressure as they have been for years, should give attention to all routine details in their departments.

I would like to point out to honourable gentlemen in this connection that this printing abuse has been growing for years. Neither party is alone responsible for it; both parties are responsible. The expenditure has increased during the last three or four years, because of the increase in wages and in the cost of paper, principally the latter; also because of the greater demands of the Militia Department and the various war commissions and services. But, while the committee has been very drastic in its recommendations and very plain in its language, we are not reflecting on the ministers, either of the present or of previous Administrations. Both parties are responsible for the present condition of affairs; but it is the duty of the present ministers to remedy it:

The most effective way to bring about economies in Canadian Parliamentary and Departmental printing is, in the opinion of the Committee, to create an editorial board of three members of the Civil Service, thoroughly conversant with public affairs, and with a knowledge of departmental workings. This board should have plenary powers to order such excisions of "copy" of departmental reports, leaflets, bulletins, memoirs, etc., or to refuse to sanction the printing of any report if, in their judgment, the public interest would not be seriously affected by such refusal.

It would be the duty of the Board to call upon the Deputy Head of any department or Branch of the puplic service created by Parliament, whose requisition and "copy" for printing were under consideration, to show cause why any proposed reductions in "copy" should not be made or the printing thereof suspended entirely, and only upon the direct written authority of the minister of the department interested should the decision of the board of editors be countermanded.

The board should present a report of its operations annually to Parliament within three weeks after the opening of each session thereof, such report to give the dates when first and last "copy" of every department report is received, and specifying the reductions in text, and the reasons therefor. In cases where the decision of the board has been overridden by the minister of any department, Parliament shall be advised.

The board should also have authority to "spur up" the preparation of departmental reports, so that work at the Printing Bureau may be more evenly distributed throughout the year.

Owing to delays on the part of various departments in sending their copy to the Printing Bureau, men are often kept idle. I think the number of hours lost in this way during the past year, if the facts were ascertained, would be astonishing. When the copy does comes, it comes with such a rush that the Printing Bureau is unable to undertake the work; consequently it has to be sent to outside offices, resulting in increased cost of printing.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Would it be necessary to pass an Act to constitute such a board?

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: No, an Act would not be necessary; I think an Order in Council would cover the case. If the suggestion of an editorial board is favourably considered by the Government and adopted, I think a very material saving can be effected in the cost of public printing, and the members of Parliament and the general public will be relieved of considerable inconvenience. Many of the reports which they receive and open are unread and are thrown away as junk; and yet they contain a large quantity of valuable paper, which at the present time is costing 10 cents a pound.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: How does the honourable gentleman suggest that the board should act?

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: The proposition is that, if the editorial board is appointed, they shall consult with the deputy heads of the various departments.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Do I understand that the honourable gentleman recommends that this board shall have power to say what reports shall be printed?

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: Yes.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: And what reports shall not be printed?

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: After consultation with the deputy ministers.

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: May I ask if the committee has considered pursuing the same plan with regard to outside persons as is followed with regard to members of the House of Commons and of this House, namely, to ask each person if he wants the report. I am perfectly certain that there are thousands of reports sent to newspaper offices and other outside places, which are never opened, but are simply thrown in the wastepaper basket. Persons on the mailing lists should be informed that a certain report will be printed, and should be asked if they want a copy of it.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: The practice is that when a report is printed a postcard is sent to every member of the Senate or the House of Commons, and also to the addresses on a select mailing list.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: To public libraries and such institutions.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: To public libraries, newspapers, etc. They are informed that a certain report is ready and are asked, if they want it, to put a cross opposite the title.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: But that is done, I understand, after the printing.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: Yes.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: What saving is effected in that way?

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: The Distribution Office and the Printing Bureau have a list, which is revised annually, of persons to whom blue-books are sent. The number of names on the list has been gradually reduced. Furthermore, we have introduced the system of charging for documents. The blue-books and various other documents are not now sent out indiscriminately to 3,000, 4,000 or 5,000 persons, many of them dead, as was previously done. The receipts from the sale of official documents for the past year were about $2,000 in excess of previous years.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I suppose the practice of the Joint Committee of both Houses to order the printing of certain reports will be continued. It is not intended to interfere with that?

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: No.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The board which is suggested will have nothing to do with that?

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: That is a matter of detail, which will be arranged when the board is appointed, if it is appointed. But the printing of the papers laid before this honourable House or the other House is a matter for the Joint Committee on Printing to consider and report upon to both Houses. Then the respective Houses decide what shall be done. We do not propose to refer that matter to the board at all.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Honourable gentlemen, what is everybody's business is nobody's business. Reports have been made and comments passed for many years on the extravagance of the Government printing. Reports come in and are filed, and I venture to say that even among members of Parliament not one in a dozen ever looks at them or considers them. If we wish to have the cost of printing reduced, the suggestion of the report, it seems to me, is not the best one. If a board of editors is constituted, it simply means another board of officials.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: It is not proposed to appoint a separate board, but to appoint three members of the Civil Service and utilize their services.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: To my mind that is not the best solution. It seems to me that an Act of Parliament should be passed constituting a joint board of members of the two Houses, to whom, all documents it is proposed to print should be submitted for authorization. The proof that editors chosen from the Civil Service would not be the most desirable committee to appoint is found in the fact that each department now prints its reports, and, so far as usefulness is concerned, they are absurd. In any one of these reports it is difficult to find anything interesting; it is simply a collection of statistics thrown together, without any index or other means by which you can ascertain what it contains. Is there any honourable gentleman in this House who ever reads any of these reports? They are sent to me and I never read them. I received a copy of the Cost of Living report. I was going to say it might be used as a paper weight; but it could be used only in a blizzard to keep down a building, it is of such a size. Another report was simply a collection of vouchers of expenditures by the Militia Department. Now, if the men who have the editing of these reports in the different departments have not enough judgment to withhold them from publication in that form, how can we expect to select from those departments three men who by their combined judgment will do any better? The men who know what the public want are the members of the two Houses of Parliament, because they are the persons to whom application is made by their constituents for these reports. Although the great cost of public printing has been pointed out time after time, no member of the Government has been sufficiently interested in the question during the last 20 years to ask for an Order in Council, and I venture to say that if we file this report it will grow blue-mouldy, and there never will be an Order in Council passed. I submit that what should be done is that the chairman or some member of this committee should bring in a Bill to constitute a board; and when that Bill passes and becomes law, a board will be appointed from the members of both Houses and we shall not have this public scandal year after year, as we have it now, of printing enormous quantities of useless literature. The accumulation would have become a public nuisance but for the good luck that it was all burned up.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Would my honourable friend, before he concludes his remarks, point out to the House the distinction between the practice which we have followed up to the present time, that of referring such matters to a joint committee of Parliament, and the proposal to appoint a board which would be practically a joint committee of both Houses?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I used the word board; I should have said a joint committee.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We have that now.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: But the joint committee is not given the necessary power. As I understand, such matters are submitted to the committee pro forma; but if no department had the right to print such documents until they had been passed upon separately and accepted by the joint committee, a reduction of expense would be effected. Does the joint committee ever intervene before printing, to say, "You shall not print this report," or, "You shall print this report in such and such a form," or, "You shall reduce this report to such a size"? I do not understand that the committee does so. The joint committee should have all reports submitted to it before they are printed at all.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: If the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton) had had a little experience of the Printing Committee and of the departments, he would find that his suggestion is quite impracticable. How would the public ever get the information contained in these reports? The reports which would be submitted to this committee are completed only just about the time Parliament meets, and sometimes it is with great difficulty that the head of a department can get a report ready in sufficient time to lay it before Parliament. If my honourable friend's suggestion were carried out, all reports would have to be submitted to this joint board. But all the work would be performed before the report was submitted to the board, and then it would be useless to submit it.

Let me say, speaking from experience, that the suggestion made by the chairman of the committee, as he has explained it to-day, is the most practical way of carrying out economy in printing, and to my mind the committee deserves great credit for what it has done. This is about the first time that we have had a Printing Committee which has really performed its duties in taking into consideration what documents should be printed. It is all very well to complain that a large number of these reports should not be printed, and that orders of one House or the other are often given overlooking and overriding the powers and duties of the Printing Committee. But when a report is laid before Parliament, if a politician thinks it will not suit his party he will crush it; but if he can use it, he will ask to have it printed by thousands. The same course is followed in the Printing Committee, and the same reasons are given for the publication of many reports which are of no interest to any one except the man who moves for them, and probably the people of the constituency in which he circulates them. The course suggested by the Chairman of the Printing Committee is the most practical one that has been laid before Parliament during the fifty years that I have been a member.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I think we are all agreed that a great deal of money is wasted, and that many reports are printed and distributed which might well be dispensed with. Reports are sometimes thrown into the waste-paper basket because they are badly arranged. Recently a book was issued containing archives of the most interesting nature in three-quarters of its space; but the balance was made up of things of practically no interest at all. One does not want a book containing something that is of no interest, and it usually goes into the waste-paper basket. The matter contained in a publication should be so classified that it will be preserved if the matter is of interest for the future.

I rise especially to say that I am in accord with the honourable member from Hastings (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell), that the committee has done excellent work. I think the recommendations of the committee are along the proper lines. I do not think Parliament will consent to do away with the Printing Committee and forego its power of directing what shall be printed and what shall not be printed; but I think it would be wise to appoint a board. I would suggest that the board be composed of two members only, one English and one French, and that it should be the duty of that board to keep in communication with the Joint Committee and with the departments, and to devise the best means, from the point of view of efficiency and economy, of reducing as much as possible the cost of printing and the circulation of papers. It might make recommendations which would be accepted by the committee as to what documents should be printed or not printed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: The honourable member for Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton) intimated that most members of Parliament and others who receive these documents throw them away. If the honourable gentleman wishes at any time to consult any of these reports, including Hansard from the time of Confederation, and will come to my office in Belleville I will furnish him with anything he wants. I have about 450 feet of shelving filled with the reports of each department for each year, and the Debates from the time of the Charlottetown meeting, at which Confederation was first considered. It would give me great pleasure to have the honourable gentleman come and consult these documents. Very often politicians come to my office and want to get books. I say: "There is the room, go and occupy it;" but I will not let any of them take books away, because I would probably never see them again.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No doubt there are some statistics that must be printed and kept on record. There is no Government in the world that does not attend to this matter seriously; but it seems to me that we are lacking in common sense when we pelt the members of Parliament with formidable reports which, when added to each other, make a small mountain each year, and when it is quite apparent that one man cannot go through them all. I have often wondered why these reports are not summarized, and the essence of the testimony taken, or the opinions given, printed. If that were done, the members would not be discouraged and would make it their duty to peruse these summaries. When I receive a list of forty-five or fifty reports, with instructions to indicate what I want, I select two or three; and even then, when I am confronted with them I am sometimes so paralysed that I leave them aside, and when I have some leisure, I find that I have more pressing demands made upon me. It seems to me that these reports should be reduced in volume to what is absolutely essential.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: I do not know what may be the value of these reports, intrinsic or extrinsic, but they must have some value. After the burning of the Parliament building, an officer of the Secretary of State's Department, I believe, wrote asking if I could help to replace the lost collection. It happened that I had a file which was nearly as voluminous or mountainous as that of my honourable friend from Hastings. I sent it on to the department. There were trunks full and barrels full—in fact, a great pile of documents. Judging from the thanks I got, that collection had some value as a historical record, or for some other purpose. If those records should only serve as documents for future historians, I think, although they cost a goodly sum of money, that we should persist in printing them. I would not insist on mountains of them being printed; but I would insist on the printing of documents which, though overwhelming in appearance, will certainly be of interest to future generations when Canada has become one of the largest, most prosperous, and most enlightened nations of the world.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: While I sympathize considerably with the suggestions made by the chairman of the committee, and think they would, if acted upon, bring about an improvement, I must say that the tendency of this report is, as has been the case in the past, to take the responsibility away from the responsible minister. In a responsible Government such as we have, it seems to me that if we remove the responsibility from the shoulders of the minister, we shall have no person to look to in the event of the work not being done properly. I submit that we are on the wrong trail altogether. Even to-day some person had to apologize and say that there was no minister to blame and that practically there never had been. I say that unless the matter can be brought home to a minister, you will not get results. It is proposed to put the responsibility upon the shoulders of two or three civil servants, and every man here knows that these men will be desirous of meeting the views of practically every member of Parliament and every politician who goes to them, and the excuse will always be given that so-and-so asked for something to be done. I think there should be some means, which we have evidently not had in the past, of putting the responsibility for the carrying out of these requirements upon the shoulders of the minister who is in charge of that department.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: The recommendation does not propose to relieve any minister of responsibility. It is proposed to appoint a board of editors, and when a report is sent in from a department—the Department of Mines, for instance, which is one of the chief sources of what I unhesitatingly say is extravagance—the board will say: "We do not think that report is necessary." The board will consult with the deputy minister, and if the deputy minister says it is essential that the report should be printed, and the board disagrees with him, the minister will be appealed to, and he has to take the responsibility of saying whether the report shall be printed or not, and has to give written instructions to have it printed.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: The minister who is asking for that particular work has to decide. For years it has been the common report on the street, that the Printing Department, which is rather loosely run, to say the least, has too many employees. What we want to do is to find out who is responsible for that condition of affairs, and put it squarely before him, in order to have that condition remedied. I suggested that one way of effecting a saving would be to find out beforehand what publications are really necessary, and print no others. I am of the opinion that an immense saving could be affected in that way. The chairman of the committee is a practical printer, and I judge from his remarks that he is satisfied that an immense saving can be affected in that department. I would like to have some suggestions from him as to how it can be done.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: I think that the suggestion made by the honourable member for Nipissing (Hon. Mr. Gordon) should be taken into serious consideration; but, unless two competent men are appointed, one French and one English, men who will be responsible, nothing will come of it. That is the only way to have anything done which will produce results.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: This discussion has been a very interesting one. The Chairman of the committee is to be congratulated upon laying this matter before the House, and his recommendations are very much to be commended. But in this matter it seems to me that the Secretary of State is very largely responsible. The Printing Bureau is under his department and the Joint Committee of the Houses of Parliament should be in a position to see that a proper branch of the Department of the Secretary of State is organized for the purpose of arranging the collation of statistics. This branch seems to be in a very serious condition at the present time. We get statistics from the different departments, and when we try to compare them we find that the results disagree very considerably, and the consequence is that the information obtained is not at all satisfactory. I think that the proper collation of statistics is one of the most important matters that we have to deal with.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: Should we not have a bureau of statistics?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Yes. Probably it would be best to have it under the Secretary of State's Department. In his report my honourable friend refers to the printing of maps. That is another case in which we have wasted an enormous amount of money. Various departments have been printing maps according to what they thought were the requirements. The Railway Department, for instance, has issued maps without any consideration of what was being done by the Department of the Interior. Very expensive maps have been issued, and a great deal of money has been wasted owing to duplication. That is another matter which I think should be referred to the Secretary of State. His department should know whether certain maps had been issued before, or whether they were really required. I think the Department of the Secretary of State should be made a kind of clearing-house, so that work would not be duplicated. Then there is the editing of all these reports. There is no doubt that an enormous amount of money is wasted owing to reports not being properly edited. That work could be done by a staff of officials, as I presume my honourable friend means to have it done. We are all interested in saving as much money as possible. There has been a good deal of waste in the past. I understand that the Joint Committee of Parliament can only deal with papers that come before it during the session, and that as to reports of departments they can only make recommendations or suggestions to the various ministers of the Government that certain action should be taken.

Under the statutes the different departments have to make certain reports to Parliament within a certain number of days after the session opens, and of course we know the Joint Committee on Printing cannot convene and get to work early enough in the session to deal with those reports. Hence anything that could be done in the way proposed would have to be done by the departments themselves. I think this is a very important matter, and at the beginning of the session we might be able to discuss it at much greater length and to better effect, and probably arrive at a more satisfactory conclusion as to what can be done.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: My honourable friend seems to have misunderstood the duties of the Secretary of State so far as they relate to the Printing Bureau. That minister has nothing to do with what shall or shall not be printed; he has no power.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Give him the power.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: His duty is simply to manage the Printing Bureau as any gentleman would manage his own manufacturing establishment—control the expenditure, arrange how the business is to be done, and see that under the Superintendent of Printing the reports sent in by the different departments are printed. If the suggestion of my honourable friend were carried out, you would make the Secretary of State a kaiser, a dictator to all the departments of the Government, which nobody would tolerate for a moment.

The motion was agreed to, and the report was concurred in.

ALLEGED MISCONDUCT OF IMMIGRATION OFFICIAL.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY rose to call the attention of the Government to the following facts:

On Saturday, 26th May last, a citizen of Windsor, named J. J. Massé, manufacturer, doing business in Windsor and Detroit, called at the Canadian Immigration office to obtain a permit to cross from Windsor to Detroit, such permit now being necessary in virtue of an Order in Council.

The officer in charge of the office at that time, was one Vincent M. Byrne who, on Massé's application, made in French, for a permit to cross, replied that the use of the French language was not legal in Ontario.

Then, in a fit of anger, he suddenly seized Massé and confined him in a cell close by, 8 feet by 6 feet, with but a small window hermetically closed, and re-inforced by a solid iron grating.

Mr. Massé was kept in confinement there, for two hours, during which he was subjected, by Byrne, to all sorts of insults, and in reply to any protests on the part of Massé, Byrne added: "Shut up; I have the upper hand here; I will have you arrested and sent to jail."

The Chief Immigration Inspector at Windsor, Mr. O. J. Adams, visited Massé in his cell, and after having heard the facts, told the prisoner that he had no right to use French, that that language had no legal status in Canada. He left Mr. Massé a prisoner.

During the whole period of his confinement, Massé was invariably refused all telephone communication with his business office in Detroit, and any communication with his solicitor.

By the intervention of another officer of the department, Massé was allowed to leave his cell and obtained what he was applying for, but he had to make his application in English.

Two days later, Mr. De Grandpré, advocate, communicated all these facts to the Minister of the Interior, and requested justice for his client.

On the 1st of June, Inspector Adams refused a passport to Massé, under the pretext that the latter had instituted an action in damages against Byrne, on account of ill-treatment by the latter on the 26th May, as mentioned above.

This refusal of Adams was denounced on the 1st of June, to the Minister of the Interior, who immediately ordered his officer to issue the passport applied for. Four days later, 5th of June, the Minister promised that an investigation would be held.

On the 23rd of June, the promised investigation having not been held, Mr. De Grandpré wrote to the Minister to remind him of his promise and requesting its fulfilment.

On the 3rd of July last, further letter from Mr. De Grandpré asking for Byrne's dismissal, on account of the unjustifiable imprisonment of Massé, also for Adams' dismissal, for complicity in the act committed by Byrne and for having, on the 17th of June, refused to grant a passport to Massé.

On the 14th July, Mr De Grandpré renewed his requests of the 3rd of July. At the same time, he received, from the Minister of the Interior, a letter informing him that the dismissals asked for seemed too harsh a measure, and giving him the assurance that the offences already committed would not be repeated.

In replying to this letter on the 24th of July last, Mr. De Grandpré protests against this attempt to hush up this matter, and insists on his request that the incriminated employees disappear from Windsor, leaving the Minister at liberty either to dismiss them altogether or to appoint them somewhere else.

"You have," he writes to the Minister, "quite recently dismissed one of your Immigration officers at Windsor who had taken the liberty of insulting Mr. Tuson, the present Mayor of Windsor, by making rather curt remarks to him, and I cannot see why you do not act in a similar manner in the case of Byrne and Adams, whose brutality and iniquity towards Massé were a hundred times worse than in the Tuson incident." This letter remained unanswered.

Mr. De Grandpré wrote again on the 31st of July, and informed the Minister that Inspector Adams kept, under lock and key in his private office, the French blank forms sent by the Department for the convenience of those who asked for them; but those who desired them could not obtain any during Mr. Adams' absence as the latter took his office key with him.

And to inquire:

Is it the intention of the Government to leave the action of Byrne and the complicity of Adams, unpunished, the former depriving a British citizen of his liberty in placing him in a cell without the slightest authority, and the latter in keeping him a prisoner contrary to the laws of this country, both being guilty of disobeying the orders of their superiors in refusing to Massé permits to which he was entitled?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I have great pleasure in giving an answer to my honourable friend that I think should be satisfactory. It is as follows:

A careful investigation was made into this case, and it was ascertained that on May 26, 1917, about 8.15 a.m., Mr. Massé appeared at the ferry dock immigration office at Windsor, Ontario, demanding that he be examined in the French language. Inspector Byrne, before whom he appeared, being unable to speak French, suggested that Mr. Massé answer in English questions addressed to him in that language. Mr. Massé, while admitting he spoke English fluently, absolutely refused to be examined in English. He was told that an officer able to speak French would be there about 9.30, and he expressed his preference to wait rather than speak English. He was then in the office where the general examination of immigrants and others takes place, and as it is contrary to the rules to have others than officials in the office when persons are being questioned, he was asked to wait outside. This he refused to do, saying: "I don't give a damn for you or any other officer; I am going to stay here until I get my rights." He was then asked to wait in one of the other offices and again refused, and was by force removed from the office in which the examination was taking place to one of the other offices. The door of the office in which he was placed was open and he was free to leave at any time. For three years there has been no telephone connection between the ferry dock office and Detroit, and for this reason his request to phone his Detroit office could not be complied with.

A temporary permit was granted to him on the date on which this trouble commenced, and when he applied for another permit on June 1st he was refused, the officers taking the ground that as the whole case had been referred to the Minister of the Interior, it was preferable that the minister should take the responsibility for issuing the second permit. Long distance instructions were given to issue the permit, so Mr. Massé occasioned no serious inconvenience on June 1st.

The Immigration Inspector in charge at Windsor, in reporting this matter, says:

There is absolutely no ill feeling between the French speaking public and myself or any of my Inspectors that I am aware of and the greatest harmony exists at all times. I regret very much the attitude which Mr. De Grandpré is taking as it would appear that he is endeavouring to create an ill feeling between the two races in this neighbourhood. I am glad to say, however, that this feeling is limited to a very few, most of whom are friends of Mr. De Grandpré.

In view of the facts above outlined, it is not the intention of the Government to in any way punish Inspector Byrne or Inspector-in-charge Adams.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I may have my doubts about the answer. With the kindness of the honourable leader, I read the answer, and I differ in toto from the version given. I think this matter should be followed by another inquiry, by examining persons under oath, and having the proper evidence produced.

MILEAGE AND GRADES OF RAILWAYS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN inquired of the Government:

1. What is the mileage by the Canadian Pacific Railway between Winnipeg and Quebec?
2. What is the mileage by the Canadian Northern railway between Winnipeg and Quebec?
3. What is the mileage by the National Transcontinental railway between Winnipeg and Quebec?
4. What is the total adverse grade on the Canadian Pacific going east, from Winnipeg to Quebec?
5. What is the total adverse grade going west on the same road?
6. What is the total adverse grade going east on the Canadian Northern railway between Winnipeg and Quebec? The same going west?
7. What is the total adverse grade going east on the National Transcontinental railway between Winnipeg and Quebec? The same going west?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1. 1587 miles.
2. 1640 miles.
3. 1351 miles.

Information has been received from the railways concerned as follows:

4. and 5. 681.51 miles in length; 14,102 feet of raise, going east. 659.83 miles in length; 14,578 feet of raise, going west.

6. 9,655 feet, going east. 10,393 feet, going west.

The elevation above sea-level is 18 feet, Quebec; Winnipeg, Red River Bridge, 756 feet.

7. 608.0 miles in length and 8,946.7 feet of a raise, going east. 536.8 miles in length and 9,730.3 feet of a raise, going west.

The Senate adjourned at one o'clock.

Second Sitting.

The Senate met at three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

WAR-TIME ELECTIONS ACT.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the third reading of Bill 133, The War-time Elections Act.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I beg to move that this Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be amended :

(1) By striking out the words "Nova Scotia" from the first and second lines of the new section 33B provided by the Bill.
(2) By striking out the words "Nova Scotia" from the seventh and eighth lines of clause 4 of the new section 62 provided by the Bill.
(3) By striking out the words "Nova Scotia" from the third and fifth lines of the new section 65A provided by the Bill.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Why does the honourable gentleman want to have those words struck out ?

Hon. Mr. POWER: To strike out the words "Nova Scotia" only — not "New Brunswick"?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I am not so interested in New Brunswick as I am in Nova Scotia. We had some discussion on this amendment last night. I desire to be as brief to-day as I can be. The voters' lists in Nova Scotia are prepared by what we call revisers.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Appointed by whom ?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: The revisers are appointed by the county council, and the appeals from them are to the sheriff.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: How many revisers are there ?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I think there are three.

Hon. Mr. FARREL: Three for a revisal section.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: The province of Nova Scotia has been Liberal since the year 1882, that is, for thirty-five years. The sheriffs are not judicial appointees. I explained last night that at one time they were appointed by the judges. Under the present Government they have been appointed by the Lieutenant Governor in Council. Now, it is perfectly true that some of the sheriffs act very fairly, but a great many of them act very arbitrarily, and the fact is that we have not in Nova Scotia under the provincial preparation of the lists a judicial review such as there is, either before or after the elections, in the western provinces and in Prince Edward Island, and it is that judicial review which I wish to provide for by this amendment.

