HOW TO WEAR THE HAIR.

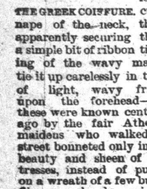
THE NEWEST STYLE OF COIFFURE DESCRIBED AND ILLUSTRATED.

A Glance at the Latest Wrinkles Which Dame Fashion Smiles On—Returning to the Pleasing Styles of Centuries Ago.

The right tight, snug, shiny little knot of hair, with its secure fastenings, which the tailor-made girl wore above her jaunty mannish rolling collar is indeed an anachronism above the clinging draperies and high puffed sleeves of a Josephine gown or in juxtaposition to the classic Grecian outlines of the popular, artistically draped costume. The ideal coiffure of the season finds its prototype only on some old Parthenon frieze or group of graces chiselled about an antique monument or altar, and the worst of it is that only a maiden sculptured in gleaming marble ought to attempt the style of coiffure, for on any live, breathing, moving girl the graceful arrangement comes tumbling down about her ears in an hour. The long wavy lines of hair outlining the graceful contour of a woman's head and twisted softly in a mass of ringlets low in the neck or just high enough to allow the lowest of the depending curls to brush the nape of the neck, the pretty conceit of apparently securing the whole thing with a simple bit of ribbon tied in front, the brushing of the wavy mass over the ears to tie it up carelessly in the back, the soft fall of light, wavy fringes upon the forehead—all these were known centuries ago by the fair Athenian maidens who walked the street bonneted only in the beauty and sheen of their tresses, instead of putting on a wreath of a few butterflies, as a head covering for outdoor wear. They know the secrets which the modern girl is now learning, that ugly foreheads may be shaped to beauty with a cuff of curls, and that the curling iron is indeed a clever and artistic substitute for nature.

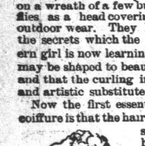
THE GREEK COIFFURE.

Now the first essential of a really stylish coiffure is that the hair of which it is composed should be curly, or perhaps, as girls say, "fluffy." If you are endowed by nature with that kind of hair which two years ago you brushed and wet and oiled to make it smooth and glossy, all you have to do now is to keep all the oil out of it by frequent washing, let it tangle and fly at will, and gather it up in a soft knot low down in your neck, where it will look as if it were going to fall down entirely every minute, and put just enough pins in it to prevent that catastrophe, and nothing more.



I saw a sweet oval-faced young girl at Sorosis the other day with exactly this style of coiffure and the most aesthetic dress of black, embroidered with trails of yellow marguerites. It your hair be as straight and sleek as that of a Puritan elder or a Commanche squaw, your hairdresser will make it ripple and wave and flow like that of a heroine in a three volume novel.

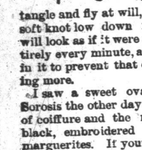
Then, if you haven't been blessed with too large an allowance of it, she will gather up the shimmering, waving strands into a coiffure like



I saw recently on a young girl whose hair, thrown in shadow, revealed glimpses of gold in the sunshine. Back from her forehead and up from her neck the wavy strands were brushed, twisted into a single light puffy knot, from which three soft curls fell, and a gold arrow held the whole in place.

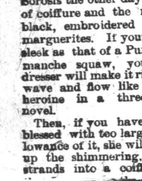
Then there is the Greek coiffure proper, or rather an adaptation of it, which was arranged by a famous Parisian hairdresser for a noted American belle. It resembles the Psyche knot, which was so travestied in New York a few seasons back, and which women with snub noses insisted upon affecting because it was becoming to their classic sisters. It is indeed a sort of a first cousin to the Psyche, but it belongs to a different branch of the family, and is made of a mass of soft curls and frizzes waving over the head from the temples and twisted into a puffy knot held by chains of pearls. On top of the head pearl combs hold the waves of hair close to the head and soft curls fall over the face.

In Paris the hair is worn low in the neck, almost universally simply looped and fastened with ornamental pins of shell, but the fashion gains ground slowly among American ladies, who insist that it is cumbersome and inconvenient, and takes away something from their dignity and smartness. As a rule, hair dressed high on the head is more becoming to the American physiognomy. It was a little Spanish beauty, with an oval olive face, who attracted so much flattering attention in an opera box because above the simple low-necked gown a faultless head, exquisitely poised, had the dusky hair simply parted in the centre, waved down either side the face, twisted low in the neck, and bound about with a fillet of delicate white blossom strung together like a child's daisy chain.



For ladies on dressy occasions there is the empire style with its light fringe of hair brought rather low down to a point on the forehead. Graceful curls lightly grouped together surmount the fringe, and at the sides above the ears the hair is prettily waved in the fashion now so generally adopted.

Another arrangement of the same mode has a tiara of jet above the fringe, which may be replaced by diamonds on dressy occasions. At the back the hair is dressed in a series of puffs or rolls terminating near the nape of the neck in two Greek curls, which fall slightly away from the neck, giving the coiffure a distinctive little air of its own and a quaint and chic effect.



