POSTAL SERVICE

RATES ON NEWSPAPERS AND PERIODICALS—REFERENCE TO EDITORIAL IN "GLOBE AND MAIL" OF JUNE 13

Hon. Edouard Rinfret (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. My attention has been called to an editorial appearing in the Globe and Mail of this morning.

An hon. Member: What a paper!

Mr. Rinfret: It is headed "Mr. Rinfret's distorted figures", and it goes on to say that the attack on the Globe and Mail was wholly based on misrepresentation. I quote:

Mr. Rinfret read the text of a letter sent by the Globe and Mail . . .

There is no getting away from it; the Globe and Mail actually sent the letter.

Mr. Graydon: The minister is just finding that out now.

Mr. St. Laurent: The hon. member is just finding it out now. We knew it.

Mr. Graydon: I take much pleasure in doing so.

Mr. Rinfret: I have already stated to the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) that the letter I read into the record the other day was under the heading of the Globe and Mail. At his request I disclosed the name of the paper. I had no intention of doing so myself.

The extra mailing costs under these rates were figured by the Globe and Mail at $3.90 a year. I am supposed to have said that in fact it was only $1.70. What I said, Mr. Speaker, was that the impact under the new amendment was $1.06 gross, and, after deduction of federal and provincial income taxes, would come to only 53 cents net per subscriber per year. I continue reading the article:

In order to make this charge, Mr. Rinfret had to distort the facts and figures clearly stated in the letter. The letter did not say or suggest that the proposed new rates meant $3.90 in extra postage. What it said was this:

I leave it to the house to decide whether the correct interpretation is the one I put on the matter or is the one the editorial puts on it.

"Under the new postal rates, announced May 21, the postage on a year's subscription has increased $3.90 since 1938—and only now is part of this increased cost being passed on to our readers."

Referring to the new postal rates, the editorial says that there have been quite a number of changes in the rates since 1938. I want to tell the house that there has been no change in the law with regard to the postal tariff since 1933. Since that date it has stayed at one and a half cents and a surcharge of four cents on all advertising content over fifty per cent. It is true that during the war, from 1943 to 1946, the clause with respect to the fifty per cent advertising content was suspended. But if we compare the figures between now and 1938, this period of three years should not be taken into consideration.

I made the calculation in the house that the Globe and Mail have 30,380 mail subscribers, and that last year they paid $119,000, which represented $3.91 for each subscriber. I made the same calculation with the new rates of two and a half cents and four cents, which would bring their total bill to $151,366; this, divided by 30,380 mail subscribers, would be $4.98 for each subscriber yearly. As I said in the house, that is an increase of $1.06 before deduction of income tax and 53 cents after deduction of tax. If I am to take the figures of the Globe and Mail, they show that between 1938 and 1950 their mailing costs have increased by $1.95, whereas under the new law the increase will be $2.89. Therefore the impact of the new law, according to the figures of the Globe and Mail, is only 94 cents gross and 47 cents net.

The real impact on the costs of the Globe and Mail will be 20 per cent of two per cent. The mailing costs of the Globe and Mail represent about 2 per cent of their total costs. From now on their mailing costs will be figured at 2.4 per cent instead of 2 per cent.

As I indicated to the house, the increase in postage charges to the Globe and Mail as a result of the provisions of the new Post Office Act will be $32,366 before deduction of income tax, and $16,183 after deduction of income tax. The charge that is now made by the Globe and Mail to their mail subscribers is 30,380 multiplied by $3, or $91,140, or a profit of $74,957. The increase to mail subscribers is therefore more than 5½ times the increase in the postage rates provided for in the new act.

Mr. Graydon: May I ask the minister just one question? Is he aware that he would not have got into all this trouble had he not read mail addressed to people other than himself?

Mr. Rinfret: According to the interpretation of the act by some hon. members in the house the other day, the Postmaster General is supposed personally to deliver mail in the country. This letter was addressed to the postmaster.

Mr. Graydon: You are not supposed to read other people's mail.

Mr. Rinfret: The letter was addressed—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Postmaster General has been asked a question, and he should be permitted to answer.

Mr. Rinfret: The letter was addressed to the postmasters or the rural couriers, which belong to the department of which I am the head, and I had the right to read that letter.

Mr. Graydon: No, you did not.

Mr. Pouliot: Well said.

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

Seventh report of standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.—Mr. Whitman.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Second and third reports of special committee on veterans affairs.—Mr. Mutch.

REFERENCE OF CERTAIN ESTIMATES TO COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works) moved:

That the message of His Excellency the Governor General, dated May 1, 1951, together with item No. 650 of the estimates for 1951-52, which was reported on this day by the special committee on veterans affairs, be referred to the committee of supply.

Motion agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Second report of standing committee on external affairs.—Mr. Bradette.

REFERENCE OF CERTAIN ESTIMATES TO COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works) moved:

That votes 84 to 111 inclusive, and vote 566 of the main estimates 1951-52, approved and reported upon by the standing committee on external affairs this day, be referred back to the committee of supply.

Motion agreed to.

TAX AGREEMENTS

CANADA-SWEDEN—INCOME TAX—APPROVAL OF AGREEMENT SIGNED AT OTTAWA, APRIL 6, 1951

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 372, respecting an income tax agreement between Canada and Sweden.

Mr. Knowles: Explain.

Mr. McCann: This bill and the two which follow on the order paper, Mr. Speaker, are presented to confirm agreements between the countries named, with a view to avoiding double taxation. They are similar to bills that were introduced at former sessions and enactments that are already in operation as between Canada and the United States and Canada and the United Kingdom. Two of them refer to income tax agreements and one to the succession duty convention.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADA-FRANCE—SUCCESSION DUTY—APPROVAL OF CONVENTION AND PROTOCOL SIGNED AT PARIS, MARCH 16, 1951

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 373, respecting a succession duty convention and protocol between Canada and France.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADA-FRANCE—INCOME TAX—APPROVAL OF CONVENTION SIGNED AT PARIS, MARCH 16, 1951

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 374, respecting an income tax convention between Canada and France.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

NATIONAL DEFENCE—CIVILIAN PERSONNEL

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood):

1. How many civilian employees are engaged in the Department of National Defence?
2. What is the total cost of civilian personnel, including salaries, wages and all other expenses?

Mr. Campney: I have discussed with the hon. member for Greenwood this question and the three following questions on the order paper, and with his concurrence I would ask that they be dropped. I understand that the hon. member is redrafting the questions, and that when redrafted they will appear on the order paper in due course.

Mr. Speaker: The first four questions in the name of the hon. member for Greenwood are dropped.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I make it quite clear that they are being replaced by other questions.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—CIVILIAN PERSONNEL

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood):

1. In how many locations in Canada do civilian employees of the Department of National Defence number more than (a) 10; (b) 50; (c) 100; (d) 500; (e) 1,000?

2. What are the names of the stations where there are more than 500 civilian employees located; who is in charge of each such station, and what has been his business or executive experience?

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood):

1. In how many different locations in Canada are civilian employees of the Department of National Defence stationed?

2. In what different types of employment such as office workers, mechanics, etc., are such civilian employees engaged, and how many are there in each category?

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—SENIOR EXECUTIVES

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood):

1. (a) What are the names of the senior fifty executives in charge of civilian staff in the Department of National Defence; (b) which of these are civilians and which service personnel; (c) what is the military and what is the civilian experience of each as shown in his file; (d) where is each such executive stationed?

2. Who of (a) the above named executives, and (b) the total civilian employees, in the Department of National Defence, are employed pursuant to the terms of the Civil Service Act?

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

SEARCH AND RESCUE SERVICES

Mr. Higgins:

1. Does air-sea rescue services function in Newfoundland throughout the whole province? If so, how many vessels of the sea branch are stationed in Newfoundland and where are they stationed?

2. How is the present air-rescue service made up with respect to manpower and equipment?

Mr. Campney:

1. Yes, but there is no sea branch as such. See answer to No. 2 regarding secondary facilities, which includes two vessels stationed at St. John's, Newfoundland.

2. Rescue co-ordination centres of the search and rescue organization are established and manned by the Royal Canadian Air Force, including that for the east coast at Halifax. There is a rescue detachment with two aircraft at Torbay, Newfoundland.

3. All search and rescue facilities and equipment maintained solely for search and rescue duties are supplied by the Royal Canadian Air Force. Other facilities forming part of the integrated search and rescue organization instantly available for search and rescue operations, when required, are supplied by the Royal Canadian Navy, Canadian Army, Royal Canadian Air Force, Royal Canadian Mounted Police, Department of Transport, Department of Fisheries, Department of National Revenue and Department of Mines and Technical Surveys.

CROSS POINT, QUE., INDIAN RESERVE—ROAD PAVING

Mr. Courtemanche:

1. Was any road paving done at the Indian reserve of Cross Point, Bonaventure county, Quebec, during 1950?

2. If so, who was awarded the contract?

3. At what price?

4. Were tenders called for such work?

5. If so, what are the names of those who tendered, and the amount of their respective tenders?

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce):

1. No road paving was done by the Department of Citizenship and Immigration on the Indian reserve at Cross Point, Quebec, during 1950. However, a provincial highway traverses this reserve, the maintenance of which is not a federal government responsibility.

2, 3, 4, and 5. Answered by No. 1.

MAGNETOMETRIC SURVEY OF PROVINCE OF NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Higgins:

What steps have been taken to implement the request by the province of Newfoundland for a magnetometric survey of the province?

Mr. Prudham: None. On February 15, 1950, a request was made by the government geologist of Newfoundland for an airborne magnetometer survey of a section of Newfoundland south of Notre Dame bay. It was impossible at that time, because of the limited facilities available, to accede to that request. There has been no further request of this nature from the province of Newfoundland.

As there is only one federal government airborne instrument for all Canada, and as surveying by this method is still in the experimental stage, there has been no attempt to make surveys of this kind by provinces. However, special attention is being given to geological regions where it is thought that the experiment will be most effective.

ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL HARBOURS IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Higgins:

What steps have been taken to establish a national harbour or harbours in Newfoundland?

Mr. Benidickson: On February 28 last a reply was given to a related question asked by the hon. member. There have been no subsequent developments.

DEFINITION OF BOUNDARY BETWEEN NEWFOUNDLAND AND QUEBEC

Mr. Higgins:

What work is being done this year on the definition of the boundaries between the province of Newfoundland and the province of Quebec?

Mr. Prudham: None.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

PURCHASE OF PROPERTY BY GOVERNMENT AGENCIES

Mr. Black (Cumberland):

1. What properties have been purchased, by provinces, since April 1, 1950, to date by (i) Department of National Defence; (ii) Department of Defence Production; (iii) crown companies; (iv) any other department of government, stating the (a) location; (b) purchase price; (c) from whom purchased; (d) date of purchase, in each case?

2. What alterations or new construction work have been undertaken or authorized on any of the above properties since purchase thereof?

3. What expenditures have been made to date on each of the said properties for (a) equipment; (b) administration and operation; (c) total expenditures, to date?

4. Have any of the said properties been leased since purchase? If so, to whom, and on what terms?

Mr. Bradley: Mr. Speaker, I understand the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black) proposes to make an amendment to this question. If he would do that now, perhaps the answer could be obtained more quickly.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped?

Mr. Claxton: No. The hon. member for Cumberland has been good enough to terminate the third part of the question with the word "properties". The words "for (a) equipment; (b) administration and operation; (c) total expenditures, to date" will be omitted. With that understanding, the question would stand as an order for return.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Yes; the minister and his parliamentary assistant have conferred with me, and I am pleased to comply with that suggestion.

[Mr. Prudham.]

Mr. Speaker: Then the question will stand as an order for return.

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

INDIANS—PRAIRIE PROVINCES—LEASES OF LAND FROM RESERVES

Mr. Bryce:

What persons have been granted leases from Indian lands on the Indian reservations of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta during the years 1949, 1950 and 1951?

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR REFUNDING OF FINANCIAL OBLIGATIONS AND ISSUE OF SUBSTITUTED SECURITIES

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to provide for the refunding of matured, maturing and callable financial obligations of the Canadian National Railways and for the issue of securities guaranteed by the Dominion of Canada in respect of such refunding to an aggregate principal amount not exceeding $200,000,000.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: It is a technical point; but if we are going to go through this form we should have it correct. In view of the fact that the governor general is out of the country—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: —and has turned the great seal over to Mr. Justice Kerwin, appointing him as Administrator, should not this approval have been given in the name of His Excellency the Administrator rather than in the name of His Excellency the Governor General?

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, I think this measure was submitted some time ago. But if it will make my hon. friend any happier, I shall be very glad to have Hansard substitute the words "His Excellency the Administrator" for the words "His Excellency the Governor General".

Mr. Knowles: May I ask which of these gentlemen was consulted?

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

TRANSFER OF LONG BRANCH, ONT., RIFLE RANGE TO WOODBRIDGE IN YORK COUNTY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence, arising out of an announcement made yesterday by the Minister of Planning and Development for Ontario, in which he indicated that the Long Branch rifle ranges had been acquired by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and that plans were under way to provide some 2,000 housing units in that area.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that he should ask his question directly.

Mr. Graydon: I shall do so. When does the department expect that the rifle ranges will be vacated by the military, and in what part of the county of York near Woodbridge is the new rifle range to be located?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Peel said, this arrangement was announced simultaneously yesterday by the minister in Ontario and by myself. The time at which the change-over will be made from the existing range at Long Branch to the proposed range at Woodbridge will depend upon the time at which we can get possession of the 1,800 acres at Woodbridge, and construct on it the necessary butts, ranges, accommodation, and so on. No estimate can be made of that, because, in part, it depends upon the expropriation proceedings, and the speed with which the relatively small number of occupants of houses in the Woodbridge area will move away.

The area, generally speaking, as I recall the map—and I have not received notice of the hon. member's question—is to the north and east of Woodbridge.

PENSIONS

TUBERCULAR VETERANS—TELEGRAM FROM TRANQUILLE, B.C., WITH RESPECT TO LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, has the Prime Minister received a telegram from the Tranquille branch of the tubercular veterans section of the Canadian Legion requesting certain action in connection with pension legislation? If so, will the Prime Minister indicate whether any action will be taken accordingly at this session?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have had no notice of such communication. As Prime Minister I receive a large number of communications, but I shall make sure about this one when I have seen the text of the hon. member's question. As to whether or not any action will be taken, that, of course, is a matter of government policy, and government policy is usually announced in the house after it has been determined by the government.

STRAIT OF CANSO BRIDGE

REQUEST FOR FURTHER STATEMENT AS TO CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport. Has the minister's attention been called to a press dispatch in the Sydney Post-Record of June 9, 1951, to the effect—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member should ask his question without referring to the dispatch. I realize that this presents some difficulty, but if I allow a question to be asked in this way, I do not see how I can prevent hon. members from reading press dispatches in asking questions on the orders of the day.

Mr. Gillis: I cannot very well ask the minister a question unless I tell him what it is all about. I would ask if his attention has been called to a press dispatch, the caption of which is, "Bridge plans are abandoned". Would the minister bring the house up to date in this matter? Have the plans for the Canso bridge project been abandoned, and is it a fact that immediate work is to begin at the strait of Canso for the construction of a causeway?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I said in the House of Commons some time ago that the board of engineers established by the government to study the Canso bridge proposal had been reconvened. I had not at that time, and neither have I yet received, a report from the board, although I understand it will be forthcoming before the end of the session. When the report is before me I shall be glad to give the house the details of the recommendations contained therein—that is, after I have consulted with my colleagues. I can add nothing to the statement that has already been made.

IRRIGATION

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER PROJECT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether the government has chosen the experts who are to give the final advice or who are to report on the South Saskatchewan river project.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): The recommendations of personnel which I have made are under consideration by the government.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—QUESTION AS TO DISCUSSION OF REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): I should like to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has he any idea when he will find it convenient to arrange for a debate arising out of the report of the standing committee on external affairs? I know the house is anxious to meet his convenience in the matter.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I hope we shall be able to discuss that report when my estimates are called on Friday of this week.

NEWSPRINT

QUESTION AS TO INTERNAL SUPPLY AND INTERNATIONAL ASPECTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if today, or some time soon, he will make a statement on the newsprint situation, dealing not only with the international aspect of the matter but with the internal supply situation as well?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I expect that the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce will be called tomorrow, and I can make a statement at that time.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

PORTUGAL COVE, NFLD., WHARF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): May I ask the Minister of Public Works if he has received the consent of the premier of Newfoundland to the tabling of the correspondence and other documents referred to in a motion for the production of papers passed on May 14?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): If it has been received in the department, I have not seen it. I shall attend to the matter immediately.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

TOBACCO

CANADIAN REPRESENTATION AT FIRST WORLD CONFERENCE AT AMSTERDAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. B. Huffman (Kent, Ont.): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, or to the department concerned. In view of the revenue the government derives from the tobacco industry, and the need for an export market to stabilize the industry, can the minister indicate whether Canada will be represented at the first world tobacco congress to be held at Amsterdam in the latter part of September of this year?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I received notice of this question only since coming to the house this morning. The government is well aware of the need of the tobacco industry for an export outlet. I can tell my hon. friend that negotiations are under way which it is believed will add considerably to Canadian exports to the United Kingdom during the current year. As to attendance at Amsterdam, I shall be glad to consult my staff, and also the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), and give my hon. friend an answer later.

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION

AMENDMENT OF ACT TO PROVIDE FOR APPOINTMENT AND SUPERANNUATION OF CERTAIN OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES, ETC.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act to provide for the appointment and superannuation of certain officers and employees necessary for carrying out the provisions of the act, and to provide further that no projects involving an expenditure in excess of ten thousand dollars shall be undertaken without the consent of the governor in council.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, will the Minister of Agriculture explain what is involved in this amendment?

Mr. Gardiner: The committee will recall that when the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act was passed in 1935 it was for a limited period of five years. When the act was amended in 1936 it continued the effect of the legislation indefinitely without a named period. The section having to do with appointments was left as it was in the 1935 act, namely, that, appointments were not to be made by the civil service commission.

The act has been in operation since 1936 in its present form, and the government has concluded that there is reason for believing that this legislation will be more or less permanent. It will be to the advantage of the persons employed under the act to be under superannuation and considered as civil servants so far as certain classifications referred to here are concerned.

One of our difficulties in connection with the administration of the act is that these officials have been so carefully appointed and trained that other departments of government and others outside the government seek to hire them away from us, particularly the engineers engaged on irrigation and water activities generally. The most recent case was that of Mr. MacKenzie, our chief engineer, who has been lent to another department. When Mr. MacKenzie was lent this matter was discussed with him and others, and we are presenting this amendment in order to put our technically qualified officials on much the same basis as similar officials in other departments. We are asking that engineers, clerks and stenographers come under the civil service and have the benefits of superannuation.

The other section of the bill increases from $5,000 to $10,000 the amount of expenditure which the minister may decide upon without the consent of the governor in council. This is being done throughout the different departments, and section 2 of the bill simply applies the same principle to the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act.

Mr. Fulton: Is the minister in a position to indicate to the committee in a general way whether the project to make the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act of direct application to British Columbia and other parts of eastern Canada has advanced to the point where a decision has been reached? As the minister knows, certain operations are being undertaken in British Columbia by engineers of the P.F.R.A. They have to be carried on under a sort of special set-up which I understand is a little awkward. It seems to me that with respect to developments that we hope for in the future it would be much easier and more regular if the act had direct application to our province, and perhaps to other provinces as well.

Mr. Gardiner: At the present time the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act applies only to what is generally known as the Palliser triangle. It may be said that the area covered extends a little beyond the boundaries of the Palliser triangle, but that is done in order to take in entire river basins. But generally speaking it applies only to the Palliser triangle or what is generally known as the drought area.

There is a provision in the act for making available the services of our engineering staff in connection with all kinds of water developments. This is done quite broadly, even outside the P.F.R.A. area. A committee was set up in 1943, and it recommended to the house that this legislation be made applicable to a much wider area. It was recommended that, to all intents and purposes, something similar be made to apply right across Canada. Since that time the matter has been up for discussion on a number of occasions. Because of some disagreement in the dominion-provincial conference with regard to finance, action was delayed. Bills were drafted which provided for the extension of the principle right across Canada, including diking in the eastern part of Canada, works in the province of British Columbia and elsewhere, and all along the northern fringe of settlement. But that legislation, which was introduced into the house in the session before last, I believe, and then withdrawn later in the session because of the fact that the meeting of the dominion-provincial conference had not been held, was prepared again for this session. However, on account of all the discussion with regard to extra expenditures on defence, it was intended to make this more or less a defence session to deal with defence expenditures, and it was not thought wise to take up new responsibilities this year.

That is the position at the moment. The government saw to it that legislation was drafted to make this extension a possibility, but it was not considered wise to bring it in at the present session.

Mr. Fulton: I am very glad to hear that, because I think we can take it from the minister's reply that the matter is not dropped, but is merely postponed for the time being. It is still definitely a possibility?

Mr. Gardiner: That is right.

Mr. Coldwell: This resolution foreshadows legislation that will be generally welcomed by the house, and particularly by those members who come from western Canada. The minister is quite right when he says that we can now look upon this legislation as permanent; consequently the officials who operate under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act should be brought under the civil service commission, with all the advantages, both to the civil servants themselves and to the country, which flow from so doing. I refer to superannuation, and so on. I think that is fair, and besides, it will tend to eliminate—at least I hope it will—the appointment of persons whose interests are not always in the P.F.R.A. but in a political situation. When I was in my constituency last autumn it was reported to me by farmers that they had been asked to produce titles to their properties, and that I had been responsible for certain questions in the house which had made that necessary. Of course that was absolutely and entirely wrong, but the impression was left by that official that I had been endeavouring to do something quite the opposite to what we of this group had been trying to do in the preceding session. Therefore I hope this legislation will result in the appointment of the type of official with respect to P.F.R.A. who will be entirely interested in water conservation.

I believe the P.F.R.A. is really one of the good things that has been done by this parliament for the prairie provinces over the years. I say "this parliament" advisedly, because for a good many years, even before the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act was brought into parliament and its administration into existence, water conservation in the prairie provinces had been something which we had been anxious to see undertaken. The officials, engineers, and so on, of the P.F.R.A. organization have done a commendable job in this respect, but, as the minister says, we can now expect that the P.F.R.A. will be permanent; consequently the necessary steps should be taken to ensure that permanency.

As the minister indicated in his remarks, irrigation is one of the projects which will have to receive considerable attention. I think he should do everything he can to retain in the employ of the department the engineers who have been responsible for P.F.R.A. up to the present and who have been working on it. If it is a matter of emolument of office, the government should give consideration to seeing to it that the remuneration of these engineers is such that they will be retained in the service of the government, because, as I say, in my opinion they have done a good job.

A few minutes ago on the orders of the day it occurred to me, following the question of the hon. member for Cape Breton South, that I might ask whether the government had decided to appoint the experts which the minister said he thought would still be necessary to advise the government in order to bring about a final decision by the government on the South Saskatchewan river plan. I have been surprised to find that no final decision has been taken, because the people of western Canada have been led to believe over the past few years that everything was settled. Indeed, as early as 1946, on April 27, the Minister of Agriculture spoke at the city hall in Regina, and the Leader-Post, which I take it can be regarded as being fairly reliable in its news reports of such meetings, stated:

> Mr. Gardiner emphasized that the federal government did not need to wait for suggestions or pressure from municipal governments, municipalities, societies or any other groups before proceeding with its water conservation plan. The dominion government had already mapped out a program, and it was a program involving $110 million. This would be used largely in providing for the storage of water and partly for the distribution of this where needed. The dominion government thus did not need the endorsation of the South Saskatchewan river development association to begin work on the South Saskatchewan river. It had already decided to go through with it.

Consequently we all thought that a decision had been made. If this article had stood alone, one might perhaps have thought that the newspaper reporter had overemphasized the words of the minister, but on several other occasions he made similar statements. On May 21, 1946, we find there is an article in the Leader-Post, being a dispatch by the staff reporter of that paper from Ottawa. It deals with what the minister told the house. I have a distinct recollection of it. I have not looked up the exact words, but they are quoted here. The report reads:

> "We are prepared to dig ditches; to make that water available as soon as there is an organization at the other end of the ditch to use the water."

On July 12, 1947, there is a dispatch in the Leader-Post from Lethbridge, reading in part as follows:

> In this connection Mr. Gardiner pointed out the dominion government had no intention of selling or distributing power. "Our intention is to construct dams and storage reservoirs and connecting canals. When these are completed we will deliver the water in accordance with agreement previously reached."

I understand that discussions have taken place recently with the government of Saskatchewan as a result of which a tentative agreement has been made as to apportionment of the costs, and that the minister has received confirmation in writing of the tentative understanding to assume its share of the costs stated from the province of Saskatchewan.

In view of the statements that have been made over the years as to this project, we are most anxious to see construction of the dam begun immediately in order that the irrigation project may be proceeded with. This is not a new subject of discussion in the house. Hon. members who have been here for many years have heard it discussed again and again.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, may I say that the larger irrigation projects are not under the P.F.R.A. vote. They are not conducted directly under this act. I do not like a discussion to start which might have to be stopped a little later on, after certain ideas had been expressed by some hon. members. I am raising the question of order at this time, before the discussion goes so far that others may feel it necessary to speak on the South Saskatchewan project.

Mr. Coldwell: I do not want to transgress the rules; I try to abide by them closely, but my understanding is that these officials of the P.F.R.A. are engaged in surveys for this project. If the minister himself had not mentioned irrigation in connection with these engineers, while I had these quotations in my desk ready for a suitable occasion, probably I would not have discussed the matter now. But I thought this might be an opportune moment to bring it to the attention of the minister and exert more pressure on the government in order that this project may be commenced. If I am not in order I certainly will not proceed, but in view of the fact that these officials are conducting surveys in connection with this project, and that the minister himself had said that other departments were trying to steal the engineers who are dealing with it, I thought that gave me an opportunity to bring a little more pressure on the government with a view to having this work started immediately.

Mr. Gardiner: Still on the point of order, Mr. Chairman, there is a great deal of activity and work in connection with irrigation in addition to these larger projects. A considerable part of P.F.R.A. work is in connection with such projects as East End and Val Marie, which do involve irrigation. To put the matter quite fairly, however, I think the only part of the work associated with the South Saskatchewan which P.F.R.A. has been doing is the investigational work.

The Chairman: The present resolution relates to a specific measure, and I do not think that under it we can discuss the whole question of irrigation.

Mr. Coldwell: Well, Mr. Chairman, I do not want to dispute your ruling, but I thought in view of what this involves I was right in discussing these matters at this time. However, I have pretty well said what I wanted to say—that is, to press the government to begin this project at once and fulfil the promises the minister has made from time to time concerning it.

Mr. Gardiner: That is the very question on which I do not want to get into a discussion. I do not make promises; I state facts.

Mr. Argue: When did you quit?

Mr. Gardiner: In the thirty-eight years I have been in politics I have never made promises to anybody. I have waited until it was a matter of fact and could be stated as something with which we were going to proceed; then I have said we were proceeding with it.

Mr. Coldwell: In the quotations I have read I think the minister said clearly the fact was that this project would be started. On October 20, 1941, he is reported as having said:

> Most of the money would be provided by the federal government, because it could not be expected that Saskatchewan, subject to drought, could carry the load of such a capital expenditure.

Now that the province has agreed to pay a substantial proportion of the cost, the work should be undertaken without further delay.

Mr. Gardiner: This morning I was going over a return ordered by this house having to do with this very matter; I will see that it is brought down within the next week. It has all the papers, and the facts do not bear out the statement that I made any promises to anybody. I read them all this morning.

Mr. Quelch: I was going to ask the minister some questions about the Red Deer diversion project, but I presume he would prefer that I wait until we come to item 46 of the estimates. However, I should like to ask one question about these officials who may be superannuated in future. Just what officials are included? I take it that would mean the engineers and district supervisors; and does it include the field supervisors as well?

Mr. Gardiner: That is all in the bill. It includes engineers, clerks and stenographers —that is, generally speaking the inside staff plus the engineering staffs who are outside. It does not include all persons engaged in engineering work, such as the rodmen and others who are appointed to engineering parties that go out in the summer. They are not included. It is the general interpretation adopted by the various departments of the government.

Mr. Quelch: I take it, then, that it will include the district supervisors. It has been suggested that some of those are what might be termed political appointees. It just happens that the supervisor in the special areas of Alberta was a defeated Liberal candidate, but in spite of that fact he happens to be a particularly good man and thoroughly familiar with the work. Therefore we are glad he is in that position.

Mr. Wright: I understand some survey parties under P.F.R.A. have been working out of The Pas in Manitoba for the past two years. Is any report available as to what they have accomplished in connection with that survey?

Mr. Gardiner: There are reports, but projects of that kind are in the class I spoke of a few moments ago, that is, they are outside what is generally known as the P.F.R.A. area, and are made as the result of requests from the province, as a rule, or some city or village or municipality. This department or the government would not necessarily be bound by any reports made in connection with them. We read the reports, of course; but only portions of the investigational work on that northern project which has been referred to have been completed and referred to us, and I do not think they could be properly discussed under this legislation.

Mr. Wright: They are being paid out of these moneys, and I think the engineers are under P.F.R.A. I should think their reports ought to be available to members of the house when they are made. Many of us are interested in this survey, and certainly I would appreciate it if the minister could see that as these reports are made they become available to members of the house.

Mr. Gardiner: I might point out that we accepted a suggestion from the opposition yesterday or the day before that a committee should be set up to redraft the rules of the house in order to save time. The rules of the house, and those of other bodies that I have read, are drafted with the idea of avoiding duplication of discussion—that is, having discussion overlap and run from one thing to another. The proper place to discuss the expenditures being made on the project concerned is the item in the estimates, which still has to be considered. This is not the proper place. When the item in my estimates comes up, all the facts will be available.

Mr. Argue: I want to say a few words directly on the latter part of this resolution, which reads:

—and to provide further that no projects involving an expenditure in excess of ten thousand dollars shall be undertaken without the consent of the governor in council.

If I correctly understood the minister's explanation, the limit now is $5,000. The Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act has been very valuable in that it has provided for the construction of dugouts, small and large pasture projects, stock watering dams, and so on; and I would imagine that projects under $10,000 might account for most of the vote under that act. Would the minister say what proportion of the expenditures under this act is used for those very valuable small projects, which can be allocated and gone ahead with under this provision?

Just on that point, I note that the expenditures for prairie farm rehabilitation this year are down from $3,750,000 to $3 million. Since I believe these small projects are most valuable, I view with some concern a reduction of $750,000 in the amount provided under this act, most of which, I presume, will be devoted to these smaller projects. I would ask the minister to tell the committee what proportion of the money expended under this act goes for projects costing less than $10,000, and how many projects and what projects he expects to go ahead with this year. I would also ask what moneys are now being paid to the farmers for the construction of small dugouts. I believe the ceiling used to be $125. What is the amount of money that the farmer can receive for the construction of a small dugout? I hope that amount can be increased.

Mr. Gardiner: I am afraid, Mr. Chairman, that we are getting off into the same thing again. All of these facts come before us when we are discussing our estimates, and they will all be here. The point which is involved in this particular item is one which I am sure the hon. member for Assiniboia will agree is absolutely essential to the carrying on of the act as it is now drafted. Without going into the question of detail with regard to the proportionate amounts, when you look at the divisions in the estimates themselves it will be noted that while the small projects that are referred to, such as dugouts and so on, run into the thousands, the amount of money which is expended on them is the smaller part of the expenditure. From that fact some people argue that all the money should be spent on that kind of thing because it does more good to more people. But the objective of this provision is to make it possible to get on with the work.

The cost of doing a small job—such as the putting in of a small dam or the putting in of pastures—is almost double what it was in 1935. If you start to hold up projects costing between $5,000 and $10,000 until a council meeting is held, and the matter is passed by treasury board and by council, at least two or three weeks would elapse, or maybe a month; and on occasion two or three months might go by before you could get the matter considered. On matters of that kind the minister must have the right to pass upon the question within some amount, and the amount in the past in all of the departments has been $5,000. The amount is being raised from $5,000 to $10,000 in all similar departments. Because of the reason it is being raised in other departments, it is considered just as essential that it be raised in this one. The benefits flowing from this provision are going to accrue from the fact that you can get work started, say, on May 1 instead of on July 1, with the result that you can spend your money during the summer.

One of the most difficult things to do in western Canada is to get to work early in our short summers. We have only a six-months period within which to do this kind of work. When there is frost in it you cannot move earth to put in dams. If you do, your dam will mush in the spring and it will go out. In our section of the country you must move in a short period of time the earth to build dams. If, on a small $7,000 or $8,000 dam, you lose half of the time in getting it through all the red tape that you must go through where hundreds of thousands are spent, you will not get any of that work done during that summer; you will have to carry it over until the next one.

That is the reason for this provision, and there is no other reason. It is to get these works, which are essential to the carrying out of the whole program, proceeded with more rapidly than they could be proceeded with otherwise. It is just raising the amount from $5,000, which was considered reasonable in all departments back in 1935, up to $10,000, which is considered reasonable in all departments now.

Mr. Argue: I am not objecting to this change that will be brought about by the resolution and the bill when it is passed. Can the minister tell the committee, from the experience he has had over the last year or two, approximately, how many projects would come into the $5,000 or $10,000 class? How many projects is this provision likely to affect in a year? Will it affect one, one hundred, or two hundred? What will be the practical effect of the passing of this resolution?

Mr. Gardiner: I would be greatly surprised if it comes up to one hundred. I should not like to make guesses, because I can give the exact information when we get into the estimates. I think it will be found that it is not an unreasonable thing. It would not be provided for in all other departments if it were unreasonable; and if it is reasonable there, it is just as reasonable to have it here.

Mr. Knowles: For the purpose of information, may I ask the minster a question on what he has just said? I understood him to say that one of the reasons for raising this amount was the time which it takes to get these matters through council. He also made reference to the treasury board. May I ask the minister whether, when this resolution and the bill pass, it will mean that projects under $10,000 do not even have to be submitted to treasury board? Or do they still have to go there?

Mr. Gardiner: They go to treasury board, yes. The projects will go to treasury board on the minister's recommendation. But they do not have to go through the regular procedure of going through council.

Mr. Knowles: But they have to be approved by the treasury board?

Mr. Gardiner: They are submitted there for the purpose of determining whether there is money available, whether it is within the regulations, and so on.

Mr. Coldwell: But the decision in that event rests with the minister, as long as the appropriation is there?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Coldwell: I think we are quite right in inquiring into this matter at this stage, because this measure, if passed, will enable the minister to deal with projects under $10,000 in the way in which they are dealt with now under $5,000. That is why we are asking these questions, and I think we should be set right about the matter.

Mr. Gardiner: That is exactly the situation.

Mr. Charlton: This bill has particular reference to the Palliser triangle, and the resolution particularly states that it is to provide for the appointment and superannuation of certain officers and employees. It has been stated that certain work has been done outside of the Palliser triangle. Can the minister tell us how many more employees, for instance, would have to be appointed than have been appointed in the past, in order to take care of work outside the Palliser triangle, and how much of this work outside of that triangle or in various other parts of the country has to do with the extra $5,000, for instance, that the minister may spend without going before the governor in council?

Mr. Gardiner: Practically all the projects, if they became projects outside of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, would not come under this provision at all. Projects outside of the P. F. R. A. are provided for under those separate votes that are found in my specials; that is, we put up $200,000 on one thing, $300,000 on another, and so on. The investigational work in connection with those projects is usually done by the engineers under P.F.R.A., and it is only their salaries that are charged up in connection with it. This has nothing to do with that. If we go outside to do these works, they come under the other votes, not under this one at all, and they would be considered from that point of view.

All these projects that I can recall at the moment are more than $10,000. They are for much larger amounts. The only one that has been done in the section of the country that my hon. friend comes from is the one having to do with the diking of the marshes along lake Erie, where, along with the provincial government, we put in $100,000. Projects of this kind would not come under this $10,000 at all.

Mr. Charlton: The wages of the employees would not be apportioned out with the various outside jobs; they are all paid under this act?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Charlton: The wages portion of the work does not change that; they will be paid in the ordinary way.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Charlton: I want to point out that as the work progresses outside the area there is much more reason why it should be made applicable to the whole of Canada.

Mr. Coldwell: The bill, as it comes down, will provide that certain classes of employees will come under civil service superannuation. I am not going to ask the minister what these classes will be, because I presume the bill will indicate it and the minister will discuss it. I hope that, when the bill is drawn, as many as possible of the employees of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act will come under the civil service and superannuation, in the interests of both the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and the employees themselves. It is important that as many of these officials as possible shall be permanent employees entitled to proper increases in salary and to superannuation. I should like to see the minister include as many of these classes of employees as it is possible to do.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Gardiner thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 375, to amend the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO RACING ASSOCIATIONS CONDUCTING PARI-MUTUEL BETTING

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 357, to amend the Criminal Code (race meetings).

Mr. Fulton: Will the minister make an explanation, or say whether the whole bill is covered by the explanatory note, which does appear to give a fairly complete picture?

Mr. Gardiner: The whole bill is covered by the explanatory note. The bill itself was introduced in the Senate and fully discussed there. If I were permitted to do so, I might read just one or two sentences from the words used by the hon. senator who introduced the bill in that house. I know I may be a little out of order, but—

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): You certainly are.

Mr. Fulton: With unanimous consent.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I doubt whether with unanimous consent a debate which took place in the present session in the Senate should be referred to in this house.

Mr. Gardiner: I will say it without reading it.

Mr. Fulton: Paraphrase it.

Mr. Gardiner: The Department of Agriculture received a request from the Standard Bred Horses Society and the Canadian Trotting Association to consider providing for the same kind of supervision of pari-mutuel betting where trotters and pacers were the horses which were competing as now exists in connection with running races. The obvious reason for this request is that it gives more protection to the public that is betting on races. The law generally states that betting is illegal; then it goes on to say that there are certain exceptions, and the exceptions are set out in the particular section that is being amended.

The exceptions provide that where races are being run under pari-mutuels, a certain percentage of the take from the public can be utilized by those who are promoting the races—in this case it is nine per cent. Then it is provided that a certain percentage may be taken by the provinces in the way of taxation, and a certain percentage must go to the public. The purpose of the supervision which this department exercises is to see that the public gets its share. That has been the case in connection with running races, and it has been suggested that it should be the case in connection with trotting. Trotting and pacing races are coming back. It is developing into rather big business. It was suggested that the same kind of supervision ought to be put on the one as on the other.

The whole intent of this amendment is to bring the trotters and pacers under the same supervision when pari-mutuel betting is carried on in connection with the racing. The procedure which is followed in bringing about the supervision is for the association which is concerned to apply for the supervision by representatives of this department. The fact that they have that supervision makes that kind of betting entirely legal; and protection is given to the public to the end that sufficient money will remain in the pool that is divided up among those who are betting on races to give the public a fair deal.

The whole intention is to put the racers and pacers under the same regulation as the runners. All that was submitted to the Department of Justice is just what is in the statement of the intent of the measure as it appears on page 2 of the bill. They concluded that the best way to do it was to repeal the section and rewrite it, rather than just to say that wherever certain terms appear, other terms are to apply. To have that kind of legislation they just repealed the section and rewrote it. The only new provisions are those which provide what we consider the means necessary to place exactly the same kind of supervision on pacers and trotters as we now have on runners.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Exceptions.

Mr. Knowles: Usually when bills are worded in such a way as to carry forward existing legislation, with the exception of certain precise changes, those changes are underlined in the printed copy of the bill placed before us. There seems to be no underlining in this bill. I take it from what the minister has said that if that were done it would simply be a case of underlining references to trotters and pacers; is that so? I realize that I am not too sure of what I am talking about in connection with this subject of racing.

Mr. Gardiner: As a matter of fact, that ran through my mind when I first saw the bill. I have been accustomed, as all hon. members have, to the underlining of changes. The explanation given me, which is obviously the proper explanation, was that this whole thing is the section written over again. By subsection 1 in the bill we wipe out subsections 2, 2(a), 2(b) and 3 of section 235 of the Criminal Code, chapter 36 of the Revised Statutes of Canada. Those sections are repealed, and other sections, as set out in the bill, are substituted therefor. Then we have written what to all intents and purposes is a new section.

There is no place at which we can underline the language and say that it is just changed. The same things have been written into a new section. I am told the reason for this is that this legislation was built up over the years and it was somewhat difficult to interpret the phraseology which had been written into it from time to time by different persons. The Department of Justice thought it best to rewrite into the bill exactly the same meaning as was in the language of the old act. They tell me that has been done, and our own officials who are familiar with the matter say that it has been done.

The chief change appears in subsection (2) (d), at the bottom of the second page of the bill. That is the chief consideration that was given in the matter. I do not believe the committee would run into any difficulty if it were to pass these early sections and accept what I have said as the fact, namely, that they are the same as they were in the old act. We are not changing it. When we come down to including the pacers and trotters, we try to put them on the same basis as the runners.

Mr. Knowles: The minister suggests that there is no difficulty about passing the early sections. I would draw his attention to the fact that there is only one section in the bill, and that when that section is passed, that is all there is to it.

There are one or two points which I would bring to the attention of the minister, in the hope that he would clear them up. First, I have always thought that the Criminal Code came under the Department of Justice. In the present instance, however, the Minister of Agriculture is bringing in a bill to amend the Criminal Code. I could understand some other ministers getting out of their departments, but why should the Minister of Agriculture do that?

Then, the minister began to refer, before Mr. Speaker stopped him, to what was said in the other place. I do not wish to have the minister break the rule in that respect, but I would ask him what senator introduced the measure in the other place. I believe I am in order in asking that question. Did he do it on behalf of the government? Why did it come in through the Senate, rather than being introduced in the House of Commons?

Mr. Gardiner: Referring first to the last question, it is a matter of knowledge that it is rather difficult to keep the Senate moving along continuously with its work in the early part of the session, if everything is submitted first to this house.

Mr. Knowles: They have their divorces.

Mr. Gardiner: And there are some other people who have had divorces to deal with, too. This measure, along with a number of others, was sent to the Senate for the purpose of making some work available there. It was thought it was a matter which might properly be dealt with in the Senate. As a matter of fact, on the last three or four occasions on which the Criminal Code has been amended, such amendments have originated in the Senate. The reason has been the one I have just stated, namely, that it was possible to have the matter dealt with in the Senate before it came to this house. Discussions that take place there are known to members here. Hon. members may follow them, if they so desire—and I know many have done that. Then when the matter comes to the House of Commons, having been dealt with in the Senate, procedure is facilitated here. That is the only reason for its having been introduced in the other place.

It was Senator Hayden who introduced the measure in the other place, and who has introduced other measures.

Mr. Knowles: But he did it on behalf of the government, did he?

Mr. Gardiner: He did it on behalf of the government—I presume at the request of the government leader in the Senate, who usually arranges those matters.

Mr. Knowles: But the fact that the minister is dealing with it here makes it clear that it is a government bill.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes. Then the other question was as to why it was in the name of the Minister of Agriculture in this house. Well, I suppose it is not enough to say that it has always been the Minister of Agriculture—but it has. The reason is that those who put up a real argument in favour of racing are those who are interested in the breeding of driving and running horses. It has always been considered the responsibility of the Department of Agriculture to promote the breeding and production of livestock, which includes horses. One may ask: Why would this be necessary, in these days of motorcars? Well, all I have to say in that regard is that about the only kind of horse that must still be bred on a farm, in a country as far north as Canada, is the type of horse that can move on the road in the wintertime.

In my experience, the best horse to put on the road in the winter is the horse which has enough standard-bred breeding to give him speed, and enough of some other breeding—perhaps hackney, Irish jumper, bronco, or something else—to give him a little more weight. In that way you have a horse with enough strength to take a sleigh through the snow in the wintertime, and enough speed to get to town before you are frozen to death. That is the type of horse in which we are most interested.

I believe that is the reason why trotting and pacing races are becoming more popular than they were ten or twenty years ago. The idea is to promote interest in the horse; and because that is the idea, this department is asked to take care of it.

Mr. Knowles: The only comment I would make is that as I look over the bill, rather than its being a bill for the promoting of the breeding of horses, it seems to me that it is a bill for the promoting of betting.

Mr. Fair: That is because there is so much gamble in farming that it has been felt that horse racing is a gamble, and that it should be put under the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am sure the Minister of Agriculture is competent in many ways. However, this bill seems to require a competence of knowledge in the mysteries of the pari-mutuel system. Can the minister discharge the duty laid down in subsection 5, which states:

> The Minister of Agriculture, if he is not satisfied that a proper proportion of gate receipts and percentages taken from the pari-mutuel pools is being given in purses to horses taking part in the race meeting or that the provisions of this section are being carried out in good faith by the association conducting the race meeting, may at any time order the betting to be stopped for such time as he may think fit.

He may not order the racing, but he may order the betting to be stopped.

Mr. Gardiner: That is right; but we are still considering section 1.

Mr. Knowles: No; section 1 is the whole bill.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, but when we take the subsections seriatim we will get to that point. Nevertheless I am quite prepared to deal with the matter. There is nothing in this bill that stops anyone from running a horse race; if there is no betting, you can run all the races you like. If it is just a matter of having a horse race at a country fair or anywhere else, they can run just as many races as they like. What the Criminal Code has always said is that if you are going to bet, then you must do it in a certain way. What is provided here is that if our man who is there checking on everything that is being done with the funds, and who has access to everything carried on in connection with the pari-mutuel betting, finds that somebody is taking more money out than he ought to be taking out, he can stop the betting. The race can go on; the public can watch the race going on, but there will be no money bet. Under pari-mutuel he simply closes the wickets and says: You cannot sell any more tickets until you do what we are instructing you to do.

Mr. Fulton: There is one question I should like to ask with respect to subsection 6. I accept all the other explanations, but I should like assurance from the minister that he is given no new powers under subsection 6.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Chairman, before this section is carried I should like to say something on this bill, and my remarks will not be at all reproachful of the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Fair: Are you going to place a bet?

Mr. Pouliot: No, not with my hon. friend, because he would not take it. My remarks will be very simple, and will not be at all a reflection on the minister who is sponsoring the bill.

This is an example of badly drafted legislation. Only those who are experts in pari-mutuel matters can understand this kind of half-baked legislation. A distinction is made between associations incorporated before May 19, 1947, if:

(A) such association has conducted a race meeting with pari-mutuel betting under the supervision of an officer appointed by the Minister of Agriculture at any time after the 1st day of January, 1938, but before the 19th day of May, 1947, or

(B) The Minister of Agriculture has, before the 19th day of May, 1947, made a determination under this section that the provisions of subsection 1 of this section, section 227 and subsections 1 and 2 of section 229 shall not extend to the operation of a pari-mutuel system with respect to running races at a race meeting conducted by such association on a race course of another association.

Mr. Knowles: Everybody who places a bet should be required to understand that first. That would certainly limit betting.

Mr. Pouliot: Horse racing is a kingly sport. Most of those who own horses in Canada, the principal winners at the races, are multi-millionaires. Some of them are just pure hypocrites. They may have some interest in paper mills that work at full capacity on Sundays in Ontario, for the seven days in the week, but when it comes to horse racing they object to having horses run on Sundays.

It is different in the province of Quebec. The paper mills are closed on Sundays, but the farmers and others enjoy horse races on Sundays as a legitimate distraction. There is nothing wrong with it, and it cannot be an offence except in virtue of this law. In the province of Quebec, the young people are baptized on Sundays, and I understand that in Ontario funerals take place on Sunday. Those are the differences.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Baptisms take place on Sunday in Ontario.

Mr. Pouliot: Not to my knowledge, but I do not live all of the year in Ontario. This is outside the range of the bill. What I want to say is that if these millionaires were less hypocritical they would not insist on such legislation as this. They are Sunday observers behind the curtains. Let us be frank about it and admit that there is nothing wrong in farmers and country people attending horse races on Sundays. I hope this will be considered.

Mr. Johnston: What about betting on Sunday?

Mr. Pouliot: Does my friend consider it an offence? He will be starting a new theology.

Mr. Johnston: I am asking you.

Mr. Pouliot: I am not opposed to it, and I cannot say whether or not it is a sin, because I am not a theologian. I do not think there is anything wrong in it.

Mr. Johnston: Betting on Sunday?

Mr. Pouliot: Yes. It may offend my hon. friend's principles; he may have his views and he is entitled to them, as is anybody else, but I do not find anything wrong with it. Some people may think differently, and that is their business. I am not saying anything unpleasant about them because they do not share my view. They are free to think what they like about it.

Mr. Johnston: Just another form of gambling, that is all.

Mr. Pouliot: I have submitted the matter to the committee. I am against ultra-puritanism in all its forms.

Mr. Fulton: Has the minister had an opportunity of considering whether subsection 6 grants any new powers?

Mr. Gardiner: It does not give any new powers, except that it will apply to trotters and racers as well.

