INGERSOLL REPORTS YIELD OF APPLES HIT BY FROST

Thousands of Barrels of Fruit Are Frozen On the Trees.

WAVE IS SEVERE

Warmer Weather May Retrieve Part of Unharvested Crop.

Special to The Advertiser.

Ingersoll, Oct. 30.—According to reports from the neighboring districts, there are thousands of barrels of apples frozen on the trees. In the opinion of many of the growers, the apples have been permanently damaged, and it is a question if an effort will be made to harvest any portion of the crop.

Of the more marketable varieties, the Northern Spies predominate. One prominent grower of this district stated today that it was probably the earliest in 25 years or more that the apple crop had suffered so severely from frost.

It is probable that the damage caused by the frost will enhance the value of the apples which have already been gathered. It was stated that as a rule the Spies are not harvested until the latter part of October or early in November.

One grower in this section declared today that he had about 250 barrels of Spies on the trees, and similar conditions are said to prevail in many other orchards. There is some speculation as to the effect that warmer weather, which would give the fruit an opportunity of thawing out gradually, would have on the unharvested crop.

ST. THOMAS ALSO HIT.

Special to The Advertiser.

St. Thomas, Oct. 30.—Fear is expressed in the district over the effect of frost on the late root harvest and the apple crop. A great portion of the apple crop is still on the trees, many fields of potatoes are undug, and much of the root crop remains untouched.

PROPER MARKETING IS NEEDED IN APPLE TRADE

Prof. Crow of Guelph Addresses Kiwanians at Luncheon Hour.

Professor Crow, formerly of the Ontario Agricultural college staff, was speaker at the Kiwanians' luncheon yesterday. His subject was the apple-growing industry of the province. In his address he criticized both the producer and the consumer, the former for his failure to market co-operatively and the latter for his lack of appreciation of the Canadian product.

With proper marketing methods he was positive that the consumption of apples in the city of London could be trebled. About 70 per cent of the apples grown in the province were of an inferior quality, he declared.

J. H. Langford was the booster today and several bushels of apples from the Westmount farm, owned by R. Suhr, were the prizes.

COL. S. C. ROBINSON, victorious Conservative candidate in West Essex, a gain from the Liberal forces. Col. Robertson defeated E. Blake Winter, former mayor of Windsor, and Liberal candidate in the general election.

CHURCH CORNER-STONE IS LAID AT STRATFORD

H. G. Martyn Officiates at Ceremony For New Parkview United Church.

Special to The Advertiser.

Stratford, Oct. 30.—Another important milestone in the church history of the city of Stratford was passed yesterday, when the cornerstone of the New Parkview United church was laid. There were about 150 people present for the ceremony. H. G. Martyn, who has been prominent in the church work in the east end of the city, officiated at the laying of the stone.

The building being erected is for Sunday school purposes, and the church proper will be built in front of the Sunday school. The Sunday school building, of red brick, will accommodate 400 persons. Rev. Finlay Matheson is the pastor of the church.

There were three speakers for the occasion. All of them brought the best wishes from the organizations which they were representing. They were Rev. J. B. Dengis, president of the Stratford Ministerial association; Rev. W. L. Hiles, chairman of the Presbytery of Perth, and Rev. A. E. M. Thomson, of London, president of the London Conference.

Ride In Barrow Won By Woman

Novel Election Wager Carried Out in St. Thomas Friday.

Special to The Advertiser.

St. Thomas, Oct. 30.—A woman official of the Yarmouth Heights federal election poll was given a free ride in a wheelbarrow this morning as the result of winning a freak election bet with a male enthusiast.

She wagered that Hugh McKillop would poll a heavier vote than Mayor Sloggett and won.

The vote in Elgin West was heavier in 1921, the figures being, 1921, 15,458; 1925, 14,956.

7 LIVES LOST AS SCHOONER OVERTURNS IN HEAVY SEA

Seattle, Wash., Oct. 30.—The motor fishing schooner Bowser was overturned by a huge wave onto the sand pit of the Grays harbor bar today and all of the crew of seven were lost, according to a radio message intercepted by the harbor station here.