A combination of the catogan and empire style is favored by some ladies as better adapted to them, giving them the becoming height in front and the graceful fulness in the neck as well, which is quite advantageous when wearing the bow crownless bonnets, as it is pleasant to feel that you have something on your head. A new comb has been designed with three substantial rings, though which the loops of hair are passed to form a double, eight-shaped arrangement on the head, and a Grecian bow and Alsatian bow swell the list of coiffures which can be arranged only by the skill of the professional hairdresser.

The present picturesque and extreme styles of dress necessitate a correct arrangement of hair to ensure their effectiveness. The reason so many women fail in this is because they lack originality and a knowledge of outlines. A style of hair dressing that they admire on a friend's head they imitate themselves, with most disastrous results. The occasionally gifted woman has nice intuitions which she may not be able to formulate in words or explain, but which effectually prevent her from making blunders of this kind. She who has not, should, if she is able, consult some artist concerning the peculiar style best adapted to her, for hair dressers in New York are not artists, as they of the profession are in Paris, and they cannot always depended upon for suggestions.

There has been something of a revival of the old custom of floral decorations in the hair during the past season, a single rose, a wreath of fine flowers, or a half wreath resting lightly on the bangs and lost in the loops and curls at the back. The most artistic and beautiful of all hairdressing, however, is that seen on children's heads, because the hair when wavy isn't dressed at all, but exquisitely cared for and left to follow its own sweet will and pleasure, only slightly cut in a bang in front to keep it from the eyes. In the early hours of the morning the nurses bring their charges to the hair-dressers for attention that once was never considered necessary. Bangs are cut, curls are trimmed and brushed, straight locks are coaxed into waves by carefully heated irons, and little misses go through almost as much of a process as their mammas and big sisters. Babies, both boys and girls, not more than 2 years old, are frequently seen sitting in the hairdressers chair with a patience born only of experience. Young girls in school wear the Marguerite braids or a single braid looped under and tied with a velvet ribbon around the neck. For dressy occasions, little girls wear a ribbon of bright color tied about the head in the old-fashioned way, just back of the fringe, or, more artistic still, like the child in the cut, with half short hair the ribbon is tied over the curls about the head like a sword. The "Lord Fauntleroy" and little page's style of hair is the popular style for little boys, and is generally worn until the instinct of freedom inherent in every Canadian laddie rises up in revolt, and the curls are sacrificed to a saucer bang with closely cropped hair at the back.

NIPPING LETTERS.

A Novel Method of Postoffice Robbery Practised in the States—Where is the Rubber?

The Buffalo postal authorities are just now engaged in an attempt to ferret out the perpetrator of a novel method of stealing from letters. So far the thief has been successful in evading capture. The following report of an interview may interest our readers.

"What is a nipped letter?" asked a reporter of A. J. Miller, superintendent of the Buffalo Railway Mail Service.

SPECIMEN OF A "NIPPED" LETTER.

"It is a letter," replied Mr. Miller, "with a piece about the size of the end of your thumb torn out of it. The piece may be larger or smaller, and sometimes the corner is torn off, but usually it is torn out of the centre of the end of the letter. Then the thief blows into the hole made, distends the envelope, and its contents can easily be discovered. If there is money in it the nipper appropriates the money and all. If there is no money he allows the letter to reach its destination. This is the sort of postoffice robber that has been at work in Buffalo for some time."

"Now," continued Mr. Miller, "I have the most friendly feeling for Mr. Sackett, and I believe he is doing his level best to give the people good service and stop the thievery, too, but when he says that the thievery is being done on the trains, why I think it is only right that I should give some reasons why I think he is wrong. I have seen many of these nipped letters which have been delivered to Buffalo people, add I believe that the work is all done by one man, who has possibly an accomplice. The similarity of the work leads to this conclusion. The nipped letters come from all points of the compass, so that if the railway mail clerks are doing it there must be dozens of them at it, and all doing the work exactly alike. It doesn't sound reasonable. Again, when letters were being nipped, at a time when no inspectors were at work here, three days was the longest time to elapse between operations by the thief. Clerks in the railway mail service work six days and lay off six or eight days. You see the inevitable conclusion. The thievery has not been done on the trains. Now I don't say positively that it is being done in the postoffice, but it looks that way to me."

Fate of the "High Horses."

People who violate the law by having their horses docked, or who violate the canon of mercy by buying horses that have just been docked in order to make them saleable, are condemned out of the mouth of babes and sucklings, to say nothing of older critics, like myself. The other day we overheard the following conversation between two small girls about the age of eight or nine:

First Child—Would you rather be a common horse or a high horse?

Second Child—I don't know; which would you?

First Child—I would rather be a common horse, for all the high horses have to have their tails cut off.

This piquant use of the word "high" was charming.—Boston Post.

They Are Coming.

Now come the nights, the blissful nights,
The nights of budding, balmy Spring,
When 'neath the twinkling stellar lights
Fond couples on the gate will swing.

BOOMING GOODS ON A GLUTTED and overstocked market demoralises legitimate business—resulting always in a break of prices and ultimate loss to the owners. The market for vacant lots in the distant outskirts of Toronto has reached this undesirable position. Any line of investment the purchasing element is always sensitive and responds quickly to the ruling touch of the market—which at present is flooded with this class of property—until buyers decline to sink money in it.