Mr. Proudfoot: Mr. Chairman, this amendment has been asked for by the standard bred breeders of Canada because in certain instances races have been promoted by men over whom we have no control, nor have we any control over the betting. So we asked the Department of Agriculture to supervise our standard bred races similarly to the supervision that has been given to thoroughbred races. I do not see anything wrong with the bill, except in one instance, and I would refer to paragraph (d) (ii) which reads:

No more than eight races or dashes, or ten heats shall be held during any twenty-four hour period.

I do not think that is quite correct, because we generally race three heats, and three will not divide into ten. That is the only thing I can see wrong with the bill, and I would ask that it be changed to twelve rather than ten, which is not a multiple of three. As I say, this bill was requested by the standard bred breeders, and also by the Canadian Trotting Association.

Mr. Ferguson: We cannot control the liquor situation properly without the aid of the government, and we cannot control betting on horse racing in Canada without the aid of the government. In my opinion the bill has been introduced to give the same form of control as is provided for the authorities who control liquor, which cannot be controlled otherwise. We have tried it. It is within the power of the government to control horse racing properly. It has nothing to do with paper mills, millionaires, the mill rate in municipal taxes, or any kind of mill at all. In my opinion it is simply proper and sane legislation.

Mr. Lesage: I agree completely with what the hon. member for Pontiac-Timiskaming has said. In my part of the country we have sulky races, and usually there are four races with three heats each. I wonder if the Minister of Agriculture could not find it possible to change the figure from ten, as set forth in the bill, to twelve. That is the only complaint I have, and it would not make much difference.

Mr. Gardiner: A number of members, who are much more familiar with the conduct of horse racing in different parts of the country than I am, have made similar representations since the bill appeared on the order paper. I feel that it would not be possible for me to agree to increasing the figure from ten to twelve without first discussing it fully, not only with the officials but also with my colleagues. The reason is that we have given a general undertaking to the house, and the undertaking was given in another place, that the bill does not provide for any further opportunities in connection with betting than existed before; in other words, that there are the same opportunities for betting on trotters and pacers as there are for betting on runners.

I realize of course that trotting races are run in three heats, and the general impression I had was that if you said what is being suggested should be said, you might confine it to nine heats. I am told, however, that the way in which racing is carried on in certain sections of the country, particularly in the Ottawa valley and outside the Ottawa valley in Ontario, is that the race is actually put up for bids, and the final racing is carried on at some other fair which bid for it. That type of race could not be conducted except with the possibility of ten heats. The reason why it is ten instead of nine is that that kind of racing is established. They race their three year olds at a certain fair, and then the race is finally run off somewhere else. The fairs bid for the right to have the race run there, and the fair that bids the highest has that race. They do the same thing with two year olds. The race is run off, and in order to run it off at the final fair they must provide for ten heats. If both two year olds and three year olds happen to be running off at the same fair, they would require ten heats. The bill makes provision for that, and the suggestion is now made that it should be twelve heats.

I am in the hands of the committee. This is your bill now; it is not mine. It has been our opinion that ten heats provide as much in the way of opportunity to bet as is provided now for the runners in eight races, and that there would be an argument on that count against having it more than ten. At the same time, however, there are a great many racing events from one end of Canada to the other where they have four races of three heats each, and that is twelve heats, not ten. I am quite prepared to allow the subsection to stand and bring it back later. I am prepared to have the committee rise and report progress, or if the committee thinks it should go through as it is, I am quite prepared to accept that.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Fulton: Let it go through and change it next year.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the minister whether the purpose of the limitation in the bill as it now stands is to prevent additional betting, or is it to protect the horses?

Mr. Gardiner: As has been said by the hon. member for Pontiac-Timiskaming, the object is to protect people who buy tickets at races where pari-mutuel betting is carried on. The practice is for a person to go up to the wicket and buy a ticket. The other type of betting is bookmaking. The individual goes up and makes his bet, and he knows when he makes it what he is going to get out of it if he wins. That is all put down in black and white. He can do that kind of betting, and it does not come under this at all. We do not supervise that kind of betting, because it is an agreement between the individual and the bookmaker at the fair where betting is being legally carried on. However, in order to make it easier to handle it on a much larger scale, they have started pari-mutuel betting. You go up to the wicket and buy a ticket, and then your money goes into a pool, together with the money of all the others who bet.

Mr. Knowles: Not mine.

Mr. Gardiner: I am telling you how you can do it if you want to at any time.

An hon. Member: He only bets on sure things.

Mr. Gardiner: The money goes into a pool. This law says that those who are conducting the racing cannot take out more than nine per cent if the amount going into the pool is $20,000 or less, and seven per cent, six per cent, five per cent, and so on as the betting increases. They cannot take any more than that out. Then it says that the public must get a certain amount. There is a leeway in between where the provinces take something by way of taxation. During the war we took it, and at the end of the war we amended the act again to turn it back to the provinces. The provinces can take it if they wish to do so. In some places they do, and in others they do not. We simply put a man there to check on all the money that goes into the pool, and then we check on the way in which it is disposed of. So long as the public get their share divided among those who win, we are satisfied; if they do not, we stop the betting. What we are suggesting is that we are going to apply that to another type of racing. The regulations were imposed in the first place to limit betting to what I have been describing. As the situation is today, betting can take place on trotters and pacers throughout the country without any supervision or regulation at all.

Mr. McLure: Not in all provinces.

Mr. Gardiner: Except what the provinces may carry on. A check is not made as it is with runners. These people say that they want the same check, and all we say is that in drafting the terms of the act we do not want to give those racing trotters and pacers any advantage over the runners; otherwise the racing runners will simply come back and ask for the same advantage, and we will have the one bidding against the other. What I would like to check up before agreeing to twelve heats is that we are not giving any such advantage, which would run us into difficulties all along the line. I have a feeling, without checking it, that we would be, though I am not absolutely convinced of it.

I have placed all the facts before the committee. If the committee thinks this restriction is required, that is quite satisfactory to us. If they think we should check further and make sure of it, I am prepared to do so and allow the bill to stand until later.

Mr. Riley: I would agree with the hon. member for Pontiac and the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet. All through the maritime provinces harness racing has been a major sport for generations. At many of our tracks they run four races of three heats each. Even if they do not do that every day, they may be rained out one day and spread the card for that day over the next few days, and thus run four races daily of three heats each. The danger we see is that we have the controlled pari-mutuel system of betting, and if this restriction is placed on the races held it will tend to encourage bookmaking at many tracks in the maritimes. If the public is not permitted to bet at the wickets under the controlled pari-mutuel system, there is the great danger of bookmakers coming in and establishing that vicious practice which flourishes in other parts of the country. We have no bookmaking today in the maritime provinces, and we do not want it; but there is the grave danger that if the ten-heat restriction is placed on pari-mutuel betting at our tracks, we may very well be faced with this problem. I hope the minister will bear that in mind when considering this section.

Mr. Lesage: In view of what the minister has said, I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again this day.

Mr. Gardiner: Would the hon. member agree that we consider the remainder of the bill as passed and allow subsection (2)(d) to stand for further consideration? Then the committee might report progress and I will bring the bill in later.

Mr. Lesage: I agree.

Mr. Pearkes: Can the minister give an assurance that this bill will be brought back this session and not left over until another session?

Mr. Gardiner: It will be brought in just as soon as the Minister of Public Works can give me the time.

Section stands.

Motion (Mr. Lesage) agreed to.

Progress reported.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR CONSTRUCTION OF LINE FROM SHERRIDON TO LYNN LAKE, MAN.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure conferring authority upon the governor in council to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to construct a line of railway from Sherridon to Lynn Lake, in the province of Manitoba, a distance of approximately 155 miles at an estimated expenditure of $14,725,000 and an average expenditure of $95,000 per mile. The measure will make provision for the issue by the company of securities, which may be guaranteed by the government in respect of the cost of construction. To enable the company to proceed with construction forthwith temporary loans may be made the company out of the consolidated revenue fund, upon terms and conditions prescribed by the governor in council and secured by company securities.

Mr. Green: Will the minister make a statement, either at this stage or when we are in committee?

Mr. Chevrier: I was hoping I could make it in committee of the whole.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Mr. Chevrier: This resolution seeks to authorize the Canadian National Railways to construct a line of railway from Sherridon to Lynn lake, in the province of Manitoba, a distance of 155 miles, at an estimated expenditure of $14,725,000 and an average expenditure of $95,000 per mile.

The resolution may be divided into three parts: First, that which seeks the authority to construct the line; second, that seeking authority so far as the Canadian National Railways is concerned, to issue securities guaranteed by the government to finance the construction; and third, that seeking authority to make temporary loans to the Canadian National Railways pending the construction of the line.

The matter of the construction of this railway has been under consideration for some time. Recently discussions were initiated between the officers of the Canadian National Railways, Sherritt Gordon Mines Limited and the Minister of Defence Production, and an agreement was reached.

The economics of the proposal so far as the Canadian National Railways is concerned are based on the understanding that the Canadian National Railways would, in the first instance, assume $10 million of the cost of construction of the said line, the balance of the cost to be borne by the federal government through the Department of Defence Production. Sherritt Gordon Mines Limited would contribute $5 million of the cost, payable at the rate of $350,000 annually for a period of twenty years, with the proviso that when traffic over the line proves to be greater than the traffic now estimated, that is, 1,880,000 tons of outbound traffic, the Canadian National Railways would repay Sherritt Gordon Mines Limited $2.65 per ton until a total of $5 million had been paid.

Minerals of a strategic nature have been discovered in the Lynn lake area. They are the property of Sherritt Gordon Mines Limited and they are needed for defence production. They cannot be exploited without the construction of this railway line. The construction of the railway line would have the following effect: First, Sherritt Gordon Mines Limited would be able to proceed with the full development of their Lynn lake nickel copper deposits, which have a proven reserve of 14 million tons; second, the establishment of a 2,000 tons per day mining plant and concentrator at Lynn lake; third, the establishment of a nickel refinery at Edmonton on the Canadian National Railways line for the refining of the nickel concentrate from Lynn lake and the manufacture as a by-product of ammonium sulphate; fourth, the construction of a 7,000 horsepower hydro-electric plant on the Laurie river, with an ultimate potential of 15,000 horsepower; fifth, the additional production per annum, providing the present demand for base metals continues, of the following:

Nickel	8,407
Copper	3,414
Cobalt	100
Copper sulphide	1,545
Ammonium sulphate	72,000

It is estimated that the annual value of the mineral and ammonium sulphate production would be of the order of $14,000,000.

The successful operation of this railway branch is dependent upon the mining development in the area. The Canadian National Railways estimates that with the traffic available and the survey it has made of the traffic potential when the developments referred to above have been completed, the effect on the net income position of the Canadian National Railways will be $244,000 annually. The contribution from Sherritt Gordon Mines Limited of $350,000 per year for twenty years would raise this figure to $594,000 per year. The excess over the $10,000,000 for which authority is being sought by the Canadian National Railways will be financed by the Department of Defence Production. It is estimated this will amount to $4,725,000.

The Canadian National Railways will be authorized to issue securities guaranteed by the government not exceeding $10,000,000, and temporary loans will be authorized during the period of construction.

This is a project of great magnitude. It is one which is urgently required. It will mean the expenditure of $50 million by Sherritt Gordon Mines Limited, the Canadian National Railways and the government. It will mean the full development at Lynn lake of 14,000,000 tons of nickel copper deposits; the establishment of a mining plant and concentrator employing 500 men; the establishment of a modern townsite at Lynn lake capable of housing 2,500 persons; the establishment of a refinery at Edmonton employing approximately 100 men, and the additional production of strategic base metals.

I recommend this resolution to the house.

An hon. Member: Another Flin Flon.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Green: It is one o'clock, Mr. Chairman. This seems to be an extremely important development. Perhaps we could consider it after the luncheon recess.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. Green: There are just one or two questions I should like to place before the Minister of Transport. If I heard his statement correctly this morning, there are to be three strategic minerals produced by this mine at Lynn lake, namely, nickel, copper and cobalt. I understand also that there is to be a mill at the mine so that the ore produced will be turned into the form of concentrates. Can the minister tell us where the respective concentrates are to be refined, and also give us some idea of the reserves of ore that are available in the district?

I have one other question which has to do with settlements along the route of this 155 mile line. Is there farming country or timber country, or are there any other mines on the line? Finally, is it the intention to refer the bill to one of the committees of the house for consideration, either the special committee on government-owned railways and shipping, or the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines? I presume a bill of this kind would go to the first mentioned committee, but I think it would be advisable to have it referred to one or the other of these committees so that witnesses could be heard and some further study given to the whole proposal.

Mr. Chevrier: Dealing with the last question first, when we reach second reading of the bill it is my intention to move that it be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines for study. It might be possible, if it was the wish of the committee, to hear evidence from certain of the officials of the railway company who could speak on the economics of the project.

Mr. Green: Could there also be evidence from the mining company?

Mr. Chevrier: That could be given consideration, but I think that the officers of the Canadian National Railways, through their engineers and inspectors, will have all the information available. I shall be glad, however, to see what can be done.

Mr. Knowles: Would it not be better to send it to the committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government?

Mr. Chevrier: Railway bills have always been sent to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, and it would be my hope that the house would see fit to send this bill to that committee. Railway bills, in my experience, have never gone to the other committee, which is one on government-owned shipping and matters affecting the Canadian National Railways.

In the topographical and geographical surveys that have been made of the area in which the railway will be built there is no indication of any agricultural development. It is all lakes and rugged territory, where farming would be almost impossible.

With reference to timber, there is no merchantable timber. There is some wood that could be sawn into logs, but no timber of any commercial value.

Answering the first question, the ore would be milled at the townsite of Lynn lake, where the mining plant and concentrate mill would be built. The nickel concentrates would be sent to the refinery in Edmonton, and the copper concentrates to the refinery which now exists at Flin Flon. The reserves so far proven are in the extent of 14 million tons.

Mr. Green: Is the refinery at Edmonton to be run by natural gas?

Mr. Chevrier: That I could not say. It will be operated by Sherritt Gordon, and I presume that has entered into the cost.

Mr. McIvor: I think it is wise to send this bill to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, because if there is anything wrong about it they will find out, and if there is anything good in it, it will come to light. It is one of the most efficient committees in the House of Commons. I hope it will go there quickly, because otherwise it is only wasting time here.

Mr. Fulton: Like anybody else, I guess I can take a hint, and certainly most questions should be asked in the committee. I did not gather from the minister's statement whether the estimate of income to the railway of $240,000 annually was net income or gross income.

Mr. Chevrier: Net.

Mr. Fulton: Has the minister any figure readily available for their estimate of gross return?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, I have complete detail of the position so far as the Canadian National Railway is concerned when this line will be built, but I should think that this is not the time to give it.

Mr. Fulton: Give it in committee.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Fort William is anxious to see the bill get to the committee. As a matter of fact we have not got the bill yet; this is just a resolution preceding the bill. However, I want to say that any move that is designed to develop the natural resources of this country, and to increase the production of real wealth, certainly deserves the favourable consideration of this house. I am glad to see that steps are being taken to facilitate the development of the real wealth that is latent in this part of northern Manitoba.

However, I cannot help but take note of the fact that when development such as this is contemplated we, the people, through the government, have to come into the picture in order to facilitate that development. It is perfectly true that private enterprise is going to play its part, for a well-known reason, too; but the minister has also made it clear that there is to be a considerable sum of public money put into the building of this railway in order to make possible the development of this very valuable resource.

I for one feel, Mr. Chairman, that in the years that lie ahead we are going to have to pay still more attention to developing the resources of this country. We are anxious to build as high a standard of living as possible. We cannot do it out of thin air; we have to do it out of real wealth, and we have the potentiality for producing that real wealth in this country to an unlimited extent.

It has been indicated that it is the necessity of defence production which is the immediate spur to this activity, and one accepts that fact. I would point out, however, that even in peacetime it is highly desirable to go ahead with the development of projects of this nature, but I feel they should be done in the interest of the country as a whole.

There are two or three questions I should like to ask, on the basis of what the minister said this morning. As I understood him, the government is putting in some $10 million and Sherritt Gordon $5 million. Those amounts are going into the construction of the railway. I understand the money Sherritt Gordon is putting in is to be paid at the rate of $350,000 over a period of twenty years—and I am a little puzzled with that, because it works out to a total of $7 million. Then I noticed the minister said that if the production exceeded a certain number of tons the money would be paid back to Sherritt Gordon at the rate of $2.65 per ton.

Does this mean that, in reality, the $5 million being put up by Sherritt Gordon toward the building of the railway is really just a loan, subject to Sherritt Gordon's actually producing a certain quantity of ore?

I have one or two further questions, but perhaps the minister would answer that one first.

Mr. Chevrier: Let me put it this way: the cost of this railway is estimated at $14,725,000. Then, $10 million of that will be financed by the Canadian National Railways in the following manner: $5 million of their own money, and $5 million which they will advance to Sherritt Gordon, who will in turn repay the Canadian National Railways at the rate of $350,000 a year for twenty years. This is on the condition that when the traffic over the line reaches an amount in excess of the amount mentioned in my statement this morning, that is an amount in excess of 1,880,000 tons, the Canadian National Railways will pay over and above that excess to Sherritt Gordon $2.65 a ton until the $5 million has been repaid.

Mr. Knowles: In other words, in the end if Sherritt Gordon produces that much ore they will not be putting any actual dollars into the railway project itself?

Mr. Chevrier: No, that is not accurate. Sherritt Gordon are putting in $5 million, which they will repay the Canadian National Railways at the rate of $350,000.

Mr. Knowles: Well, I will not pursue it further, except to point out that they are putting it in, but that they have the chance to get it back later.

An hon. Member: Sure.

Mr. Knowles: I hear various comments, one of them to the effect that this line should be built by the Canadian National Railways. All right; but that emphasizes what I said a moment ago, that it is perfectly clear that in order to facilitate the development of this natural resource it is necessary for the people of Canada, through their government, and through their government-owned railway, to finance the construction of the railway itself. This is another case of private enterprise with public assistance.

May I ask the minister whether in the agreement to which he referred this morning, the agreement that has been reached between Canadian National Railways and Sherritt Gordon—or it may be between the government and Sherritt Gordon—there are any items or clauses relating to the freight rates to be charged Sherritt Gordon by the Canadian National Railways. For example, is there anything comparable—

Mr. Chevrier: None whatever.

Mr. Knowles: Is there anything comparable with what is done in connection with Steep Rock?

Mr. Chevrier: No, no clause having to do with freight rates at all.

Mr. Knowles: In other words Sherritt Gordon will pay the standard tariff to the Canadian National Railways for that sort of freight.

Mr. Chevrier: I do wish the hon. member would not ask leading questions. He has asked me one question as to whether or not there is anything in this agreement in connection with the imposition of freight rates, and I have said no. That is clear. I think I made that clear. Now he comes along with a question, a leading question, in which he says, "I understand therefore that it will pay the standard freight rate." Well, my hon. friend can draw his own conclusion as to what they will pay. I do not know. First of all, the railway is not built. Secondly, the freight rate has not been fixed. Thirdly, the standard tariff has not been established on the new railway. Therefore it is impossible for me to answer that kind of question. I hope the hon. member will be satisfied.

Mr. Knowles: But it is perfectly clear that there is no clause in the agreement similar to that in the Steep Rock agreement?

Mr. Chevrier: I have answered that twice by saying no.

Mr. Knowles: Good.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Obviously if the railway is not extended beyond Sherridon, that portion of the railway from the main line of the Hudson Bay railway at Sherritt junction to Sherridon would have very little business, and would have to be scrapped, since the mine at Sherridon is practically worked out. If this proposed construction program of the C.N.R. does not take place it means a ghost town at Sherridon, and a thousand men turned it of employment.

I would like to ask the minister if there is not a large hydroelectric power project which would be installed in order to operate this new mining development.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. I indicated this morning that on the Laurie river, forty-five or fifty miles south of Lynn lake, there is a potential power development which will be capable of developing 15,000 horsepower of electrical energy, which is more than sufficient to facilitate the production of the known deposits in the Lynn lake area.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): I understand a very great development is anticipated there by some of the other large companies, and that this power would be available for other mines developed in the area.

Mr. Chevrier: That I am not able to say, except that I do know other mining companies have made explorations in the area, and have certain rights. Whether they would use this power development or not, I cannot say.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Replying to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre —and I thought, with something less than his usual charm—the minister said that the railway was not built, that various other things were not done and that therefore these figures could not be available. But there is one very important figure which is fixed, if I understand correctly, and that is the figure which Sherritt Gordon is to get back at a certain stage in the contract, at so much a ton. What puzzles me is how that figure was arrived at, if all the other figures are still unknown.

Mr. Chevrier: On the basis of the tonnage I gave this morning in my statement, concerning the additional production which would be available of nickel, copper, cobalt, copper sulphide, ammonium sulphate and the like, and on the basis of the amount of the value of these base metals, it can be estimated what the total revenue of the line would be. The Canadian National Railways have prepared a statement which I have before me, and which will be available at the opportune time, which shows that, having regard to that, their income position would be bettered by the construction of the line to the extent of $244,000 annually; and with the amount of $350,000 which will be paid annually by Sherritt Gordon to the company, over a period of twenty years, their income position would be bettered to the extent of $594,000.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am not on the committee, and I shall not press the matter further, but I do wish to point out that I am still puzzled, because it would seem to me that these other figures which have been arrived at would depend, in large measure, on the freight rate on the ore during the period of operation. However, I am content to let the matter drop, and have it go to the committee.

Mr. Knowles: In other words, if the minister knows that the position of the Canadian National Railways will be bettered to the extent of $244,000 per year, and if he knows the weights of ore, upon which that $244,000 is based, someone must know what those freight rates are.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Chevrier thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 376, respecting the construction of a line of railway by Canadian National Railway Company from Sherridon to Lynn Lake, in the province of Manitoba.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read a second time?

Mr. Chevrier: I have the bill in my hands and I am sure it will be distributed. I wonder if we could not give consideration to giving the bill second reading now so that it can be referred to the committee. There is great urgency for the construction of this line and it may be that the house would feel like considering the bill and referring it to the committee.

Mr. Green: Much as I would like to help the minister along, we do have a responsibility to have a look at a bill before we pass it. I am afraid we will have to have second reading at the next sitting.

QUEBEC SAVINGS BANKS ACT

INVESTMENTS IN CORPORATE BONDS OR DEBENTURES—LOANS

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 338, to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act.

Motion agreed to, bill considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

INCOME TAX ACT

The house resumed, from Tuesday, June 5, consideration in committee of Bill No. 296, to amend the Income Tax Act—Mr. Abbott—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Income from office or employment.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): We were discussing depreciation under this section and the minister had told us that certain changes were being made in the regulations. I wonder whether the minister could indicate what line they will take or whether the situation is being changed?

Mr. Abbott: I am afraid I am not in a position to indicate just what the amendments will consist of. As my hon. friend knows, the administration is handled primarily by the Department of Trade and Commerce so far as the issuance of certificates of eligibility is concerned, and the Department of National Revenue administers the balance of the regulations.

I have been informed that as a result of specific applications which have been made to the Department of Trade and Commerce and representations which have been received by that department and the Department of National Revenue, certain amendments to the initial regulations are being considered and I understand will be available shortly. It was felt that when changes were being made it should not be done piecemeal, that an endeavour should be made to do whatever seems desirable at the one time. I made inquiry this morning and was told that it was expected that the regulations would be available for consideration by council within a few days. I do not know that there is anything more that I can add to that.

I did indicate the other evening that I believed that one of the provisions in the regulations would be that there would be a periodical publication of the names of those who had received certificates of eligibility and the purposes for which the certificates had been granted. Apart from that I do not think that I can attempt to go into detail now, but I assure my hon. friend that as soon as the regulations are prepared they will be made available. I would doubt if the estimates of the Minister of Trade and Commerce will have been completed before that time, and if there were any questions which it was thought desirable to ask, they could be asked then.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I appreciate the difficulty of the minister because this matter is in the hands of another department, but I wish he would go a little further and assure us that we will have an opportunity to discuss this important matter. I notice the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce are coming up tomorrow and from what the minister has said I gather that it may be several days, or perhaps a week or two before these regulations will be ready This is a matter of great importance and we ought to have a chance to consider it. I appreciate that we are dealing with regulations and I appreciate also this opportunity to discuss them, but I think the minister will agree that this matter is of sufficient importance that we should have a chance to discuss it again.

Mr. Abbott: I cannot give any positive assurance that there will be a further opportunity, but I would hope that that would happen. I do not anticipate that the changes in the regulations will be particularly drastic in their character. This matter has been before the house for some weeks and I think there would be a basis for discussion if my hon. friend is desirous of discussing it. While I would do my best to see that an opportunity is afforded, I could not give any such definite assurance. As the hon. member has pointed out, these are regulations. We have not before us any statutory provision relating to them and it is by arrangement, I think a most desirable one, that we are now discussing the general principle. I agree with my hon. friend that this is a most important matter.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I thank the minister and I note his reservation. I think that makes it all the more incumbent upon us to bring to the minister's attention, while the regulations are still in course of being changed, any matters that we may have in mind. On April 10 the minister referred to this new and I suppose almost unprecedented provision, when he said:

> What we need is a stiff financial deterrent that will affect particularly the businessman who is considering the kind of investment which is attractive, not because of its long-term soundness, but because it can be written off out of the expected high profits of the next few years at a time when he expects the rate of corporate income tax to be abnormally high.

I draw that to the minister's attention because I am going to suggest very earnestly that under the section as it is worded—and I take it the whole thing is pursuant to the principle the minister laid down, and which I have just read—there are certain cases which seem to me not only to go far away from that but to be entirely contrary to it. No doubt the minister has had other representations of this kind, but I hope it will be possible in these regulations to deal with cases of the kind that I am going to mention.

I have one case here which I wish to draw to the minister's attention. It involves a situation where there was a holding company, and several subsidiary companies. The holding company retained ownership by simply retaining the shares of the various companies. For the past year or so a study has been in progress to determine whether substantial savings could be made by merging the projects into one enterprise. The study has been completed. It is obvious that the sensible thing from a business point of view is to merge, but if the merger is proceeded with no depreciation under this wording, as I understand it, will be available for four years. This is a case where no new equipment is involved. There is certainly no question of entering into a new investment with speculative possibilities. Yet under the wording as it stands, although decreased costs of operation could be achieved, the companies will be forced to carry on under the present set-up with higher costs, thus adding to the fires of inflation, you might say, because if they amalgamate now depreciation on the assets of the various constituent companies will be deferred.

The writer of the letter providing me with that information says somewhat caustically: "It simply does not make sense." I submit to the minister that whether or not it makes sense, it does not come anywhere within the four corners of the paragraph of the minister's speech that I read. I take it it is perfectly clear that this provision is not a tax collecting provision. It is a provision, as the minister has said, to avoid undue expansion. I think the minister will probably agree that it was never intended to catch a case of this kind, but it will, and numerous others. I submit to the minister that there must be some administrative way of dealing with this situation. Here is a case that by no conceivable stretch of the imagination comes within the minister's principle.

There are one or two other cases. I am sure they are known to the minister, but I want to get them on the record. There is the case—and I am sure there must be large numbers of such cases—where firm commitments have been made, commitments which cannot be escaped, to acquire property. They were made before the 10th of April but the machinery, or what you will, had not actually been acquired. Then there is the case of the individual businessman who wants to incorporate, and as I understand it he is in the same difficulty. I would have thought that in particular might have been made an exception because there is no question whatever there of coming within the minister's principle. I will leave the matter at that point merely emphasizing again that it seems to me that the cases I have cited have shown that the simple wording of the clause as it stands now is not only going to create great injustices but, what is perhaps even more important, it is going to create situations which I am sure the minister never had in his mind when he made his budget speech.

Mr. Abbott: I think it is probably fair to say that special cases such as my hon. friend has outlined are just the sort of cases that are now under consideration to see whether some remedial action can be taken. I should add that as a rule representations are not made to me directly. They are made to the Department of Trade and Commerce or the Department of National Revenue. If the cases which my hon. friend has cited have not already been brought to the attention of the department—and I think some of them have —I shall see that they are carefully considered.

Mr. Fleming: I am sure that the committee will appreciate the statement just made by the minister as to his willingness to review cases of this kind, because they are serious cases. I was a little disappointed to hear the minister say earlier this afternoon that the revision of order in council P.C. 1778 of April 10, 1951, which is under way at the present time, may not go as far as perhaps some of us had hoped. I should like to express an opinion based on what I have seen of the way in which this new order in council has operated.

For a sudden new departure in a matter of such importance, I think the order in council was unduly drastic in its terms. The hon. member for Greenwood has referred to its effects on various cases, and I also referred to such cases when speaking on this matter on June 5, cases where commitments had been entered into prior to April 10 but where the property had not yet been acquired, where the purchaser under his commitment is obliged to complete his purchase and discharge his commitment notwithstanding that he has no effective opportunity in a situation of that kind to exercise that choice which the minister praised in this new scheme as being the essence of it. I refer to the taxpayer's choice between acquiring and not acquiring property on which depreciation will be deferred four years. In a situation of that kind there is no element of choice left to the individual.

The feature of choice in the present scheme of deferred depreciation which the minister claimed for it is not to be found in a situation of that kind. The commitment is there, but there is no opportunity on the part of the purchaser to decide whether he will or will not acquire the particular asset which, if he acquires it, will not be depreciable for income tax purposes for four years. I would urge that the drastic features of the new depreciation scheme, its rigours, ought to be mitigated in the revision that is under review at the present time.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend knows that one can always mitigate.

Mr. Fleming: I hope that is the principle that will guide the government in connection with the present revision of the order in council. After all, when we think of the features of the scheme offered a few years ago to encourage people to embark on the acquisition and construction of plants, you will remember that the bonus or inducement there offered was double depreciation.

[Mr. Abbott.]

If we were applying the same principle here in reverse, because of the fact that this is intended to have a deflationary effect, I should have thought that the step to be taken would have been to reduce the depreciation allowance by one-half. If with a view to expanding the construction of plant and equipment a few years ago the principle followed was to double the rate of depreciation, then surely the way in which that principle might well operate now would be to reduce the rate of depreciation by one-half, but this proposal eliminates it altogether, and in consequence it has some highly discriminatory features. It may be that in times like these, when great stress is being placed upon the need to halt the expansion of industries which may in any way compete for defence materials that are in short supply, brakes must be applied on both the extension of existing businesses and the creation of new ones. But, with respect, it seems to me that a measure so drastic as this, suddenly applied, is going to work very great hardship on young businesses, young enterprises and those avenues through which the free enterprise system finds its expression. People starting up in business, making their own way and taking all the risks inherent in entering upon a new business, find a scheme like this being applied with highly discriminatory effects.

I conclude these remarks by saying that I do hope the revision being currently carried out in order in council P.C. 1778 will not be merely some superficial amendment, but will really seek to eliminate the very objectionable features of the new scheme resulting from its rigour and the discriminatory consequences.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to add a word to support what has been said by the hon. member for Eglinton, particularly with regard to the want of notice. I am going to read what Mr. Gaitskell, the British chancellor, had to say when taking similar action. He gave a year's notice of the withdrawal of allowances for new plant and machinery; and these are his words:

> Since the planning and execution of most investment takes a considerable time, the scope for restriction in 1951 is obviously limited, but we should take action now so as to restrain investment in 1952 and later years. I have, therefore, reluctantly decided that the initial allowances of 40 per cent given for income tax and profits tax purposes on plant and machinery, and 10 per cent on industrial buildings and mines and oil wells must be suspended as from April 6, 1952. I am giving a year's notice. Any expenditure incurred on or after that date will continue to qualify for the ordinary annual depreciation allowances, but it will receive no initial allowance.

You will observe that there are two great differences here. In the first place, as the hon. member for Eglinton has suggested, in the United Kingdom they did not wipe out all depreciation. In the second place the step taken does not become effective until April, 1952. I am not going to labour the matter because I am sure the minister has a very open mind and is going to do a lot of the things we want, and I do not want to irritate him so he might be less likely to do those things. But I want to mention two or three classes which I think cry aloud for adjustment under the wording of the minister's budget speech, which put the matter very clearly and which I have read to him this afternoon. The three classes I want to mention by way of summary are: first, where a firm or individual was committed to capital investments at the time the order became effective; second, where there is merely a change in the form of ownership after the order became effective; third, where the property purchased was used or secondhand. I think the minister will agree those are all problems which demand sympathetic attention by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Abbott: All three are being considered.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Then there is the question of the wording in section 1, where a new phraseology has been pointed out to me. Instead of the words "reasonable allowances" which I understand have been used in the past, we have a new phrase, "allowances (not in excess of reasonable amounts)". The suggestion is made that it is going to be confusing to have these different wordings. Perhaps the first question to ask the minister is whether they mean different things, because if they do that is another matter.

Mr. Abbott: These amendments were drafted by the Department of Justice, and I should not think there would be any serious confusion. It is to prevent abuse, of course, as my hon. friend appreciates, and any taxpayer who is dissatisfied would have the right of appeal. It would be a question of fact whether the allowances for travelling expenses came within the terms of those words and were in excess of reasonable amounts.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): But with his legal background I think the minister will agree that just as sure as shooting if that ever comes up for interpretation the first thing lawyers will say is, "Well, they used different words. They could not have meant the same thing, or they would have used the same words." Then presumably it would be easy for one side to suggest that these words are more restrictive, and for the other side to suggest that they are less restrictive. Does not the minister agree that it would be sensible to use the phrase which has been used in the past and which has the sanction of usage behind it?

Mr. Abbott: I am told there is a reason for the distinction. I am afraid I had not given it the consideration my hon. friend has. The reasonable allowance phrase is found in section 5 (b). In that case the allowance in excess of what would be a reasonable allowance I suppose must be included as income and would be subject to tax. I really do not think it will give rise to any difficulty. This is intended to be a relieving provision, of course, because under the act as it now stands per diem travelling allowances are not allowed. It is felt that in all probability it is more economical to allow employees, such as civil servants and others, who are travelling to have a fixed allowance for travelling expenses, which obviously would be established on the basis of what it would reasonably cost them to live. If by any chance they were able to save a little on that I do not suppose anyone would question it.

Mr. Fleming: I wonder if the minister would indicate in more complete detail the types of allowances contemplated in subsection 2 for agents-general of provinces while in Ottawa.

Mr. Abbott: I understand that certain provinces maintain representatives here and that, as is the case with our diplomatic representatives abroad, in addition to their salaries and other remuneration they receive what is described as a representation allowance, I suppose to enable them to look after the expenses necessarily incurred when businessmen or others from their province are here on business. They act in a somewhat similar way to our trade commissioners and diplomatic representatives abroad. I believe they have been maintained here since the beginning of the last war, when many businessmen from the more remote parts of Canada were coming to Ottawa in connection with war business and it was found useful to have a provincial representative here to assist them in their discussions with government departments. Essentially it would be analogous to the representational allowances which I understand our diplomatic representatives and trade commissioners receive while abroad.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Certain reserves included in computing income.

Mr. Fleming: I believe two features of this section will attract attention and perhaps some opposition on the part of the house. In line 24 we have the expression "in the opinion of the Minister of Finance," and the second subsection makes these provisions retroactive. In general, when the Income Tax Act was enacted two years ago, parliament turned its face against ministerial discretion. There are several evidences in this bill of the conferring of discretion on the minister. I do not say that in every case there should be no ministerial discretion. There are some cases where it may be necessary, but I think that the committee will wish to scrutinize every such case with the utmost care. I would ask the minister if he would state to the committee what is the case that he makes out for the discretion in this instance.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend may recall the proceedings before the banking and commerce committee at the time of the last revision of the Bank Act. I do not know whether he was in the house at that time or not.

Mr. Fleming: No.

Mr. Abbott: At that time there was a long discussion with regard to what are known as the banks' inner reserves or hidden reserves. As a result of that discussion it was decided that the Minister of Finance should have the responsibility of determining whether or not the so-called inner reserves of the bank were in excess of what were needed for banking purposes. My hon. friend will find in section 11(4), which is the section allowing deductions from income, a reference to this same subject, and the same phrasing:

> . . . such amount as is set aside or reserved for the year either by way of write-down of the value of assets . . . and is, in the opinion of the Minister of Finance, having regard to all the circumstances, not in excess of the reasonable requirements of the bank.

This is a complementary provision to provide that if the Minister of Finance is of the opinion that these inner reserves are in excess of the requirements of the banks, he may require that they be taken back into income for purposes of tax.

As the committee will appreciate, the banks have a very special position in this respect. They are the only type of corporation which has this special right to create inner reserves, for reasons which are well known and which were thoroughly canvassed by the banking and commerce committee when the Bank Act was last revised. Of course, as the committee is probably aware, in matters of this kind the minister acts upon the advice received from the inspector general of banks who is in constant touch with the operations of the banks. This is really a complementary provision to the provision which is now in section 11, subsection 4. But I must say that I believe, having accepted the principle—as the banking and commerce committee did in the last parliament—that the Minister of Finance must be given this responsibility of determining whether or not the inner reserves are in excess of the reasonable requirements of the bank, he should make provision that they must be taken back into income.

Mr. Fleming: As to the complementary feature which the minister has mentioned, was he referring to the review of the Bank Act or the review of the Income Tax Act?

Mr. Abbott: The review of the Bank Act. This method of determining what are appropriate inner reserves for banks to have was established at the last revision of the Bank Act, as those who were members of the committee will recall; and the Minister of Finance was given special responsibility with respect to those inner reserves. He had the right to say that reserves may be needed which are not in excess of the reasonable requirements of the bank. But if it develops that reserves have been set aside—and quite properly set aside—but that in the ordinary operations they become, in the minister's opinion, in excess of the reasonable requirements of the bank, then obviously in the interests of what is proper and fair, the excess should be brought back into income and tax paid on it.

Mr. Fleming: There are two questions I should like to ask the minister to deal with. The first is this. What are the principles which guide the minister in determining whether the reserves are or are not in excess of reasonable requirements? Second, with regard to the second subsection, what is the reason for giving the new section 9 of the act retroactive effect?

Mr. Abbott: On the first question, of course, that is determined by the exercise of judgment as to whether the amounts which are reserved against the bank's total assets are or are not adequate. That involves the exercise of judgment on the part of the minister, assisted by his permanent officials and the inspector general of banks. If the bank's assets in the form of loans are, let us say, $50 million and there is—and I am using an extreme case—an inner reserve of $40 million against them, I think that even the veriest layman would conclude that is in excess of the reasonable requirements of the bank.

But to answer my hon. friend directly on the matter, it must involve the exercise of judgment on the part of the minister. I think that I should say that that judgment is exercised largely on the basis of fairly well recognized and predetermined formulae in this matter and, as I have indicated, with the advice and assistance of the inspector general of banks.

As to the second question, I am informed that there has never been any question but that it should be taxable when brought back into income, but that technically the law was not clear. The putting of this provision in the law was overlooked. The banks had never questioned that if it were brought back into income it should be taxed; because these inner reserves are, of course, created out of income which has not been subject to tax. The rule is therefore made applicable to the year 1949. So far as I recall, I do not think—well, I had better not speak from memory. I do not recall whether or not any have been brought back in within the last year or two.

Mr. Fleming: I have an extremely strong feeling against retroactive legislation and it is not without reason, I think, Mr. Chairman. The minister has indicated that this appears to be, as he has put it, or as I understood him to put it, a codification of the principles that have been observed in connection with bank assessments hitherto. If that is the case, I think it might be quite satisfactory to leave the matter as it is and to enact legislation now to the extent necessary to deal with the situation now, to come into effect now or as of the date of the budget proposals in the ordinary way. But I do not think that the minister has made out a case for applying this section back to January 1, 1949. That is the effect of the second subsection. If there is no particular situation calling for the enactment of retroactive legislation, then I strongly urge that the committee should not approve the retroactive operation of the new amendment.

Mr. Abbott: No one, the banks or anyone else, has ever seriously questioned that when these inner reserves are brought back into income they should be taxed. I am afraid I could not countenance that suggestion. I do not think this procedure has ever been seriously questioned. It is to repair what may be really a technical lack in the act. That is the position.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to back up what the hon. member for Eglinton has said. If I thought there was any danger of tax evasion, I would not feel that way about it. But I think the minister has assured us that is not so. Certainly my own experience would wholly confirm that view. But I feel that this habit—and it is almost a habit we are getting into—of retroactive legislation is extremely undesirable. Unless the minister feels there is some reason for it, beyond what he has given us, I would hope that he would give heed to what the hon. member for Eglinton has said.

Mr. Abbott: I have just as strong objection as have my hon. friends to what is really retroactive legislation. But this is a section which should have been in the act from the very moment that section 11, subsection 4, was in it; that is 1949. Nobody is going to be prejudiced by putting it in now. I feel that the two sections should be made effective from exactly the same date. I think that in this case I would have to insist on my stand.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I will not say anything more except this. When we condone retroactive legislation because it is not going to hurt anybody, it is easy to do it in the case where it does hurt somebody; and later on this afternoon I am going to refer to a case where it is going to hurt somebody. That is why I am anxious to get a good precedent established.

Mr. Abbott: I think the exception proves the rule. There are cases, and I have seen them in the course of my experience, where so-called retroactive legislation is fully justified.

Mr. Graydon: And you have seen some in which it was not.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Deductions allowed.

Mr. Sinnott: In looking over these deductions allowed, may I say that I noticed that union dues were disallowed until just recently, and I thank the minister for allowing them to be deducted. But since that time that they have been allowed to be deducted, I notice that union dues have increased to about twice the amount they were before. However, I wish to speak for another class of people in Canada, namely those who are not able to help themselves. Deductions are allowed for those in the family who are under sixteen years of age. There are quite a few people in this country who are incapacitated and who are kept by their families. Last week end I happened to visit a home not very far from Ottawa and I found a crippled person there who was unable to take care of himself, and the family is taking care of several people throughout the country. There are several boys in my own municipality who are kept wholly by their parents. I would ask the minister whether he would take into consideration the granting of some deductions to parents who are keeping this class of citizen. I should like to have an answer to my suggestion.

Mr. Abbott: The act at the present time in section 25, subsection 1 (c), provides that deductions may be made for every child over 21 years of age who is dependent by reason of mental or physical infirmity. These conditions have to be established. If a taxpayer has a child who is completely incapacitated because of blindness and who is thirty or forty years of age, a deduction may be claimed for that child in the same way as it may for a completely dependent infant.

Mr. Knowles: It is unnecessary for me to say how much I welcome the part of section 3 of this bill which re-establishes the right of trade unionists to deduct their dues for income tax purposes. I shall not take any time to go over the history of the matter in past sessions, for it is a matter of record. I am pleased that this action is being taken.

When we were discussing the matter at the resolution stage I expressed some concern lest the definition of trade union dues might not be completely satisfactory. At that time the minister was good enough to say that he would be pleased to receive any suggestions when we reached this stage of the bill. I must respond to the attitude of the minister expressed at that time by stating that to a very large extent I find the definition of trade union dues satisfactory. I will have to qualify that by saying there are one or two aspects of the definition that I want to get clear in my mind. I think the minister's wording in the bill is at least moving in the right direction.

First of all in the new subsection 10 (d) (i) we are told that a trade union is as defined, and I quote:

> (i) by paragraph (r) of subsection (1) of section 2 of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, or
> (ii) in any provincial statute providing for the investigation, conciliation or settlement of industrial disputes.

I think it would be appropriate for me to put on the record at this point what that definition of a trade union is, as it appears in the national labour code. The definitions in the provincial labour codes are similar. By turning to section 2, subsection 1, paragraph (r), of the federal statute, we find:

> (r) "trade union" or "union" means any organization of employees formed for the purpose of regulating relations between employers and employees but shall not include an employer-dominated organization.

Well, that is good. That definition of a trade union is completely acceptable to the trade union movement, and it excludes what are sometimes referred to as company unions. So far so good; but when we get down a little further in the section we do find a couple of qualifications. One of them is a qualification that eliminates that portion of union dues which is levied for or under a superannuation fund or plan, or for or under a fund or plan for annuities, insurance or similar benefits. I know that the minister may reply to me by saying that in some cases the portion of union dues that is levied for a pension fund is covered by another section in the Income Tax Act. That is true. Section 11 (1) (g), which the present amending bill does not seem to touch so far as I can ascertain, says:

> Not exceeding in the aggregate $900 in the year, if retained by his employer from his remuneration for or under the fund or plan in respect of services rendered in the year or paid into or under the fund or plan by the taxpayer as part of his dues for the year as a member of a trade union.

I did not read all of the parts that connect that subsection to the rest of the section, but the effect of it is that if part of a trade unionist's dues is for a superannuation plan, and if that plan has been approved as a proper pension plan, approved by the Department of National Revenue, then that portion of union dues which is a contribution to a superannuation plan is allowed. I see the minister nodding his head, and that indicates that I am stating the position correctly thus far. In other words, it adds up to this, that in a case where a trade unionist's dues are in part dues for the general operating expenses of the union, and in part for a superannuation plan, he may get all of them allowed if the part for a superannuation plan is paid into a plan that has been approved by the Minister of National Revenue. If that plan is one that has not been approved by the Minister of National Revenue that portion of his dues will not be allowed as a deduction for income tax purposes.

I am going to come back to that in a moment, because there is an aspect to it that I want to discuss with the minister; but before going into it further I think I should raise a question about paragraph (c) of the new subsection 12, which reads:

> For any other purpose not directly related to the ordinary operating expenses of the association or trade union to which they were paid.

The effect of that is to say that it is only that portion of trade union dues which is used for purposes directly related to the ordinary operating expenses of the trade union that will be allowed. The question that is in my mind as a result of that qualification is this: Who decides what portion of a trade unionist's dues is for purposes directly related to the ordinary operating expenses of the union? Will there be regulations made by the Department of National Revenue, or is it left to the union, or on what basis is the decision to be made?

Mr. Abbott: It is a question of fact. The department will rule and if the taxpayer is not satisfied he will go to the income tax appeal board for a ruling. It is a straight question of fact.

Mr. Knowles: No extra regulation?

Mr. Abbott: No.

Mr. Knowles: The trade unionist will claim the deduction. If the department thinks it is not a proper deduction it will disallow it.

Mr. Abbott: Right.

Mr. Knowles: If the trade unionist feels it has been wrongly disallowed he takes the case to the income tax appeal board?

Mr. Abbott: Right. It is a straight question of fact.

Mr. Knowles: That seems reasonable so far. It would depend on how it works in practice. Now I want to come back to the other question, namely, that of the portion that goes into a superannuation fund or plan. It is clear that the decision in that connection is not made on the basis of what might be called fact, but rather it is made on the basis of a decision that is rendered by the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. Abbott: That is true of all superannuation funds.

Mr. Knowles: I realize that is true of all superannuation funds. I have a case which illustrates this problem quite clearly. It is one I have taken up with the minister across the floor of the house on previous occasions. In fact the last time I took it up with him I thought I got his agreement to the position I was taking here, and that it would be only a matter of time until the appropriate officials would agree.

But I did not have as much success with the officials in the department as I had with the minister himself. I thought the minister was at the top, but I found out when I went—

Mr. MacInnis: You found out he was hard boiled.

Mr. Knowles: No; the minister was reasonable. But when I went to the official with whom I had to deal I did not find him to be similarly reasonable. I am referring to the case of the International Typographical Union, of which I speak with some knowledge, because I happen to be a member of it.

The International Typographical Union has a pension fund which is administered from the head office of the union located at Indianapolis. In order to be a member of any local of the International Typographical Union a charge for the superannuation fund has to be paid as part of the union dues.

The Department of National Revenue has approved of that master superannuation plan. The result is that for quite a number of years members of the International Typographical Union have been allowed, as a deduction, that portion of their union dues which went toward that approved pension plan. The amount paid into that fund is two and a half per cent of the income earned at the trade.

It so happens that one of the locals of the International Typographical Union, Toronto local No. 91, felt that, good as the pension plan now is—paying to retired members of the union $18 a week—it could be improved upon. With that in mind the Toronto local No. 91 of the International Typographical Union worked out a supplemental plan. That supplemental plan requires each and every member of the Toronto local to pay an additional one per cent into a local fund out of which, when a member retires, he receives an additional $5 per week.

The point I make is that the requirements attached to the additional one per cent, the supplementary plan, are on all fours with the requirements of the master plan administered from the head office at Indianapolis. One could not be a member of local 91 of the International Typographical Union at Toronto without paying the additional one per cent, just as I could not be a member of local 191 in Winnipeg without paying the two and a half per cent required by the international laws of the union. It seems to me that the two are completely on all fours.

If, as I agree, the master plan of two and a half per cent can be approved as a deduction,—and it has been so approved over the years—the additional one per cent required by the Toronto local should also be approved by the Department of National Revenue. I would point out that the local in Toronto got full approval of the head office of the union at Indianapolis before it was able to make this extra one per cent a requirement of membership in the Toronto local.

I have a thick volume of correspondence in the matter. I have been in the office of the particular official of the Department of National Revenue who handles this sort of thing. In addition to that I have had correspondence with the officials of the Department of Finance, with whom the minister a year ago told me to get in touch. And, by the way, when he told me that I felt hopeful; I thought I was getting somewhere.

