THE ROYAL COMMISSION.

What Sir Geo. Cartier thought about admitting Americans into the Canada Pacific Railway—The McMullen family in Court—What they Know about Selling Correspondence—Important Testimony.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

OTTAWA, Sept. 11.

The proceedings before the Royal Commission to-day were of a very interesting nature; and some facts were given, which have not heretofore been brought to the light. The attendance was, as usual, but had it been generally known that the father and brother of the notorious G. W. McMullen were to give evidence, the room would have been crowded.

Sheriff LeBlanc, the intimate political and personal friend of Sir George Cartier, wished to make some addition to his evidence. He said he and some others went as a deputation from Montreal to Ottawa to interview Sir George respecting the position he intended to occupy with reference to the Pacific Railway, the Northern Colonization road, and other enterprizes. [This was previous to the general election, and about the time it was charged that the Government sold the Pacific Charter to Sir Hugh and the Americans.] Sir George said he did not want his election to turn upon his support of, or opposition to any specific railway enterprise. He based his claims for re-election upon his past services to his constituents and the country; and he wished to be left free to act when these great Railway enterprises were finally arranged. When the Americans were mentioned Sir George grew excited and said:

IN THE INTERESTS OF THE WHOLE COUNTRY

"D——n the Americans. We must be "masters of our own property. So long "as I live the Americans shall never have "anything to do with our Pacific Railway." "I will resign my seat in the government rather than consent to it. We "have enough Canadian companies, and "can raise enough money to build the "railway, and our friends ought to use "every effort to bring about an amalgamation of the Canada Pacific and Inter-"Oceanic Companies."

Le Blanc stated that the deputation had a second interview with Sir George, when he made virtually the same statements, refusing to bind himself to any scheme for combining the Northern Colonization road with the Pacific Railway. LeBlanc dined with him on nomination day, when he (Sir George) reiterated his determination to contest the election on his own merits and on account of his past services.

LeBlanc's evidence created a profound sensation, as it rolled away the load of lies and obloquy which unclean hands have so religiously heaped upon the dead Baronet's grave. McMullen has stated, and his fellow-falsifiers—through the vile channels of an impure press—have kept up a steady stream of assertion and insinuation, that Sir George Cartier was the man who really sold the charter to Sir Hugh and his American friends; and that in order to secure his election he had to promise willing acquiescence in all Sir Hugh's Railway schemes.

What are the sworn facts? Why that Sir George was most bitter in his opposition to the introduction of the American element, and lost his temper at the mere mention of it; and further, that he stubbornly refused to run his election on any other grounds than those of personal merit and

PAST SERVICES TO THE COUNTRY.

Carrying out that resolve, he was defeated. Sir Hugh wanted men in the House who would help him out with all his schemes, and consequently he supported men whom the Government opposed, as is clearly seen in the case of Beaubien, of Hochelaga. Thus the more evidence that comes out the stronger grows the proof that the charge of selling the charter is as unsubstantial and unreal as

"THE BASELESS FABRIC OF A DREAM."

The next witness called was:

Daniel M. Mullen. In response to this request an elderly gentleman, with an extensive "choker," grey hair, and an enormous wen on the back of his head stepped forward and was sworn. Before beginning his deposition he stated that he was a little deaf, and his memory not so good as it once was. Fortified by these statements he went on to say that G. W. McMullen was his son. He was a very good boy. He had such confidence in George's integrity and ability that he (the father) never questioned him about his business. The only communication George ever made to him was on the day when he told him that the Canadian Government had decided against the admission of the Americans into any Pacific Railway Company. "Fearing," said the old gentleman, "that George had "spent a good deal of money on behalf of "the man whom he represented in working up these railway matters, I asked "him how he was to be reimbursed?" He replied: "Oh, I have a plan for accomplishing that."

This "plan" was to attempt to blackmail the Government, sell the "Allan letters" to Sir Hugh, and afterwards sell copies of them to the now notorious whose saintly souls have recoiled in horror at the venal practices of the men in power.

