An International Bully Brought To His Knees.

The United States as a nation has been posing before the world as independent of all other countries and very capable of standing on its own bottom. It has acquired a reputation of being "out" of international politics, or when in them of being its own interpreter as to how far it shall live up to the clauses of any treaty it may sign. As neighbors of the United States we have had an unfortunate experience of their regard for treaty obligations, and we know of more than one instance where diplomatic sharp practice on their part has deprived Canada of valuable territory. We recall their sudden abrogation of the old reciprocity treaty; we remember their indifference when the Fenians organized armed expeditions within their borders for assault on Canada; we know how they have failed to carry out their obligations in the Washington Treaty: the duty on lobster cans, the duty on fish because packed in ice, and we know, last of all, of legislation recently passed empowering the President to discriminate against Canadian vessels using the Soo Canal, because Canada saw fit to give a rebate of canal tolls to vessels using the St. Lawrence route for the export of their cargoes to Europe.

We have not forgotten, further, the insolent terms in which Mr. Blaine stated to our commissioners in Wasnington recently that we could have no more intimate trade relations with the United States as long as we maintained our connection with Great Britain.

It must not be forgotten also that this same diplomatic sharp has a trick of not being responsible for those who represent the United States in making treaties. Their commissioners are not entrusted with full powers, but the constitution of the United States reserves the consummation of treaties to which it is a party to the Senate so that no matter what sort of an agreement may be reached by the representatives of the nations interested no one can ever count on the Senate accepting the decision arrived at.

Well, this swasnbuckler nation which was independent of all others, and especially of Great Britain, is now on his kees before England especially and all other nations of the earth. Uncle Sam has found out that he has been making some terrible blunders in regard to the monetary system of his country. He has found out that he is not able to stamp sixty-five cents worth of silver with the Yankee eagle and then ask the world at large to accept it at one hundred cents for his obligations. The endeavor of Congress to make silver the equal of gold in the circulation of the United States has proved a rank failure, and unless Congress steps in at once and stops the future coinage of silver the financial authorities of the United States who are best able to judge predict a great and wide-reaching financial panic throughout the United States due to their silver blunders.

President Harrison and his administration have had this impending danger fully brought before them, and they are much concerned as to what course they should take in order to avoid it. The New York Tribune, which is the organ of the Harrison administration, is very careful not to admit too much, but the other day it had this significant closing paragraph in an article discussing "The Fall of Silver":

The one practical remedy, which can be applied with success by commercial nations, is offered through the international conference. If an agreement can there be reached, the benefits of this country, and especially to silver producers, will be very great. Wisely, the Government has exerted itself to bring about this conference and to impress foreign powers with a sense of the importance of concerted action. But if all these efforts should be in vain, and if the burden and responsibility should again be thrown back upon the United States alone, it might become a duty to consider whether the complete stoppage of silver coinage and of purchases of silver would not be necessary, in order to compel other nations to meet fairly their share of the burden and the risk.

This conference is soon to be called and by admissions in the other American papers the whole solution of the silver question rests with Great Britain. Great Britain has other colonies besides Canada, among them India, and Uncle Sam is placed in the humiliating position of imploring England, the Mother Country of that Canada with which he said he would not trade more freely as long as it was a British possession, to try to induce her still greater colony of India to relieve the United States of their silver incubus. That is the whole and principal aim of the United States, as far as it is concerned; in the coming international conference on silver, namely, to dump its load on other nations, and especially on a British colony if possible!

Let there be no mistake as to the beseeching attitude assumed by the United States in this question, and let there be no mistake that this same beseeching Uncle Sam, who has become truly alarmed as to his silver affairs, is the same gentleman who passed the notorious McKinley Bill!

It is not often that the means of resenting an insult are so soon put in the hand of a sufferer as happens to be the case of Canada to-day. We have suffered at the hands of the United States, and our Government will be untrue to their position if they do not take some means of laying before England the treaty-observing character of the nation which is now imploring our Mother Country to save it from financial ruin. Lord Rosebery, the new Minister of Foreign Affairs, if he is true to his high and responsible position will not let the opportunity pass of reminding the inventors of the McKinley Bill what he thinks of some episodes in their international career. We have still some unsettled questions with the United States, such as the fisheries in both the Atlantic and Pacific; the question of canal tolls and the constant threat of rescinding the bonding privilege; and we leave it for the present for the Canadian and the British authorities to make what they can out of the opportunity presented to them of Uncle Sam on his knees before all the nations of the world!

Do not let anyone get away from the fact that a monetary crisis is impending over the States and that the immense production of silver now going on in that country and the existence of legislation which compels the Government to buy it up, no matter how rapidly the market may be falling, must inevitably end in disaster. And we might just close by saying that, as far as we can judge, England is not disposed to give silver any further preference in India; and indeed an agitation has already been set afoot to make gold the standard of that great empire of the East. It may be a trying ordeal to undergo, but once it has taken place there is not likely to be any further danger from silver becoming a common instead of a precious metal. And that is the future of the silver.