A number of positions have been taken against this plan by the particular official who seems to have the say. According to the act it is the Minister of National Revenue who would have the say; but, in fact, it seems to be this particular official. On one occasion he tried to tell me that the wording of the plan for the supplementary program in Toronto did not make it clear that all the members of the Toronto local had to contribute. He picked out a particular phrase which said that employees of the union may become eligible, and laid great stress on the use of the word "may".

I have since pointed out that all that paragraph refers to is clerks and secretaries who may work for the union, in the office. It does not apply to the members of the union. They must pay this additional one per cent.

The other basic objection which this particular official has taken to the plan, as indicated in letters I have had from the Minister of National Revenue, from one of the officials of the Department of Finance, and others, is that these officials look upon this plan as essentially a savings plan rather than a retirement plan. For the life of me I cannot see how that can be said about the additional one per cent that makes provision for a supplementary $5 any more than it can be said about the two and a half per cent which makes possible the basic $18 a week pension for retired members of the union.

The whole purpose of the basic pension plan of the International Typographical Union is to provide for retired printers a pension; and the whole basis of the Toronto supplementary plan is to provide a slight increase in that pension for retired printers.

I raise this case for two reasons. First, I feel very strongly that an injustice has been done to the members of Toronto local 91. The more I go into it, the more I am convinced that the only reason for the continued rejection of this supplementary plan is because a position was taken by a certain official, and he does not want to change that position. The other reason I raised the matter is that it illustrates a problem we may run into in connection with that part of union dues deductibility clause which rules out any of the amounts which go into a superannuation fund. It is unfortunate that it is left in this way to the discretion of certain officials. It seems to me some better way could be found to define that part of the dues so that people who pay part of their dues into a bona fide superannuation plan will not have that portion disallowed by a departmental official when they apply for a deduction.

There are one or two other points I should like to mention, but I would ask the minister to deal with this superannuation question. We shall wait and see how that part of the definition which speaks of purposes directly related to working expenses of a union works out. I am satisfied with the definition of a union as taken from the national labour code. But I am not satisfied with the part relating to superannuation.

While I am on my feet, may I say I am glad to note that the provisions of this section are fairly wide, in that they include professional membership dues. This would include those different groups including teachers, doctors, lawyers, engineers, architects and all those others who were mentioned in the debate on February 26 of this year when my motion was before the house. I am glad to note that there is no limit to the kind of dues which may be allowed, provided they are dues necessary to be paid in connection with one's occupation.

Mr. Fleming: That is the first time I have heard the hon. member say a good word for the lawyers.

Mr. Knowles: Oh, my hon. friend should look back across the pages of Hansard. If he did he would find that there have been other times when I have had a good word to say for them—and I have had other words, too, of course. But, in all fairness it does seem to me that this section is good in what it does. The aim is, I believe, to be fair to all concerned. I should like to hear from the minister, particularly on the question of superannuation.

Mr. Abbott: I thank my hon. friend for the compliment he has paid to the drafters of this section. I must tell him a great deal of time was spent in working out the definition of eligibility and I think it is probably a pretty good definition. Nothing is perfect and it may be that in subsequent years it will be found it needs improvement, but I think it is a good starting point. The hon. member has raised the question of superannuation. As he has pointed out, the Income Tax Act for many years has only allowed payments into approved pension plans as deductions. The responsibility for approving those plans rested with the Minister of National Revenue. As the hon. member has pointed out, there is an officer or there are officers in the department specially charged with that responsibility. I am informed that there has been put out a book which enunciates the principles which are followed in approving these plans.

I am not in a position to argue, nor shall I attempt to, the merits of the particular plan to which the hon. member has referred. All I can say is that the further representations which he has made today will be brought to the attention of the Minister of National Revenue and his officials. I do not know whether the hon. member has brought out any new facts today, but I cannot attempt to make any critical analysis of the plan because the responsibility of approving or refusing to approve the plan does not rest with me. I do not know that I can add very much so far as the hon. member's grievance that this particular supplemental payment has not been allowed is concerned.

Mr. Knowles: I thank the minister for the attitude he has taken and I appreciate that the representations I have made today will be referred to the Minister of National Revenue. I trust that this case will be looked at from scratch and not on the basis of a decision already given. Since my representations are being turned over to other authorities may I take just a moment longer to point out that one of the arguments used against this plan and which was contained in a letter to the union was as follows:

> When employee contributions are deductible for tax purposes, they must be withheld and paid over by the employer.

That is one argument that the official used, namely, that these payments were not withheld by the employer and paid into a fund, but were withheld by the employees' own organization, namely, the union. I should like to answer that by quoting the wording of the latter part of section 11 which refers to money paid into or under a fund or plan by a taxpayer as part of his union dues for the year as a member of a trade union. In other words, the law provides clearly, not only for the kind of payment that is withheld by an employer and paid into a fund but also for the kind of payment that is made by a taxpayer as part of his union dues.

As I said before, a good deal of the argument of the officials who have rejected this plan thus far dwelt on the theme that this was more a savings scheme than a pension plan. Any pension plan that is based on building up a fund might be called a savings scheme as distinguished from the pay-as-we-go plan that is going to be brought in with respect to old age pensions.

I have tried to give this case the best study I could, partly because of my relationship with these fellow trade unionists, but also because I wanted to make an objective study. I feel that a wrong decision was arrived at by the official concerned and I hope that the new study which is to be made at the request of the minister will result in a change.

Mr. Fleming: I have one question to ask which is prompted by the word "insurance" on page 4, line 24, of the bill, which sets out subsection 12 of the new section. Is there any reason why unemployment insurance premiums should not be included within the scope of this remedial exemption?

Mr. Abbott: This relates entirely to amounts paid as part of what are defined as union dues. It has no relation to any other payments. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has pointed out, if the union dues were $5 per month and $2 per month represented a contribution to an approved superannuation plan or any superannuation plan, the $3 per month would be deductible for income tax purposes and, if it were an approved superannuation plan, the $2 would be deductible under the other section. This section is intended to apply only to payments which form part of union dues.

Mr. Fleming: I was dealing with the principle of the matter. If you are making an enlargement of the present deductions, why should you not include unemployment insurance?

Mr. Abbott: If we were going to do that I do not know why we should not allow as a deduction for income tax purposes payments on all forms of insurance, for all risks such as fire, life, sickness and so on. That has not been considered practicable.

Mr. Argue: I should like to advocate an extension of the type of dues which may be allowed as deductions for income tax purposes. I raised this matter in the committee stage on the resolution. It is now provided that professional people of all kinds may deduct dues for income tax purposes, and this principle is being extended to union dues. But there is one main group of Canadians who cannot deduct the dues they pay for income tax purposes. I refer to our farmers.

Mr. Abbott: Is the hon. member referring to the ordinary farmer in business for himself who grosses up his income and deducts the expenses of earning it?

Mr. Argue: I do not think the general farmer can deduct the dues he pays to a farmers organization.

Mr. Abbott: I think those would be allowed if claimed under the general rules which have applied.

Mr. Argue: The minister is saying that in his opinion a farmer could deduct the dues paid to a farmers organization. If I am given that assurance I shall drop the matter right now.

Mr. Abbott: That is my offhand view. The question has never occurred to me before. If dues were paid into an organization which has been set up for the purpose of promoting the interests of farming and that sort of thing, I would think the farmer could deduct his dues in the same way a businessman can deduct the dues he pays to a board of trade, to the manufacturers association or to anything else.

Mr. Fraser: Are not dues paid to the federation of agriculture allowed?

Mr. Abbott: I think they are.

Mr. Argue: The minister may be correct, and he might have been correct if he had said this a year or two ago. All I can say is that some prominent leaders in farm organizations, to say nothing about the farmers themselves, were not aware that such dues could be deducted.

Mr. Abbott: I would consider them completely analogous to board of trade dues or Canadian Manufacturers Association dues.

Mr. Knowles: Or lawyers on fees.

Mr. Abbott: Right.

Mr. Argue: I thank the minister for his comment. I am sure it will meet with the approval of farmers throughout Canada, and certainly my object in discussing this matter at this time has been accomplished.

Mr. Fraser: Subsection 10(a) on page 3 refers to "annual professional membership dues", and then at the bottom it says: ". . . that he was required by his contract of employment to maintain". Would that also apply if he was self-employed?

Mr. Abbott: He gets it automatically if he is self-employed because there he grosses up his income. The lawyer or engineer who operates on his own account on a professional basis puts in his gross fees, and charges up his office rent, expenses, his bar dues, and so on. This extends it to the salaried professional man.

Mr. Fraser: Under subsection 13 it refers to one-half the fees paid to an investment counsel.

Mr. Abbott: That is to confirm what has been the practice for a great many years. My hon. friend is aware that there are these investment counsel who assist those who are more fortunate than others in investing their capital and seeing that it suffers as little loss as possible. I believe a question was decided by the income tax appeal board that this was not a charge against income but was properly a capital charge. For a great many years the department had administratively allowed 50 per cent of these fees as an expense against income as being a fair proportion representing that portion of the charge which was incurred in earning the income, and the other as capital. It seemed to me and to the department that it was fair to maintain that practice, and it is for that purpose that this section is in the bill.

Mr. Fraser: I know members of parliament are receiving letters from these investment counsel every week. I know some people I have met who employ two or three such counsel because they want to average them up and see where they stand. Are they allowed half of the fees of each counsel?

Mr. Abbott: So far as I am aware, if a man pays a fee to this particular type of professional man, and if he is the super-cautious type who wants to have one to check the other, he can charge off 50 per cent. He has to pay 50 per cent of it himself. There is no deduction for 50 per cent.

Mr. Johnston: I should like to ask a question with respect to section 3 on page 2 concerning the repaying of borrowed money. It seems to me that the only deduction that would be allowed from income tax would be the interest on that borrowed money.

Mr. Abbott: This is a relieving section. There was a little lack in the law. In certain types of contracts there is an attributed interest content, and that is required to be included as income by the person who receives it.

Mr. Johnston: What it refers to is the attributed interest content.

Mr. Abbott: That is correct. Taking the reverse situation, if I as the lender under these circumstances am required to include it in my income, the man who is paying it to me can include it as an expense. That is the effect of the section. It is a relieving section. It seemed the sensible thing to do.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Under this section I think I should raise a very earnest expression of grievance I have from the acting profession, actors, musicians and such. I will read a short extract to the minister, and then I should like to know what the effect of this is, or whether there is any other relevant section. One letter reads in part:

. . . the department has seen fit to place us in the category of "piece workers" or as in a "master-servant" relationship.

An hon. Member: How do you spell it?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): He spells it p-i-e-c-e. The letter continues:

This means we are allowed no business deductions, even though we may incur very heavy responsibilities for music, equipment, reference material, travelling expenses. Neither can we receive such direct employee benefits . . .

And so on. The next letter adds something which is of interest. First of all it makes the same complaint. It reads in part:

This means we are allowed no business deductions, even though we may incur very heavy responsibilities for music, equipment, reference material, travelling expenses.

Further on the letter continues:

Surely, sir, Canadian artists have had a singular struggle to gain recognition and a not too steady income without being burdened with unjust and illogical taxation. Both in the United States and in Great Britain the professional status of the free lance artist is recognized.

First of all I merely want information from the minister as to how far what I have read is accurate. Then I should like to suggest what seems to be a reasonable attitude, but I will wait first of all to hear if that is an accurate statement of the position.

Mr. Abbott: It is a new thought to me. I had not realized that there were special problems of the artistic profession. They would get some relief of course under subsection 3 of this section, where an officer or employee is ordinarily required to carry on his employment away from his employer's place of business and under the contract of employment was required to pay the travelling expenses incurred by him in the performance of the duties of his office or employment.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Does that not refer to an employee?

Mr. Abbott: I am assuming that an actor in a travelling theatrical company would be paid a salary.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): In the cases I am bringing to the minister's attention they are free lance artists.

Mr. Abbott: In that case they are just the same as any other self-employed person. They gross up their income and deduct their expenses just the same as a lawyer, doctor, engineer or anybody else. If they are not on salary, if they are self-employed, they are entitled to deduct expenses wholly and necessarily incurred for the purpose of earning the income.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): How does the minister explain what I understand to be the fact, that these persons are not allowed any business deductions even though they may incur heavy expenses for music, equipment, reference material, travelling expenses and so on? As I understand the minister, those would be the kind of things that could be deducted.

Mr. Abbott: It was brought to our attention that in certain cases musicians, for instance, were required to provide music under the terms of the contract and were required to provide certain other things. Under the amendment that we have here they may be able to deduct these things from their salary. In certain cases if they have to be absent for any reason, and have to provide a replacement, then under the amendment they are entitled to charge whatever they pay for their replacement.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Let me go a little further. These people seem to have been harshly treated. Perhaps they have never had a sympathetic minister to speak to before.

Mr. Abbott: Perhaps they have not had very sound tax advice. I do not know.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): To carry this matter further, people of this kind would have agents' commissions. They might have advertising expense. They would have repairs to musical instruments, and so on. Again, would all these things not be of the kind or nature which might be deducted by a self-employed person?

Mr. Abbott: As my hon. friend knows, mixed questions of fact and law are involved in these cases, and without knowing the precise facts of the individual case it is very difficult to give a definite opinion. The general rule is that a person who is self-employed grosses up what he receives in fees or other remuneration and deducts from that the expenses which he has been obliged to incur to earn that income. Of course they must be wholly and necessarily, and all the rest of it. It is a mixed question of fact and law, and I would find it extremely difficult to give a firm offhand opinion as to what the result would be in a particular case. If my hon. friend will give me the particulars of this case, I will have it carefully looked into. I do not want to give an offhand legal opinion here.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Is the full statement of the law contained in this section? If not, would the minister let me know whether there is anything else that is applicable?

Mr. Abbott: One has to look at the definition of income from office or employment, and then section 11 is the section which outlines the various items that may be deducted from the gross amount.

Mr. Fleming: The class of person to whom the hon. member for Greenwood has referred, namely musicians, actors, radio artists and so on, have a very real problem. The minister may suggest that in the past they may not have had good advice with regard to their tax position, but I may tell him that their position has been taken up with the Department of National Revenue. If I am not mistaken there was a recent decision of the income tax appeal board dealing with expenses sought to be brought into their returns as deductions by persons in this category; and the view that has been taken by the Department of National Revenue as to proper deductions in the case of a musician or free lance artist such as those referred to has been very narrow indeed. If the minister will look into the files of the Department of National Revenue on this subject I think he will find that the interpretation that has been applied to outlays for the purpose of earning income in the case of persons of this category is extremely narrow. After having taken up the case with that department, and having had some correspondence about it, it seems to me such persons have a legitimate grievance. If the provisions of the act at present are so narrow that such persons are denied deductibility in the case of such expenses as have been referred to this afternoon, I think it is high time the act was amended and broadened to meet the legitimate exigencies of such cases.

On section 4—If chief source of income not farming, etc.

Mr. Catherwood: The explanatory note for this section reads:

> The new subsection allows a deduction for one-half the loss incurred in farming, but not to exceed $5,000, where farming is not the chief source of the taxpayer's income.

I presume this is intended to give some compensation to those who might be classed as gentlemen farmers. These citizens are a real asset to agriculture, and have rendered a real service to it. As a matter of interpretation, is depreciation on property allowed on the farm income?

Mr. Abbott: As the hon. member points out, this section is intended to give some measure of relief to those who may be colloquially known as gentlemen farmers, whose principal occupation is not farming. Again this confirms what was a practice over a great many years, during which the income tax branch allowed 50 per cent of the cash losses incurred in this type of farming, secondary income; and by cash losses it meant without charging depreciation. It was a rule which, as it developed, probably was not strictly justified under the act. We had a great many representations that the practice which had existed for many years, I believe going back to the early twenties, should be maintained. It was felt that it would not be appropriate to do so without any limit, because some might run very elaborate farms with very large losses in fancy horses and that sort of thing. Probably it would not be fair to allow such losses without limit, so the present section was inserted fixing a limit of $5,000. This means in effect that on the net cash basis, without allowance for depreciation, a man who has a cash loss of $10,000 will have to stand $5,000 of it himself and the other $5,000 can be deducted from his other income. I agree with my hon. friend that this type of farming has proved beneficial to a great many parts of the country, and we had representations from agricultural associations asking us to maintain the practice which had been followed in previous years. That is the reason for this amendment.

Mr. Fraser: Does subsection 2 mean they can claim back to 1949?

Mr. Abbott: Yes. The previous practice to which I referred went up to 1949, which was the date of the introduction of the new act. We want to make the same practice carry on, so in this case the retroactivity of the legislation is beneficial. It is to carry forward the existing practice.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have ventured on one or two other bills to raise a question concerning legal verbiage, and I am going to do the same thing here. The note on the right-hand side of the page says:

> —where farming is not the chief source of the taxpayer's income.

I think I can understand that, but let me read the wording used to describe that in the act itself. I do not know what I would have thought that meant if it had not been for the clear statement we had from the other side:

> Where a taxpayer's chief source of income for a taxation year is neither farming nor a combination of farming and some other source of income, his income for the year shall be deemed to be not less than his income from all sources other than farming (after application of the rule in subsection (1)) minus—and so on. I do not want to speak in any cheaply critical way of people who have to draft legislation, because I am sure it is very difficult.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend is absolutely right on that point. If he had had any extensive experience along that line, as I expect he has, he would know it only too well.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I accept the rebuke in good part, but perhaps the minister would explain the reason for this rather complicated and hard to understand wording.

Mr. Abbott: This was a very difficult section to draft. It relates to section 13 (2) of the act, which reads:

13. (1) The income of a person for a taxation year shall be deemed to be not less than his income for the year from his chief source of income.

(2) The minister may determine which source of income or sources of income combined is a taxpayer's chief source of income for the purpose of this section.

I am told by the draftsman that it was necessary to make perfectly clear that this section should confer the benefit which was intended upon those who were entitled to it and upon no one else. I have had occasion to say before that I do not know that it is very profitable to engage in an interpretation argument here in the house. I have the greatest confidence in the assistant deputy minister of justice, who was the principal draftsman of this act. It may be that others could make it a bit clearer; things can always be improved, but in my experience I have found his drafting airtight, and that he does express what it is intended to put in the act. Until I am prepared to substitute myself for him I have to rely upon the assertive argument that this drafting is clear in its terms. I might adopt the tactic which I understand was used by the late R. B. Bennett when anyone asked him what a section meant. He would say, "Why, it is as plain as the nose on your face." Then he would read it in a loud, firm voice and say, "Isn't that clear?" and then sit down.

Section 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Medical expenses.

Mr. Fleming: I should like to make one or two observations on this clause.

Obviously this is a step in the right direction, and the minister is to be commended for at last recognizing, even in a limited way, the claims that have been put forward in the house for years that expenditures on necessary drugs should be recognized as a medical expense under section 26. I am not going over all the ground that has been covered in that respect, but I remind the committee of the injustice and discrimination that exists at the present time. Apart from this new and very limited amendment the department rejects any claim for expenditures on drugs and medicines purchased from a qualified dispensing pharmacist. But if the taxpayer happens to reside in the country where his physician does his own dispensing, and the cost of medicines or drugs is normally included in the fee of the physician, the full amount is allowed by the department. This has created a discrimination, not only against taxpayers who are sent by their physicians to pharmacists to get prescriptions filled, but also against the pharmacists themselves.

Of the proposed amendment I have only this to say, that it is commendable as far as it goes. It is regrettable that it selects only three or four drugs for recognition for exemption under section 26, the clause dealing with medical expenses, but I express the hope that since the minister has yielded even to this limited extent, a principle now has been recognized. As time goes on perhaps the minister, to the extent of his opportunities in office, will see to it that the recognition of this proper principle will be enlarged.

Mr. Fraser: As to insulin, I understand that if it is bought in a drug store it is not deductible. Is that right?

Mr. Abbott: No. If it is bought in a drug store with a prescription, it is allowed.

Mr. Fraser: There must be a prescription?

Mr. Abbott: That is correct.

Mr. Fraser: Does the taxpayer have to send a copy of the prescription in with his tax papers?

Mr. Abbott: That is an administrative matter. We have not that information here. I would doubt if he would have to do that.

Mr. Fraser: I just wondered, because insulin is not handled by the doctors; and the people have to go to the drug store.

Mr. Abbott: So I understand. That is why it is put in here; it is realized that it is bought from the drug store.

Mr. Knowles: When we were discussing this item at the resolution stage I raised with the minister the question of further amending section 26, subsection (b) of the Income Tax Act with a view to wiping out that 4 per cent figure in relation to medical expenses. I asked the minister at that time if he had read the remarks I made on this question on April 17 as reported at pages 2131 to 2138 of Hansard. He did me the honour of indicating that he had read that speech. Then he went on to say, as reported at page 3177 of Hansard of May 18, and I quote:

Mr. Abbott: I think I shall have to restrict myself at the moment to saying I shall give further consideration to my hon. friend's representations.

That is good. Then he goes on to say:

One advantage of doing that is that I seem to have to open up this section every year; and with the persistence for which the hon. member is so justly noted I am quite sure he will keep this subject alive until possibly something further is done.

Mr. Knowles: I will.

I am sure that the minister, now that he has met my request for the deductibility of trade union dues, must be wondering what resolution I am going to put on the order paper next year to take the place of that one. I think it would be only fair at this point to let him know what my resolution will be amongst private members' notices of motion next year, for it relates to this matter that is now before us. So that he can be thinking it over between now and the next session, I will give him an advance indication of the wording of my resolution.

Mr. Abbott: Thank you.

Mr. Knowles: It will read as follows:

The following proposed resolution—That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give consideration to the advisability of introducing legislation amending the Income Tax Act so as to permit taxpayers to deduct from their incomes, before computing the amount of income tax to be paid, the aggregate of their medical expenses, as defined in the said act, rather than only that portion in excess of 4 per cent of the taxpayer's income, as is provided in the act as it now stands.

Mr. Abbott: I will be mulling that over.

Mr. Knowles: That is good. If the minister will read again the speech that I made on April 17—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: It is bad enough to have to listen to it.

Mr. Knowles: —and will consider it in the light of this resolution which will be before the house at the next session, I hope when that time comes he will be prepared to agree to the passing of that resolution. If he is not prepared to agree to the passing of it at that time, I will be satisfied with the same result as that obtained this year when a resolution of mine was defeated, but had the support of a sufficient number of Liberals that when the budget came along, my proposal was in it. I hope that something will be done about this matter next year.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): There is a question of construction that I want to raise for the minister's consideration. It may have come to him already. That is, when the basis of an assumed winding-up—

Mr. Abbott: We are on section 6.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am sorry, I thought that section was carried.

Section agreed to.

[Mr. Knowles.]

On section 7—Dividends received by a corporation.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): My question is on section 7. Taking the basis of an assumed winding-up as the basis of distribution, that is all right in the case of preferred and common shares. But it is suggested to me that in the case of class A and class B shares, where you have a priority with regard to dividends but an equity with regard to distribution of capital, the winding-up itself is not universally applicable.

Mr. Abbott: I am informed that this amendment here is to implement a recommendation of the Canadian Tax Foundation which came in last year too late to be included in the budget. It is to take care of cases of preferred shares. We will have to look further at the class A and class B shares. There may be something in what my hon. friend says. I will be glad to look into the matter.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Perhaps I had better say that I understood that this matter of class A and class B shares was the one brought to the minister's attention by the Canadian Tax Foundation. I thought it likely had been brought to the minister's attention.

Mr. Abbott: It is to implement a recommendation or suggestion made by the tax foundation.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): We have an hour or two yet. Would it be possible perhaps to allow this section to stand and to get that point considered. If discussion continues over six o'clock, as it may, will the minister allow the section to stand until this question has been considered? Of course if we are through with everything else—

Mr. Abbott: We adjourn at six o'clock today. If it goes over six o'clock, it goes over till the next sitting.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It is a point we are all equally interested in having dealt with. As I say, if we are through with everything else by six o'clock, I will not ask to let it stand.

Mr. Abbott: Let us leave it on that basis, and I will have it looked into.

Section stands.

Section 8 agreed to.

On section 9—Part payments.

Mr. Fleming: In the provision under section 33A we have an averaging provision at the option of the taxpayer in certain cases with respect to certain types of income, namely payments by way of superannuation or pension fund upon the death, withdrawal or retirement from employment of the employee. That averaging may be for the taxation year and the two years immediately preceding the taxation year. Of course, if averaging is permitted in the case of death, it would have to be with respect to the years preceding the taxation year. But I am thinking of cases where the payment is made not by reason of death but to a taxpayer who is surviving and is, we will say, living in retirement after superannuation. Would it not be much fairer to allow him to do this averaging of these payments made to him, on superannuation or retirement, over the taxation year and the two years succeeding rather than the two years preceding? Presumably in the two years preceding he has been earning his normal income. Then on his retirement in a particular year, he receives his normal income and then receives this additional payment as well. That additional payment is made because of his retirement or because of his superannuation. It seems to me, therefore, that the period to which it is properly applicable is the period after his retirement. In a case of that kind it seems to me not only logical but fair that he should be permitted to do his averaging over the taxation year and the two years following rather than over the taxation year and the two years preceding.

If the minister raises the argument that that procedure may necessitate the reopening of assessments with respect to the taxation year as the taxpayer ascertains his income in each of the two following years, may I say that I am quite sure that that difficulty can be overcome. In this bill we have a provision today to cover just such a case; it is a section which we are coming to shortly. It seems to me that the case I am putting before the minister has logic and fairness behind it.

Mr. Abbott: I will consider the representations that have been made. The present system, of course, was intended to provide an effective rate at the approximate rate at which the deductions were made. That is why we go back instead of forward. It is a very complicated subject, and I would not attempt to analyse and answer my hon. friend's arguments here on the floor of the house, but I will study his representations. I believe that the system we have now is the fairer, but I will be glad to have a look at it.

Mr. Fleming: I am sure everyone is glad to find the principle of averaging in the bill. The principle is perfectly sound, because the payment made in the time to which we were referring is an abnormal payment. It is not referable to the income of that particular year. Therefore, the principle of averaging is sound, and I am sure it commends itself to every member of the house, but the period, it seems to me, ought to be one that takes account of the following years, which are the years during which the abnormal payment is designed to assist the taxpayer.

Section agreed to.

Section 10 agreed to.

On section 11—Rate.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): This is the clause which I mentioned a little while ago, and I hope to persuade the minister that the retroactive feature of it is bad.

When we were considering the retroactive feature in section 2 the minister laid emphasis on the point that nobody was going to be affected by the retroactive feature, and therefore he declined to change it. In this case no such argument can be made. I have a case where a litigant in effect already is, I think without doubt, going to be prejudically affected if this is made retroactive, and therefore I wish to stress very strongly to the minister that the retroactive feature is not necessary unless there is some overwhelming reason for it.

In the second place, I want to question these new words "directly or indirectly." It is pointed out to me first of all that there is a certain judicial definition of the words "direct or indirect control", but no means of finding what direct or indirect ownership means. I want to read to the minister a brief quotation from a judgment of Lord Simonds, which seems to me very relevant. This is a reference to I.R.C. v. J. Bibby and Sons (1945) All England Reports, volume I, page 673:

> Those who by their votes can control the company do not the less control it because they may themselves be amenable to some external control. Theirs is the control, though in the exercise of it they may be guilty of some breach of obligation whether of conscience or of law. It is impossible (an impossibility long recognized in company law) to enter into an investigation whether the registered holder of a share is to any and what extent the beneficial owner.

I suggest to the minister that by putting in these words "directly or indirectly" we are just raising up a whole mountain of complexities and legal difficulties. I wish to underline what I said a moment ago, that in this particular case there is an appeal involved under the section, and in the normal course it would go to the appeal board and then to the exchequer court and the supreme court; but if section 11 is amended and made retroactive it will, without doubt, prejudicially affect the litigant.

I put to the minister two points. I ask him why it is necessary to have this complicating and perplexing addition to the act—the words "directly or indirectly." I think anyone who is familiar with it at all knows how far this may take you and how difficult it may be. Is there some strong reason why it has to be done? Second, why need this be made retroactive when, as I have indicated, it is certainly going to affect prejudicially existing situations?

Mr. Abbott: I will answer the second question first. I would not personally have the slightest objection to having this made effective from 1951 on, but it would not give relief to cases such as the brother in Halifax who had a company and the brother in Vancouver who had another company but could not agree as to who should get the $10,000 exemption. This is intended to be entirely a relieving provision, and is intended to apply from the time we brought in the definition of related companies. But I think my hon. friend will find that if at his insistence I agree to make this 1951 instead of 1949 he may have had one kick from one person, but he will get an awful lot of kicks from others who will be prejudicially affected by not making these relieving provision changes from the time that the definition of related corporations was first introduced in this act. I know that is the case. I do not know of the particular case that my hon. friend has in mind, but this is in itself entirely a relieving provision.

We had a great deal of difficulty with this section to get a definition of what were related companies, and as usual in these cases where we are working out a condition to block a possible loophole, we make the definition pretty tough, and when we see what the circumstances are we relax. This is relaxing this provision.

So far as the words "directly or indirectly" are concerned, I think these words should stay in the act because I do not think a person should get the benefit of this special low rate of tax by in fact having two companies, although in form he has no shareholding in the other. That would be a matter for the income tax appeal board if there was a question to determine as a matter of fact whether in fact he owned directly or indirectly the required percentage of the issued shares.

I feel I must insist that the phrase stay in. It is a fairly common phrase that lawyers know in legal drafting. In the province of Quebec we have a legal phrase that you cannot do indirectly what you are prohibited from doing directly. As I say, this is a relieving section and we are spelling it out in terms in the section. I would urge the committee to consider pretty carefully before they make it effective from 1951 on, and not from 1949 when the definition was first put in.

Section agreed to.

Mr. Fleming: We slipped over section 10 rather quickly. I have a question that I should like to ask, and wonder whether I could ask it now.

Mr. Abbott: Yes, certainly.

Mr. Fleming: Reference is made in section 10 to tax credits. In the amendment you are limiting the tax credit to dividends from a taxable corporation. What would be examples of other corporations than those in respect to which dividends are being paid?

Mr. Abbott: Foreign business corporations.

Mr. Fleming: That is all you have in mind?

Mr. Abbott: Yes, that is right, that sort of case.

On section 12—Defence surtax.

Mr. Abbott: I am afraid I have to intervene here. This is the section which provides for the surtax on corporations, and the amendment which I shall ask one of my colleagues to move in a moment strikes out the provision under which corporations, if certain conditions were fulfilled, would be given relief from the 20 per cent defence surcharge.

The committee will recall that in my budget speech I expressed concern over the fact that the proposed increase in the corporate tax, when considered in conjunction with provincial corporation taxes, could mean that more than half of a corporation's earnings would be taken away in taxes. At that time I made special reference to the position of certain classes of companies, for example, where there is public control of rates and where the companies ordinarily are able to earn only a modest return on capital. With this group particularly in mind I made provision in the income tax resolution for abatement of the 20 per cent surcharge and I quote from the resolution:

> To the extent that it would reduce the corporation's taxable income after payment of ordinary income tax to an amount less than 5 per cent of its capital employed.

Many hon. members who are familiar with the difficult practical problems which arose under our wartime excess profits tax will not, I believe, be surprised to learn of the troubles I have encountered in attempting to work out a definition of "capital employed" for purposes of relief from defence surcharge which, while giving some relief in the directions intended, would not be unsatisfactory from the point of view of its general application to all companies. For several months I have been exploring the results of several formulae put forward not only by officials of the departments concerned but also by businessmen.

I am now forced to confess that up to this time I have not found a solution sufficiently satisfactory to warrant my recommending it to parliament. I have made an honest try but have not been successful. However, I shall give the problem further consideration and study.

I think I might refer back to my general approach to the budgetary problem when my tax proposals were introduced. At that time after reviewing the current uncertainties in the world situation I said:

> In another year's time we should have a clear view of the prospects. I have, therefore, decided not to recommend any major reconstruction of our tax system this year but instead to meet our current requirements by a series of simple but adequate surcharges on several existing taxes and also to widen the coverage of our special excise taxes. I think that over the shorter run this method of defence surcharges will produce the necessary revenue with the least difficulty and inconvenience. If our optimistic hopes are realized it will be easy to reduce these surcharges or to drop them entirely, but I want to add that if it becomes clear that we are in for the long pull at these high levels of expenditure some major changes in the existing tax structure may have to be devised. My tax proposals, therefore, must be regarded as an interim policy for the period of the current year.

I shall therefore ask one of my colleagues to move:

> That subclause (1) of clause 12 be amended by deleting subsections (2) to (5) inclusive of section 37 of The Income Tax Act as set out therein and by substituting the following therefor:
> "(2) In this section, 'tax otherwise payable' means the tax otherwise payable before making any deduction under section 38 or any deduction allowed under any other act from the tax imposed by this part."
> and that clause 12 be further amended by deleting subclauses (3) and (4) thereof.

Mr. Gardiner: I move accordingly.

Mr. Adamson: Then the purport of the new amendment is that the retroactive or safeguarding clause, that the taxation even after the 20 per cent surcharge could not be a sum greater than the capital of the company, has been removed?

Mr. Abbott: It was found in practice, or perhaps I should say I found it, absolutely impossible at this time to work out a satisfactory definition of "capital employed"—because that was the wording. I tried a definition of "capital employed" as contained in the Excess Profits Tax Act during the war, but I found it did not fill the bill at all. As a matter of fact, as the committee will recall, as I said in my statement there was a difficulty in connection with the definition when the board of referees had to give an attributed capital in a great many cases. I came to the conclusion that this just could not be worked out for this situation.

In the bill it is noted that I left it open to try to work out a definition. I found I simply could not evolve a definition which would be fair to all taxpayers. Therefore I am reluctantly forced to drop what I hoped might be a relieving provision.

Mr. Adamson: I am glad the minister agrees that this is a retrograde step, particularly in respect of corporations who are now going to face a difficult year because of the uncertainties of materials, supplies and markets. With the 20 per cent surcharge it seems to me we are going to be faced with corporations running into a level of taxation which is very considerably higher than the minister expected.

I wonder whether through their annual statements or from their balance sheets there could not be some empirical formula worked out to see what the "capital employed" is. It does not have to be paid-up capital, capital represented by bonds or preferred stock or common stock. Surely the annual statement of most companies would give information as to the capital actually employed. I would ask the minister to tell us about that. I realize of course that it is a difficult situation.

Mr. Abbott: I repeat what I said, that I have not been able to evolve a formula, empirical or otherwise, which would be appropriate. A formula which would be appropriate as related to one taxpayer, let us say, would be completely inappropriate for another. I can only assure the house we have looked at the operating results of public utility and other companies and have endeavoured to apply this formula and that formula. All I can say is that for this year I am not prepared to recommend such a measure. Therefore I am forced reluctantly to withdraw the proposal I made. I can only assure the house we will have to look at it again next year.

Mr. Adamson: Then it simply means that the 20 per cent surcharge is a blanket surcharge on all corporations?

Mr. Abbott: All corporation profits, in excess of $10,000, will be subject to the 20 per cent surcharge.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It seems to me not only a very disappointing but also a surprising thing, and also a serious thing. After all, we did have a budget, and the public of Canada was advised about it. Now, without warning to anyone, so far as I know, we suddenly find this change. It is a major change and in some cases will be a very serious change, as proposed.

I suggest to the minister that it is not fair to the committee, or to anybody else for that matter, to do this in the present off-hand way, without warning. I am going to suggest to the minister that it is not impossible to do these things. I am going to ask him whether he has, in fact, called in the sort of people with whom he often does discuss matters when he is preparing his budget. I am wondering whether this particular matter might not be left for a time, and whether the section might not stand. After all, we will be here for some weeks, and I suggest strongly to the minister that we should not have what can be described only as a major change done in this way, without any notice to us or to the public, and without having further time to consider it or, if necessary, to call in other parties interested in it. I do hope the minister will accept that suggestion.

Mr. Abbott: I have spent probably more time in the consideration of this section, since the budget was brought down, than any other, because it is an extremely complicated one. I regret that I cannot change the decision I have announced. It was arrived at after most exhaustive consideration by myself, by officials of my department and officials of the Department of National Revenue, after examination of the operating results of a great many companies, and even after obtaining such information as we could as to the probable operating results of companies which we felt were more particularly affected during the coming year.

I can only say that if we sat here for another two months I would not be prepared to proceed with this proposal. I regret it has not been possible to implement it. I said that in my opening statement.

I have to take the primary responsibility for these things. I have recommended this decision to my colleagues. I have made the announcement only after careful consideration, and with considerable reluctance.

Mr. Fleming: I urge that hon. members should be afforded an opportunity to give to this particular question, on their part, the same degree of careful consideration the minister has given to it, on his part. Before launching into a discussion of the amendment I would ask him if he would be prepared to let it stand. It is now 5.20, and I understand we are to rise, on this bill, at 5.45. It is not probable that we shall finish the discussion on the bill tonight. Therefore we are not asking a great deal when we suggest that this section and the amendment should stand until the next occasion we have the bill before us, so that we shall have an opportunity fully to consider it.

Mr. Abbott: I have not the slightest objection to allowing it to stand. But I wish to make it clear that the decision I have arrived at has not been arrived at hastily. That was arrived at in the light of information which I do not believe would be available, for obvious reasons, to most hon. members of the house.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I just wish to make this other point. Does not the minister think it fair that outside parties, the usual outside parties, should have an opportunity to discuss a matter of this kind?

Mr. Abbott: Whom does my hon. friend mean by "usual"?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If my memory serves me correctly, when the minister was making a major change in the Income Tax Act we were told that it would have to wait a session so that the minister could distribute it to various organizations throughout the country in order to get their views. I am not suggesting that there were any boys in the back room or any sinister communications of any kind. I am suggesting to the minister that in attempting to reach this conclusion he should give an opportunity to those who are competent to discuss these matters to make suggestions. Does not the minister think that that would be fair? This section should not only be allowed to stand, but an opportunity should be given, if it has not been given already, to those parties who are particularly expert in these matters to make submissions to the minister.

Mr. Abbott: A good many of those who are particularly interested in this question have made representations. I have had numerous conferences with them and it was following those conferences that this decision was arrived at. I have no objection to allowing the section to stand.

Mr. Fraser: Can the minister say how much extra revenue he expects to receive?

Mr. Abbott: That was indicated in my budget speech. I do not remember the exact figure, but it will be quite substantial.

Mr. Adamson: Can the minister indicate if any companies have stated how large a percentage of their capital this surtax would amount to in the coming year?

Mr. Abbott: I think some of them estimated the additional tax they would pay if their income reached a certain figure and they were projecting their operating results for another nine or ten months in order to arrive at that conclusion.

Mr. Adamson: Did any of them say that this would mean ten or fifteen per cent of their capital?

Mr. Abbott: It is capital employed, which is a complex definition. Five per cent of capital would not mean much to some of them.

Section stands.

Sections 13 and 14 agreed to.

On section 15—Withholding.

Mr. Fleming: This is the section which requires deductions from salaries or wages or from other payments made to certain classes of taxpayers. As the committee will realize, the regulations have recently been changed, and one of the principal effects is now to require a higher percentage of deduction than has prevailed for some years. The rate of deduction now is so high that it virtually amounts to the payment in advance of 100 per cent of the tax, with the inevitable result that when the taxpayer comes to prepare his T1 return on or before the following April 30 in most cases he will find he has overpaid, and will have to make application for a refund and wait for it. What reason can there be for departing from the percentage which has been established for some years and which appeared to be operating satisfactorily, as far as anything we have heard is concerned?

Mr. Abbott: I understand that the Minister of National Revenue proposes to give the reasons for the changes in the regulations on his estimates.

Mr. Fleming: I think the Minister of National Revenue should be here to make a statement because this is the place where we will have some opportunity to deal with it. We will probably have the estimates of the Minister of National Revenue the last day of the session or the day before when everything is going through at a gallop. This is an important question which affects hundreds of thousands of taxpayers across the country, and I expect it will mean great inconvenience to them through having to make applications for refunds in the following year and then wait for the payment of those refunds. There are going to be many more applications for refunds than there have been hitherto and obviously many taxpayers will have to wait. If the Minister of National Revenue is not available I suggest that this section stand until he is here to make such statement as he intends to make. We would then have an opportunity to examine the statement and analyse the reasons put forward in support of this new policy.

Mr. Abbott: This is an administrative question, but I have no objection to the section standing.

Section stands.

Section 16 agreed to.

On section 17—Tax on income from property transferred between husband and wife or to minors.

Mr. Adamson: I should like the minister to explain this new section. Does it deal only with a gift or transference or has it more far-reaching implications?

Mr. Abbott: I am informed that as the law now stands if a husband transfers property to his wife he becomes liable for income tax in respect of income from that property. If he transferred all his property to his wife he would continue to be liable for income tax on the income from the property but would not have anything out of which the tax could be realized. This section is intended to block up that loophole.

Mr. Adamson: As I understand it, the law as it now stands and before this section is passed would make a husband liable for income tax if he transferred revenue producing property to his wife, that is income tax on the income from that property.

Mr. Abbott: That is correct.

Mr. Adamson: Does this section make the wife liable for the tax on that property?

Mr. Abbott: It is really a collection section; it makes it possible to collect under certain circumstances.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Does it lessen his tax?

Mr. Abbott: There is only the one tax; there are not two taxes.

Mr. Adamson: Under this section a husband could transfer revenue producing property to his wife and be relieved of taxation if he was in the higher bracket.

Mr. Abbott: The tax liability would be determined in respect to the husband's income, but it would be possible to take it from the wife. It is almost like a garnishee in her hands.

Mr. Adamson: If the husband transferred property producing a revenue of $1,000 a year his income would be reduced under this section by $1,000.

Mr. Abbott: No, his income would continue to be $1,000, but if he did not pay the tax on it the department could assess the wife for the amount of the tax.

Mr. Adamson: Let us say that a husband has an income of $10,000 a year and transfers to his wife a piece of property bringing in a revenue of $1,000 per year; then his income would be $9,000 a year. His wife's income increases by $1,000 a year. Is that the import of this?

Mr. Abbott: His income would still be $10,000, but I take it that under the section the minister can assess the wife for the income with respect to that portion of the property which had been transferred to her.

Mr. Adamson: I do not think that answers my question. I do not think it is clear at all. Do you mean that if the husband transfers stocks, bonds, a house, or anything else, to his wife and gets no income from them, he still has to pay income tax on them?

Mr. Abbott: That is correct. That has always been the law. It has been the law for years.

Mr. Graydon: And still you can tax her?

Mr. Abbott: No.

Mr. Graydon: That is what you said.

Mr. Abbott: There cannot be two taxes. I cited the case where the husband transferred all his property to the wife. Under the law as it stood, while the income would be deemed to be in his hands, there would be nothing out of which the department could collect. Under this amendment, while it will still be deemed to be in his hands, they can collect the tax from the wife who has the revenue producing assets.

Mr. Cardiff: Would that not lessen the tax he has to pay by $1,000?

Mr. Abbott: The tax is only paid once. It is not paid twice.

Mr. Cardiff: You cannot collect both from the wife and the husband.

Mr. Abbott: That is correct. The tax is only paid once.

Section agreed to.

Section 18 agreed to.

On section 19—Refunds.

Mr. Fleming: The present section 52, subsection 1, provides for the making of refunds even without an application therefor on the part of the taxpayer. The amendments proposed in section 19 of the bill seem to eliminate the provision that no application need be made for the refund. If you look at the provisions of the proposed new subsection 1 of section 52 you will see that the minister shall make a refund of an overpayment if (a) the return is made within two years from the end of the year, and (b) application in writing for the refund was made by the taxpayer before the expiration of one year, et cetera. You will notice that paragraphs (a) and (b) are cumulative requirements. It seems to me that there is no provision here for the making of a refund apart from application therefor on the part of the taxpayer. Why should that be? I am sure the present section has not worked any injustice against the crown, and I doubt very much if it has worked any administrative hardship on the Department of National Revenue. Therefore why should this limitation be placed upon the scope of the refund provision? It seems to me that from this point of view the present section is infinitely fairer than the proposed new section.

Mr. Abbott: I am informed that if there is an overpayment the assessment notice points that out and says that no application for refund is needed. However, if something else comes up within a year after the assessment then an application in writing for the refund must be made by the taxpayer provided the return of income for the year was made within two years from the end of the year.

Mr. Fleming: That explanation does not cover the whole ground of my objection by any means. I do not know whether the minister followed the point I am trying to make. The proposed new section 52, subsection 1, will completely eliminate any right on the part of the taxpayer to a refund, even if otherwise completely entitled thereto, unless he makes application in writing for it. There are two requirements attached to his right to receive a refund. The first is that he must make his return of income within the stipulated period, and he must make application in writing for the refund. In his explanation it seems to me that the minister has not given any reason for departing from the present rule as found in the present section 52, subsection 1, of the act. Surely in cases of this kind what we want to do is to see that anybody who has overpaid his tax receives his refund, and not to set up more requirements which make it very easy for someone to overlook the fact that he must make his application in writing within the stipulated period. Surely what we wish to do is to see to it that everybody who has overpaid receives his refund with a minimum of administrative obstacles put in his way. If we wish to we can strangle this right by applying a whole lot of requirements with regard to the method by which the application for the refund must be made.

Mr. Abbott: We are standing a number of other sections, and perhaps we might allow this section to stand and I will have a further look at it.

Mr. Fraser: When the minister is looking at that will he ascertain whether, when a taxpayer in making out his income tax form puts at the bottom that he has overpaid so much, that does not constitute his application for refund?

Mr. Abbott: I think that is the whole point.

Mr. Fraser: He puts at the bottom that he has overpaid so much. That is his application.

Mr. Abbott: That is the application.

Section stands.

On section 20—Non-profit corporation.

Mr. Abbott: I have an amendment which I will ask one of my colleagues to move. It is rather long, and relates to these charitable organizations for which we introduced a provision for tax deduction last year. It arises out of representations that have been made to us that certain charitable foundations might not qualify under the law as it stood.

Mr. Gardiner: I move:

That paragraph (eb) set out in subclause (1) of clause 20 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"(eb) a corporation that was constituted exclusively for charitable purposes, no part of whose income was payable to, or was otherwise available for the personal benefit of, any proprietor, member or shareholder thereof, that has not, since June 1, 1950, acquired control of any other corporation and that, during the period,

(i) did not carry on any business,

(ii) had no debts incurred since June 1, 1950, other than obligations arising in respect of salaries, rents and other current operating expenses, and

(iii) except in the case of a corporation that was, before the first day of January, 1940, constituted exclusively for charitable purposes, expended amounts each of which is

(A) an expenditure in respect of charitable activities carried on by the corporation itself,

(B) a gift to an organization in Canada the income of which for the period is exempt from tax under this part by virtue of paragraph (ea), or

(C) a gift to a corporation resident in Canada the income of which for the period is exempt from tax under this part by virtue of this paragraph, and the aggregate of which is not less than 90 per cent of the corporation's income for the period,"

Mr. Abbott: Perhaps this amendment might stand so that hon. members can read it in Hansard. It is a purely technical change in the section as printed in the bill. The change is to cover a particular case that was brought to my attention in connection with the wording. If we can proceed to section 21, there is a short statement I should like to make before we rise and report progress. It will only take two or three minutes.

Section stands.

Mr. Abbott: This section relates to the special method of collecting taxes from the armed forces. I think we had a very helpful and interesting discussion on this subject, not so much with respect to the new tax collection method from the armed forces but with respect to the desirability of exempting armed forces who are serving in theatres of war or abroad from income tax. I outlined the reasons why I felt the system we followed during the last war was not satisfactory. A good many hon. members expressed their views as to what should be done, and I think it fair to say the general feeling was that special consideration should be given to those members of our forces now serving in Korea and who may be serving in other theatres of war. Suggestions were made that there should be a special increased exemption. I put forward the tentative suggestion that it might be covered by combat pay or something of the sort, but in any case I undertook to give the matter further consideration and see what could be done. The giving of a special, additional exemption of course would involve such inequities as would result from the differing incomes of soldiers. The higher ranking personnel would receive the greater benefit from the exemption, and those with private incomes would also receive a greater benefit.

That can be overcome, however, by using the tax credit method. I am going to propose that we give a tax credit of $1 a day or up to $365 a year for members of the armed forces serving outside Canada, which in the present case would be those serving in Korea. A discretion would be given to determine what geographical areas would render personnel eligible for the tax credit. In effect that would provide an additional exemption of up to $1,900 to the lowest paid other rank. In the case of a single officer it would probably extend to a captain, and of course in the case of a married officer it would go very much higher.

It seems to me that has a good deal to commend it. While this is not the governing factor, simplicity and ease of administration from the point of view of the forces of course is important, and the $1 a day device makes it very easy for the paymaster to calculate just how much tax credit a serviceman is entitled to. I think the general feeling was that it should apply only to those serving in foreign theatres, that it should not apply to those at headquarters or those doing garrison duty in Canada.

