LITERARY.

LOVE'S BITTERNESS.

Oh perfidy! oh sorrow!
  Oh weary time mis-spent!
Sick longings for the morrow
  Uneasy discontent.
Passion burning madly
  Within a throbbing heart;
Sorrow brooding sadly;
  Oh the pain,—the smart!

Lost in Love's idolatry,
  The soul an inward moan;
Floating on a dreary sea,
  Tear-blinded, mad, alone;
Seeing but the cruel wave
  Of that dark flood, Regret;
Crying, on its heaving grave,
  "Lord, teach me to forget!"

Sweeping down the waters;
  Beneath the dark'ning sky;
While courage fainting falters,
  And God hears not the cry,
Drifting to the ocean
  Of fathomless despair;
Quivering with emotion,
  Breathing its icy air.

Clinging with madden'd grasp
  To the soul's idol still;
Kissing the poison'd asp
  Causing them this ill;
Wearying, hoping, weeping—
  Every thought a sigh;
Dreary vigils keeping—
  Praying at last to die!

Sleepless amid the slumber
  Of other, happier eyes,
Counting up the number
  Of Love's perfidies;
Crying, that 'tis bitter;
  Scorning thine own salt tears;
Whispering that 'tis fitter
  He should feel thy fears.

Wearying for the daylight;
  Weeping when it came;
Bearing its jealous despite,
  Hearing strangers speak his name;
Longing for the touch
  Of a hand upon thy brow;
Yet knowing it too much
  To hope and wish for now.

Listening for a voice
  That hath forget its tone,
And of its own free choice
Yearning, heart-sick, for a look,
  With bow'd and weary head,
Reading, as in a book,
  Every word he'd said.

Knowing they will never—
  No, never come again!
And this thirst for ever
  Must ache, and ache in vain.
Oh, the weary emptiness!
  Oh the patient woe!
Oh the barren dreariness
  Of this world's gauds and show!

CHAPTER I.

Continued.

An Indian-born child, Katie was sent home for education too early to have but a dim remembrance of her parents, or to feel very keen sorrow when the news of their death, in close succession, reached her at school. From that time she had lived at Temple House altogether, hardly knowing what relatives she had, or what position she would occupy on the completion of her education. All that she clearly understood was that her school fees were regularly paid by a maiden aunt of her father's, a Miss Rycroft, who lived in a large town in the north of England, and from whom she occasionally received a short epistle, couched in the formal terms common half a century ago.

What wonder then that Katie was a dreamer, having no interests beyond her school life, never quitting Temple House, except for one brief visit home with Carrie Elton, which had opened to her a phase of existence as new as it was delightful? No, all Katies life hitherto had been of a neutral shade; a strand of grey unmixed as yet with any of the brighter tints or darker shades which go to make up the web of most human destinies. Up to this time it had mattered little to herself. Healthy and active, clever and busy, beloved among her companions, the life around her had sufficed for all her wants; but now, when those she had been most closely connected with in study or friendship were beginning, one by one; to go forth from this sheltered seclusion to take a part in the world's drama, Katie began dimly to recognise the fact that she too was standing

Where the brook and river meet,
Womanhood and childhood sweet;

and to feel the stir of new longiggs and new capabilities in her heart.

She listened dreamily to Carrie Elton's glowing anticipations of pleasure to come. How happy she was! and Katie felt, mingled with the pain of losing her best loved companion, some pang of envy for the lot which seemed opening before her. Unwilling to encourage these feelings, Katie took up her book again without saying a word.

'Do put down your book Katie,' said Lina Harwood, entreatingly. 'Never mind Lillians Golden Hours, we are going to talk about ours.'

'Yes,' exclaimed Carrie Elton, 'That is exactly what I mean mine to be, 'Golden Hours,'—what an excellent title! I suppose it means happy hours, or 'good times,' as our Yankee friends call them. Shan't I have golden hours, girls!—only fancy, Paris first, then Switzerland, Italy, Rome, Venice, and I don't know where beside. And then all the fun we shall have, the fetes, and theatres, and balls, and excursions!'

'I wish I were going,' said one girl, and the rest echoed the desire, even after drawing divers bright pictures of their own anticipated holiday trips and diversions.

No one asked Katie what she was going to do these summer holidays, for all knew she had no happy home to go to; the vacations were always spent by her at school; and though she had much liberty and various indulgences, she was left to her own devices: and, in general, looked forward with pleasure to the time of reassemblage, which was a source of lamentation to her companions.

'Then you come back to England again in a year, Carrie?' said one of the girls, after a pause; 'how dull it will look after these bright lands! Mademoiselle says our sky is always only grey, not blue.'

'Grey hours after golden ones,' laughed Carrie. 'Well, 'che sera, sera,' as Signor Molti says.'

'Mine are all grey,' murmered Katie, as if to herself, and looking sorrowfully out at the bright sky which quite belied Mademoiselle Lalange's verdict in that moment.
