THE MI-WOK INDIANS

This nation or race is at one of the most numerous and interesting, in many respects, of the ancient people still dwelling among the mountains of California. For houses the Mi-wok construct very rude affairs of poles and brushwood, which they cover with earth in the Winter; in Summer they make into mere brushwood shelters. Higher up in the mountains they make a Summer lodge of puncheons in the shape of a sharp cone, with one side open and a bivouac fire in front. Their food is acorns chiefly, though they eat all creatures that swim in the waters, all that fly through the air, and all that creep, crawl or walk upon the earth, with a dozen or so exceptions. They are industrious to a degree, but most of the labor is performed by the women. They make comfort the robe of hare skins. These are cut into narrow slits, drawn in the fire and then made into a wide web by tying or sewing strings across at intervals of a few inches. Soap root is used in the manufacture of a kind of glue, and the squaws make brushes of the fibrous matter measing the hair with which they sweep out their wigwams. With million of tall, straight pines in the mountains, the Mi-wok had no means of crossing rivers except on rafts or clumsy rafts. All their bows and arrows were bought of the upper mountaineers. Wampum, shell buttons, pierced in the centre and string together, are used as money, five dollars worth making about a yard, periwinkles being rated at a dollar a yard. Their chieftainship, such as it is, is hereditary when there is a son or brother of commanding influence, which is seldom; otherwise, he is passed aside for another. The chief is simply a master of ceremonies. When he decides to hold a dance in his village, he dispatches messengers to the neighboring rancherias each bearing a wand whereon is tied a number of knots. Every morning thereafter the invited chief unties one of the knots, and when the last one is reached, men, women and children joyfully set forth to the dance. Diseases are few, among them by scarification and prolonged suction with the mouth; physicians are shamans, some of whom are women. In case of colds or rheumatism they apply California balm of gilead (populus balsamifera) externally and internally. Stomachic affections are treated with a plaster of ashes and earth. The shaman's perquisite is that he must be paid in advance, usually a blanket or two of deer or so much money. Yards of money; the price is specified in their treaties with the shaman. A magic for all who have any work