Hon. Mr. POWER: This amendment will not give it.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Yes, it will.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: You are not dealing with the province of New Brunswick at all. Is that province to follow the old lists?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: New Brunswick is provided for in the Act along with Ontario and Quebec.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: But I am asking for information. How will the lists of New Brunswick be arranged?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: The lists will be taken as they are now.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: By the revisers?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Yes; but they can be added to by the enumerators putting on the new classes of voters provided for in the Act. The effect of this amendment to strike out the words "Nova Scotia" is to put Nova Scotia on the same footing as Prince Edward Island, Alberta, Saskatchewan, British Columbia, and Manitoba. Although there is not a judicial review in any of those provinces before the election, there is a revision after the election, and in the meantime there is ample machinery to enable a man to vote whom the enumerator would wrongly exclude from voting, and there is no way by which a man can squeeze in a vote who is not entitled to it. The voter or his agent can have his vote brought under review by the judge. So far as my limited comprehension goes, there is not the slightest advantage given one party over the other in this system. If any one had shown me that there was, I would take a very different view of the amendment which I am now proposing to the House. It is, I think, desirable that there should be a judicial review and that it should be equally open to both parties.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Is there a judicial review in New Brunswick?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: There is not in New Brunswick; but New Brunswick has representatives here, and if they wish to have "New Brunswick" added to "Nova Scotia" in this amendment, it is quite open for them to do so.

I was told last night that this proposal was sprung as a surprise upon this House, but that is not so. It was known in the other House and known to leading members of the Liberal party that such a proposal would be made in this House. The amendment would have been proposed in the other House only that at the time it was mentioned there the Bill was under closure, and it was impracticable to put the amendment in.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Will the honourable gentleman mention a single member of the Chamber who knew that such an amendment would be offered?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Mr. Maclean.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: He expressed his surprise to us last evening that such an amendment was proposed here.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I am informed that he was acquainted with the fact.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Do I understand the honourable gentleman to state that this amendment was not put before the House of Commons owing to closure?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That is what he said.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I want a straight answer to that question. The honourable gentleman has said that owing to the closure this amendment was not allowed to be put in the House of Commons.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I say if the Bill had not been under closure the amendment would be have been offered.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: What an argument that is against closure in the House of Commons. You have to come up here for free speech.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: The honourable gentleman from Kings (Hon. Mr. Fowler) has asked me to amend my motion by adding the words "New Brunswick." I am willing that my amendment be amended in that way.

Hon. Mr. DANDUDAND: The honourable gentleman can do so only by the consent of the House.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: We can do it in another way.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Do I understand that we agree that the effect of the amendment moved by the honourable gentleman is that the enumerators to be appointed under this Act will have to make all the lists de novo?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: They start with the provincial lists. They have the benefit of the provincial lists.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Where does that appear?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: In section 46 of the amended copy of the Franchise Act that accompanies the Bill before the House.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is within the enumerator's discretion to take the list or reject it.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: He will take that list. If he does not stand by that list, the parties in the division who are interested have the old list to guide them.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: In complainin to the judge?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: In complaining to the enumerator himself and later on to the judge.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: If this amendment were adopted, would the lists be entirely in the hands of the enumerators, or would the lists that were already made up for the year be accepted?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: He takes the list for the year. From that he takes all the names that he thinks he can take, and strikes off names of persons whom he thinks not qualified to vote, and the names of others whom he thinks qualified to vote. If he strikes out the name of a man who thinks he is qualified to vote, that man may apply to him to be reinstated, and if he is not reinstated he gets a certificate and takes it with him to the polling station on polling day, and votes. There is elaborate provision for dealing with the case.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I understand the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. Mr. Ross) to state as the reason for his amendment, that the electoral lists of the province of Nova Scotia are revised by the sheriffs, and that the sheriffs, being appointed by a political party, are not always fair, and that there should be a remedy for a condition of that kind. The honourable gentleman asks to substitute nominees of the present Government, who would be entrusted with the preparing of the electoral lists for the whole province. Does it not occur to the honourable gentleman that these nominees will likewise be appointed by a political party, and they will not give any more guarantee of impartiality than the sheriffs who were appointed by another political party? I appeal to the honourable gentleman whether it is fair, by means of a majority in this House to disturb the whole system under which the House of Commons and this Government have been acting heretofore. It seems to me that this matter can be dealt with in a way on which all men who have any sense of fairness will agree. It is suggested to continue the provincial lists as a basis, but to provide for a revision of those lists by the judges. All parties will be put on a par, and no advantage will be taken by one over the other. I suggest an amendment to the amendment, as follows:

Nothwithstanding anything to the contrary contained in this Act, in the province of Nova Scotia, on the application of any person having a right to vote in virtue of this Act in any electoral division of said province, the electoral list of such electoral division may be revised by the county judge at any time within a delay of thirty days from the passing of this Act.

On the occasion of such revision a judge may strike out any name appearing on the electoral list or he may add to it such names as he may deem proper. I think this should appeal to the sense of fairness of the honourable gentleman. Is the honourable gentleman willing to accept that?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: No. I tried to work out an amendment on the lines suggested by the honourable gentleman. It would require almost a complete code, providing for the fixing of the sittings of the judge, for the notice to the electors affected, and the other necessary notices, and for the parties being heard; whereas under this system the thing is complete. The honourable gentleman's motion has the merit of proposing the interference of the judges, but it is not workable under this Act.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Why?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I have already pointed out that we have not the machinery.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Reserving my right to speak on this amendment, I should like to make a suggestion. Instead of getting into a discussion that may last over a number of sittings and may lead to no satisfactory conclusion, I would suggest to the honourable gentleman that the House adjourn for a short time to allow the legal gentlemen on both sides, with the Minister of Justice and a couple of representatives from both sides of the other House, to meet and see if we cannot agree upon granting an appeal to the judges of Nova Scotia in case of any complaint of omission or commission in regard to the lists. It seems to me that, instead of entering upon a course of wrangling which may lead to nothing and which may prevent prorogation for a number of days, my honourable friend should accept such a suggestion.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Why cannot the honourable gentleman show us how it can be done?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It is up to you.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Why disturb the present state of things in Nova Scotia? Is it not good enough?

Hon. Mr. POWER: I had given the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. Mr. Ross) credit for being broad-minded and fair-minded. I am sorry to feel now that I have misunderstood the honourable gentleman's character. Here is the fact. In the province of Nova Scotia the assessors' lists are the foundation upon which the whole structure rests. The revisers who are appointed by the municipal authorities take the assessors' lists, go over them carefully, and make a list of the persons whom they believe to be entitled to be registered as voters on the basis of those assessment lists. Then the revisers take the list, which you may call the original list, and post it up in various places throughout the constituency; and part of the notice is to the effect that on a certain day the revisers will meet to hear appeals from the original list. On that day the revisers meet, consider the appeals, strike off the names of persons who they are satisfied have not the right to vote, and insert the names of persons which have been improperly omitted. After that, if there is still disatisfaction, the dissatisfied person has the right to appeal to the sheriff. Now, honourable gentlemen, while the Government of Nova Scotia has been Liberal for a great many years, these lists are not made up by the Government. They are not made up under government supervision. They are made up under the supervision of the municipal authorities, and those authorities, I think, are about equally divided between the two parties. So that there is no ground for a change from that system. There has been no complaint of it. My own impression is that if the honourable gentleman will look into the matter he will find that appeals to the sheriff hardly ever take place. I have not for years seen or heard of any serious complaints as to the character of the electoral lists in the province of Nova Scotia. Under those lists Conservative members have been elected to the House of Commons in as large numbers as Liberals, or in somewhat larger numbers. They have also been elected in considerable numbers to the provincial legislature. Under these circumstances, why should the honourable gentleman separate his native province from Ontario, Quebec and New Brunswick, and put it in with the province of Prince Edward Island and the western provinces, where there are no provincial lists at all? It is a great advantage to have these provincial lists, which are non-partisan in their character; yet the honourable gentleman proposes practically to do away with them, and substitute lists that are made up by enumerators, all of whom are appointed by one party.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Allow me just one correction. I am informed that Manitoba and British Columbia both have electoral lists.

Hon. Mr. POWER: They have no such lists as we have, because that appears from this Bill itself. If they have such lists why are they dealt with separately in the Bill? There are other honourable gentleman here from Nova Scotia, and I do not think that any of them can say that any serious complaint has been made with respect to the lists in that province.

Another point is this. It is stated that we are within a month or so of the election. The lists were all made up months ago, and the period for appealing has elapsed, and if there were appeals they have been heard and disposed of. Why should we go back and take these complete, impartial lists and put them in the hands of enumerators to be dealt with just as those enumerators please? There is nothing to hinder the enumerators from wiping out the whole of the existing and carefully-prepared provincial lists, and substituting lists of their own.

I think it is a most extraordinary motion. Further, it should be borne in mind that this Bill has passed through the House of Commons, where there are representatives of both parties from Nova Scotia, yet no one in that House ever said a word in the direction of the amendment which the honourable gentleman now proposes.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I think the honourable member from Halifax has fairly stated the case, with exceptions. He appears to have the idea that the provincial lists will not be placed in the hands of the enumerators.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I did not say that.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: While I agree that the lists as at present arranged in New Brunswick are fairly made up, as a rule, yet under this law they must go into the hands of the enumerators, who take the lists as the basis of the new electoral lists.

Hon. Mr. POWER: We are simply asking that Nova Scotia be left where New Brunswick is left.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I was going to suggest that I think it would be to the advantage of New Brunswick to go in with Nova Scotia in the amendment which the honourable gentleman suggests, because, as I understand it, at the present time the sheriff has nothing to do with making up or revising the list; it is only appeals from the revisers that go to the sheriff. Now, if I understand the amendment offered by the honourable senator for Middleton, it is to have that appeal go to the county court judge instead of to the sheriff. That is all there is in his amendment, so far as I understand; and I think that ought to appeal to the judgment of the House; I do not see how any one can take exception to it. As far as the sheriffs are concerned, my impression is that in my constituency they have been pretty good men, pretty honest and fair. In regard to these officials in the other parts of the province, I am not in a position to judge. In the province of New Brunswick the sheriff is appointed by the Government of the day, and he is appointed annually, not for a number of years, so that of course the office is liable to constant change. Naturally the sheriff is a strong and active supporter of the Government of the day. The object of the amendment, as I understand it, is that instead of appeals being made to those gentlemen, who are annual appointees of the Government of the day, they should be made to the county court judge.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Does the honourable gentleman say that in Nova Scotia the sheriff is appointed annually?

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Yes.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Although nominally he is appointed annually, as a matter of fact he is appointed for life.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: He is only appointed annually.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: The appointment is renewed by the fact of the Government not disturbing it; he is virtually there for life. I would call my honourable friend's attention to section 11 of the New Brunswick Elections Act, which says that the voters' lists must be made up at certain times, on or before the first day of August, and section 12 says that on or before the first day of September in each year the revisers of each city, town and parish shall meet, and, with the aid of lists furnished them, and so on. Now, the first day of September is past. Where do we stand on those lists? They are prepared, and they do not come into force until next year. If an election should come on prior to the first week in February or March, as the case may be, then we vote in New Brunswick on the electoral lists prepared the year before. Has my honourable friend considered that point at all?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: If you took the same view that I do, you would agree to insert New Brunswick in my amendment.

Hon Mr. DOMVILLE: I do not want to take any views at all. I want to go by the law and the statute.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I think that this motion should be, not to amend the Bill, but to move the House into Committee of the Whole. Then the different phases of the amendment could be considered, and the mover could answer questions; otherwise we have no opportunity to learn what we want to know.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: On the third reading of the last two important Bills here, amendment after amendment was proposed in the House, and I think it is better to follow that practice.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: In the Senate it is usual to follow the English practice and amend the Bill, when necessary, on its consideration in Committee of the Whole. I raise the point of order.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: With regard to that point of order, I would like to say that in connection with the Canadian Northern Bill we had about a dozen amendments.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: But they complied with the rule.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: In the case of the Canadian Northern Bill, in accordance with practice, all the important amendments which were moved in committee had to be repeated on the third reading, in order to be recorded with the names of the members voting pro and con; but they were repeated at the third reading, on motions that the Bill be recommitted to the Committee of the Whole House, in order to amend the Bill along certain lines, which was the proper practice. Now, the honourable gentleman from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry) raises the point, a quite important one, as to the correct practice to be followed in this House. A motion is made, in amendment to the motion for the third reading, to amend the Bill; there is also an amendment to that amendment. These questions bring us down to the details of the Bill, and I urge His Honour the Speaker to examine closely the point raised by the honourable gentleman from Stadacona as to whether we can go on proposing amendments and counter amendments to a Bill on the third reading without recommitting the Bill to the Committee of the Whole House. Of course, we can do so by general consent if the amendments are unimportant ; in fact, we can do nearly everything by general consent; but the question now is what is the correct practice to be followed? In the House of Commons members would not for a moment think of amending a Bill at the third reading stage instead of going back to the committee stage. The point is whether the regular practice should not be followed, that if amendments to the Bill be moved, that should be done in committee.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I would call attention to the fact that last night the honourable gentleman from Middleton gave notice that at the third reading he would move this amendment.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I think I was the person who told him that he need not give that notice, because a public Bill can be amended without notice; but it must be amended according to the form which says that if you move to amend a Bill in details you must return it to the Committee of the Whole.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: We discussed this amendment last night, and the understanding then was that I would make my motion on the third reading to-day.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Nobody on this side of the House is objecting to my honourable friend moving his amendment; in fact, we ourselves have amendments to move on the third reading. But when it comes to moving amendments to the Bill, I think the regular practice is the one that was followed in the case of the Canadian Northern Bill—that the Bill be recommitted to the Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My motion is that the Bill be read the third time. My honourable friend from Middleton has moved an amendment to that. My honourable friend from Stadacona suggests that, owing to this being involved in very great complications, it can be better discussed at the Table than in the House. If honourable gentlemen will consider for a moment the amendment of the honourable member for Middleton, it will be quite evident that no motion can be made possessing greater simplicity, so to speak, so far as the absence of complications is concerned.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Did my honourable friend say innocence?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am not importing unnecessary elements into the discussion. Upon the words "Nova Scotia" being struck out, then automatically all the machinery of this Bill comes into play. There is nothing complicated about it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But my honourable friend sees that there is a sub-amendment to the amendment of my honourable friend, which complicates the matter.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) has moved a very vague and shadowy amendment containing, I grant, a principle, but not containing any provisions which would be necessary for the working out of such an amendement. But the amendment of my honourable friend from Middleton is quite simple.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: We might add two more words, "Ontario and Quebec." That would be simple too.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: Too simple.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Would it not be easy by adding three or four words simply to say that such and such provisions of the Revised Statutes of Nova Scotia for the revising of the provincial lists shall apply? It would import the whole machinery.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That might be, but it is equivalent to saying—

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Will the honourable gentleman allow me? I prepared my amendment on my knees, at the last moment, when the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Ross) was moving his motion. I had not expected from what had passed that the suggestion would come from the honourable gentleman.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am very glad that my honourable friend prepared his amendment in so reverential a manner. It indicates his sincerity, anyway. What I was about to say was that if this Bill should be referred back to the committee, it would mean that any motion to amend a Bill on the third reading would have the effect of recommitting the Bill to the Committee of the Whole. Some one could simply move an amendment to the amendment, seeking to complicate it, and thus render it desirable that that should be done. It seems to me that the proper procedure is being followed in this case, and that the Bill should not be recommitted to the committee.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I will quote May also:

> When material amendments are desirable, the order for the third reading of the Bill may be discharged, and the Bill recommitted to introduce the amendments in committee.

That is the English practice.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My honourable friend (Hon. Sir James Lougheed), on the point of order, has advanced reasons which might appeal to the discretion of the House; but when we are discussing a fixed point of order we are discussing the rules, not the discretion of honourable members. It is or it is not the rule of this House that if any amendment to a Bill on the third reading is to be made, it can be made only by the Bill being sent back to the committee for that purpose. Whether the amendment proposed is one that is simple or is not simple, whether it is one that could be easily done or not easily done is something altogether outside the rule. The argument of my honourable friend for this House to proceed and dispose of this matter here without again going into committee might be a good argument if the unanimous consent of the House were obtained, but that is no answer to the objection that it is against the rule. If the rule is to be disregarded, that must be done with the unanimous consent of the House. My honourable friend will not deny that the rule is that to amend a Bill on the third reading it must be sent back to the committee. Does my honourable friend deny that?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. The Bill has not to go back to committee.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Surely my honourable friend will not seriously say that the rule does not require that a Bill shall go back to the committee to be amended?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am unaware of any such rule. The practice in this House is entirely different from that of the Commons. My honourable friend has in view the Commons practice.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Not at all.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Let us have the rule, then.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I am not able to put my finger on the rule, but to my mind it is so much the rule that I have never seen it departed from here except when the House unanimously agreed. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if the amendment and the sub-amendment are to be considered they can be discussed properly only in committee.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would draw my honourable friend's (Hon. Sir James Lougheed's) attention to the amendment moved by the honourable gentleman from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique), which opens the whole question of the revision of the lists. He will see that it is no inconsequential amendment and not a matter to be easily solved by a simple vote on the amendment and the sub-amendment. He will see that when once we enter upon this question of giving to the judges of Nova Scotia the appeal from the decisions of the sheriffs or upon any complaint, then members of the Senate may move further amendments if they believe that further amendments are needed to perfect the working of the Act. For these material reasons, I appeal to the honourable the Speaker to declare that this Bill should go back to the Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I am not prepared to say anything upon the point of order, for I think it is a rather complicated question, and I am sure that His Honour the Speaker is not ready to pronounce upon it. It seems to me at first blush, having heard the authorities read, that the point of order is well taken; but I am not prepared to pronounce upon that. I desire only to say how much I regret that the suggestion of my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) has not been accepted by the Government. Here is an amendment proposed which, I am sorry to say, shows the majority in this House to be more partisan than that of the other House. As a member of the Senate I regret that

Then a sub-amendment is proposed, and here is a point of order.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: Which side does the honourable gentleman think is partisan?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I say that I regret that the suggestion, which was a very fair and proper one, has not been accepted, that a conference should be held to discuss the question and even to discuss the point of order. If a conference were held among the leaders on both sides of this House, with the Minister of Justice, an understanding might be reached before we meet this evening at eight o'clock, and the time of the House would be saved, and we should be spared a great deal of partisanship which may be shown here this afternoon. It seems to me that the suggestion ought to be acceptable to the honourable gentleman from Middleton, who so far has been fair-minded except for this motion, which I am sorry to see in his hands, and to the honourable leader of the Government, who used to be ready to accept suggestions, much less time would be taken up. I think the difficulty could be settled in 20 minutes if the honourable leader of the Government, the honourable leader of the Opposition, and a few other members, together with the Minister of Justice and a few of the Nova Scotia members of the other House, from both parties, were to confer for the purpose of coming to an agreement. Then an amendment could be put, which would be fair to all concerned, along the lines of the sub-amendment proposed by the honourable gentleman from De Salaberry, to put the matter in the hands of the judges. Though I am not in a position to give an opinion on the point of order, it seems to me that the suggestion made by the honourable gentleman from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) ought to be accepted, and the sitting of the House suspended for half an hour, so that the point of order may be taken into consideration and an amendment may be brought in which will perhaps be agreeable to all concerned. That would smooth over the difficulties and prevent a display of partisanship. No time would be lost, because in the meantime the Railway Committee could perhaps proceed with its work. If the suggestion is not accepted, if we proceed now with this Bill, the rest of the sitting will be wasted in talk, that is certain.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: In order that my honourable friends may not think that members on this side of the House have hardened their hearts against any reasonable proposal, I may say that this matter has been discussed this morning with some of my honourable friends opposite, and every consideration has been given to working out a judicial revision of the list; but it is utterly impossible, owing to the lack of judges in Nova Scotia, to adopt any system by which the lists can be revised other than the plan which has been adopted in the Bill. It is a physical impossibility.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: How many judges are there?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I understand there are six judges. There are sixteen constituencies, and it would be utterly impossible to take those judges away from their duties and have them revise the whole of the lists for Nova Scotia within the time which will elapse between the present date and the holding of the election.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: There are the county court judges as well.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Will the honourable gentleman (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) allow me to draw his attention to this situation? Under the present Bill, leaving Nova Scotia as it is, and leaving the lists as they are, is there not a possibility of numerous appeals being made to the judges of Nova Scotia?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, after the elections.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: The question before the House is on the point of order raised by the honourable gentleman from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry). Until that question is disposed of I do not think it is in order to discuss any other question.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: With the permission of the House I should like to give this additional reason for my point of order. If we are not obliged to go into committee, why have we a committee for all Bills that come before us? The committee is a stage of our proceedings which practice has imposed, because there is more liberty in committee to discuss points that are brought up. We could do away with the committee stage of every Bill if the reasoning of our friends is correct. That reasoning could be applied to any Bill that comes before us. The procedure of referring Bills to committee is one imposed by parliamentary law and which we should follow, or, if we do not like to follow it, we can by common consent move any amendment we like.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, I would suggest this, to show the good faith of honourable gentlemen on this side: that we should now rise, and my honourable friends on this side will be only too glad to discuss the question to see if we cannot arrive at some satisfactory conclusion.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: The point of order raised by the honourable gentleman from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry) is that the amendment moved by the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. Mr. Ross), like all amendments made on the third reading of a public Bill, must be referred back to Committee of the Whole House. I have had very little time to study the question, but I do not see anything in our rules which indicates clearly the way of proceeding. I find, however, in Bourinot, Fourth Edition, page 531, the following:

In the Senate, Bills are constantly amended on the third reading without going back to committee. Previous to 1880-81 it was customary not to require a formal motion for the third reading—a practice which sometimes gave rise to misunderstandings when members wished to move amendments. Since then, the third reading is moved regularly as in the Commons. The practice in moving amendments is still very variable. Amendments are now moved after the reading of the order, or on the motion for the third reading.

We are referred then to the Senate Journals of 1867-8, pages 124, 278; 1876, pages 115, 183 and 212; 1878, page 186; 1880, page 247; 1882, page 334; 1884, pages 225 and 257; and the same practice in the Lords.

I find also in the Journals of the Senate for last session, when my honourable friend from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry) was the Speaker of the Senate—and we all know how well informed he was on points of order; he knew the procedure perfectly well, and would not allow an amendment to be moved until he was satisfied it was perfectly in order—I find the following:

The Order of the Day being read for the Third Reading of the Bill 66, "An Act in aid of Provincial Legislation prohibiting or restricting the sale or use of Intoxicating Liquors," as amended,

It was moved, That the said Bill, as amended, be now read a third time.

It was moved in amendment, That the word "not" be inserted before the word "now" in the said motion and that the following words be added at the end of the question: "but that it be amended by adding the following as subsection 2 to section 2:

"No brewer or distiller shall distil, manufacture or brew, within the boundaries of any province that has adopted prohibition, under the like penalties."

The vote was then taken.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: But there was no objection raised.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: My decision is that the point of order is not well taken.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: I would ask His Honour the Speaker, is it then our right to continue to move amendments on the third reading? Is there no limit in moving amendments?

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Other amendments may be moved.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

The Senate resumed at eight o'clock.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

On the Senate being resumed:

The debate was adjourned.

DRY DOCKS AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Bill 134, an Act to amend the Dry Docks Subsidies Act, 1910.—Hon. Sir James Lougheed.

The Senate adjourned until eleven o'clock to-morrow morning.

THE SENATE.

Wednesday, September 19, 1917.

First Sitting.

The Senate met at Eleven o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

DISORDER AT FORD CITY.

INQUIRY.

Before the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I should like to know from the honourable minister in this House if he would be willing to inquire who called out the Militia at the time of the Ford city disturbance. Some one is responsible. Everyone wants to shirk the responsibility, but I want to find out who did it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I may say to my honourable friend that I made inquiries some days ago, and it was not then known that they had been called out. I will inquire further.

WAR-TIME ELECTIONS ACT.

DEBATE ON MOTION FOR THIRD READING.

On the Order:

Resuming the adjourned debate on motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, that Bill 133, the War-Time Elections Act, as amended, be now read a third time, and the motion in amendment of the Hon. Mr. Ross (Middleton), thereto, also the motion of the Hon. Mr. Béique in amendment to the amendment, etc.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, I am still hopeful that we may be able to arrive at a mutual understanding as to what amendment may be made to the Bill. My honourable friend from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) was good enough to lend his good offices in calling a conference of some of the Nova Scotia Liberal members of the House of Commons. That conference is still discussing the question. I therefore move that the debate be adjourned until the afternoon sitting of the Senate, and that we adjourn until three o'clock this afternoon.

The debate was adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until three o'clock this afternoon.

Second Sitting.

The Senate met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

WAR-TIME ELECTIONS ACT.

DEBATE ON MOTION FOR THIRD READING.

The Senate resumed the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed that Bill 133, the War-time Elections Act, as amended, be now read a third time, and the motion in amendment of Hon. W. B. Ross, and also the motion of Hon. Mr. Béique in amendment to the amendment.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Honourable gentlemen, as my name was mentioned by the honourable leader of the Government at this morning's sitting in connection with a conference which met for the purpose of arriving at an agreement as to the amendment in question, I think it my duty to state that the parties have been unable to come to an agreement, and to state what is the point of difference between them.

It will be recalled that the motion of the honourable member from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) was based on the allegation that in the province of Nova Scotia the revising officer was appointed by the local Government, and that in certain cases he had not revised the lists as he should have done. It was suggested by the amendment that the revising officer, who, in each district or county in Nova Scotia is the sheriff, should be superseded by the enumerator to be appointed by the Government under this Act when it is passed.

To this we on this side of the House answered that it was nothing short of substituting for one political appointment another political appointment; that if, as was claimed, there was need for any redress, we were quite willing to forego the present method of revising the lists, and to allow the judges of the province to revise them de novo and to hear applications for the insertion of names, or for the removal of other names. Objection was taken to that, and the proposition embodied in the sub-amendment which I had the honour to propose yesterday, was made instead.