The message from the U. S. dredge Culba stated that the Bowser approached too close to the bar, over which the huge waves were breaking and which turned her over.

The dredge and other vessels in the vicinity stood by until all hope of rescuing the crew was lost, the message said.

LATE MRS. H. M'CALLUM BURIED AT MT. PLEASANT

The funeral of the late Mrs. Helen McCallum, widow of the late Malcolm McCallum, was held yesterday afternoon from her late residence, 81 Fullarton street, to Mount Pleasant cemetery. The services were conducted by the Rev. Dr. Bowley Green of Toronto.

FRANKLIN SMOKE, K.C.
elected Conservative member for Brant, a gain from the Progressives. Mr. Smoke is an old campaigner, and won the two-man fight in his riding by a majority of more than 1,000.

SPINDRIFT

An Adventure of the Great Lakes

By HAROLD TITUS

INSTALMENT 25.

It was not over.

John Goodheart had won one stage of the grilling battle. He had brought hope to hopeless men, had delivered concrete hope in the shape of stout manila line with his own hands. He had beaten the lake, he had functioned, but so far he had put no more than hope into their grasp. Now he and the Hopps were at the mercy of Ezra and the men out there.

Willie could not move. He could stand up and suffer the line to be passed about his chest beneath his armpits, lashed there with lighter stuff. But that was about all he could do, and William and John worked feverishly, fighting off the stiffness that cold had put into their limbs, for though he stood he could not speak. Little Will had collapsed, a moaning huddle, in the water.

"You next," Goodheart said to William. "Lash you close to him. He may need help. I'll stay by the little fellow."

And so the line went next about William, and then the two lifted Will, propped him up, shielded him from flying spray with their own bodies, and bound the life line close about his body.

"Stand by, old fellow!" John cried, in his ear. "We've got you now! Keep up a grin. . . They'll have you aboard in no time. . . That's the boy!"—as Will opened his eyes. "We don't quit. . . Not now, we don't. . . All right! Now, you're ready!"

Deftly he made himself fast, and then mounting to the rail, he moved his arms to the men in the pitching Wanderer.

Strong though he was, resistant though his splendid vitality proved to be to the cold and the struggle, John Goodheart never recalled the detail of that terrible trip outward.

One by one they went over the side, Willie first with a gasp of pain as he felt solid footing go from beneath him. Then William went, and before the line, hauled by steady hands on the tug, had yielded the last of its slack, John lowered little Will into the water.

He leaped in himself and, one hand gripping the line beyond the half-conscious boy, put his other arm about him and began to shout encouragement into his ears.

Slowly the men on the tug pulled, but it seemed to Goodheart as though they were being drawn through the water with the speed of an express train. His hip grazed a rock and he winced from the pain.

"Let yourself go limp!" he shouted at Will. "You won't get hurt. I'll hold you up."

Little need for that advice. Will was as limp as a rag and, but for the life belt which he wore, Goodheart would have been forced to struggle desperately to keep the boy's face above the water.

As it was, they were submerged a great deal of the time. White, angry froth smothered them; spray slapped at them and the current gripped at their bodies as if in conscious, savage wrath, swinging them this way, then that, banging them against boulders, dragging them over others, and once they were caught on an upstanding, jagged rock and held there for endless moments while Goodheart waved frantically for slack as he fought the pull of the line with his feet.

Then they went on. Goodheart cupped one hand beneath Will's chin and swam with his feet to make it possible to keep the little fellow's mouth and nose in the air at least a part of the time. It seemed that he had been too late, that the spark of life had gone from Will Hopp, and then, when tears of helplessness smarted at his eyes, John felt the lad's throat move as he swallowed and he laughed again in triumph, but the laugh was choked back as a great crest swept down upon them, battering the breath from him, bruising and tearing at him. . .

However, the size of that sea meant that they had come far; they were out where the great seas broke again and when he rode to the top of the next roller Goodheart fought against the drag of the line which would pull him through the crest so that he might see. . . Yes! Just beyond them was green water. They were right on the edge of the shoal then!