I will not ask the house to debate this amendment this afternoon, but I was anxious to announce that this is the position we have taken. I hope it will commend itself to hon. members generally, and particularly to those who have had some experience with the forces. I do not say it is generous, perhaps nothing could be too generous in this connection; but I think it is a practical, fair way of recognizing the special contribution being made by these members of our armed forces. I would like the amendment put formally, so hon. members may read it in Hansard.

Mr. Fraser: Will it cover those in the United States?

Mr. Abbott: Perhaps I might read it and then ask my colleague to move it.

That the introductory words of subclause (1) of clause 21 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"21. (1) The said act is further amended by inserting the following heading and sections after section sixty thereof:"

and that the said subclause (1) be further amended by inserting the following section immediately after section 60A of The Income Tax Act as set out therein:

"60B. There shall be deducted from

(a) the tax for the year otherwise payable under this part, and

(b) the tax for a month otherwise payable under section 60A, of a member of the naval, army or air forces of Canada an amount equal to $1 for each day in the year or month, as the case may be, during which he was on duty as a member of the naval, army or air forces of Canada in a zone outside Canada prescribed by a regulation made on the recommendation of the Minister of Finance."

and that subclause (2) of the said clause 21 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"(2) Section sixty A of The Income Tax Act as enacted by subsection one is applicable to the month of July, 1951, and subsequent months and section sixty B of The Income Tax Act as enacted by subsection one is applicable to the 1951 and subsequent taxation years."

It was felt that someone had to take the responsibility for bringing in a regulation determining the geographical area in which this special provision would apply; and since it is a tax credit it seemed appropriate that the Minister of Finance should take that responsibility, and that is the form in which the amendment is prepared. I would ask one of my colleagues to formally move it and it can stand, to be discussed later.

Mr. Gardiner: I move accordingly.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move that the committee rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to and progress reported.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO RACING ASSOCIATIONS CONDUCTING PARI-MUTUEL BETTING

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 357, to amend the Criminal Code (race meetings)—Mr. Gardiner—Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Exceptions.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move:

That subclause (ii) of subsection (d) of section (1) of the bill be withdrawn and the following substituted therefor:

(ii) no more than eight races or dashes, or four heat races of three heats each, shall be held during any twenty-four hour period, and

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

An hon. Member: By leave.

Mr. Gardiner moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull) moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: Tomorrow we will go into supply and consider first the estimates of the Department of Defence Production, and some time during the day we will take up the estimates of trade and commerce. If we should be fortunate enough to pass all those items the Minister of Agriculture will proceed with his estimates.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 5.50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, June 14, 1951

The house met at eleven o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Eighth report of standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.—Mr. Whitman.

Eighth, ninth and tenth reports of standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. Winkler.

PRIVATE BILLS

SUSPENSION OF STANDING ORDER 105

Mr. H. W. Winkler (Lisgar) moved:

That, for the remainder of the session, standing order 105, respecting the posting of private bills, be suspended.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAY ACT

AMENDMENTS ARISING OUT OF REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION ON TRANSPORTATION

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 377, to amend the Railway Act.

Mr. Graydon: Explain.

Mr. Chevrier: This bill, which is to amend the Railway Act, together with the other two which follow, an act to amend the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act, 1933, and an act to amend the Maritime Freight Rates Act, are bills which have been drafted to meet the recommendations of the royal commission on transportation so far as the equalization of freight rates is concerned.

When we reach the second reading stage of these bills I propose to ask my colleague, the Minister of Public Works, to move that the bills be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, with instructions that the committee shall consider the same and report thereon from time to time to the house.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, is it the intention that the standing committee should consider the subject matter of these bills during the present session, or at the fall session?

Mr. Chevrier: The committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines is the master of its own procedure, and will decide what action it will take in connection with the bills.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN NATIONAL—CANADIAN PACIFIC ACT

REPORT TO PARLIAMENT TO GIVE INFORMATION CONCERNING CO-OPERATIVE PROJECTS

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 378, to amend the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act, 1933.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

MARITIME FREIGHT RATES ACT

AMENDMENT AS TO APPLICATION TO WESTBOUND RAIL AND LAKE TRAFFIC

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 379, to amend the Maritime Freight Rates Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT—PUBLICITY AND PUBLIC RELATIONS

Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. How many publicity and public relations employees are in the Post Office Department?
2. What has been the cost, month by month, for publicity and public relations, since the first day of May, 1950, and to date?

Mr. Rinfret:

1. 28.
2.

May, 1950	$ 8,695.96
June	8,824.53
July	11,138.01
August	15,589.33

CROSS POINT, QUE., WHARF

Mr. Courtemanche:

1. Were repairs made to the wharf at Cross Point, Bonaventure county, Quebec, between January 1, and December 31, 1950?
2. If so, was the work done by contract or by day labour?
3. If by contract, what was the amount thereof?
4. Were tenders called for such work?
5. If so, what are the names of those who tendered, and the amount of their respective tenders?

Mr. Fournier (Hull):

1. Yes.

2. By contract.

3. $11,582.25.

4. Yes.

5. Capt. J. Romeo Allard, $11,582.25; J. A. Dufour, $11,753.50; Arthur Bujold and Fortunat Bernard, $12,316.90.

PROVISION OF FEDERAL BUILDINGS IN ST. JOHN'S, NFLD.

Mr. Higgins:

What is the present position with respect to the erection or purchase of a federal public building or buildings in St. John's, Newfoundland?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Negotiations for the acquisition of the sites for the two federal buildings to be erected are still under way. The purchase of the health laboratories building from the provincial government of Newfoundland is completed.

ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL PARKS IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Higgins:

What is the present position with respect to the establishment of a national park or parks in Newfoundland?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Speaker, when the estimates of the Department of Resources and Development were before the committee of supply on Friday, June 8, this question of the status of national parks in Newfoundland was dealt with. I think an answer will be found to the satisfaction of the hon. member at page 3866 of Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Answered.

ERECTION OF STORAGE SHEDS IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Browne (St. John's West):

1. Are storage sheds to be erected in Newfoundland? If so, where?
2. How many are to be erected?
3. What will be the cost of each?

Mr. Fournier (Hull):

1. (a) Yes; (b) Bay of Islands district and Burin district.

2. Two.

3. Not known until plans completed.

[Mr. Rinfret.]

REVENUE FROM SALE OF RADIO LICENCES

Mr. Fair:

1. During each of the calendar years 1945 to 1950, both inclusive, what revenue was derived from the sale of radio licences?
2. During each of said years, what was the cost of collection?

Mr. Benidickson:

(Records are maintained for fiscal years only)

1.	1945-46	$3,964,603.24
	1946-47	4,099,795.14
	1947-48	4,398,495.86
	1948-49	4,670,342.65
	1949-50	4,989,354.33
	1950-51	5,076,997.96
2.	1945-46	231,818.48
	1946-47	237,503.97
	(including $326,695.25 commissions)
	1948-49	611,918.76
	(including $341,982.00 commissions)
	1949-50	637,381.27
	(including $331,652.20 commissions)
	1950-51	657,779.82
	(including $335,693.35 commissions)

HEALTH GRANTS—P.E.I.—LABORATORY SERVICES

Mr. MacNaught:

Has any contribution been made under the national health grants program to the development of laboratory services in the province of Prince Edward Island?

Mr. Martin: Yes. The national health grants program has contributed $54,000 toward the expansion of diagnostic laboratory services in Prince Edward Island.

In order to decentralize the work of the provincial laboratory, branch laboratories have been created in eight hospitals throughout the province and trained technicians have been placed there to carry out medical and public health laboratory work. This organization will provide a much quicker and more reliable service to public health officials, as well as to hospitals.

HEALTH GRANTS—MENTAL ILLNESS RESEARCH

Mr. Rooney:

Has any contribution been made under the national health grants program for research into mental illness in the province of Ontario? If so, what was the amount of such contribution?

Mr. Martin: Yes. Over $150,000 has been made available to the province of Ontario under the national health grants program to carry out nineteen research projects related to mental health. The following are examples of such projects: genetic aspects of psychiatry; biochemistry of central nervous system; physiological changes associated with emotion; electro-encephalographic investigation of psychopathic personality; enzyme studies of cerebrospinal fluid.

ARMED FORCES—SERVICE HOSPITALS—COST OF DRUGS

Mr. Balcom:

What is the average current cost of drugs per diem per man while hospitalized (a) Royal Canadian Navy; (b) Canadian Army; (c) Royal Canadian Air Force?

Mr. Blanchette: The estimated average cost of medical supplies and equipment per man year in the Canadian armed forces is $14.01.

HEALTH GRANTS—VANCOUVER

Mr. MacDougall:

How much has been contributed to the metropolitan health centre of greater Vancouver under the national health grants program?

Mr. Martin: Over $253,000 has been allocated to the metropolitan health committee of greater Vancouver in order to expand its health services. Programs such as the following have been supported: mental health; tuberculosis home care service; community health education; public health education; audiometric testing in schools; public health nursing services; dental hygiene; nutrition services; food and milk control.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

NAVAL PROPERTIES IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Higgins:

1. What is being done with respect to the former Royal Navy and Royal Canadian Navy properties in Newfoundland?

2. Are they to be put back into service? If so, when?

MING SUNG INDUSTRIAL COMPANY—TRADE WITH CHINA

Mr. Pearkes:

1. Are any vessels of the Ming Sung Industrial Company of Canada trading under the Canadian flag with Canadian registration, between Hong Kong, Macao, Canton?

2. If so, what is the nature of their cargoes?

3. Do the officers of these vessels hold Canadian certificates?

4. Do any vessels of the Ming Sung Industrial Company trade under the flag of the People's Republic of China?

Proposed Legislation

FEDERAL DISTRICT COMMISSION

INCREASE IN NUMBER OF MEMBERS—POWER TO CONSTRUCT RAILWAYS, ETC.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Federal District Commission Act, 1927, to increase the number of members of the commission from nineteen to twenty; to provide also that the commission may construct in the national capital district railways and related facilities and, for this purpose, acquire land and real property and enter into agreements with railway companies for the use, maintenance and operation of such railways; and to provide further for the payment of limited grants to the appropriate authorities in municipalities in respect of property situated therein and acquired for inclusion in Gatineau park.

He said: Mr. Speaker, both His Excellency the Governor General and His Excellency the Administrator have been informed of the subject matter of this resolution, and His Excellency the Administrator recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: Very good.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA DAIRY PRODUCTS ACT

ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL STANDARDS—REGULATION OF TRADE

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure repealing parts I and II of the Dairy Industry Act and substituting therefor a new act intituled, the Canada Dairy Products Act, for the purposes of establishing national standards for dairy products and of regulating interprovincial and international trade therein.

Provision is made for the appointment of inspectors, graders and other persons necessary for the administration and enforcement of the act.

He said: His Excellency the Administrator, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

PENSIONS

TUBERCULAR VETERANS—TELEGRAM FROM TRANQUILLE, B.C., WITH RESPECT TO LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, following the question put to me yesterday by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), I had inquiries made and was informed that a telegram purporting to have been sent, collect, from Tranquille, had been brought to the Prime Minister's office, but, in accordance with the general practice of the office, we refused to accept collect charges.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

C. D. HOWE COMPANY LIMITED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers): I should like to ask a question of the Secretary of State. On Friday, May 18, I asked a question about some government contracts. My question is set out at page 10 of the order paper for that day. On Monday, May 21, my question was passed as an order for return. I should like to know when I may expect that return.

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State): I shall make inquiries and endeavour to expedite the return.

HOUSING

QUESTION AS TO FEDERAL PLAN FOR CONSTRUCTION IN DEFENCE AREAS—PRIORITY FOR BUILDING MATERIALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Resources and Development. Is it his intention shortly to announce government policy with respect to a federal plan for the building of houses in defence areas? I notice in the press—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Graydon: —that that was suggested.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): I can only repeat what I have said before, that the whole question of housing is under active consideration by the government, and that any decisions as to policy will be announced as they are arrived at.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): I should like to ask the minister if he is correctly reported in today's press as having said at London yesterday that no priority will be given in respect of building materials in favour of either public or private housing.

Mr. Winters: I have not seen the particular report to which the hon. member refers. What I did say yesterday in London was that no system of priority had been arranged for the program contemplated under section 35 of the National Housing Act.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

CIVIL DEFENCE

REQUIREMENTS OF MUNICIPALITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): May I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare, under whose jurisdiction civil defence now comes, whether the municipalities across Canada have been circularized, or whether there has been communication with them, asking how much money they will require and what equipment they will need in connection with the civil defence plan. I ask this because of his director having said that there is no response from the municipalities.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health): The hon. member knows that the municipalities would report directly to the provincial governments. Municipalities are the creatures of the provinces. I know that such negotiations are now going on.

Mr. Graydon: That is not what your director says.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENCE PRODUCTION

76. Departmental administration and payments to Canadian Commercial Corporation and other corporate agencies for services provided in connection with defence purchasing and production, $5,000,000.

Mr. Green: Is it the intention of the Minister of Defence Production to make a statement?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, I have in mind making a statement of some length. This department has been in existence for only two and a half months and, if the committee will bear with me, I shall give a complete statement on the work of the Department of Defence Production.

Last March, in introducing the bill to establish the Department of Defence Production, I outlined the organization and functions of the proposed new department. I now intend to review what the new department has been doing in the two and a half months we have been in operation. I propose to say a brief word on the organization, and then to refer to some general matters that affect the over-all operations of the department.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, I beg the minister's pardon for interrupting him at this point, but I would ask that the chairman of the committee call order so that we may hear the minister's words.

The Deputy Chairman: I was just about to do so. I thank the hon. member for Peace River for having called attention to the disorder which prevails in several parts of the chamber. We have not yet the benefit of the amplifying system; therefore in order that we may be able to hear the statement which is being made by the Minister of Defence Production, we must have silence in the chamber.

Mr. St. Laurent: And even behind the curtain.

Mr. Howe: The suggestion is that we have silence behind the curtain as well as in the chamber.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Howe: To continue my statement, from then on it will, I think, be convenient to deal with the different programs which we are carrying out in the various divisions of the three main branches of the department: the production, general purchasing and materials branches. I will begin with the organization of the Department of Defence Production.

I have arranged for hon. members to receive copies of the organization chart of the department. I hope this will be of assistance to them in the consideration of the estimates and the work of this department.

When the department was established on April 1 of this year the majority of the staff was recruited from the government service, chiefly from the Department of Trade and Commerce and from the Canadian Commercial Corporation. A number of employees have also been drawn from sections of the government service that have been discontinued or are cutting down on staff, such as the wartime prices and trade board, emergency import control divisions, etc.

As I mentioned last March, we have also recruited men from industry to head up a number of divisions and to provide the technical knowledge that is so essential to the job we are trying to do. You will recall that under the Defence Production Act the minister may make appointments outside the normal procedures of the Civil Service Act. However, relatively few appointments have been made in this manner, and where it has been done, it has been used chiefly to secure specialists from industry; and in most cases these persons are serving without government salary. At the time of its inception there were 871 persons employed in the new department, and three-quarters of them came from the Canadian Commercial Corporation. By June 1 the staff had increased to 1,120. This figure is exclusive of crown companies, such as Defence Construction Limited, Canadian Commercial Corporation as it is now constituted, etc.

In addition to the offices at headquarters in Ottawa, the department has offices in the leading cities of Canada, and also in Washington and London. The department has taken over the district offices formerly operated by the Canadian Commercial Corporation, but in Toronto and Montreal the office accommodation was insufficient to meet the expanded needs of the new department, and other quarters have been leased. Headquarters of the petroleum and machine tools divisions and the wool division of the Canadian Commercial Corporation are located in Toronto; the chemicals and explosives division and the pulp and paper division are in Montreal. Other divisions of the department are also represented in these two cities, and in each case there is an office manager to co-ordinate the administrative work in these two centres. As space was limited in the Canadian embassy in Washington, it was necessary to move the department's office to new quarters on June 1.

In the Washington office we have on-the-spot representatives for the different divisions of the department that have a direct interest in what is happening in the United States priorities field.

To avoid duplication of effort, arrangements have been made to use trade and commerce officers and facilities in London, England, and also at St. John's, Newfoundland, and Vancouver, British Columbia. In each case it was found that the interests of the two departments were sufficiently close to warrant such a course and that it was unnecessary at this time to set up separate offices.

Turning now to some of the problems with which we are dealing, I think I should start with the question that first arises in connection with the wide variety of things that are required by modern armies, navies and air forces. Should these items be produced in Canada, or obtained from other sources of supply? In many cases it has not been easy to arrive at these decisions. A number of factors are involved. As you know, a decision has been taken to adopt United States type equipment for our army. This means, in many instances, that before we can make production decisions we must secure rights to manufacture from the United States, as well as plans, specifications and bills of material. Frequently we must also secure special security clearances for departmental officials or Canadian industrialists to visit plants in the United States in order that they can study special production problems at first hand.

In the beginning we found that the securing of the necessary rights to manufacture, the specifications, and access to production sites was a time-consuming process. Naturally there are reasons why this might be so. The rights of private industry, as well as government proprietary rights, are involved. The security of highly classified material must be adequately safeguarded. I am satisfied, however, that we have now worked out with the United States authorities procedures which will facilitate and accelerate the release of the rights and information which we require.

Another factor is our limited requirement for military end items in certain fields, which does not make it practical to undertake Canadian production if we would only be filling our own orders. In some instances we feel that because of special circumstances our production would be particularly efficient, and in such cases we attempt to interest the United States in our production facilities. According to our agreement on economic co-operation, signed by Canada and the United States last October, we are pledged to utilize the combined production facilities of our two countries to the best possible mutual advantage.

There are, of course, certain cases where, despite limited Canadian requirements and lack of United States orders, we feel that it is important that we initiate production in this country. The reason for such a decision is that we feel that if a war should develop, we would have immediate need of heavy production in certain fields, which could not be brought into being unless we establish a nucleus now. This entails partial tooling up, training key production personnel, and studying new production techniques. In some instances, in order to get better production runs, we have offered to make some of our output available as mutual aid to our NATO allies, financing the production from funds voted by parliament for this purpose. I might add that we do not make such offers unless we are assured by the defence production board of NATO that such supplies would help meet a real deficiency which could not be adequately met from European production. Examples of items which we are now offering to NATO countries from current production include 155 millimetre howitzers and other artillery items, as well as certain radar and other electronic equipment.

So much for the questions involving decisions as to what to produce in this country. When a decision has been made to build a certain type of aircraft or a certain type of ship, certain types of armament or any other complicated piece of equipment, we are faced with establishing the necessary facilities.

In most cases existing plants have to be largely rearranged or new plants built, machine tools have to be purchased and production tooling and setting up expenses incurred. In some cases it is advisable to establish these facilities with capacities greater than our immediate requirements, as a measure of insurance. We have two basic policies that we follow in dealing with these cases. If industry will put up its own money we offer them accelerated depreciation so that they may reduce the value of their investment to a reasonable figure in the event that the facilities are not required for the original purpose and have again to be converted. I might add the obvious fact that, if the facilities are required by the government after they are written down, the government receives the benefit, as the assets can only be depreciated once. If it is not possible to persuade industry to advance its own money on terms satisfactory to the government, we provide the facilities through direct capital assistance, but in that case we retain title to the assets. Sometimes one course seems advisable, sometimes the other, and on rare occasions some combination of the two.

To date we have concluded arrangements for accelerated depreciation in three cases. We have five formal applications under study, and nine or ten others in the early discussion stage. Because so many of these cases have not yet been settled, I cannot give the house much in the line of figures as yet, but the three settled cases involve assets to the value of approximately $1,500,000. The formal applications before us involve assets valued at approximately $20 million.

In capital assistance we have projects in various stages of completion which will ultimately aggregate $107 million, only part of which, however, will be spent in this fiscal year.

One further matter that I might mention in dealing with the estimates is the department's revolving fund. This of course is a statutory vote, and was discussed at some length when the Defence Production Act was being debated. However, because of the importance of this vote, I should like to advise hon. members of the commitments which we have entered into and have financed through the revolving fund. To date a total of $74 million has been allocated from this fund to provide for the purchase, and resale, during the year of textiles, wool, strategic materials, shipbuilding, and ammunition components, to the value of some $250 million.

Mr. Green: That has nothing to do with the money advanced by way of capital assistance?

Mr. Howe: No. These are simply payments which will be recovered later when the finished product is disposed of.

I turn now to the various individual programs. It is perhaps appropriate to start with the aircraft program, because it is the largest. It is in this field that Canada has demonstrated its ability to compete with other countries, and it is in aircraft production that we can make a major contribution, not only to our own defence effort but to that of our allies. The aircraft division has already placed contracts amounting to over $400 million, and a number of programs are well under way.

After spending years in research and development work on the CF-100 jet fighter and its Orenda engine, Avro in Toronto will be in production this fall. Deliveries of this aircraft will depend on how soon the new engine plant under construction at Malton can produce Orenda engines in quantity. In Montreal the F-86 Sabre is now in quantity production, with output limited only by the number of engines and complementary equipment imported from the United States. The Harvard training plane is being built in Fort William, and it is planned to produce its engine, propeller and other components in Canada as well. It is noteworthy that this will be the first time that complete aircraft have been built in this country with all components Canadian made. It is expected that Canada may be able to supply the United States and commonwealth countries with their requirements for this aircraft and its spare parts. As you know, the Canadian Beaver was chosen by the United States authorities in competition with eight United States aircraft manufacturers, and orders have been placed for 109 planes to be used by the United States air force. A further and larger order is expected.

I have just recently received word that Canada will participate in the production of the United States air force twin engine trainer, the Beechcraft T-36A. Negotiations are not yet completed, but plans are also under way to produce in Canada the Lockheed T-33 dual controlled jet trainer.

The division is also engaged in placing orders and arranging for the production of a number of components required by the aircraft industry. Another important phase of its work is the allocation of orders for maintenance and repair of aircraft. For some years it has been the government's policy to allocate this work to various sections of the country in order to ensure that adequate repair and maintenance facilities are strategically located across Canada. At the present time we have repair and overhaul requisitions from the R.C.A.F. amounting to approximately $35 million, with some programs extending over two years.

We now come to the electronics division. This is one field in which Canadian production will make a substantial contribution, not only in producing for our own requirements but also for the requirements of the United States and our NATO allies. A great deal of research has been carried out by the defence research board, the national research council, and industrial research workers as well as universities, and it is hoped that much of this research can be carried through the development field and into the production field in order to meet allied military requirements. It is difficult to describe major electronics projects because of their complexity, variety and interrelation with the aircraft, shipbuilding and other programs.

Our present electronic program for the armed services is already under way and will eventually total more than $400 million. As about one-quarter of the program has been placed with prime contractors, the impact of this work on subcontractors will soon be felt.

A third division is the shipbuilding division. As has been announced, contracts have already been allotted by this division for one icebreaker, fourteen minesweepers, fourteen escort vessels and five gate vessels, as well as a number of harbour craft. It is expected that this program will amount to approximately $200 million.

These are new types of minesweepers and escort vessels of which no prototypes are yet afloat. This means that certain capital assistance is necessary, and that some delays and difficulties at the shipyards may be expected from time to time. Although Canadian shipbuilding costs are somewhat higher than European costs, it has been government policy to maintain key personnel and essential equipment in all our major Canadian yards for strategic reasons. The growth of this program is shown by the employment figures in the shipbuilding industry: October, 1950, 8,440, and April, 1951, 12,147.

In addition, I released a statement last week which referred to the conversion and refitting of thirty-four ships. This is a two-year program, and includes eighteen minesweepers and sixteen frigates. The shipbuilding division is also developing the production of propulsion machinery and auxiliary equipment.

Another division is the ammunition and gun division. The general remarks which I have already made concerning problems in our production program are particularly applicable to the work of this division. Nevertheless some pieces of equipment and kinds of ammunition are now planned for production in this country. For example, 60 millimetre and 81 millimetre mortars of United States design will be manufactured here. These will replace the 2-inch and 3-inch mortars used previously. In addition, the 3·5 inch rocket launcher anti-tank weapon, replacing the Piat as a standard, will be made in Canada. In artillery the American 105 millimetre and 155 millimetre howitzers will now be standard weapons replacing the old 25-pounder and the 5·5 inch howitzer. Both guns will be made at the Sorel plant, which is also engaged in the production of the 3-inch 50 calibre naval gun for the United States and Canada.

Ammunition for the types of small arms and artillery which we have adopted will be produced in Canada. At the moment the bulk of the ammunition and small arms program is being carried out by Canadian Arsenals Limited, and the howitzers and naval guns are being made at Sorel.

Yet another division is the mechanical transport division. The present program in mechanical transport is small relative to our contribution to allied requirements during world war II. On April 27 I released a statement in which I advised that preparations were being made for the partial manufacture and complete assembly of 456 three-quarter ton military trucks and 780 two-and-a-half ton military trucks by Chrysler Corporation of Canada Limited and General Motors of Canada Limited, respectively. I pointed out at that time that full tooling and production to meet the limited requirements of the three Canadian services is out of the question at present.

The possibility of securing United States orders for our Canadian factories was carefully examined but there is excess capacity in that country for producing these types of vehicles. Nevertheless we were satisfied that some production must be undertaken in Canada in order to encourage the production of components in this country and to ensure the highest possible Canadian content in these vehicles. It is also important to make arrangements for some tooling up in Canadian plants and to give Canadian industry an opportunity to become familiar with these types of vehicles. Since my announcement the Ford Motor Company of Canada has been studying the possibility of Canadian production of the one-quarter ton four by four jeep. It is expected that these engineering studies will be completed very shortly.

The machine tools division has been established to ensure that there is available to every production project, such as the manufacture of aircraft, radar, guns and ammunition, shipping, etc., an adequate supply of machine tools and the necessary allied equipment. This division has started on a three-year, $40 million machine tool purchasing program. Of this amount, it is estimated that $12 million will be spent in Canada, $4 million in the United Kingdom, and $24 million in the United States. In addition, an attempt is being made to rationalize the Canadian machine tools industry in order to achieve an increase in output and efficiency by having certain plants concentrate on the production of specific sizes and types of machines. In this way we avoid duplication of effort and at the same time achieve manufacturing economies.

Defence Construction Limited, which is a crown company set up as part of the production branch, is responsible for construction required by our armed forces. By the end of May, Defence Construction Limited was administering contracts with a total value of $110 million, of which $44 million worth were taken over from the Canadian Commercial Corporation. Defence construction requirements have increased sharply in recent months, and the present rate of contract awards exceeds $4 million per week. It is estimated that by the end of the current fiscal year Defence Construction Limited will have under administration over $200 million in construction contracts. Such an extensive program is making heavy demands on critically short materials, particularly reinforcing steel.

The last division of the production branch is the small industries division. Briefly, the functions of this division are to gather and distribute information on contracts so that subcontractors can get in touch with the prime contracting firms quickly for possible orders; second, to inform prime contractors of available industrial capacities as needed; and third, to act as a representative in Ottawa of small industry across Canada for whatever problems may arise in its dealings with the defence production department. In order to ensure close liaison with small industry, it is planned that this division will have representatives in the department's offices in Toronto and Montreal. The division will have special maritime and prairie province liaison officers on its staff in Ottawa, with the understanding that these individuals will spend considerable time in their respective territories. It is also planned to work closely with industry in British Columbia and Newfoundland through the Department of Trade and Commerce offices in Vancouver and St. John's. We are anxious to see that every section of Canada, and small industry as well as large, has an opportunity to participate in our defence production program.

An hon. Member: Saskatchewan, too?

Mr. Howe: Well, we do not buy much wheat in New Brunswick and we do not buy many munitions in Saskatchewan.

Another main unit of the department is the general purchasing branch which is carrying on most of the work of the former Canadian Commercial Corporation. It is responsible for purchasing all the defence supplies outside the field of those for which production divisions have been created. These cover a wide range of commodities and include such things as hardware, barrack stores, fuel, photographic equipment, medical supplies, food, petroleum products, etc. The branch also places contracts for repair and maintenance work on national defence property.

One of the largest programs being handled by the general purchasing branch is in the clothing and textile field. It is expected that about $150 million will be spent on uniforms, blankets, boots and other items needed by the armed forces in the current fiscal year. Because of the size of this program the government, after consultation with the textile industry, decided to proceed with the orderly placing of contracts for about half of the woollen textile requirements. To ensure sufficient wool to meet this volume of orders before the fall sales open in Australia and New Zealand, the wool division of the Canadian Commercial Corporation has already ordered 7,100,000 pounds of raw wool and tops. This in turn will be sold to mills manufacturing fabrics and blankets for military use. In this way it is hoped that there will be no undue disruption of civilian requirements in the textile field, and at the same time the defence program can move ahead in an orderly fashion. In the case of cotton goods, industrial demands are heavy, and as Canadian mills are finding it difficult to fill all our defence needs a good deal of yardage will have to be purchased outside Canada if we are to avoid heavy impingement on the civilian market. Synthetics are being incorporated into cotton and woollen fabrics with excellent results, and this is particularly useful in view of present shortages and high prices of natural fibres.

The majority of contracts awarded by the general purchasing branch are placed as a result of competitive tenders. In certain cases, however, contracts placed by the branch have been allocated throughout industry. This has usually been done because of delivery requirements and the quantities needed, and to make sure we were not placing too heavy a burden on a limited number of manufacturers. For instance, orders are being placed for one million pairs of military footwear with firms located throughout Canada, in order to make the best use of open capacity. Many supplies are bought and services contracted for in the area where the armed forces are located, and purchases of these items have been made from coast to coast by district purchasing offices.

The suggestion has been made recently that there is something unfair about the way in which defence contracts are being awarded to the different provinces; and I refer especially to our friend from Moose Jaw. For example, it is claimed that Saskatchewan is not getting its reasonable share of the defence program. Before commenting on this, I would like to emphasize the fact that capacity for making defence goods is not spread evenly over the country. Modern weapons are made in specialized factories by skilled workers, and it is a basic fact that the bulk of Canada's potential for making munitions is in Ontario and Quebec. It is not necessary for me to dwell on the economic influences which have brought this about, but the fact remains. It is true that the volume of defence contracts for such things as aircraft, military vehicles, weapons, ammunition and electronics will be relatively small outside the central provinces.

However, when other military purchases are examined the provincial distribution seems to be quite reasonable. Not counting the items just mentioned, the prairie provinces got defence contracts in the last fiscal year amounting to about $25 million, or nearly 13 per cent of total contracts let in Canada for these items. When account is taken of the fact that the net value of manufacturing in the prairie provinces was only about six per cent of the total in the latest year for which figures are available, the prairies appear to have done rather well.

Particular reference has been made to the lack of defence contracts in Saskatchewan, and I want to outline some recent developments to correct the mistaken impression that Saskatchewan is being left out of the defence program.

In the month of April of this year, defence orders worth nearly half a million dollars were placed by the Department of Defence Production in Saskatchewan. In May, Defence Construction Limited awarded contracts for over $4 million for work in Saskatchewan, and there are other defence contracts which are now being tabulated. Mention should also be made of the expenditures in this fiscal year by the Department of Transport on behalf of the Department of National Defence for landing strips and runways in Saskatchewan.

It is planned to spend $965,000 for military landing strips and runways, and another $440,000 for similar civilian facilities. Such direct government expenditures do not fully reflect the impact of the defence program on Saskatchewan. For example, Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited plans to spend about $2 million this year on uranium production in Saskatchewan. This is not a part of the government's defence vote, but it is a defence expenditure which will contribute substantially to employment and income in that province.

Before concluding my references to the general purchasing branch, I should just like to say a few words about the Canadian Commercial Corporation. As I mentioned at the beginning, most of the personnel of the old Canadian Commercial Corporation has been absorbed into the department proper. However, the government has decided that it would be useful to maintain the corporate entity of Canadian Commercial Corporation, although its staff has been reduced to approximately twenty-five. The main task of the Canadian Commercial Corporation, as now organized, is to act as a purchasing agent for foreign governments securing supplies in Canada. It will also be used by the government for the purchase of strategic and other materials for stockpile.

One of the most vexing problems facing us today is the over-all shortage of strategic materials. Before referring to what we are doing in this field in Canada, I might mention some of the international studies that have been made or are being made.

For some months the organization for European economic co-operation has been devoting considerable time to this question, as has the North Atlantic treaty organization. There have been special rubber and tin conferences, and at the last meeting of the commonwealth prime ministers it was agreed to extend the terms of reference of the commonwealth liaison committee so that this group could keep the special commonwealth aspects of the raw material situation under review. I might explain that the commonwealth liaison committee is a standing committee composed of all the commonwealth high commissioners in London, and includes senior representatives of the appropriate United Kingdom ministries.

[Mr. Howe.]

However, the most important work currently being carried out in the materials field is being done in Washington by the international materials conference. This conference is organized into a central group with a number of commodity committees. The central group's main responsibility is to select the commodities that are to be studied, and to invite the countries which are the principal producers and consumers of the selected commodities to establish commodity committees. The central group includes Canada, the United States, the United Kingdom, France, India, Italy, Brazil, Australia, and a representative from the OEEC and a representative from the organization of American states. To date, the central group has established the following commodity committees: wool; cotton; sulphur; tungsten and molybdenum; manganese, nickel and cobalt; copper, lead and zinc; and pulp and paper. All these committees have similar terms of reference, and, in general, these are: (1) to establish as accurately as possible the supply and demand position; (2) to encourage increased production; (3) to stimulate conservation and substitution wherever possible; (4) if it is apparent that there is an inevitable gap between available supplies and essential requirements, to recommend reallocations of supplies. It should be noted that these committees have authority only to recommend redistribution of supplies to governments.

The work of the international materials conference is for the most part in its early stages. They have made only one recommendation, which was that North America ship 3,000 tons of newsprint to France. However, I shall say more about that later.

As a country which is one of the most important exporters of many strategic materials and a significant importer of others, Canada has been active in nearly all the commodity committees. Because North America controls a large share of the free world supplies of scarce materials, I welcomed a statement released on May 29 by United States defence mobilization director Charles E. Wilson, in which he outlined a set of priority principles designed to assure supplies of scarce materials to the United States and her allies. I say I welcomed this statement because it is one in which we can readily concur. It is completely in line with the instructions which we have been giving our representatives on the international materials conference for the last few months. In his statement on guides to be followed in allocating resources devoted to foreign needs, Mr. Wilson stated in part:

When there are competing requirements of similar high essentiality in terms of over-all objective, allocations policy should attempt to satisfy such requirements according to the degree to which they will contribute to the following results:

(a) military production of the free world, and direct support for the expansion or improvement thereof;

(b) promotion of increased supplies of all materials essential to strengthening the free world, and in particular the production and acquisition of those materials required for the current mobilization effort;

(c) maintenance and necessary expansion of essential services and production facilities, and maintenance of minimum essential civilian consumption requirements in the free nations, and in areas which they control.

Mr. Wilson went on to say:

Allocations form part of a wider give-and-take among the free nations. Among the countries sharing in such allocations the principles of self-help, mutual aid, and similarly effective application of internal policies governing the allocation and use of scarce materials should prevail.

After requirements of high essentiality have been met, the inter-country allocation of remaining supplies should take into account the effects upon the respective civilian economies of the broad contribution of each area or country toward common defence, in direct military production or in increased political and economic strength, including the common aid of controlling inflation of world prices. Individual countries differ widely in their ability to make such contributions; the objective should be to bring about an equitable distribution of the resulting burdens and sacrifices. This objective clearly excludes any mechanical formula, or any mere levelling down to a uniform standard of lowered consumption.

The foregoing principle is admittedly difficult to apply, since standards of consumption in different areas of the world are determined by a complexity of factors, such as normal levels of real incomes, customs, cultures and climate. But its application is of high importance for the attainment of the over-all objective of economic strength and morale in the free countries.

To return to the Canadian scene, I think the most orderly way to discuss our materials situation would be to review the work of the materials branch. The problem of short supply in relation to rising Canadian and world demand affects the work of the six divisions of the materials branch.

In the steel division the task is twofold: to facilitate increased supplies, and to make sure that preference is given to essential requirements. This year, as a result of a rise in production and an increase in imports, we have had more steel in Canada than we had last year. But the demands of Canadian users have increased much more sharply, with the result that we still have a tight supply situation. While the expansion plans of the Canadian steel industry are an encouraging part of the picture, we shall still have to obtain substantial quantities of steel from outside sources to meet our own defence needs. An important task assumed by the steel division is to demonstrate these needs to the United States authorities in order to have steel released to Canada.

In order to ensure the best possible distribution of the steel that is available in this country, limitation orders have been placed on certain non-essential types of construction. Last January the supply of steel for certain types of less essential building was restricted, and these restrictions were extended to additional types of buildings in March. In recent months the requirements of steel for defence projects have increased sharply, and we are now faced with a critical situation with respect to supplies of reinforcing steel, plates and structural steel. It has, in fact, been necessary to direct Canadian mills to defer shipments of less urgent projects. In co-operation with the priorities division every effort has been made to obtain increased supplies from the United States. I am pleased to be able to tell you that our representations have been well received in Washington. However, in spite of this, defence requirements are so large there will be only limited quantities of steel available during the next few months for projects that are not closely related to the defence effort.

The non-ferrous metals division has also been faced with the problem of increasing production and making sure that defence needs receive first claim on materials in short supply. In the case of some of the more common metals produced in Canada—copper, lead, zinc, nickel and aluminum—expansion of production by the industry has enabled us to meet essential demand in this country, and at the same time, keep up our exports to our traditional customers. Special steps have been taken to increase our own supplies of some of the less common metals, and I thought that hon. members might be interested in some of these measures.

In the case of tungsten, the government is erecting a 230-ton mill at the Emerald property in British Columbia which should be in production late this year. Under contract for export to the United Kingdom, the Red Rose property, also in British Columbia, is being put into production by the owners.

Mr. Green: Tungsten?

Mr. Howe: Yes. In addition, the Hollinger mine, and possibly some of the other gold operations, are planning to undertake the recovery of scheelite, one of the tungsten ores, in order to supplement supplies obtained from the United States. Every effort is being made to obtain our requirements of molybdenum from traditional sources in the United States. However, impending shortages have resulted in further restrictions on United States consumers, which will have a corresponding effect in Canada. To meet this situation, negotiations are now under way to reopen the La Corne mine in Quebec which was a producer during the last war.

In the case of cobalt, an incentive price schedule was announced last February, and the Deloro Smelting and Refining Company was appointed as the government's buying agent under this bonus price plan. The company's smelter facilities will be used to convert into metal the ores and concentrates purchased under the plan. I might say that this plan is producing results.

As a further step in increasing our supplies of essential materials, stocks of tin and antimony were purchased some months ago, and further purchases are now under consideration. Arrangements have also been made to obtain quartz crystals from Brazil, and steps are being taken to explore a Canadian source of this scarce material. Reasonably good stocks of manganese and chrome ore are being maintained by the Canadian consumers of these minerals.

A long list of metals and minerals has been declared essential under the Defence Production Act. The informal "producer ration" system that was in effect earlier in the year has now been replaced by an "order-approval" system for such metals as nickel, copper and aluminum. Similar orders covering lead, zinc and cadmium will be issued shortly. Through these orders we hope to regulate the rate of metal consumption for commercial purposes in order to support our expanding defence program. The operation of these orders will also prevent surplus buying to build up abnormal inventories. This "order-approval" system was very effective in the last war. Because of its flexibility, we feel we will be in a much better position to meet changes in over-all supply and demand, and in the United States priorities picture, than we would be if a more rigid system were adopted.

In the chemicals division, efforts are being made to assist industry with some of its supply problems and in arranging the mechanics of handling Canadian requirements for chemicals and chemical equipment to be secured in the United States. As a first step, a number of chemicals were placed on the essential list under the Defence Production Act. So far, it has been possible to work out satisfactory arrangements without formal control. However, in view of proposed international allocations, it will be necessary to place sulphur under control in the near future.

[Mr. Howe.]

The continuing shortage of sulphur is a problem that is not confined to Canada, and, as part of our contribution to the over-all situation, every effort is being made to reduce our dependence upon the United States sources of elemental sulphur. Plant expansion has been approved to increase production of sulphuric acid in this country, as well as new capacity to produce elemental sulphur from natural gas in Alberta and liquid sulphur dioxide from the operations at Copper Cliff. Studies are also being made to increase our production from smelter gases and pyrites.

Expansion is taking place in other parts of Canada's heavy chemical industry, and many new chemical processes are being planned in this country for the first time, including the manufacture of nylon intermediates, polyethylene for plastic and electrical insulation, cortisone, and important new petrochemicals, the latter in Alberta. Altogether, priority assistance has been given for expansion amounting to more than $150 million.

On the supply side, arrangements have been made with the United States for the allocation of chemicals to Canada, with distribution to be made where necessary under the direction of the chemicals division.

The development of the oil resources of Canada has assumed new importance with our defence program placing increasing demands on available supplies. The petroleum division is doing everything possible to increase our own production and to work out with the United States authorities a satisfactory distribution of North American supplies. Since the division has been in operation, a survey has been made of tubular steel requirements in this country and a system of allocation set up to fit in with United States procedures. Canada was granted an allotment of 13,000 tons of steel for the oil industry for the third quarter of 1951, and distribution of this will be supervised through the Calgary office. A system of reserve supply depots, and the method of withdrawal from these depots, have now been established and will go into operation on July 1.

The division has also worked out, in co-operation with the United States authorities, a system of allocation of tetraethyl lead to Canadian refiners in order to conserve supplies and build up inventory. In addition to a number of surveys on the supply and consumption of certain petroleum products, the division has given assistance to the industry in obtaining materials for urgent projects already under way.

Some weeks after the department was in operation it was decided to establish a pulp and paper division. The main reason for this move was the likelihood of some international allocations being recommended by the international materials conference.

The pulp and paper committee of this conference has now recommended one allocation of newsprint to France and it is possible that there will be others during the next few months. I think that no one will quarrel with the desirability of North America assuring that our allies have at least minimum amounts of newsprint available in order to combat the claims of communism. It seems that in the free countries where communism is the greatest threat, the communist papers in one way or another get newsprint. It is important that we ensure that the free press of these countries also secure supplies.

As I mentioned, the international materials conference has recommended an emergency allocation of 3,000 tons of newsprint to France, 2,500 tons of which is to be supplied by Canada. I have, under the powers granted me by the Defence Production Act, instructed the director of the pulp and paper division to make an equitable levy on all Canadian newsprint producers for the purpose of providing the aforesaid 2,500 tons of newsprint. This purchase will be made by the Canadian Commercial Corporation, on behalf of France, at prices not inconsistent with contract prices prevailing in North America, but having regard to any additional costs involved in this transaction.

I do not believe that it will be necessary to divert a large tonnage of newsprint from North America in order to satisfy these emergency requirements, but with our mills already over-committed it is obvious that North American users, who are by far the heaviest consumers of newsprint, must expect some cutback in order to provide this tonnage. Every precaution will be taken to requisition in such a way as to minimize the impact on producers and consumers in this country.

I have left the priorities division to the last because so much of its work cuts across that of other divisions in the department. One of the major tasks of the priorities division has been to see that Canadian requirements on the United States economy are fully recognized when it comes to the allocating of materials, components, and productive capacity by the United States authorities. So far, the single band "defence order" priority rating system has been used in that country, and its use has been extended to include defence-supporting and essential civilian requirements in addition to defence contracts. This has placed undue pressure on the defence order system, and plans are being made in the United States to introduce a controlled materials plan to regulate material requirements in a more equitable manner. There has been a good deal of delay and uncertainty about the controlled materials plan in the last few weeks, but I would like to say at this time that Canadian officials have done everything possible to try to minimize the effect of this on Canadian industry.

Some of the difficulties have arisen from the fact that decisions on policy implementation and operations have not been forthcoming from the United States national production authority in sufficient time to meet the original plans, and a great deal of confusion at the industry level has ensued. Canadian firms have been subjected to misinformed requests from their supplying firms south of the border. A number of stop-gap methods have been employed in national production authority to avoid dislocations in important defence supporting industries, and in general we have been successful in arranging for parallel measures to be applied to the corresponding Canadian industries in respect to their United States supplies. For example, there is conflicting advice as to what steps will be taken in connection with the truck manufacturing industry in the United States. The necessary information has been obtained from the Canadian automotive industry, so that their priority interests can be protected quickly, no matter which way the situation moves in the United States.

During this unsettled period, it has been most difficult to put in final readiness the rather comprehensive administrative procedures which will be necessary, assuming that controlled materials plan comes into full operation in the United States. It would seem most inadvisable to put any method of operation before Canadian industry until such time as we can be sure that it affords at least a relatively satisfactory short-run basis of operation.

My colleague, the Minister of National Defence, has described in some detail the program of the armed services. It is the role of the Department of Defence Production to ensure that the armed services have the equipment and supplies that they require. In the remarks which I have just made, I have indicated how the department is organized to procure these supplies. I have referred to the three main branches of the department and to their various programs. I have touched briefly on our activities in the international field. I have mentioned some of the inducements which we are using to encourage production in Canada of articles or commodities that are needed for the defence program. I have said previously in this house, and in other public statements, that I am satisfied that we can fulfil the program on schedule. I have admitted that we could not carry out this task without the complete co-operation of Canadian industry, but that is a co-operation which we have enjoyed in the past, and I have no doubts as to the role that Canadian industry will play in the future.

There is another important element in the defence production program, and that is manpower. We have a tight manpower situation. As civilian producers, with exceptionally heavy stocks, run into consumer resistance, they may find it necessary to cut back staff. I am satisfied, however, that such personnel will be absorbed quickly into defence or defence-supporting industries. There will be minor dislocations, but I am satisfied that there is sufficient labour of the right kind in Canada to support our defence program as well as a flourishing civilian economy.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I feel sure all hon. members will welcome the minister's comprehensive review of the organization of this new department, and the plans it has under way for the expansion of our necessary defence production. In effect, the extensive and complete analysis by the minister of the work of his department constitutes what might ordinarily be described as a white paper on that subject.

Quite apart from any discussion we may have later in regard to details, the review is one which places clearly before us and before the people of Canada the general organization of the department and the nature of the activities that are being undertaken. I am satisfied that all hon. members—at least I hope they will—agree with the minister as to the capacity and the ability of our industrial organization, both at the management and the workers level to meet the production demands which are being set as the target of the plans of this department.

The minister has explained the concentration of production in the two central provinces. He has indicated that to a certain extent this is made necessary by the experienced management and technical skills possessed by the workers themselves, which have been built up over many years, and that it is necessary to make use of those skills. On the other hand I would point out that much of the production will be in completely new lines. I can understand the necessity for using existing skills in relation to production which is already under way. But in new types of production every effort should be made to decentralize that production and to locate the new plants in those parts of Canada which up to the present have not been called upon to accept the responsibility for any substantial part of our defence production.

I believe there is a reason for that which goes beyond either the desirability of decentralization as a principle in itself, or the very reasonable request that is made by the provinces to the east and the west of the central provinces that they have a share of the employment and production which is paid for out of the common funds raised by taxation from all the people of Canada. That additional reason, I suggest, is very important.

Unless there is decentralization it becomes necessary for many people to move from the maritime provinces or the western provinces to central Canada simply because of the expanded requirements for employment in those areas. That means, first of all, the movement of people, under the compulsion of employment, to places other than the communities in which they have lived and in which their intimate associations have been established.

What is still more important is that in a great many instances it means the necessity of leaving the homes they have built up in those communities which they have chosen as the communities in which they wish to live. This being so, I think it will be to the advantage of Canada, and add to the satisfaction of the people and to the generally favourable employment conditions of the workers, if, so far as possible, new production should be moved to the locations in which the workers are living rather than to new locations of employment.

I repeat that I recognize the weight of the argument that in some types of production, where long-established skill is necessary, it follows naturally that there must be an expansion of existing production. On the other hand, in relation to all new types of production every effort should be made to establish plants in Newfoundland, the maritimes and the western provinces, knowing as we do the ability of our people to adapt themselves to new undertakings.

After all, we learned during the last war that people from every part of Canada had an extraordinary capacity to adapt themselves to new skills and new types of production. We had never made anything like radar before in this country, and yet our radar equipment, manufactured not only by people native to the central provinces but also by people from other parts of Canada who came to those central provinces, became recognized as the equal of any radar equipment made anywhere else in the world. I mention radar because undoubtedly in the field of electronics as well as in the field of general production it calls for as high a measure of skill as could ever be required.

Since men from the maritimes and western Canada were able suddenly to adapt themselves to this type of work in plants in central Canada, we are faced with conclusive evidence that if plants were located in the maritimes and the west they would be able to develop the same type of skill with the same speed as was shown previously.

The minister has referred to the efforts that are being made to obtain general co-operation from those who will be responsible for our production. He has indicated, and I have expressed my own hope that all members will agree, that there will be no doubt about the wholehearted co-operation of all Canadians in any steps that are made necessary by the emergency which we face. There can be no doubt that Canadians will accept any challenge that may arise, so long as that challenge is presented to them in clear and understandable terms which will indicate the necessity for whatever they are called upon to do.