At the conference we submitted the following amendment by way of compromise:

In the province of Nova Scotia any enumerator, candidate or elector in any electoral district may, at any time previous to fifteen days before the date of polling, apply by way of appeal to the judge of the County Court for the judicial district in which such electoral district is situate, or to a judge of the Supreme Court of the province who may be allocated to the said electoral district by the Chief Justice of the said Court, upon the application therefor by the judge of the County Court for the judicial district in which such electoral district is situate, to add to the existing list the names of any persons who, according to the laws of the province, should have been added thereto when the said list was made, and to strike therefrom the names of such persons as should not have been allowed to remain thereon according to the laws of the province when the said list was so made. The said County or Supreme Court judge shall have power to entertain and dispose of all such applications or appeals, and shall prescribe such procedure as to notice, evidence or otherwise as in his judgment may be fair and reasonable; provided. however. that no person shall be struck off the said list without having received five days' notice of the intention so to do, either by personal service or by mailing a registered letter, postage prepaid, to said elector to the address given in said list or to his last known address,

The said judge shall, not later than the thirteenth day prior to the election, furnish the proper returning officer with the complete list of all names added to or removed from the said electoral list for the said electoral district, and the said returning officer shall allocate the same to the several proper polling subdivisions and furnish a copy of such changes and allocations to all candidates not later than ten days before polling day.

To this three exceptions were taken. First, it was claimed that the judges would not have time to make the revision, and that it would be necessary to empower the judges to appoint nominees of their own. We conceded that.

The second objection was that the revising judge should have not only the power to revise the list as made up at the time it was closed, but also the power to put on the list the names of persons who became qualified subsequent to the making up of the list, up to the first of September. We again conceded that point by way of compromise.

It was also claimed that the last clause of this proposed amendment would not harmonize with the Bill as drafted, and that it would be necessary to adopt other machinery. This was conceded also, and Mr. O'Connor was instructed to draft it so that it would harmonize with the Bill as printed.

I may say at once that this harmonizing could, in my humble opinion, easily have been done by striking out that last paragraph and substituting another. Before reading the proposal I should refer to the first paragraph of section 65A of the Bill in question. It says:

In the provinces of Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick the enumerators shall adopt as the basis of the lists of voters which they respectively shall compile the lists prepared for the several polling divisions established, and which on the sixtieth day next preceding the day fixed for the nomination of candidates for the election were in force, or were last in force, under the laws of the province, for the purposes of provincial elections, and they shall not add to such basis list any other names than those of female voters qualified to vote by this part of this Act nor strike off nor erase therefrom any other names than those of persons disqualified from voting, by this part of this Act, and section 62 of this Act shall apply not only to qualified female voters whose names do not appear on any list compiled by any enumerator and to persons whose names he has erased or struck from such basis list.

I think that the first paragraph of the draft which I have read would have harmonized with this provision of the Bill by our adopting as the second paragraph the following:

The said judge shall, not later than the . . . . day prior to nomination furnish the enumerator with a certified copy of the list as revised by him, which list shall be taken as being the list referred to in the first part of subsection 1 of section 65a of this Act.

This morning I was furnished with a copy of the proposal from the other side, which is in the following words:

Add to section 65A at the end, as paragraph 5 of Bill 133:

5. In the province of Nova Scotia—

(1) The various judges of the County Court shall be revisers of lists of voters and shall be known as Revising Officers. Each thereof shall have jurisdiction on appeal from enumerators over the electoral district within his judicial district wherein he resides, and shall have power, and is directed to appoint one other Revising Officer (who shall have similar jurisdiction) for each electoral district within such county court judge's judicial district. Such additional Revising Officers shall be barristers of not less than ten years' standing. Every Revising Officer, before acting as such, shall be sworn before the appointing judge to the faithful performance of his duties. A Revising Officer shall have power to entertain and, in manner not inconsistent with the provisions of this Act, to dispose of, all appeals which may be asserted before him. Subject to the provisions of this paragraph he shall prescribe or confirm such procedure as to notice, evidence or otherwise as in his judgment may be fair and reasonable, considering the circumstances.

To this we took no exception.

(2) The enumerators in said province shall adopt as the basis of the lists of voters which they respectively shall compile the lists prepared for the several polling divisions established, and which on the sixtieth day next preceding the day fixed for the nomination of candidates for the election were in force or were last in force under the laws of the province for the purposes of provincial elections, and they shall not add to such basis lists any other names than those of (a) female persons qualified by this part of this Act to vote at the election of a member, and (b) male persons who according to the laws of the province were qualified to be added to such lists when the same were made or who under the laws of the province or under this part of this Act are qualified to so vote, nor shall such enumerator strike off nor erase from such basis lists any other names than those of (a) persons who, when such lists were made were not qualified to have their names entered thereon or (b) persons disqualified by this Act from voting at the election of a member. Every enumerator in said province who shall strike off or erase from any such basis list the name of any person shall forthwith mail to such person by registered letter, to the address given in such basis list or to his last known address, notice of the fact and of the reason. Every enumerator in said province shall complete, date at his place of residence and sign the copies of the voters' lists prepared by him fifteen days before the polling day; two of such copies he shall forthwith post up as required by section 48 of this Act and a third he shall personally deliver or mail by registered letter to the Revising Officer for the electoral district wherein his polling division is contained. He shall also deliver or mail by registered letter a copy of such list to each of the candidates. Such list so prepared shall not be subject to revision by the enumerator, nor shall he have any further duty to perform except the issuance in any necessary case of a certificate in Form W-3 under paragraph (g) of section 67. If the enumerator refuses or omits to enter upon the list of voters the names of any person whom he is by this paragraph authorized to enter thereon or strikes off or erases from the basis list the name of any person other than one which he is by this paragraph authorized to strike or erase therefrom, such person, (or, in the case of a qualified person who may be absent from the polling division at the time of the enumeration, an elector in the polling division acting on such absent person's behalf) may within four days after the posting up by the enumerator of such list, appeal to such Revising Officer by notice in writing stating the facts and mailed to the enumerator and to said Revising Officer respectively. An appeal shall also lie in like manner, and on the like and further notice by registered letter to the person entered on the list, from the entry by the enumerator under authority of this paragraph of the name of such person on such list. The registered letter shall be mailed to the address of the person as appearing on the list, or to his last known address. The Revising Officer shall first sit at such place as he may fix and notify by public advertisement, ten days before polling day. He shall continue in session as Revising Officer until all appeals have been disposed of but in any event for not longer than six days, or, if any one of the five days following his first day's session is a Sunday, he shall arrange to conclude his business as such Revising Officer in five days. He shall make and initial the alterations in the lists of voters, rendered necessary as a result of his decisions, and shall append and sign to each of such lists the following words:—

I certify that the foregoing is a correct list of the voters in polling division No. (or as the case may be) of the electoral district of as revised on appeal by me this day of , 1917.

"Revising Officer of the Electoral district of in the province of Nova Scotia.

Four days before polling day the Revising Officer shall deliver or mail by registered letter to each of the candidates in the electoral district a statement of such alterations as he has made in the lists of voters on appeal, and on the same day he shall deliver to the proper returning officer the lists revised on appeals and as well all other lists received by him from the various enumerators, but respecting which no appeals have been asserted, or, if asserted, no changes have been made. The returning officer shall deliver such lists to the proper deputy returning officers forthwith or before six o'clock on the morning of the polling day. All such lists shall be deemed closed and section 62 of this Act shall not apply thereto, or to the persons whose names appear thereon.

Honourable gentlemen will see that under the provisions of paragraph 2 of this draft the provincial lists in Nova Scotia are completely set aside, except that in preparing the lists the enumerator will take the last provincial lists as a basis; but he may strike out names or add to the list as he deems advisable. Therefore the enumerator is entrusted with the duty and is given the power of preparing an entirely new list. The electors of the province will be placed in this position. Under the list as at present prepared, if provision is made for revision, the name of any person who happens to be on the list remains there unless it is attacked and unless it is shown that the name has no right to be there; whereas, if this suggestion were adopted, it would result in an entirely new list, and it would be incumbent upon any person whose name was not placed on the list as prepared by the enumerator to claim that his name should be put on the list, and to establish his right to have it there. That would be altogether unfair. It would be putting the whole electorate of the province to the trouble of having a new list made, and of establishing de novo their right to be on the list, instead of merely having to answer to the revision of the list as made, and as it may be amended by the revising judge, if the system as suggested by this side of the House were adopted. In other words, the proposition announced to-day is that the Government shall be allowed to appoint enumerators who shall have the power and the opportunity to stuff the electoral lists as they like, and to give to the other side the opportunity to try, by way of revision, to clean it up as well as they can before the list is finally closed at six o'clock on the morning of the voting day. Honourable gentlemen can understand that it would be quite easy to obstruct the revision of the list to such an extent that it could not be properly revised within five days. The root of the whole difficulty, and the main objection to the suggestion, is that it wipes out the provincial list and provides for the making of an electoral list de novo.

I am asked to explain more clearly the difference between the one plan and the other. I think I have already given a clear explanation; but I will repeat it. Under the plan as suggested by myself and some of my friends, the provincial list will be taken, and it will be open to any elector or any candidate, or to the enumerator himself, to ask a judge to revise the list and to strike out any names which should not have been added to the list, or to add any names which should have been included, and we give ample time for that by allowing the judge to appoint nominees, as was suggested by the other side, so that all facilities might be afforded for the revision. We also consented by way of compromise to allow any person who had no right to vote in April last, or in January last, when the list was made up, but who, between that time and the first of September, became qualified by age or otherwise, to be added to the list. Under the draft as now suggested by the other side, we are asked to consent to a new list being prepared by the enumerator, and when that list has been so prepared, the other party has five days within which to appeal from the list, and to ask either that names be struck off or that names be added to the list, the list to be completed by six o'clock on the morning of voting day.

Now, honourable gentlemen, I desire to call the attention of this honourable House to the fact that when this Bill was introduced in the other House by the Government, it was expressly stated by the Secretary of State, who introduced it and gave the explanations, that in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta the lists are always prepared for each election, and that the same practice would have to be followed in those provinces; that the preparation of the lists would have to be entrusted to enumerators appointed for the purpose; and that in the provinces of Manitoba and British Columbia, although there were provincial lists which were used in former elections, in the present instance there were certain categories of electors whose names would have to be struck off or added, as the case might be, which would disturb those lists to such an extent that it became necessary, as in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, to have new lists prepared by the enumerators. The Secretary of State added:

The provincial franchise, subject to the operation of the two principles I have described in the foregoing part of my address, is adopted in every province including Alberta and Saskatchewan.

Franchise, of course, is one thing and list making is another. The alterations in the franchise, described in that portion of the Bill dealing with the franchise which alterations I have endeavoured to explain so far, were such that there had to be variations in the elections Act to enable the lists to be made. For example, in British Columbia and Manitoba, the lists that are now made contain the names of all women as well as of men; consequently, we have addressed ourselves to the task of making a list to meet the franchise requirements of this legislation. In the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan there are no provincial lists and by our own Dominion Elections Act, which has been in force since 1905—indeed, I think before—the Dominion provides machinery for the making of the lists. By this Act the machinery which heretofore has been applicable only to the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan is made applicable to all those provinces where the present lists are such that new lists are necessary; namely to the four western provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba and as well to Prince Edward Island. It was impossible to use any lists to be found in those provinces and consequently the machinery which has been in force for twelve years as to the provision of lists in Alberta and Saskatchewan is made applicable to the other three provinces.

And further on:

I have covered the method so far as it applies to the four western provinces and Prince Edward Island. There are left the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. In those provinces the women are not on the list last made up. In the province of Ontario the list last made up was prepared last fall and completed, I believe, in December. It is only a male list. That list has also been judicially reviewed according to the Ontario law, and there is no reason for throwing that list away and making a new list by enumerators. This year's list will, of course, include some names of women. My words in that regard apply only to the counties of Ontario and to towns up to 9,000 population. In towns over 9,000 and in cities, there are no completed lists. consequently, as to towns and cities in Ontario, another method of making the list has to be devised. First, let me deal with the counties of Ontario. In the counties of Ontario there is a list covering all places except towns and cities over 9,000 population. That list has been made up and was revised judicially last December.

In Quebec, in the cities of Montreal and Quebec, there are also completed lists, and in all the rest of Quebec there are lists now approaching completion, and to be completed this month. Those lists should be kept in mind in conjunction with the Ontario lists in counties, because all are treated the same. Similarily in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia there are lists now complete.

The lists so made up of male voters all judicially revised in Ontario and Quebec and revised by the provincial methods in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, are by this Bill adopted, so far as they go. The only requirement as to them is to add such of the women as by this Bill are to be entitled to vote and to substract such of the men, if any, as, by reason of alienage, should not be entitled to vote. This is done by means of a system of enumeration similar to that adopted in the other provinces. The names of women are enumerated along the lines of the present Ontario Act. I am not speaking now of the cities of Ontario; I shall ask hon. members to keep the cities of Ontario until I get through with the counties of Ontario and with the provinces of Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. As regards these latter the lists are adopted and the enumeration only goes to the adding of the names of the additional women now entitled to vote and to the striking off of those who by reason of alienage, and nothing else, are disentitled to vote. That is the province and duty of the registrars or enumerators, whatever you call them, and that alone. They cannot in other respects affect those lists. The work of the enumerators to that extent, namely the adding of the women and the taking off of the men by reason of alienage, is subject to the same safeguards on election day as obtain in the four western provinces and in Prince Edward Island. That is to say, any one who is taken off by the enumerator and claims the right to vote, may, by taking the necessary oath on election day, vote, and his vote goes in an envelope; and if any one has not been put on by an enumerator and claims the right to vote—and it must be a woman of course because no one else has the right to be put on—she may go and assert her claim, and if the enumerator refuses it she may vote and her vote goes in an envelope. The vote of any one claimed to be wrongfully put on may be challenged, and it will then go into the protested lists and be subject, as all other protested votes, to revision.

I now come to the cities of Ontario. But perhaps I should first repeat that there is no review of what has already been reviewed; that is to say, of the lists as already made up in the counties of Ontario, in Quebec, in New Brunswick, and in Nova Scotia. There is no review of those lists except, of course, so far as the work of the enumerator goes, and the enumerator has power only to add the women vote and to strike off by reason of alienage. He can strike off for no other cause. That work and that alone is subject to final review by a judge. The rest of the list is already completed and revised, and that stands for this election.

Honourable gentlemen will see that it was well said by the Government itself when the Bill was introduced, and that principle was respected when the Bill was put through the other House, that as far as the provinces of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick were concerned the provincial lists were not to be disturbed. I think we went a long way when, because it was alleged that there might be complaints, we consented to open the revision anew, and have that revision made by judges; and I submit that honourable gentlemen in this House should have been satisfied with that concession, and that it is altogether unreasonable to ask that new lists be made, especially when it is done in violation of the principle laid down by the Government in introducing the measure both in this House and in the House of Commons. For my part, I must say that I cannot explain the attempt now made to change the system and to have a new list made, except that it is for the purpose of taking an undue political advantage by one side over the other. I do hope there will be found in this honourable House a number of men of sound and impartial judgment, who will understand and appreciate the unreasonablemess of the motion which has been made, and will give their vote against the amendment and support the sub-amendment. My sub-amendment simply asks that the Bill be amended in such a way that the electoral lists may be revised by the county judge at any time within thirty days from the passing of this Act. This motion embodies merely the principle I have laid before this House as the true one on which it should act, and if this amendment is adopted it will be the duty of the House to proceed to arrange the proper machinery to carry it out.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I would like to ask if the Government, or honourable gentlemen on the other side, wish us to discuss the proposal which has come from the other side? If so, it will be impossible for us to discuss such an important matter intelligently unless we have before us the terms of the proposal. Both sides are accusing each other of partisanship, those on the other side saying that they cannot accept the lists for Nova Scotia because those who revise them were appointed by the local Government, which is a Liberal one. On this side we say: supposing that is true, we offer to you the proposition to have the list revised by the county judges of that province. But the other side will not accept that, saying that they have no confidence in lists prepared by officers of the local Government. They go further and insult the judges by saying that they have no confidence in the judges revising the lists, and they propose to appoint enumerators to prepare the lists, to be afterwards revised by the judges. For one, I am not willing to discuss the counter proposal without the opportunity of reading it; but I consider the sub-amendment of my honourable friend from De Salaberry fair to everybody, and will support it. I would like to ask the leader of the Government what the intention is—whether to go on with this proposal, or drop it and go on with the real amendment and the sub-amendment; or to adjourn again in order to give time to the members generally to look over this matter when it is printed in Hansard.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: All I can answer to my honourable friend is this: that a conference took place lasting the most of yesterday and almost until midnight last night; that, when the Government came to put into workable shape the proposals agreed upon, my honourable friends on the Liberal side would not accept those proposals.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: Then what is the consequence?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There is no other alternative than for the debate to be proceeded with.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Do I understand the honourable gentleman to say that the agreement come to last night was not accepted to-day on this side of the House? Is it not a fact that the agreement entered into last night was on the basis that I have claimed it should be— that there should be a revision of the list and not a new list?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We have accepted as the basic list the provincial list, but when we come to apply the machinery which the Government considers absolutely necessary for the purpose of completing that list as a list revised by the judge, then my honourable friends do not accept. There is just that difference of opinion, and it seems to be irreconcilable. It is a regrettable fact that such is the case; but the Government must necessarily be influenced by the law officers of the Crown as to what machinery is necessary to put into effect the requirements of the proposition which we yesterday discussed. That has been submitted, and it has not been accepted.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I hope I shall be allowed to say this: that the draft which I have read as being our proposition was left in the hands of the Secretary of State and Mr. O'Connor, with the understanding that it would be amended so as to harmonize with the Bill.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But that cannot be carried out.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: And that embodied the principle which was agreed on. I would be glad to have an explanation.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I was present at the conference which took place between representatives from both sides of this House and representatives from both sides of the House of Commons. The honourable member for De Salaberry, so far as he has gone, has frankly and fairly stated what took place; but the honourable gentleman has, I am sure not intentionally, omitted one thing which I consider of great importance in the discussion. After the discussion had proceeded all afternoon, and I think far into the evening, the Secretary of State, (Hon. Mr. Meighen), came into the meeting and read the memorandum which has first been read by the honourable member for De Salaberry. As soon as he read it he said that the proposition could not be worked out in the language which was embodied in that agreement. In other words, he said, "This memorandum is quite unworkable." After we discussed it for some time further, the Secretary of State said, "Now we are agreed upon the settlement of this question, and I wish to state"—

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Agreed upon the principle.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Upon the principle, if you choose, on which this question is to be settled—I think that is accurate—"and I shall state what we are agreed upon." He then went over the memorandum, not reading it, but summarizing it, and said: "Now, we shall carry this out on the plan laid down for the cities of Ontario; we shall adopt the machinery which is to be used in settling the lists in the province of Ontario." I confess that, so far as I am concerned, I had not read that part of the Franchise Act which related to the cities of the province of Ontario. No person in the meeting demurred to the statement made by the Secretary of State, and we left the meeting on the understanding that Mr. O'Connor should draft an amendment to the Franchise Act providing for our adopting the machinery which is to be used in settling the lists in the province of Ontario. Now when one reads the clause of the Franchise Act applicable to the cities of the province of Ontario, which is subsection 3 of section 65A, one sees at once that the enumerator has to make the list, striking out the names which should be striken from the lists, and adding names which should be added to it. Therefore if the Secretary of State's suggestion, which was agreed to by all those present—I am not saying that it was thoroughly understood— is to be followed, it necessarily follows that paragraph 2 of the proposed amendment is really the amendment which was agreed to at that meeting.

I believe that all parties to the conference are expressing themselves candidly, and I do not consider that the honourable member for De Salaberry is making a statement which is not as he understood it; but I think it was the duty of those who were at the conference, if they did not know what were the provisions for the settlement of the electoral lists for the cities of the province of Ontario, to look at those provisions. At all events, it would have been the part of prudence to have done so. I was not concerned to look at the provisions, because what would satisfy the Secretary of State and the members from Nova Scotia was absolutely satisfactory to me, and I had no concern in the matter in any way excepting to endeavour so far as I could to bring those interested to an agreement.

I conceive that the only difference between us is this, under the proposed amendment the duty is thrust upon the enumerator of striking from the voters' list such names as he by evidence finds should not have been put on that list when it was finally revised, and of adding to that list the names of those whom he finds on evidence were improperly left off the list when it was finally revised. I am not addressing myself to the question of the women's vote, or the question of striking at the aliens.

Application is open to both sides, and if the enumerator adds to that list names to which either side objects, the objector may carry the matter before the county judge. The war is over this: both sides say that when the list comes before the county judge the applicant has the labouring oar and must prepare the evidence for the county judge. I cannot see any substance in this objection, because when the list comes before the county judge the appellant must present his evidence, truly; but the respondent must also come there with his evidence. There is no additional expense: there is no expense on the appellant which would not have been on him if he had been the respondent; there is no expense on the respondent which would not have been on him if he were the appellant.

I am not saying more at the moment about the agreement; but in my judgment the honourable gentleman from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) is quite wrong when he says that it is left to the Government to stuff these lists. I have just enough confidence in my opponents in political matters not to leave them any more discretion than I can help; and I think my opponents are equally justified in giving me as little discretion as they are compelled to do. But let us study this for a moment. The Solicitor General, it is said, laid down in the House of Commons as a principle that the lists of the provinces of Nova Scotia, Ontario, New Brunswick and Quebec should not be interfered with. But after the Solicitor General had delivered himself of this speech, the Conservative members from the province of Nova Scotia demurred. They said: "It is quite reasonable for you to adopt this principle in so far as it affects Ontario and Quebec, because in those provinces the revision of the voters' lists is by a judge, and the reviser has the confidence of both sides in politics, but in the province of Nova Scotia a different condition obtains. We have for years, session after session, asked the powers that be in the province of Nova Scotia to substitute for the sheriff, who is their officer and a partisan, the county judge, who dwells in a higher atmosphere and is free from political affiliations; and they have so often absolutely and flatly refused, although they knew that throughout the Dominion of Canada Liberals and Conservatives alike were willing to have their lists settled by the judicial officer." And they said: "As a consequence of these lists being finally settled by a partisan officer, we have not received fair treatment and the lists have not represented the electorate honestly and honourably; we object to it." They protested so strongly and brought forward so many facts that they have induced the Government to believe, and the Government does believe, that there is substance in their objection and that the lists in Nova Scotia should not be treated on the same basis as the lists in the other provinces.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Would the honourable gentleman give us any explanation as to why all this was not said by the Conservative members in the House of Commons when this Bill was under discussion?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I am not a diviner and I cannot tell my honourable friend the reason, because I was not in the House of Commons and I have no information of what occurred in that House.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It was not disclosed in the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: All I can say is that these facts have been brought to the notice of the Government, and, upon this condition being disclosed, this amendment has been offered in this House. As to whether it should have been brought up in the other House or not, I have nothing to say.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: The honourable gentleman mentioned New Brunswick. I should like to know the attitude of those who attended the conference as regards New Brunswick?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: So far as New Brunswick is concerned, there has been no objection raised.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I am told there is no objection raised. We are frying other fish at the present moment. It is conceded by the Liberals of Nova Scotia that the Conservatives of Nova Scotia have made out some sort of case anyway, because they say, "Admitting that our reviser, the sheriff, is a partisan, we will give you the right to appeal." They do not for a moment admit, they have most forcibly denied, that the sheriff in any case has acted improperly. They say that in any constituency you can count on your fingers the appeals which have taken place in years; they say that in many cases the sheriff has been appointed the returning officer by the Conservative Dominion Government; and so on. For these reasons, they say: "We are quite willing that these lists should be submitted to the county judge."

Now, we have all got to the point that the lists should be submitted to the county judge for revision; and I have pointed out, as clearly as I am able, the reasons why in my judgment and belief there would be no extra expense put upon either party by reason of his being the appellant to the county judge.

Now let us see what will happen before the enumerator. Honourable gentlemen have with one voice averred that there are very few, if any, inaccuracies in these lists, and have called in evidence the fact that year after year few, if any, objections have been taken to these lists. If that is true, then, when the matter comes before the enumerator, he is bound to take evidence, and he is sworn to perform his duty, and he has before him the fact that the case is appealable to the county judge. Both sides are represented before him. Is it conceivable that a man, knowing that the county judge will sit in appeal over him, will strike off wholesale names from that list?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: He can do it.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Oh, he has the right, and so has the county judge. It is a matter of indifference to me which contention succeeds in this. I am only trying now to explain the matter as it strikes me, and not to express any opinion on it. My honourable friend says that when the lists come before the enumerator, it is left open to the Government to stuff them. Well, if you have men brazen enough, in broad daylight, in violation of their oath, with both sides represented, with an appeal to the county judge, open to stuff the lists, then you are better—or worse—politicians even than Sam Slick said you were. But, from what I have been told by honourable gentlemen on the other side, I do not believe that when these lists come before the enumerator he will strike off more than 10 or 20 names, or add more than 10 or 20.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: He might add a hundred.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: He might add a hundred; he might add a thousand.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Without notice.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: No, no —as I understand it. If it is not so provided, it should be provided, that he should not have power to add any names except in the presence of both sides and after hearing evidence from both sides. That is the way I read it.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: That is not provided in the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: If it is not provided for, I agree that it is improper that it is not. It should be. I say that the enumerator should sit in open court, that both sides should be represented, that either side should give evidence, and that he should give judgment on the facts, and if he does not give that judgment on the facts, he is a disgraced man. If the enumerator is put in the position of a judicial officer and changes the list only on evidence and in the presence of both sides, there will be, in my opinion, no appeal from him in nine cases out of ten. You must necessarily go before the enumerator when you apply to strike off the alien vote; or when you apply to add the women's vote; and, according to the memorandum, you could then have to go to the county judge and have yourselves put to four or five days' trouble, when you could settle the whole thing before the enumerator and in nine cases out of ten there would be no appeal to the county judge. To my mind the present amendment cuts down the trouble for the candidates and their friends by one-half. To my mind this reduces the expense. To my mind it is absolutely fair. To my mind this machinery is more desirable than the other. The only objection to it is the assumption that the enumerator will act as a felon and not discharge his duty.