In the meantime President Harrison, who is so anxious to bring about the international conference on silver, might try his hand at refusing the offer of Canada to abolish the rebate of canal tolls at the end of this season!

The cholera epidemic is stiffening the price of carbolic acid as well as many a poor victim in death.

MANY KINDS OF CURRENCY.

The United States Has No Less Than Nine Different Varieties.

[From The Philadelphia Record.]

There are in the United States so many kinds of currency that it is not strange that misapprehension and a confusion of ideas should exist on the subject at home as well as abroad. Recent statistical abstracts furnished by the Treasury Department, and published in the speeches of Senator Sherman and others in the debate on free silver coinage, give complete information concerning the present condition of the currency. A brief review of these statistics may not be without interest to many readers.

First in order is the gold coinage, the basis upon which the whole circulation of the country rests. Should this become weakened the entire system would be likely to fall into confusion. The gold dollar is the only recognized legal "unit of value." By it only is measured the value of all foreign coins and bullion, whether of silver or gold. That the gold dollar rests on its own basis independently of Government that is seen by the fact that gold bullion is of the same value and performs the same function as the gold coinage in monetary transactions. The case is very different with the silver dollar and silver bullion. According to the latest estimate of the Director of the Mint, the stock of gold coin and bullion in the United States, including the coin in the Treasury vaults, in the banks and in circulation, amounts to $697,000,000. As nobody can tell how much gold may be stowed away in stockings and other hiding places, this estimate is largely based upon conjecture so far as the gold in private hands is concerned.

Next come the standard silver dollars, of which a little more than $57,000,000 is in circulation, and about $357,000,000 is piled up in the vaults of the Treasury. Upon this coinage, authorized by the act of 1878, about $327,000,000 in silver certificates are in circulation. The small remainder of silver certificates is in the Treasury, to the amount of $4,000,000. These certificates are legal tender for taxes, custom house duties and other demands of the Government. Under the act of July 14, 1890, no more of this class of silver certificates will be issued.

The greenbacks, the remainder of the legal tenders issued during the war, amount to $346,681,016, of which about $100,000,000 constitutes a portion of the reserve of the national banks. These greenbacks are a floating debt of the Government, and while their amount cannot be increased, they may be issued and reissued as fast as returned to the Treasury. For their redemption $100,000,000 in gold is held as a Treasury reserve.

The national bank notes amount to $172,476,575, of which $168,067,089 is in circulation. The rest is "cash" in the Treasury. While the national bank notes are not a legal tender in general, the national bank must accept them at par for all demands. This makes them legal tenders for all practical purposes.

Under the Act of July, 1890, new silver certificates to the amount of $105,000,000 have already been issued for the purchase of silver bullion, of which upwards of $100,000,000 is in circulation. They are legal tender for all debts, public and private.

Of the gold certificates, of which $175,644,879 has been issued, $153,000,000 or thereabouts is in circulation, but most of this issue serves as a convenient reserve for the banks.

The subsidiary silver coinage amounts to $77,433,950, about $63,000,000 of which is in general circulation and the rest is stored in the Treasury vaults. This coinage is legal tender for no greater sum than five dollars.

Lastly there are the currency certificates, under the act of 1872, amounting to $30,500,000, nearly all of which are in general circulation.

This makes nine different kinds of currency, the total sum of which on July 1, 1892, amounted to $2,241,096,694. Of this amount $1,529,316,833 was in circulation on the date, and $267,594,455 was in the Treasury. This whole fabric of currency rests upon gold as its base—in theory, at least, if not in fact. Whether the enormous volume of silver and of paper certificates upon this silver can be kept at par with gold will depend on the future policy of the Government. If unrepealed, the Bullion act of 1890 will sooner or later bring the currency to a silver basis.

RAMBLES ABOUT LONGFORD.

LITERARY REMINISCENCES OF BALLYMAHON DISTRICT.

The World's Commissioner Recounts the Interesting Stories Told Him of Maria Edgeworth and Oliver Goldsmith—A Tribute to the Memory and Worth of These Writers—Sir Walter and the Pigs.

Edgeworthstown, or the parish of Mostrim, has a population of 3000, nearly all Roman Catholics, of which the town absorbs 1000. It is so called because of its being the residence for the past 200 years of the Edgeworth family.

The little town of Edgeworth is very pleasantly situated, and the land about here is the best in the County Longford. Edgeworthstown House, a short distance outside the town, was the birthplace of the well-known authoress, Maria Edgeworth. She was born in 1770 and died in 1849. Her long and useful life was chiefly passed in County Longford. Miss Edgeworth in her novels endeavored to please the taste and educate the mind. In her early educational stories were the charming tales, "Rosamond," "Harry and Lucy" and "Frank." In a work called the "Parents' Assistant" Miss Edgeworth endeavored to teach people of a more advanced age the lessons contained in the previous sketches. Her best novel was a story entitled "Castle Rackrent," in which the miseries and wretched state of poor Irish tenants and the tyranny of landlords were vividly sketched. In many respects Maria Edgeworth did for the Irish what Sir Walter Scott did for the Scotch. Her other literary efforts included "Simple Susan," "The Absentee" and "Patronage."

