TORONTO MECHANICS' INSTITUTE.

On the evenings of the 13th and 27th ult., the Rev. Professor Paine lectured in the Mechanics' Institute on the "Growth and Prospects of Canada." The audience was large and respectable, and highly delighted with the interesting details. The lecturer said:—The population of Canada, at the time of its surrender to Britain in 1760, was between 60,000 to 69,275, exclusive of Indians. With the exception of a few trading ports, this population was confined to the lower part of the Province. After 1770, U.E. Loyalists coming in from New Jersey and Pennsylvania increased it somewhat. In 1791, the white population of Upper Canada was under 50,000; in 1811, it was 77,000, according to the statement of the Board of Statistics, Hence it is only forty years since it can be said to have begun to grow, if so much. By 1824 the population reached 151,067, nearly double in thirteen years, in 1834 it was 320,693—double, with 18,492 over; in 1850, when it was 791,000, it was more than ten times its number in 1811; over five times its number in 1825; Its growth during the last half century was shown by statistical returns to have been in a ratio about thrice that of the Free States. By statistical returns it was shown that Canada West taken as a whole, has been growing for the last forty years, at a rate about equal to that of Ohio, Michigan, and Illinois conjoined, for the last twenty at a rate somewhat over theirs. It was remarked, that while the growth shown to have taken place in Canada West was on the country as a whole, that of the Western States was at the expense of the other States of the Union, between which and them the disproportion was very great; to the extent of the American portion of it the immigration to the Western States is but a removal from one part of the Union to another, not an increase to its inhabitants. By way of the illustration to the effect of selecting portions, of the States, as is done in the case of the West, and drawing general inferences, from them, the Home and Gore Districts were selected out of Upper Canada and their rate of growth shown to exceed that of the Western States. Indiana contains now a population of 177; times what it was 1800, while the Home District contains over 500 time the number of inhabitants of 1599—which was in that year 224; in 1850, 112,996. Though indifferent parts the country there have been differences in the rate of growth, their has been on a whole gratifying uniformity; examples have sometimes been adduced illustrative of this fact.—Coincident with this rapid growth in population a corresponding advance has been taken place in the quantities of land under cultivation, agricultural products, stock, &c., and in the value of land, which was illustrated by statistical returns. A comparison of assessed values in the State of New York and Upper Canada respectively, for 1848 brought out the fact that, supposing the principle of the valuation the same, our neighbours of the Empire-State have, with a population over four times ours, property under five times ours—New York city included. The growth of the country was next illustrated by the contrast it presents now to the published descriptions of travellers, comparatively recent. What they described as wilderness, is filled with towns and villages—many of them handsome, and not a few of them large and wealthy. The growth of a number of these—among them, Toronto, Hamilton, Dundas, Brantford, London, Guelph, Belleville, Brockville, Kingston—was viewed—their present population and that of earlier periods being given. Examples of the rise of property in some of these towns were likewise given. In its trade, the growth of Upper Canada is, as proved by the comparison of the exports and imports of different periods, quite equal to its advance in other respects. Great progress has also been made in regard to the conveniences of life, as was manifested by a comparison of means of conveyance—steamboats and roads at different periods; with the increase of postal arrangements and the facilities afforded by electric telegraph. By a comparison of statistical returns, it was shown that in proportion to population our increase from immigration is one-third greater than that of the U. States, which with a population fifteen times receives an immigration only ten times ours. In proportion to population, our increase from immigration between 1830 and 1850 has been five times that of the United States. Lecture second was devoted to the growth of Upper Canada in its higher interests, those of an intellectual and spiritual character. In 1812, Canada had five newspapers, all in the Lower Province. Now it cannot have much under two hundred. A hundred and eighty, or a little above, would give us in proportion, to population, a supply equal to that of the United States, which have about 2500. Generally speaking our newspapers will compare favorably with those of our neighbours as to character. The number of our book-shops, with the extent of their stocks, and the books stowed in libraries and found on tables, indicate a growing taste for reading. On all hands a growing interest is manifested in the cause of education. Our schools and school-masters are increasing rapidly. Sums largely increased are being paid for education; the people in many parts voluntarily taxing themselves for its support. The character of the education given is also improved. In numbers of places, too, larger Schools are being introduced, with a number of qualified teachers, which admit of proper classification of pupils classification of pupils and divisions of labour on the part of masters. Schools of this sort have been seen by the lecturer in successful operation in Brantford and London. The Normal School is rendering the country great service; as is also the Chief Superintendent of the Common Schools by the diligence, singleness of purpose, and industry with which he is devoting himself to his noble employment. The number of Grammar Schools is also increasing, and the number of Mechanics' Institutes. Now too the Provincial University, with its staff of well qualified Professors, to which addition is being made, offers its advantages to the youth of the country at a price little more than nominal. Trinity College, likewise, though a denominational institution, adds to the means of education in the higher departments. It is a fact specially cheering that the means of religious instruction and worship are increasing at a rate fully equal to the growth of the population. This was shown by comparison of the statistical returns of different periods. In civil arrangements and the application of correct principles to the government of the country, it is believed improvement will generally be admitted to be taking place. Our municipal institution are working, on the whole, satisfactorily—improving the country and educating the people. The past growth of the country, with its extent, its soil and climate, and the facilities for intercommunication afforded by its rivers and lakes, were next adverted to. These he said in connection with the character of its inhabitants, who were vindicated from the imputation of want of enterprise, afforded pledges of the future greatness of the country. The lecture closed with an exhortation to Canadians to do their duty towards the development of the resources of the country.—Family Herald.