I intend later to join in some of the questions which will be asked about the different aspects of defence production, but I wish now to deal with a subject which I believe is of major and compelling importance; and it relates to the announcement just made by the Minister of Defence Production. The minister has spoken of our skill, existing and potential. He has spoken of our tremendous industrial capacity, existing and potential. Our skill and the skill of other industrial nations throughout the free world is going to depend, not only upon our ability to produce and the plans that are made for production, but also very largely upon how far we achieve real co-operation between those nations in the types of production which they carry out.

Shortly after the end of world war II many of us had high hopes that the lessons of that war in regard to the importance of the standardization of equipment, particularly of the calibre of weapons, would be accepted, and that we would not again have the confusion and waste, or even worse, which can result, and in many cases which did result, from non-standardization among armed forces which were working in closest co-operation with each other. Many statements were made which caused the people of the free world to believe that decisions had been made to go ahead with effective standardization. Sometimes the importance of the standardization of the calibre of weapons, even more than of the types of weapons, is hardly recognized in the general discussion of this subject of international co-operation.

Important as it is from this point of view that standardized weapons be used by armed forces which are called upon to work together in the very closest co-operation, there are other considerations which are even more important. In the first place, if we have different types of weapons and different calibres of weapons employing different types of ammunition, obviously the men who will be called upon to stand side by side in the defence of freedom will require different books of instructions to tell them how to carry out the duties they are to perform in such close physical association. But there is something infinitely more important than that. If we have different types of weapons that in itself creates supply problems, creates difficulties in instruction, and in the end possibly difficulties in drill itself. If we have similar calibres of rifles, machine guns, mortars, rocket launching weapons, guns for aircraft, guns for ships, artillery pieces, and so on, we shall be able to have standardized production of ammunition.

This is tremendously important, because in the end it is the ammunition that does the job. The weapon is merely a device by which the ammunition is projected to the points to which the whole military plan calls for its application. Each weapon, whether it be rifle, machine gun, mortar, rocket launcher or artillery piece, is like a huge tap through which, once it is put into active operation, a flow of ammunition continues to flow in enormous quantities. The moment we accept the proposition that we are not going to have similar types of weapons, we accept also the fact that we must have different types of ammunition, with resulting supply problems in handling the ammunition requirements of the forces that are working together in a common cause.

I raise this question today because of a discussion which took place yesterday in the House of Commons in Great Britain. It was indicated definitely by the British Minister of Defence that their government has made a decision to proceed with the manufacture of rifles and small arms of a different calibre from that which the United States is to produce. The Minister of Defence Production has indicated this morning that it is the intention of the Canadian government to proceed with the production of small arms and other weapons of the same calibre, and I assume of the same type in most cases, as are being used by the United States armed forces.

I am not questioning the necessity for such a decision. The main thing is there must be a decision to produce equipment which can be used most effectively by the forces engaged in a common defence effort which we all still earnestly hope will preserve peace where it exists and restore it in those areas where there is now real war. The hope of peace—and our thoughts should be concentrated on that reason for what we are doing—largely depends upon the effectiveness and efficiency of the efforts that are made, not by Canada alone, not by the United States alone, not by Great Britain alone, not by France alone or by any other country acting alone, but by all the free nations working together to put the skill and the vitality of the energy of their people to work in one common cause in such a way as to produce the best results. The thing which will be most likely to deter the men of the Kremlin from any aggressive act which would precipitate another holocaust on the scale of a world war is the knowledge that all the immense skill and productive capacity which they envy, and which they fear as much as and perhaps more than the atom bomb, is being put to work to achieve the greatest possible result. Failure to standardize weapons will in itself be something very encouraging to the men of the Kremlin.

It is not our right, and it is certainly not our duty, to criticize the action of any other government with respect to the domestic affairs of the country in which that government has its responsibility. But when it has to do with matters in which we have a common interest, then I submit we not only have the right but the duty to say what we think should be done to achieve the best results in the common cause in which we are engaged. I do not think it is necessary at this stage for us to determine who is or is not to blame. What we are confronted with is the real and alarming fact that a dangerous, frustrating and possibly disastrous decision appears to have been made. It is not only the right but the duty of hon. members of this house, as well as members of the British House of Commons or of the congress of the United States, to indicate in the clearest possible terms what they think will best contribute to the combined strength of those nations which are associated in one of the greatest causes in which they have ever been jointly engaged.

It is not too late for those decisions to be changed. It is not yet too late for the governments of the United States, the United Kingdom, and all the Atlantic powers, as well as the powers generally associated in the United Nations, to meet and discuss this vitally important subject, because production is not yet far advanced in these new types of weapons. According to a Reuters dispatch appearing in the press of Canada today, in answer to a definite question the Minister of Defence, Mr. Shinwell, definitely stated in the British House of Commons that the British government has made up its mind to produce small arms—rifles and machine guns —of ·280 calibre as soon as possible. In response to further questions which were asked on that point, Mr. Shinwell expressed the opinion that there perhaps need be no great cause for concern as to the effect of such a decision on the close co-operation of the defence forces of the commonwealth in the years ahead.

As a Canadian and a member of the Canadian House of Commons, and expressing my opinion as a Canadian with an interest in the joint effectiveness of all our plans for defence, I submit that this is a misconception of what the consequences will be of such a decision. I am not suggesting that the fault lies with the government of the United Kingdom alone. It may well be that the fault lies equally with the government of the United States for failure to standardize. That is not for us to say; but I suggest it is for us to say that, no matter who is to blame for the failure to standardize so far, we in this house want to see that measure of standardization which will produce the maximum effectiveness of the armed forces we are called upon to raise.

I do not think that the Canadian government is called upon to accept silently any decision of that kind. As an increasingly important member of the Atlantic community and the whole community of free nations, Canada is perhaps in a better position than any other nation today to say to the two leading nations of the west that we want to see standardization come before it is too late, and to urge that we have further meetings and try to avoid the conceivably disastrous consequences that might result from a decision of this kind. The failure to standardize small arms, artillery pieces, rocket launchers, mortars and other projecting equipment of all kinds might mean the difference between victory and defeat if unhappily we are ever called upon to resort to force of arms to defend our freedom.

I have raised this question today, Mr. Chairman, because a very real danger now confronts us. The United States has announced its decision to produce ·300 calibre rifles and machine guns. The government of the United Kingdom has announced its decision to produce rifles and machine guns of ·280 calibre. The government of France has announced its decision to manufacture rifles and machine guns of 7·5 millimetre calibre. Other nations are making similar decisions, wholly inconsistent with that measure of co-operation which is essential if the western powers are to attain the combined strength which will preserve peace simply by the fact of its existence. In our early childhood we all learned the story of what happened in the building of the tower of Babel. This is not the building of a tower; it is the building of a great bulwark to preserve our civilization and that of the whole world, and this decision might have terrible consequences. In any event the consequences could be very serious in the confusion and inefficiency in the production of munitions.

I think it is appropriate for us to say to our own people, and also to point out to the nations associated with us in the Atlantic community, that we on this side of the Atlantic have one great advantage that geography has given us. We have the defence barrier of the Atlantic ocean. We have the defence barrier of the Pacific ocean. Yes, though distances may be diminished month by month through the increased range of aircraft, we still have the powerful barrier of the Arctic wastes between us and the only enemy in the world that threatens us or any of the free nations today. If we should come to the terrible necessity of employing these forces for the defence of freedom, we know that this North American continent is of vital importance, not only to ourselves as a source of production, but also to the other nations associated with us in this common cause. We have the skill that has been developed here; and when I make that statement I would not want anyone to think I was forgetting the vast accumulated skill of the nations of Europe and Asia associated with us in this effort. But the very fact that there are oceans and Arctic wastes protecting us gives us an advantage which should not be ignored by any of the nations which are closer to the immediate actual threat of armed force.

Everyone knows what happened in the last world war. God forbid that events of that kind should be repeated. We are building our defences in the hope they will not be repeated; but in building those defences we must recognize the eventual possibility that these arms, and the men who carry and handle them, may have to be employed in military action. With the tremendous and truly appalling increase in the destructive power of weapons of all kinds, it is not beyond the realm of possibility that there might be serious dislocation of production throughout the nations of Europe and also in the British isles, even though the armed forces opposed to us were not able to move forward one inch.

With that thought in mind it seems to me that without being called upon simply to accept without question the decisions of other nations, the government of the United Kingdom and the governments of the countries of Europe might, with great advantage to themselves and to us, examine the importance of having weapons of all types of the same calibre as those which will be produced on this continent. The time might come when they would have to look very largely to this continent for continued supplies of ammunition for the weapons they have produced; and I think we have a right to say that in this common cause, no matter what may be the underlying reasons for these varying decisions, every conceivable effort should be made to have weapons of the same calibre, and if possible of the same type, as those that will be produced and handled in North America.

What I have said is related mainly to small arms, but I have indicated that my remarks apply with equal force to all weapons designed to project ammunition toward an enemy, whether they be in the form of artillery, mortars, rockets, bombs from aircraft, or the new types of self-propelled weapons. The minister has announced this morning that we have adopted the 60 millimetre and 81 millimetre mortars to replace the 2-inch and 3-inch mortars we have used in the past. We are also to adopt the 3·5 inch rocket launcher. We are to produce 105 millimetre and 155 millimetre howitzers to replace the 25-pounder and 5·5 inch howitzer which have been standard up to the present. We are also adopting the 3-inch 50 calibre naval gun, which is a United States standard weapon. This indicates the extent to which we are adopting their standards. I am not now going to indicate all the consequences which might flow from that decision. I would point out, however, that this means a great departure; that it means the adoption of new books of instruction; that it means the adoption for the first time of equipment different from that which is being used by other nations of the commonwealth. Once you adopt new weapons and new books of instruction, it is not long before you adopt new types of drill, and there are other important consequences which may flow from that decision.

For these reasons I most earnestly hope that the views I express this morning will receive the approval of the government; and after all, we have had in recent days some satisfying evidence of agreement on other subjects, though not as important as this. I would hope that no one in the United Kingdom or elsewhere would take it amiss if we Canadians, associated with them so closely by ties of blood, of sentiment and history, say in complete frankness that without regard to the reasons for these decisions, and without regard necessarily to what may be the ultimate decision, every effort should be made to standardize all types of weapons, at any rate as far as calibre is concerned, so that the armed forces of the free world may attain the very highest measure of combined power.

Mr. Croll: Does the hon. gentleman appreciate the fact that we had to make a decision?

Mr. Drew: In the earlier part of my remarks I said it was necessary for us to make a decision. The reason I am making these remarks is that it is still not too late to get uniformity. Only yesterday it was indicated in the British House of Commons that, while a decision has been made, they are only now starting with the production of new types of weapons. We know we have not yet started on the production of these new weapons; therefore it is still possible, if the nations will get together, to achieve that measure of standardization which I am sure the hon. member who has just spoken, and who had very real service in the last war which gives him expert knowledge of this subject, will regard as important.

Mr. Croll: Will the hon. member enlighten the house as to the reasons and motives that led Britain to go one way, and the United States to go the other way, with respect to munitions and weapons? I was following him closely, but there would seem to be some reasons which do not appear on the surface.

Mr. Drew: That is one place in which the Minister of Defence Production is in the best position to enlighten us. I said that no matter what the motives might have been, no matter what the reasons might have been, in regard to a decision of such vital importance, I believe Canada should, if necessary, take the lead in asking that all nations reconsider their decisions. This should be done without delay, so that the tooling up shall not proceed to such an extent that we will perpetuate confusion and inefficiency in an effort of this kind.

It is not for us to impute motives or to try to interpret the motives of other governments. It may well be that the Minister of Defence Production is in a position to say what reasons the governments of the United Kingdom and the United States have given for not coming to an agreement. I recognize that the Canadian government cannot, by its own unilateral action, assure standardization between those nations, which are the two leading nations of the free world. What I am saying is that leadership can be given by the Canadian government by expressing, in the most unqualified terms, the concern of Canadians generally, as well as of the Canadian government, about this lack of standardization, and by inviting the other nations to meet, particularly the United States and Great Britain, to seek a basis of understanding on this vitally important question.

I would remind hon. members that we were given great hopes, in speeches made both in this house and elsewhere during the past few years, that there was to be effective standardization. The member for Spadina has asked a question in regard to motives. I am not going to seek to interpret or explain the motives of another government. It was my intention, however, to refer to an aspect of this problem which I regard as far from reassuring.

Mr. Croll: Perhaps I should have used only the word "reasons". I was not looking for motives.

Mr. Drew: I was not taking exception to the word. I take it we are all hopeful that whatever the reasons were, those which others will put forward may still have some results. After all, that is the vital power of democracy. One of the things that was learned during the last war was that the greatest weakness of Germany, and our most powerful weapon, was that no one in Germany could criticize a decision which produced unsatisfactory results. Perhaps our strongest weapon, perhaps stronger even than the atom bomb, is our right to speak as free men and women, before it is too late; to say that certain things should be done, if in fact those things should be done.

Before leaving this subject I wish to refer to a related matter, because it is one with which some of the younger members may not be as familiar as some others who have had occasion to recall things that have happened in the past. I hope that the fact that there are private profit interests involved in the production of some weapons has had no part in any decision which has been made. When I make that statement may I, in view of the tendency that there is to oversimplify statements of the kind, say that this is no new thought of mine, as many hon. members know. My firm belief that weapons should be made only in government plants, or in plants supervised or operated by the government, is one which relates not only to efficiency of government production, but also to the dangerous consequences that may follow where private interests are involved in the production of materials which have no normal market of any kind, which can only be sold to governments and should be produced only on the basis of a careful decision of the government itself as to what the requirements are.

I believe it was a great step forward when Canada made the decision to produce small arms and other weapons in government arsenals. That decision was made in the early stages of the last world war. The principle, however, had been accepted many years before. There was established near Toronto the Canadian Arsenals Limited, small arms division. There was established at Longueuil many years ago the Canadian Arsenals Limited, gun division. The small arms arsenal at Long Branch was designed primarily to produce rifles and Sten guns, and is of course capable of producing machine guns and other weapons of that kind. The gun arsenal at Longueuil was designed both as a pilot and a research plant, as well as a producing plant, to make artillery pieces.

Mr. Chairman, I can conclude in a few minutes, but if you now wish to call it one o'clock, I shall conclude within a few minutes after we reconvene.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

By leave:

WHEAT

ANNOUNCEMENT OF CARRYING CHARGE UNDER INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENT

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the unanimous consent of the committee to make a statement about an international agreement. The statement is timed for this hour, and I hope the committee will give me permission to put it on Hansard.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Howe: I would like to make an announcement to the house in regard to wheat. Article VI of the international wheat agreement provides that the basic minimum and maximum prices under the agreement are exclusive of "such carrying charges and marketing costs as may be agreed between the buyer and seller."

The Canadian wheat board is of the opinion, and the government concurs in the view, that under conditions now prevailing a carrying charge should be added to its selling price of wheat under the international wheat agreement, effective on sales which will be registered with the international wheat council for the crop year 1951-52. The international wheat council is meeting in London, England, this week, and the Canadian representatives have conveyed the board's decision to importing countries represented at the meeting. The carrying charge which will be added to the board's international wheat agreement selling price is six cents per bushel, and will apply on agreement sales for registration in 1951-52. The board will today commence 1951-52 sales under the agreement.

I might add that, owing to commitments already made, the carrying charge on international wheat agreement wheat will not apply on the balance of deliveries or sales of wheat which have been or will be registered against 1950-51 agreement quantities.

It is my information that the other principal exporting countries participating in the international wheat agreement, namely, the United States and Australia, will initiate a similar policy in regard to carrying charges on wheat sold for 1951-52 under the international wheat agreement.

Since the board's selling price for domestic consumption in Canada is the same as the price at which it sells wheat under the international wheat agreement, the six cents per bushel carrying charge will apply on domestic sales. Effective immediately, the board will add a carrying charge of six cents per bushel to its domestic selling price.

The Chairman: We will now revert to the item under consideration at one o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Dion in the chair.

76. Departmental administration and payments to Canadian Commercial Corporation and other corporate agencies for services provided in connection with defence purchasing and production, $5,000,000.

Mr. Drew: When the committee rose this morning I was discussing the two government arsenals, one near Toronto and the other at Longueuil. Having regard to the fact that Canada and the other industrial nations associated in the Atlantic pact are preparing to build defence forces which may require many changes of weapons over the long period during which this emergency is likely to continue, it is of the utmost importance that the small arms arsenal near Toronto and the gun arsenal at Longueuil should be operated by the government.

I regret that the government has announced that it intends to place the gun plant at Longueuil under the control of a private manufacturer and is permitting its use for the fulfilment of a private contract. That is clearly inconsistent with the policy established by this government, a policy which was first declared as the Canadian policy in regard to the production of weapons by the Conservative government led by R. B. Bennett. That policy has therefore been generally accepted on both sides of the house for many years. I hope the government will reconsider its position and decide that the guns to be made at Longueuil—and I am not suggesting that they should not be made there—will be made under government direction and control. I hope that the government will declare that it intends to continue the policy that weapons, as distinguished from general defence requirements, which in most cases are the by-product of normal civilian production, will be made in government arsenals, or in plants operated directly under government control.

I do not intend to enlarge upon the demonstrated danger of the activities of those who try to stimulate sales, or try to change the decision of governments as to the types of weapons they will use. The evidence in regard to that is all too clear over the years that have passed. I am satisfied that it was in recognition of the evidence to that effect that two succeeding Canadian governments of different political persuasion stated their belief that weapons which only have a military use, and have no normal market, should be made either in government arsenals or in plants operated fully and directly under government control. I leave that subject hoping that we shall receive reassurance on that score.

The people of this country are to be called upon to spend very large sums for their part in the defence of freedom. I am sure that they will willingly accept any burden imposed upon them which they believe to be a necessary part of our participation in that extremely important undertaking. I do think, however, that there is a sentiment, held very largely throughout Canada, that at a time when sacrifice for the defence of freedom is demanded not only of those who will contribute financially in the form of taxes or otherwise, but also of those who give personal service in the armed forces, that sacrifice should not be balanced in any way by profiteering on the part of those who are in a position to gain advantage because of the necessity for the sudden expansion of our producing capacity for the needs of this time. That is particularly true of equipment which is strictly of a military character, such as rifles, machine guns, artillery pieces, naval guns, rocket projectors, mortars and everything of the kind. I am sure it would give the people of this country a great measure of confidence in our own participation if that policy were strictly adhered to. I think also it would be an indication on our part that while we do not presume to interfere in the decisions of any government in regard to its domestic responsibilities, this country is very definitely against profiteering in the provision of the weapons of defence or war.

To refer back to what I said earlier about standardization: Whatever the reasons may be for failure to agree upon standardization, I do in all earnestness urge upon the Canadian government the immense importance of doing everything within its power to bring about the reconsideration of those decisions which could very well have disastrous consequences for us and for all the nations of the Atlantic community. It is not yet too late to step back from unwise decisions to make weapons of different calibres and different types in those countries which are seeking to combine their forces in Europe under General Eisenhower and elsewhere under combined commands.

I believe that Canada, making it clear that we follow policies in which no self-interest could be shaping our course, policies which have been clearly declared in the past, would be able to invite the nations to reconsider this matter, and perhaps in a way that no other nation could at the present time. If this emergency is as real and as great as it has been pictured to us, then no stone should be left unturned to give to the nations of the free world the greatest strength they can possibly have. Canada at this time can give leadership that may have tremendously important consequences for us and for all mankind in the years ahead.

Mr. Thatcher: Mr. Chairman, I welcome this opportunity to take part in the debate on the estimates of the Minister of Defence Production. I think most people in Canada will be pleased to have received the minister's statement. Some of us are at times not very happy with the methods the minister uses, but I think all Canadians will agree that he does seem able to get things done.

I must say, however, that in these two and a half months as head of the Department of Defence Production, the minister has not shown up quite as well as he usually does. He has not displayed his usual business acumen or his customary ability to get men working for him. It seems to me that the chief task of the Department of Defence Production is to rearm Canada, to provide our three services with arms, equipment, and weapons, so that they may defend our country in the event of armed aggression.

From the figures the minister gave this morning, it is obvious that some progress has been made in that direction. I say however that infinitely more could be accomplished, if the minister would agree to change certain major, basic policies in his department. I believe it can be said that today in Canada only two of our provinces are producing for our defence effort at anywhere near full capacity. It seems to me that the minister today could be likened to a farmer who has on a wagon a heavy load to be moved. He owns eight or ten horses with which to move that load, and the harness required to harness the whole number. I believe most of us would consider that farmer very silly if, with his eight or ten horses, complete with harness, he decided he would use only two to pull the load. Most of us would think that farmer crazy if he made only two horses do the work—and then in addition held the reins so tightly that their progress was impeded.

Yet that is precisely what the minister is doing in his department today. He is acting like that farmer, because he is preventing seven or eight of our provinces from playing their full part in the defence effort. He is making use of only two, perhaps three, of the provinces.

Mr. Benidickson: Half a horse?

Mr. Thatcher: I say that even with the use of our total capacity, the use of all the factories and resources we have, we shall be most fortunate if we are able to rearm in time, and to prepare ourselves for possible aggression. But surely if we use only part of our capacity our chances of being prepared will be considerably less than they otherwise would be.

I say the people of Saskatchewan, Alberta, Manitoba, Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and British Columbia are just as patriotic as those in central Canada, and just as anxious to play their part in this defence effort. They are anxious to do something to help Canada rearm, and to prepare against aggression. All they ask is that the minister give them a chance to use their plant capacity more adequately.

Perhaps the minister is not a farmer, and the analogy to which I referred may have little meaning for him. So that he may understand my point, let me express it by a mechanical comparison.

Mr. Howe: About the half horse, do you mean?

Mr. Thatcher: I would compare his new department to a new car. The driver is at the bottom of a steep hill. Would the minister not agree that the driver was not too bright if he got out of the car and disconnected six of the eight cylinders before attempting to climb the hill? But he is doing precisely that in rearming Canada today. He is only using two out of a possible ten cylinders. He is using fully the plant capacity of only two of our ten provinces.

What I shall say this afternoon applies to six and possibly eight of the provinces of Canada. I shall deal with only one aspect of the minister's speech, and that is his program for the diversification of industry. Since the beginning of this session I have often and consistently maintained that the minister has not been giving the outlying provinces their fair share of defence production contracts. I have suggested particularly that Saskatchewan is not getting its share. On numerous occasions the minister has promised to bring to the house figures to show that these outlying provinces are getting their share. I was disappointed this morning therefore when I heard the minister speak for the most part in platitudes; he did not give us any basic figures to refute the charges made earlier in the session. I think he told us this morning that the prairies' share was "quite reasonable" and he said that "Saskatchewan had not been overlooked". I shall maintain, and I think I shall prove this afternoon, by using figures which the minister's department has supplied to me, that these provinces are not receiving their fair share of defence contracts, that they are not receiving their fair share of defence industries. I say that the minister's attitude toward my province is arbitrary, unfair and unwarranted. If he continues to allocate defence contracts in the way he has done in the past, he is going to weaken the defence effort of this nation and he is going to sap away the strength and population of important segments of this country.

Some two or three days ago in the public accounts committee Mr. Low, who was previously the head of the Canadian Commercial Corporation, presented us with a break-down of the contract figures for the past fiscal year.

The Chairman: That committee has not reported and the hon. member should not refer to its proceedings.

Mr. Thatcher: I simply wanted to put the figures on the record.

Mr. Wright: These figures are a matter of record in the public accounts which have been tabled in this house.

Mr. Thatcher: I think I am in order in quoting these figures. As I say, they are for the past fiscal year. I shall give the figures in thousands only.

The Chairman: In that case the hon. member would be in order.

Mr. Howe: To what year is my hon. friend referring?

Mr. Thatcher: It would be 1949-50.

Mr. Howe: We are told that these figures were quoted in the public accounts. Can the hon. member give me the page in the public accounts?

Mr. Thatcher: I am sorry I cannot do that because they were only presented at the last meeting and the minutes have not been printed. They are Mr. Low's figures and I am sure the parliamentary assistant has them.

Mr. Howe: The chairman has ruled out of order reference to figures given in the public accounts committee, which committee has not reported to the house as yet. The hon. member for Melfort stated that the figures were contained in the public accounts; which is correct?

Mr. Thatcher: I do not blame the minister for being ashamed of them, but these are the defence contracts by provinces, which were allocated during 1949-50 in round figures:

Newfoundland	$ 471,000
Prince Edward Island	1,491,000
Nova Scotia	7,334,000
New Brunswick	2,097,000
Quebec	81,055,000
Ontario	89,401,000
Manitoba	9,600,000
Alberta	9,576,000
British Columbia	8,356,000
Yukon	3,409,000
Saskatchewan	769,000
United States	3,672,000
Britain	5,261,000

What does that mean? It means that in the year under discussion Saskatchewan got only a little more than three-tenths of one per cent of all the contracts which had been let by the Canadian Commercial Corporation. As if to add insult to injury we find that Yukon got five times as much as the whole province of Saskatchewan. Would any hon. member, regardless of his politics, suggest that that is a fair allocation of contracts? The minister may say that Saskatchewan "has not been overlooked", but certainly in that year Saskatchewan did not get its fair share. Let me proceed. When this session opened I put a question on the order paper and I should like to place again on Hansard the questions I asked and the answers that were given, and I quote from page 451 of Hansard of February 19, 1941. I asked how many of the 80,000 contracts awarded in the first nine months of the current fiscal year with Canadian industry were placed in the various provinces, and their dollar value, and this is the answer that I received:

Yukon	$ 254,000
British Columbia	33,574,000
Alberta	6,707,000
Saskatchewan	450,000
Manitoba	6,667,000
Ontario	214,436,000
Quebec	154,055,000
New Brunswick	5,468,000
Nova Scotia	23,003,000
Newfoundland	402,000

In those nine months my province received one-tenth of one per cent of the defence contracts. The minister got up in the house and said that these figures represented only post office locations, and thus did not give the true picture, that they signified little. Perhaps they did not signify much to him, but I can tell him that they certainly signified a good deal to the people of my province. They signified rank discrimination against Saskatchewan.

A month or so later I placed another question on the order paper in order to try to have these figures brought up to date, but I was refused a break-down. The parliamentary assistant told me that the request was not a fair way to break down the figures, and therefore he did not think it would be in the public interest to bring in the return. It may not have been in the interest of his department, but I think the people of my province and of other parts of Canada were very interested in such a break-down. As far as I can see, the only reason they were not presented in that way was that the parliamentary assistant and the minister were a little ashamed of them.

Now we come up to the time when the Department of Defence Production was set up some two and a half months ago. I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce another question on February 20, as reported on page 496 of Hansard:

> Can the Minister of Trade and Commerce give any assurance that in future the prairies and the maritime provinces, and I refer particularly to Saskatchewan, will be given greater consideration in the allocation of defence contracts?

If I may presume to say so, the minister very facetiously answered me in this way:

> That is rather like asking a man if he will stop beating his wife. We endeavour to distribute defence purchasing as equitably as possible as among all sources of defence materials. That has been and will continue to be our policy.

I ask the minister if I am to take from that statement that Saskatchewan will continue to receive only one-tenth of one per cent of defence contracts in the future? When the Department of Defence Production came into being, the parliamentary assistant was kind enough to supply me with details of the various defence contracts placed as they were released every two weeks. Those of you who have gone through these will know that there is no provincial break-down and that the totals are not included. I wonder if that is done for obvious reasons? The first departmental release was for the period April 1 to April 15, and the only contract awarded in Saskatchewan was for fuel oil at Prince Albert in the amount of $27,500. The next one was for the period of April 16 to April 30. Not five cents out of a total of millions of dollars was awarded to my province. The next release was for the period May 1 to May 15. Again there is not one five cent piece for the province of Saskatchewan. A release termed "No. 3" for the same period also showed not one five cent piece for Saskatchewan.

Then we come to the latest figures which I was able to obtain only yesterday, "release No. 4", which shows a contract to W. C. Wells Construction Company, Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, for the building of an airport in Alberta. We are grateful to have that contract, but it will be admitted I think that the men who will be employed will come mostly from Alberta. That contract is not going to mean an awful lot to the economy of my province.

Mr. Low: We should have had it ourselves.

Mr. Thatcher: Let me sum the matter up. Despite the figures which the minister gave this morning, only two contracts out of 415 have been placed in the province of Saskatchewan since his department commenced operations. Possibly there are later figures, but according to those which I obtained yesterday, at this date only two contracts out of 415 have been placed in Saskatchewan. If that is treating the province of Saskatchewan in "a reasonable way", as the minister suggests he has been doing, then I think the minister had better check his dictionary.

There is one other aspect I feel I should mention at this time. People in all walks of life are concerned about this matter in my province. Resolutions are being passed by trade unions, boards of trade and city councils. I hope my good friends from Saskatchewan who are in the Liberal party will also take exception to this discrimination.

Mr. Ferrie: They built an airport at Moose Jaw, and they are sure taking exception to that.

Mr. Argue: Are you opposed to that?

Mr. Thatcher: I suppose it is fortunate that some members object once in a while. There is an old saying that the squeaky wheel usually gets the grease. I remind the committee again that in every case these figures I have used today have been supplied by officials of the minister's department. Possibly some hon. members will say, as the minister has said, that Saskatchewan has no industrial capacity, or that the other prairie provinces and the maritimes lack such capacity. I have looked through some of these contracts, and I note that many of them are for food, meat and dairy products. There are contracts let to Canada Packers in Toronto, Canada Packers in Montreal, and Bordens in Toronto. Surely these are products that we could produce economically in Saskatchewan. We have clothing industries out there. We have lumber and saw mills. We can produce boxes. We have an oil industry. We can produce petroleum products both at the initial and refined stages. We have a brick plant. Surely if the minister and his department are genuinely interested in this problem there are many things they could do to diversify industry. Certainly the department is not using the industrial capacity we have there now.

Are there any particular reasons why parliament should be interested in the giving of more defence contracts to outlying parts of the country? I humbly suggest there are numerous reasons why every member of the House of Commons, regardless of his politics, should try to see that the outlying provinces receive fair treatment in this regard. In the first place there is a great need for the dispersal of industry for reasons of defence. For the most part our present industrial capacity is concentrated in the two central provinces. If there should be war, and the enemy had any kind of an air force at all, with four or five well placed bombs on the hydro plants of eastern Canada our whole industrial capacity could be wiped out overnight. If we can believe our United States friends to the south, about thirty per cent of any attacking group of bombers is all that can be stopped in a concentrated air attack. That means the other seventy per cent can get through. Therefore I think Canada's industrial capacity is very vulnerable to air attack at the present time. Surely it would be senseless to add to that concentration and make it worse.

I suggest to the minister that the nation as a whole would benefit if he would put some of these industries in other parts of the country or help to build up the ones presently existing by giving them defence orders. I think the discovery of oil and gas in western Canada has been a great development, and will help our future industrialization. There is a good deal of scrap iron on the prairies on farms and elsewhere. In the last war most of our scrap iron was sent to mills in central Canada. Since that time, however, the freight rate has risen by 45 per cent, and from every indication it is probably going to go up a little more. Why should it not be sensible for the minister to give some metal orders to our plants in Regina, Moose Jaw, Saskatoon, Calgary or Winnipeg? We have foundries which I am sure could produce some kind of equipment if they were given the opportunity.

If the minister does not choose to do something for my province by way of defence industries, I am sure that we are going to see its population go down as it did during the last war. We are going to see many of our skilled young people drained out of the province to central Canada or to British Columbia, and I do not think that is in the national interest. I want to say once again that the minister's own figures make it clear beyond any shadow of doubt that up to this point Saskatchewan in particular, and the other prairie and maritime provinces, have been discriminated against in the awarding of contracts. The minister and his department have told me at various times that they always let defence contracts on a competitive basis. In many cases that is probably a wise thing to do, but with the freight rates as they are it means that very seldom can an industry in the west, or at the extreme end of the maritimes, compete successfully with central Canada if the goods are sold f.o.b. some Ontario point. I ask the minister why it would not be proper, reasonable and fair, to take tenders for these various contracts f.o.b. factory. In other words, if there is a factory in Regina competing with a factory in Toronto, make these contracts or tenders f.o.b. factory. That seems feasible to me. In that way we could avoid the discrimination which exists because of freight rates.

Even Saskatchewan newspapers, my good friends the Sifton press, are somewhat worried about this situation. The Regina Leader-Post of February 20, 1951, carried an article reading in part:

> Every possible support should be given to the . . . attempt to obtain more contracts and subcontracts to enable Saskatchewan plants to remain in operation. This time the arguments in favour of such a policy are unanswerable, and Ottawa will be short-sighted in the extreme if it blindly ignores them as it has in the past.

That is the Regina Leader-Post which is certainly not noted for its C.C.F. sympathies. I call upon the minister today to reconsider this question, and in the future to give greater consideration to these provinces in the awarding of defence contracts. If he does not do that, then perhaps I am biased; but I can only draw one conclusion therefrom, namely—that my province is getting no contracts because of its government's political colour.

Mr. Howe: I think perhaps I should answer immediately a statement that is so completely distorted as that made by my hon. friend.

Mr. Thatcher: Your figures.

Mr. Howe: I suggest the biggest industry in Saskatchewan is operated by the government as a defence industry, and that is the central ordnance depot in the city of Regina. Surely that must be contributing something to the economy of Saskatchewan because it is costing the federal government a few million dollars to keep it in operation. I point out to him that one of the most important defence efforts is the air training plan, and I point out that three of the largest schools under that plan are located in the province of Saskatchewan, and each school will be maintaining several hundred men in that province. The moneys involved in maintaining these men will be paid largely to Saskatchewan firms. It seems to me that will make a contribution of the type that Saskatchewan can take care of.

I might point out that some $4 million of contracts for airport construction has been placed there within the last month. My hon. friend is not willing to accept my statement that the addresses shown on tenders are not a complete disclosure of where the work is being performed. Yet he himself cites one against me when he says that a Saskatchewan contracting firm mailed a tender from Saskatoon, but the work was performed in Alberta. He does not admit for a moment that could happen in reverse, and is happening.

The hon. member expects us to place contracts with Saskatchewan firms. What industrial plant is there in Saskatchewan that is not working to capacity? We have placed orders for blankets there, as we have placed orders wherever we could find capacity. We have placed orders for boots there wherever we could find capacity. If there were capacity, Saskatchewan firms would be tendering on the contracts that go out from the department every day. The hon. member suggests as a remedy that the government purchase f.o.b.

factory and pay the freight. Let me tell him that if we purchased on that basis no Saskatchewan firm would ever get a contract; it would be just impossible. If we could buy in Toronto and deliver in Saskatchewan free of freight, those goods would be delivered at prices which would probably undersell any Saskatchewan firm. Firms in Saskatchewan have the protection of the freight charges from larger centres on goods consumed in the area. With three training schools, the ordnance depot and all the other war paraphernalia already in Saskatchewan or due to be there shortly the freight added to the tender price to points of delivery is a very important protection at the place of delivery. If we followed the hon. member's advice, that protection would be thrown out the window. That shows how utterly silly his advice to the government is in that connection.

Mr. Wright: On that point can the minister name one contract he has let in Saskatchewan which would not have been let there if freight conditions had been as he describes?

Mr. Howe: Yes, I can mention one; bread for the employees at the ordnance depot in Regina, or almost any supplies we buy for the troops that are or will be stationed in that province.

Mr. Wright: Bread could be bought more cheaply where?

Mr. Howe: Probably in Toronto.

Mr. Wright: And shipped out to Saskatchewan?

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend wants me to throw away the freight charges or absorb them. We try to buy what we can in every province. I have made a little analysis, and I find that of all the food purchases during the past year 56 per cent came from Ontario and Quebec, 20 per cent from the prairie provinces, 14 per cent from the maritimes and 10 per cent from British Columbia. Perhaps I had better give an analysis of the various fields of purchasing, which when added up give quite a different picture than the quotations of my hon. friend, which really referred to manufactured products. He must recognize the fact that 81 per cent of all the manufacturing production of Canada is concentrated in the two provinces of Ontario and Quebec. I suppose the industry and initiative of the people of Ontario and Quebec had something to do with establishing that pattern, but I believe climate and geography also had a good deal to do with it. Nevertheless we face the fact that 81 per cent of our manufacturing is in those two provinces. I think about 3 per cent is in the province of Saskatchewan, if my memory serves me right. I speak subject to correction, but that is as I remember the situation. We buy as well as we can and distribute our purchases as well as we can; and I think my hon. friend will find that with the central ordnance depot at Regina, with three air training schools in the province and the other activities I mentioned such as uranium in northern Saskatchewan, on which we will spend over $2 million this year in direct government expenditure, a very reasonable part of the war expenditure is being made in Saskatchewan. But I know of no way to change overnight an agricultural economy to an industrial economy. I know of no way to change the Saskatchewan economy overnight into the Ontario and Quebec economy.

Mr. Thatcher: I am sure the minister wants to be fair. A moment ago he suggested that Saskatchewan was to have three of the largest airports, each of which would have several thousand men. I can tell him that at the Moose Jaw airport, far from several thousand there will be 650, according to the Department of National Defence. I hope he has not drawn all his other figures out of the air as he did that one.

Mr. Howe: All I can say is that Moose Jaw is not all of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Thatcher: What?

Mr. Gibson: Not all of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Green: In the course of his statement this morning the minister dealt with the small industries division, and I would like some further information with regard to the work of that division. I understood him to say that the division had three functions. The first was to gather and distribute information concerning contracts being or to be carried out by primary manufacturers, and to distribute that information to the small plants. The second was to inform the large plants about the small plants which could take subcontracts. The third was to represent the small plants in Ottawa in order to give them whatever help was needed here at the capital.

Last week a Canadian Press dispatch was published with regard to these small plants, purporting to outline the plans of the department. I am quoting the dispatch as it appeared in the Vancouver Sun of June 6, 1951:

> The defence production department intimated to Canada's "little" manufacturers today that there are some big defence projects in the wind, and they had better hurry if they want to get in on the show.
> The projects included propulsion machinery for escort vessels, shell forgings, aircraft instruments and engines and distribution panels for ships.

No figures were made public, but officials said the projects, some of which would get government capital assistance to get them started, "will run into millions."

I presume that has reference to capital assistance for the large plants. Then the dispatch goes on:

Officials said that by giving the small manufacturers advance information on the kind of projects on which the department is concentrating at the moment, they would have a chance to bid for subcontracts on component parts with the big producers who would get the main contracts.

Then an example is cited:

For example, the department said it intended to award the escort vessels propulsion machinery contract to John Inglis Co. Ltd., Toronto.

The "little" contractor then could swing his attention on that company to negotiate a deal to handle a small part of the main contract.

Mr. Howe: Does it say who wrote that article?

Mr. Green: It is a Canadian Press dispatch.

Mr. Howe: No byline?

Mr. Green: No. It says that the defence production department intimated. As the minister knows, Canadian Press dispatches are very authoritative. In this case there is no byline at all; it is a dispatch sent out from Ottawa.

Mr. Howe: When it says the department intimated, that is a very vague statement. How does a department intimate? A department can put out a statement or an officer of a department can intimate, but to say the department intimates is pretty vague.

Mr. Green: As the minister knows we frequently get dispatches which, while they may not be direct statements, are based on comment by some official of a department. In most cases they turn out to be right from the horse's mouth.

Mr. Howe: Sometimes, but sometimes not.

Mr. Green: In any event, I am quoting this dispatch. It may or may not be true, but I think it brings up a question which should be dealt with on these estimates. It would appear from this dispatch, and also from the minister's statement this morning, that the large firms are to get these contracts, and in some cases are to get capital assistance. The small plants are supposed to run around and try to get subcontracts from these large firms. I would hope that there could be some plans devised to give further help to the small plants.

For example, why are they not made eligible for capital assistance in the same way as the very large plants in Canada. Then, are they to get the benefit of priorities in the same way as the larger plants get priorities? Are they to get certificates of eligibility which will enable them to get away from the new depreciation plan under which there can be no depreciation written off for a period of four years? These questions are very important to many parts of Canada, certainly to the plants on the Pacific coast, and I presume in the maritimes.

You see, Mr. Chairman, and I am sure the minister realizes that this is a long-term problem facing the Canadian people. Last week he was quoted by Canadian Press as having said at Quebec on June 5:

This development of Canada's basic and industrial resources, to meet the possibility—

I am now going to quote the words which I wish to stress.

—of a generation of international danger, was perhaps even more important than actual placement of defence contracts, . . .

I believe the minister quite properly stressed the fact that we may be in for a whole generation of international danger. It is a long-term pull. For that reason, it is particularly important that we get this work scattered out as much as possible, not only among the provinces but amongst the smaller communities in each province. Let us not have it all concentrated in the larger cities.

I believe that the backbone of the country is in these smaller centres, although I happen to represent a city constituency. For many years the trend has been to the city and away from the less populated districts. Here is an opportunity to reverse that trend, at least to some extent. The minister will recall that during the last war small plants in small towns were given the opportunity of manufacturing certain types of equipment that were needed under government contract. I know that in British Columbia there were quite a few towns which were able to put their smaller plants to work. This will be particularly necessary in the event of a third world war because of the bombing. The larger cities of Canada are practically certain to be bombed. Furthermore, we still have a very difficult housing situation in most cities in Canada. If the plants are to be built in the larger centres, the result will be men and women flocking in from the farms and small towns and complicating an already difficult housing situation.

Then, you find the same problem with the schools. The children of these people who move in have to be provided with schooling. It means the use of materials for building new schools and other buildings of a similar type, whereas out in the districts from which the people came the present facilities would be sufficient. There are many other reasons why every encouragement should be given to the small plants in Canada. Now, at the beginning of this large defence program, is the appropriate time to adopt policies which will bring about the expansion of these smaller plants.

That sums up what I wanted to place before the minister. I would ask him to answer with regard to those three suggestions. In the first place, under the plans of his department is capital assistance to be available to the small plants? Second, are they to be given the benefit of the priorities? Third, can they get certificates of eligibility which will enable them to have the advantage of the depreciation write-off, which advantage will be given to at least some of the larger firms? I believe the minister stated this morning that these depreciation write-off privileges were in the process of being given to the amount of about $21 million. I wonder if he can give the information with regard to these three proposals, in so far as the small plants in Canada are concerned?

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, I am fully aware of the desirability of spreading the work into the small plants, and into the small towns in this country. I believe the hon. member will recall that there were serious complaints from British Columbia at the beginning of the last war to the effect that no work was going to British Columbia. If he looks at the industries in British Columbia today, he will find that about half of the industries were built as a result of contracts issued for war production in the period 1940-45. If ever a successful job was done in my opinion it was done in building up industry in British Columbia, largely through subcontracts for war materials. We provided millions of dollars' worth of machinery. Vancouver, which never thought of itself as an industrial city before the war, can today compete with any part of Canada in efficient production, largely owing to the fact that modern machinery and modern techniques were introduced there as part of the war effort.

Nevertheless, it is impossible to start a large war contract from the small town. For instance, about one-third of our defence production program is in aircraft. It is not possible to ask a small centre to design an aircraft and put it into production. It is possible, after production starts, to break down the aircraft into components that can be built in small towns. For example, there are subcontracts for aircraft parts being sent from Toronto to the maritime provinces. There are subcontracts on aircraft components going to Winnipeg. I dare say that subcontracts for aircraft components will be placed in Vancouver. Somebody whispers now. That is a process that takes time. The prime contractor must get his production line in operation, and he must get his design and fabricating up to the point where he can send patterns out to smaller plants and get components built.

That is also true of the next largest program, namely, radar. It takes a very highly competent engineering staff, and a very large staff, to bring a unit of radar production into being, but once the over-all design has been made and proven and the manufacture is under way that can be broken down very readily, and was broken down in the last war, and sent to a great number of smaller plants.

We have in Vancouver a firm that specialized on one particular branch of radar, and when orders are coming forward in the proper way that firm will be a prime contractor. All this cannot be done overnight, and the smaller the factory the longer it takes to get work suitable for that factory.

The purpose of the small industries branch is to build up that particular phase of the work, and, as subcontracts become available, to make sure that they go to plants that are capable of handling a contract of an appropriate size. That work is under way. I think it is better planned this time than it was in the last war. We are building on the experience of the last war, and I believe that in time any plant that is capable of taking work of that class will be able to get it.

My hon. friend must also keep in mind another factor, namely, that the plants in any area were not built for war. They were built for a particular purpose; and most of them are busy on that particular purpose. For example, I suppose if we had a type of contract suitable to the firms in Vancouver we would find great difficulty in getting capacity in Vancouver for that work, because Vancouver production facilities are very busy now looking after the business for which they were organized. That is equally true in Saskatchewan. Someone said: You could use all the garages in Saskatchewan to build war munitions. Unfortunately, for the war effort the garages were built for another purpose, and that was for servicing the mechanical equipment that is operating in the vicinity of those garages. We tried that in the last war, and we found that while garages were willing to do a bit of work for us in the wintertime, in the summertime they were busy on the task for which they were built and for which they operate. Theoretically there is capacity, but practically it is not available for the purpose we require.

All these factors have to be taken into account. I assure my hon. friend that we are as anxious as he is to see that work goes to every part of Canada, and we are making an effort to send it there, but there are difficulties and it is a task that takes a good deal of time.

Mr. Green: The minister did not deal with the important question concerning capital assistance, depreciation and priorities for the small plants.

Mr. Howe: Ordinarily we have tried to place contracts in existing capacity. In some cases that is not possible. For example, if our gun productive capacity is being fully used, we have to build a gun plant, and for that purpose we extend either capital assistance or accelerated depreciation. We must acquire the facilities. That does not come into the picture so much in dealing with subcontracts. Subcontracts are usually put where capacity exists. But if we require capacity at a place and we find there the skill to carry out the work and the manpower to carry it out we will certainly extend either accelerated depreciation or capital assistance just as readily in the small town as we will in the big city.

Mr. Green: I think the minister will find that some of these small plants will be unable to do their part in filling the subcontracts unless they get help such as depreciation or priorities or possibly capital assistance. A few moments ago the minister himself said that many of them will be fully occupied with their peacetime production. I know that in Vancouver some of the firms would find it very difficult if they had to get into war work without assistance by one or the other of those methods. From what the minister said I take it there is no policy against giving such assistance even to a small plant.

Mr. Howe: That is quite correct.

Mr. Green: One other question: is there any plan in mind for building cargo vessels? I think the minister mentioned only war vessels this morning. I should like to know whether cargo vessels are to be built. If so, will they be modern fast cargo vessels?

Mr. Howe: The government encourages the construction of cargo vessels by various means; one of which is accelerated depreciation, as my hon. friend is aware, and the other is the use of escrow funds. The government has no program of government-building cargo vessels.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. Green: Are there no modern fast cargo vessels being built in Canada at the present time?

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Green: Very few, are they not?

Mr. Howe: On the great lakes very modern vessels are being built. I have been asked to go up on Saturday just to see one set out on its maiden voyage. Unfortunately I cannot go. I would like to go. It is the biggest cargo vessel on the Canadian great lakes.

Mr. Green: I mean ocean-going.

Mr. Howe: Ocean-going? There have not been any undertaken recently.

Mr. Green: Are there no modern ocean-going cargo vessels under construction?

Mr. Howe: Four modern cargo vessels are being built in Montreal at the moment for Colombia. Others were built since the war, but none for Canada.

Mr. Thatcher: Can the minister say whether, when these tenders are being called, the lowest tender is always taken, or is there any conscious effort on the part of his department to diversify some of the contracts in the outlying provinces?

Mr. Howe: Yes, that is watched very carefully. There is a latitude, which I have mentioned in the house. We do not stress it, and we use it only if we think we should. It is used sparingly. If we can put a contract in Saskatchewan at not more than 5 per cent higher than we could place it somewhere else, in an area that is well taken care of, we would place it in Saskatchewan. The trouble with placing contracts in Saskatchewan is that there are very few productive facilities there, and we rarely get a price on government work from that province.

Mr. Knight: Is it not a fact that if the people were assured of contracts there would be a certain expansion of facilities? We are not at war at the moment, but during the last war these facilities were created in Canada in view of the contracts that were coming from the government. The minister is probably right when he says that most of our facilities are working at capacity. But I think I am right when I say that a great many of the owners of those facilities would be prepared to expand if they were assured of contracts. That particular type of expansion is the thing we need in that province, because, as someone pointed out here today, our young men and our young women were induced to leave that province during the war by more profitable work in the east. We would have liked to keep our people at home. We have a problem. The greatest problem that I see in the province is that we want to increase our facilities—I mean road building, hospital facilities, and things of that sort. If we are to do that we must be assured of a stable population. We must have the people there to pay the taxes. We do not want, every time there is war or a rumour of war, our population getting out of our province and leaving us helpless in that regard. My point is this, that we can establish permanent industries there, if we have the help. I admit we are getting some, but I would back up the statement of the hon. member for Moose Jaw, that we are not getting sufficient.