The line was cutting into John's body. It seemed as though it would tear away his flesh in great rolls across chest and back, tear loose his arms and slip over his head. He dragged himself forward and shoved against Will with his other hand in an effort to ease the strain that might be squeezing at what life remained in that limp body. He called out to William to watch Willie's face to keep up. . . And then the strain eased suddenly.

He wondered sharply at that. Had the line parted? Had something——

But, clinging to Will, buoyed by the life belt, they rose swiftly on the next wave instead of being dragged through it. He saw the men standing in the stern of the Wanderer, taking in slack easily, without much effort.

"Good old Ezra!" Goodheart muttered. "Good old Cap'n! He's backing down on us—relieves the strain!"

He realized that he was very tired and let himself go a moment, floating idly beside Will. Then he stirred to effort, shoved the other's head up and shouted in his ear.

When he looked up again the Wanderer was flaunting her stern at them as she rose over the next wave. The screw was churning the water. Ezra had backed far enough. He was starting out with just speed enough to hold his own, and the line was tightening, dragging the four forward. Hands were reaching down, voices were shouting encouragement, and Goodheart felt strong fingers fasten in his shirt and swing him up. He sprawled on the deck, buckets of water streaming from him.

"Get 'em into the fire hole!" he said quickly. "Will's bad off, but I guess a little heat——"

A hand fell on his arm, tugging at him.

"You, too. Come!" It was Ezra Needham, and in his eyes was a strange conflict of lights, like joy giving battle to pain.

"Never mind me. Get them in first. I'm all right."

"Yes," said the cap'n. "You're all right, John."

He turned away but Goodheart had seen the mist in his fine old eyes and had detected the catch in his voice.

The exuberance, the sense of mastery drained from him.

He could beat the lake and all its savagery. He could look death in the face and be unafraid. But he could not do so simple a thing as remember.

Still, there was a measure of compensation for him.

This did not come from the extravagant things that were said by the crowd that swarmed the dock shortly after they reached Fairport and the story had spread, John did not care about that. He did not even give much heed to the reassuring clasp of Ezra's hand on his shoulder when, clad in dry clothing, he emerged from the pilot house.

It was when he stepped to the dock that he faced the Brothers.

William looked as he always had looked. The narrow escape had left no mark on him. Willie was pale but his eye was as dispassionate, as blank as ever. Little Will leaned against a spile for support and shivered despite the heavy Mackinaw jacket he wore over warm, dry clothing.

William swallowed hard and stepped toward John.

"Mister Goodheart," he said, "you done us a little favor today and we want to thank you for it."

". . . want to thank you for it."

". . . thank you for it."

"That's nothing, boys. You'd do as much for me."

William nodded vehemently and then launched on what was probably the longest speech of his life.

"We'll tell everybody we would, Mister Goodheart. We'll tell everybody something else, too. We tried to do you harm, once. We set on you an' tied you up onct. We war right rough with you that night. We done it because the story'd got around that you was a warden an' we thought you was goin' to make trouble for us. We guess you ain't no warden, Mr. Goodheart. We guess the man who said you was a warden is pretty low down. But even if you should ever git to be a warden an' folks should know it an' try to be mean to you, you just come to the Hopp Brothers. We'd go through hell an' high water for you, Mister Goodheart. After what we done to you, you didn't owe us nothin', an' yet you risked your life for us today!"

A lump came in John's throat. He grinned but he thought the expression must be unconvincing.

"Well, that's darned fine of you, boys. I don't ever expect to need that sort of help, but it's nice—it's fine—it's a great thing to have offered."

He pushed through the crowd then with heart sinking. He had seen Janet Needham looking at him, and all the old misery, all the futility of trying to remember swept over him.

Still, he told himself as he walked on toward Sam Faxson's, for a brief span of time today he had known again what mastery meant. He had tasted the sweetness of achievement. Give him time, give him strength, and he would beat this other thing as he had beaten the lake. The task seemed hopeless but he would keep on trying to do such a simple thing as remember a face!
