MR. BLAKE AT TEESWATER.

An utterance more damaging to the Government, more unwelcome to the partisan press, more inopportune for the Ministerial orators, more disappointing to the ardent admirers of the BAYARD of Britain, more painful to the general reader, and, probably, more distasteful and unsatisfactory to the speaker himself, can scarcely be imagined than that of the President of the Council at Teeswater—the gentleman who is associated incredibly in the history of the Anti-Reform Administration with his astute predecessor; and who through his resignation of a far higher and more important office than that which he now fills, gave opportunity and sanction to the appointment of the worthy and venerated LAFLAMME to the Ministry of Justice.

In conformity with the canons of CICERO, MR. BLAKE's speech consists of exordium, statement, argument, and peroration, which fill up eleven closely-printed columns of the Government organ of the 1st and 2nd instant. The speech having been delivered on the 24th of September, commendable regard to the hint of HORACE in respect to publication has evidently been observed, for five weeks in those stirring days is surely equal to twice five years of lazy life in Tusculum.

"Better fifty years of Europe than a cycle of Cathay."

It is noteworthy also that this somewhat tardy compliance of our contemporary with an evident and repeated public demand was very carefully preceded by the printing in extenso of all the speeches of Messrs. MACKENZIE, CARTWRIGHT, and their immediate coadjutors at Simcoe, Aylmer, &c., probably by way of serving the faithful as the priests of Isis did the mummies.

"Whose care the fear of modern skepticism, Were stuffed with gums and antiseptics."

It is, we trust, needless for us to say that in common we believe with all the Canadian public we deeply deplore the decline of health which threatens in the very prime of manhood to impair the activity and usefulness of a gentleman of the acknowledged ability and influence of Mr. BLAKE, and that we earnestly hope for its early restoration. He has, however, appeared upon the platform; and he must hold himself in this respect amenable to criticism from which he might have been shielded in his retirement as an invalid, but it is his political and not his personal condition that the public have a right to diagnose and discuss.

The keynote of the address may be inferred from the opening lines of the poem quoted at length in the celebrated Aurora speech, which may now be written:—

"You ask me then why it is also
Within this region I subsist,
Whose spirits falter in the mist,
While Cassious odour taints the breeze."

Then eager, hopeful, and audacious, flushed with power, and revelling in newly-born political influence, the hope and pride of a great circle of enthusiastic young men of whom he appeared to be the natural leader, few seemed willing to remember that there were suspicious circumstances connected with his accession to office in Ontario, and that its record might be seen in the appointment to a high judicial position of the man upon whose sturdy shoulders he clambered into place. Then he made, as he seemed well pleased to imagine, a "disturbing" speech, and in his ardent enthusiasm, untrammelled by gross party shackles, and for the moment unhoodwinked by the spell of the terrible task-master, he shadowed forth a political Utopia where the Bacowes would cease from troubling and the Tories be at rest.

Although it may be said that the keynote is the same, the contrast between then and now is principally shown by recalling it. Worn, weary, disappointed, dissatisfied, self-condemning is the tone and spirit which pervades the speech. Pegasus soaring with APOLLO to the skies, and Pegasus yoked to an ignoble ox and sinking in the furrow beneath a cruel master's goad, typify the difference between the eager imaginative mood and the calculating and cool judgment. The limits of a leading article forbid anything but a hasty passing glance at the topics of the speech, some of which may form the subjects of notice hereafter.

Mr. BLAKE states that he has been attacked because the MACKENZIE-CARTWRIGHT Government, to which he belonged, had not reduced the number of Ministers and the departmental expenses. This is unfair; having urged that thirteen Ministers were unnecessary, and that the departmental expenses were extravagant. Mr. BLAKE and his friends have been justly censured for not lessening both when they came into power, and he does not escape the charge of gross inconsistency in what he admits to be a fair subject of criticism.

We have often given incontrovertible figures from the Public Accounts to show the enormous increase in the departmental expenditures. The defenders of the Government recklessly deny in the face of the plain and easily-accessible evidence that such increase exists. Mr. BLAKE, however, admits it and justifies it by the increase of work. Why is there a want of harmony of defence in this important matter? Even the expenses of Mr. BLAKE's own department, which has his attention throughout the greater part of his speech, far outrun under his guidance, its highest expenses under the Administration of Sir JOHN MACDONALD, and we have seen continually to see how

"Sir Boyle Roche's bird fell out in 1877 has been sustained by throwing its labour and outlay upon other departments, and by how much it will be seconded by the coming session's estimates of the Minister of Justice, remains to be seen. It seems a needless bit of bluster for Mr. BLAKE to say that "his accusers, bold and blatant, did not venture to repeat" in Parliament the accusation that the "prerogative had been sold for money." It is scarcely necessary to say that no member of Parliament ever insinuated such a charge against Mr. BLAKE in Parliament or elsewhere. The contrary is his high position would have warranted him in treating it with contemptuous silence. Mr. BLAKE ridicules the proposition the idea of a general uniform system under which the franchise in respect to the election of members of Parliament shall be exercised, although nothing can be more obvious than its fairness, and probably the ultimate necessity of its adoption is not far distant. The opposition to it, however, is based on a fierce scrutiny which utterly destroys the security of the ballot, enormous costs which will teach a man of limited means not to vote, have invariably to be contested with a wealthy opponent, and a protracted inquiry which virtually deprives a locality of representation for the term of Parliament, does not justify the enormious which Mr. BLAKE hesitates on the election of members of Parliament, and which the policy of the Liberal Party, which he says is to adopt the franchise of the Local Legislatures.

Reference is made to the old hobby of representation of minorities, which was tried in Toronto and Kingston, and which at the close of the last session of Parliament, Mr. DEVLIN's resolutions were discussed for the extended representation of the lesser lights of the party, but Mr. BLAKE did not lend his aid to the debate.

The cons and shameless infraction of the law in respect to the Independence of Parliament has aroused a public indignation that will long smart. It is, perhaps, a reference that was made to it at Teeswater, Mr. BLAKE says "he had been charged with being responsible for what which, it is said to have been given under which the Speaker, and, as is asserted, of several other members of Parliament have entered into pecuniary relations with the Government," and he states that he gave no aid to the Government in these matters, but if he had been consulted he would have advised against them. He says also that he understands Mr. Speaker was unseated was not discovered until the beginning of 1876, although it was said to have been elected November, 1875, and must have been notorious to the members of the Government resident in St. John's, and to a very substantial private members living there. As well as to the three gentlemen who have filled the office of Postmaster-General since the Reformers came into power. In the discussion of the ARGYLE case Mr. BLAKE seemed well to have a sense of what was due to his own eminent legal position to put an end to the sophistical babble of the MILLOYS, MCCARTHYS, DUFRESNES, and LAFLAMMES on the Committee, and to sanction and inspire a report which showed that the Speaker had been guilty of a breach of law in the observance of which is an essential of the purity of Parliamentary government, in fact the very foundation stone of the public welfare and a just representative of its rights. Mr. BLAKE was not accused of giving any countenance to the contracts in question, but among the many thousand "registered references" there is all some one who knows of the work with which he says his late Department is annually burthened, it seems strange that it never occurred to any of the high contracting parties to seek advice as to the ARGYLE contract, the NORRIS contract, the contract of the Pacific Railway company, and many other similar civilities. It is evident that the party leaders are not responsible for these
