IMMORTAL LONGINGS.

Christ let me come to Thee! My heart is weary, and I long for rest; Is not my earthly mission well nigh done I cannot bear this burden on my breast— It weighs my spirit downward like a stone My saddened life is ever veiled in clouds, And midnight darkness hath come o'er my soul. My once bright hopes are wrapped away in shrouds,

And sorrow's heavy surges round me roll: Sweet Christ, oh ! may I come ?

Christ, let me come to Thee! Life hath a dark Sahara been to me ! The few bright flowers that bloomed along my way

Were soon transplanted-each beloved tree To bloom perennial in the " perfect day. My dear loved ones sit round thy Golden

And wait-a broken sircle till I come Let me not linger here on earth alone-Oh ! let me join them in their heaven!

Sweet Christ, oh ! may I come? Christ, let me come to Thee!

Behind me roars the angry ocean tide; Each crested wave comes nearer, nearer still; The muttered thunders in the billows hide; I shudder at their hourse, loud voice so chill cannot meet the fierce wild storm of Life! I have no strength to battle with it more ! Too long I've wrestled in the painful strife, I must lay down the burden that I bore. Sweet Christ, oh! may I come?

Christ, let me come to Thee ! In dreams I hear the white robed angels sing The golden glories of their beautious land; I hear the rustle of each snowy wing, And feel their touch upon my fevered hand. Colder than ever seems the earth to me, When I awake and see them flit away; I strain my eyes the last bright glimpse to see And watch them vanish through the gates

Sweet Christ, oh! may I come ?

Christ, let me come to Thee! watch my toiling breath grow faint and slow I note the hectic deepening, day by day, And feel my life is like a wreath of snow, Which one kind breath of heaven would mel away. A little longer in this world of vice The wished-for boundary is almost passed-I see the shining shore of Paradise, I know my pain is almost o'er at last.

Sweet Christ oh ! let me come. Christ, let me come to Thee ! I've seen the gates that guard thy holy clime And often caught a gleam of thee within; I know they'll open in thine own good time, And let thy weary, wandering child come in

I've had, through all this weary care and nain. One blessed hope, that ne'er has known des pair-It cheers me like the sunshine after rain!

I know thou'lt hearing deep and heartfelt prayer,
And let me come to thee.

The feathery flakes of snow had ceased to fall. and the sun, long past the meridian, just break ing through the clouds in the west, was tinging all things as with a glory, when Mrs. Lee and Minnie stood by the window, the little girl in raptures that the storm was over and gone, that now she might have the promised sleigh-ride. She chattered away like any nagpie to her unheeding mother, for the heart of Mrs. Lee " was with her thoughts, and they were far away." At last the child said :-

" Mamma, don't you see Chester Havens He's been looking up at you this ever so long."

Mrs. Lee looked down to the sidewalk, where stood a lad of about twelve years, with a wooden snowshovel in his hand, his upturned, expressive face, and the application of the shovel to the pavement, indicating as plainly as words his desire to remove the snow from the walk. Mrs. Lee nedded assentingly, and the lad went briskly to work, only pausing occasionally to rub his fingers, or stamp his feet, and then proceedhis task. The stone steps, the enclosure within the iron railings, the flagged pavement, were all relieved of their light covering, when Mrs. Lee sent Minnie to call Chester to her ehamber. Removing his cap as he entered the room, answering courteously and respectfully the greeting of Mrs. Lee, he took the profered seat by the fire.
"It's very cold, Chester, is it not?" asked

"Oh, no, not at all-or rather, I should say I'm not cold; the exercise has made me very warm, except my hands and feet."

"Have you vacation now, or how is it you are at leisure this afternoon?" inquired the

Mrs.Lee felt some hesistancy in offering money; she knew, though Chester was not affluent, he belonged to one of the best families in New England; best in every sense of the word,—

Mrs. Lee did not give utterance te the thought of her heart, which was, that the boy's prophecy in regard to himself would prove true; he would succeed, and though he knew it not, she had more than half-guessed his "secret" before he left the room.