I have heard members from Nova Scotia on this side of the House and in the House of Commons say: "So far as I am concerned, I am willing that any barrister in the province of Nova Scotia should be appointed by the judge as revising officer; I am not in the least concerned what his politics are." I think that the members on the other side of the House have equal confidence in the integrity of a member of the legal profession when acting in a judicial capacity. So if men are to be selected as enumerators in Nova Scotia who are respectable men—and I have not noticed in any election, provincial or Dominion, any quarrel as to the selection of the returning officers, who have far more power, or of the deputy returning officers—I cannot see, unless we are going to stickle on a question of principle quite irrespective of whether or not that principle is going to injure or benefit us, why this amendment should not be agreed to.

As I have said before, I think all the gentlemen who appeared at the meeting of the committee and took part in it acted fairly, displayed no heat, and appeared to be anxious to arrive at a fair solution of this problem. I think that we have the opinion of the law officers of the Crown that this is the only practicable way to work out the problem—that, if we adopt that memorandum as it is, we shall have confusion worse confounded, we shall perhaps have the elections in the province of Nova Scotia contested, we shall have trouble. I cannot see how either side can be in any way prejudiced by adopting the proposed amendment.

The honourable member for De Salaberry has said that they have only five days in which to appeal from this stuffed list. I think the honourable gentleman is quite in error —and sincerely in error. The judge on the appeal has to sit for five days. You may prepare your appeal, and surely, when there is a judge for every electoral division, you can dispose of the appeals in five days. A great deal of talking can be done in that time.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Electoral division or polling division?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: In the electoral division. But if you want to change the time I do not see why we should not do so. Divide the time that we now have on election day, and work it out so that there can be no doubt that sufficient time will be given to everybody, and there will be no snap judgment; everybody will be on the same basis. Let me point out, too, that if the list is to go before the county judge, before whom the honourable member for De Salaberry wants it to go in its present form, what is to prevent any person who is opposed to that list from objecting to the whole list? If he objects to the whole list, in substance, we must make a new list. The judge will have to learn the complete history of every man just the same, if you are all unreasonable. You are not going to avoid making a new list if we have to deal with a lot of silly, prejudiced people, no matter on what side.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That state of affairs might happen after the enumerators got through with the list.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Certainly it might happen.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Then your solution does not end the difficulty.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I am going to assume—it may be a violent assumption—that the people of Nova Scotia are reasonable; that they are not going to waste their time, when they ought to be out before the electors, in battling over matters before the judge or the enumerator; but that when they have real objections they are going to dispose of them before the enumerator or the county judge. I would not give the enumerator any discretion over those lists except the judicial discretion, that is, to find the evidence.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Did the honourable the Secretary of State take any exception in principle to the draft which was read by him at the conference last night, except saying that it would have to be arranged in order to be workable?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: What the Secretary of State said—I am going to answer you candidly——

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I will put another question so that the honourable gentleman can answer it at the same time: and did you not understand that the principle of revision, on which the draft was based, was accepted?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I say, first, that the Secretary of State said that this form was unworkable. Then he said it would have to be worked out by the machinery used in the Ontario cities. That is my answer to the first question. Whether that involved the principle or not, I am not able to say; but so far as I myself am concerned, I have already stated that I did not know what the Ontario machinery was, and I did not recognize that it made any change. I have stated to the honourable member for De Salaberry privately, and I state it to him now, that I did not myself appreciate that by invoking the use of the machinery for the cities of Ontario we were going to change in any way the memorandum.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Will my honourable friend allow me one question? I understand the two gentlemen who were there from the House of Commons to ask the Secretary of State that very question about that Ontario matter.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: If they did, I may assure the honourable gentleman that it was not in my hearing.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I am in doubt as to the Ontario system. Has the honourable gentleman found what the system is?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Yes. It is set out in subsection 3 of section 65A of the Act, and it provides that the same course shall be pursued as is set out in section 2 of this amendment. In other words, section 2, objected to by the honourable member for De Salaberry is, as near as may be, a copy of subsection 3 of section 65A as far as it is applicable to the case in hand.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I want to make a suggestion, although I am not very hopeful that it will be acted upon; but if we can avoid losing any more time I think it is desirable. It appears clearly from the two statements we have heard that we are fighting about nothing. The honourable member for Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton) tells us that they agreed on the principle, and from all we know there was a distinct agreement on the principle that there should be a judicial revision. The difficulty has arisen in the matter of carrying it out. Would it not be a wise thing to see if we cannot find a way of carrying out the agreement that has been arrived at on both sides? What are we talking about? Merely a matter of procedure, is that not all?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Then had we not better adjourn, to let the jury see if they cannot agree?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would say to my honourable friend that it seems to be hopeless to make further endeavours to come to any agreement on this subject. We have occupied all to-day up to three o'clock; we adjourned this morning in the hope that a mutual understanding would be arrived at with our honourable friends opposite; but those who represent the Liberal members of the House of Commons seem to be obdurate on this question. If my honourable friend thinks that he has greater persuasive powers than those who have taken the matter in hand, we shall be glad to let him see if he can find a settlement. But we are charged with trying to pass this Bill, and we have spent so much time on it that I think we should proceed with it.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I think we should confine ourselves to the discussion of the amendment and the sub-amendment. It is the only thing to do, because there can be no agreement between the parties. I charge the Government with acting very partially in this matter, especially after hearing what has been said by the honourable member for Hamilton. I was informed this morning that there was an understanding on the lines suggested by my honourable friend from De Salaberry, and that this understanding was accepted by the Government and by the Secretary of State. It was so at twelve o'clock, and this morning I was told by a member of the Government that the arrangement was all off, because so many members of the other House objected to it and wished to have the revising of the lists in Nova Scotia in their hands. This is the game, and we see through it. But the other side has not the courage to bring up that question in the other House; so we must take the matter as it stands now. It seems that the members of the other House have now changed their minds, and have imposed on the Government the necessity of changing this Bill. I say "imposed," because I am sure that the honourable leader of this House in his heart would be glad if the Bill would stay as it is now—that he is opposed in his heart to the amendment, because he is a fair man. The honourable member for Middleton boldly said yesterday that the reason this amendment had not been put through in the other House was because the closure was brought up against the Tory members in the other House, and they were not at liberty to introduce the amendment which they are now asking us to make to this Bill. I think that this admission from the mouth of a Tory like the honourable member for Middleton shows how far they may go with this closure, and how the rights of the people have been trampled upon in the other House by the Government.

In regard to this amendment, it has been stated that both parties are acting as partisans. The Liberals are satisfied with the way the voters' lists are prepared in Nova Scotia, and it seems that the Tories have been satisfied too, for there has been no complaint. Those appointed by the Liberal Government there to prepare the lists had to give notice that on a certain day the lists would be closed, and complaints against them would be heard, and if the lists are now closed it is only fair to assume that they are correct, and that the Conservatives in Nova Scotia are satisfied with them. I am surprised to hear a lawyer of the standing of the honourable member from Hamilton say it would be for a man who is on the list to bring proof of his right to be included rather than to require those who are attacking his right to prove that he is not entitled to vote. I am sure my honourable friend from Hamilton would never as a lawyer give that opinion which he is now supporting as a senator. A lawyer who would put that before a court of justice would be laughed at by the judge on the Bench. Now, those Nova Scotia lists are supposed to be correct, and have been accepted by everybody there; but both parties can make application for the addition of other names, such as women, soldiers, and others; then finally the judge will revise this list. Is that not fair? That is the principle maintained by the sub-amendment. Nobody can vote against this amendment unless he refuses the right to vote to those who are now on the Nova Scotia electoral list, or unless, with a partisan view, he wishes to make it a stuffed list, as the honourable member for De Salaberry has said. We on this side of the House may be accused of trying to favour the Liberals of Nova Scotia, and the other side may be accused of trying to favour the Conservatives there; but when we are prepared to take the opinion of the judges of the province, what can be said? We must stop accusations of partisanship at the door of the court-house at least. Can anybody deny that it is a fair proposition to leave to the county judges in the province the revision of the lists? That proposition is found in this amendment, which I will support with great pleasure.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: The subject for discussion before the House this afternoon is the province of Nova Scotia. I have the honour to come from a portion of Nova Scotia—the city of Halifax. Perhaps we have a pride in the metropolis of the province in supposing that we are equal in intelligence and repute to the people of any other county in Nova Scotia. We do not claim superiority in any respect, but simply an equality with the other counties of the province.

I think I may claim the right to say a word historically on the subject of elections in Nova Scotia, especially in the city of Halifax. My knowledge of elections began in the year 1847. I took part in the election of 1859, and I have had an intimate knowledge of all the elections that have taken place in the province since that date. I may say, with regard to the outside districts in the county of Halifax, with which I am familiar, that the municipal council elects revisers, and they—both sides of politics being represented—make up the lists for country districts in the county. There is an appeal to the sheriff—

Hon. Mr. POWER: The honourable gentleman remembers that there is first a preliminary list made by the reviser who hears the appeals.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: Yes. I omitted that because it is patent to every one here that a list is first prepared, gone over, and posted up for the information of every one in the district.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: Will the honourable gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: I would much prefer that the honourable gentleman wait until the end of my remarks, when I will endeavour to answer him. I am not a legal man, and I do not think it is fair to break in on a layman. I may say that the sheriff of the county of Halifax has always been regarded as a model of fairness and impartiality. We had some objection to sheriff Archibald because we thought he rather leaned towards the Tories. He had been a Liberal, and fearing that it might be asserted that he leaned towards the Liberals, he took good care to give the Tories a fair proportion of everything they demanded, and as a result we rather complained that he leaned towards them. The present sheriff is Sheriff Hall. I think no one accuses him of partiality. I think he has evinced by the propriety of his conduct that he intends to act impartially. When the Tories get in they invariably thank and praise the sheriff for his impartiality, and afterwards say that he has conducted the elections with the utmost fairness and that they have full confidence in his decisions and in his conduct. When they do not get in, they are like bears with sore heads: everything has gone wrong; there has been partiality; there has been undue leaning; there has been misconduct. I am quite willing, so far as my little influence goes in the county and city of Halifax, to submit the question of appeal to the sheriff, to the county judge, to the judge of the Supreme Court, or to any of those gentlemen, who are above any imputation of wrong doing, and whose character and attainments would warrant that their decisions would be of the utmost fairness and according to law. So much for the sheriffs.

This afternoon I heard the very acute legal argument of the honourable gentleman who has such an intimate knowledge of Nova Scotia and of Sam Slick and other literary products of Nova Scotia, but who has not such an intimate acquaintance with the facts. I am not a lawyer, as every one can judge from my conversation, but I am in possession of some facts that the honourable gentleman does not know. I say that when a new form of enumeration is set up the burden of proof that the former system was improperly exercised or inadequate. Did the legal gentleman do that? He took the essential point for granted. He did not prove that the present enumeration was a failure, or that it was partial or illegal in any respect. In the first place, the names put on the lists come from the assessors' books. The assessors are fully acquainted with the property of the individual. They are chosen from various parts of the city, and they give their very best attention to the compilation of the lists, which are posted up. The revisers and enumerators have access to the assessors' books; which are in the court house building where they have their office, and they have full intercourse with the assessors and other officials. The revisers then make out lists from their knowledge, and from the applications which they receive. These men are all sworn. They are all of good character; they all have experience. Why not put that experience, knowledge, character and sworn obligation by the side of an enumerator who must be chosen? Unless we assume that the enumerator has a better character, more knowledge or more experience than these other men, we should not lay aside the present system. We should not lay aside the present system if it be equal or superior to the one that is proposed. Both sides come before the reviser or arbiter to make out their case. They have attorneys. They state reasons why certain names should be left off the lists or why they should be put on, and the city clerk, a sworn official of the city, sits in judgment. Then the persons whose names are posted up are allowed to vote. I have had experience of enumerators in my time. Some twenty odd years ago Mr. E. H. Harrington, a very respectable and honourable barrister of Halifax, was appointed revising barister. Next Mr. B. H. Eaton was appointed. He was a man of great integrity, but he was not a native of the city of Halifax. He did not know the people, and great confusion arose from the fact that the names of individuals who lived in one extremity of the city were put on the lists for districts far remote from their residences, and where they were not known. Without any intention of doing so, he frequently left off names which should have been on the list, those of citizens of respectability who had been qualified for a long time.

It has been demonstrated by experience in the city of Halifax that the system at present in vogue is infinitely superior to any enumerator, even when he enters upon his duties with the best intention. First of all, he has not the time; secondly, he has not the knowledge; thirdly, he has not the benefit of collateral sources of information to enable him to make out a list as accurately as it can be done under the present system. Sometimes the conduct of these officials does not satisfy gentlemen on the opposite side of politics; but if they are successful in the elections they say that everything has worked admirably and smoothly, that the officials have discharged their functions with repute, and that there could be no better system than the one at present in vogue.

Now, honourable gentlemen, from theory, from history, from experience and from knowledge of the circumstances, I have no hesitation in saying that the lists as at present prepared are as near accuracy as it is possible for them to be, because the information has been derived from the best sources, the men employed are men of integrity, they are anxious to discharge their duties properly, they have the information at hand to enable them to do so; and, as an honourable gentleman has said, if, with all those qualifications, they do not make out a better list than the enumerator can they are criminals, I should be very loth to place the stigma of being criminals upon the heads of those city officials who have given the best of their services and have the confidence of the community.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: I should like to ask the honourable the leader of the Government a question. I have tried twice to do so, but did not succeed. I am of the opinion of the honourable member for Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt). I cannot believe that there is no way to an agreement. The honourable leader of the House has said that the question of agreement was closed; but does he not think that the suggestions made by the honourable member for Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton) opens the door to another conference, and does he not think that the differences between both parties are narrower than they were before? It is now five o'clock. Perhaps by eight o'clock the two parties could agree. I am inclined to believe that those who took part in the conference must be of opinion that the suggestions made by the honourable gentleman from Hamilton deserve to be taken into consideration. I am sure that the honourable leader of this House must attach some importance to those suggestions.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I pointed out to my honourable friends before that we had been most anxious to meet their wishes in every possible way, but it seems impossible to do so. It is not necessary for me to say that the session is drawing to a close, and that we must proceed with this Bill. As my honourable friends have not accepted the workable form, in which we on this side of the House consider we have embodied the principle suggested as a basis of settlement, I am not aware of any other concession that we can make.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: The honourable gentleman cannot deny that the honourable member for Hamilton has suggested an amendment.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We have spent two days in trying to get my honourable friends to accept that very same proposal.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Honourable gentlemen, I made some observations on the second reading of this measure, but I think I may add a few words more. The honourable leader of this House says that this measure must be put through this session, and, because it is desirable that the session should close at an early date, that we should go ahead and dispose of the measure now; and he practically says that any one who undertakes to hold up this measure and delay its passing is really not a friend of the country—is an enemy of the country.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I have not said anything about that.

Hon. Mr. POWER: It is implied. Now, who is responsible for this hold-up? If the honourable gentleman had allowed the Bill to pass as it came from the House of Commons there would not have been any delay at all. But the honourable gentleman allows one of his supporters to get up in this House and move an amendment which, as regards the province of Nova Scotia, practically contravenes the principle laid down in the Bill. I think that under such circumstances it is really not becoming for the honourable gentleman to undertake to blame members of the Opposition who have resisted this important change made by one of the honourable gentleman's own followers in a Bill coming from the majority in the House of Commons. If I may say so, I am not fond of talking; but I feel that this is a case where one is bound to say something. As the honourable gentleman from Halifax (Hon. Mr Roche) has just pointed out, the lists in Nova Scotia —and the same is the case in New Brunswick, I understand—are prepared with great care. The revisers are not appointed by the Government; they are appointed by the county councils.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: In New Brunswick the chairman is appointed by the Government. The other two are generally county councillors. I think it is the same in Nova Scotia.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I was under the impression that it was the same in New Brunswick as it is in Nova Scotia. In Nova Scotia the Government have nothing to do with the appointment of revisers. The revisers meet, and, using the books of the assessors, and any other information they have, they make out a parliamentary list. This list is printed and posted up in a number of conspicuous places in the polling districts, and notice is given that on a certain day the revisers will meet to hear applications to have the lists corrected, whether these applications are to add names which have been omitted or to take off names which have been improperly inserted. Some weeks intervene. The first meeting of the revisers is held, I think, about the 5th of February, and the revisers meet about the 5th of March to correct the lists, and then there are, particularly when an election is coming on, a good many applications to have the lists corrected. These lists are finally corrected by revisers, who, as I say, are not appointed by the Government. As a rule, that really ends the matter. The law gives an appeal to the sheriff, but that appeal is hardly ever taken; and, as my honourable colleague has stated, as regards the county of Halifax, the sheriff who preceded the present one was like the man who was so straight that he leaned backwards. Sheriff Archibald was so anxious to leave no ground for his being charged with sympathy for the Liberals that he rather leaned the other way. No matter what may be said in a corner, I am prepared to say this. I have had a good deal to do with elections for a great many years—not as much of late as when I was younger—and practically no substantial complaint has been made with respect to the lists of Nova Scotia. Under those lists Conservative members have been elected to the provincial legislature and Conservative members have been elected to the House of Commons, and none of the gentlemen who have been defeated have ever complained, or undertaken to establish any complaint, against the lists of Nova Scotia. That is the condition in the province of Nova Scotia. The lists are prepared with the greatest care and the utmost impartiality, and opportunity is given for the most careful scrutiny and correction; and yet, when an election for the Dominion is about to be held, you do not say as to Nova Scotia as you said as to New Brunswick and Quebec and Ontario, that the provincial lists shall form the basis of the new electoral lists, but you practically give these enumerators who are appointed by the Government the right to frame completely new lists.

The charge made by the honourable gentleman from Middleton, who moved this amendment, was that sometimes the sheriffs were partisans; and, in order to get rid of the little shade of partisanship that might possibly creep in because the sheriff, the officer to whom an appeal is taken, might be a friend of the Liberal party, he undertakes to place all the electoral lists in the province in the hands of men who are appointed directly by the Government to make up the lists —a Government going to the country on a mighty bad record, by the way. I am astonished that any hounourable members of this House should be in favour of dealing with the province of Nova Scotia in any way different from that in which they deal with the provinces of Ontario, Quebec and New Brunswick.

The amendment introduced by the honourable gentleman from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) accepts the employment of the enumerator, but simply provides that the enumerator shall base his list on the carefully-prepared provincial lists, and that there shall be an appeal from the decision of the enumerator to the county judge or to a judge of the Supreme Court, as the case may be. I really cannot understand how any honourable gentleman having regard for the good name of Canada could be a party to such a transaction as that which is proposed.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I have listened with a great deal of attention to this discussion, and it seems to me that it is being kept at a pretty low level. There are very few large, national ideas in it—or absolutely none. The outstanding feature of this discussion is that an irresponsible body, called the Senate of Canada, is undertaking to build foundations for responsible Government in the House of Commons. An irresponsible body such as the Senate of Canada has been yesterday and is to-day, and will probably be until the 7th of October, undertaking to make foundation for responsible Government in the House of Commons. I am not proud of the position. It is none of our business to interfere with the fundamental rights of responsible Government. This discussion about picayune matters, about revising officers, and this and that, does not appeal to me.

If I had a suggestion to make—I was not called into the conference; probably it would have been a success if I had attended it—I would have proposed, and probably I would propose yet, that this whole matter be referred back to the House of Commons for their deliberation instead of ours. Would the honourable leader of the Government accept that?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. After we pass this, it will go back to the House of Commons for their concurrence.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: That all this matter be referred back to where it belongs—to the House of Commons for further consideration and action thereon, instead of half-a-dozen honourable senators going into a room and wasting time in trying to settle a little, picayune matter regarding representation on the floor of the House of Commons, not interfering in the least with our right or our responsibility. What also surprised me was that such a bright legal mind as that possessed by the honourable senator from Middleton, Nova Scotia (Hon. W. B. Ross), should have consented to accept this brief. Of course, I know professional duty obliges an attorney to accept a brief when he is asked, especially in criminal cases. The honourable senator from Middleton, to my mind, casts lustre on this House from the point of view of intelligence, fair-mindedness and uprightness. I think he is one of the fairest-minded on the other side of the House—probably more so than many on this side. Why he consented to take up this matter in this House is more than I can understand, unless it is from a strict sense of duty under his oath as an attorney, not as a senator, to present the case of scared politicians in the House of Commons. We have it on his own statement, his own frank and candid statement, that this is the remarkable reason for his amendment. It is on page 1285 of the report of yesterday's Senate Debates. The reason, he said, for bringing up the amendment of this Bill was that, although it was discussed privately among members of the House of Commons, Ministerial and Opposition, they did not bring it to a head, and they were forced out of court by Sir Robert Borden's motion of closure.

There are two points in that. It is a straight condemnation of that un-British act of muzzling the representatives of the people and preventing them from protecting the interests, rights and liberties of the people. Here we have the honourable senator from Middleton telling the Senate of Canada and the country that the reason this provision, which he considers necessary, and which the entire Government to-day considers necessary, is introduced because members of the House of Commons were prevented from introducing it owing to the closure being put upon the discussion in that House. That is from one of the best legal-minded representatives of the Government on the floor of this House.

I was not satisfied with that admission which the honourable gentleman made in the course of his remarks. It was not heard by everybody. I thought it was a most serious admission to make. When I want information I am not backward in asking any member for it; and, according to my usual custom, although there were cries on this side of the House not to interrupt, I did persist in interrupting and got from the honourable gentleman from Middleton the following answer:

Hon. Mr. Cloran: Do I understand the honourable gentleman to state that this amendment was not put before the House of Commons owing to closure?

Hon. Mr. Belcourt: That is what he said.

The honourable gentleman from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt) heard the statement, but I venture to say there were some honourable gentlemen who did not hear it. In the meantime, the honourable gentleman from Middleton did not answer. (Reading):

Hon. Mr. CLORAN.

Hon. Mr. Cloran: I want a straight answer to that question. The honourable gentleman has said that owing to the closure this amendment was not allowed to be put in the House of Commons?

That was a straight question, and what was the fair and candid answer given by the honourable gentleman from Middleton?

Hon. W. B. Ross: I say if the Bill had not been under closure the amendment would have been offered.

What do you think of that? What does the honourable leader of the Government think of it? What does the Prime Minister think of it? What will the country think of it? This amendment was not put before the House of Commons because the closure was put on the Bill. Where is your freedom of speech, freedom of discussion, freedom of action? We have been threatened with the Kaiser. We do not want him over here; we have some just as good as he is, right here in Parliament. We have had more kaiserism right here in the Canadian Parliament than was ever attempted in the Reichstag of Germany. We have had it right here, and we have it to-day; and there is the proof of it from one of the ablest and most upright supporters of the Government in this House or in the country. This amendment which is taking up the time of the Senate has not been dealt with by the representatives of the people in the lower House because of the closure put on by the Government, through Sir Robert Borden, and the same Sir Robert Borden is looking around the country for a good Liberal to join with him. Any liberal respecting the traditions of his party will never join hands with a Government or a Prime Minister of that kind, who inflicts such dastardly things on Parliament. He will look around Canada and will find no Liberal worthy of the name, respecting the traditions of the party, having at heart the welfare and the unification of the country. Will he find a Liberal to join, as he calls it, a union or coalition Government? Not one. Why, the Government to-day is in a state of decomposition. Some of its limbs have been worn out and have dropped off, and the majority in Parliament supporting that Government has been reduced from 48 down to 20, sometimes down to 8. That Parliament is in extremis, in the agonies of constitutional death. That kind of Parliament and that kind of Government are forcing this kind of legislation on the free, independent people who desire the welfare of the country, the unification of the people, built up on responsible government, on freedom of votes.

We in this Senate are compelled to deal with this matter. I am prepared to deal with it; I am prepared to deal with it from now until the last breath of this Parliament is drawn, on Saturday night two weeks hence. I think this legislation, which has been forced through by closure, deserves not only that the brain and intellect of the members of this party should be put at the service of the country, but that their health, their physical welfare, should be at the service of their country to prevent this thing from going through. If the Government can put on closure and muzzle us, as the Government has muzzled the Opposition in the House of Commons—it is a pity to have to say it—it is a shame to the country. The Government has muzzled its supporters on the other side, with the honourable leader in this House and the honourable gentleman from Hamilton. Now, if the Government has that power, why should we not use another kind of closure, which would be the closure of free men against pirates? Why should we not have the right to do so? I tell you, honourable gentlemen, what was said to me the night before last by a returned soldier who had been three years in the trenches. "Oh," he said, "senator, if the people of the country only knew what is going on, there would be in Canada scenes similar to those in Russia." That is from a soldier of the King who comes from Winnipeg; and he is in this House—at least, in this building. That is the kind of thing we have to deal with. We are opposed by closure; we are opposed by the complete silence on the other side of the House. They have no defence for their attitude, no explanation for their conduct.

The honourable senator for Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton) has also a good, legal mind—fair too. The honourable senator from Hamilton and the honourable senator from Middleton make a good pair on the other side. The honourable gentleman from Hamilton stated—and it is the only fair explanation that has been offered in regard to this measure—that the enumerator is a judicial officer and cannot put aside a name that is already on the list or refuse to add a name, without sworn evidence, and then his decision is subject to an appeal to a higher court; and the honourable gentleman asked, "What objection can honourable gentlemen have to the amendment?" As soon as he uttered those words I said: "I would vote for that, but it is not in the Bill."

