Mr. Mayes, who bore the brunt of the collision, did not return to consciousness. He was thirty-four years old, and leaves a wife and daughter.

The body was taken up river Thursday afternoon for interment at Queenstown, Queens county.

Two hundred street railway men, representing the Hudson, Pelham & Salem and the Lawrence division of the Boston & Northern roads, attended the service over the body of Samuel R. Mayes, Sunday morning last at Haverhill.

The services were held at the Centre Congregational church, the street railway employes, headed by General Manager Franklin Woodman of the New Hampshire Traction Company and Supt. Robt. Dunbar of the railway, escorting the remains to the church, where the Rev. C. M. Clark delivered and eloquent eulogy upon the efficiency and faithfulness of the deceased as a street railway man.

A Blueberry Voyage.

Blueberries are scarce this year, and pickers are on the lookout for new sources of supply. A. & R. Loggie heard of a place on the Gulf of St. Lawrence where blueberries abounded, and sent out an expedition a few days ago in search of a supply. The entire outfit for a packing establishment, together with 2,000 empty cans, was placed on board the Gray Loggie and sent to the promised land. She found a place in Saguenay county where blueberries are thick and labor plenty, and the factory was planted at once. The vessel was absent only eight days.—Chatham World.

Mr. Jones's Two Wives.

By May Elliott Hutson.

Mr Jones had been more than commonly blessed in the matrimonial line; numerically, at least.

Most men have had but one wife—and frequently thought that too much but Mr Jones had had two, and Mrs. Jones the present never let him forget it.

She was consumed by jealousy—as second wives sometimes are—and through this jealousy and because of it, a species of rivalry was kept up between those two—the quick and the dead.

Mr Jones, the bi-married, was moderately well off, fairly even-tempered, and a good fellow enough, as men go; but the life of Jane, which might otherwise have been bright and happy, was made utterly miserable because of Sarah.

Jones loved his wife, but Jane could not abide the thought that he had once loved Sarah also—perhaps loved her still. The idea of sharing her husband's affections with another woman, be she dead or alive, was a thought that this very much alive wife could not for a moment brook, and the bare possibility of it haunted her like a spectre

She brooded over it by day she dreamed of it by night, until she came to regard that poor dead woman in her grave with such deadly hate and fear as she felt for no living creature.

The more she hated Sarah the more fiercely she loved Jones, and the more suspicious and exacting tempered did she become, till really the poor man's life was made a burden to him. Did he chance to be moody she immediately surmised that he was grieving for his lost Sarah, and an instant and sharp rallying was resorted to by way of bringing him back to present surroundings.

If tender of mood, she forthwith suspected that he had been conning over letters—letters of his youth and early love—and resented his tenderness accordingly. Was he morose, for any reason under heaven, he was supposed to be comparing his lot unfavorably with his first. Did he sing, he was singing the song that Sarah loved. Did he read aloud, she guessed that he had read those tales before—under similar circumstances.

On each and every occasion she made her feelings understood in unmistakable language. Jones's plea of 'not guilty' was never known to save him. Of course he was not guilty, according to his own statement, was her mental comment. What husband would dare plead guilty to a second wife of tender, regretful thoughts of the first?

Did Jones take her for a fool?

As for that dead wife, she thrust herself forward as no dead wife should. She was forever appearing before Jane's eyes and hanging around Jane's husband. It seemed that she would not relinquish her claim, even in death, refusing to recognize the later and more binding claims of her successor. No wonder Jane was angered.

When her husband brooded, that white form in its winding sheet seemed to lean over him and whisper comf