Mr. Wright: Mr. Chairman, to follow up that line of thought, I believe that in Canada most of our industries have begun as small shops, from which point they have developed. That is exactly what we are trying to persuade the minister to do, so far as Saskatchewan is concerned today. We have some small plant and equipment in various towns which we believe could be used for subcontracts. I am free to admit that we have not the power facilities to operate large plants and equipment. Only when we have been able to develop some of our power facilities in Saskatchewan will we be able to industrialize our province to any considerable extent. However, we do have many small shops, small industries which, with some encouragement and some contracts, could be developed into thriving industries to help in the production of the implements of war. Those industries would be available to enter peacetime production following that of wartime.

I believe that is about the only type of industry which could be developed at the present time in Saskatchewan. In other words, some of the smaller plants could be developed into larger plants to assist in the effort to rearm. It is because of the failure to do this in the last four or five years that the hon. member for Moose Jaw and other hon. members from Saskatchewan have been anxious to see something done.

I have before me the public accounts for the year 1949-50 which show that in that year, for the acquisition, construction and purchase of property the army spent $53,604,000. Out of that sum there was spent in Saskatchewan only $30,100.36. Of that amount one contract for $19,000 was let to a Winnipeg firm.

Then, on the same item, namely for the acquisition, construction and purchase of property the navy spent $40,688,000, but not one dollar was spent in Saskatchewan. On the same item the air force spent $77,502,575 and again not one dollar was spent in Saskatchewan. These figures are a matter of record, and they are disturbing to those of us from that province. I suggest there should be an attempt to distribute our industries to a greater extent than now obtains. If war comes there is every expectation that there would be bombing, with the resultant disorganization of industry; and this condition would be greatly lessened if our industry was distributed more evenly across the dominion.

That is one of the major arguments. Then, added to that is the problem of housing which develops when large concentrations of people are placed in eastern Canada. From 1941 to 1944 there was an exodus of people from Saskatchewan both to the west and to the east, and we are anxious that that condition shall not be repeated. We hope we shall be able to keep our own people and develop our own industries. It is only by starting at the bottom, by starting with the small shops and giving contracts so that they may expand and become industries in time that we can hope to diversify our industries in Canada.

While I am on my feet I should like to say a word about raw materials. It seems to me we are facing two major difficulties in the world today in our preparations for defence. One of these is the distribution of raw materials and the other is the standardization of our equipment. We find many of the European countries in the Atlantic pact are having difficulty in obtaining the necessary raw materials to enable them to make a real effort so as to carry out their share of the burden. I do not know what our government is doing; the minister will know. It seems to me however that we have been competing against each other for scarce raw materials in the last year. As a result of that the stronger nations are in a much better position. Yet sometimes we sit back and criticize other nations which are not as fortunate financially or with regard to raw materials as we are because they are not able to carry on an effort equal to ours.

It seems to me there could be much more co-operation among the countries of the Atlantic pact in the matter of the distribution of raw materials. Unless there is co-operation we will not get the best results from our endeavours to build and re-equip our armed forces so that we can have a reasonable chance of maintaining peace.

On the matter of standardization, for the life of me I cannot see why we should not have more standardization in our equipment than we now have. The reasons for the lack of it surely cannot be military alone, because military reasons would indicate that we should have standardization. The leader of the opposition spoke about this subject at considerable length. He should know something about the background of it. I can remember reading his articles in Maclean's magazine back in 1925 or 1926, I believe it was, on the "weapons of death" and the profits made out of armaments at that time. It seems to me we have not gone very far since. I would say that today in Canada and in the United States and the other Atlantic pact countries 90 per cent of our equipment for war is manufactured by private industry. Is that why we cannot standardize that equipment? Is it because private interests have vested rights in some of these things? I cannot see any other reason for it, because from the military standpoint common sense says that we should have standardization.

If private enterprise is the reason for it, then it is time that some of the private members in democratic parliaments got up and said so; and it is time some of the ministers in the governments of these countries got up and said so. It is too serious a matter for us just to sit back and let things drift.

I had hoped the minister would be able to give us more information than he has given in the matter—because it is a serious one. Those of us in parliament representing the people of Canada should have all possible information on the subject. I would urge upon the minister that Canada, if at all possible, should do more in this matter. I feel sure the government has done a good deal, because we are in between the two millstones. Canada is going to suffer from this lack of standardization. Our army is not large enough to warrant the setting up of plants to produce for it alone. If we have plants that are going to be operated economically we must have contracts from other countries. I repeat that we are the ones who are going to suffer. The government and this parliament should have more to say on this matter.

Mr. Howe: As far as Canada is concerned there is no vested interest in any munitions of war that I know of. I doubt if the vested interest in any particular weapon has much to do with the present situation. The rifle has been the most irritating item and this is due wholly to the fact that the technical experts of the three countries concerned, the United States, Great Britain and Canada, cannot agree on what is the best weapon. Opinions differ. I think there are overriding considerations of logistics and supply lines that outweigh the question of which is the best weapon. I dare say that any rifle that any of the three countries is using is a good rifle.

[Mr. Wright.]

It seems to me to be a pity that standardization of weapons cannot be arrived at. We are still taking a leading part in keeping the agitation alive to get the three countries to agree to a standardization of weapons. Not long ago an appeal was sent to General Eisenhower to take the situation in hand as the supreme commander and appoint a committee to arrive at a decision. In the meantime we are not making small arms simply because we do not want to make one that might not be standard by the time we have it in production. About fourteen weapons have been agreed upon for standardization by the three countries, which indicates some progress. But the progress should have been much more rapid and we intend to do anything we can do in the direction of accelerating the trend toward the use of common weapons.

Mr. Blackmore: I wonder if the minister could give us some details of the measures which have been adopted to increase the production of steel in Canada? I feel that all through the program which he has been outlining there are three or four advantageous and desirable trends. Obviously the minister is endeavouring to make Canada much more self-sufficient and to that end we find the establishment of plants to produce machine tools and that kind of thing. That is why I wonder why with all the iron ore we have in Canada we have not yet become self-sufficient in steel.

Mr. Howe: Every steel plant in the country has a substantial expansion program under way at the moment. The Steel Company of Canada, our largest producer, is adding nearly 50 per cent to its basic steel capacity and is spending around $50 million for that purpose. Algoma Steel are putting in new finishing capacity and new primary capacity with a program running to about $35 million. Dominion Foundries at Hamilton are installing a new blast furnace which will probably be in operation before the end of the calendar year. Dominion Steel are also adding to their capacity but I cannot give the details as there has been some delay in working out the complete program.

The full program of expansion will add about one million tons of steel to the Canadian production, or about a 30 per cent increase. It will increase the diversity of the types of finished products that Canada can manufacture. The whole program is being carried out by private interests with money raised in the ways open to private interests. It is an expansion that is greatly in the national interest and the government has been encouraging it in every way possible.

Mr. Blackmore: By the time that expansion is completed will Canada be producing the steel which would normally be used in a peacetime year, or shall we still be short of meeting our national needs?

Mr. Howe: I should think that probably we shall always be importers of steel, for two reasons. First, this country is growing rapidly and a balanced situation today might be an unbalanced situation a year hence. Another difficulty is caused by the short runs of certain products, such as wide flanged I-beams and products of that kind. The volume is not sufficient to warrant the expense of setting up to produce that type of product. There will always probably be products that it would not be economical for us to organize to produce and which would have to be imported.

Mr. Blackmore: Many people are asking why so much of our Canadian ore is reported to be going into the United States to be processed there. Can the minister give a reason why that is so?

Mr. Howe: I will set my hon. friend's mind at rest on that. At the moment Canada is a net importer of ore. In other words, we bring in more ore than we export. That situation will change in a year or two, but I would not worry about it just yet. We have been heavily dependent upon the United States for iron ore since Canada installed its first steel plant, and we are still in that position. My hon. friend asks how much steel Canada would use if we had all the steel we could use. I do not know the answer to that, but this year we will produce about three and a quarter million tons of finished steel and import about a million and a quarter tons, or about four and a half million tons in all. If we had another half million tons I am sure we would use it.

Mr. Green: Have any steps been taken in recent months to establish a steel industry on the Pacific coast? We read about Consolidated using their iron tailings at Kimberley for that purpose and also the possibility of a plant being built on the lower mainland or on Vancouver island. Can the minister tell us whether there is actually any move on foot to establish a steel plant or plants on the coast?

Mr. Howe: My last advice from Consolidated Smelting is that the company is proceeding actively with the designing of a blast furnace to be carried on with its smelting operations. I have heard nothing directly about a steel plant on the west coast. My hon. friend will appreciate that the government does not build these things. An industry is built around a man with specialized skill and driving ability. Until that man comes forward to actively take charge there will never be a steel industry anywhere. They just are not built by committees of chambers of commerce or boards of trade and I wish boards of trade would appreciate that and not bother me so much with general requests that the government do it. The government does not do anything.

Mr. Hansell: Before referring to the amount of this first vote on administration may I make a comment or two in respect to the observations made by the hon. member for Moose Jaw? He gave us a picture of the ratio of contracts between provinces. I think perhaps there is room for criticism but at the same time there is also room for commendation. A thing cannot be so lopsided that everything is bad and nothing is good. The hon. member compared the difference between contracts awarded in Saskatchewan and those of the Yukon Territory, and I think that there is an explanation forthcoming there. If it is left as it is, it would appear to be a ratio or comparison that is far beyond reason. There must be some reason for it.

Then the hon. member referred to a small contract given to a Saskatchewan contractor for work to be done in Alberta. Before he got through he indicated that perhaps the picture might savour of political patronage. Of course the answer to the fact that a Saskatchewan contractor got a contract for work in Alberta may be obvious. It may be that they could not find a Liberal in Alberta to whom they could give the contract.

An hon. Member: They do not grow them there.

Mr. Hansell: I think the minister should be asked a very pertinent question. I am not necessarily coming to the defence of the socialist government of Saskatchewan in asking this question because I think I am just as anxious to defeat the socialist government of Saskatchewan as the minister may be. So far as socialism is concerned, everyone knows my position. Nevertheless I think the minister should answer this question. If Saskatchewan is not getting what would appear to be its fair share of contracts, if Saskatchewan is left so far behind, I should like to ask the minister whether that picture would be materially changed if Mr. Tucker should come into power after the next election.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hansell: I hear my friends saying "oh, oh." They have need to answer that question because I am quite certain that when an election is called Saskatchewan Liberals will say: You vote Liberal and you will get more contracts. If that is so, the time for the minister to make a pronouncement is now.

An hon. Member: But not too early.

Mr. Hansell: If he answers the question yes, that the situation will be materially changed, then he is telling the country that the whole defence production of the country is administered on the basis of patronage. If he says no, the situation will not be changed, then he will be telling the country that he is running the productive affairs of the country irrespective of politics, and they will not then be able to play politics in the election with respect to contracts. I believe that the minister should answer that question, and answer it yes or no.

Mr. Ferrie: What about Ontario? They are getting all the money.

Mr. Gardiner: Why are you saying "if Mr. Tucker"?

Mr. Hansell: Evidently there are some other members who would like to get the floor. They can have it when I sit down. I am not from Saskatchewan but I am asking the question because I believe it is pertinent and I think the minister should answer it. It is all very well to say that in the letting of contracts each province must get its fair share, but that suggestion must be qualified. I think it is a matter of a fair share under the productive circumstances of the province, and I think that is what the minister has in mind. You cannot give contracts to people who are not capable of handling them. Take the matter of electrical power. There are some provinces that might be short of electrical power. They may be running at capacity, and there is no use bothering. I think we have got to be fair in our analysis of the ratio of contracts.

Personally I have no particular criticism or complaint to make, and that is partly due to the experience I had during the last war. I do not believe I went to the government once to ask them to push anything my way. I do not believe I did. I went to various officials of the government and laid the cards on the table with respect to certain things. I know that during the last war I had six air training or auxiliary schools in my constituency.

An hon. Member: What are you kicking about?

An hon. Member: You did well.

Mr. Hansell: I remember on one occasion I told a Liberal I had that many and he said: "My goodness, what pull have you got with the government?" I answered that by simply telling him that his constituency was in a mountainous region, and it was obvious that you could not put air training schools in a mountainous region. I think that the government was pretty honest and fair in their locating of air training schools when they put six of them in my constituency, and I am not the only member from Alberta who had such schools in his constituency. There were many others. I think the engineers were honest in their appraisal of territory, climate, winds, and everything concerning the training of airmen. Of course there may have been another reason. They may have thought that if there was an attack Alberta, and Macleod particularly, would be blown to kingdom come, but I think that would be stretching the imagination.

I have no particular criticism to make in the matter of contracts. However, I come to the first item now before us, and I believe that the minister must give us a more detailed break-down. I refer to the item of $5 million for departmental administration. The $5 million is not involved in the paying of contracts or paying for defence production. It is simply administration of the department. Five million dollars is a lot of money simply to administer a department when they are not buying anything. I have compared it with other departments of government. Possibly my comparison is not altogether fair for the reason that all departments do not break down their administrative items in the same fashion. Of course this department is new, it has been set up just this session; but I look at some of the other departments. Here is agriculture, and the first item for administration amounts to about three-quarters of a million dollars. Here is citizenship, about a quarter of a million; here is external affairs, two and a quarter million; here is fisheries, a little over a quarter of a million. Justice is about three-quarters of a million and labour a little over a half million. Here is finance, one and a half million. Of course there is another item under administration that I should mention, the comptroller of the treasury for which there is the considerable sum of twelve million. Here is mines and technical surveys, and the item for departmental administration is less than half a million. Here is health, less than half a million. Post office is less than half a million; public works less than half a million; trade and commerce a little over half a million; transport over a million, and veterans affairs two and a quarter million for administration.

When we come to this Department of Defence Production, however, we are staggered with a figure of $5 million. I thought I would like to see what that covered, so I turned to the break-down on page 143. The first large item I find is $3 million for temporary assistance. That is a very nebulous explanation. I may be quite wrong, but I am inclined to think most of those people would be doing office work, administrative work of that sort. Some of the other items are also rather startling. Here is $200,000 for postage. I do not see how the department will spend that much unless it is going to send out a lot of literature to all the citizens of the country. You can buy a lot of stamps for $200,000. The minister may say that of course this is just paid by one department to another, but let us remember that the taxpayers of this country will have to pay on the basis of the total amount of these votes. Here is $200,000 for telephones and telegrams. That is a lot of money for telegrams and conversations over the telephone. Then the last item making up the $5 million is sundries, $250,000. I do not know what sundries there can be to make up that amount. Of course I know that in these days a million dollars seems to be just peanuts. The other day I was sitting in the gallery with a visitor, rather an intelligent person, I thought, and she seemed disgusted with the way we discussed and handled these astronomical amounts. Her comment was, "My goodness, and we are the ones who have to pay". Of course I know that is not quite the picture, but that is the impression one gets sitting in the gallery while we are dealing with these matters. If you go out in the country and say this department has paid $3 million for temporary assistance they will scratch their heads and ask how many stenographers they are putting on. That is their conception of it: my goodness, they must be employing a lot of temporary workers. Postage, $200,000: my goodness, something is going down the drain. That is the impression people get.

I believe the minister should give us a more or less complete break-down. I know he spoke this morning, and I am going to analyse his rather lengthy speech tomorrow, when it comes out in Hansard; but I believe the people of Canada need a little more information as to why the administration item for this department should be so large. That item has nothing to do with the contracts ultimately signed, whether for guns or anything else. The people pay for them, and the contracting parties get their profit. But in order to put those contracts through it is costing the country $5 million for administration. I think the minister owes it to the house to give us some further explanation; and when he replies I hope he will not forget the other question I asked as to whether the picture would change if Mr. Tucker got into power.

Mr. Howe: To take the serious part of the question first, my hon. friend overlooks the fact that there are no items in the estimates for branches in this department. If he will check all the departments he mentioned and add to the administration item the cost of those branches that have separate allocations of funds I think he will find that $5 million as the cost of operating the Department of Defence Production is not excessive. He speaks of $3 million for temporary assistance. I remember that he applauded loudly when I said that everyone in the department was temporary. It is a temporary department; no one has permanent status nor can anyone attain it. As I said this morning, there are roughly 1,100 people in the department. At $3 million that would give an average of about $2,700 per person, which I do not think he would say is exorbitant. At least I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would say that was a very low salary, for I believe anything under $5,000 is low to him. So I hope the hon. member will agree that to operate a department with 1,100 people for a year, $3 million is not exorbitant. Will he go that far with me?

Mr. Hansell: Yes, I will go that far; but what I want from the minister—

Mr. Howe: That is all I wanted to know. The hon. member wanted an answer to that question and I just asked if he would agree with me.

Mr. Hansell: Well, I want a yes or no answer to the Tucker question.

Mr. Howe: We will get to that. Then my hon. friend mentioned $200,000 for postage and thought that was a tremendous sum. Yet everyone here wants us to go into all the small industries of this country with all the tenders, and we try to do that; but it takes a lot of postage. I do not know how many tender forms we send out in the course of a day but I dare say it runs into the thousands, and each one carries a stamp. We estimate what it costs to do that business properly. I see that my hon. friend from the potato fields is very much amused. I must say I enjoy his contributions to these debates because they are so sensible, and his laugh is the most sensible contribution he makes. We will talk about potatoes some other day, and my hon. friend can join in that debate with something besides a laugh.

Then the hon. member mentioned telephones and telegrams. Well, this year I suppose we are doing a business of over a billion dollars. This is a large country; a good many questions are asked the department, and a good many calls are made. If the hon. member will look into other departments and consider all the various branches I think he will find that is not an unreasonable telephone bill for a year for a department doing the amount of business we are doing.

Mr. Knowles: And that includes your offices across the country?

Mr. Howe: Yes. We have offices in every large city as well as in Washington. These are the total expenses of operating the Department of Defence Production, and I suggest they are not excessive. In fact I may be back in the fall for a little more money, because the department is somewhat larger than we thought it would be.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Chairman, before the minister leaves that, let me point out that my criticism was not so much of the amount of $5 million. My criticism was that the break-down did not give us information that I think we should have. I quite agree with the minister that that item is not broken down into departments the same as the other government departments are broken down, and that is the reason that it appears as $5 million for administration.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, may I point out that other departments of government have a background of experience. This is a new department. We had only a very indefinite idea of how large a personnel would be required. We simply said that one thousand persons at $3,000 each would be a reasonable estimate of the salaries, and we estimated forty per cent for overhead, which is about normal for other departments. We put in the estimate on that ground. After we have been operating for a year or two, I think we will be able to give you a break-down in considerable detail.

Mr. Hansell: Now, would the minister answer the Tucker question?

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend has brought politics into the discussion. I may say there are no politics in the Department of Defence Production. I do not understand Alberta politics. I do not understand why Albertans send the political representatives that they do send here, and I am not altogether clear about Saskatchewan politics. I would suggest that if he would wait a year or two he will have a chance to find out. After a Liberal government is in power in Saskatchewan, he can form his own conclusions on that area.

Mr. Harrison: I am pleased to see that the minister has not been overcome by the gloomy speeches we have had from the other side. His last statement indicates that is so. We have had two or three speeches from Saskatchewan members saying that we have not had a share of defence orders in that province. I do not think the minister is in a position to place many orders in that province. He has to have defence materials now, and we are not in a position to give him those materials, being an agricultural province. I would gladly trade any possibility of getting defence contracts for an indication from the minister and the government that they would go ahead with the Saskatchewan dam. Then, when that is completed, we would be in a position to talk about contributing something in the line of materials that could be used for defence.

It was also suggested by the three members I mentioned that the policies of the minister and this government are contributing to taking people out of Saskatchewan. I find that the opposite is the case. As a matter of fact, the very fine policies of the Minister of Trade and Commerce are going to put some five or six thousand people in my riding within the next two or three years. In 1948, not one person lived in that area. I am speaking of the northern part of my riding. The policy with respect to uranium production under Eldorado Mining and Refining at Beaverlodge lake will mean additional population. They went in there in 1948 for exploratory work. Since that time the government has spent something like a million dollars a year there, and I was pleased to hear the announcement in the house today that they would spend $2 million there this year. I understand that in 1952 they will send in a mill, and it will be in operation in 1953 to reduce the ore and concentrate it for shipment.

As I say that is distinctly at variance with the opinion of my friends who believe that the policies of this government are taking people out of Saskatchewan. I believe if they were to look over the policies of the provincial government in Saskatchewan, as run by their own group, they would find they are taking people out of the province. I should like somebody to tempt me to cite some cases. I do not need to explain it so far as my constituents are concerned, because they are well aware of the fact. To give you just one instance, in the timber industry in my particular riding the policies of the government of the province of Saskatchewan have materially affected the population. They have a policy whereby the timber must be delivered to the provincial timber board. According to provincial government returns last year, it must be delivered at an average price of $30, and must be delivered to the nearest government lumber yard which might be fifty miles away. Hon. members will know that you cannot produce lumber for $30. In the immediate vicinity of Meadow Lake, thirteen mills moved out to Alberta. On being advised of this the minister of natural resources said he was glad to hear of it, and it was good riddance. Those are the policies these gentlemen follow.

I should like to suggest to you that if federal policy ran along parallel lines we would soon not have any people in the province at all. I want to thank the minister sincerely for the effort he is making in my riding, because it is going to have a great effect on the population in the next two or three years. We are now in the atomic age. Uranium is a top commodity the world over. We hope it will not always be used for destructive purposes. It has already been used for medical purposes to humanity's great benefit. I want to thank him for his policy, and for the great benefit it has been.

Mr. Knowles: I would be grateful if the minister would expand a bit on what he had to say this morning with respect to the mechanical transport division of his department. The reason I express that desire is because, as the minister knows, both management and employees of the automotive industry are concerned about their situation. When the minister was speaking this morning he said that orders had been placed for 456 three-quarter-ton military trucks, and 780 two and a half ton military trucks. As I understood it, no other firm orders had yet been placed by the mechanical transport division, although he said that the Ford people were studying the quarter-ton, four by four jeep.

Now, as the minister knows, delegations have been coming to Ottawa representing both management and employees in the automotive industry. In fact, representatives of the United Automobile Workers are in Ottawa today. They are, in fact, genuinely concerned about the employment situation. They point out that there are three things that are affecting their situation. One is the volume of defence orders. Their claim is that there do not seem to be enough orders for defence production to take the place of civilian production, which it seems to be the desire of the government to curtail. The second factor that interests them is that of the supply of steel. I understand that one of the automobile plants has as large an inventory of steel as it has ever had, but some of the other plants are facing a shortage of steel. There is, in addition, a third factor which concerns them. While it does not come directly under the minister's department, still it is related to the whole problem, and I am sure he must be interested in it. It is the impact of credit controls. These employees, the members of the union, as well as the management, point out that the effect of stringent credit controls is a lessening in the purchase of new cars. That results in the supply of new cars piling up and the fear that there may be layoffs. No one suggests that we should facilitate the manufacture and the purchase of new cars by easing credit restriction and by other means, if that plant and equipment and those men are needed to produce defence materials. But if defence orders are not being placed they feel that steps should be taken to make sure that these employees are kept on the job.

That would seem desirable not only from the standpoint of the men themselves, which in my view is a major consideration, but also from the standpoint of defence. It is no help to the defence program if important plants, such as our automobile plants, are allowed to stand idle. I have every confidence that this matter is of concern to the minister, and that he and his department are giving attention to it. I must say however that, having had representations from the members of the United Automobile Workers who are in town today, when the minister spoke this morning and gave these figures that I have repeated, namely, 456 trucks of one kind and 780 of another kind, it did seem to bear out their statement to me that the orders being placed with the automobile firms in Oshawa, Windsor and in other places here in Ontario really provide work for only a very few weeks.

I need not spell the problem out in any greater detail than that. It does seem to call for consideration, I would say, of the points they have emphasized, namely, the question as to what defence orders are in prospect for automobile plants, the question of the supply of steel and also the question as to whether or not the Minister of Defence Production might recommend to his colleague the Minister of Finance a relaxation of the credit controls on the purchase of cars.

There is another subject that I want to raise, which is completely different. I would be glad if the minister would comment at this time on the automobile employment situation.

Mr. Howe: I gave the size of orders for automobile equipment that have been filed with the department so far. My hon. friend will understand that the Department of Defence Production does not initiate orders for fighting equipment. These come from the services. The fact that the army is not using its own vehicles in any combat area of course limits the number of vehicles that the army requires for its present purposes. We are, however, tooling up to provide for substantial production of two types of vehicles, namely, the two and one-half ton truck and the one and one-quarter ton 4 x 4, and we hope shortly to settle the provision of tooling for the jeep, which has been a troublesome matter from the start, but which I think is practically in hand at the moment. We must tool for large production. In the last war the vehicles program was the largest program we had. We built some 800,000 vehicles, if my memory serves me right. In case of war it will again be a very large program. But one of the difficulties about defence production is that we have to be ready for any eventuality, but we can only produce to meet the requirements that come to us from time to time.

It has been suggested that the automobile companies are in trouble due to the lack of steel. I told the workers when they were here before that they would not be cut off from steel, and so far as Canada is concerned the automobile companies have been getting the same amount of steel they were getting before.

I think we might as well face the fact that any difficulties experienced by the automobile industry are due to the fact that they produced far more cars in the first three or four months of this year than they had ever produced in their history. Everyone knew that the budget was coming down in April, and everyone tried to buy a car before the budget came down because nearly everyone expected that the tax would be increased on cars as it was in the previous war. Now that expectation has been realized. The budget has come down and there is an increased tax, and most people have new cars. I never saw so many new cars around Ottawa in my life as I can see today. If you walk down the street here today you will see numbers of new cars. People who have not got new cars do not intend to buy them this year. Perhaps they will do so next year.

There is a limited demand for cars. I suggest that anyone who suggests that the change in the tax structure has had really no effect on the situation is not being realistic. However, taxes are out of my department and I do not care to discuss them.

Mr. Knowles: I could have spoken about taxes, but actually I spoke of credit controls.

Mr. Howe: I do not think that is the underlying difficulty.

Mr. Knowles: I still hope the department will review this serious problem and try to find some way to maintain a balance between defence needs and civilian needs, bearing in mind the desirability of keeping these men at work.

The other question on which I should like the minister to comment a little further—again this is something that he spoke about in his statement this morning—is the newsprint situation. I asked him yesterday if he would comment on that matter, and he said he would do so today when his estimates were before the house. As I listened this morning it seemed to me that in the main he dealt just with the desire of France for a quantity of newsprint, and with arrangements for meeting that request with as little impact as possible upon the producers and consumers of newsprint in this country.

There are other aspects of this problem in which we are all interested. One might anticipate a statement from the minister with regard to the price situation, particularly in the light of the newspaper reports lately on the attitude taken by the United States, but I am also interested, in fact even more so, in the supply situation here in Canada, having in mind particularly the needs of small newspapers.

It has been represented to me specifically by three or four small newspapers that they are having difficulty placing contracts with the producers and suppliers of newsprint in this country. The position taken by the companies that supply newsprint is that they have entered into contracts that exceed what they can produce; but it is still hard to explain to the small newspapers in Canada that in this country, which is perhaps the world's greatest producer of newsprint, it is not possible for them to get a reasonable share. It does not seem to be any problem for the large daily newspapers to get their supplies, although I understand that even some of them are complaining about the price, and that should be looked into as well. I should like it if the minister would say whether there is not some way in which his department, now that newsprint control is in effect, can see that these small papers get the supplies that they need.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Perhaps I could ask the indulgence of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to hold his newspaper comment for a moment or two and let us finish up with the matter of steel.

Mr. Knowles: All right, provided the minister will come back to it later.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): Quite right. Ordinary continuity in the debate might expedite matters. Before leaving the matter of steel, which was mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who knows everything about everything, perhaps some of us who know something about nothing may be permitted to say a word or two.

I am taking this opportunity to congratulate the minister on his quiet and orderly attitude towards these problems which have come to our attention lately. I am also happy to have him in such good mood. Perhaps he will not object too much to our finishing up the matter of steel before we go on to the matter of newsprint. Not very often do we find a member from an opposition party congratulating the administration or any member of the ministry on the way it handles problems. However, in connection with the administration of the supply of steel I understand the minister's difficulty, and I believe the minister realizes that I understand it.

But steel for motorcars is not half as important, to my mind, as steel for buildings of one kind or another that will not only house our people but will help build institutions of the kind required in the $30 million program of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Institutions of that kind will help restore health and strength to our community.

I am sure the minister who is in charge of the distribution of steel is in harmony and sympathy with the projects in the program of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and I am sure he will see to it that steel is provided for those projects directly connected with the welfare of our Canadian people. Those institutions are necessary so that we may house and accommodate those thousands of people who, through no fault of their own, find they must go to them.

While I make this plea now, Mr. Chairman, I realize that it is granted even before I ask it. However, I do ask that the minister see to it that these institutions, many of which are voluntary, have sufficient steel. In this way hospitals which have been dreamed of may now become a reality through the minister's administration, and through the $30 million program of the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Let us develop this point one step further. Let us see that steel is made available for nurses' homes, which are so necessary if the nurses are to have accommodation in those hours when they may rest. In contrast to a use of this kind, I draw the attention of the committee to the use as exemplified in the building of motorcars. Let anyone take a look in Windsor or in Oshawa and he will see miles upon miles of new cars. Are they necessary, or are our nurses' homes necessary? Are they necessary, or are our hospitals necessary?

When we think of steel requirements our minds turn to those essential projects so necessary for the welfare of mankind, so that there may be a sufficient number of hospital beds, proper accommodation for nurses, and other ancillary buildings. I would ask the Minister of Defence Production to think of his colleague with the $30 million who is trying to do a job.

I know the minister, whose estimates are now under consideration, will see to it that priority is given to those human requirements which are so much more necessary than the miles and miles of new motorcars one sees lined up on the streets of cities throughout Canada, and particularly east of Oshawa for a distance of a mile and a half.

I do not know whether all those motorcars are necessary; perhaps a little walking, a little more exercise, would do us some good, rather than always to drive in motorcars. But I do know these hospital requirements are necessary, and I am sure I do not need to impress that fact upon the minister. He is a sensible kind of man, Mr. Chairman. He knows the circumstances, and he supports all of us who are interested in these humanitarian endeavours.

I am sure that in his administration first things will come first, and that these other things which you, sir, and I, as younger men, did not expect would come into existence in our day and generation, will not be considered so necessary. Indeed, one of these days we may find that our grandchildren will not need legs to walk around on, at all. We do not need all these automobiles; we do not need all this steel for the automobile industry; but we do need steel to build institutions so necessary for the welfare of our people, if they are to be cared for properly and in an orderly manner.

I have risen to speak at this time because I did not want steel to go by the board without first making some representations from one branch of our economy which is so necessary. After that will come the myriad of things connected with industry.

But let us have first things first. I thank the hon. member for permitting me to turn the discussion away from newsprint for a few moments. I am pleased to have this opportunity to place the facts before the minister, although I am sure he understands them. I urge that he permit his colleague to proceed with his $30 million program, so that we may have a few more institutions to take care of our people, and so that we may have more nurses' homes, laundries and all those other buildings which are required in this modern age.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, the department is doing its best to take care of all steel requirements and, in doing so, is not overlooking the need for hospital accommodation.

The difficulty is that the demand appears insatiable. We are trying to take care of first things first, and I believe we are having some success. I believe, too, that we have some of the ablest men in the steel business assisting our steel controller and trying to stretch the steel available sufficiently to take care of requirements.

The story with respect to newsprint is quite interesting, I think. Since the last year of the war the industry has been doing its best to meet demands for Canadian newsprint, which have been coming from domestic sources and from abroad, but has never quite succeeded in doing so.

Canadian publishers in 1950 received 84 per cent more newsprint than the average consumption of Canadian newsprint during the war years 1939-45. Compared with the last year of wartime conditions and rationing—that is, 1945—Canadian publishers received in 1950 an increase of 70·6 per cent in total supply over 1945. Canadian consumption in the last four years has been as follows:

1948	306,000

Canadian consumption in the first four months of 1951 was 116,323 tons as compared with 114,787 tons in the first four months of last year. Canadian consumption is still rising. The continuation of this increased rate of consumption cannot be assured because of the reinstatement of some of our overseas obligations, particularly to the commonwealth and because of special shipments we might make as a result of recommendations by the international materials conference. However, it is expected that supplies for Canadian consumption in 1951 will be close to the record quantity of 355,000 tons provided in 1950.

Canada has been increasing its newsprint production but it has been faced with a peculiar situation. The price structure has not risen at a rate comparable with that of other paper products. It is a strange thing, but today in the United States market the pulp content of a ton of newsprint will bring more money than a ton of finished newsprint notwithstanding the expense of finishing and packaging. In other words, the pulp content of newsprint brings a higher price than the newsprint itself.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Is that Canadian pulp?

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. Howe: Yes, sulphide and groundwood pulp. The pulp that goes into a ton of newsprint will sell for more as pulp than the newsprint will sell for after the pulp has been put in and the paper finished and packaged ready for shipment.

Mr. Hansell: Why is that?

Mr. Howe: The users of newsprint have a very potent lobby, if you like. It will be noticed that whenever there is an increase in the price of Canadian paper there are congressional investigations in the United States and we have extravagant statements made, such as appear in the papers today, by senators and other responsible United States public men.

Mr. Knowles: The newspapers' case gets space in the newspapers.

Mr. Howe: They are apt to do that. I think the last increase in the price of newsprint was in November, 1950, and up to that time there had not been an increase in the price for two and a half years owing to the fact that the mills had been made more efficient and additional production was obtained without corresponding capital investment. It was thus possible for the mills to absorb the increased costs, and costs have increased for everything they use, without making any substantial increase in the price of newsprint.

Mr. Hatfield: Can they find a market for all the pulp they could manufacture?

Mr. Howe: Perhaps not. They have not tried to sell it that way. I am simply saying that they could sell it that way if they wanted to. Since the termination of world war II price controls in the United States, newsprint prices in that country have advanced 26·2 per cent. In comparison, since the end of controls in the United States, book paper prices have advanced 54·3 per cent; craft paper prices have advanced 63·1 per cent; paperboard prices by 91·2 per cent; and tissue papers by 93·4 per cent. If the price of newsprint had risen since decontrol as much as the United States government pulp and paper index, newsprint prices would now be $143 a ton instead of the announced price of $116 per ton. If the price had risen as much as the weighted average index shown for the four major grades, the price would now be $145 per ton.

The effect of this has been that no new major capital expenditures have been made. There have been ten major pulp developments in Canada since the war but there have been no major newsprint developments. The result is, as I have said, the price of pulp is greater than the price of the same pulp put into newsprint. Another effect has been that United States mills which formerly produced newsprint have been converted to the production of more profitable lines, such as tissue papers, wallboard and products other than newsprint. The brunt of furnishing North America with newsprint has fallen very largely on Canada.

It is a fine business, but at the same time I think the business is entitled to a price for its product which will allow it to grow and keep up with the demand. Recently the newsprint industry has been faced with a reduction in the work week from 48 hours to 40 hours and in addition to that there has been an increase in the weekly take-home pay. It has been faced with increased costs for its woods operations and for all supplies that it has to buy.

When we were informed that the Abitibi paper company found it necessary to declare an increase in the price after July 1, the situation was explored carefully because we knew from experience the political repercussions that would follow any change in the price of newsprint. The matter was referred to the economic committee of the cabinet whose report was considered by the full cabinet. In view of the facts disclosed by our own officials we felt that we could not object to the $10 increase which the industry, as represented by Abitibi, found necessary and therefore we took no action in the matter.

Mr. Knowles: I thank the minister for the statement he has made, but there are two or three questions I should like to ask. The minister gave both percentages and absolute figures concerning the consumption of newsprint within Canada since the end of world war II. Has the minister comparable figures showing the quantities of newsprint that have been exported from Canada?

Mr. Howe: The quantities exported to the United States were as follows:

1947	3,685,000
1948	3,881,000
1949	4,056,000
First quarter, 1951	1,042,000

The Canadian consumption of newsprint has gone up steadily. In 1947 it was 6·9 per cent of all paper consumed in North America; in 1948, 7·3 per cent; 1949, 7·6 per cent; 1950, again 7·6 per cent; and for the first quarter of 1951, 7·8 per cent.

Mr. Knowles: I thank the hon. member for these further figures. In fact it was the last figures that I was anxious to get. Now another question. Is the price obtained for newsprint in Canada the same as is obtained for newsprint exported to the United States?

Mr. Howe: It is a trifle less, the differential being a survival of war controls. I think it is $4 per ton less at the mill for newsprint supplied to Canada than for newsprint for export.

Mr. Knowles: I have one other question. I note that there has been a fairly substantial increase in the absolute number of tons consumed in Canada, 275,000 tons in 1947 and 355,000 tons in 1950. It would appear that the figure would be about the same for 1951. It is 116,323 for the first four months, and if you multiply that by three it comes out close to the 1950 figure. I should like to know whether the minister can give any sort of idea as to how that increase has been divided between the large dailies and the smaller papers, both dailies and weeklies, that are trying to get established. I have in mind three or four smaller papers that report considerable difficulty in getting the newsprint they need. They are aware of the fact that there is such a thing as newsprint control, and that there have been these increases in newsprint consumed in Canada. Is there not some way in which, in view of the increased quantities that appear to be available for consumption in Canada, these smaller papers can get their proportionate share?

Mr. Howe: It is difficult for every newspaper in the world to get additional newsprint. There is hardly a week goes by that there are not two or three important publishers from somewhere in the world in my office demanding that we give them an increased amount of newsprint. My hon. friend knows there is newsprint on the New York market selling for around three times the price of contract newsprint just because it is free newsprint. It is not easy to take care of new demands because they come from every quarter in the world. I think Canada is perhaps losing more good will through newsprint than anything else because we cannot take care of the requirements of all countries that think we should help them out in this situation. I have gone into the matter pretty carefully, and I believe our industry is trying to do a real job with Canadian newsprint. Certainly no Canadian contract has ever been varied as far as the news trade is concerned. Two or three years ago, shortly after the war, any newspaper could contract for all the paper it wished, and most newspapers did contract directly with the mills for their supplies. These contracts have been taken care of and increased from time to time as the situation warranted. However, I think the newspapers to which my hon. friend refers are taken care of ordinarily by jobbers. There again I think the jobbers try to take care of the situation that they are supposed to take care of, weekly papers and papers with small circulation.

Mr. Knowles: Do jobbers handle newsprint that comes in rolls?

Mr. Howe: Oh, I think so. I cannot say definitely. I am not a technician in the newsprint business.

Mr. Knowles: I do not think so. As to newsprint that comes in rolls, there are small papers—not the smallest in the country—that require rolls to produce their publications, and it is that type to which I refer.

Mr. Howe: I cannot say. A committee representing the weekly newspapers association came to see me a while ago saying that they would like more newsprint. I asked them who their supplier was, and they mentioned one or two jobbers. I do not know about newsprint in rolls, but I know that the industry is very anxious to take care of legitimate requirements of Canadian newspapers. I think they have gone to quite unusual lengths to do so considering the pressure that is on them from other sources to supply more newsprint. If there are hardship cases, and if they are brought to my attention, I will be glad to have them examined by the proper authorities.

Mr. Knowles: I thank the minister for that assurance.

Mr. Hatfield: Could the minister tell us what the increase is for other paper products in Canada besides newsprint?

Mr. Howe: I do not know.

Mr. Hatfield: Paper boxes and bags.

Mr. Howe: I have not that information. About 1,250,000 cords of pulpwood, which would be sufficient to produce over a million tons of newsprint, went into products other than newsprint, that is pulps, wallboard, and products of that kind.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Would the minister consider a priority with respect to steel for a paper manufacturing plant contemplating operating at Prince George, B.C.?

Mr. Howe: There are no priorities for any industrial use except direct defence use or defence supporting. There are three or four pulp mills being built throughout the country, and they are getting on quite all right without any priorities. I dare say if the people at Prince George wish to build a pulp mill they can get on all right too. There are no official priorities for that class of work.

Mr. Green: I understand that defence contracts from countries other than Canada come under the jurisdiction of the Department of Defence Production. Could the minister tell us the situation at the present time with respect to defence contracts from countries other than Canada, and particularly from the United States? I believe that these contracts have not been up to expectations. Perhaps the minister could give us a statement with regard to that.

Mr. Howe: I could give the figures but they are rather misleading. The reason why our purchases from the United States have been high is that we need finished munitions, and they have finished munitions. The reason why their purchases in this country have not been as great is that, while they are quite willing to buy here, we have not the finished munitions to sell them. We have taken substantial orders, and they are coming in at an accelerating pace. Over a period I think there will be a reasonable balance. There is every will in the world to carry out the spirit of the agreement entered into some months ago. However, I think it would be unwise to give the figures on the orders that we have obtained from outside the country, or purchases from outside the country.

Mr. Green: The minister can give no figures either for United States contracts or from other countries?

Mr. Howe: There are practically no orders for munitions from other countries that involve payment. Of course other countries are buying raw materials and paying for them, but any munitions that are going to Europe are going as a part of our contribution to NATO. The cash purchases come from the United States. They amount to a very respectable sum, but I would not care to give a figure at the moment. I think it will be fairer to the United States to wait a few months until the impact of the negotiations now under way is fully realized.

Mr. Drew: With relation to that particular point, I wonder if the minister could give us some indication as to the extent to which there is agreement on certain types of equipment. Let me take as a specific example the walkie-talkie used for military service. I understand that orders have been placed in Canada for substantial numbers of these sets as the result of an accepted design which is regarded as a very favourable design for this type of military equipment, and that the order is on a scale that contemplates the disposal of a large quantity thereof in the United States. Can the minister say whether they have actually agreed to take this equipment from us or whether it is simply in the speculative stage at the moment?

Mr. Howe: Well, the walkie-talkie in question is really in the development stage now. The design has been discussed with a committee representing the ABC countries, and there is agreement that the design, which originated in Canada, will, if it can be brought from the development stage at a reasonable price, be standard equipment for the three countries. But we have not solicited orders for the time being. We placed an order ourselves for 50,000 sets, but we have not solicited orders from other countries nor would we be in a position to do so until we could show them a finished prototype.

Mr. Drew: Then I understand from the minister that 50,000 of these new sets have been ordered, and my information is that it is a highly efficient set, which has been developed by our own research organization. I think the minister will agree that Canada itself would not have use for more than 5,000 of these sets at the outside.

Mr. Howe: That is correct.

Mr. Drew: If we have placed an order for 50,000 and we could not use more than 5,000 ourselves, does this represent the absence of a sufficient measure of agreement as between the NATO countries, if we have placed a definite order for ten times what we can use without a commitment on the part of our associates to take the sets?

Mr. Howe: No, it does not represent that. It represents a belief on our part that the requirements of the three countries will run to 50,000 sets, and that if this set is all it is believed to be at the moment by the experts of the three countries those 50,000 sets will be in demand. If it is not up to the mark, if the set does not perform as the three countries believe it will, production will be stopped and Canada will absorb the development expense. Certainly Canada would not place a large order for walkie-talkie sets it could not use. The orders we have placed at the moment are tentative and will be confirmed if the set when actually produced lives up to its promises.

Mr. Drew: The information the minister has given confirms the information I had received, which prompted my question. This brings me back to certain remarks I made earlier in the day. The minister will correct me if I am wrong, but I understand the United States is actually proceeding with the construction of another walkie-talkie set.

Mr. Drew: If that is the case then are we not seeing evidence here that even at this stage of the development of our defence program for this emergency we are not reaching agreement quickly enough in regard to vitally important questions of supply? Is that not right?

Mr. Howe: Well, I think the United States walkie-talkie now being developed is based on the same design as our own; but even with respect to walkie-talkie sets, which are fairly important pieces of war equipment, I do not think the United States would depend entirely upon a source of production outside the country. The United States usually follows the practice of having two sources of supply, even though both may be in their own country. I think everything being produced for the United States in Canada is a second source of supply to a source within the United States.

Mr. Drew: The minister has explained that the requirements of the NATO countries are estimated at 50,000 sets, which is the order already placed with a Canadian producer. If that is so and the United States is, as I understand and as it would seem the minister agrees, proceeding with the production of another type of walkie-talkie which has substantial differences to that we are producing, then it would seem that this would greatly affect the total number we might sell, having regard to the fact that obviously the United States would be the largest consumer of that type of equipment. I mention the walkie-talkie not because I am suggesting—

Mr. Howe: It is not a very typical example.

Mr. Drew: I think it is. I am not suggesting for a moment that the strength or weakness of the army is going to depend on a walkie-talkie. Nevertheless I do suggest that it is an important piece of equipment, and I also suggest that what is happening in this case is illustrative of a difficulty that is being encountered in getting decisions, and that in many cases certain jealousies as to who shall produce a certain article are entering into these decisions.

I come back to what I said earlier. The minister has indicated that Canada has been forced to delay the actual commencement of production of rifles and machine guns because of the failure of the governments of the United States and United Kingdom to standardize on one accepted pattern. I thought I made it clear this morning that I was not criticizing the Canadian government for any failure to achieve uniformity in that case, because this government could not do it. I was urging the Canadian government to use its good offices to seek a further meeting, and to impress upon the other governments our feeling of urgency in regard to this aspect of the problem. The minister mentioned the fact that there had been agreement in regard to the standardization of some fourteen types of weapons.

Mr. Howe: I do not want to mislead my hon. friend. The Minister of National Defence says that about four hundred items have been agreed to, but of those fourteen are important and the others are minor.

Mr. Drew: There is a vast difference, of course, between the four hundred items and the weapons. We all know what the important weapons are. We know that as yet there is no agreement in regard to rifles and machine guns. When we speak of standardization, it has its primary effect upon the organization of the land forces. The next weapons we come to are the artillery weapons. Today the minister explained that we have decided to adopt the 105 millimetre and 155 millimetre howitzers in place of the 25-pounder and the 5·5 howitzer. I understand, and I would wish to be corrected if I am wrong, that there is not an agreed standard between the governments of the United States and the United Kingdom in regard to those weapons. Is that correct?

Mr. Howe: I had the other understanding, but I do not want to be too positive. I think at the moment we are discussing a good deal of classified material. I can tell my hon. friend, if it will comfort him, that we are making 155 millimetre howitzers for the United Kingdom, so I assume that is a standard.

Mr. Drew: Is that on a firm order?

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Drew: The reason I ask is because it might be on a firm order or it might be on the same basis as the walkie-talkies.

Mr. Howe: No.

Mr. Drew: Surely the minister must know whether in fact there has been agreement. After all, these are not merely decisions of two nations; they are decisions that affect NATO preparations. I know this has been under discussion, and I know there is agreement as to the desirability, but surely the minister is in a position to say whether in fact there is formal agreement between the government of the United States and the government of the United Kingdom that the 105 millimetre and 155 millimetre howitzers will be the standard weapons.

Mr. Howe: In the first place, I am speaking about a matter that my hon. friend will appreciate is not my concern. That is a matter for the armed services. If I said there was agreement, I would be saying what I believe. If the hon. member asked the source of my information, I could not tell him. I can only say that the army does not ask us to go into large scale production on an item which has not been agreed upon among the three countries, and we have been asked to go into large scale production on the 105 and 155 millimetre guns. So I am assuming that they are standard to the three countries. I think I am correct in the assumption, but I am not the man to answer that question. In fact, the whole matter of standardization is outside my province. It is a matter for the armed services.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Defence Production has indicated the very close association of these two departments in all that they do. The activities of these departments are closely interlocked by virtue of the fact that the Department of Defence Production is the department which interprets in terms of actually finished articles the requirements of the Department of National Defence. The Department of National Defence establishes its requirements, and the Department of Defence Production then takes steps to bring those requirements into production. It seems to me that in the discussion of defence production this is directly related to the effectiveness of what we are doing, and this is the appropriate time to emphasize the tremendous urgency of some decision in regard to standardization. Whatever minister is responsible, the government itself should be ready to take whatever steps are necessary to seek some conclusion in regard to standardization, if in fact the emergency is of the nature that has been explained to us and that justifies the tremendous sum of money we are called upon to approve.

I know that the Minister of Defence Production did not seek to convey the impression but unintentionally the suggestion was left that we have not achieved standardization in regard to only two of the weapon categories, rifles and machine guns, whereas we have achieved some measure of standardization in other fields. I would point out that the infantry is still the most important segment of the whole defence formation from the aspect of the occupation and holding of any area. To a large extent the character and ultimate form of all our defence forces is determined by the organization of the infantry and the other land forces. The characteristics of these land forces are largely decided by the type of weapons they possess. For that reason the rifle and the machine gun are, in fact, the basic equipment of the whole defence system, although they may appear to be relatively unimportant weapons in themselves as compared with aerial bombs, mortars, field guns and equipment of that kind. The aircraft and even the ships are simply methods by which the power of any nation is asserted for the ultimate purpose of making it possible for the infantry to do its job. For that reason I suggest it is of critical importance that there should be standardization of these weapons.

The Minister of Defence Production has stated that we are not proceeding with the manufacture of rifles and machine guns, at a time when we have been told we face this great crisis. He has explained we are not proceeding with that because uniformity has not been established between the governments of the United States and the United Kingdom. I would ask the minister if he will give an undertaking that the Canadian government will take whatever steps can be taken to bring about a further meeting, in the hope that this may be achieved.