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The suggested amendment.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I am prepared now to accept the proposition made by the honourable senator from Hamilton, and if the enumerators are to be made judicial officers for the occasion, taking the oath of allegiance to the King and justice to the subjects, and if they cannot take names off or add names to the list without evidence, and their decisions are to be subject to an appeal to a higher court, I will swallow the Bill.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: That is all there is to it.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: What fairer proposal do you want? But the honourable gentleman from Hamilton said that was in the Bill. It is not in the Bill. Now, if the Government will put that into the Bill, I will accept their amendment. That is fair enough. What more do you want? I am not here to bolster up the Liberal party when it does wrong, or to buttress Liberal traditions and ideas. No more should you be there to maintain a Government that is doing wrong when you know in your heart and soul that it does wrong very often. I belong to the Liberal party in Canada, and am proud of its traditions and accomplishments since the days of Papineau, Lafontaine and Baldwin, and especially since the days of the Laurier regime; but when our party makes a mistake, either in administration or in legislation, I am not hindered or hampered in telling them that such a law, or such a clause in that law, is not right. I would not give up my freedom of speech or my convictions for the sake of party affiliations. I am too good a Canadian and too proud of my country to take part in public affairs along such lines.

I stand here and offer to the Government that if the proposition made by the honourable senator from Hamilton is put into the Bill I will accept it, and I think many of my friends on this side will do the same. I think it is a fair proposition. All I want in this Bill is fairness; I want no partiality in it at all, either to one side or to the other. I like a fight or an election on fair grounds, and you can only have that with a fair voters' list. The voters' lists under this Bill, not only in Nova Scotia but all through the Dominion, are going to be of the most unfair character, and most obstructive in regard to the good regulation of an election, simply on account of one word. I agree with the honourable senator from Hamilton that everybody in Canada is not a scoundrel or a felon; but the law can make him one officially. This law says that the enumerator or reviser, whoever he may be, will only have the voters' list completed fifteen days before polling day, and that it cannot be interfered with—cannot be changed, added to or subtracted from—until six o'clock on the morning of the polling day.

Now, members of this House who have gone through elections know that in the days of Sir John Macdonald or Alexander Mackenzie the first thing we used to do when an election was announced was to run to the returning officer and get all the copies of the voters' list we could, and that would be forty or sixty days before the polling day. The Government at that time was good enough to give us those copies at ten cents each. But in the elections under this Bill the list will not be ready till fifteen days before polling day. Have you stopped to think what is going to happen? Remember, it is not everybody who can get a copy of the list. According to this Bill a copy will be sent to the candidate, and another is to be posted up. But does the Government think there are many small pocket boroughs about a mile and a half or three-quarters of a mile square? Is the Government not aware that out of the 235 or 240 constituencies in the next election there will be at least a hundred covering from fifty to one hundred miles in length and the same in depth, while there are some counties over 500 miles long and 300 deep? How is a candidate or a revising officer to get around there in the fifteen days before polling? And the candidate is not sure that at six o'clock on election morning the entire list is not changed; he has no guarantee. The enumerator can change the list up to six o'clock that morning. Go over to Germany and ask the Kaiser if he has anything to do like that. He would be glad to see you on a mission of that kind; he would be getting lessons from you. I do not ask the leader of the Government to go, for he would be too honest; but let some of his colleagues go—the Secretary of State, for instance, who concocted this scheme; let him go over and ask the Kaiser if that is good legislation for a free and independent people—to have candidates travel 300 or 400 miles, and some of them in boats.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN.

The more you look at this Bill the more disgusting it is to a man who loves his country and wants to see it free and well governed. It breaks my heart; that is what it does. I have no interest in this election; but I love my country, and when I use such words, people like those on the other side of this House, who have no heart, sneer at the remark; all they care for is the petty little triumph at an election. I am looking to guard the honour of my country, and I am contrasting the action af the Government with that of the Kaiser in Germany, and I find the action of the Kaiser more acceptable than that of this present Government.

Now, I ask the honourable leader of the Government to suggest to the Secretary of State to strike out the word "fifteen" in two or three clauses and put in "forty" at least. If I had my way and were Secretary of State, I would give the people and the candidates a chance by providing that the list should be revised and completed sixty days before the polling day. I would also strike out the words stating that the lists can be changed and added to and taken from up to six o'clock on the morning of the polling day. Just imagine a candidate at an election who has fifty, sixty or seventy polling subdivisions; how can he be in the whole seventy at one time to see that the list is not interfered with before the polling is opened? Can you not see that that is unfair? It is unfair not only to the candidate on the Liberal side, but more especially to the Laborites and to your dear friends, the Bourassa outfit, the Nationalists. I am considering the independent candidates as well as the Liberal candidates. Do you not think that this legislation is unfair, unrighteous and unjust? On its face it is. I therefore suggest to the Secretary of State that he strike out that word "fifteen," and I will split the difference and make it forty days before the polling that the list is to be closed, and not open to every Tom, Dick and Harry to interfere with it before polling day. What is the use of a candidate running an election if he is not sure of the names of the men on the list? I put that to any honourable gentleman on the other side who has been a candidate in elections. How can a candidate leave his home and drive ten, fifteen or twenty miles when he is not sure that the men to whom he is to speak on that night will be on the voters' list? That is not fair to the people or to the candidate, who may have to cover thirty or forty parishes.

We are standing by the boys at the front, and as I have asked them to stand by their brothers and fathers whom they have left behind, so let the Senate stand by the boys at the polls and not deprive them of their votes for any reason. Any man who is good enough to pay taxes and work for the development of this country is good enough to vote. That is sound democracy, and that is what our boys are fighting for on the other side of the seas. By our action here for the past two days, and by the action in the House of Commons, we are demolishing those very principles to uphold which our blood is flowing and our treasure is being spent. So I appeal to the honourable gentlemen, or a few of them anyway, to stand by the principles which underlie democracy—the principles of fair play, justice and right to the people we are called upon to govern.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH: When this Bill was brought into this House for the second reading, I thought the Government had gone as far afield as they could in order to try to legislate themselves into power, not by the voice of the people, but by trying to stifle it. I had occasion then to point out what they had done with British subjects in this country, who were to be deprived of the privilege granted to them by this country under solemn compact, that when they came here and took the oath of allegiance to Canada, they were to be possessed of the electoral franchise and of all the rights and privileges exercised by Canadian citizens. By this Bill that right has been denied them. Great Britain herself, as I then pointed out, thought sufficient of her compact with the Belgian people to go to war with Germany because she had broken her treaty of neutrality with that little nation. What are we to think of the Government of Canada breaking her contract with thousands—yes, I think I would be right in saying tens of thousands—of British subjects in this country who have proved themselves loyal and good citizens, and deprive them of the right of citizenship? I went further, and said that if they deprived them of their citizenship, they should see that they were freed from taxation. I point out again, because I wish to emphasize it, that taxation without representation is a most unfair principle, which lost to Great Britain the thirteen colonies of the United States. You do not know how dangerous a step you are taking when you deny to citizens of this country privileges which they received under the solmen compact that Canada made with them, when there has been no violation of their agreement on their part.

The honourable member for Hamilton stated that he would be satisfied to have this clause amended to conform to the Ontario Franchise Act. If that means that he would be satisfied with the form of the present Ontario voters' list, he has me as a supporter. I know how the Ontario voters' list is prepared in rural parts and in the the cities, and I know that no enumerators or political officers have anything to do with it. The assessor may be a political partisan, but he is a sworn official of the municipal council. He makes the assessment which is the basis of the voters' list. After he gets through with it, it is returned to the clerk of the municipality. The municipal council then has a court of revision, after the list has been posted up for a month or more, and advertisement of the date of that court has been published in the newspapers in the municipality. If any name is on that list that should be off, the right is given to apply to have it struck off in that court of revision, which is composed of members of the municipal council elected by the people. Parties then have a right to go to the final court of revision before the county judge, who advertises the date for holding that court, and have names inserted that should be added, and get names removed that should be off. I would readily accept that plan. There is a further provision for cities and towns of a registration list at a court held by the county judge, after notice given when it is to be held, and after due application made. The names to be put on or off the list must be made public some fifteen days before the court of enumeration is held before the judge. An open court is held, witnesses are called, every one has the right to go and hear the appeal, and the judge decides the case.

I say that the attempt to put through this amendment has an ulterior motive, namely, to hold up an important railway Bill which contains legislation of importance to the people of the province of Ontario. I think the Government of the day is trying to burk that Bill, which is now before the Railway Committee of the Senate.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Order. My honourable friend has no right to ascribe motives of that kind. I think he is entirely out of order, and I do not propose that my honourable friend shall cast any such aspersion upon the Government.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH: I have been in this House seventeen years—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This House has been sitting day and night, beginning in the morning and sitting until midnight. What does my honourable friend expect us to do?

Hon. Mr. McHUGH: I have been some seventeen years in this House. I have no closer neighbour than the honourable member who is our honoured Speaker. If I have broken the rules of order on this occasion, it is the first time, and I have never before been called to order in this House. I ask no better authority than that of the honourable gentleman who occupies the Chair to say what my conduct in this House has been. I may have been out of order in attributing motives; if so, I withdraw the remark. But I say that the action that has been displayed in not allowing that Committee to sit when this House was in session, and in holding the Bill back in that way, has left the impression on my mind, that the measure was to be strangled. I know that the people of Ontario are greatly interested in that Railway Bill, and do not want to see it delayed in order to gain an election for political friends of the Government in the province of Nova Scotia.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, it has been said in the other House by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State that it was not the intention of the Government to bring in a Federal Franchise Act; that the sole purpose of the Government was to bring in a temporary provisional Act, the title of which, "A War-time Elections Act," explained itself. It is provided that the effect of this Bill shall come to an end upon the day of demobilization. I can quite understand the desire of Nova Scotia to transform its provincial lists into Federal lists. That is a legitimate desire; it has prevailed throughout the whole of Canada; and for a number of years we carried on elections—at least two, perhaps three—under a Federal Act; but to attempt to organise a Federal franchise for the whole of Nova Scotia, to govern elections that are within sight, is something which I cannot understand, and which I think cannot be properly done. The suggestion has been made that Nova Scotia should take advantage of this provisional Act to redress a grievance. If there was a grievance, it is surprising that it was not mentioned where the shoe pinched. If there was a grievance as to the mode of electing the members at the next election, the persons who had that grievance were surely the members of Parliament and not senators. That grievance was not heard of in the other Chamber, and surprise has been expressed by more than one senator who has preceded me that the Senate is now to take up that question. That question is before us under the amendment of the honourable member for Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) to the motion for the third reading of the Bill. By this amendment he asks that Nova Scotia be removed from the operation of clause 65A of the Bill. This clause reads as follows:

> In the provinces of Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick the enumerators shall adopt as the basis of the lists of voters which they respectively shall compile the lists prepared for the several polling divisions established, and which on the sixtieth day next preceding the day fixed for the nomination of candidates for the election were in force, or were last in force, under the laws of the province, for the purposes of provincial elections, and they shall not add to such basis list any other names than those of female voters qualified to vote by this part of this Act nor strike off nor erase therefrom any other names than those of persons disqualified from voting, by this part of this Act, and section 62 of this Act shall apply only to qualified female voters whose names do not appear on any list compiled by any enumerator and to persons whose names he has erased or struck from such basis list.

If this amendment is carried, what will be the state of things in Nova Scotia? In order to know that, we have to revert to the work which will devolve upon the enumerators who are to be appointed, and for that purpose we fall back on subsection 2 of clause 42, which reads as follows:

> Subject to the provisions of section 65A of this Act, in the compilation of such list, the enumerator may adopt as a basis thereof any part or parts of any provincial or municipal list of voters in force or last in force which may be applicable to the polling division for which he has been appointed, adding to or taking from such list the names of such persons as he may find to be qualified, or not qualified, as the case may be, within the polling division for which he has been appointed. He shall add after the name of every female voter whose name he places or permits to remain on the list of electors prepared by him the letter W in brackets, thus (W).

That shows the work which the enumerators in Nova Scotia would do. What does it mean? It means that the enumerators in Nova Scotia will do the same work that the enumerators in British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba are charged with. It means that they will prepare lists—new lists in toto. The Nova Scotia lists that are in force to-day will disappear. In the compilation of such lists an enumerator may, if he pleases, adopt as a basis thereof any part or parts of any provincial or municipal list of voters in force, or last in force, which may be applicable to the polling division. But, on the other hand, he may not choose to do so. He may start anew and go about his work as he deems proper. His discretion is absolute. Have honourable gentlemen formed any idea of what is meant by the wiping out of the whole of the lists of Nova Scotia, and the preparation of new lists? As I have said, if we were making a general franchise Act for the Dominion in ordinary times, a year or two or three years ahead of the end of Parliament, we would be prepared to accept the whole machinery from A to Z, for the appointment of officers, the preparation of the lists, the appeals upon the first draft of the lists, the closing of the lists and their proclamation in due form. We would be prepared for all of that. But I draw attention to the fact that to-day we are past the middle of September. This Parliament will cease to exist on the 7th of October, and it is not probable, if we rely upon orthodox constitutional doctrine, that this Parliament can remain non-existent much more than two months or two months and a half, especially in time of war. We all know that, according to British precedents and doctrines, Parliament is supposed to be always at the call of, and is called by, His Majesty the King. On the very day we adjourn a day will be fixed for the calling of the following session, and that time is again fixed from month to month. Parliament is supposed to be always at the call of His Majesty for the purpose of giving him advice. How much more important is it that Parliament should be existent and that the people should be represented in time of war, when conditions may change or become more difficult. So, I say, if the true constitutional doctrine which has prevailed in England for centuries is accepted, this Parliament will be called within two or three months after the 7th of October, which implies that an election will have to be held in short order. It is my conviction that the Government would be derelict in its duty, if after the 7th of October there were a period of more than forty or sixty days before the election. If that is so, we are facing the necessity of going to the people within two months and a half or three months. I ask honourable gentlemen if this is a proper time for wiping out the lists of a whole province and starting to reconstruct the whole machinery from the bottom to the top, for the purpose of calling the electors to the polls in that province.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: What about Manitoba, Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The Prime Minister and his representative who framed this Act and took the responsibility for it, took very great pains to explain why they were putting aside the provincial lists in the provinces of Manitoba and British Columbia. There are feminine names and a number of names of aliens running all through the lists, that have to be struck out.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: It is the same in Nova Scotia.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: You have no women's names.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: You have in the municipal lists, but not in the list upon which provincial or federal elections are held. Great care was taken to explain that.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: If I understand the honourable gentleman, he is raising the point that there will not be time to make up the lists. These other provinces have to make up lists, and in Nova Scotia we can prepare them as quickly as they can.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I understand the point raised by my honourable friend, but I draw attention to the fact that there are two provinces in which you will be facing chaos, Manitoba and British Columbia, and it will be as well to make an effort to make new lists. This does not mean that difficulties will not be met, and that a number of grievances will not creep in. I do not infer that the work will be done thoroughly. But, when we have, as the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State have said, four provinces that have had their lists revised under a system that has existed for over a quarter of a century, is it opportune and proper to do away with those lists, to charge enumerators with starting anew, and to put candidates and the people to considerable worry and expense—looking to the protection of their rights individually and to their mutual advantage collectively—in seeing that proper names are not struck off the lists and improper names added? Is it right to throw the whole province into a turmoil, so that, until the lists are posted on the day of the election, electors will be wondering if their names are on the list.

At six o'clock the Senate took recess.

The Senate resumed at ten o'clock.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, after I had moved the third reading of the Bill, as indicated in the Orders of the Day, an amendment was moved by the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross), and my honourable friend from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) moved an amendment to the amendment. As honourable gentlemen know, this matter has been discussed between both sides of the House with a view to arriving at some mutual understanding on the subject. I fully appreciate the fact that my honourable friends on the other side do not wish to commit themselves to this Bill. Yet, notwithstanding that fact, I think I may ask my honourable friend from De Salaberry, in view of what I am about to move, to withdraw the amendment to the amendment, and I shall likewise ask my honourable friend from Middleton to withdraw the amendment. I propose to move as an amendment to the Bill the following:

Add to section 65A, at the end, as paragraph 5:

5. In the province of Nova Scotia—

(1) The various judges of the county court shall be revisers of the lists of voters and shall be known as revising officers. Each thereof shall have jurisdiction on appeal from enumerators over the electoral district within his judicial district wherein he resides, and shall have power and is directed to appoint one or more revising officers (who shall have similar jurisdiction) for each electoral district within such county court judge's judicial district. Such additional revising officers shall be barristers of not less than five years standing. Every revising officer, before acting as such, shall be sworn before the appointing judge to the faithful performance of his duties. A revising officer shall have power to entertain, and, in manner not inconsistent with the provisions of this Act, to dispose of all appeals which may be asserted before him. Subject to the provisions of this paragraph he shall prescribe or confirm such procedure as to notice, evidence or otherwise as in his judgment may be fair and reasonable, considering the circumstances.

(2) The enumerators in the said province shall adopt as the basis of the lists of voters which they respectively shall compile the lists prepared for the several polling divisions established, and which on the sixtieth day next preceding the day fixed for the nomination of candidates for the election were in force or were last in force under the laws of the province for the purposes of provincial elections, and they shall not add to such basis lists any other names than those of (a) female persons qualified by this part of this Act to vote at the election of a member, and (b) male persons who according to the laws of the province are qualified to be added to such lists when the same were made, or who under the laws of the province were qualified to be added to such lists when the same were made, or who under the laws of the province or under this part of this Act are qualified so to vote, nor shall such enumerators strike off nor erase from such basis lists any other names than those of (a) persons who, when such lists were made, were not qualified to have their names entered thereon, or (b) persons disqualified by this Act from voting at the election of a member. Every enumerator in said province who shall strike off or erase any such basis list the name of any person shall forthwith mail to such person by registered letter, to the address given in such basis list, or to his last known address, notice of the fact and of the reason. Every enumerator in said province shall complete, date at his place of residence and sign the copies of the voters' lists prepared by him fifteen days before the polling day, two of such copies he shall forthwith post up as required by section 48 of this Act and a third he shall personally deliver or mail by registered letter to the revising officer for the electoral district wherein his polling division is contained. He shall also deliver or mail by registered letter a copy of such list to each of the candidates. Such list so prepared shall not be subject to revision by the enumerator, nor shall he have any further duty to perform except the issuance in any necessary case of a certificate in form W/3 under paragraph (g) of section 67. If the enumerator refuses or omits to enter upon the list of voters the name of any person whom he is by this paragraph authorized to enter thereon or strikes off or erases from the basis list the name of any person other than one which he is by this paragraph authorized to strike off or erase therefrom; such person, (or in the case of a qualified person who may be absent from the polling division at the time of the enumeration, an elector in the polling division acting on such absent person's behalf) may within four days after the posting up by the enumerator of such lists, appeal to such revising officer, by notice in writing, stating the fact and mailed to the enumerator and to said revising officer respectively. An appeal shall also lie in like manner, and on the like and a further notice by registered letter to the person entered on the list, from the entry by the enumerator under authority of this paragraph of the name of such person on such list. The registered letter shall be mailed to the address of the person as appearing on the list, or to his last known address. The Revising Officer shall first sit at such place as he may fix and notify by public advertisement ten days before polling day. He shall continue in session as Revising Officer until all appeals have been disposed of, but in any event not longer than six days, or, if any one of the five days following his first day's session is a Sunday, he shall arrange to conclude his business as such Revising Officer in five days. He shall make and initial the alterations in the lists of voters rendered necessary as a result of his decisions and shall append and sign to each of such lists the following words:

I certify that the foregoing is a correct list of the voters in polling division No. .... (or as the case may be) of the electoral district of ..... as revised on appeal by me this ..... day of ..... 191 .

Revising Officer of the electoral district of ..... in the ..... of Nova Scotia.

(3) Four days before polling day the Revising Officer shall deliver by mail or registered letter to each of the candidates in the electoral district a statement of such alterations as he has made in the lists of voters on appeal, and on the same day he shall deliver to the proper returning officers a list revised on appeal and as well all other lists received by him from the various enumerators, but respecting which no appeal shall have been asserted, or if any asserted, no changes have been made. The returning officer shall deliver such lists to the proper deputy returning officers forthwith or before six o'clock in the morning of polling day. All such lists shall be deemed closed and section 62 of this Act shall not apply thereto or to the persons whose names appear thereon.

The enumerator shall forthwith after he receives notice of his appointment begin the performance of his duties and shall fix a time and place where he shall attend to consider applications in the performance of his said duties and shall give notice of such hearing with the time and place of such hearing by publication in a newspaper published in the electoral district or by posting such notice in at least four public places in his district; any person who wishes to have the name of any person added to or struck from said list shall deliver to the enumerator at least two days before the hearing a list of such names, which list shall be opened to the inspection of any voter or candidate during such two days. Any voter whose name is proposed to be struck from the said list shall be given two days' notice by registered letter addressed to the address of that voter as given on the list or to the last known address of that voter. The hearing shall begin within ten days after the notice of his appointment shall have been received by the enumerator. The enumerator shall receive such evidence at the hearing, which shall be in public, as may be offered by a candidate or any voter respecting the adding of names to the said list or the striking of names from such list and shall give his decision on all applications at the hearing. The enumerators shall proceed from day to day until the applications are disposed of. The enumerator is authorized to accept as prima facie evidence of his or her right to be put on the list the statutory declaration of any person who desires to be placed on the list that he or she is qualified to vote at the election. The name and the address of the enumerator for such electoral district shall be published in The Canada Gazette and in a newspaper published in the electoral district immediately after his appointment.

That, honourable gentlemen, is the amendment it is proposed shall supersede the amendment moved by the honourable gentleman from Middleton and the amendment to the amendment, now before the House. In view of this and of what has taken place in reaching this understanding, I would ask my honourable friends to withdraw their motions.

It is necessary, for the purpose of giving effect to this, to strike out the words "Nova Scotia" from section 65A, in the fifth line; the words "part of this" from section 65A in the seventeenth line; the words "Nova Scotia" from section 62, subsection 4, seventh and eighth lines. The application of all these proposed amendments has been considered, and I move that they be adopted. In view of these amendments, will my honourable friend from De Salaberry withdraw his amendment?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I appreciate that this matter is in quite a different position from what we were asked to accept this morning; and, with the leave of the House, I will ask to withdraw the amendment which I proposed.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I suppose the amendment agreed upon has all been accepted, including the last words which were read, by the Liberal members in the House?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, my honourable friend from Ottawa will know that.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: That is the understanding?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, no doubt about that.

The amendment to the amendment was withdrawn.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Inasmuch as this amendment as read accomplishes what I asked for, I have great pleasure, with the consent of the House, in withdrawing my amendment.

The amendment was withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON then moved the amendment proposed to be substituted for the amendments withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I want to mention another point to my honourable friend. During the discussion it was agreed that, when the Bill goes back to the Commons, some of the details may be altered without the principle being affected; for instance, with regard to dates. I mention this because there may be a difficulty under the rules. This Bill comes from the Commons, we amend it, it goes back to the Commons; it is questionable whether the Commons can further amend it. I have not looked into the matter; but that question may arise, and I want my honourable friend to say that objection will not be taken in the other House when the Bill is again under consideration there.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Oh, no. I may say to my honourable friend that the understanding is that if it is necessary to alter those dates so as to make them consonant with the tenor of the Bill, it will be done.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: And no objection will be taken?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, no objection will be taken. That is what I understood to be the expression of the conference on the subject.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Before the motion is put, I want to congratulate the honourable senator from Hamilton upon the fair manner in which he suggested this amendment, and on his fair and candid explanation of the Bill. I think he deserves the thanks of this House, and I am sure he will receive those of the lower House. I was happy to associate myself with his proposal. Although not in consonance with some of my friends on this side of the House, I felt that his proposition, under the circumstances, was as fair as any that could be offered to this House. After so many conferences, running over several days, afternoons and nights, with no decision arrived at, as soon as the honourable gentleman made his proposal which is now embodied in this amendment, I felt, as a representative of the people, that it should be endorsed. The only thing I regret in this matter at present is the fact that the electors of the province of Nova Scotia, and especially the candidates, are not given sufficient time to study the voters' list. I am not objecting to the Bill itself, but I am pointing out that the electors and revisers and enumerators have to do all this tremendous work inside of fifteen days, or inside of six days. I am not going to propose any amendment, but would simply point out to the House of Commons that they would be perfectly justified in asking the Government to grant to the officers under their control sufficient time for the candidates and their agents and the electors to have full cognizance of the voters' lists—not fifteen, but at least forty, days before polling day. How is the enumerator in the space of four or five days going to take into consideration complaints from every polling division regarding names that have been added or subtracted? As a matter of fairness to the officers you are going to appoint to make those lists, I trust that members on both sides of the House of Commons will see that ample time is given to them to compile those lists with due respect to the interests of their respective divisions. I thank the honourable senator from Hamilton for having made the suggestion this afternoon, and I thank myself for having endorsed it.

The amendment was agreed to on division.

On the question of the third reading of the Bill:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Before that motion is put, I desire to say that we have dealt with certain amendments affecting the details of the Bill, but we have not altered the objections that were taken to the Bill itself on the second reading. A strong objection that was made at that time was that this Bill dealt only with the question of the franchise of certain subjects of His Majesty, and gave them a qualified franchise, and that certain other people were being disfranchised. That was a policy to which we on this side of the House took considerable exception. We think that it is a mistake that this Bill should be enacted at the present time. Therefore, I beg to move, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Dandurand:

That the said Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole House with instructions to amend it by eliminating from it all provisions which tend to remove the franchise from any class of His Majesty's subjects who are now qualified electors according to the laws of the province in which they reside.

The motion was negatived on division.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I move, seconded by the honourable member for Mille Isles (Hon. Mr. David):

That this Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be recommitted to the Committee of the Whole House with instructions to amend the same so that in all cases where a voter's name was entered on the electoral list by an enumerator, and the right of such voter to vote was challenged at the time of voting, it be incumbent on such voter, if a recount be made before a judge, to prove his right to vote.

The motion was negatived on division.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I do not want to give a silent vote on this Bill. Coupled with the Bill giving the franchise to the soldiers, this Bill is quite a departure from the practice of the past, and I am opposed to it because it does not follow the traditions which we have long loved and would like to see preserved now. The Bill is called the War-time Elections Act, and one of the clauses enacts that as soon as the war is over and the troops are demobilized the Act will be no more—that it will fall of itself. There is one thing we cannot forget, however. If future members are elected upon this military electoral vote they will continue to be the representatives of the people, but they will not represent the sentiments of the country. I would have no objection if it were provided that as soon as the war is ended the party in power, be it Conservative or Liberal, should immediately dissolve the House.

