A DAY SPENT IN BRITISH TRENCHES

Correspondent Tells of Ordinary Life in Dug Out at Front.

London, Sept. 13.—"I suppose you will give them the usual stunt about the splendid spirit of the Canadians in the trenches. Do you really think the old folk at home want to be told that?"

The remark came to me from the major whose dug-out I was sharing for the night. It was addressed good-humoredly enough, but there was a suspicion of sarcasm in the first sentence and a note of expostulation in the second. I hastened to assure my host of the dug-out I had not the least intention of enlarging upon the splendid spirit of the Canadians in Flanders. For very shame, even were I so minded, I could not set out to patronize the boys who are "carrying on" out there.

In the Dug-Out

The dug-out was about twelve feet square and five feet wide. One had to bend double to get in, and the entrance, small as it was, was carefully screened with canvas. A couple of candles stuck safely in niches in the clay between the heavy timber supports gave an abundance of light. The major, tunic off and pipe between his lips, reposed comfortably on his overcoat, staring absently between puffs and remarks at the corrugated roof three feet above his face. The satchel which contained his gas mask served him as pillow. He had to keep his knees drawn up to avoid the telephone apparatus. Before this sat a lad of about nineteen, likewise without tunic; dug-outs are certainly a bit stuffy in the early hours of the night. The telephone receiver was about the operator's head; he pored over a magazine in the intervals between messages.

The Daily "Grind."

My own favored position was the couch in the dugout, an oblong framework raised a foot and a half, with sacking or canvas nailed across it. It gave quite a reasonable amount of ease to one's limbs. The brigade officer who had brought me up stayed chatting with the major some little time.

"Fairly quiet to-day," said the major. "The Boche put one or two in about four, but there was no damage worth speaking of. What have you heard of the bust-up in——'s battalion?"

"Seven men hit," answered the other. "It was just in the same spot where the same thing happened on Monday."

"Well, I must beat it," at length said my guide of an hour before. "Best way back is along Regent street, isn't it?"

"I should like Lover's Walk, and then along Sandy avenue," suggested the major. "They put one or two into Regent street now and again at night."

Now and again came the thump, thump of artillery at a distance, and the rap-rap-rap of the machine gun much nearer. Even a green civilian feels safe in a dug-out. The major did tell me, though, that if a shell were to come fair on our dug out the place would be blown to smithereens. My companion was one of the grievously diminished number of those who have been "out ever since the beginning." Like everyone else with such an amount of experience, he has the greatest respect for the enemy's fighting powers.

Must Know What to Do

"It comes to this," he declared. "There is not time to think of what is best to be done. You have to know it before you ever come here, and then do it right away. If the Boche got busy right at this moment I should know exactly how to deal with him."

The assertion was made in all modesty, but with the most complete self-confidence. My companion made it plain that the war has become a matter of specialization both in attack and in parrying of attack. The German puts his shells over; the quarter in which they fall is marked down as unhealthful, and avoided. The German wafts his devilish gas across No Man's Land; our command serves out gas masks and watches the veering of every breeze. The German is prodigal in his delivery of shrapnel; our fellows wear metal hats; some of these hats by now have crimped edges, the work of stray bits of shrapnel.

A Quiet Night

My major slept soundly enough for an occasional half hour. I tried to do likewise, but found myself staring instead at my companion, or at his young assistant at the telephone, or even at the burning candles. Outwas the occasional shuffle of boots upon the wooden slats of the trench flooring. A doze of a few minutes and a startled awakening by the rap-rap-rap of the machine-gun. Thump, thump, and then a dull crash — the work of a big gun in the rear. I was told though, it was a "wonderfully quiet" night.

Hot coffee and ham and peas in the open air at four o'clock, sitting in an angle of the trench. All the countryside swathed in mist. Not a sound except the ordinary movement of those immediately around me. The boys with the rifles appear to derive a lot of amusement in the spectacle of a slightly shivering and much bedraggled "civvy" relishing trench rations.

The major crawls out of the dug-out. "There's a message just come about you, he says, handing me the official pink telegraph form. "You can keep it as a souvenir." It read: "Journalist to be at brigade headquarters by six-thirty. Please ensure safety." A couple of mere lads in khaki "ensure safety" by doing the three-mile tramp with me, their rifles on their shoulders. We stumble over wire on the way—I do at any rate—but we get there all right and in good time. Only the good-natured brigade cook is stirring, save another who is cleaning the brigadier's jack-boots. The cook produces something warm for my guides before they start their return through the raw mist.

SIR SAM WAS UNDER HUN FIRE

Also His Brother, Dr. James L. Hughes, Who Tells of It in Toronto.

Toronto, Sept. 13.—That no people on earth were nearer the Germans in selfishness than some of the people of Ontario, was the closing remark of Dr. James L. Hughes yesterday afternoon to the York Pioneers, who had asked him to take the place of Mr. P. W. Ellis, who had been called to Ottawa. Dr. Hughes, his brother, Sir Sam, and a party spent seven days on the western front.

A favorable indication of the close of the war came to the speaker during the review of the Canadian cavalry under General Seely.

Will Soon Chase Germans

"What I regard at the most hopeful sign is the statement of my brother that he had heard that the 300,000 horsemen would soon be chasing the Germans," said Dr. Hughes.

Sir Sam, Dr. Hughes, and the party were permitted to witness an artillery action between the Canadian and German batteries. They were taken to the brow of a hill. In the rear the Canadian batteries were stationed.

Kept Out of Danger

"We were not permitted to go too close, because there might have been danger," he said. When the German batteries began to reply, the party hurried away in their automobiles, and within two minutes were a mile away, Dr. Hughes said. This was near the Somme.

Dr. Hughes was presented with a cane made from the wood of a door of the Cloth Hall Ypres, by Major McKendrick of Toronto, who is now in charge of the road work on the western front.
