BRASS BEDS FOR CATS

Wife of Chicago Banker Gives Extreme Care to Pets

Mrs. W. Eames Colburn, wife of a Chicago banker, is said by her friends to be the greatest enthusiast over cats in America. Thirty-five of her pets are famous blue-ribon winners, but she also has a large collection of less patrician pussies who receive equally gentle care. The total colection numbers almost 100, and each individual in it is known to its mistress by name and pedigree.

For her prize cats Mrs. Colburn recently built a modern seven-story house with every comfort known to architects and designers. It is fitted up with specially made brass beds, each just large enough to furnish ideally comfortable quarters for one of the sleep champions, and with their silken draperies and lace hangings the animals sleep more luxuriantly than the majority of men and women.

An Incident of 1889

(Ottawa Journal.)

In the Journal excerpts from its fyles of twenty-one years ago there recently appeared a paragraph telling how, when in April, 1889, Mr. Oliver Mowat, prime minister of Ontario, visited the taste capital of New York, the members of the legislature refused him the honor of a seat on the floor of the house, although such honor was habitually granted to all the smaller visiting politicians of the United States. And the newspaper account of that time seemed to intimate that this discourtesy met with the approval of the larger number of the members of the American state legislature.

Such incident would be unthinkable at the present time in either country. In the generation that has elapsed since 1889, the Dominion of Canada and the United States have made long strides towards a better understanding, and a better liking for the good points in the national character of each other. The incident of 1889 is of more importance today than it was when it happened, seeing it furnishes Canadians of today a mark by which they can judge the long distance in friendliness, courtesy and respect that the two nations have travelled in the past quarter century.