A CUTE BOY.—"James, my son, take this letter to the post office and pay the postage on it." The boy returned highly elated and said: "Father, I seed a lot of men putting letters in a little place and when no one was looking, I slipped young-in for nothing and brought a gingercake with the money."

NOTHING is so much and admired, and so little understood, as wit.

BEAUTY has been the delight and torment of the world ever since it began.

I KNOW SO evil, under the sun so great as the abuse of the understanding, and yet there is no one vice more common.

TRUTH RESULT BECOMES falsehood if it is presented in any other than its relations. There is no truth but the "whole truth."

Physic, for the most part, is but a substitute for exercise or temperance.

DAHOMEY.—The London Times gives the following fascinating description of Dahomey, the country on the coast of Africa which the British Government has recently taken under its protection:—

"The great potentate of the district in question is wretched negro, who calls himself Guezo, King of Dahomey. As he is now himself, so would all his predecessors appear to have been. It would seem that about 200 years ago, a savage called Tabchohdohnoh, King of of Takkee, marched in hostile guise upon the town of Abomey. Here he performed a vow to his fetish by ripping open the belly of the captured prince, and placing the mangled corpse under the foundations of his new palace, which was thence called 'Dahomey', or Dah's Belly." Hence the kingdom has received the name of Dahomey. Gueze the present king of 'Dah's Belly,' is a brutal savage, who spends his time among his 18,000 wives, and in cutting the throats of all the weaker tribes who have the misfortune to live in his vicinity. Commander Forbes, of the Benetta, made an excursion to the lair of this drunken monster, and found him in the midst of his woman and his pannikins of rum At a great festival held in honour of their arrival, this King of Dahomey or Dah's Belly, indulged his visitors with the sight of a decapitation, just as an European Sovereign would take his guests to a review or to the Opera. The victims were brought in baskets or boats, strapped down as criminals are in France, when they are brought up to be thrust under the knife of the guillotine. The boat or basket was placed on end on a parapet. The King gave the basket a push from above, which caused it to topple over a height of twelve feet. Immediately the poor creature's heads reached the ground, they were, of course, stunned, and before they recovered themselves the executioners had finished the bloody work, and the bodies were cast out to the wolves and vultures. These men were prisoners of war, not criminals. And such is the wretch with whom our diplomatic and naval agents on the spot have been in close relations.

