Pope and Kaiser.

It is no new thing for an Emperor and a Pope to come into collision. It is now eight centuries since that memorable quarrel between Henry, Emperor of Germany, and Hildebrand, known in history as Pope Gregory VII., which wrapped Europe in war and powerfully affected the course of subsequent history. The arrogant monarch, finding the Pope would not yield his claims in the matter of investiture, assembled a Conventicle of Bishops at 1076, and made them pass a sentence of deposition against Gregory VII. He sent this decree to Rome with an insolent epistle of his own. But the monk of Cluny was not made of the stuff which bends before the frown of an Emperor. He responded by excommunicating Henry, and declared that his crown was forfeit for his tyranny and wickedness. The Pope's fulmination was more effective than the Emperor's, for no churchman claimed the tiara in Rome, while a number of princes of the Empire chose Rudolph of Suabia to fill the throne vacated by the word of Gregory. The Emperor, seeing his mistake, suddenly resolved to appeal to the Pope, and conciliate him by penitence and submission. In the midst of a bitter winter he crossed the Alps and presented himself, barefoot and in penance shirt, at the gate of Gregory's castle at Canossa. The great pontiff seemed to take pleasure in macerating this bruised reed, and kept him waiting three days, his penitence turning to gall in his heart. It was perhaps a little overdone, for as soon as Henry received absolution, he hurried home, and after beating his rival Rudolph, he marched again upon Rome, this time in shirt of mail, and gave Gregory a sad old age and an exile's death.

The recent quarrel between Pious IX. and William of Germany shows what progress has been made in relation of the Church and State since the eleventh century. The cause and the motive quarrel are almost exactly the same as in the earlier one; for human nature changes very little in the process of ages. It is now as then the conflict between spiritual and secular authority, the Papal against the Imperial emous-propre, disguised on the one side by an unquestionable sincere zeal for the Church, and on the other by an equally earnest protestation of devotion to public order. But while it is difficult to see any especial difference between the moral aspects of the two conflicts, the method of the quarrel has changed to an extent which forms an almost ludicrous contrast to prompt and savage reprisals of the middle ages. While Henry and Gregory, upon a disagreement in relation to an investiture, declared each other's thrones vacant, and set armies in motion to sustain their fulminations, William and Pius, on a precisely similar question, content themselves by an interchange of polished and sarcastic notes, which will be read with as much interest for their keen incisive style, as for the importance of the issues involved. The letter of the Pope, as befits his claim of spiritual supremacy, is the more direct and dogmatic of the two. He informs the Emperor that his Government, which he takes care to separate from the person of His Majesty, is in aiming at the destruction of the Catholic religion. He warns him solemnly and severely that such measures will only undermine his throne. He makes a singular concession, or a singular claim, as it will be variously regarded by Catholics and Protestants, in saying that all the baptized belong to him, and concludes by expressing the hope that the Emperor will put a stop to the scandalous conduct of his Ministers. The Emperor, very much at his leisure, answers, a month later, that he is pleased to have an opportunity to correct certain misapprehensions of His Holiness. He assumes the full responsibility of his Minister's act, informing the Pope that nothing could be done against his approval. He complains of the rebellious spirit displayed by his Catholic subjects, which he regards as equally disloyal and unscriptural. He answers the Pope's demand by the counter-demand—in which there seems more of irony than arrogance—that the head of the Catholic Church will use his authority to put a stop to the agitation in Germany. He closes by declining, with perhaps more of candor than of courtesy, the honor of being considered one of the flock of the Pope.

There will be two very decided opinions as to which of these aged yet still ardent champions has the better of this passage at arms. But we think there can be little dispute as to the question whether the world of Pius or the world of Hildebrand is the preferable one to live in. We are far from approving all the measures by which the German Government has thought proper to crush the Catholic protest against the tyranny of the State; but we can heartily congratulate the world that there is no power in Rome which can pull even a tyrant from his throne.

[From the Boston Journal.]

An Open War on the Public Schools.