I hope I have demonstrated in my remarks today that I am seeking to aproach this subject conscious of what I regard as its vital importance. I have sought to divorce from the arguments I have presented on this subject some of the very strong views I hold in regard to detailed aspects of this whole problem. I have done it because I believe that if we could establish some measure of unanimity in our expression as to the immense importance of achieving these results, and if word went from here that the Canadian House of Commons had indicated fairly clearly that we felt that every conceivable step should be taken by the governments of the United Kingdom and the United States to achieve standardization now to the advantage of all members of the Atlantic community, that might produce extremely important results.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Chairman, I should like to support the leader of the opposition in the plea he has just made. I said something about this in the house on May 9, and it appears on page 2867 of Hansard. Canada, more than any other country on the face of the earth of which I know, desires standardization. We have to work with Britain and the United States, and our work, either in war or peace, is made much easier if they work together; that is fundamental. We have worked on standardization committees over the last five years with the representatives of the armed forces and civilian industry of Britain and the United States. We hoped for success. We hoped that we might achieve common standards, not only with regard to screw threads and industrial materials but also a large number of weapons. Unfortunately, that was not achieved in respect to the fundamental weapon of all, the rifle.

We have now the announcement of a failure to agree between Britain and the United States. Britain has announced her intention to adopt the ·280 calibre for her rifle and related weapons and the United States is going to retain its present ·300 calibre round or adopt another. Meanwhile we have a large supply of ·303 rifles and ammunition. We believe that this is an exceedingly important crossroads. We believe that if the extreme claims made by the British for the ·280 are completely admitted, and if at the same time the claims by the United States for the ·300, or whatever other type they adopt, are completely admitted, all the combined advantages of the claims made by both will be more than outweighed by the loss of the advantage of agreeing on something together.

We believe that this is of extreme importance. On that account we have made representation at every level to try to bring the United Kingdom and the United States together. If this failure to agree continues, it not only affects the development programs of Britain and the United States and the countries of Europe, but far more it affects ourselves because we are a surplus producer. We can produce far more rifles or any type of equipment than we could use ourselves. We want to produce something that will be of the utmost use to all the North Atlantic treaty nations. All we ask is that there shall be agreement.

I believe the time has come when this vital matter of the rifle, and the calibre of ammunition, the type of arm common to all nations and essential in all forces, must be decided. A new approach must be made if necessary, and that is that General Eisenhower and the standing group should be asked to call into consultation the nations concerned to see if they cannot reconcile their differences. Agreement at this stage is of paramount importance. I am in full agreement with the leader of the opposition. But also I do recognize the difficulties that have been facing Britain and the United States in arriving at agreements for technical reasons, for reasons of the background behind all of their weapons. Now a fresh approach should be made, and on that account I addressed myself a communication to the minister of defence of Britain and the secretary of defence of the United States, asking them to try again to arrive at some means to an agreement. They, with the members of the other North Atlantic treaty nations, should now ask General Eisenhower himself to call into consultation at any level the required personnel to arrive at an agreement on something so that we shall stand together on this fundamental weapon and show that we can agree on making progress through co-operation together.

Item agreed to.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

77. To provide capital assistance for the construction, acquisition, extension or improvement of capital equipment or works by private contractors engaged in defence contracts, or by crown plants operated on a management-fee basis, or by crown companies under direction of the Minister of Defence Production, subject to approval of treasury board, $50,000,000.

Mr. Green: This item provides for capital assistance to three groups of corporations. First of all there are the private contractors engaged in defence contracts, then the crown plants operated on a management-fee basis and, thirdly, crown companies under the direction of the Minister of Defence Production. What companies or crown plants will benefit from this vote?

Mr. Howe: It is practically all Canadian Arsenals.

Mr. Green: I would like the minister to include the three classes, namely the private contractors, the crown plants and the crown companies.

Mr. Howe: These are capital assistance projects:

Aviation Electric Limited; machinery for instruments, $119,055.

Canadair Limited; equipment for F-86 aircraft, $6,688,726.

Improved airport facilities, $95,304.

Light Alloys Limited; magnesium castings; building, $1,320,000; equipment, $932,960; housing, $200,000.

A. V. Roe; Orenda engines and air frames for CF-100, $9,350,000; equipment, $36,500.

Those are some of the principal capital expenditures which have been approved to date. There are others in the offing. A long list of items is under consideration. Does my hon. friend want to have the whole list?

Mr. Green: Would there be any objection to putting it on Hansard?

Mr. Howe: I think there would be, because a good many of these negotiations have not been finalized.

Mr. Green: The companies the minister has listed are all private companies, are they?

Mr. Howe: Yes.

[Mr. Claxton.]

Mr. Green: No crown companies included in that list?

Mr. Howe: That is right. The crown companies are:

Canadian Arsenals Limited; rehabilitation of hexachlorethane plant at Brownsburg, $150,000; rehabilitation of explosives plant, Valleyfield, $5,500,000; electronics division; $800,000 at St. Paul l'Ermite; $3,500,000 at Scarborough. Guns and ammunition division, $6,200,000. That is the list, I believe.

Mr. Green: Are they in the category of crown plants operated on a management-fee basis?

Mr. Howe: No. My hon. friend will understand that all the facilities created by capital assistance are the property of the crown. To that extent they are operated not on a management-fee basis but under the management of the plant in which the equipment is installed.

We have only one management-fee contract, and that is the Valleyfield explosives plant which is being operated by Defence Industries Limited on a management-fee basis. That is the former arsenal. It was not used for several years and had fallen into a state of disrepair. It is being put back into condition and operated by Defence Industries Limited.

Mr. Green: Would Emerald mine come under that category, also?

Mr. Howe: Yes, Emerald mine is being operated under a management-fee contract for the account of the crown. It is a cost-plus-10-per-cent contract.

Mr. Green: What company operates that mine?

Mr. Howe: I do not remember the name offhand, but it is the company of which Mr. Charles A. Banks of Victoria is president.

Mr. Green: The company which owns the rest of the property?

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Green: Yesterday a bill was introduced providing for an extension of the Canadian National Railways from Sherridon to Lynn lake, Manitoba. The explanation was given that the Department of Defence Production was providing $4,725,000 for that line. Would that amount come under this vote, or does it come out of the revolving fund of the department? If from neither of these sources, from what source does it come?

Mr. Howe: It is a capital assistance item, and the funds come from this vote. The situation there was that the government was very anxious to bring in a nickel property at Lynn lake. The company who owned the discovery were able to finance the development of the mine and of the smelter to treat the ore, but they found it impossible to finance also any large part of the railway line. The estimated cost of the railway was about $14,800,000. It was decided, after a good deal of discussion, that the railway would provide $5 million, which they considered the amount which would be economical from the earnings point of view, and the company undertook to finance $5 million. The government undertook to finance the balance as capital assistance to the project.

Mr. Green: Apparently there is some provision for repayment by the company of at least part of the money advanced by the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Green: Is there a similar provision for money being advanced by the Department of Defence Production, or is that money to go into the line and, in effect, become part of the assets of the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. Howe: That is right. It is capital assistance to the project on an out-of-pocket basis. There is no recovery of that amount.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): The minister mentioned $3,500,000 for Scarborough. What is that?

Mr. Howe: That is a plant for the assembly of early warning radar sets. It is being constructed at Scarborough.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): In the township of Scarborough?

Mr. Howe: Yes. It is to be operated by Canadian Arsenals Limited.

Mr. Green: Do I understand that none of this $50 million will be recovered?

Mr. Howe: Oh yes; we own the properties we create, with the single exception of the railway to Lynn lake which will be owned by the Canadian National Railways. But in every other case the asset which is created by the $50 million is owned by the crown. I presume the procedure followed after the last war will be followed after this emergency, whereby the asset will be sold in the best market available.

Mr. Green: Are there any projects in contemplation similar to the extension of a railroad to Lynn lake. Mind you, I am not quarrelling with that extension.

Mr. Howe: No, that is an unusual project.

Mr. Green: There are no similar plans in mind?

Mr. Howe: No.

Mr. Knowles: The minister has answered in part the question I am going to ask, namely as to what would happen to the assets which the crown would own in cases where extensions to private plants are built at government expense. The minister says that presumably they would be sold as they were after world war II. Can he give us any figures as to the total amount that was expended in that way during world war II and what we got back when those assets were sold after the end of the war?

Mr. Howe: I do not remember the investment figure but I recall that the recovery was over $600 million. I think we recovered about 65 per cent of the amount invested.

Mr. Knowles: We are not now buying back any of those assets that we sold, are we?

Mr. Howe: The only case, I think, is the Emerald mine.

Mr. McLure: Will the money being spent on these properties be for the manufacture of shells, cartridges, small arms, as well as the other items needed in defence production?

Mr. Howe: The hon. member will appreciate that at present the demand for shells is not great. The army is not fighting where Canadian shells are used. However, we are setting up capacity for shell manufacture, largely in government arsenals. The actual production of shells will not commence on a full scale until war actually breaks out.

Mr. McLure: The father of Canadian munitions who was most successful in 1914 and the last war was Colonel Weatherby, whom the minister knows very well. I was hoping that when the government began to manufacture things of that kind he might be employed once more and consideration given to my province in that connection. There is no doubt about his success in getting out munitions.

I sincerely hope that the minister will consider my province in connection with defence contracts, and particularly Charlottetown where there are real mechanics, good labourers and fairly good machinery.

Mr. Howe: That has been attended to already. The great manufacturing firm in Charlottetown is Bruce Stewart and Company and they now have enough work modernizing frigates to keep them going for some time. I presume that after that there will be other work. I would point out also that there is an active air station on the island which is good for that particular locality.

Mr. Brooks: Before asking what questions I have to ask I should like to request that the minister do as much as he can for New Brunswick. This afternoon the minister said that some $81 million had been spent in Quebec, $87 million in Ontario and a little over $2 million in New Brunswick in a certain period of time. That has been our proportion for some time. According to population that would work out to about $4 per head, while in the central provinces it would be from $25 to $30 per head.

I know that this is a difficult problem but I know also that the minister has been accustomed to dealing with difficult problems. I am satisfied that if he gives this problem his full attention he can work out a solution. The location of defence industries in our provinces—I am speaking more particularly for my own province—would be of great assistance. I know that hundreds of young men are leaving every week for central Canada. They have to close up their homes. Anyone reading the reports of houses built in the different provinces during the last few months will have noted that fewer houses were constructed in New Brunswick than in any other part of Canada.

The last time I was home three young veterans, men with families, came to my office to see if I could help them sell their homes. They said that they were moving to Toronto with their families. They all had nice homes but they were being forced to sell them at only a fraction of what they had paid. They told me that they were having great difficulty in finding houses to live in in Toronto. I should like to read what the Toronto Globe and Mail had to say about the housing situation in Toronto and how it affected those who were moving in from New Brunswick and other outlying areas. I quote:

> Men ought to be moving from places like New Brunswick, where they aren't needed to places like Toronto, where they are. But, with this region's critical housing shortage, they shouldn't be family men.

According to the Toronto Globe and Mail, young unmarried men should be leaving our province to come to Toronto to get work, but family men should stay at home and do the best they can. The situation is serious in New Brunswick and I do hope the minister is giving it every attention he can. Speaking this morning the minister said that repair facilities for aeroplanes were being established everywhere across Canada. May I have the minister's attention?

Mr. Howe: I read that article some time ago and I do not think it has much to do with this debate. We are not discussing housing.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. Brooks: That is the attitude the minister always takes when this question of the distribution of industry is brought up. As a member coming from the maritime provinces I feel I should plead our case. We feel strongly about this situation and I feel sure that the minister can correct it if he will. I pay him that compliment. I said at the outset that he is accustomed to dealing with difficult problems, and this is a difficult problem. We in the maritime provinces have the same rights as people in any other part of Canada and it is up to the government of this country to see that the people in that part of Canada are treated in the same way as others. I do not intend to take any brush-off from the minister or anybody else in this connection. I would also like to have the minister listen to what I am saying.

Mr. Howe: When the hon. member speaks about housing conditions in Ontario I would remind him that I live right here in Ontario while he lives in New Brunswick.

Mr. Brooks: That is quite true, but you are the minister for Canada in this connection.

Mr. Howe: I am fully aware of that. Also, I was a maritimer before the hon. member was.

Mr. Brooks: You were also a United States citizen before you were a Canadian, but that has nothing at all to do with this. I should like to ask where repair facilities are being established across Canada, and whether any are being established in the maritime provinces? I should like to ask him where the $200 million is being spent for shipbuilding which the minister told us this morning was being spent in Canada. I should also like to ask him what assistance is being given to small industries in the province of New Brunswick and the other maritime provinces to assist them to become established. These are very important matters to us indeed, and I should like the minister to answer my questions and tell us what is being done in my own province so far as industries are concerned.

Mr. Lesage: We are on item 77.

Mr. Brooks: I know where we are.

Mr. Howe: Do you know where you are?

Mr. Brooks: Yes, I know where I am.

Mr. Howe: To correct the figure of $2 million that the hon. member used, contracts placed in New Brunswick by the Department of Defence Production in the year 1951 total $7,281,043.

Mr. Brooks: I was quoting the figures the minister gave this morning when he said that $81 million had been spent in Quebec, $87 million in Ontario, and a little over $2 million in New Brunswick in a certain period of time. It was not the figure for 1950. It was concerning another period.

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend asked what we are doing in shipbuilding. Within the last week a contract has been placed for the repair and overhaul of five ships, two minesweepers and three frigates, with the Saint John Drydock Company.

Mr. Brooks: That is repair, but what about shipbuilding?

Mr. Howe: Certain ships are being built there. I have not the figures before me. I think one of them is a lighter. I do not remember what the others are, but my hon. friend should have some idea what is going on in his own province. Then he would not have to cross-examine me on it. I have to think of ten provinces, not just one.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Howe: Now we will have it.

Mr. Drew: That is the kind of remark that makes it difficult to deal with the minister in terms that produce the best results. It was an absolutely uncalled for affront to a member who is trying to get information from the man who is under an obligation to give it to this committee. It is not for the minister to tell any member that he should find out. It is for the minister to answer questions in committee.

Mr. Howe: Thank you very much for that instruction.

Mr. Drew: You need instruction.

Mr. Howe: That is the result of your long experience in this house.

Mr. Drew: If the minister—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The leader of the opposition has contended that the remarks made by the Minister of Defence Production are tantamount to an affront to the hon. member for Royal. The words used by the minister were to this effect: The hon. member for Royal knows the situation in his province and therefore does not have to cross-examine me. Apparently the minister contended that the hon. member for Royal should know some of the facts himself. Alluding to that statement, the leader of the opposition said that it constituted an affront to the hon. member for Royal. Of course the words complained of should be complained of by the hon. member for Royal if they constitute a question of privilege. We are now dealing with an item and remarks must be relevant to the item.

Furthermore, I might add that in Beauchesne, third edition, citation 418 says that the ordinary function of a committee such as this one is deliberation and not inquiry. It has been the practice for inquiries to be made in the discussions that have taken place in these committees. However, if it is to be a debate and not inquiry, strictly speaking the word "cross-examine" is one that could be properly used by the minister. I do not want the matter to go much further. I want members to make their remarks relevant to the item under discussion. The hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet reminded the hon. member for Royal that we were on item 77, and if I understood the hon. member for Royal correctly it may be that he may have thought we were still on item 76, which was carried before the recess.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Chairman, I am merely seeking information from the minister. So far as the other item is concerned, I was attending the veterans affairs committee this afternoon, and I was not aware that the item had been carried. It is information that I should like to have. The minister says that I should know the situation in the province of New Brunswick. Let me tell him that I know it too well, and the situation in New Brunswick is exactly what I am complaining about. I am complaining because we have not the industries that we should have. I am complaining because thousands of our young people have to go to Ontario or Quebec for employment. These are things that I do know, and what I am asking the minister to do is to see if he cannot distribute industry in some way so that we can hold our people in our province. That is the situation so far as I am concerned.

Mr. Howe: I can tell my hon. friend to start with that the nature of the answer he gets from me is very liable to follow the pattern he sets in asking the question, and that applies to what has just happened. If he will be a gentleman in asking his questions I will try to be a gentleman in giving the replies.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Brooks: I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Howe: I am on my feet.

Mr. Drew: All right, you are on your feet. I ask, Mr. Chairman, that you demand the withdrawal of a statement which is absolutely inexcusable.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Brooks: The minister has accused me of being ungentlemanly in asking my question. I think that is unparliamentary and unfair, and I would ask you, Mr. Chairman, to request the minister to withdraw that statement. I prefaced my remarks tonight by paying the minister a compliment, and it was only when he refused to answer my questions that I perhaps used a little more heat than I otherwise would have. I think it is unfair and ungentlemanly for him to make that statement, and I ask him to withdraw it.

Mr. Howe: I accept the apology and I withdraw anything I said that was offensive. I can now give my hon. friend the information he wishes. It is to be found in Hansard of June 4 in the statement made by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre in his capacity as parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence. The announcement made at that time was that a steel crane lighter will be built by the Saint John Drydock Company, and that the Saint John Drydock Company will also build two Norton class tugs. That is in addition to the alteration work that I mentioned.

Mr. Brooks: I also asked the minister about repair facilities for aeroplanes. He said that they were being established across Canada, and I wanted to know if there were any in the maritimes and where they were.

Mr. Cote (Matapedia-Matane): Don't you know? I thought you came from there.

Mr. Brooks: I hope I know as much as you do.

Mr. Howe: I cannot say. I know that one contract has been placed with the Fairey Aircraft Company of Halifax and also with the Cossor Company of Halifax. I do not recall where facilities are set up in New Brunswick, but I will be glad to make inquiries and give my hon. friend the information at the first opportunity.

Mr. Brooks: I understood the minister to say that there was a representative for the maritime provinces in the office at Ottawa.

Mr. Howe: Yes, there will be.

Mr. Brooks: Can he tell me who that representative is?

Mr. Howe: The appointment has not been made. It will be made within the next week. Two names are under consideration, and I cannot tell my hon. friend which will be chosen.

Mr. Gillis: At the risk of getting into difficulties I am going to say a few words on this item. I too was out of the house this afternoon attending the veterans affairs committee; otherwise I would have made a general statement. I am not going to do that at this time; I will stick to item 77.

[Mr. Brooks.]

This item is for defence production, which covers a very broad field. I want to refer briefly to the statement by the minister this afternoon that in the allocation of contracts for the expenditure of money for the purposes of this vote the great potential for the manufacture of munitions was in Ontario and Quebec. If that is the thinking of the department, that is the way the money will be spent under this item. I disagree with that statement. While the minister indicated this afternoon that he has done some pretty broad and comprehensive planning in the mechanics he has set up in his department, that particular statement is not correct in the light of the defence program. The great potential for munition making under present circumstances, and as we see a potential war developing, is not in the centre of Canada. In my opinion the major portion of the armed force we are building today is designed for western Europe. The whole program of arming our north Atlantic pact countries means that the munitions and equipment necessary for that purpose will have to be shipped to Europe, so the logical place to do the manufacturing is the point closest to Europe. Even though you now have an overdeveloped fabricating organization in the two central provinces, the great bulk of the raw materials are being dragged here from the east coast. That seems pretty illogical, and it tends to great waste if you haul your raw materials all the way up here, manufacture them and then haul them all the way back to the east coast again and ship them overseas from Halifax or Sydney. If the minister is realistic, as I know he is—though he may have some bad advisers who have centralized minds—he will agree with me.

Then I am convinced that this is not a short range program. This program is going to last for a long time. I believe in connection with munitions and vehicles, if you like, the minister should think in terms of allocating a large plant as near basic steel as he can get it, and in an area where labour is available. The hon. member for Royal has indicated, and he is quite right, that the greatest export from the maritimes is our young people. We have all the ingredients necessary for an economic program in connection with munitions, vehicles and things of that kind, which will have to be shipped out of the country; and they should be produced as close to the sources of raw material and labour as you can get. If this were a war we would be getting over in three or four years and we had an emergency program it would be all right to throw up your plants anywhere, as was done during the last war; but that is not the case. In my opinion this is a long range, more or less permanent program; and if the money of the taxpayers is to be fairly allocated in view of economic conditions the minister should give serious thought to the establishment of a plant or two in the area where both raw materials and shipping facilities are available.

I would like the minister to think of that, because as I see our program developing today the thinking is exactly the same as it was during the last war, when we overdeveloped industry in the central provinces, particularly in Ontario, to such an extent that a power shortage was created. That power shortage still exists, so that Ontario now is racing around the country asking for a billion dollar expenditure in the St. Lawrence so they can get more power to meet a potential industrial development in this province that is not warranted. I am leaving that thought with the minister, because certainly this is not an equitable development. I believe it is uneconomic and shortsighted, and it is not like the minister to carry on a program of that kind. I wish he would take that question under advisement. I do not believe it is good thinking to centralize everything in these two provinces, with the chance of an atomic bomb wiping out everything overnight. It is still early; this program is just getting started; it is still in the embryo stage. So I hope the minister and his advisers will sit down and seriously consider utilizing, in the part of the country where they are located, the raw materials that are being dragged across this country for fabrication.

Most of the stuff we are going to manufacture will be sent to Europe, as I have said. Having that in mind, the closest you can get to raw materials, shipping facilities and a labour supply is down on the east coast, so I leave that thought with the minister. If I had been here when the first item was called I might have developed a real argument, but I am rather restricted now. I suggest that the minister think over my observations and let us know what can be done.

Mr. Howe: I have given a good deal of thought to that situation. Last year we placed contracts in the maritimes to the extent of $28,596,000. That was direct defence purchasing by the department for which I am responsible, but there are defence supporting industries which are also very important. For instance, we regard the building of freight cars as an important defence supporting industry, and about 25 per cent of that work is carried out in the maritime provinces. The hon. member will also keep in mind that the production of coal is an important defence supporting industry. I have been very pleased at the progress made in locating industries in the maritime provinces during the past two or three years, and have tried to assist that development wherever possible. As my hon. friend knows, we have advanced a substantial sum for the mechanization of coal mines in an attempt to increase production there. We also allotted certain capital assistance to the Trenton steel works, and put in a very large press for pressing rotors for the new escort vessel program, at a cost of about two and a half million dollars. If at any time there should be an opportunity to place an industry in the maritime provinces my hon. friends both from Royal and from Cape Breton South may be sure that we will give every assistance possible.

Item agreed to.

78. To provide for research and development of jet engines and aircraft, $1,000,000.

Mr. Green: Would the minister explain this vote for research? I am wondering why it does not come under the defence department, where they have a research branch, or under the national research council. What is the reason that it is shown in a vote of the defence production department?

Mr. Howe: This was a civilian project undertaken some three years ago to assist the A. V. Roe Company Limited in developing a commercial jet transport. The transport was developed and is, I believe, a very creditable plane. Unfortunately, in times like these with the urgent need for war planes it has been decided to put that work aside. This million dollars is to settle accounts up to the time the work is put aside. If the opportunity offers a little later we hope to complete the work, and produce a Canadian-designed air transport plane powered by Canadian jet engines.

Mr. Green: It has not been carried along to the finished stage yet?

Mr. Howe: No, it is being dropped. The plane was finished and flown, as my hon. friend is probably aware. Certain improvements were suggested by the flights, and a second prototype was under way. When the need for factory space for war production became evident we decided to put the transport project aside.

Mr. Graydon: May I say a few words with respect to that. I believe the work which has been done by the A. V. Roe Company at Malton deserves a word, because in a sense they are the pioneers in the jet passenger plane field. The jet liner, which is a matter of great pride to the workmen and management at Malton, to the minister and to all of us, has put Canada rather out in the lead so far as that type of machine is concerned. It is a beautiful machine. I should think there is nothing that looks quite as graceful in the air as the new jet liner. I would fancy that as time goes on perhaps the work that has been done will provide great benefits and advantages so far as Canadian leadership in the field of civil aviation is concerned, when the opportunity finally comes for it to blossom forth. I am glad to hear that the minister has at least settled up the accounts in connection with the Orenda research, because I think a magnificent job has been done at Malton, and I am sure the minister will agree with that.

Mr. Howe: I agree thoroughly. I am sorry that the work must be suspended, but we only have so much floor space and it is needed for war production.

Item agreed to.

79. To provide for the liquidation of contracts, including commitments of previous years related to the acquisition of assets operated by the departments of munitions and supply and reconstruction and supply or an agency of these departments; the liquidation of the assets and liabilities of closed crown companies and crown plants; and for miscellaneous and unforeseen expenses, $200,000.

Mr. Green: Is this a clean-up item to finish off various old contracts, or just what is the explanation of this $200,000?

Mr. Howe: There are certain long-standing lawsuits against the department for patent rights and so on. I cannot say this is a clean-up item. We began with a clean-up item of $500,000, and we have gradually reduced it to $200,000. We have claims at the moment for $3,064,000, and we estimate that of this amount there is payable this year $144,000 plus legal costs.

Item agreed to.

80. To authorize the transfer of funds from the Canadian Commercial Corporation employees' retirement fund to the retirement fund created by the Civil Service Superannuation and Retirement Act, in respect of past contributions and accumulated interest thereon of employees transferred from the corporation to the department, $1.

Mrs. Fairclough: Will the minister tell us if there are many employees affected by this item? Approximately what is the number of employees and the amount involved in this transfer?

Mr. Howe: The employees of the Canadian Commercial Corporation have only recently been taken into the civil service superannuation and retirement act. Prior to that time, however, five per cent was deducted from their salaries under a government retirement plan that was carried on with temporary employees during the last war.

That five per cent is now transferred to the retirement fund as a credit to back retirement for the employees that have now been taken in.

Mrs. Fairclough: Does this mean that these employees are now governed by the civil service commission?

Mr. Howe: That is right. I should say they are not all transferred. There are still some employees with Canadian Commercial Corporation but the major part of the staff have been blanketed into the civil service.

Mrs. Fairclough: This just covers those who have been transferred?

Mr. Howe: That is correct.

Item agreed to.

Crown companies—

81. To provide for expenses incurred by Defence Construction Limited, in procuring the construction of defence projects on behalf of the Department of National Defence, $3,000,000.

Mr. Thatcher: Will the minister state whether any of these defence projects are on the prairies?

Mr. Howe: Yes, a good many of them are on the prairies.

Mr. Thatcher: Would the minister indicate which ones are?

Mr. Howe: This is to provide for the cost of operating the company for the services of the Department of National Defence. In other words, it is really an operating fee.

Mr. Murphy: I believe I am in order, Mr. Chairman, in raising this subject under this item, but I want to meet the wishes of the minister. I wish to speak about the Polymer explosion, but perhaps the minister would rather answer under another item?

Mr. Howe: There is no vote here for the Polymer Corporation. I do not want to stop my hon. friend, but I am sorry he did not bring it up on the general item. Personally, I have no objection to his speaking on this item.

The Deputy Chairman: There may be a supplementary item later on which the member could speak.

Mr. Murphy: I shall not be very long.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to speak on the Polymer Corporation under this item?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Murphy: I want to be quite fair in this, Mr. Chairman, and I know the minister will appreciate that. I am just hoping that after I am through the minister will promptly make a statement to the house, and to the country, respecting this important industry at Sarnia where this blast occurred. It was perhaps a miracle in many ways that it did not do more damage. I have some questions to ask the minister concerning this particular explosion. I believe the public is rather unfortunately informed about what took place, because I am inclined to believe that some of the statements that were carried in the press and over the radio were exaggerated. Perhaps this was due to the fact that statements were not immediately forthcoming from either the minister or the top management at Sarnia.

Living on the border as I do, I know that our people listen to the United States radio stations. One of them thought that this was an atomic explosion. I believe the people in Sarnia are most fortunate that it was not worse than it was. It was disastrous enough. I noticed a statement made by the minister that the damage was from $50,000 to $100,000. He may revise that statement. I think it was made immediately after the explosion. What concerns me and the people in my area, which is a chemical valley, is an article which appeared in the magazine published by the Polymer employees. The minister in his statement after the explosion did say that there had been two previous explosions. I want the members of the committee to appreciate the fact that the minister did state at that time that this particular element, butadiene, is not one of the easiest elements to handle. What disturbs so many people, apparently, is the fact that there were not two but three previous explosions, I believe, in that particular area.

Hon. members may not realize it but this tank was made of steel seven-eighths of an inch thick. Of course all the plate glass windows in the neighbourhood were blown out, and fragments of steel pipe were found a mile or a mile and a half from the scene of the explosion. I am also informed—and I think this will impress upon the committee just how serious the explosion was—that one fitting or valve weighing 26½ pounds was found a little more than a mile and a half away from the explosion. I should now like to pay a tribute to those in Polymer and to the fire department who played such an heroic part in averting what could have been much more serious.

I am now going to quote an article which appeared in the official staff publication of the Polymer Corporation. The quotation I hold in my hand was taken from the Canadian Observer, which in turn took it from an article which appeared in the company publication. It is dated Monday, May 7, 1951. It refers to an explosion in March of this year, or an averted one. It says:

> A potentially serious fire at Polymer corporation's butadiene extraction unit was averted on March 29, through the bravery of an operating crew, according to a graphic story appearing in the latest edition of the "Polysphere," official staff publication of the crown company.

Then it goes on to speak about the heroes and says:

> With absolute disregard for their personal safety, these men prevented what could have been a serious fire March 29 by shutting off escaping butadiene which was being released to the atmosphere through a ruptured butadiene product line.

The article continues:

> At approximately 4.25 p.m. on March 29, a 6-inch steel line connecting three butadiene accumulators ruptured, releasing approximately 9,000 pounds of butadiene to the atmosphere. The line ruptured with considerable report, bringing the operating crew to the scene immediately.
> Because of the dense hydrocarbon fog which enveloped the area, it was impossible to determine where the leak was coming from.

Then it goes on to speak about how three of the employees shut off the plug valves, and how McEachran, Moore and Roberts entered the dense hydrocarbon fog and tried to shut off one 6-inch plug valve, but found that they could not.

That to me is disturbing, and it is also disturbing to the people in my area. It may be that an inquiry has been held to determine why that valve could not be shut off at that time. These are elements so peculiar in their nature that we can think of explosive qualities in many of the products coming from a chemical valley.

The article continues:

> They shut off the plug valve at a header which shut off the violently roaring hydrocarbon, thus stopping the leak and giving them a chance to see the source of the leak.

The last paragraph reads:

> Cause for the line rupturings was attributed to a formation of "popcorn" which develops when pure butadiene remains dormant in a line for long periods of time. It is a risk common to industries where butadiene is used.

In one of his previous statements the minister emphasized that. I have practically every article that appeared in the press at London, Windsor, Sarnia, Toronto and so on. I am not going to deal with them in detail. I think the committee is already impressed with what happened and with what was averted. If I were speaking on civil defence I would go into it in greater detail, and I will at a later time; for what happened that night was almost a calamity because of the thousands of cars which gathered in a very few minutes.

I am going to bring my remarks to a close with some questions which I should like to have the minister answer, perhaps not tonight, but at any time that he feels so disposed. The people are entitled to it. I was hoping that an inquiry would have been held into this explosion immediately and the public properly informed of what actually happened. I was there for two days after the explosion. I did not want to bring it up at that time because I thought that I would give it more thought, and I did not want to create any commotion. Under these conditions perhaps we have to accept the unusual and take it in our stride.

There is another reference here by a former employee who dealt with an explosion earlier, and maybe at some later date I will go into it. There is some question about the statement of this particular employee who attended at a previous explosion. What alarms us down there is this. This plant is adjacent to the Imperial Oil Company refinery, which is the largest refinery in the British empire, and which is now increasing its production by about 25 per cent. Just on the other side of Polymer is the Dow chemical plant, another chemical industry. They all play an important part in our war potential.

Apparently the so-called "popcorn" is something that accumulates in a line. The minister can correct me if I am wrong, but I understand there were four explosions within eleven months, or three averted explosions. I should like to know what this so-called "popcorn" element is, and how it forms in this particular line. How rapidly does it build up? If it does build up, why is it not removed periodically? Can it form a plug in the line? It apparently did because there was notice to the people in that area that something serious was happening. A flare showed ten times as bright for two or three moments, and then shut off. Apparently the escape valve did not work. Could it form a plug in the line? Was the line failure caused by excessive pressure? Was the six-inch line of adequate strength to withstand anticipated pressure? Was the line seamless or welded? Could the line have been weakened by corrosion or other causes? If the line plugged up could the butadiene build up enough pressure to rupture the line? Are there safety valves which shut off the flow of butadiene when the pressure increases above normal operating pressure? Are those safety valves tested periodically to determine if they operate satisfactorily? There is evidence to which I have already referred that they do not operate.

[Mr. Murphy.]

Have there been other cases where similar failures have occurred in installations handling butadiene? If not, how have they been prevented?

The crew was unable to close the six-inch plugged valve. Was the plugged valve damaged by a line rupture or was it out of order because of failure to lubricate it, or for some other reason? Would a gate valve have been easier to close?

I am referring to the explosion on Sunday, May 6, 1951. I am asking if there was an investigation after the line rupture on March 29. Were any steps taken to instal safety devices and prevent further failure? Were the 30,000-gallon tanks and connecting lines of adequate strength for the anticipated pressure? Was this tank normally used for butadiene storage? Could popcorn have formed and plugged some of the equipment or the pressure release line? How did the butadiene ignite?

Those are the questions, Mr. Chairman. I doubt if the minister will be able to answer them immediately. However, I think that it may be that inquiries by those competent to make them could find some reason for this occurrence. It might have been a spark or flame in the area. Theories have been advanced. For instance, did butadiene in the line and tanks have oxygen mixed with it to form an inflammable mixture? What amount of oxygen or air is required to form an explosive mixture with butadiene?

I intended to be brief, and I hope I have been fair. I believe I would not do justice to the constituency I represent if, in the light of what took place, I failed to ask the minister for an explanation. I know some of these questions are technical, and if he is not prepared to answer them tonight it will be satisfactory if they are answered at a later date.

I should like hon. members to appreciate that those of us in that area were greatly concerned, and we were much relieved that the explosion did not do more damage. I am hopeful that we will not have three or four explosions in a year, and I am sure that with the able direction available in the Polymer Corporation management that will not take place.

I know they are working with a dangerous element. Hon. members will appreciate that in the chemical industry there is a constant fight with treacherous elements. I trust the minister will take my remarks in the spirit in which they are offered, and make some explanation to the committee.

Mr. Howe: Obviously I am not qualified to answer the questions asked by the hon. member. However, I shall be very glad to send them to Sarnia and obtain expert answers to them so that I may give them to my hon. friend at an early opportunity.

I never attempted to minimize the seriousness of the explosion which took place recently. But I think it is a remarkable tribute to the safety precautions taken at the plant that an explosion of that magnitude could happen without loss of a life, and with only very limited damage to property. I am told the damage has now all been repaired and that section of the plant is operating again at full capacity.

The plant was built by experienced chemical engineers, and it was designed in units to minimize damage from explosion. Every safety device known to man has been installed there—at least so I am informed. If as a result of this experience other safety devices are indicated, they will be installed. But I do hope that, with the experience gained from a misfortune of this kind, there may be no further difficulty.

Mr. Hosking: Mr. Chairman, I would suggest to the Minister of Defence Production that if he requires the building of any more plants, such as Polymer, we could supply him with suitable land which would not be in a densely populated area. I can assure him that we would be pleased to have them installed in the constituency of Wellington South.

The Deputy Chairman: I would remind the committee that we are discussing item 81, which is to provide for expenses incurred by Defence Construction Limited in procuring the construction of defence projects on behalf of the Department of National Defence. By unanimous consent the hon. member for Lambton West did make a brief statement concerning the explosion at the Polymer plant at Sarnia. I suggest now, however, since the minister has replied, that we return to a discussion of item 81.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Mr. Chairman, up to this time I have not taken part in this discussion, but certainly not because this subject lacks interest in Nova Scotia. I have taken it for granted, from statements made at different times to me privately and otherwise by the minister, that it is his expectation and his purpose to give a fair share of industry to Nova Scotia and the other maritime provinces. A great many people there are keenly interested. I have strong views in the matter, and have expressed them many times in the house. I have directed attention to the unfairness to our province during the last war, and up to the present, and I shall not elaborate on it in detail tonight.

I can say that any war industry established there in the past gave good results, and any that will be established under the defence production appropriation we are now considering will also succeed.

On May 23, I asked the minister what progress was being made in the establishment of a chemical industry in Nova Scotia, based upon the presence of sodium chloride and other chemicals. He replied:

> Consideration is being given to the problem. However, the project has not advanced to the point where any announcement can be made at the present time. Serious consideration is being given to it.

Unless the minister is prepared to answer at this time, I shall not press for a further statement. I would point out again that there are salt deposits in the Malagash area which have been in operation for many years. There is a tremendous tonnage there of natural salt, as well as other chemicals. There is a large salt producing industry only a few miles from my home town of Amherst. Borings have indicated a thickness of thousands of feet.

There was also a large aeroplane industry which operated with great success in Amherst during the last war. We have been expecting an announcement of further developments under the estimates we are now considering. The minister has given us encouragement as to what may be done there shortly. If he is not prepared to make a statement about it now, I shall not press him.

A wooden ship building industry was established 150 years at Port Greville on the bay of Fundy and these is little employment there now, but they have been expecting some special work. Can the minister make any announcement in that regard? I have been informed that a special representative, I presume from his department, has been visiting the wooden ship building yards in Nova Scotia.

There is a great deal more I could say, but the minister knows my views and he knows also what can and should be done in the maritime provinces. I am taking it for granted that his department is going to extend industrial activities down there and give us a share of these large expenditures and improve employment and business conditions in our part of Canada. I shall be glad to hear any announcement in respect to these or other matters the minister has to make, but I will not now press the minister any further. I will wait until he is able to state, either publicly or privately, or both, just what he is prepared to do for us in the maritimes.

Mr. Howe: I am sorry I cannot be too specific at the moment. There is great interest in our aircraft division in connection with subcontracting work at Amherst. Studies are still going ahead in the chemical field, but it takes a good deal of time to go through all the highways and byways involved in that industry. I can assure my hon. friend that the next time we are considering these estimates we shall have something worth-while to tell him.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to ask some questions about Defence Construction Limited. What is the relationship between Defence Construction Limited and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation? Who actually administers Defence Construction Limited?

Mr. Howe: Defence Construction Limited is a corporation under the Department of Defence Production. Its president is R. G. Johnson, a very experienced man who was head of construction in the department of munitions and supply during the last war. He was with the department throughout the war, but was in charge of the branch during the last year.

The staff of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is retained by Defence Construction Limited to carry out certain duties. In other words, instead of setting up branches across Canada from a standing start we thought that it was better business to retain the staff of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and have them provide additional staff when it was required. For that service we pay them a fee, which is represented in this item, of three per cent of the value of the work carried out within the period. That is supposed to represent the cost. If the fee proves to be too large it is adjusted, or a supplementary payment is made if it is found to be too small, but current balances are settled on the basis of three per cent.

Mr. Fulton: Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is the agent of Defence Construction Limited rather than Defence Construction Limited being the agent of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Can the minister tell us how many projects are under way under Defence Construction Limited for which this item is being provided?

Mr. Howe: I have not the number of projects, but the total value is $65,247,933.01.

Mr. Fulton: Is there an item elsewhere to provide for the payment of those projects because this item is only $3 million?

Mr. Howe: The projects are being carried out for the Department of National Defence and the money will come from the appropriations of that department.

Mr. Fulton: I think I see the picture now. This is purely to cover administrative costs?

Mr. Howe: That is correct.

Mr. Fulton: Has the minister information as to where the projects presently under way are located?

Mr. Howe: They are located I should think pretty well in every city in Canada. It would be a long list and I am sorry it is not available at the moment.

Mr. Fulton: Without going into particulars of that sort can the minister state the general nature of the projects? Is it housing or is it other types of construction?

Mr. Howe: Housing is handled by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for the Department of National Defence just as any other housing is handled, except that the bills are paid by the Department of National Defence. Housing is not included in this vote, but it covers almost every other kind of construction, such as fortifications, airport structures and the various types of buildings that the armed forces require.

Mr. Fulton: I was not thinking so much of housing in cities to accommodate workers in defence industry; I was thinking more of projects like radar stations. Is it not correct that in looking after the project Defence Construction Limited would provide housing accommodation?

Mr. Howe: That is correct, isolated housing.

Mr. Fulton: The minister gave me the total cost of the projects presently under way. Has he got that broken down by projects?

Mr. Howe: No. The figure of $65 million which I gave was for 1951, beginning January 1, but the projects taken over from Canadian Commercial Corporation as of December 31, 1950, totalled $51,100,000. They are in addition to the $65 million which have been placed subsequently, giving a total of $116 million.

Mr. Fulton: Is there a project being constructed by Defence Construction Limited at Falconbridge?

Mr. Howe: A radar station is being built in that area.

Mr. Fulton: I should like to have information with respect to one other project which I understand is being constructed at Edgar near Orillia. Does the minister have particulars of those two projects there so that he can tell us how much the expenditure has been to date and what has been acquired for that expenditure?

Mr. Howe: I am afraid I am not in a position to do that. As my hon. friend knows, these are very secret projects. The security around them is very strict. I have not had a report on them recently. They were started some two months ago, and I do not imagine there has been very much building other than a road into the property at the moment. They are both rather inaccessible sites. I could get the information my hon. friend wants, but I would have to ask for it particularly.

Mr. Fulton: I do not want to hold up the item by suggesting that the information be produced first. However, the information I have is that for the amount of money expended already there is very little to show. As the minister says, there is not much more than a road into the project and some of the buildings in which the construction workers are residing for an expenditure of between $2 million and $3 million. That is the information I have. I am merely putting that forward. As I say, I do not want to hold up this estimate until the particulars are received and made available. Perhaps I can follow it up by correspondence, but on the basis of the information I have I would urge the minister to give these projects his personal attention and see how the money is being spent and whether value is being received for the money as it is spent. I should also like to ask whether Defence Construction Limited has appointed a firm of consulting engineers for all projects that they undertake or, if not, for all projects dealing with these radar installations?

Mr. Howe: As I remember it, the firm of Margison and Babcock made one design for all radar stations. I think I am correct in saying that they made a master design and it was adapted by the staff of Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation to the local conditions. As I remember it, that is the situation. I might explain that there may be off-site work being done on the radar stations. For instance, there may be structural steel made off the site. I would be surprised if the total spent so far has reached anything like $2 million for these two stations because the cost of each runs around $4 million. The estimate for each is about $4 million including the equipment, and the contracts have not been placed for more than two or three weeks.

Mr. Fulton: Can the minister tell us something about the firm of Margison and Babcock? What qualifications do they have for this type of work?

Mr. Howe: It is one of the oldest consulting engineering firms in the Toronto area. Mr. Margison has been a consulting engineer in that area for at least thirty years, and perhaps longer. I think he is perhaps the outstanding consulting engineer in Toronto.

Mr. Fulton: When the minister says "consulting engineer", is that in architecture, or what?

Mr. Howe: No, engineering.

Mr. Fulton: Professional engineering. Is that the main type of work on which this firm has been employed as consultants? I understand that a good deal of the work in connection with these stations is purely building, not so much engineering as simply the central building and the housing accommodation necessary to house the men. In what capacity is the firm of Margison and Babcock employed?

Mr. Howe: They are employed as general engineers. We had a problem there. We needed an engineering design and we retained Margison and Babcock to provide that design. There is nothing very mysterious. Is my hon. friend suggesting that a consulting engineer is not capable of building houses in a remote area if it is necessary to do so?

Mr. Fulton: I am not suggesting anything at the moment. I am trying to get some information. When these projects are to be built, are the contracts let by Defence Construction Limited for the construction of each individual project?

Mr. Howe: Yes, contracts are let by Defence Construction Limited. It is impossible to submit the plans for tender for the reason that they are very secret. They are kept under lock and key at all times, and it is quite ridiculous to think that they could be put out for tender. That would be like telling the world what a radar station looks like. The method of allocating tenders was that responsible contractors were chosen for their ability to carry out the job, and also chosen with an eye on the other work they do for the department. We chose contractors who we knew were capable and who had the available manpower and equipment to do the job.

Mr. Fulton: Are the contracts allocated on a cost-plus basis or a firm bid basis?

Mr. Howe: Cost-plus.

Mr. Fulton: Can the minister tell us the names of the contractors to whom the contracts have been allocated?

Mr. Howe: I have not the list in full. I could name some of them. I met them all in my office after the contracts were awarded and gave them a talk on the secret nature of the work they are carrying out, the necessity for speed and the importance of the project. I could name a good many of them. If my hon. friend is interested in a particular locality I can probably remember who the contractors were in that locality.

Mr. Fulton: I can perhaps follow this up by questions on the orders of the day. Is the minister in a position to give us an estimate of the average total cost of one of these projects? I do not suppose that the cost is the same for each one. That is why I am asking if he can give the average.

Mr. Howe: I am not in a position to give that at the moment. I think perhaps my hon. friend should not pursue this matter further. He is treading in the realm of security, and it is rather difficult for me. I should like to answer his questions as frankly as I can, but I do not wish to get in trouble with the security officers.

Mr. Fulton: I just have this to say. I have some information as to the cost on the basis of which I have asked the minister to look into two particular projects which I have named. I did not realize at the outset that they were all radar. It was not until the last few questions and answers that that emerged. On that basis I quite appreciate the minister's position, and for the time being I will not pursue the subject any further.

Mr. Hodgson: We have a dominion arsenal in my town of Lindsay, and I do not think it is running to full capacity at the present time. There is available space. There are also water mains and electricity available for enlargement of the plant. Has the minister had that drawn to his attention? We have a lot of good workmen who are anxious to get some work along that line. If the minister can increase the size of the plant or increase the work it will be much appreciated.

Mr. Howe: I shall be very glad to keep that in mind. I think there is work coming into the plant in considerable volume. I do not know whether or not it will be necessary to expand the plant.

Mr. Pearkes: Are we on item 82?

The Deputy Chairman: We are now on item 81.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Higgins: Can the minister tell me if any contracts have been awarded in Newfoundland under this item? I have not asked a question today. It may have been answered before.

Mr. Howe: Frankly I do not know whether Defence Construction Limited has work in Newfoundland. I presume it has. If I told you it had you would ask me where it was, and I would not know that; so we had better call it off.

Canadian Arsenals Limited—

82. Administration and operation, $3,300,000.

Mr. Pearkes: I wonder if the minister would outline for us the role of Canadian Arsenals Limited, and explain what arsenals are being operated in Canada by that corporation. A few weeks ago the minister announced that one of the arsenals near Montreal, I believe, had been leased to or was being operated by a private company making a certain type of gun. I would be very interested to know the general policy of Canadian Arsenals Limited and what other arsenals we have in addition to those at Quebec and Lindsay. The minister might also say whether they are being operated by Canadian Arsenals Limited solely or in conjunction with private firms.

Mr. Howe: The function of Canadian Arsenals Limited is to operate stand-by arsenal capacity in time of peace, and to keep the arsenals in readiness to expand in time of war; and the corporation has been carrying out that function. The purpose in establishing the arsenals after the war was to have in them capacity for making anything Canada made during the last war; and all the arts of the last war have been preserved in the arsenals.

The Quebec arsenal is making shell cases, filling shells, and making the various components of explosive charges. It is carrying out a pretty well rounded program in the field of ammunition. St. Paul l'Ermite was a shell filling plant in the last war and it is handling the same work at the present time. It is filling shells made at various arsenals other than the Quebec arsenal. The Longueuil plant was equipped with finishing machinery for artillery, horizontal boring machines and machinery taken from a number of gun plants built and operated by private firms during the last war. It was a well rounded plant in finishing capacity, but it had no primary capacity. On the other hand Sorel, a much larger plant, had primary capacity and some finishing capacity, but both were out of balance if operated separately. After a good deal of study our officers decided to combine the two plants and use the excess primary capacity of Sorel with the finishing capacity of Longueuil. That seems to have worked out very well, and additional production will be possible as a result of the combination of the two plants.

Then we have Valleyfield, which was an explosives plant dealing with various kinds of nitrocellulose powder, TNT and various other explosives. That plant was kept in a standby position in peace. When defence production became necessary it required a good deal of rehabilitation, and Defence Industries Limited have been retained on a management contract to put the plant in shape and bring it back into production. The Lindsay arsenal is operating as it has always operated, making shell casings and shells of various calibres, mainly the larger ones. Then coming into the Toronto area a portion of the former Research Enterprises Limited is now a branch of Canadian Arsenals which is being expanded to take over a part of the radar program. It is the nucleus of the production of early warning radar sets. The small arms division in the Toronto area is the focal point for the production of small arms. At the moment it is tooling up for 50 millimetre aircraft guns, and as soon as we determine the type of rifle to be produced it will go back into the manufacture of rifles and automatic weapons.

Mr. Pearkes: Is the Longueuil plant owned by Canadian Arsenals and operated by them, or is it operated entirely by a separate company?

Mr. Howe: No. The Longueuil plant is owned by the government. It was built by the government during the last war. The plant has been leased to Sorel Industries Limited, and the operating staff of the arsenal is working with Sorel Industries at the moment. The purpose of the integration is to get the larger capacity for the heavy guns being made under contract by Sorel Industries Limited.