Hon. Mr. POPE: No.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Certainly, and call upon the people.

Hon. Mr. POPE: No.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: My honourable friend does not understand why.

Hon. Mr. POPE: No.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Two to one that he does not.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: He is not obliged to comprenhend; it is sufficient that the other members of this House understand why. I do not see why any party should remain in power after having been elected in this way. I am not speaking for one party or the other; I am speaking for both parties. I say I do not see why any party that obtains power on a vote of this kind should remain in power. The Act ceases to have effect, and it is inequitable that the party elected under its provisions should remain in power. As a consequence, we must resort to other devices to keep in power people who have different feelings from those which are manifested to-day. I think even the honourable gentleman who interrupted a moment ago (Hon. Mr. Pope) will understand that.

If one may judge from the really scant attention the matter is receiving from the press, or at all events from the papers printed in the English language, it would seem doubtful if there is any realization at all of how the interests of the majority of the Canadian people, and indeed their rights, are being sacrificed by allowing to become the law of the land the extraordinary franchise legislation which is being crowded through Parliament with such unprecedented speed, and the effects of which on the liberties of the people are likely to become more and more pronounced each year for many years to come.

It is said that the number of persons who voted in the last Dominion election, in 1911, totalled slightly over 1,300,000 for the whole of Canada, constituting probably about 60 per cent of the names on the voters' lists. Legislation has just been put through making it as certain as any event to happen can be that there will be recorded the votes of practically all of some 400,000 soldiers, including foreigners and minors, by providing a period of twenty-eight days in which the soldiers may exercise the franchise by means of ballots brought to them. How this has a tendency to make the soldiers' vote predominate will be realized when it is recalled that under ordinary circumstances probably 40 per cent of those entitled to vote at an election do not get to the polls.

In addition, and far more dangerous as regards the rights of ordinary Canadians, we have now under consideration the so-called War-time Elections Act, disfranchising a considerable number of the constituents of the present House of Commons, and, worse still—especially in eliminating the influence of the French Canadian minority—adding to the voters lists the wives, mothers, sisters and widows of the soldiers. The latter feature in practice really amounts to the same thing as giving each of some 400,000 soldiers two, three, four, or perhaps five or six votes. Thus at a moderate estimate there may be added to the voters' list anywhere from say 800,000 to 1,200,000 votes for the women relatives of soldiers—this too, it should be remembered, to supplement the votes of the male near relatives of soldiers who of their own right are already entitled to vote, or, allowing one for each soldier, which is quite a conservative estimate, making 400,000 more soldier-controlled votes. Thus there is a prospect of the soldiers and their relatives having upwards of 2,000,000 votes, compared with a total vote of only about 1,300,000 in the last election. It is an easy matter to test the effect of the proposed war franchise by applying it to a number of families that we know of from which members have enlisted in the army. In each case we find that at least two, three or four women relatives, and sometimes more, will be entitled to vote on account of the soldier member of the family. 2,000,000 soldier votes!—contemplate it. These figures are certainly startling in their possibilities, and the appalling results which may accrue should make all democratic people, especially the ever liberty-loving French Canadians, awake to some realization of the dangers ahead. For there can be no other meaning, even if the estimate given were cut in two, that once this legislation is passed, the soldier vote will absolutely dominate the country, removing the check which, though very limited, has always been of value, at least as a last resort, which the ballot has heretofore afforded the ordinary citizen, of restraining excesses on the part of the soldier element and their friends when their actions far transcend all reasonable bounds.

Everyone has an idea of how difficult it is at present to prevent groups of soldiers taking the law into their own hands—as witness the breaking up of meetings in all parts of the country except the province of Quebec. How much will this be intensified if the soldiers are allowed to absolutely dominate the voting? And how will it be when half a million soldiers return to Canada, many of them looking for employment when work is scarce, as it very likely will be, after the war is over, resulting in their making all kinds of impossible demands on the country backed up by an overwhelming vote. It goes without saying that a House of Commons elected under a franchise in which the soldier vote overwhelmingly predominates is the more likely to accede to unreasonable demands than one in which all have an equal say. Nor can it be safely assumed that a House of Commons chosen by the soldier vote will refrain from continuing the preference given to the soldier vote, no matter what may be said now as to the law being merely for this coming election.

The hostility which many of the class constituting the soldiers—probably the great majority of them at the present time ordinarily feel towards the French Canadian, would seem very likely to produce far more intolerable conditions in future than any that have so far prevailed in Canada towards the minority, whose position, God knows, is often made very difficult as it is, as witness the school legislation of Manitoba and Ontario, where the stock appeals to gain victory in elections are to prejudices against Roman Catholics and especially those of French extraction. Since the despoliation of the minority by the Manitoba school legislation, condoned by the Laurier Government after the elections of 1896, has not the tendency been to more and more disregard minority rights and give the extreme imperial and Orange elements the say as to the destinies of our country? And intolerant ideas, which public men would have shunned in the days of Sir John Macdonald, are now regarded as the surest road to victory in many cases when it comes to deciding issues at the polls.

At the present time, probably the majority of the English-speaking element in Canada are quite opposed to extreme war legislation, as is the case with the French-Canadian element; but the English-speaking people who feel that way have no opportunity of making themselves heard; and before giving them the opportunity of doing so it is proposed to submerge their voice by the votes of soldiers and their female relatives so overwhelmingly that they will be discouraged for a long time from making their influence felt.

Who are the men who have so far enlisted? Undoubtedly about fifty per cent are English immigrants, coming in many cases from the lowest classes in England, cockneys, etc. Probably twenty-five per cent of the soldiers have enlisted for adventure or owing to lack of employment for a time after the war broke out. The remaining twenty-five per cent may be ordinary Canadian boys who have responded strictly to appeals to defend the country.

Judging by history, it is a most dangerous thing to put great power in the hands of the soldier element in any country. How much more so must it be the case in a country like Canada, whose population is composed of various races, and of certain elements which are often very intolerant towards others, as witness the spirit of many of those who openly say that they want to force the "damn Frenchmen" to sacrifice their lives in the war, claiming that they have been obliged to fight their battles.

Furthermore, a Parliament controlled by soldier votes is likely to be much more extreme than the present expiring one, as there will be no restriction on it, and new conscription legislation may be expected with a view to making additional calls for 100,000 men each, perhaps even with a view to sending home the soldiers at present in Europe and having the new ones go over to take their place.

I think every member will understand why I object to this Franchise Act which has been imposed upon us in the dying days of Parliament, and which will continue its effect in future, for the duration of at least one Parliament. For this reason I shall vote against the third reading of the Bill, and I hope that all my friends on both sides of the House will consider this view of the question, and will help me to defeat the Bill.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: Honourable gentlemen, I have only one word to say. It seems to me rather unfortunate that we should be treated to an argument which is deliberately against the principle of the Bill, and therefore clearly out of order, especially by an ex-Speaker of our own Chamber.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: It is perfectly in order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I may tell the honourable gentleman, who has been the Speaker of the House of Commons, that the principle of a Bill may be discussed on the third reading.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: But it is not permissible to argue against the principle of a Bill on the third reading.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Quite the contrary.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I rise to say a word on the third reading——

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Order. The honourable gentleman has already spoken.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I have not. I have spoken on the amendment.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I am going to speak on the third reading. When did I speak on the question?

The Hon. the SPEAKER: The question is on the third reading.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I rise to speak. I have not spoken—

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: You have spoken.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I have not.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order, order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: It is a question of fact.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order, order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I think the honourable gentleman has spoken on the amendments.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Yes, on the amendments.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: The honourable gentleman has made a long speech on the third reading.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: It was on the amendment. I am not going to take that ruling. I am going to stand here—

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order, order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I shall sit down when you sit down.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order, order.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: The question is on the third reading.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: Really, Mr. Speaker, as a matter of fact—

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order, order.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I think the honourable the Speaker is mistaken. I do not think that my honourable friend has spoken on the third reading.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Certainly he did.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: He spoke on the amendments. I spoke on the amendments myself, but I have not said anything on the third reading. The question has just been put to-night. I think the Speaker is acting in good faith, but he is mistaken.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Order.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I rise to call the attention of the Speaker to the fact that he is making a mistake. I think he is acting in good faith, but it is impressed on my mind that the honourable member from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran) spoke when he had no right to speak. I was expecting that he would be called to order because he had already spoken on the amendments which had been proposed; but he has not spoken since the third reading has been moved. It is only a few minutes since the question of the third reading was put. The honourable the Speaker will see by the Minutes to-morrow that he is mistaken on the question of fact.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: The honourable member for De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) overlooks the fact that two long speeches were made by the honourable gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran), and that three-quarters of those speeches were against the third reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Certainly. They were against the amendment proposed on the third reading.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: If the House will give permission to the honourable gentlemen—

Some Hon. SENATORS: No, no

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I will take it in spite of you.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Unless the House gives permission, I say the honourable gentleman has no right to speak on the third reading.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I do not think it is a question of permission. The honourable gentleman has a right to speak or he has not. If he has spoken on the third reading he has no right to speak again, but it is not for the Speaker to say that the honourable gentleman may not speak with the permission of the House.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: No, I beg your pardon. I differ entirely. If the honourable gentleman from Victoria has spoken, he has no right to speak again. If he has not spoken, he has a right.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER: I would like to say a word on the question. If the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Cloran) has spoken, it was on another motion.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER: I would like to remind the Speaker that the honourable leader of the Government withdrew his first motion for the third reading. Then the amendments came in, and now he is making a new motion for the third reading. He withdrew his first motion. He said so himself, because the honourable gentleman from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt) asked him, "Are you going to withdraw your motion for the third reading?" and he said, "Yes, I am withdrawing it."

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: That is correct.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER: So now it is a new motion for the third reading.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The honourable gentleman from Victoria division (Hon. Mr. Cloran) spoke after I moved the third reading of the Bill—

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: No.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: —and congratulated the honourable gentleman from Hamilton upon the work which he had performed in connection with it. I feel absolutely certain that that is the case.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: That is the case.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: And if that is so, that was on the third reading.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: It was on the honourable gentleman's motion to withdraw the amendments. Now the honourable gentleman has made a new motion for the third reading of the Bill. The honourable leader of the Government made a motion and I spoke to it, congratulating the honourable gentleman from Hamilton; then he made a second motion for the third reading of the Bill.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order, order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: You cannot suppress me It is not that I am going to take up the time of the House.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order, order.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I rule that the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Cloran) is out of order. When the honourable leader of the Government moved the third reading of the Bill there were two amendments made; but there was not a new motion for the third reading of the Bill. After the two amendments had been withdrawn it was the same motion, that made at first, for the third reading. I rule that the honourable gentleman has no right to speak again.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Question, question.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: Honourable gentlemen, we ought to be fair to everybody.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order, order.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I do not desire to discuss the ruling of the Chair, but just to make an explanation.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order, order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Keep quiet over there.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I desire only to suggest that in order that my honourable friend (Hon Mr. Cloran) may say a word or two on the question—only a word or two——

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: You have no right to discuss it unless you appeal from the Chair.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I would just ask the permission of the House to speak for two minutes, that is all——

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order, order.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: —to settle the matter.

Some hon. SENATORS: Order, order.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: Well, I can make a motion, I suppose; I can make a motion on the third reading.

The Hon. The SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion for the third reading?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: Honourable gentlemen, I have a right to make a motion on the third reading. I will move the adjournment of the House if honourable gentlemen are not satisfied. I wish to have peace. It was at my suggestion that we rose yesterday afternoon, and I am thankful to the honourable leader of the Government for having accepted it. I am just going to move this, in view of the facts which have been brought out and the decision of the honourable the Speaker. I do not wish to discuss the decision, which has been given in good faith; but we on this side of the House, many of us, think that the honourable gentleman from Victoria has not yet spoken on the third reading. Now he is deprived of his right to speak by the decision of the Speaker, which I respect. I do not wish to say anything against it, but under the circumstances, in order that the honourable gentleman may not be prevented from saying a few words—surely he will take just a minute or two—I will move that the honourable gentleman be given permission to address the House on the third reading.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order, order.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: What is the point of order in that?

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: The point of order is simply this. If the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Choquette) is appealing from the decision of the Chair, it must be done without debate.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I say I do not appeal at all from the decision of the Speaker. I am going to move that this Bill be not now read a third time, but be read this day six months. I move the six months' hoist.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER: We will not be bullied.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I am willing to withdraw the motion if the honourable gentleman has my permission to say a few words. Honourable gentlemen, I did not intend to speak further on this question. I have given all the reasons which I have for fighting this Bill. It is a very bad Bill in every way. I did not intend even to stand up and congratulate my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Landry), who has spoken on the third reading, on the view, the excellent view, he has taken on this question, that after this war is over Parliament ought to dissolve and a new election ought to be held, in order that those who are unjustly, unfairly and for political purposes disfranchised, may in a new election have the right to vote. Now, as this Bill is forced upon us, and as members of the Senate are deprived of the right of speaking, by a decision which, though given in good faith, is in my opinion and that of other honourable gentlemen based on premises which are not correct, I intend to make another motion on this question, without taking up much time in making a speech. It is sufficient to recall these facts to show how the Opposition are treated—ill-treated—in this matter—not by the honourable leader in this House, but by a few members on the other side, who have behaved in this matter as they ought not to have behaved. I move that this Bill be not now read the third time, but be read this day six months.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: I rise to a point of order. I claim that such an amendment is out of order and that the honourable gentleman was likewise out of order in speaking. When the motion for the third reading is before the House, and any amendment is moved to that motion, the party who talks to the amendment is talking to the motion for the third reading as well, and by his speech exhausts his right to speak again on the third reading.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: That is ancient history—no good in a free Parliament. Honourable gentlemen, I have much pleasure in seconding this motion.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: The question is on the point of order raised by the honourable member for Grey (Hon. Mr. Sproule).

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would like the honourable gentleman from Grey to elaborate somewhat his point of order—to explain it a little more clearly, because I have not caught the point he has made.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER: Does the honourable member (Hon. Mr. Sproule) contend that we have no right, when the third reading is proposed, to move that the Bill be not now read the third time but be read this day six months? Does the honourable gentleman claim we have no right to do that?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: Not if he has just spoken.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: That is what he says.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER: That is a very new principle.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: If the honourable senator (Hon. Mr. Tessier) takes his seat, I will tell him what my contention is on the point of order: that the honourable gentleman who moved the motion is out of order because he had already spoken on the third reading—

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: No, he did not.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: —and thereby exhausted his right. He spoke on the amendment, and that amendment and the third reading were both before the House, and, having spoken on the amendment, he could not speak on the third reading.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Get your education over again.

Hon. Mr. SHARPE: Therefore he could not move a motion. If I remember correctly, a motion for the six months' hoist on this Bill was voted down long ago.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I think the honourable gentleman is mistaken.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Talk all night if you wish.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My contention is that the point of order is not well taken. There may be two or three amendments moved, and a member can speak on each amendment.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Go ahead. We are prepared to wait.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Order. The point of order has been raised.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: If the point of order is raised—

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: It is withdrawn. The honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Sproule) has withdrawn it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: If he has not withdrawn it, I want to say a word upon it.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Do I understand that the honourable gentleman from Grey has withdrawn his point of order?

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: If it is the desire of the House, I withdraw it.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: This puts me in mind of going through a snowbank, sometimes the engine has to be very strong to go through the snow. This scene does not cast much lustre on the Senate—a body of intelligent men on the other side, under the control of the honourable leader of the Government, trying to prevent free speech on the floor of the independent Parliament of Canada. It is not a spectacle to be—

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Pardon me.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I never know when he is up.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: The motion has not yet been put from the Chair.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: All right.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: It has been moved by the Hon. Mr. Choquette, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Béique, that the Bill be not now read the third time, but be read the third time this day six months.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I hope the track is clear by this time and that we may put a little express business on it. When the honourable Senator from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry) rose to point out the difficulties under which the Act will be operated, and to point out the constitutional results, he was met with what? By the supporters of the Government, who have been deaf and dumb for the past three weeks on the floor of this House, with shouts of disapproval. They recovered their voices all of a sudden—not in an intelligent way, not in a way that is befitting an intelligent body; and they tried to put the honourable Senator from Stadacona down. I had no intention to speak on this motion or any other. I have my work in regard to this Bill, but I feel I must stand by a man who is claiming the right to speak for the people he represents, and whom certain persons on the other side try to put down. As long as I am here you shall not down him. Nor shall you down me, even if you put me in the tower. The honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Landry) called the attention of Parliament to the fact that this Bill lasts only during war-time. He has called the attention of the country to an essential constitutional point. To-morrow, or this day twelve months, the war may be over. When the troops are sent back to their homes, demobilized, what happens? Parliament, under the constitution, the British North America Act, is elected for five years. But this Bill is a violation of the British North America Act. It interferes with the rights of the provinces in regard to the electors. It interferes with the rights of the province of Quebec, which is the pivot of Confederation. On the voting power of Quebec depends the voting power of the rest of the Dominion. Under this Bill and under the Military Voters' Bill you introduce into the province of Quebec voters who are not residents and have no right or title in that province. Was not the honourable senator justified in calling the attention of the House and of Parliament and the country to that fact, and why was he hooted down vulgarly?

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: What else could you expect?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: If honourable gentlemen opposite have brains, let them use them otherwise than in hooting. Then he pointed out the fact that the effect of this Bill is to cease ipso facto with the termination of war and the signing of peace, what is to justify this Government or this Parliament saying that this war is going to last for five years more? If the war ends in six months or a year, this Act becomes obsolete and of no constitutional effect, and yet Parliament will sit for four years after the Act ceases to be effective. How are the representatives of the people to be elected when there is no Franchise Act in existence? I hold, with the honourable gentleman from Stadacona, that when this vicious, mischievous, nefarious Act ceases to be effective, Parliament should go out of office. There is no provision made for that. Where is the blame to the honourable senator from Stadacona in mentioning this fact? Honourable gentlemen, if you only knew what opinion I have of this House, you would not consider me very favourable to your views.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: They would eject you.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: When I talk here, it is not to honourable gentlemen on the other side; I talk to my fellow-citizens beyond the walls of this Chamber.

Hon. Mr. PLANTA: You talk to the gallery.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The gallery is a good place. That is where the gods are, not down in the pit, where the millionaires flaunt their wealth. The gods are the people. Has the honourable ever talked to the gallery, or has he ever talked to the pit—either one or the other? The honourable gentleman hoots, that is all.

Honourable gentleman, I was prepared to let this Bill go, and I gave my word to the honourable gentleman from Hamilton that if he was able to induce his Government to get into this Bill the proposition that he laid down this afternoon, I would swallow the Bill holus bolus. I have not the slightest doubt that my endorsation of the position taken by the honourable senator from Hamilton has brought about this happy ending of a miserable quarrel between party politicians. But when I find a body of men like the honourable gentlemen opposite trying to suppress free speech, trying to put down a man of the standing of the honourable senator from Stadacona, for forty-five years representing the people of this country in the House of Commons and in the Senate, and as Speaker, hooting him down simply because he happens to disagree with his party on one or two measures, I say it is a crying shame. Is that the way to treat men who have devoted their lives to legislation for this country and for the Conservative party? Simply because the honourable member in his heart and in his conscience cannot endorse one or two measures of the Government, the dead, decomposed Conservative Government, he is to be hooted down by his colleagues. Honourable gentlemen, you may stand for it, but let me tell you the people of the country will not stand for it, and when the people of the country read what has happened here to-night and find the scenes depicted in the press of the country and in our public documents, they will hold the Senate in supreme contempt, more contempt than they ever held it, and they will be justified. The idea of intelligent men, men of means, men of brains, especially the newly-appointed ones, good, sturdy, lively Tories, taking the position they have taken here during this debate, and especially to-night! I say that will not appeal to the people of the country, and your action here to-night will destroy the influence of Sir Robert Borden, whatever is left of it, in the country. I rose to-night in protest against this attempted effort, made by honourable gentlemen in this House, who ought to be impartial, and especially by the honourable leader of the Government, to suppress freedom of speech. God knows, it is bad enough to have it suppressed in the House of Commons by means of regulations and laws, but it is miserable and mean to my nature to have it suppressed by intelligent men. That is a thing that I cannot understand, and I fully advocate and endorse the principle and the statement made by the honourable member for Stadacona.

The motion of Hon. Mr. Choquette was negatived, on division.

The main motion was agreed to, on division, and the Bill was read the third time, and passed.

DRY DOCKS AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 134, an Act to amend the Dry Docks Subsidies Act, 1910.

He said: The object of this Bill is to so amend the present Dry Docks Act as to permit an increase in the width of dry docks from 110 to 125 feet, and to increase the depth over the sill from 37 to 38 feet. The Bill also makes provision for increasing the rate of interest on the guarantee from 4 to 4½ per cent. It also provides that bonds may be issued to the extent of 75 per cent of the amount invested after $1,000,000 has been expended.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: What did you say the length was?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It does not limit the length.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I notice that this Bill does not refer to any of the present dry docks; it is only with regard to the future, apparently. Can my honourable friend tell us whether it is the intention that any of those dry docks should be built at the present time? I thought we had about all the dry docks that we require in the country.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This Bill is not retroactive, in a sense; but if the conditions which at present obtain would permit of its applicability, of course it would apply to docks that are at present built.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: If my honourable friend will look at section 4, I think he will see that that is not quite so, as that section provides that it shall not apply or extend to any agreement heretofore made for the construction of any dry dock.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Of course, if an agreement has been entered into, it would not apply. What I had in view was that it might be made applicable to the construction of docks that may now be under negotiation, but concerning which an agreement has not been enterred into. Of course, it would not apply to any docks which have already received a subsidy.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This is a money bill, and probably honourable gentlemen will allow me to move its third reading, which I now do.

The motion was agread to, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

COMMONS AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved that the amendments made by the House of Commons to Bill Q2, the Companies Act Amendment Bill, be concurred in. He said: In paragraphs j and k, on page 26, the words "since the annual meeting" were added. It was considered that it should be definitely shown that the history of the company with respect to these subjects need not be included in every annual statement, but only the changes made from year to year. The same comment applies to paragraphs i and q, on page 27. These statements are made annually for what occurred during the last preceding year, and this was considered sufficient. As the Bill stands, since the inception of the company the statement is required to be made each year.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: This is the only amendment which is of importance in the Bill. It destroys that part of the Bill. The object of requiring in each annual statement the mention of what amount was paid in cash was to give the public the proper information before they invested in the stock of the company. The moment this disappears, the party will have no information unless he follows the annual meetings from year to year. At this stage of the session, I do not suppose we are disposed to take issue with the House of Commons, but it will be a matter of amendment at a future session.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The information would now only be obtainable by taking a series of annual reports. It seems to me unfortunate that the Bill was so altered, because the Senate committee were of the opinion that it was in the public interest that the annual statement should show the transactions of the company.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Perhaps my honourable friend could give us an indication of the reasons for the change.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, I have not the Debates showing how they were brought about. With these explanations, I move that we concur in the amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

RECRUITS UNDER CONSCRIPTION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

1. As the figures of the Census of 1911 establish that there is in the country, between the ages of 20 and 34, both inclusive, a male population of 1,066,690 souls, of which 636,746 belong to the first class which is to respond to the call to arms, and 429,944 to the second class,—what is, on the 100,000 recruits which are to be selected this year, the proportion to be allotted to each of the following territorial divisions, namely:—Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, British Columbia, the Yukon, and the Northwest Territories?

2. Out of the 100,000 recruits chosen by selective conscription, what will be, in each of the above mentioned territorial divisions, the number of soldiers intended for the firing line, and the number of those needed for the manufacture of munitions of war, or for any other service outside that of combatant?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1. The number of recruits to be drawn from the several territorial areas cannot yet be estimated. It is the intention of the Government at present to call the whole of Class 1 as defined by the Military Service Act, 1917, and the numbers to be called from the respective provinces will, therefore, depend upon the number of men belonging to the said class within each province.

2. It is not intended to make use of any of the men recruited under the Military Service Act in the manufacture of munitions. They will be put on active service in the Canadian Expeditionary Force, and will be placed in the combatant or non-combatant branches thereof, in accordance with the needs of the service at the time. It is impossible to state now what proportion will be used in the combatant branches, and what proportion in the non-combatant branches.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Before we adjourn I should like to ask the leader of the Government if we may expect any further legislation to come down?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am unaware of any except a Supply Bill.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Is it the intention to prorogue to-morrow?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The probability is in favour of prorogation to-morrow evening.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: After that announcement, is there any use in the Railway Committee sitting in the morning?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It seems to me it is hardly to be expected that the business of the committee can be finished. We would not be able to make sufficient headway to warrant the Bill going through. It is quite a large Bill.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: We might get through.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Well, we are prepared to sit. The Bill will have to go to the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: If Parliament were prepared to wait a day or two, as I think it should, I think the Bill could be put through.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am as anxious as my honourable friend to dispose of the Bill, but it is a question whether the House of Commons will continue to sit, and it is a question whether the Railway Committee of the Senate is prepared to dispense with giving proper consideration to the many clauses which have yet to be dealt with.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: If we dealt with it, what would the House of Commons do?

Hon. Mr. WATSON: They seem to be very anxious to get the Bill back, and the public seem to be anxious to have the Bill passed.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We can meet at ten o'clock, and possibly the wish of my honourable friend to have this Bill passed may be realized.

The Senate adjourned until eleven o'clock to-morrow morning.

THE SENATE.

Thursday, September 20, 1917.

First Sitting.

The Senate met at Eleven o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

RAILWAY EMPLOYEES WAGES BILL.

