AT THE OLD BURYING GROUND.

BY CORNBAGS.

Up by the gate that closed "God's Acre" in,
Two persons waiting talk of "kith and kin"—
While hard-by rests a man upon his spade,
A quiet listener to what is said.
We're here, said they, to note some old time names,
From ancient days of Sires and worthy Dames:—
Pray tell us, Sexton (that is, if you know)
Something about this graveyard's "long ago."

The living have forgotten to revere
The memory of their fathers, once so dear!
The very stones, that mark each resting-place
Seem trying to escape from this disgrace!
Some have gone under—some are sinking down—
Others again in "weeds" would hide their frown:—
Results, like rum-shops yield. Is it not so?
A sort of rollicking of life's "long ago!"

A people who neglect the homes they have,
But seldom shew respect for parents grave;
For the disorder, that outflows with rum,
Is sure to leave its mark upon the tomb.
Great God! Is all the pomp of burial bought?
Are all the tears on separation naught?
Have Earth's fair flowers now refused to grow
To keep alive a loving "long ago?"

How can a people claim the world's respect,
Whose debts are lives—whose payments gross neglect?
There is no mockery (so have we read)
That equals desecration of our dead.
But, blest be winter! That can meet this chill
With a white garment, to adorn them still,
And yearly visit this abode of woe,
To re-enshroud their coffined "long ago."

The Sexton heard, then put his spade aside,
And answered them and said: "The folk who died,
And were entombed within these graves are not,
As you suppose, disturbed about their lot;
They were all honored with a hearse in black,
With surpliced service, hymns, and crape, and back,
And 'twas their business, in graves below,
To turn to dust, and have so long ago."
