(Laughter.)—The reason why the bill was confined to the Judicial salaries was, because there were no other salaries on the Civil List establishment that could be reduced. There was only one of the Judges—Judge Street—whose salary the local Government had power to reduce, under the instructions received from Lord Glenelg and Lord Stanley; and he [hon. Attorney General] was obliged, if called upon, so to advise his Excellency, and if the hon. mover of the amendment stood in his place he would be obliged to act in the same manner. Were that hon. member the first legal adviser of the Crown, and were he called upon to advise as to the passing of a Bill for the immediate reduction of the Judges' salaries, with the Despatch staring him in the face, would he not say the Royal assent could not be given? Did the hon. member mean to tell him that he would not do it? Were he in that situation he must do it; and so must he (hon. Attorney General) do it: he was sworn to do his duty, and would do so fearlessly and conscientiously, regardless of popular clamour or its result. He was sworn to obey, and to serve that Government which was willing to concede to us every thing we asked that was consistent with the dignity of the Empire. He again warned the committee that he must do his duty, and that if the bill should receive this amendment it could not pass. And if the House had not confidence in him he would resign his office, and let them place another man in his stead; and he thanked God that he was not dependant on his office for a living. The hon. member for Carleton had proposed a reduction in his salary, and had told him that the people expected him to make a voluntary reduction; but why was he singled out to do this more than any other Public Officer? was it because he had fought so long for popular principles, and had been the means of placing the House in that foreground in which hon. members now found themselves? Because he had sacrificed his practice, and worked for the public for fourteen years without remuneration, was it expected of him to spend the remainder of his life in the same manner? He did not believe it of the people of this Province, and he was willing to go into the hon. member's own County upon that ticket, and run him single-handed!—(Applause in the gallery.)

Mr. Ritchie rose to order. The hon. Attorney General and himself had been contending earnestly it was true, but cautiously until now, when the hon. member's remarks were cheered by his constituents in the Gallery. As the hon. member had the vantage-ground in this respect, he should be cautious not to address himself to the passions of his constituents, and a little courtesy on their part was necessary. He was not to be intimidated by any such means, and upon the first repetition of it he would move the standing order. He did not come there to be bullied by a Fredericton mob.

[Several hon. members here strove to gain the floor, when his hon. the Speaker took the Chair, and called the House to order. Mr. Ritchie then stated his complaint, and the hon. Attorney General explained that he considered it an innocent ebullition of feeling on the part of his constituents, not intended to interrupt the proceedings, but to back him in the challenge he had thrown out to the hon. member for Carleton. The hon. Speaker then declared that if the noise was repeated, he should order the Gallery to be cleared. The Committee then resumed.]

Hon. Attorney General continued.—He would ask the hon. member for St. John if he would require any one in office to do what he himself would not do if in their situation? That was always a safe test for a person in opposition to apply to himself, and if the hon. member would go the length he had described, he had better take care, for his character would be appreciated by the public. What the opposition advocated amounted to politic infidelity. He (hon. Attorney General) had given the Committee warning that the bill as proposed to be amended would not pass into a law, as the Imperial Government had repeatedly declared that the Salaries of present Incumbents shall not be reduced. He then came to the second amendment proposed, to embodying other reductions in the bill. This was liable to a very serious objection. That Bill was a Money Bill, and must be sent up to the other Branch on parchment; that Branch would have no power to amend, but would be obliged either to pass or reject the Bill as it was. Therefore if the Bill should go up with a scale of reductions applied to all Salaries the House thought it were proper to reduce, it would deprive the other Branch of their deliberative power, and they must either accept of the whole scale or reject it. This would probably lead to the defeat of the Bill. Hon. members urged immediate reduction in Salaries, because the people were starving; if by doing so they could relieve the people of the Province and save them from starvation, he would at once sacrifice his salary; but it would be of no avail. If the people were suffering, let the House protect them in such articles as they could manufacture, and that would give them employment and a living. But if the people were suffering, and reducing salaries would relieve them, hon. members should vote for the Bill as it stood, as it would thus become law, and not vote for amendments which would prevent the Bill passing at all. But let them not be led away to hope for that which was impossible. Supposing all the Salaries in the Civil List establishment were swept off, it would only swell the amount of the Surplus Fund, which the Province could not touch. The sum of £14,500 a year would still be drawn from the Treasury and placed in the hands of the Receiver General, where it would be locked up, as were £9,000 at the present time; and how would that relieve the distresses of the people? The only way to effect an immediate reduction was by an Address; that he would go for, and if another hon. member took the lead in the matter, a member of the Government would do so. The Government would also endeavour to get at the Surplus Civil List Fund. He wished to see something done, and did not like to see the Bill before the Committee thwarted by a measure which could effect nothing. For the same reason he should oppose the amendment by the hon. and learned member for Restigouche, as that would in all probability prove fatal to the Bill in the other Branch. He hoped the Committee would support this Bill, and then let them prepare an Address to the Throne. He regretted the ebullition of temper just now about the noise in the Gallery; if he was warm it was his manner, and he meant no offence by it; and the hon. member for St. John should learn to distinguish betwixt warmth and bad temper.