CONSIDERATION OF AMENDMENTS BY HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments made by the House of Commons to Bill D, an Act concerning the payment of salaries or wages of employees of railway companies.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, to the Bill which this House passed some time ago to amend the Railway Act in order to provide for the payment semi-monthly of railway employees' wages, the House of Commons has added several sections, which appear in the Railway Bill now being considered by the Railway Committee of this House. I would say, generally, that that committee has considered all the sections of the Railway Bill constituting the amendments which the House of Commons has made, with the exception of two clauses, which apparently have not yet come before the committee. The introduction of these amendments into the present Bill is done in anticipation of the possibility of the Railway Bill not going through. As they are clauses in which the employees of railway companies are very deeply interested, it was thought that we might give effect to them by including them in this Bill. Perhaps if we went into committee we could examine them more closely. I move, therefore, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the amendments.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate went into committee, Hon. Mr. Blain in the Chair.

On the amendment:

1D. Section two hundred and sixty-nine of the said Act is amended by adding thereto the following paragraphs:

(d) with respect to the length of sections required to be kept in repair by employees of the company, and with respect to the number of employees required for each section, so as to ensure safety to the public and to employees;

(e) limiting or regulating the hours of duty of any employees or class or classes of employees, with a view to the safety of the public and of employees; and

(f) providing that a specified kind of power or method or means of propulsion shall be used on any or all locomotives and trains in any district.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I think this committee should understand just what it is doing with respect to the three matters dealt with. This amendment practically takes the management and control of the road out of the hands of the company, and puts it into the hands of the board. I think it is proper that the board should have the right to supervise and regulate—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The beginning of the section says that the board may make regulations. It is authorized by this amendment to make regulations with respect to the length of sections.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I think these matters should stand until we finally deal with the Railway Act.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: What is the urgency with regard to this?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is said that the employees are very much interested in the passing of those sections particularly which relate to the protection of life and property, not only of the public but of the employees.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I would suggest that we do not concur in this until it has been taken up and passed on by this House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: It seems to me that there is no necessity for delaying the consideration of this matter, unless the Senate is opposed to the proposition that is made to place this power in the hands of the board. Under the circumstances, I think it would be much better to let it go through, though I agree with the honourable gentleman from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) that it is placing too much power in the hands of the board.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I am willing to help to pass such provisions as may be urgent, but I do not consider that this is an urgent provision. It is a very important one, and I think it should be considered by this House with due deliberation.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: The reason that this clause d became controversial and the reason that it was asked for by the railway employees is that some years ago this question was before the Railway Commission. The employees felt that the number of men employed on certain sections of railways was not sufficient to keep the track in proper repair. The companies took the position that the Railway Commission had no jurisdiction to interfere in a matter of this kind. This clause would give the Railway Commission jurisdiction to regulate such things, and if in their opinion it should be done it would be done. I call attention to one instance. Honourable gentlemen probably all remember the fatal Spanish river wreck of a few years ago, when a number of people were burned to death. The evidence at the coroner's inquest went to show that there had not been sufficient attention paid to the maintenance of the track. The section foreman had gone so far, in making repeated applications for help, as to notify the company that he could not be responsible for what might occur if he had not more help. The help was not given, and he resigned. A green man was put in his place, and the accident occurred shortly afterwards. This provision is for the purpose of ensuring the safety of everyone who is travelling, and if the Railway Board find that the track is not being maintained as it should be, that court will have jurisdiction.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: How many section men are there to a mile as a rule?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: It depends very largely on the volume of traffic on the road, and the season of the year. At some seasons of the year there is only one man to about 9 miles of track.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: For my part, I am always willing to provide the necessary machinery for such cases, but we must not be carried away because of individual cases and take the management of the railways out of the hands of the railway companies. I take it that this clause means that it will be the duty of the Board of Railway Commissioners to interfere with the management of the railways, and it places an undue duty upon them which will tend to increase considerably the staff of the board if they carry out the spirit and the letter of the law. If the Act is amended to the extent proposed, it will be very expensive to the country, and will seriously interfere with the management of the railways by the companies. I suggest that this is a matter which should not be dealt with in the dying hours of the session, but that it should be left for future consideration.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I must take exception to the interpretation which some honourable gentlemen seem to place upon this amendment, in saying that it means that the maintenance of way must pass from the hands of the railway companies to the Railway Board. That is not the case at all. We entrust the Railway Board with responsibilities which are much greater than this, and it seems to me that the fact that amongst the higher officers of the roads, particularly, say, divisional superintendents, and under them section foremen, and so on, there is more or less emulation in the exercise of economy in order to receive recognition at the hands of the company, frequently results in an absence of the necessary expenditure to keep the track in proper condition. This provision simply gives the board authority to pass regulations, not in any way to interfere with the management. Take, for instance, the case of train employees going over a certain section of road. Their attention may be directed to a portion which demands immediate attention. They will hesitate about saying to one of their superior officers that it should receive immediate attention, and that a certain expenditure should be made upon it. If they should do so, they would be told that it is none of their business. Is it unreasonable that a method of this kind should be adopted in order to determine whether the road at any particular place is being maintained as it should be maintained? It seems to me that the safety not only of the public but of the employees demands it, and frequently it would enure to the advantage of the railway companies, because where very serious accidents occur the damages which they are called upon to pay infinitely exceed the amount of expenditure involved in keeping the road in proper shape.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The board has already in other clauses the power to do all that is necessary for the safety of the employees and of the public; but this paragraph provides that the board may make any order with respect to the length of the sections required to be kept in repair, and also as to the number of employees required for each section. I claim that that is interfering with the management of the company, and I think the Senate should not concur in it.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I am bound to say that I think those companies whose consciences are uneasy on this matter are opposed to this provision. I do not see why any company that is doing its real duty should object; but I know that companies like the Quebec and Lake St. John Railway, which forms part of the Canadian Northern, is not maintaining its track so as to prevent accidents. If a road has sufficient men to protect the public I do not see why it should object to this amendment, which will be severe only on those companies that are remiss in their duty. We need not suppose that the Railway Commission will be harsh with any company. They are interested only in protecting the public. Some companies do not care as long as they can make money, and if no accident occurs they neglect to see that the line is in a good state of repair; but if an accident happens they wake up and try to put the responsibility upon their employees. I do not see any harm in giving the board power to compel the companies to do what they ought to do themselves. If the line is well sustained the board will not interfere.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am not disposed to agree with my honourable friend from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) in regard to this amendment, because subsections g and l of the Railway Act give such wide powers to the board that they impliedly cover the extension sought by clause h of the old Bill and the amendment which is now under review. I see no reason why the board should not have the right to review the way in which the road is maintained; therefore I have no objection to extending to the board the simple discretion which is allowed it under this clause.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I have not had time to look at other amendments which may have been made to chapter 37, but on the whole I think this paragraph should be in the Act. Of course, it is liable to very serious abuse in case the employees of a company were constantly appealing to the board to get them to do things that the company should be left to deal with. At the same time, I think the board should have the power, if the question should arise, of regulating this particular matter, and we will have to trust to the good sense of the employees and to the judgment of the board to see that it is worked out in a fair and equitable manner.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Honourable gentlemen have evidently not understood the point I was making. I do not object to the board having all the power necessary for protecting the interests of the public and the safety of employees; but they have that power under subsections g and l, as was pointed out by the honourable member for De Lorimier. But there is a great difference between giving the board general power and giving them the specific power of interfering for the purpose of ordering what length the sections shall be and what number of employees should be engaged on different sections.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would point out that subsection j gives power to the board to limit or regulate the hours and duties of employees or classes of employees with a view to the safety of the public and the employees. If we give the board that power, should we not at the same time give them power to say that since the hours of employment are reduced the number of employees must be increased? It seems to me that we are not going at all beyond the spirit of the whole Act.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I want to endorse the amendment proposed by the honourable leader of the Government, and I do so from practical experience. I have been over railroads in this country on which the public have been treated in the most shameful manner. I allude particularly to the Transcontinental and the Canadian Northern, especially between Montreal and Quebec, and in the northern regions. For ten years I have seen passengers by the hundred, two hundred and three hundred, standing in the mud at Hervey Junction, without any station, and the agent had for shelter only an old cattle car. An immense amount of traffic passes that point. Finally, one day when there were some 250 passengers lined along this box-car, a number having come down from the shanties, and a large number of ladies with little children, all subject to the inclemency of the season and the intemperance of the men, I went into the box-car and wired to Hon. Mr. Bernier, who was then a member of the Railway Commission, that they were not doing their duty in protecting the public, and I asked that a station be built there. During the following week an order went forth to that company to build a station, and it was built. That is an illustration of the need of the Railway Commission having absolute authority over the company. The point before the House is in regard to the services of men. For the past seven years, on the line referred to, four switchmen had to take care of from ten to fourteen miles of track. I have travelled with them on their hand-cars, and when I would point to a piece of the road and say, "Before you know it there will be a wreck here," they would reply, "What can we do? We can't attend to fourteen miles of section." Six miles is all that four men can attend to, and even that is too much; yet that kind of thing has been going on for years. The amendment proposed is the proper one. The Railway Board is not going to be autocratic and order work to be done if it is not necessary, or men to be put on work where they are not needed. This amendment is quite in order for the safety of the public, in justice to the men, and for the companies themselves.

The amendment was agreed to.

On the amendment:

1E. Subsection two of section two hundred and seventy-four of the said Act is repealed and the following is substituted therefor:

(2) Where a municipal by-law of a city or town prohibits such sounding of the whistle or such ringing of the bell in respect of any such crossing or crossings within the limits of such city or town, such by-law shall, if approved by an order of the Board to the extent of such prohibition, relieve the company and its employees from the duty imposed by this section.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: I think that is fair.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: What will be the position if the board does not approve? The board cannot quash a by-law?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Then, section 274 in its entirety would be in operation. They would have to observe the Act.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: That would override the by-law?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: The whistling is a great nuisance in some parts, such as a railway centre like Moncton. Trains whistle at unearthly hours and keep people awake, and I think when that is brought to the attention of the board, if the authorities do not attend to it, they will remedy it. I think it is a very good provision.

The amendment was agreed to.

On the amendment:

1F. Subsection one of section two hundred and seventy-six of the said Act is repealed and the following is substituted therefor:

276. Whenever in any city, town or village, any train not headed by an engine is passing over or along a highway at rail level which is not adequately protected by gates or otherwise, the company shall station on that part of the train, which is then foremost, a person who shall warn persons standing on, or crossing, or about to cross the track of such railway.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: I think that is a good section.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: How shall they warn them?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They stand on the end of the train as it is moving slowly, and in that way warn them.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I notice that in some places a man stands ringing a bell.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: That would be a warning.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: In some cases a man walks ahead of the train. I have seen that done very effectively.

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: These trains have an air signal as well as a brake on the rear end.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I suppose the board would have the power to stipulate the kind of warning to be given?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I should think so.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: What power would the board have to require a company to give a warning on trains backing up?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I think there is a provision in the present Act covering that.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Would it be done by an air whistle, by a ring of the bell, or what?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: That is only when the engine is crossing first. I would suggest that when the cars are being shoved ahead of the engine there should be somebody riding ahead of the engine, to warn people who might cross the track without noticing the approach of the train.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: By whistle, by bell, or simply by standing there?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: It would not be possible for him to warn by a whistle in riding in front of a freight car while doing switching, but if he were always in communication with the engineer by signal he could stop the train if he did not attract the attention of the person crossing the track.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: There are automatic bells at a good many places.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: This is intended to apply to places where there are no automatic bells or other means of warning, or watchmen on duty.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is in the interest of the railway company to comply with this, because otherwise they might become liable for damages.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I may say that the railway companies and the employees are agreed on this section as being desirable.

The amendment was agreed to.

On the amendment:

1. Subsection one of section three hundred and six of the said Act is amended by striking out the word "one" in the fifth line thereof, and substituting therefor the word "two."

Hon. Mr. WATSON: What does that mean?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: It means two years instead of one year.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: This is a very serious amendment. In practice this is what takes place. The freight comes in from the United States—from Pennsylvania, or from Chicago—and passes over half-a-dozen different railways. There may be claims for overcharge. It is very difficult to adjust such claims. The files of the different railways have to be sent from one company to another, and it takes months to adjust the matter. Sometimes a company has to pay the claim and is then reimbursed by other companies, but as a rule I think the claim is not paid until it is adjusted among the different companies concerned. The claim may be paid by one company, or it may be divided among several. So it is very important that it be made within a reasonable time; otherwise it is very difficult to adjust it. I happen to have had personal experience in adjustment of a number of cases of such claims, and I think the delay of one year was reasonable. If there is a claim to be made it should be made within one year, otherwise it is very difficult to adjust it. I think extending the time for the adjustment of claims to two years is unreasonable.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I may say, briefly, that the request for the extension of time from one to two years was made by the employees because of the experience in a number of cases where men who had been very seriously injured had lain in hospital month after month and had amputation after amputation, and did not know until after one year had expired after the accident whether or not they were going to be permanently disabled, and therefore could not enter into litigation with the company. After the year had passed by the company would say: "You are now out of court, because a year has expired." That is why this amendment is brought before the House.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I see that it applies only to injuries; so my objection does not stand.

The amendment was agreed to .

The Committee rose and reported.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the amendments were concurred in.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON.

DEBATES OF THE SENATE.

REPORTING FOR THE PRESS.

Hon. Mr. FARRELL moved that the third report of the Standing Committee on Debates and Reporting be concurred in. He said: This report merely asks for a renewal of the agreement made in 1913 with Mr. Hannay as reporter and Mr. Fortier as translator.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: I think it is well that the members of the Senate should know what they are doing. It has been the practice for a number of years past to employ a special Senate reporter to prepare a synopsis of the proceedings and debates of the Senate. It was presumed that the press would pay some attention to the proceedings of the Senate if they were furnished gratuitously with a report of the proceedings; yet very little attention has been paid to the Senate by the press. The point to be considered by the Senate now is whether we are justified in continuing the payment of a special reporter for making a synopsis of the proceedings of the House which is utilized only to a very limited extent, and under certain circumstances, by the press of the country. When Parliament is in session we pay $40 a week to the reporter and $15 a week to the translator. There is very little for the reporter to do, and very little has been done in the way of translation. We have not, to my mind, received an adequate return for the money we have spent. During the present session of Parliament we had a vacation of over two months, and during that time the reporter received $20 a week for doing nothing. During the present year we have paid nearly $3,000 for these services. It is for the Senate to consider whether we are justified in expending money in the manner in which it has been expended, without receiving an adequate compensating return in the form of publicity by the newspapers to the rep rts which are furnished them. I wish the Senate to understand that I am not finding fault with the manner in which the reporter has performed his duties; but that though he has performed his duties to a certain extent in a satisfactory manner, I contend that the Senate is receiving no consideration from the press though these reports are furnished for nothing. I may add in this connection that, so far as the committee is concerned, I stand a glorious minority of one. The other members of the committee were in favour of the report which has been presented. There is another consideration. How far are we justified in making an arrangement for future sessions of Parliament? I know that we have been in the habit of doing so; but it is questionable how far the practice should be continued. Let the next Parliament, of whomsoever it may be composed, employ a reporter and pay him if it is thought proper. To my mind we are going a little beyond our duty. It was pointed out in the committee that some years ago I originated this practice of employing a reporter. That is quite true. I did so on the supposition that if a synopsis of the proceedings of the Senate were furnished to the press it would be utilized; but they have treated the Senate with the same contempt as previously. Whether it is because the press consider that this House is useless or that the utterances of the members are of no consequence to the community is a question which they have to consider. I have come to the conclusion, after three or four years' experience, that this is a useless expenditure, more particularly at this time when economy is supposed to be the order of the day. I could give the amounts expended during the last four or five years in this connection, but I do not think it is necessary to do so. I simply express my own general views on this question as to whether we should adopt this report and continue to make provision for the next session of Parliament. After considering the whole question, I think we are in duty bound to allow this matter to stand until the next session of Parliament, and to let that Parliament take such action as it may think proper. I know the answer to that will be: "You will not have any reporter; there will be nobody to take a seat in this House and make a report of the proceedings." Considering the results in the past, I do not think that will be of any consequence to the public or to the Senate.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Honourable gentlemen, I sympathize to some extent with the honourable gentleman from Hastings (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell), but I think this is a question which may be considered from a different point of view. This Senate has been rather remarkable, I think, for the good sense which has characterized the debates. Perhaps I may say that ten years ago there was just as much wisdom embodied in our debates as at present, but we found that while words of wisdom were flowing from the lips of senators they never reached the public. We have had Hansard, it is true, but the proprietors of the newspapers did not seem to think that it was worth the trouble of examining it to see if there was anything that was deserving of notice in the papers, and, if so, how much notice it deserved. The honourable gentleman from Hastings, who has had a large experience in connection with the press, realized, as the rest of us did, that this was an unsatisfactory condition of things, and that some means should be adopted to place at least a summary of the work done by the Senate before the eyes of the public, and this plan of having a gentleman to prepare a summary of the Senate debates for distribution to the various newspapers was suggested by him. We had a gentleman who discharged this duty for some time. I do not remember whether he left the country, died, or became too old or too proud to continue the work. At any rate, the Senate appointed Mr. Hannay for the purpose of making this summary. I think every honourable gentleman who knows about it, including the honourable gentleman from Halifax, the Chairman of the Printing Committee (Hon. Mr. Dennis), who is also a member of the Debates Committee, feels that Mr. Hannay did his work well. If honourable gentlemen will compare the notice which the Senate gets in the newspapers nowadays with what it got ten years ago, they will find that there is very much more attention paid to the proceedings of this House now than there was at that time. We pay thousands of dollars for the purpose of having a Hansard report made and translated, but, as the public do not see these reports, it is clear that the money is not bringing the results that it should, and that the only result of a public character that we get is the summary that Mr. Hannay prepares and distributes to the different newspapers. The honourable gentleman from Hastings, as he said, has felt, during the last three or four years, that the money paid to Mr. Hannay and Mr. Fortier, who translates the summary, is money thrown away. There is a good deal of money thrown away in contion with the Government generally, but I do not think that the money paid to Mr. Hannay can be said to have been thrown away. There has been no question raised about it hitherto, and while I think the honourable gentleman from Hastings is perfectly right in expressing his opinion on the subject, I think, on the whole, that summarily to get rid of these two gentlemen will not be in the interest of the Senate and will be to a certain extent a blow to the gentlemen concerned.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: I admit the truth of the statement made by the honourable gentleman from Halifax as to there being more consideration given to these reports of late; but generally, if you look at them, you will see that they are confined to questions on which there have been what I might call "rows" in the Senate.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: I shall simply refer to the question of committing a future Parliament to engagements. In the other Chamber we found several times that we were hampered by such engagements. It became a common practice among certain employees to go among members and induce them to have measures passed which secured for them employment for the following session; and in that way they tied the hands of the committee of the coming session, who would be compelled to say: "We cannot help ourselves; this was passed, and we have to bear with it." To my knowledge, that practice resulted, in some cases, in very large expenditures. To my mind it is improper, and I think we shall not be doing our full duty if we consent to it. I have nothing to say about the gentlemen who do the work referred to, nor as to how or when they do it, but I have noticed one thing, perhaps more by accident than otherwise. When I was laid up in the hospital I watched the papers from day to day to see what was going on in the Senate, and I could not find a daily paper that even stated when the Senate adjourned or when it was sitting or anything else about it. When I did get a paper that referred to it, it was in the patent boiler-plate part of a weekly which was two or three weeks old. I had to wire or write from Owen Sound at different times to ascertain whether the Senate was in session, or if it had adjourned. It occurred to me that if the Senate desired to have its business brought to the attention of the public, it ought to employ some one connected with the daily press in the Commons, whose reports would go to the whole of the press.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: If that is done and they are paid so much a line, the papers will publish it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I should like to answer the criticism of my honourable friend from Grey (Hon. Mr. Sproule), as to the practice in this Chamber in making engagements at the end of the session for the following session. I draw his attention to the difference between the House of Commons and the Senate. My honourable friend says the practice is objectionable because it ties the hands of the future Parliament. What the honourable gentleman says is true with regard to the Commons, because there will be a new Commons; but the Senate is not affected by the dissolution of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: The Committee on Internal Economy, which will have to deal with some of these things next session, will find itself committed in advance.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Undoubtedly the Committee on Internal Economy will find itself bound by what the Senate has decided upon at the preceding session. The practice of the Senate in the past has been at the end of each session to contract for the following session in only two instances: first, for our Hansard reports. Honourable gentlemen who have been appointed recently to this Chamber perhaps are not aware that up to last session the Hansard reporting was done by contract, so that at the end of each session we had to renew the contract for the following year in order to have our reportorial staff at the table on the first day of the following session. Since last year we have done away with that system, and our reportorial staff is now on the Civil Service list. The engagements which the Senate now makes for the following session are limited to those two reporters whom we have been in the habit of retaining to circulate a summary of what takes place in the Senate. It was decided some time before I came into this Chamber, some twenty years ago, I think at the instance of my honourable friend from Hastings, that we should have a special reporter to make a summary of the proceedings of the House and distribute it daily to the press. This synopsis is made and is given to the daily newspapers and to the associated press every evening, to be wired throughout the country during the night. This is the work of the chief reporter. The press receives these reports and either publishes them in full or makes clippings from them or does not publish them at all. With the leave of the House I will refer to what took place in the Committee yesterday, because under orthodox practice one should not do so. We asked a journalist who is in active practice, the junior member for Halifax (Hon. Mr. Dennis), if the work of our reporters was satisfactory. He said that it was to be commended. The question was asked:

"Why does not the press publish the reports of our summaries daily?" The answer was that if the papers are short of space they will leave aside things that they think of secondary importance, and give more space to the Commons report if the debate there seems to be more important and more interesting to the public. But he said that if these reports were not circulated our proceedings would not be reported at all. Is it important that the people at large should be informed of what takes place in the Senate? My honourable friend from Hastings says that when the public is informed it is usually of things that are not of real importance, but rather of some exciting discussion or a little rumpus that looms up larger than the serious work that is done; and the Senate, which is a revising body and does its work mainly in committees, escapes the attention of the public at large. I recognise that; but men who are interested in the legislation of this Parliament gradually recognise the importance of a revising body such as this second Chamber, and we must rely upon that opinion permeating the country to give the public a true realization of the importance of a second chamber.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: A capital argument, provided it could be utilized.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Of course, we cannot force the newspapers to publish every summary of our daily work; but, if the honourable gentlemen of the Senate will bear with me, I would suggest that we try to bring into this Chamber some work which will effectively draw the attention of the public to the usefulness of this Chamber and the work it can do.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: We have been agitating that for the last thirty years.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have several times suggested that we amend our Senate rules in order to allow a minister of the Crown, sitting in the other Chamber, to come into this Chamber and initiate or explain his own legislation. This is done in every Parliament of Europe except, I think, the House of Commons and the House of Lords in Britain. The House of Lords in past centuries would not think of allowing a commoner to enter their sacred precincts; but we feel that we are of the ordinary clay, and that it would not be offensive to any member of the Senate to see a cabinet minister come into this Chamber, propose his legislation, and participate in the debates, without voting, inasmuch as he has no seat. What would be the effect? Very often in the House of Commons there is a long debate on a question which holds up the entire legislation of Parliament for weeks. As a minister of the Crown desires to put his own stamp on legislation emanating from his department, he quite naturally prefers to propose it in the Chamber in which he has a seat, and he sometimes waits for weeks in the House of Commons while a debate is going on for an opportunity to bring in his legislation. If he could come into this Chamber and initiate his legislation here, we would not then need a third reporter to make a summary of our proceedings, for the whole press gallery would file in here. If that were done it would have the effect of apportioning the work more equitably between the two Houses; it would relieve the representative of the Government in this House, who has his hands full with Bills from all departments; and we would have the decided advantage of being able to deal with those Bills in the early part of the session, instead of being overwhelmed with work during the last days of the session.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: We have been listening to speeches of that kind every session for the last fifteen years, and nothing has ever resulted from them. The matter just discussed has nothing whatever to do with the question before the Senate at the present moment. Let me ask if this Senate approves of the payment of $20 a week to a reporter for doing nothing during parts of the session when the Senate is not actually sitting; that is, one-half of what is paid to him during the actual sitting.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: You cannot secure a properly-qualified reporter for the session if during our adjournments, long or short, his salary is held up. Under the present arrangement the reporter is given a weekly payment, and when we adjourn his weekly pay is cut in two. We felt that because we adjourned for a few weeks we should not require him to hunt for his salary in the meantime.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: I would like to see some of the work that is done, because there is an impression either that the work when done is absolutely refused by the press, or that it is not done at all.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is in the Clerk's office.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Has the honourable member (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) been speaking under the rules of the House?—because he is a great stickler for the rules.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am prepared to give notice to amend the rules at the next session in the direction of my suggestion.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I do not know whether you could make any rules to that effect.

Brigadier-General Hon. Mr. MASON: I was present at the Debates and Reporting Committee, and concurred in this report; but while I think provision should be made to have the proceedings of the Senate appear in the newspapers, there was some dissatisfaction with the way in which the duty was performed by the reporters specially employed. I think it would be better to leave the responsibility of that appointment to the Debates and Reporting Committee at the next session of Parliament.

The motion for the adoption of the report was negatived on a vote of 19 to 19.

APPROPRIATION BILL No. 4.

FIRST READING.

Bill 135, an Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the financial year ending 31st March, 1917.—Hon. Sir James Lougheed.

JUDGES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

AMENDMENTS NOT INSISTED ON.

A message was received from the House of Commons stating that that House refused to concur in the amendment made by the Senate to Bill 66, an Act to amend the Judges Act.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I move that this House do not insist on its amendments to the Bill, and that the House of Commons be acquainted accordingly.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Do I understand the refusal to concur includes all the amendments that were made to the Bill in the Senate?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until this afternoon at three o'clock.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED.

Second Sitting.