A Literary Family.

Miss Edgeworth's father and brother were noted for their literary ability and interest in education. Prior to the passing of any educational measures Richard Lovell Edgeworth supported eight schools in the town, which was noted for the excellence of its teaching and general proficiency of its schools.

In the year 1740 a Latin school was taught here by Rev. Patrick Hughes, at which Oliver Goldsmith spent two years.

The Edgeworth family settled early in this place, to which they gave their name, the old name being Mostrim. At a place called Firmount in this parish was born the Abbe Edgeworth, who attended Louis XIV. on the scaffold at his execution in Paris in 1793. He embraced the Catholic faith while traveling in France in his young days. The Fetherstones represented County Longford several times in the old Irish Parliament.

A horrible tragedy is told in connection with the Fetherstone mansion. The then baronet kept a large number of servants and workmen. Among the latter was a carpenter and also a deaf and dumb gardener. The carpenter was in the habit of teasing the dummy. One day in summer the dummy fell asleep in his workshop with his head on his block. The gardener saw this and with the carpenter's own hatchet he severed the head from the body. This was a terrible revenge. The wretched man, now a maddened murderer, rushed into the country and at the end of several days was captured and sent to end his days in Maryborough Lunatic Asylum.

Poet, Philosopher, Historian.

One of the most charming writers of the 18th century was Oliver Goldsmith, who was born in the village of New Pallas, near Ballymahon. He failed to take a medical degree at Dublin and Edinburgh, but succeeded at Leyden, in Holland. He then started on a tour of the Continent on foot and visited in his travels France, Switzerland, Italy and Austria, returning to London in 1755. Here he played many parts: usher in a school, as an apothecary, then as a tutor and finally began to practice medicine. At the same time he pursued a literary career amid all the poverty, misery and uncertainty of one who depends upon his wits or the produce of his pen to make a living. After a hard struggle with adversity he died in 1774, having established for himself the name of being the most generous alms-giver; the best poet, the most pleasant prose writer and the most genial companion of his day.

Pity Gave Ere Charity Began.

I will not attempt any reference to his works. His purse and friendship were ever open to the needy and distressed. Stories about him I found were current in Ballymahon and Edgeworthstown. When appealed to either by a professional beggar or a fitting subject of charity he never refused a gift. Whilst at Trinity College, Dublin, he was one day during the middle of winter, and whilst himself suffering from extreme poverty, accosted by a poor woman, who told him that her husband was in prison and she and her children were starving for want of food. Oliver had not himself tasted food for 24 hours at the time. However, "his pity gave ere charity began;" for, remembering that he had at home on his bed a good blanket and coverlet, he brought them to the poor woman and gave them to her, telling her to sell them for food. Next morning when a friend went to call Goldsmith he could see nothing on the bedstead but the bare mattress of feathers. After calling some time, however, a head was popped out of the bed clothes and Goldsmith announced to his astonished visitor that he would be with him directly. Goldsmith, having no other shift to make for a bed after his extravagant gift, cut a hole in the feather tick and slept in the feathers all night.

When he commenced his literary career in London the report of his greatness reached Ballymahon. His friends thought he could do anything for them. They accordingly wrote to him to ask him for his patronage. In reply to a letter he received from a Mr. Hodson he wrote:

Want, Master of the Ceremonies.

"By a very little practice as a physician, and very little reputation as a poet, 'I manage to live. Nothing is more apt to introduce us to the gates of the muses than poverty, but it were well if they only left us at the door. The mischief is, they sometimes choose to give us their company to the entertainment, and Want, instead of being gentleman usher, often turns master of the ceremonies.'"

It was in Ardagh House that, in 1744, the celebrated scene took place between Miss Fetherstone and Oliver Goldsmith, which subsequently led him to write his famous comedy of "She Stoops to Conquer," or "The Mistakes of a Night."

Goldsmith was interred, after a life of poverty, in Westminster Abbey in the Poet's Corner, and a Latin inscription records his virtues and abilities. It states that he was born in Ireland, in the parish Forguey, in the County of Longford at a place named Pallas Nov. 29, 1728, and died in London April 4, 1774.

Sir Walter Got the Worst of It.

An anecdote is told of Sir Walter Scott in reference to a visit he made to Edgeworthstown. When he was visiting Maria Edgeworth in 1800 he drove with her to the house of Sir George Fetherstone. In passing along the road they met a little boy minding a sow and her little pigs. Sir Walter, as became a canny Scot, asked, "Who owns the pigs, boy?" "The sow, sir," promptly answered the boy, which so pleased Sir Walter that he produced his purse and gave the youngster a guinea, to the latter's very great delight.