Mr. Ritchie said it was to say the least of it indelicate on the part of the Hon. Attorney General's constituents to come there and interrupt the proceedings, and he checked it in order that the offence might not be repeated. The Speech they had just heard from the Hon. Atty. General was a mass of fallacies, and so he would make it appear. The hon. member had charged those who were in favour of the amendment with being political infidels. "It is political infidelity," said he "to go on with the principles of immediate reduction, and apply it to the Judicial Salaries." He had at first said this, and afterwards in the course of his Speech, forgetting what he had said in the commencement, he proposed to pass this Bill first, and he would then go with either Bill or Address in favour of immediate reduction; although he considered an Address the most courteous; so that the Hon. Attorney General was, by his showing, a political infidel! The opposition had also been asked why they did not bring in measures—thus was it retorted upon them when they called upon the Government to bring down their measures. Was there no difference in their position? Had not the Government been formed upon the understanding that they were to be a working Government, and had they not had three months to prepare their measures; and now where were they? Was this all—a Bill to effect a reduction perspectively. But "said the Attorney General, I will not yield to popular clamour; I do not care for the popular voice!" He who stood so long as the champion of popular rights, and who had been placed in office by the voice of the people, no sooner finds a measure proposed which is likely to affect his own Salary, but he turns round and calls that same voice popular clamour! (Hear, hear.) He might call it whatever he chose, but he might rely upon it that the public voice was aroused upon this subject, and would be heard. Then the hon. member told them that the Bill if amended would not become law; and why? He was his own prophet in the matter, he told them it would not pass, and then told them that he, as the first legal adviser of the Crown, would advise the Governor to withhold his Assent. And herein lay the gross inconsistency of the hon. member, for he declared against the Bill passing if the principle of immediate reduction was embodied in it, on the ground of its unconstitutionality, and yet he says, "pass this Bill as it is, and then embody the principle of immediate reduction in another Bill, and I will go for it?" —Now if the hon. member had no objection to another Bill embodying the principle of the amendment, why would he not consent to have this Bill amended? As to the other hon. and learned member for York, who was also in the Government, he had positively refused to give an opinion on the Salaries of other public officers—the House could not drag his sentiments from him. He (Mr. Ritchie) knew not whether the Bill would pass with the amendment, or without; but if it should pass with the amendment, and the Royal Assent should be withheld, the Imperial Government would then know that this House considers it possesses the right to make an immediate reduction of Salaries: but if the Bill should pass without the amendment, it would be taken for granted that the House held the opinion that they would not interfere with the Salaries of the present Incumbents. In reference to the case of Mr. Fairbanks, in Nova Scotia, it happened thus—He held his office under the former system of vested rights, and held a distinct pledge to that effect in writing. But when the local Government determined on making the office political, Earl Grey, in one of his Despatches confesses that the Imperial Government was pledged to him, and expressed his opinion that the local Government ought not interfere with him, and a hope that they would not; but at the same time, he acknowledged their powers to do so, and directed that the case should be submitted to the decision of the House of Assembly. Here it was different, for no distinct pledge had been made to Judges whose salaries were now under consideration. The hon. Surveyor General had, in a very graphic manner, and with much dramatic effect, drawn upon his imagination for a meeting between a holder of New Brunswick Scrip, and a London Broker. Now he differed with the hon. Surveyor General as to the probable result. If the Broker found that we had reduced Salaries here, he would consider us a saving, commercial people, but if on enquiry he were told that the Surveyor General of this Province sits, in his office a few hours in a day, with little or nothing to do, and gets his £1200 or £1400 a year for it, he would button up his pocket and say, "oh, you're an extravagant sett out there; you'll never get along; I'll not lend any money to you!" (Much laughter). As to the salary of the Surveyor General he (Mr. Ritchie) considered £400 a year quite enough. ("Hear hear" from hon. Mr. Baillie.) "Hear hear?" Yes, it was "hear, hear" now in this House, but "hear, hear" would go abroad among the people, and "hear, hear" would come back again, until it "hear hear'd" a person into the Surveyor General's office who would be content with a reasonable salary. (Roars of laughter.)

Hon. Mr. Baillie,—"Why, that is "Hear, hear's" enough to last for twenty-four hours.—Fred. Reporter.

The House is principally engaged in discussing the Revenue Bill; and if the experiment of high taxation, a dozen times repeated, prove efficacious, we shall have it to the full. The Duties thus extracted will, during the ensuing year, be paid by the poor thousands, to the Rich Few; and this is what is called Protection, and a wholesome circulation!—Ib.