In the proceedings of the Roman Catholic Convention at St. Louis on Friday there is a very clear and unmistakable announcement of the Catholic policy in regard to our public schools. We are very glad to have the statement take so decided a form, and come from so athoritative a source. Hitherto those persons who have asserted that the Catholics desired the destruction of our school system have been looked upon as alarmists. Now we have fortunately all doubt removed, and we invite the attention of any who do not understand the attitude of the Catholics on this question, to the report of the discussion at St. Louis.

The resolution which evoked the discussion was one which declared "that the present system of public schools is a curse to our country and flood-gate of atheism and et sensuality; and of civil, social and national corrupion." Mayor Kelly of Richmond, Va., representing in his official position, as he admitted, a constituency which is 80 per cent. Protestant, thought the resolution should be modified, and believed that the Catholics should be satisfied with driving the Bible out of the public schools. A delegate from Pennsylvania expressed the same idea, but was interrupted by an irate priest, who declared that the purpose was not to drive the Bible out of the public schools, but to introduce the correct version and the Catholic catechism. This extraordinary proclamation was met with the query whether it was just or right to introduce the Catholic catechism among Protestants when the Protestants, who were in the majority, were not allowed to use the Bible in the public schools. The discussion went on. One reverend father "frankly confessed that the Catholics stood before the country as the enemies of the public schools," and added that they would as soon send their children to the pest house or bury them, as let them go to the public schools. Another declared that "the public school system is a nuisance." The resolution was finally recommitted, and a substitute, expressive of similar views in a modified form, was adopted by a unanimous vote.

College Secret Societies.

The recent tragedy at Cornell University, resulting in the death of young Leggett, has led to an overhauling of the numerous secret societies of that institution, resulting in some very peculiar revelations. In order to attain the honor of membership in the society of which young Legget aspired to be a member, a rigorous initiation must be endured. The night for the performance of the rites of initiation having arrived, the members meet in secret lodge and prepare for the ceremonies. The candidate is finally led in, and a rope having been fastened around his body he is drawn into another apartment, where he is tossed in a blanket and put through a series of perambulations dangerous to life and limb. Not unfrequently, as in the case of Leggett, the candidate is taken out into an open field, stripped and made to run under the spur of half a dozen whip lashes. After this the candidate must submit to the process known as branding. To accomplish this he is bound, his clothing is removed and a heated shovel is brought nearly in contact with the body until the exposed part is heated nearly to a blister, when, suddenly, a piece of ice is clapped on. He is then placed in a coffin where he is generally frightened into a swoon, and when he awakens to consciousness, he is given the hand of fellowship. It is understood that measures are to be taken to suppress these practices forthwith, and that any society repeating them will be straightway abolished. At the coroner's inquest, called to investigate the circumstances of Leggett's death, the testimony shows that in a process preliminary to initiation, the deceased was blindfolded, when the students, who were leading him, all fell off the cliff. The verdict of the jury was death by accident.

A Romance of Crime.

A romance of crime has recently been brought to light at Eton College, the hero of which appears to have been one of the most accomplished swindlers of the period. Aged about forty, and of gentlemanly, foreign appearance, M. Ostrog appears to have found but little difficulty in entering the best society, and among his most recent acquaintances were officers, clergymen and members of the learned profession. At Eton College he introduced himself to one of the masters and after having thus ingratiated himself he appears to have been treated in the most considerate manner, and repaid that gentleman's kindness by robbing him of a large quantity of valuable books and other property, which was subsequently traced to the house of another gentleman in London. Upon asking for M. Ostrog, it was represented that he was not there. Delay was thus occasioned, and in the meantime M. Ostrog escaped over the roof of the next house in his waistcoat and trousers, armed with a revolver. The following day M. Ostrog revisited his pleasant quarters at Eton, and his knowledge of the manners and customs of the students helped him to effect another still more extensive robbery, a large number of students being among his victims. Worse remains to be told. M. Ostrog while in London courted and won the affections of a most accomplished and handsome young lady the daughter of a gentleman of position in the neighborhood. Thanks to the efforts of the police she had a most fortunate escape from this villain's attentions. It is believed by the police that considerable care will be required in his capture. armed as he is, and that in order to avoid arrest he will not hesitate at any crime.
