First Gun Fired in Fight Against Paving Agents

Council Will Ask Legislation for Power to Lay Permanent Pavements.

The city council last night took the bull by the horns, so to speak, and made a vigorous attempt at dealing with the paving agent trouble in London.

For very many months the paving of streets, which need in the worst way to be improved has been delayed through the agents of the rival paving companies, going from ratepayer to ratepayer and having them sign petitions for one class of pavement and against another, for the purpose of beating rival companies. While all this has been going on the council has been delayed in the improving of the city's streets, and time after time works initiated by the city have been knocked out through the instrumentality, it is alleged, of the paving agents.

To overcome these difficulties the council now proposes to ask the legislature to take the selection of pavement out of the hands of the citizens and to allow the council by a two-thirds vote, to settle the matter.

At last night's meeting of the city council, Ald. Stevely moved, seconded by Ald. Carson, as follows, the motion carrying unanimously:

"That in the opinion of this council, the municipal act should be so amended that in the construction of permanent pavements, part of the cost of which is defrayed by the municipality, the council should have the power by a two-thirds vote of all the members, to decide as to the kind of pavement that shall be laid, and to construct the same, and charge a porportion of the cost of the said pavement to the property holders on such street or streets as pavements may be laid, and that the city solicitor be instructed to prepare such an amendment, and that the Hon. Adam Beck be requested to introduce the same in the Legislature at its next session, and advocate its adoption."

In speaking to his motion, Ald. Stevely said the experience of the past few years showed that it was time something was done to change the mode of the securing of pavements. If the power were placed in the council's hands a great deal of the trouble and worry now occasioned by the paving agents would be obviated.

Other aldermen agreed with Ald. Stevely and in the end the motion was carried unanimously. It is expected that the London delegation will ask the Ontario Municipal Association to support the resolution when it is placed before the Legislature by Hon. Adam Beck.

DEATH'S DOINGS

CZARINA IS NOW A REAL RULER

Nicholas Fell in Love at Birth of Son.

EMPRESS HATED BY TERRORISTS

Once Pitied by Revolutionaries Her Promotion of Trepoff Put Her in Danger of Death.

St. Petersburg, Aug. 22. — The virulence with which the revolutionary party in Russia are now attacking the Czarina is in a way a high compliment to her majesty, a proof that she has at length become a personage of importance in the land. Until within the last few months it was their custom to show more consideration for her than for any other member of the imperial family. Not only did they never say a word against her, but they even took up cudgels on her behalf sometimes, and denounced in unsparing terms the fashion in which certain of her husband's relatives demeaned themselves toward her. They used openly to accuse the grand dukes, especially the Alexandrovitches, Vladimir and Alexis, of intriguing against her, and the Dowager Czarina of doing everything she could do to render life to her a burden. Her husband's neglect of her, too, was a scandal, they were never weary of declaring; and they spread abroad all sorts of strange stories concerning the painful position in which it often placed her, even at her own court.

They used her most skillfully as a tool wherewith to excite animosity against the whole Romanoff family, in fact, lavishing on her personally much warm sympathy the while, and even professing to be sorry not only for her sake, but for the sake of Russia, that the Czar should never turn to her for advice, but always to his mother. In those days it was at the Dowager Czarina they hurled the bitterest of their reproaches and the fiercest of their threats, for they looked on her then as the power behind the throne; and if they hurl them now at Czarina Alexandra, it is because they know, or, at any rate, believe, that she has taken her mother-in-law's place as the adviser in chief. A year ago the Czarina was as safe in St. Petersburg as the Queen is in London; now, were she to drive down the Nevsky, she would carry her life in her hand.

To what extent the revolutionists are right in looking on Czarina Alexandra as the power behind the throne, and holding her therefore responsible for the present state of things in Russia it is impossible to determine precisely. Undoubtedly, she now holds a different position, not only with regard to the whole imperial family, and even the nation, from that which she used to hold. So long as she was without a son, she was looked upon as a stranger in Russia, one who had no stake there, and therefore, no right to a voice in its concerns. She had been brought there for the express purpose of providing its sovereign with an heir; and, having failed to do so, was treated as those who fail generally are treated in this illogical world of ours. The superstitious looked on her askance as on one with whom the powers on high were angry; the patriotic, as on one who ought to have rendered the fatherland a service and had not; while even in the mind of Czar Nicholas she was associated with disappointment and anxiety. For her in these circumstances to be a power either behind the throne, or anywhere else, was, of course, impossible; not only politically, but even socially, her influence was nil.

All this was changed, however, the day her son was born. As the mother of the future czar she could no longer be ignored, thrust aside, and made of no account at court. Not only had she the right to speak, but to speak with authority. Besides, in his unbounded delight at having at length an heir, Czar Nicholas developed a passionate attachment for his wife; he fell in love with her, in fact, as he had never fallen in love with her before; and — well he has always been as wax, it must be remembered, in the hands of those whom he loves. He who, even in his honeymoon, had never paid the slightest heed to her opinions, or dreamed of asking her advice on any subject, suddenly began to turn to her for guidance upon all occas would do nothing wit her, and would keep his waiting for the hour toge talking over with her the detail projects which they h lated.

At the instance of the Gran Sergius, Gen. Trepoff, the on crat in whom the grand duc hates bureaucrats, has fa summoned from Moscow to S turg and given a free hand urate reforms. Unhappily, by a piece of supreme ill-lu even the general was installe the St. Vladimir's day incid lowed as it was by the murd Grand Duke Sergius, threw out of gear. The Czarina, panic-stricken, became mo than ever to shirk responsibi again the grand duchess Cam help, bringing with her this t Trepoff; and thanks to their agement and support her maj since then certainly tried her make her influence felt on t and through him in state affair it is not altogether without rea the revolutionists have turned her, and are denouncing her gerous.