The Senate met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

AGRICULTURAL, INDUSTRIAL AND TRADE INTERESTS.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

Hon. F. L. BEIQUE presented the third report of the Special Committee on Agricultural, Industrial, and Trade Interests. He said: Honourable gentlemen, at last session there was a special committee appointed "to further inquire into what is being done and what could be done to best promote the agricultural, industrial and trade interests of this country both during and after the war." The committee was organized and during the recess issued some 22,000 circulars to public bodies in the country, inviting them to make suggestions on the subject-matters mentioned in the circular, which covered a very wide field. The main object in forming the committee was to set people thinking as to the problems which after the war would have to be settled in this country, and to prepare for the settlement of such problems. In answer to the circular some 250 suggestions were received. Some of them were of a local character and others of a general character. Those which were of a general character and which were of importance, in the opinion of the committee, were printed, in accordance with a resolution passed by this honourable House at the beginning of the session. I have been trying for the last two or three weeks to find an hour when the committee could be called together with a view of taking up this question and presenting a report. The time of members of this honourable House has been so much occupied by other work that it has been an impossibility to hold a meeting of the committee until to-day. The committee has met and its report will be read in a moment.

You will notice that there are eighteen or nineteen recommendations made by the committee. Most of them are taken from suggestions made by such bodies as the Manufacturers' Association and the Boards of Trade, especially the Edmonton Board of Trade, which made very valuable and important suggestions. Some of them are suggestions by myself and others members of the committee. I intended, if time had permitted, to accompany these suggestions with appropriate remarks and some quotations in order to bring them more prominently before the members of this House. This, however, may be done next session. We have tried to reduce the expense as much as posssible. The suggestions have been printed in a volume, which is not large, and the committee ask authority to have one thousand copies printed, with a view of sending one copy to each person who took the trouble to make suggestions, and to circulate the balance, some 750 copies. I will ask the Clerk to read the report.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The Senate,
Committee Room No. 69,
Thursday, September 20, 1917.

The Special Committee appointed to further inquire into what is being done and what could be done to best promote the Agricultural, Industrial and Trade Interests of this country, both during the war and after, beg leave to make their Third Report as follows:—

In pursuance of the authority granted your Committee during the last Session of Parliament, the following circular letter was mailed during recess to all public and quasi-public bodies in Canada (about 22,000 circulars):—

"By instructions from the Special Committee lately appointed by the Senate of Canada 'to inquire into what is being done and what could be done to best promote the Agricultural, Industrial and Trade Interests of the country, both during and after the War,' we enclose herewith copy of the Order in Council upon which the Economic and Development Commission was appointed by the Government in October, 1915.

"2. On pursuing the Order in Council you will see that it covers a great variety of important questions, such as the whole field of agriculture, colonization, immigration, labour, employment for returning soldiers at the end of the war, improvement of highways, branch railway development, the attraction of capital in the country, and the extension of trade relations. You will readily understand that the Commission can hardly be expected to solve these questions without the earnest help and co-operation of the public at large, and especially of all the organized bodies in the country.

"3. The object of the Senate in appointing the Special Committee is mainly to help the Commission in the discharge of the heavy task imposed upon it, also to inquire as to the development and utilization of our natural resources generally, and to make an appeal to all organized bodies for their best co-operation in the matter.

"4. The frightful expense, destruction of life and waste of property entailed by the unprecedented war into which almost the whole of Europe and Canada are now engaged and the new and temporary channels of industry to which both public and individual energies are now mainly directed, will demand prompt and radical readjustment of conditions in the country when peace is signed.

"5. The readjustment in this country will be best found in the development and in the improvement of agriculture, in the fostering of homogeneous industry and in the expansion of our trade.

"6. The development of our agriculture being dependent upon an increase of population, it becomes imperative to find the means of attracting a proper class of immigrants and as numerous as possible.

"7. With the peace, great avenues of trade will be opened within the Empire and with the Allies and neutral countries. Let us prepare to take our fair share and thereby find permanent employment for the capital and labour which is presently engaged in the manufacture of munitions of war.

"8. Let us prepare also for the transferring, at the end of the war, of the energies of the country from the military to the economic field.

"9. The Special Committee most earnestly request your prompt co-operation in seriously studying these and all other questions which you may consider within your province.

"10. A like appeal is being made to all municipal bodies, Boards of Trade and Chambers of Commerce, Schools, Colleges and Universities, School Commissions, Farmers' Associations, Manufacturers' Associations, Transportation Companies, Church Dignitaries, heads of the various Federal and Provincial Government Departments, Bar, Medical, Notarial and Trade Associations, all Newspaper and Press Associations, Labour Associations—in fact, to all the organized bodies in the country—and the Committee hope that it will receive from every one of them, at as early a date as possible, the result of their best thoughts and suggestions in concrete form. In the event of such information being already of record, a reference to the publication where it can be found will be sufficient.

"In addition to securing the suggestions of the Press, the Committee would appreciate its further co-operation in creating and interest in the investigation by giving as much publicity as possible to the aims and objects of the Committee and by inviting the views of the public.

"Everybody should give his mite towards bridging the cataclysm we are going through. Let all bear in mind that this joint and common action may be the means of avoiding a great depression at the end of the war, and of laying the best foundation for the future prosperity of our great Dominion."

Some two hundred and fifty replies were received. Many of these replies are limited to matters of a local character and others containing suggestions of general interest. The more valuable of the latter have been printed and are submitted herewith, together with a criticism and suggestions by Lord Shaugnessy.

Your Committee have held several meetings when the above-mentioned suggestions were fully considered in so far as they relate to agricultural interests, and your Committee now beg to make the following recommendations:—

1. Co-operation between Dominion and Provincial Governments in formulating plans for the granting or selling of land for farming purposes, whereby the respective mineral, forestry and agricultural value and its advantages and disadvantages for the latter purpose would be ascertained before each land section or district is opened for grant or sale.

2. The opening of the different sections of land for farming purposes on colony basis covering different branches of agriculture, and as close as possible to market and railway facilities.

3. That the system of disposal of the remaining Dominion lands in the West be rearranged so as to promote increased development of mixed farming on lands within a reasonable distance of railways, and of live stock industry on the more remote lands by affording assurance of reasonable permanence of the ranges.

4. The formulating of some practical schemes of farm loans which would facilitate the borrowing of capital properly guaranteed for the purpose of stocking, improving or developing farms, with sufficient co-operative responsibility to secure proper local supervision.

5. The establishment in co-operation with the Department of Immigration of organizations for the gathering and dissemination of reliable information as to labour conditions in all parts of the Dominion and the proper distribution of labour.

6. The formulating of plans to encourage and assist returned soldiers who are so inclined and physically fit, to go upon the land and cultivate it.

7. The establishment in each province of camps on good agricultural lands where returned soldiers may find employment at reasonable wages in different kinds of occupations, but mainly agriculture, with theoretical and applied instruction in agriculture in view of their ultimately settling in colonies on farms of their own.

8. The formation of expert agriculturists and assigning them to supervise and control the cultivation, by way of demonstration, of a number of different plots of ground (say one or more in each locality) by the owners thereof.

9. The formulation of plans for the better conservation and utilization of farm manure, and for the procuring of artificial fertilizers at the lowest cost possible.

10. The making of expert inquiries as to the practical use of farm tractors both for western and eastern farms and the practical demonstration of their use in different sections of each province.

11. As soon as labour conditions permit, the formulation of plans to ensure the cutting by farmers of weeds before maturity.

12. Stimulating and encouraging co-operation among producers, both for purchasing and selling, and the proper grading of farm produce.

13. The promotion of cold storage and abattoir facilities.

14. The promotion of petty industries in which farm hands may be employed at leisure time.

15. The promotion of modern conveniences, such as telephone and electric light, in rural settlements.

16. Dissemination of proper knowledge for the use of suitable fertilizers.

17. Dissemination of proper knowledge and advantage of tile draining of agricultural lands.

18. The teaching of elements of agriculture in all elementary schools, with an adjoining plot of land for applied instruction.

19. In the eastern provinces, the making of ready or semi-ready farms for intended settlers, by the province.

Your committee further recommend:

1. That the attention of the Department of Agriculture be directed to the valuable suggestions on the subject of drainage of agricultural land contained in the report of Mr. W. F. O'Hara, D.L.S., C.E., submitted herewith, with a view to the publication of the same in the form of a bulletin.

2. That one thousand copies of the Report of the Committee and the accompanying suggestions be printed in pamphlet form for general distribution.

Hon, Mr. BEIQUE.

3. That the Committee be revived at the next session of Parliament to continue the investigation into the other matters set forth in the Order of Appointment.

All which is respectfully submitted.

F. L. Beique, Chairman.

The report was concurred in.

APPROPRIATION BILL No. 4.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 135, an Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1918.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, the supply Bill now presented consists of three schedules—A, B, and C, comprising portions of the main, supplementary, and further supplementary Estimates brought down during the present session for the fiscal year ending March 31st, 1918.

Schedule A is composed of a balance of three items of the main Estimates not included in any of the preceding Appropriation Acts, being seven-twelfths of $8,094,000.00, $4,721,500.00.

Schedule B contains the balance of the items brought down in the supplementary Estimates, amounting to $677,312.50.

Total of Schedules A, B and C, $51,096,- while in Committee of Supply) amounting to $45,697,954.55.

Schedule C is composed of the items appearing in the further supplementary Estimates amounting to $677,312.50.

Total of Schedules A, B and C $51,096,767.05.

The total estimated expenditure (excluding $33,300, deducted in Committee of Supply, but including statutory charges) for the fiscal year 1917-18, and contained in the several Appropriation Acts Nos. 1, 2, and 3, and this Act, amounting in the aggregate to $254,659,250.79.

Chargeable to Consolidated Fund: Voted —partially controllable, $126,674,157.32; Statutory, uncontrollable, $74,691,001.24; $201,365,158.56.

Total for 1916-17	$280,143,323 15

Comparative Summary.

1917-1918.

Chargeable to Consolidated Fund—voted and statutory, $201,365,158.56; chargeable to Capital—voted, $53,294,092.23; total, 1917-18, $254,659,250.79.

1916-1917.

Chargeable to Consolidated Fund—voted and statutory, $193,083,546.59; chargeable to Capital—voted, $37,059,776.56; chargeable to War Appropriation—voted, $50,000,000; total, 1916-17, $280,143,323.15.

Instances of Increases and Decreases.

The following services chargeable to Consolidated Fund show a substantial estimated increase of expenditure for 1917-18 over that of 1916-17:

Pensions: voted for 1917-18, $10,000,000; voted for 1916-17, $3,000,000; an increase for 1917-18 of $7,000,000.

Interest on Public Debt: statutory, 1917-18, $54,284,143.17; 1916-17, $37,147,496.23; an increase for 1917-18 of $17,136,646.94.

Land for soldiers.—The Estimates for 1917-18 provide an amount of $2,500,000, an advance to soldiers settling on land under the Soldiers' Settlement Act. This item is new, and the service appears in this year's Estimates for the first time.

The aggregate increase in the estimated expenditure on Consolidated Fund account from these three sources—Pensions, Interest on Public Debt, and Land for Soldiers—amounts to $26,636,646.54, and should be considered in any comparison made with the estimated expenditure for the preceding fiscal year.

Increase for 1917-18 in expenditure on Capital account: the estimated expenditure on account of Railways and Canals, capital, is increased over that of last year as follows; for 1917-18, $44,349,542.23; for 1916-17, $25,71,976.56; an increase on Capital account for 1917-18 of $18,677,565.67.

Reductions in Public Works expenditure for 1917-18: The estimated expenditure for the Public Works, income, for 1917-18 amounted to $11,672,454.79. Similar estimates for a like service (1916-17) amounted to $19,834,641.99, showing a reduction for this year over that of last year of $8,162,-187.20.

Substantial reductions in Railways and Canals income expenditure for 1917-18: The estimated expenditure for Railways and Canals, income, for 1917-18, is $8,014,597.33. The estimated expenditure for a like service for the year 1916-17 was $23,937,947.33, or a decrease for the year 1917-18 of $15,923,-350.

With these explanations, which are fairly comprehensive and also fairly detailed, I move the second reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Could my honourable friend give us the expenditure on war account? He mentioned $50,000,000 in 1916-17.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The amount for war appropriation in 1917-18 does not seem to be mentioned.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Does that $50,000,-000 cover all the war expenditure in 1916-17?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not think so; I think it was only the appropriation.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The total amount mentioned for 1917-18 does not include war expenses at all?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, apparently not.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I want to congratulate the honourable leader of the Government on the complete statement that he has given us in regard to the items of the Supply Bill, but I must say that the figures are very large. As I understand the position, the expenditure for 1917-18 will amount to $254,000,000 odd, which sum does not include the expenditure on war account. Apart from the amount set down for pensions and for soldiers' settlement, and the amount of $54,000,000 for interest on debt and sinking fund, I understand that the expenditure on account of the war is not included in those figures. They represent a very large amount of money for a country with a population of about seven and a half millions; and the question to my mind is whether we are justified in increasing the expenditure in the way that we have done.

Honourable gentlemen will notice that the actual expenditure for 1916-17 was $280,000,000 odd, out of which apparently $50,000,000 was war expenditure, leaving the general expenditure at $230,000,000 odd, while for this year it will be $254,000,000 odd. That shows honourable gentlemen the way the expenditure of the country is increasing. We must also bear in mind that to those figures will have to be added the expenditure on war account. According to the statement given by the Minister of Finance, the income last year, 1916-17, was sufficient to enable us to supply $60,000,000 towards the war expenditure. While it is satisfactory that we were able to supply that amount, it is to be hoped that in the present year we shall have a revenue that will enable even a larger surplus towards paying the war charges.

Honourable gentlemen who consider the financial position of Canada, and other countries as well, must see that the only country in the world to-day to which any of the allied countries can go to borrow money is the United States. Now that that nation has entered the war, the chances of our being able to borrow large sums there will decrease from day to day. We had an instance of that in the case of the loans that were negotiated by the Minister of Finance only a short time ago. He had to go to the United States for his last loan of $100,000,000, and had to put it on the market at a price that netted him $96 on every $100. It has been figured out that the cost of that loan to this country is somewhere between seven and eight per cent, which is a high rate for us to have to pay on borrowed money. If we look at the details of the loans made by the Minister of Finance during the last two years, we find that the expense of borrowing money is increasing year after year. In 1915 a loan of $100,000,000 was placed, the rate of interest being five per cent, and the issue price being 97½ The commission charged by brokers and bankers was one-quarter of one per cent. The loan itself netted the Government some $97,003,000. In 1916 the Minister of Finance had to negotiate another loan of $100,000,000 at five per cent, repayable in 1931, also issued at 97½; but while the commission of the brokers was the same, he had to pay to the bankers one-half of one per cent in place of one-quarter of one per cent, with the result that his loan came out just about the same, netting about $97,000,000. The third loan, made in 1917, was for $150,000,000, repayable in 1937, the rate being five per cent, but this was issued at 96, as against 97½. The commissions were higher than on former occasions, and the loan netted the Government $139,882,508. Then we have the other loan to which I have already referred, made about August 1, which cost the Government considerably more than the other three I have mentioned.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: That is only a short-term loan, two years, is it not?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Yes, it is a two-year loan that was really made on notes, and when we go to pay off this loan it will have cost the country the difference between the $100,000,000 and the $96,250,000 that the Government received for it, namely, $3,750,000 plus the interest for two years, $10,000,000, making the cost to the country $13,750,000 for this $100,000,000. I point out these figures to honourable gentlemen in order that they may realize the position into which we are getting, and as indicating that the Minister of Finance is going to have considerably more trouble in raising money than he has already had. I have not referred to loans that were made in this country, because that is a different question. The difficulty that I see before Canada, as before other allied countries, is that there is only one market at present in which they can borrow money, and if they are not able to borrow in that market the only means open to the Minister of Finance for carrying on the affairs of this country are those which can be supplied by the savings of the people of Canada themselves. In this country we have not been in the habit of considering the question of saving as much as has been the case in older countries, because there has not been the necessity here; therefore it will probably be more difficult for our people to realize the obligation that lies ahead of them to save money in order to help to carry on the affairs of the country.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: If the honourable gentlemen has the figures, I think it would be interesting to know what proportion of the money borrowed was taken up in Canada?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I have not those figures here.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: You are only speaking about foreign loans.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I was speaking only about borrowing money outside of Canada.

Apart from being able to borrow money in an outside country, the only ways in which the Minister of Finance can get money for the carrying on of our affairs are from taxation and from what the people themselves are able to save and put into domestic loans. Of course, one other method has sometimes been adopted, and to a certain extent has, I think, been adopted, not only in Canada, but in other countries since the war began, that is, by the inflation of the currency of the country. This is a very dangerous course to pursue and one that cannot be continued for any length of time without causing great trouble and disaster.

Hence we are brought back to the fact that it is incumbent on the people of this country to economize in every possible way, and to reduce as far as possible every expenditure. My honourable friend has pointed out reductions that have been made by the Government in certain expenditures; but I think other reductions could have been made. I would suggest that the work on the Hudson Bay railway and on the docks, elevators and other structures at the terminus of that road should be shut down at once and no other expenditure made on it, at any rate until the war is over. It is a question whether any expenditure of that kind should be gone on with any further, when, we find in the Estimates put before us expenditures for other public works in various directions. I do not propose to go into the details particularly, but I notice that in the province from which I come there is an expenditure put down for a considerable extension of telephone lines. Whilst expenditure of that kind is very desirable when you have the money to spend, I think that at the present time that expenditure could very well have been omitted. Lines of that kind are not immediately required. The people have got along for a number of years without those extensions, and they probably could have got along just about as well for a year or two more, until we saw better what the standing of our country was and how we could manage the public finances so as to be able to carry on this class of expenditure.

Then we have to bear in mind another point. It has been brought to the attention of the country just lately that the orders for munitions, which have been a source of considerable profit in some instances, and have created a great deal of business in this country for the last two or three years, were being cut down, with the result that a large number of the persons who have been employed in munition factories will find that they have to turn to other work in order to get employment. On account of the desire to turn out munitions as quickly as possible, large wages were paid in a great number of instances to these workers, which had the effect of inflating wages not only in the munition works themselves but also in other industries in the same locality in which those works were established. The closing down of munition factories will affect the whole question of wages in the districts in which they are located, and will tell very much on the people in those districts. It will bring home to them the fact that the conditions under which they are living are somewhat inflated, and they will feel very much more than they have felt in the past the increase in prices, which has been brought about largely by the war conditions.

For all these reasons it is necessary that great economy should be observed in the expenditure of money, so that a burden may not be placed on the country greater than it can bear.

I do not propose to take up the time of the House any longer. I have tried to place before honourable gentlemen the position of affairs with regard to the finances of this country as I see them at the present time, and the necessity there is for economy in every possible direction.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the third reading of the Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

THE WAR-TIME ELECTIONS ACT.

CONCURRENCE IN COMMONS AMENDMENTS.

The Senate proceeded to consider amendments made by the House of Commons to Bill 133, the War-time Elections Act.

The Clerk then read the amendments, which were as follows:

(a) By striking out paragraph 2 of subsection 5 of the new section 65A provided by the said Bill the word "made" and inserting in each case the said word "completed" as said word appears on lines 19 and 21 of page 1162 of Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons.

(b) By striking out of said paragraph 2 of said subsection 5 of section 65A the words "except the issuance in any necessary case of a certificate in form W/3 under paragraph (g) of section 67," which words appear in the 33rd, 34th and 35th lines of said Votes and Proceedings.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Can my honourable friend tell us what is the effect of these amendments?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I cannot, out I presume, if the House of Commons in their wisdom choose to amend the Bill, and as it affects only the representatives of the people in the popular Chamber, that no objection can be taken to it. I understand they are made with the consent of both parties.

The amendments were concurred in.

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT.

The Hon. the SPEAKER read a communication from the Governor General's Secretary announcing that His Excellency would proceed to the Senate Chamber at 5.30 o'clock p.m., this day, for the purpose of proroguing the present session of Parliament.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved that the Senate adjourn during pleasure.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Before the motion is put, I would ask my honourable friend to be kind enough to let me know if he has any answers to give to my inquiries?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I regret very much that I have not. By to-morrow I shall probably be able to answer my honourable friend.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: If the honourable gentleman would be able to give me answers to-morrow I would keep the House in session until to-morrow. However, so that there may be no interference with the business of the country in general, perhaps the honourable gentleman would be kind enough to send me the answers. I will relieve the anxiety that may exist in the minds of my honourable friends on this side if I get the answers.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I will give the honourable gentleman the answers.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 5.30 the sitting was resumed.

His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated on the Throne;

His Honour the Speaker commanded the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to proceed to the House of Commons and acquaint that House that: " It is His Excellency the Governor General's pleasure they attend him immediately in the Senate,"

Who being come with their Speaker;

The Clerk of the Crown in Chancery read the Titles of the Bills to be passed, as follows:

An Act respecting the Minister of the Overseas Forces, the Parliamentary Secretary of the Department of Militia and Defence, and the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs.

An Act respecting Game in the Northwest Territories.

An Act to amend The Meat and Canned Foods Act.

An Act to amend An Act in aid of Provincial Legislation prohibing or restricting the sale or use of Intoxicating Liquors.

An Act providing for the acquisition by His Majesty of the capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company.

An Act to incorporate the Imperial Order Daughters of the Empire and the Children of the Empire (Junior Branch).

An Act respecting Live Stock.

An Act to amend the Criminal Code (respecting Insurance).

An Act to authorize the levying of a War Tax upon certain incomes.

An Act to incorporate The Army and Navy Veterans in Canada.

An Act to amend The Companies Act.

An Act to amend The Dry Docks Subsidies Act, 1910.

An Act respecting Insurance.

The Military Voters' Act, 1917.

An Act concerning the payment of salaries or wages of employees of railway companies, and to otherwise amend The Railway Act.

The War-time Elections Act.

An Act to amend the Judges Act.

An Act relating to War Charities.

To these Bills the Royal Assent was pronounced by the Clerk of the Senate in the following words:

In His Majesty's name, His Excellency the Governor General doth assent to these Bills.

Then the Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons addressed His Excellency the Governor General, as follows:

May it please Your Excellency:

The Commons of Canada have voted the Supplies required to enable the Government to defray the Expenses of the Public Service.

In the name of the Commons, I present to Your Excellency the following Bills:—

An Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1918.

An Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1918.

To these Bills I humbly request Your Excellency's assent.

Then, after the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery had read the titles of these Bills,

To these Bills the Royal Assent was pronounced by the Clerk of the Senate in the following words:

In His Majesty's name, His Excellency the Governor General thanks His Loyal Subjects, accepts their benevolence, and assents to these Bills.

After which His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to close the seventh session of the twelfth Parliament of the Dominion of Canada with the following Speech:

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

Important measures for the effective prosecution of the war have engaged your close attention during a long session, and I am now happy to release you from further attendance.

Since your labours began, the high and worthy character of our cause has been confirmed by two significant events. Our allies, the Russian people, are engaged under trying circumstances, in establishing institutions which shall fully conform to their ideals of liberty and order. In the midst of inevitable difficulties, which command our sympathy, they have affirmed their determination to remain faithful to the Alliance.

The United States of America, refusing to tolerate the arrogance and menace of Prussian Militarism have made common cause with the Allies and are vigorously co-operating in the struggle for freedom and humanity. Already the Canadian people have given many expressions of the warm welcome with which they greet their great kindred neighbour as a comrade in arms.

The meetings of the Imperial War Cabinet and Imperial War Conference in the early part of the year have very materially facilitated the thorough co-operation of the Dominion, both in the prosecution of the war in preparation for the future. They constitute also an important step in the development of constitutional relationships between the nations of the British Commonwealth.

Notwithstanding the increasing military strength of the allied nations, the stubborn resistance of the enemy in all important theatres of the war demonstrates the need of throwing our utmost effort into the struggle and thus hastening the day of abiding peace. In the western theatre the Canadian Army Corps, by its capture of the coveted Vimy Ridge and by its recent operations at Lens, has sustained its distinguished record and contributed in important measure to the ascendancy which the Allies have gained in that theatre.

In order to secure the reinforcements essential for the support of our forces further steps have become necessary, and the authority you have granted for compulsory military enlistment on a selective basis will meet the urgent need for reinforcements. At the same time it will provide the means for conserving more effectively the essential agricultural and industrial activities of the Dominion.

You have recognized your duty in providing the best possible safeguards for enabling those engaged in the defence of their country to have their voice in the decision of national questions which vitally affect them. For this purpose, as well as to give due recognition to service and sacrifice in the affairs of the State, the necessary adjustments which you have made in the legislation relevant to these matters will doubtless prove effective.

The legislation you have passed for the purpose of assisting returned soldiers to settle upon the land will not only aid materially in restoring these gallant men to their rightful status in the community but should greatly increase the agricultural production of the country.

The appointment of a Food Controller and of a Fuel Controller invested with important powers and duties is founded upon the impressive need of the utmost economy and saving in order that our national strength may continue unimpaired.

In order that our industries may be equipped to cope with the intricate problems of the future, provision has been wisely made for promoting scientific and industrial research.

Important progress has been made in solving our difficult problems of railway transportation, and the means have been provided whereby a great railway system shall become the property of the people of Canada and be added to their national undertakings;

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

In the name of His Majesty I thank you for the liberal provision you have made for the needs of the public service and for the prosecution of the war.

Hounourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

Although the stress of the war becomes increasingly severe, the people of Canada, resolute in the supreme purpose of achieving through victory an abiding peace, have not faltered; and I am confident that whatever further efforts are necessary will be unhesitatingly put forth in the stern determination that the vast sacrifices already made shall not be in vain.

The Honourable the Speaker of the Senate then said:

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

It is His Excellency the Governor General's will and pleasure that this Parliament be prorogued until Thursday, the 1st day of November next, to be here holden, and the Parliament is accordingly prorogued until Thursday, the 1st day of November next.