The old gentleman did not appear know to anything much, except that he had been a Methodist local preacher, did not preach now, was proud of his son George, and wanted to get back home as soon as possible. By way of explaining his want of knowledge of Pacific Railway matters, he volunteered the statement that "George was always a remarkable boy, and when engaged in anything of importance always kept his own counsel." Exit old gent.

"G. W. MCMULLEN"

called the crier, in triplicate; but "my son George" is far away in the safe shelter of his Chicago retreat, where he can give words to his fertile imagination without a Bible being impudently thrust into his hand, or his sensitive soul vexed by the insult of being asked to preface his statements with an oath.

"D. Y. MCMULLEN," said Mr. Crier, and there stepped forth a dwarf, with a slight hump upon its back, of unpleasant features, and dressed in a suit of very shabby clothes. He took the Bible as one would take up a toothpick, and looked as if he thought taking an oath was a sort of superstitious Canadian practice, which was quite harmless in its way. He deposed that he was the brother of G. W. McMullen, his confidential business partner, that their office was in Chicago, that and that he was interested in and knew all about the negotiations between Sir Hugh Allan and his brother respecting the Pacific Railway. He saw the original contract between Sir Hugh Allan and the Americans. Among the American names signed were those of W. A. Ogden, General Cass, Governor Smith of Vermont, W. G. Fargo, and Adams Express Company. It was also signed by Sir Hugh Allan, C. M. Smith and G. W. McMullen. He had seen Sir Hugh Allan's letters; but could not recollect the exact dates. He remembered the first one, which was sent to C. M. Smith in the fall of 1871. Another letter contained a rough sketch of the monies expended by Sir Hugh; another referred to the distribution of stock; and the last two closing the correspondence, announced Sir Hugh's decision to break off with the Americans. These letters were not now in his brother's possession. His brother told him they were all in the Starnes package. He believed all the important letters were in that package. The two last were not there, as they were not important.

THEY WERE IN THE BANKING BUSINESS:

Judge Gowan—Why not important?

Witness stammered, said he did not exactly know; but he thought that his brother thought they were not important. (Laughter.)

[The witness was then shown two letters, from the Starnes package, and admitted that they were the two "unimportant" letters which he said were not there.]

In reply to Judge Gowan, witness said he left Chicago on Sunday night. "George" was then there and in good health. [Laughter.]

In reply to Sir John, the witness said he was partner with his brother and acquainted with all the matters concerning the Pacific Railway.

Sir John—Did you see the letters published in the Montreal Herald?

Witness—No, but I saw them in the Globe.

Sir John—How did they get there? Who sent them?

Witness—I do not know.

Sir John—Did your brother never tell you that he gave copies of those letters to anyone?

Witness—Never.

Sir John—Did you never hear from anyone that he gave copies to certain persons?

Witness (after long pause)—No.

Sir John—Did you not know that your brother gave me copies of the letters?

Witness (after another long pause)—No.

Sir John—Then you swear positively that your brother never told you that he gave me copies of that correspondence?

Witness (after looking earnestly at his boots for some time)—I recollect now that he told me he showed you the correspondence.

Sir John—Did you never hear that copies were given to Mr. Huntington and Mr. Foster?

Witness—Never.

The cross-examination was continued at some length—too long for this mail. The witness for some time denied all knowledge of how the correspondence was disposed of or that any money was received. Being hard pressed by Sir John, he at length admitted that the originals of the correspondence had been returned to Sir Hugh for

TWENTY THOUSAND DOLLARS,

"which," said the witness, "were divided between Hurlbut and C. M. Smith, after George had paid his own expenses." Witness further stated that "George" had to forfeit $17,000 for violating the agreement by which he bound himself not to publish the correspondence. He denied any personal knowledge of "George" receiving $25,000 for selling copies of the correspondence to Huntington.

The witness left the stand and the room with an evident feeling of relief. He did not appear to mind the Judges much, but Sir John's questions seemed to ruffle the tranquillity of his Chicago conscience to a very perceptible degree.
