FEBRUARY.

A marked attention to the comfort of his cattle, is an essential trait in the character of a thrifty husbandman. In severe weather cattle should be furnished with a clean and warm stable, and plentifully supplied with food, but not so as to waste any. A few turnips or potatoes, each day, in addition to their hay, will always be in season. Have a convenient watering place, and give particular attention to the watering, daily, of calves, and young and weaker cattle. Many calves are lost or much injured in their growth from want of care in these particulars. Thrifty Steers, rising two years old, if provided with a light yoke, and a light sled, and carefully handled, may be easily inured to the yoke, and to the draught; and without any injury to their growth, may bring home firewood sufficient for the use of an ordinary family; but they should never be loaded to the full extent of their strength. Oxen are found to be more profitable upon a farm than many horses. Feed sheep in the open air, and furnish them with a shed under which to retire in stormy weather.

One of the great objects of education is that children, as is expressed in the Church Catechism, should learn and labour truly to get their own living, and to do their duty in that state of life, unto which it shall please God to call them.