THE FARMER.

METHOD OF CURING PRIZE HAMS.

[From the American Farmer.]

The hams of Maryland and Virginia have long enjoyed a world wide celebrity. At the exhibition of the Maryland State Agricultural Society, four premiums were awarded for hams. We are informed by those who had the opportunity of examining them, that they were of first rate quality. The following are the receipts by which the hams were cured:—

T. E. HAMILTON'S RECIPE.—First Premium. To every 100 lbs. pork take 8 lbs. of G. A. salt, 2 oz. saltpetre, 2 lbs. brown sugar, 1 1-2 oz. of potash and four gallons of water. Mix the above, and pour the brine over the meat, after it has lain in the tub for some two days. Let the hams remain six weeks in brine, and then dried several days before smoking. I have generally had the meat rubbed with fine salt when it is packed down. The meat should be perfectly cool before packing.

J. GARDE'S RECIPE.—Second Premium. To 1,000 pounds of Pork, take half a bushel and half a peck of salt, 3 lbs. saltpetre, 3 lbs. sugar, and two quarts of molasses. "Mix—rub the bacon with it well; keep on for three weeks in all; at the end of nine days take out the hams and put those which are at the top at the bottom.

R. BROOKS, JR.'S RECIPE.—Third Premium. One bushel of fine salt, half bushel ground alum salt, one and a half pound to thousand lbs. pork; let to lie in pickle four weeks, hung up and smoked with hickory wood until the rind became a dark brown.

C. D. STINGUFF'S RECIPE.—Fourth Premium. To 100 lbs. green hams take 8 lbs. G. A. salt, 2 lbs. brown sugar or molasses equivalent, 2 oz. saltpetre, 2 oz. Pearl ashes, 4 gallons water, dissolve well; skimming off the scum arising on the surface. Pack the hams compactly in a tight vessel or cask, rubbing the fleshy parts with fine salt—in a day or two pour the above pickle over the meat, taking care to keep it covered with pickle. In four or six weeks, according to the size and weight of the hams, (that is to say, the longer period for heavy hams,) hang up to smoke, lock up; smoking with green hickory wood. I have put up hams for the last twelve or thirteen years by the above receipe with uniform success, equal at all times to the sample now presented.

SMOKE HOUSES.—Many persons commit great errors in building smoke houses. To be nice, and be a handsome and respectable appurtenance to a farm, it must forsooth be built of brick or stone, with close fitting doors, and a single aperture for the egress of the smoke. The consequence is, the meat is black and bitter, and might as well have been put in a pickle of pyrologineous acid; having lost all its the flavour, smelling of soot like a chimney sweep.—The walls are so close and cold that the smoke condenses and settles on the hams or bacon; and instead of drying, it becomes flabby and ill-coloured.

A smoke house can hardly be too open. It takes longer, to be sure, to perfect the process; but when completed, the meat is dry, of a fine, chesnut colour, and a delicate flavour of smoke penetrating the whole mass.

The best houses we have seen, are built with a stone wall, three feet high, flagged bottom, and a wooden structure built on the top of the wall.—Common siding is tight enough, or boarding outwise like boarding a barn is sufficient, with a tight board or shingle roof. The bottom is used for an ash house and the smoke fire is built on the ashes. It is safer for both purposes, and will produce a much finer article for those who have a sweet tooth for that delicious treat—a nice flavored ham.—Gettysburg Times.

RELATIVE VALUE OF MANGOLD WORTZLE AND SUGAR BEET.

During the last month I made a series of careful experiments on the saccharine properties of mangold wortzles, red and yellow, and sugar beet. The quantity operated on in each was 1 cwt. I adopted that quantity to simplify calculation, as being the decimal of a ton. The result proved as follows:—

Long red Mangolds gave a saccharine juice equal to	50lbs.
Yellow globe mangolds do	53lbs.
Sugar Beet, small and indifferent in quality	62lbs.

Hence there is preponderance of just 20 per cent. in favour of the fattening property of beet. Nor does its superiority rest here. The expressed juice of the mangolds, both descriptions, was remarkably acrid, and left a biting alkaline flavour on the palate, from which the juice of the beet was comparatively free. This doubtless arises from the presence of earthey salts, such as potash, amonia, sulphur, resin, &c., all of which are contained in both roots, but in excess in the mangolds. Now these salt are both purgative and diuretic, and as such detract from the fattening property of the food. Farmers who stall feed on mangolds have doubtless observed this effect on their cattle, particularly when first put into stall—of course the effect diminishes, and is finally corrected by habituated tone of stomach, and is admixture of hay or other food—but till this take place the beast pads up little on the flesh.

In the sugar beet those are comparatively less, and therefore their fattening properties are rapid and certain.

There is another feature of contrast between the value of those two roots not less remarkable—the foliage—the leaves of the beet far exceed in quantity and quality those of mangolds. I am not prepared to say from personal experience, as in the saccharine property, how much more valuable they may be—but I am assured by a gentleman of the strictest probity, who has grown over 100 acres of white beet during the two past years, that he deems the foliage of the beet worth nearly double that of mangolds, as food for milch cows, pigs, sheep, &c. The young leaves are so tender that they may be safely used at table as spinnach, which it strongly resembles in appearance and flavour.

The crop of beet is seldom so heavy as that of mangolds, or the roots so gross; but as the relative value is fully 20 per cent. more, the land will admit of that deduction with an equal profit.—Thus 32 tons of beet would equal 40 tons of mangolds per acre—or calculating the return from both foliage and saccharine matter, it might be nearer the truth to say—30 tons of beet would equal 40 tons of mangolds per acre—or calculating the return from both foliage and saccharine matter, it might be nearer truth to say—30 tons of beet would equal in value 40 tons of mangolds.

Great Meeting at the Amphitheatre.

LIVERPOOL, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 28.

Last evening one of the largest and most imposing meetings we have witnessed for some time was held at the Amphitheatre, for the purpose of considering the subject of Nunneries, and of adopting a petition to the Queen on the subject. The house was densely crowded, both on the platform and in the body.

The chair was taken by John Cropper, Esq., who called upon the Rev. Mr. Taylor to engage in prayer after which,

THE CHAIRMAN, in his opening remarks, observed the object of this meeting was a very simple one—to call upon our honoured, our loved, our noble Queen—to appoint a proper and suitable inspection of Nunneries, in order that those who may be confined there, if they chose, should have liberty to withdraw. (Hear, hear.) It was a simple movement, but it was a very great one; and he hoped that this evening their meeting would further the object for which they were met together. Liberty was a watchword in these days; but when they (the meeting) talked of liberty in these days they were called bigots; when they talked of liberty in other years, and had held meetings there for the object of relieving the oppressed, they were called meddlers. That cause, however, triumphed, and God would cause this cause to triumph too, in answer to the Christian's prayers. (Cheers.) Confident, then, in the righteousness of their cause, they might hope for success. (Hear, hear.) Their appeal was to high authority; their standard was the Christian's charter—it was the Christian's bill of rights, for it was the word of God—(loud cheering)—and coming forward in his name he trusted and believed that nothing that might that evening arise would be contrary to that high and important profession which they all made and avowed as Christians.—(Hear, hear.) Let them not do anything that evening which could give the enemy cause to say they wished to do anything to offend; let them show the darkness of their enemy's doings in the spirit of love. (Hear, hear.) After a few further remarks, the chairman concluded by at once calling on the Mix—rub the bacon with it well; Hugh Stowell to address the auditory. (Tremendous cheering.)

THE Rev. CANON STOWELL on presenting himself was received with the Kentish fires and loud applause. He said it was his privilege to move:—That this meeting, thankful for the privileges, civil and religious, of the British constitution, desires for all their fellow countrymen the full enjoyment of the same privileges uncontrolled by priestly domination.

The man or the woman who objected to such a resolution was unworthy of the honoured name of British. (Applause.) He might breathe British air and tread British soil, but he had not British blood, he had not a British heart throbbing. (Loud applause.) England had been long the refuge, and the shelter, and the stronghold of freedom. It could scarcely be said there was freedom in any land in Europe besides, certainly in none where the mitred tyrant of the seven hills sways his iron sceptre. (Loud applause.) But yet unhappily for England she had allowed that mitred tyrant to get the little finger of his tyrannical power within her bulwarks and her fortresses, and there was much danger, lest where he gets his little finger, he should drag his monstrous body in at the last; and of all the innovations, and of all the encroachments of that mitred tyrant, there was none he conceived more out of harmony with British spirit—more out of keeping with the British constitution—more out of keeping with the noble spirit that has actuated free-born Englishmen since the glorious reformation—than those prison houses which disgrace our land. They were met there under very peculiar circumstances, for though the meeting was largely composed of the male sex, the meeting owed its origin to the female sex—(applause?—that sex who were constituted by a gracious God the nursing mothers of all that was refined in sentiment, and endearing in social life—all that was of virtuous and good report in the Church of Christ; for their quiet, silent influence was shed like the dew of Nature, unseen in its descent, but clothing all with beauty with its vivifying power. And Christian women were never so beautiful as in their silent influence, like the stream that is little heard but seen in the beautiful flowers which embodies its banks, or like violet flowers in their own shaded dell, betrayed but by the sweetness which they cast upon the breeze from their seclusion. So our women were loveliest in the shade, but there were occasions where women had stood forward nobly. The Jael, the wife of Nebo the Kenite; there were times when women were in their place standing forward—and though the Rev. Doctor, (turning to the Rev. Dr. McNeile,) who was so endeared to them all, had been long a public character, he believed it was the first time his respected lady had taken a lead in a movement like this. (Loud applause.) And sure he was that as the mates of Liverpool had always supported the right hand, the females would support the left hand noble upon this occasion; and Mrs. McNeile would be no second to her husband in the glorious undertaking which would be sent to her Majesty. (Applause.) Yes, he contended that the ladies of Liverpool were perfectly in their place in this movement.—There could be nothing indicate in women exposing the cause of oppressed outraged women—there could be nothing out of place in women addressing a woman who sits on the throne of this mighty empire, and wields the sceptre of the vastest domain which God ever gave to a mortal being to rule—it could not be out of place for women to address a female sovereign to assert a certain right to let their voices be heard,—heard in an ear, which would not be slow to hear, and a heart which would not be slow to compassionate. (Loud applause. If ever there was a heart fraught with fine sentiment, and a spirit tuned to liberty, there was none more tuned or strong than the heart and spirit of Queen Victoria. (Loud applause.) But then they were told they were met together, if not for an indelicate and unfitting purpose, at least for a very uncharitable and despotic purpose. We very often found that the despot charged the free with despotism—(hear, hear.)—and that was a common manœuvre of Rome. No sooner did we resist her attempt to persecute us than she cried out we were persecuting her. (Laughter.) No sooner did we restrain her liberty to encroach on ourselves, than she cried out we had become bigots, and were encroaching upon her liberties. Rome was a perfect adept at playing perfect Janus-faced imposture—she had one cheek when we resisted; she now showed the cheek of love and tenderness, and now the cheek of stern domination and tyranny. (Laughter and applause.) She knew how to play either part, and had marks suited for either purpose. And so Rome now played the part of the persecuted in the public taking up the cause of those poor nuns, and pleaded pathetically, we had no right to encroach upon their happiness, to carry the blissful Parallelogram towards which they