Mr. Pearkes: Are all those guns being made for Canada?

Mr. Howe: No.

Mr. Pearkes: Then under what terms has the Sorel company taken over the arsenal?

Mr. Howe: The rental has not been settled as yet, but it will be a commercial rental. The larger part of the gun contract at Sorel is for the United States government, though Canada is participating in all types of weapons being manufactured there. That is, Canada is getting a share of all those weapons.

Mr. Hatfield: During the last war there was a large shell filling plant outside Montreal. Is that plant still intact and operating?

Mr. Howe: Yes. That is the plant I was referring to as St. Paul l'Ermite.

Mr. Adamson: I do not know whether this question has been asked already; if it has I apologize for having been out of the house. I understand the plant of Light Alloys Limited has been taken over by this department to produce light castings and alloys of magnesium and other light metals.

Mr. Howe: The plant has not been taken over; it is being operated by its former owners. We have authorized capital assistance to the plant to expand the floor space available for the manufacture of castings. It has been very successful in making the type of castings used in the Orenda engine, and it is expected that the expanded capacity will be operated to manufacture castings for that purpose.

Mr. Adamson: The dominion arsenal was acting in conjunction with the plant of Canadian Acme Screw and Gear of Weston road in Toronto. Are they still in operation? During the war they made a vast number of highly technical fuses and other equipment. Is that arsenal still in operation?

Mr. Howe: It is not an arsenal; it is a privately owned establishment. Acme Screw and Gear is of course a very large supplier, and they are doing certain work for the government. Unfortunately the plant is on strike at the moment, so I cannot say it is operating just now.

Mr. Adamson: Yes; I know all about that unfortunate strike.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

General administration—

449. Departmental administration, $513,280.

Mr. Charlton: Is the minister prepared to make a statement on our trade position now?

Mr. Howe: Yes, I shall be glad to make a statement. I will try to keep it a little shorter than the one on defence production. During this session there have been several opportunities to discuss the activities of the Department of Trade and Commerce. We have had a debate on the Torquay trade agreements. Legislation has been brought down amending the Weights and Measures Act, which is administered by this department. During the debate on the speech from the throne I also gave a review of the work of the department. The committee will recall that wheat policy, and the activities of the Canadian wheat board, have come in for extensive discussion from time to time during the past few months. It is hardly necessary, therefore, for me to give a lengthy statement at this time.

I would like, however, to offer a few comments on Canadian trade policy. Since the end of the war very great efforts have been made by the government, and the Department of Trade and Commerce in particular, to enlarge the volume of Canadian trade. These efforts have taken many forms. The trade commissioner service abroad has been strengthened. Canada has supported international action to reduce trade barriers. When this country was suffering from a serious shortage of dollars, the government did everything possible to encourage exports to dollar areas and to encourage imports from soft currency countries. The establishment of the international trade fair in 1948 was another evidence of the government's interest in an expanding volume of trade, both import and export.

The efforts have borne fruit. Canada's trade has expanded to an extent that few thought possible. It is in better balance vis-à-vis the dollar and sterling areas. The position now, however, is very different from what it has been in these last few years. We are once again in a seller's market, faced with the fact or the prospect of shortages of certain materials because of the competing demands of the defence program. In the light of this change in the trade outlook, the government has reviewed its policy to see whether the emphasis on trade is misplaced.

We have come to the conclusion that while the needs of defence are paramount, Canada continues to have a vital interest in foreign trade. The defence program, and the high rate of consumer and business spending which accompanied it, have resulted in a high level of imports. These imports must be paid for. For that reason alone we cannot afford to neglect our export trade. But there is a longer-run reason as well. All of us hope and believe that the present emergency will pass. In so far as possible, therefore, trade contacts should be retained and developed, looking to the time when Canada will once again have to seek out buyers for its surpluses.

Accordingly, as I said at the opening of the international trade fair in Toronto this year:

> There is to be no general let-down in our efforts to promote export trade. That is the policy of the Department of Trade and Commerce and of the Canadian government. We are having special supply difficulties to meet in various lines of export business. We shall probably continue to have such difficulties. But the fact that we shall be giving first priority to defence production needs is not to be taken to mean that the servicing of our export business will be pushed into the background or left without the very closest attention that we can give it.

In May the United Kingdom-Canada continuing committee on trade and economic affairs met in Ottawa. As was announced at the time, the United Kingdom hopes to buy a very much increased volume of goods in Canada during the next year. We, for our part, are anxious that the United Kingdom and the sterling area generally should continue to ship as much as possible to Canada. The discussions were most useful, and it is our hope that they will result not only in a substantial increase in the volume of United Kingdom-Canada trade but in further progress towards the restoration of normal trading relationships between the sterling area and Canada, which is our ultimate goal.

The United Kingdom talks were immediately followed by discussions with the British West Indies. There have always been close commercial ties between Canada and the British West Indies, and the imposition of restrictions upon imports from Canada into these islands had undoubtedly been the cause of a good deal of inconvenience and disruption to both importers and exporters. The introduction of the trade liberalization plan at the beginning of this year was an important step forward, and we are hopeful that it will be followed in the near future by further progress in the same direction.

A French trade mission then met with Canadian officials. This is not the first time that such Franco-Canadian trade talks have been held. Indeed they may become a more or less regular event. While our trade with France is not very large, it is, I believe, capable of expansion and the discussions this year were concerned with how this could best be done. We have been particularly impressed by the growing interest of France in the Canadian market.

Finally came informal discussions with a New Zealand trade delegation led by Hon. C. M. Bowden. Like other sterling area countries, New Zealand has been imposing very strict limitations on imports from Canada and other dollar countries. During the talks with Mr. Bowden, it was evident that New Zealand shares our interest in the restoration of normal trade relationships, and that there is more likelihood of progress in that direction now than for some time.

Another evidence of the government's continuing interest in trade was the decision to hold the Canadian international trade fair again in 1952. In many respects the fair held this year was the most successful since the first fair was held in 1948. But the extent of participation by Canadian manufacturers and industrialists is disappointing. Furthermore, there is a good deal of uncertainty about the effects of defence preparations upon trade. In deciding to hold a fair next year the government is taking some risks. But, on the other hand, to abandon the fair this year might have been taken as evidence that the government no longer attaches the same importance to the development of trade, which would have had unfortunate repercussions at home and abroad. Whether the fair will continue beyond 1952 depends upon the extent to which Canadian businessmen take advantage of the opportunity provided to sell their wares not only abroad but to their neighbours at home.

In brief, Mr. Chairman, the Department of Trade and Commerce is continuing to take an active interest in the promotion of Canada's trade.

Mr. Adamson: Mr. Chairman, I know that there was a good deal of disappointment over this year's Canadian international trade fair because of the lack of participation by Canadian manufacturers. I visited the fair on more than one occasion and was certainly distressed, to put it mildly, to see the lack of interest which our own manufacturers displayed in the fair. One would have hoped that this trade fair would have been the beginning of international trade with the rest of the world by Canada, and particularly those nations with whom we did not normally trade before the war. The pattern of trade that we are going to see in the years to come may be, and probably will be, very different from the old triangular pattern of trade that we saw prior to the war. At that time we were more or less the sterling broker for the United Kingdom and the United States.

I was surprised to find the lack of interest, and I may say rather disappointed, because I had hoped that this trade fair would have opened up an opportunity for the exhibition of the goods that we had to sell to the countries that are just emerging from the aftermath of the war and the currency and other restrictions imposed by war conditions. The foreign countries, particularly Holland, Italy, and to a degree Germany, had an excellent exhibit. The machine tool exhibit I thought was in every way admirable, but the fair this year seemed to be lacking something. Whether it was a disbelief in world trade, or whether it was some degree of disenchantment of the Canadian manufacturer with the outlook, I do not know. But certainly we have no cause for satisfaction over the present situation.

Things are difficult. The problem of currency, the problem of exchange, is a besetting evil that is destroying today all attempts at international trade, and I hope that will be the subject of debate in this house at another time; but it seemed to me, Mr. Chairman, that there was a lack of appreciation of Canada's opportunity at the present time to open out in new markets. I just wonder whether the minister would care to comment on what must be to him, and the officials who worked so hard at this fair, a rather disappointing situation.

Mr. Howe: I would not say that the fair this year was disappointing. In many ways I think it was the best fair that we have held. However, if the fair suffered from anything it suffered from the fact that it was being held in a seller's market. Practically everything that was on exhibit at the fair was sold on the first day of the fair, and anyone capable of taking orders had his order book filled very early.

The department is concerned about the lack of interest by Canadian exhibitors. Very serious consideration was given to making this year's fair the last, but we had such a strong protest from the Toronto board of trade and from other business organizations across Canada, particularly from people who did not exhibit in the fair itself, we decided to continue the fair for one more year with the distinct warning that if there is no increase in Canadian participation in 1952, 1952 will be the last trade fair.

Mr. Pearkes: The minister has spoken about trade with certain European countries. I want to raise a question regarding trade with China, because within the last few days I have received an air mail letter from what I believe to be a responsible organization in Hong Kong, known as the China Coast Navigating and Engineering Officers Guild. So far as I know it is an organization consisting of officers of the merchant marine of commonwealth countries.

In this letter the general secretary points out that there are certain vessels belonging to the Ming Sung Company, a company that I believe has its offices in Montreal, because I took the trouble to look up the directory and I found that it was registered there. It is claimed that certain ships of this company are trading between Hong Kong and Macao, where they are carrying passengers and cargo, between Hong Kong, Macao and Canton, which would be of course a triangular line, again carrying passengers and cargo, and between Hong Kong and Canton, where they are carrying cargoes only.

I understand that these ships are ships which were built in Canada and were to be sold to the central Chinese government before that government fell, and that now they are operating out of Hong Kong under a Canadian flag, and still with Canadian registry, and that the government derives some revenue from this operation. Canton of course is a port which is under direct control of a government which has not been recognized by the Canadian government, and is to all intents and purposes a government with which we are in active warlike operations in Korea.

What cargoes are these vessels carrying? I ask that question because, according to the letter I have, and I quote:

> Eye witnesses state that included in the daily cargoes is essential war material.

Of course if that is a fact it is something which will be very distressing to a great many people in Canada. I am told that the merchant naval officers associations, both in Canada and in Hong Kong, are seriously perturbed over this situation. There is no doubt that the letter states that these vessels are trading under the Canadian flag and have it painted prominently on both sides. The letter says that they wear the Canadian ensign in Chinese communist ports. These vessels are officered and manned by Chinese, and in one case there is a Russian captain, according to the information. Without going into it in more detail at the present time I wonder whether the minister has any information about that situation, and if he can tell us whether there is any trade going on between Hong Kong and communist China by ships of Canadian registry or carrying the Canadian flag?

Mr. Howe: These ships were built in Canada by an arrangement that was current post-war, by which private transactions between Canadian firms and Chinese firms, or firms of other countries, could be carried out with the guarantee of both governments guaranteeing the loan. The Ming Sung Company came here and made a contract with two or three Canadian shipyards. They had a guarantee of the then government of China, and the loan was jointly guaranteed by the then government of China and the government of Canada. The ships were sold in the ordinary way through a commercial transaction, and the ships passed to the flag of China, subject to a mortgage held by the Canadian shipyard and deposited with the bank that lent the money.

All went well until the Chinese government, the government of Chiang Kai-shek, fell, and then the banks began to worry a little about their loan. In the uncertain situation that followed, it seemed wise to transfer the ships to the Canadian flag, which was done at the request of the Ming Sung Company, which expressed a desire to protect their loans in Canada. I may say that the loans in Canada are not in default at the moment. The payments have been made when due. I do not know the outstanding balance, but while there are substantial balances there is no default in the loan. However, it is a fact that the ships are operating under the Canadian flag. The government is not happy about it. The operation of the ships is supervised by the government of Hong Kong which, as my hon. friend knows, is also a British colony. Whether the ships are carrying contraband in their trips to Canton and up the Yangtze river I cannot say. I hope they are not. If they are—well, I do not know what we could do about it. While they are Canadian flag ships they are not in any way subject to the direction of the Canadian government.

They are not owned by the Canadian government. We can withdraw the flag, and that is about all we can do. But the government has no direct interest in the situation other than that they are guarantor to a Canadian bank for part of the money that built the ships for the Ming Sung Company.

Mr. Pearkes: If these ships are sailing under the Canadian flag would not the government of Canada be responsible for seeing that these ships were manned according to the Canada Shipping Act, that they had officers of Canadian nationality or at least carrying Canadian certificates? Could not the certificates be withdrawn from the ships' officers if they are not carrying out the other regulations?

Mr. Howe: I am sorry to say that is not the situation. When the flag was transferred the ships were exempted from the shipping regulations which required them to be officered by Canadians.

Mr. Pearkes: When they came back under the Canadian flag would they not then have to conform to the Canadian shipping regulations?

Mr. Howe: When they came back under the Canadian flag they were exempted from the requirements. This was the most disturbing condition to meet and, rather than let the ships go, which might have been the wisest course, we did take what seemed to be the practical course, to bring the physical ships under the Canadian flag, but to exempt the ships from the requirements of the Canada Shipping Act as long as they operated in Chinese waters.

Mr. Pearkes: I had no idea that these ships were carrying out operations right into the heart of China, up the Yangtze river. That is the first time I had heard about it. I did not know they were still operating into the heart of Red China. It is inconceivable that they are not carrying material there which would be very useful for the prosecution of the war by Red China—and our Canadian boys today are fighting against Red China up in Korea. I cannot help thinking that the government must take some firmer action, even if it had to confiscate those ships. It seems to me an appalling situation.

Mr. Howe: How would we confiscate them? Would we send the army up the Yangtze to take them over? That is about the only way we could get our hands on them, I think.

Mr. Pearkes: No. If they are operating out of Hong Kong, that is a long way from the Yangtze river. We have Canadian destroyers in those waters now. Perhaps those Canadian destroyers could do something about it.

Mr. Howe: I am informed that the two on the Yangtze river have been seized by the communists, and they are operated by the communists. They may or may not carry the flag. I doubt very much if they carry the Canadian flag. I think those two ships that have been seized are carrying the communist flag. The others are operating out of Hong Kong and we are assured by the Hong Kong officials that they are not carrying contraband.

Mr. Pearkes: How many ships are there?

Mr. Howe: There are five ships, two others have been seized by the communists.

Mr. Pearkes: There are two up the Yangtze, making up the original seven?

Mr. Howe: Yes.

Mr. Pearkes: I think it is a pretty sorry situation.

Mr. Adamson: Where are they registered? What is their home port—Vancouver or Montreal?

Mr. Howe: I am sorry, but I cannot say.

An hon. Member: Toronto.

Mr. Howe: It might easily be Toronto.

Mr. Adamson: It might, at that.

Mr. Howe: And they are not my problem, I should say. I had nothing to do with them, except that when they got into difficulty I was called in to try to straighten out the trouble. But they have nothing to do with my department, I am happy to say.

Mr. Green: I think the minister said there are mortgages on the ships. Would it not be possible to have them seized and sold under those mortgages in Hong Kong, and in that way clean up this mess?

Mr. Howe: It might not be the right thing to do. The Department of External Affairs and the Department of Finance are struggling with the situation. I should not be talking about it at all, because I know very little about it, and I have nothing to do with it.

Mr. Pearkes: Have we any check on the cargoes taken out on these ships? We have a trade commissioner, have we not, in Hong Kong? Has he any responsibility in the matter?

Mr. Howe: The Hong Kong government is responsible for checking cargo in and out of Hong Kong, and I am sure they do it efficiently. As I say, with respect to the two ships up the Yangtze, I make no promises about them.

Mr. Knowles: The two ships up the Yangtze are down the river.

Mr. Hatfield: We have two good dollar markets, one in Cuba and one in Venezuela. What is being done to increase our trade with those two countries? We used to ship our maritime products to Cuba. We have lost most of that trade on account of the duties. Venezuela is the only South American country which is a dollar market. They have been taking a lot of produce, including potatoes, from the maritime provinces lately. I was wondering what is being done to increase trade with Venezuela.

Mr. Howe: We have a large and growing trade with Venezuela, of which I hope to have the figures in a moment. We are doing everything we can to give that market good service, and I think our relations are most cordial.

Mr. Hatfield: The trade is growing there?

Mr. Howe: The trade is growing every year, yes. Exports to Venezuela in 1947 were $12,988,625; in 1948, $16,934,563; 1949, $27,688,637; and 1950, $25,456,741.

Our imports from Venezuela in 1947 were $46 million; 1948, $94 million; 1949, $91 million and 1950, $87 million. The imports of course from Venezuela are chiefly of oil. So it should be a good market for Canada because the balance of trade is in favour of Venezuela.

So far as Cuba is concerned, our trade relations there should be considerably better because of our agreement to take 75,000 short tons of sugar annually from that country.

Mr. Blackmore: I have wondered whether it would be possible for me to get the general picture of the functions of the Department of Trade and Commerce. It is a department, we must admit, that does a good deal of work. I am wondering what its general aims are. I might commence questioning to obtain the information I want by asking the minister what was the purpose of holding the international trade fair in Toronto. Was it to enable Canadian producers to sell more Canadian goods abroad, or was it to enable Canada to buy more goods from abroad?

Mr. Howe: It was to set up a marketplace where goods from Canada and goods from abroad could be displayed and purchased either by Canadians or by foreign buyers, as the circumstances might permit. The purpose was to assist exports and to assist Canadian buyers in selecting imports. One distinct purpose it has achieved is in putting our manufacturers on their toes. They have seen displayed the best products of a great number of countries abroad and I think they are making better articles as a result of seeing what the competition is in foreign markets.

The difficulty in offering Canadian goods for sale abroad is the currency restrictions. We hope that they are moving toward the end of currency restrictions and if that should happen I am sure there will be greater Canadian participation in the fair. I believe the fair has served a useful purpose. When there was talk of closing it up this year we received protests in a volume that really surprised me. The future of the fair is not too definite. We will try it one more year and if we get greater Canadian participation we will try to make it a permanent feature. Otherwise I think perhaps we may wind it up.

Mr. Blackmore: Are there officials in the department whose duty it is to look over the broad field to decide what is best for Canada? We in Canada are capable of producing certain goods to our advantage, and it is to our advantage to sell certain goods abroad. What goods would it pay us to produce and sell abroad, and what goods would it not be in the best interests of the Canadian economy to produce and sell abroad? What goods could we buy advantageously from abroad? If questions like that were asked it seems to me that we would have an over-all purpose in mind.

In order to illustrate what I have in mind I shall refer to something which I have talked about in this house from time to time for fifteen years—beet sugar. I do not propose to discuss sugar beets, I simply refer to them as an illustration. It is well known that the production of beet sugar enriches the land and it enables us to feed livestock to advantage. It provides a number of advantages to Canadian economy which are not given by many manufactures.

Are there commodities which Canada could produce which would benefit the Canadian economy generally in the way much as the beet sugar industry does? Would it not be wise for us to single out such commodities and aim to sell them rather than to sell such commodities as zinc, copper, lead and other base metals which actually permanently deplete our resources? If we expand the sale of such commodities overmuch our grandchildren will find in this country a pile of rocks instead of a great heritage passed on to them.

It seems to me that we have reached the point in our national life where considerations of this sort ought to be rather prominent in our thinking. I am trying to bring matters down to a focus so that the minister will have some chance of answering. Are we going too far in exporting wood pulp, for instance? Are we selling so much wood pulp abroad that we are depleting our forests beyond the point to which we should deplete them? Are we selling fish abroad to the extent where we are tending to deplete our fish resources? Has the department consciously contemplated these things generally and, if so, what has been the result of the departmental thinking?

Have they decided what commodities we can afford to export? It is quite obvious that if we continue to produce wheat and sell it abroad, sooner or later we are going to deplete the fertility of our soil. If that goes on too far then the great-grandchildren of this generation will find themselves in a country no longer rich as it once was. That is what will happen unless we take some measures to restore the fertility of our soil now being exhausted by the production of crops like wheat, oats and barley for export abroad.

Has the minister's department given conscious thought to matters such as these? After the minister finishes with these questions I am going to ask if the department has given conscious thought to the things we ought to be importing rather than producing at home.

Mr. Howe: As I see it, the function of the Department of Trade and Commerce is to find markets for any surpluses Canada may have. It has never been the purpose of the department to tell Canadians what they should produce. It is the function of the department to dispose of any production that is surplus over home requirements. For that purpose we maintain offices in almost every country of the world and have there aggressive representatives who find markets for anything that we have, as surplus.

My hon. friend has suggested that we should plan our economy, but as an illustration he chose a most unfortunate item. A great many countries of the world produce sugar from beets, but I do not know of any beet sugar from any country that moves into the export market. Sugar beets have the geographical advantage that they can be grown where the sugar is consumed. Their production is beneficial to the soil although I think my hon. friend will agree that it is hard on the labour that produces the beets. It is not an easy matter to grow sugar beets and harvest them. Nevertheless, it is a good domestic crop. This industry is being kept healthy by duties against cane sugar and by any other help the government can give.

I cannot agree that we should keep our metals in the ground. It is through the mining of metals that the waste spaces of Canada have been populated and made prosperous. I do not suppose there would be much of a settlement around Kimberley except for the mining that is carried on there, and I am sure that there would not be much of a settlement around Sudbury or Flin Flon were it not for the mines in those areas. Canada is a country of varying resources and each district is made possible by the exploitation of some natural resource that can be produced in surplus.

Mr. Blackmore: Apparently the Department of Trade and Commerce looks upon itself more or less as a clearing house; it does not aim to give leadership or guidance to the nation in respect of products which it would be valuable to the nation to produce or import. The department merely takes what is produced and endeavours to dispose of it to best advantage. I do not know whether it will be in order to ask the minister this question as it may be considered to be an unfair question. I wonder if the minister does not think that somewhere in Canada we ought to have an organization thinking in terms of the future. The minister says that we have to exploit our resources, and of course I know what he means. It would not benefit us to keep all our minerals in the ground, but nevertheless I think the minister will grant, without any argument at all, that it is an exceedingly unwise procedure to exhaust the minerals in any given area. For example, it is conceivable that Sudbury might become a ghost town in due time, and Kimberley might become a ghost town. The question will have to be raised some time before it is too late as to how many towns we can afford to build up and then allow to become ghosts.

Mr. Howe: I might suggest there are ministries that have the job to which my friend has referred. For instance, we have a Minister of Agriculture and the Department of Agriculture. Their duty is to keep the agricultural industry of Canada healthy, and each province has an agricultural department for the same purpose. The same is true of mining. We have a minister of mines and each province has a minister of mines, their duty being to make sure that the mineral assets of the country are properly harvested. In the same way the forests belong to the provinces, and each province has a minister of forests. We have a department of government that has general oversight over forests from the dominion's point of view. The work of planning the use of Canada's resources is handled, but it is not handled by the Department of Trade and Commerce. That is the point I am making. I would not like my hon. friend to think I was implying that the job was not being done.

Mr. Blackmore: That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. Higgins: I should like to ask the minister what significance he attaches to the present price war in the United States. Does he see it spreading to Canada?

Mr. Howe: As far as I understand the situation, they had fair trade laws in the United States which provided that if a contract was made between the producer of a proprietary article and one distributor, the price stated in that contract applied to all distributors in the area. That law was set aside by one of the high courts of the United States with the result that certain department stores undertook special sales of these proprietary articles that they were free to mark down for the first time. That developed into price competition. It was perhaps speeded up owing to the fact that department store sales were off anyway, and there was a desire to clear stock and speed up distribution through department stores. I hardly think it is a big enough affair to be called a war. It was a skirmish between four or five or six large department stores in the city of New York. I think it has hardly spread outside that area, and I think it has no great significance in the over-all economic situation.

Mr. Higgins: You do not see it approaching Canada at all?

Mr. Howe: No.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): In view of the great industrial development of the west, would the minister consider staging the great trade fair in the west next year having in mind the manufacturing that takes place in Vancouver, Seattle, Los Angeles and elsewhere along the Pacific coast, and the fact that we are now reviving trade with Japan, South America, and so on? Perhaps by next year there may be peace in the Pacific, and the trade fair could be very well staged some place in British Columbia. It would give the mining people particularly an opportunity in the same way that the aluminum people have taken very good advantage of the opportunity to exhibit at Toronto. I want to congratulate the department on staging the fair. I have attended it on two occasions. I find it is a tremendous emporium, and I am sure the bringing together of these people from all these nations with their exhibits and merchandise is of tremendous assistance towards world peace. I should like to see it staged in Vancouver.

Mr. Howe: I am sure my officers will take note of the hon. member's remarks.

The Deputy Chairman: Could we not reserve our remarks on fairs and exhibitions until we reach items 455 and 456?

Mr. Green: Can the minister tell us the trend of Canada's trade balance in 1951? I was quite struck by a little publication entitled "Business Review" issued by the Bank of Montreal under date of May 23, 1951. They say in part:

> . . . a closer analysis of last year's external transactions, viewed in conjunction with trade trends thus far in 1951, reveals some significant changes that flash a light of warning against an overly complacent attitude toward this country's position on international account.

Dealing with the 1951 position in so far as merchandise trading between Canada and the United States is concerned they say:

> In merchandise trading transactions, the early months of 1951 have witnessed an abrupt reversal of the former welcome contraction of our deficit with the United States and a correspondingly sharp accentuation of the unfavourable trend in our overall balance. While average monthly shipments across the border in the first quarter of this year were about 5 per cent higher in value than throughout 1950, imports were up by 30 per cent. Thus the trade deficit with the U.S.A. in the three months to the end of March—

That is the present year.

> —was about $140 millions, as contrasted with only $47 millions for the whole of last year. The value of merchandise moving across the seas in both directions has shown little significant change. The consequence is that Canadian merchandise trade with all countries, which resulted in a reduced but still favourable balance of $10 millions in the full year 1950, has shown an unfavourable balance of $124 millions in the first quarter of 1951.

The statement indicates that the unfavourable balance with the United States is a great deal higher in the first three months of 1951 than it was last year, and also that our unfavourable balance with regard to the world at large is a great deal higher than it was in 1950. Can the minister tell us whether or not these figures are correct and, if so, whether that trend has continued through April and May?

Mr. Howe: The figures are quite correct. Our trade with the United States is out of balance through abnormal imports from the United States. Our exports to the United States are running at a record level, considerably higher than at any former time in history. But with the purchase of war materials from that country, which have been coming in in volume, and the tremendous capital investment program going on in Canada, which exceeds by far any previous record, we have been buying materials from the United States in excess of normal purchases. Aside from that the balance has not changed greatly. Our trade with Great Britain is in about the same balance as it was last year, and also our trade with the sterling area. Trade with South America has grown greatly but it is in fair balance. The balance has not changed much. Any change that has taken place is in our trade with the United States and is the result of greatly expanded imports from that country. I believe that this situation is abnormal. We are in a strong financial position to stand it, and I think it can be straightened out when our building boom settles down. The economic measures we have taken to check capital expansion in the country are designed to check the very circumstances my friend has called to my attention.

Mr. Green: Does the minister think that on merchandising transactions between Canada and the United States there will be a greater deficit this year than in 1950?

Mr. Howe: Oh, yes; very much greater.

Mr. Green: Canada's position will be a great deal worse this year than it was last year, on those transactions?

Mr. Howe: It will be further out of balance; in other words there will be a greater deficit in our account with the United States, and probably a deficit in our account with the world. The reason for that, of course, is our large investment program. My hon. friend will appreciate that as more of Canada's production is invested at home less becomes available for export, and the greater the pressure for increased imports.

Mr. Adamson: I am interested in this because our adverse balance of trade at the present time with all countries is running about half a billion dollars a year. I would like the minister to enlarge on that. He has said this is largely due to capital expenditures. I gather, from talking with manufacturers I know and from the press, that up to the present time defence orders placed in Canada by the United States have been extremely disappointing, and that so far there has been very little reciprocal business in defence equipment and defence material as between the two countries. I wonder if the minister would care to comment on that.

Then I have seen members of his department at work in various fields. I saw some of his trade commissioners in Germany, and I believe the work our trade commissioners are doing, under great difficulties, deserves the highest commendation. But each man I spoke to told me in one way or another that his principal difficulty and in fact his only difficulty in selling Canadian goods was currency control. There was no question that the goods we were producing in Canada, whether raw materials or finished products, were desirable and of the type required, but in country after country they could not import them over the barrier of currency control. Perhaps the minister would say a word on those two points, first the lack of reciprocal business in defence purchases by the United States and the difficulties in regard to currency restrictions.

Mr. Howe: I have no particular complaint to make as far as defence purchasing is concerned. The Americans were able to sell us certain war materials off the shelf, you might say, or out of stock; and those materials have been moving. We have had nothing to sell back in the way of war materials off the shelf, though we have taken contracts which will be productive as our production steps up and the goods are delivered. The contracts on both sides are not in balance, but there is a tendency for them to come into balance. I am not particularly worried about the upset in exchange due to war business between the two countries; I believe that situation will straighten out if there is the will to straighten it out, and I think everyone is doing his best along that line. I was just looking at the trade figures for the first three months, and in our account with the United States there was a deficit of $100 million, which is very close to the amount of our deficit with the world. Well, that is not too serious. If it continues at that rate during the year we will have a deficit of $400 million, and that is not anything to worry about. We have had far greater deficits. In 1947 we were losing a billion dollars a year to the United States. However, that is a trend we do not like, but we think it is a trend that can be reversed whenever we are willing to curtail our investment program and cut down on abnormal purchasing in the United States.

Mr. Adamson: Would the minister care to say anything about currency difficulties?

Mr. Howe: The currency difficulties are improving. Every time we bring trade with any country into balance we make it possible for them to relax the restrictions. In most countries with which Canada is accustomed to trade, restrictions are being relaxed to some extent. They are not being relaxed as quickly as we think they should be, but we are constantly pressing for the relaxation of restrictive measures. Some progress is being made, and we think the trend is in the right direction.

Mr. Blackmore: It seems to me a number of hon. members speak of these currency restrictions as though they had been imposed as a sort of punitive measure, instead of being something imposed through necessity. If a nation finds itself importing more goods than it is exporting, one of the most effective devices to prevent that sort of thing is to control foreign exchange, which means currency restrictions. It is quite idle to talk about removing currency restrictions unless first we do as the minister says; that is, unless we manage to enable the country concerned to sell us as much goods as it buys, or to balance its trade in a three-way arrangement. So it seems to me we are rather more optimistic than we should be if we think this matter of currency restrictions will more or less iron itself out. As long as we do not buy enough goods from Britain, for example, to enable her to buy the goods we wish to sell her, Britain will have to use quotas or currency restrictions against us in defence of her own economy.

I would like to hear a little discussion along that line. This was all involved at the time of the Bretton Woods discussion. Many hon. members seemed to think all we had to do was clamp on the restrictions envisaged by Bretton Woods and all difficulties would right themselves. That has not happened, however; now we find that they had the cart before the horse, and there seems to be quite a bit of uncertainty as to what should be done. This was one of the considerations that caused me to ask the minister the questions I put to him in the beginning. I was wondering whether it would be wise to manage the Canadian economy in such a way that we could buy from Britain the goods we need to buy in order to enable her to purchase the wheat and other commodities we desire to sell, or whether it would be wise for us to envisage a more or less closed economy, or a balanced economy, or a self-sufficient economy in Canada and use some other means to enable Britain to buy the goods we want her to buy from us, something similar to the mutual aid device we used during the war.

Mr. Howe: I am happy to say that we finished 1950 with an adverse trade balance with the rest of the sterling area. In other words the rest of the sterling area sold us more goods than we sold them. There was a slight balance in our favour with the United Kingdom, as between the two countries, but it was very much smaller than ever before and showed a gap that presents no particular problem. As far as the balance of trade between Canada and any sterling area country is concerned, however, there is no good reason why the barriers cannot be taken down, and we think they should be taken down much faster than that is being done.

Mr. Blackmore: That is, the barriers between the various countries of the sterling area, but not the barriers between the sterling area and the dollar area?

Mr. Howe: The sterling area and Canada. As I say, the sterling area sold us more than we sold to the sterling area, that is including England as part of the sterling area.

Mr. Quelch: I think the minister is to be congratulated now on bringing about this dollar situation. A few years ago we used to hear a lot in this house about our trade being on a triangular basis. We bought far more from the United States than we sold, and consequently we had to sell more to Europe and insist upon payment in dollars in order to use those dollars to make up our deficit with the United States. Consequently, as a result of that policy Europe did try to impose heavy restrictions upon trade with us in order to prevent having an unfavourable balance of trade with this country. I think the situation is far more satisfactory now. We are balancing our trade with the sterling area and trying, at the same time, to balance our trade with the United States. In other words, we are trying to increase our sales to the United States and increase our imports from the sterling area. I believe that is as it should be. If we continue that policy, I believe Europe will be willing to give up the restrictions against this country.

Item agreed to.

450. Commodities and allocations, including assistance in the development of markets and new industry, the procurement of supplies, and contributions as detailed in the estimates, $596,973.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. Blackmore: This item 450 is an item that puts a question into my mind. It contains the phrase, "including assistance in the development of markets and new industry . . ." That is the phrase which a while ago made me ask the minister if he actually was consciously endeavouring to develop new industry in Canada. If he is not, then what is the purpose of having that phrase in that item? If the purpose is to develop new industry, what new industry and why?

Mr. Howe: The commodities and allocation branch is the office which indirectly supports the trade commissioners in the field. For instance, we have specialists in almost every type of production and raw materials. We have textile specialists, livestock specialists and so on, specialists in almost every product that Canada produces in surplus. These men meet the producers in Canada, and work out their problems with them. They communicate the instructions to our trade commissioners abroad. It is the Canadian end of the trade commissioners' service. I think that is a fair way of putting it.

Mr. Blackmore: I do not wish to be critical of the minister. I believe the minister has done a magnificent job ever since he began being a minister in this country. I have told him that several times before now. But I was wondering whether or not the minister was doing the same thing for civilian production that he obviously is doing for defence production. In his fine report earlier today, he indicated quite clearly that if he finds a deficiency of any particular commodity in Canada, he goes out consciously and gets that commodity. If he has to arrange to lend money to a company to produce the commodity or give the company special depreciation, he does it.

Now then, is the minister doing a similar thing with respect to civilian production? If he is, then I should like to know what civilian production he has in mind; what he is doing, and what success he is attaining. All these matters, as the minister fully knows, are involved in Canada's supply position. If we do not keep up and improve the supply position of Canada with respect to civilian consumer goods, then we are likely to be in a bad way.

Mr. Howe: We do perhaps the job my hon. friend has in mind for industry. We point out opportunities abroad for a certain type of manufacture, and we send over the specifications to be filled. For instance, we point out to them there is an opportunity for long-sleeved underwear in China or Japan or some part of the world. We send over the specifications, and find a market for the goods produced accordingly. We give industry all the guidance that they will accept as to the the manufacture of goods suitable for certain specific markets.

I pointed out that it is not the duty of the department to do the same job for other types of production because they have separate ministries responsible for that chore, such as agriculture, fisheries, mines and other resources of the country. They have other ministries doing the same job.

Mr. Blackmore: That is about as it should be, but I am wondering if the Department of Trade and Commerce takes leadership over the other departments. Wheat is an example. I do not desire to discuss wheat, but wheat is primarily an agricultural matter. At the same time, it comes under the Department of Trade and Commerce, which has a considerable voice in respect of the wheat situation in Canada. I would think it would have a voice in any agreement to be negotiated.

Now then, when it comes to developing agricultural or forest products, is there an understanding or co-ordination between the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the other ministers so as to obtain an over-all picture of what we ought to get, and a decision as to what ought to be done?

Mr. Howe: I may point out that wheat is a good example. The Department of Trade and Commerce has the job of marketing surplus Canadian wheat. The department has nothing to do with the amount of wheat that is grown; the variety that is grown or how it is planted or harvested; that is a matter for the Department of Agriculture. The marketing of the surplus is the job of the Department of Trade and Commerce, and it is because wheat is a surplus commodity that the marketing of wheat is in the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Blackmore: May I ask one more question about that long-sleeved underwear? The minister has said he will point out to the producers of underwear in Canada that there is a market in China or Japan for long-sleeved underwear. I wonder whether or not he will go so far as to give financial support to a company which would enable it to produce long-sleeved underwear, much as he would give financial support to a company producing a particular kind of ship for defence. Would he give accelerated depreciation to a company to enable it to go into the production of this particular commodity for which he found a market?

Mr. Howe: The Department of Trade and Commerce has very little to do with money. We have no money. If anyone wants money, we send him to the Department of Finance. Trade and commerce is simply a service department with particular responsibility for exports and imports.

Mr. Blackmore: But trade and commerce, in seeking to obtain a particular item of defence production, does have the determining voice as to whether or not financial assistance will be rendered to the company engaged in the production of that commodity, does it not?

Mr. Howe: No; the Department of Trade and Commerce is out of the defence business—it should never have been in it. Today defence business is the duty of the Department of Defence Production, which is quite different from the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Blackmore: Then the Department of Defence Production does have a determining voice as to whether financial assistance shall be offered to a company that would be engaged in producing commodities.

Mr. Howe: Producing defence products.

Mr. Blackmore: What I am probing for is to see whether or not there is something resembling a department of civilian production.

Mr. Howe: No.

Mr. Blackmore: It is not any part of the function of the Department of Trade and Commerce to engage in that sort of activity?

Mr. Howe: No.

Mr. Blackmore: It looks as if we ought to have an organization that should do something like that before long in Canada.

Mr. MacInnis: The minister mentioned that wheat was a surplus commodity. Can he tell the committee how much surplus of the various grades of wheat we have at the present time?

Mr. Howe: At the present time we have sold all that we dare to sell of grades one to five. We have a fair quantity of No. 6 wheat, and a fair quantity of feed wheat, but not too good. We hope that the whole situation will clear up shortly after the end of the crop year.

The Deputy Chairman: May I point out that there will be ample opportunity to discuss wheat when we reach items 464 and 465. Shall this item carry?

Item agreed to.

451. Trade commissioner service, including payment of compensation to trade commissioners for damage to and loss of furniture and effects, under regulations approved by the governor in council, $1,963,751.

Mr. Charlton: Can the minister give us any idea as to how our trade position is with the South American countries? Has it improved or deteriorated?

Mr. Howe: The volume of our trade has gone up very greatly, both exports and imports, and the improvement in the balance is favourable to Canada.

Mr. Adamson: Have the trade commissioners abroad diplomatic privileges or not? I mention this because it is rather a sore point with some of them. The employees of the department of immigration, who in many cases are doing a great deal of extremely hard work under very difficult circumstances, do not enjoy diplomatic privileges, but some trade commissioners do enjoy diplomatic privileges. One or two suggested to me they wished that they all did have them. Is there any general agreement on this, or is there any general rule about whether they enjoy diplomatic privileges or not?

Mr. Howe: If a trade commissioner is attached to an embassy he does enjoy diplomatic privileges. If there is no embassy in the country he is serving he does not have diplomatic privileges. Sometimes we try to get external affairs to give him consular status, which carries with it diplomatic privileges, but there are trade commissioners who do not have diplomatic privileges, and there seems to be no way in which diplomatic privileges can be obtained for them.

Mr. Adamson: I must say that the granting of diplomatic privileges to a trade commissioner is of tremendous advantage to him and is of tremendous advantage to the country. If the minister could persuade his colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, to grant diplomatic privileges to these trade commissioners it would be of great advantage to all concerned.

Mr. Drew: Under the details of the trade commissioner service the figures are given as to the expenses of each of the various offices. I realize that there are bound to be substantial differences in regard to these offices, but would the minister explain why, for instance, the trade commissioner service at Caracas is $77,877, and the trade commissioner's office at Melbourne is $24,335? I would like to have some indication as to what considerations result in so much larger expenditure in the office at Caracas than in the office at Melbourne. I simply take them as an illustration.

[The Deputy Chairman.]

Mr. Howe: The trade commissioners are paid a basic pay, as though they lived in Ottawa, and there are supplements, depending on the cost of living in the posts to which they are assigned. Caracas has the highest cost of living in the world, as far as I know. It has that record in the trade commissioners' service. On the other hand, the cost of living in Melbourne is probably no higher than the cost of living in Ottawa. It may be a bit, but I would believe that it was not much higher than in Ottawa.

Mr. Drew: I am taking such places as Wellington and Melbourne as places within the commonwealth where one would think the activities would be important, and then comparing them with such a place as Caracas, and for instance Manila, where the expenditures are $49,542, as compared with $20,466 in Wellington. Are the activities of these offices in the cities in the commonwealth not more important than they are in Manila or Caracas?

Mr. Howe: Well, the trade commissioners in these areas cover many countries. I suppose the trade commissioner in Caracas covers three or four other countries. He may have a larger office than the office in Melbourne. The office in the Philippines has been newly established and a drive has been made, a very successful drive, to get a share of the Philippine business. We have done big business there. I dare say some extra pressure has been put on that office, and perhaps extra expenses incurred. The very fact that it is set up new may have something to do with it. There are three offices in Australia. The work is divided.

Mr. McLure: What are the qualifications for appointment of trade commissioners? To my mind he should be a man who can sell Canada and Canada's products.

Mr. Knowles: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. Howe: They must be university graduates with some trade experience. Trade commissioners are taken into the service in a junior capacity, and put through a course of training which takes at least a year. The trade commissioner is sent to all parts of Canada. The first requirement is that he must know Canada and Canadian industry thoroughly. Then he is put in a junior position abroad, and gradually given the experience required to be a trade commissioner.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Drew: No.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Hughes Cleaver (Halton): Mr. Speaker, may I ask you to revert to motions in order to present a report of the committee on banking and commerce?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Is it the pleasure of the house to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Seventh report of standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Cleaver.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will move adoption of the amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 198, to amend the Customs Act, and Bill No. 355, respecting weights and measures. I understand the government agrees to those amendments.

Mr. Knowles: Does the minister know what they are?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): One is the debate on the six months question; they have extended it to twelve. I do not know what the other amendment is.

Mr. Howe: A typographical error.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Perhaps a clerical error—the absence of a few commas. Then tomorrow we will go into supply to consider the estimates of the Department of External Affairs and the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. Then we will proceed with Bill No. 375, to amend the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, before taking up the estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Fleming: What position does the government take on the amendments made by the Senate?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I said the government would agree to or accept the amendments.

Mr. McLure: When will we have the pleasure of going over the estimates of the Minister of Public Works?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I am aways at the disposal of the hon. gentleman. It will be a real pleasure when I can find a moment to discuss my own estimates. However, if the hon. member needs any information preceding the estimates, I am ready to give explanations.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

76. Departmental administration and payments to Canadian Commercial Corporation and other corporate agencies for services provided in connection with defence purchasing and production, $5,000,000.

77. To provide capital assistance for the construction, acquisition, extension or improvement of capital equipment or works by private contractors engaged in defence contracts, or by crown plants operated on a management-fee basis, or by crown companies under direction of the Minister of Defence Production, subject to approval of treasury board, $50,000,000.

78. To provide for research and development of jet engines and aircraft, $1,000,000.

79. To provide for the liquidation of contracts, including commitments of previous years related to the acquisition of assets operated by the departments of munitions and supply and reconstruction and supply or an agency of these departments; the liquidation of the assets and liabilities of closed crown companies and crown plants; and for miscellaneous and unforeseen expenses, $200,000.

80. To authorize the transfer of funds from the Canadian Commercial Corporation Employees' Retirement Fund to the retirement fund created by the Civil Service Superannuation and Retirement Act, in respect of past contributions and accumulated interest thereon of employees transferred from the corporation to the department, $1.

Crown companies—

81. To provide for expenses incurred by Defence Construction Limited in procuring the construction of defence projects on behalf of the Department of National Defence, $3,000,000.

Canadian Arsenals Limited—

82. Administration and operation, $3,300,000.

83. Construction, improvements and new equipment, $1,700,000.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

General administration—

449. Departmental administration, $513,280.

450. Commodities and allocations, including assistance in the development of markets and new industry, the procurement of supplies, and contributions as detailed in the estimates, $596,973.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, June 15, 1951

The house met at eleven o'clock.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Third report of standing committee on external affairs.—Mr. Bradette.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON PROCEDURE—APPOINTMENT OF STRIKING COMMITTEE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That a special committee consisting of Messrs.: Weir, Tremblay, Casselman, Knowles and Shaw be appointed to confer with Mr. Speaker and, with his assistance, to prepare and report a list of members to compose a select committee of the house to consider with Mr. Speaker the procedure of this house for the purpose of suggesting any changes that may be desirable to assure the more expeditious dispatch of public business, with power to send for persons and papers and to report from time to time its findings and recommendations to the house.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has kindly consented to be the seconder of this motion.

Motion agreed to.

OLD AGE ASSISTANCE ACT

PROVISION FOR AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES—PAYMENTS AT AGE 65

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure respecting old age assistance and to provide for the payment to the provinces out of the consolidated revenue fund of amounts in respect of old age assistance paid by the provinces, to certain persons who have attained the age of sixty-five years and who are in need of such assistance, not exceeding, in respect of any recipient, fifty per centum of forty dollars monthly or of the amount of old age assistance paid by the provinces monthly to the recipients, whichever is the lesser; and to provide for the making of agreements with the provinces in relation thereto and for the conditions and duration of such agreements.

He said: His Excellency the Administrator, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Mr. Knowles: Good for the Administrator.

Motion agreed to.

BLIND PERSONS ACT

PROVISION FOR AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES—PAYMENTS AT AGE 21

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure respecting allowances for blind persons and to provide for the payment to the provinces out of the consolidated revenue fund of amounts in respect of allowances for blind persons paid by the provinces, to certain persons who have attained the age of twenty-one years, and who are blind and in need of such allowances, not exceeding in respect of any recipient, seventy-five per centum of forty dollars monthly or of the amount of the allowance paid by the provinces monthly to the recipients, whichever is the lesser; and to provide for the making of agreements with the provinces in relation thereto and for the conditions and duration of such agreements.

He said: His Excellency the Administrator, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

PROVISION FOR AUDIT OF PUBLIC ACCOUNTS, FINANCIAL CONTROL OF CROWN CORPORATIONS, ETC.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to consolidate and revise the Department of Finance and Treasury Board Act and the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, and certain other acts; to provide for the organization and functions of the treasury board and the Department of Finance, and the appointment and functions of the comptroller of the treasury; to regulate the collection, management and disbursement of public money, public borrowing, the management of the public debt, and the acquisition, recording and issue of public stores; to provide for the keeping of adequate public accounts, the audit thereof, and the appointment, salary and functions of the Auditor General of Canada; to provide for the control of the financial affairs of the crown corporations; to regulate the terms and conditions upon which contracts may be made on behalf of His Majesty; to provide a procedure for the write-off of debts owing to His Majesty that have become uncollectible; and to provide for the management of the consolidated revenue fund and for the making of certain payments therefrom.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General and His Excellency the Administrator, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommend it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

WESTERN GERMANY

ARRANGEMENTS FOR PEACETIME RELATIONS—ESTABLISHMENT OF CANADIAN EMBASSY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct three brief questions to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). As I have not previously given notice of these questions, I shall be quite satisfied to have him answer them later on.

First, would the minister tell the house what Canada is doing and has done to get upon something like a peacetime basis with western Germany? Second, would the minister consider it feasible and desirable to provide for such a state of cordiality of relations as would warrant the establishment in western Germany of a Canadian embassy? Third, have any steps already been taken in contemplation of such a move?

Mr. Speaker: I understand that the house is going into committee of supply almost immediately and will consider the estimates of the Department of External Affairs. If that is so, I think these questions should be reserved until that time.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

BURNT-OUT PENSIONERS—EFFECT OF APPLICATION OF OLD AGE PENSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is the Minister of Veterans Affairs yet in position to answer the question I asked on Tuesday with regard to the relationship between the War Veterans Allowance Act and the new old age pension legislation?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Minister of Veterans Affairs): The matter referred to in the question asked on Tuesday by my hon. friend is being reviewed and considered at the present time. I can assure my hon. friend that no veteran is going to suffer from the introduction of the old age security legislation.

HOUSING

QUESTION AS TO AGREEMENT FOR PROJECT IN ESTEVAN, SASK.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. J. Smith (Moose Mountain): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Resources and Development. Has the government of Saskatchewan requested the federal government to enter into an agreement for housing in Estevan under section 35 of the National Housing Act? If so, is the federal government prepared to enter into an agreement for this purpose?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): Section 35 of the National Housing Act has to do with dominion-provincial projects. Having in mind the difficulties attendant upon house building at this time, and the great interest of my hon. friend in housing in Estevan, a matter which he has kept before me since he entered the house, I think perhaps I should answer his question in a little more detail than I might otherwise do.

In a letter dated June 5, 1951, the minister of social welfare and rehabilitation asked for our approval of housing in a number of municipalities, including Estevan. No specific project was submitted. In my discussion with Mr. Sturdy and in my correspondence with him I pointed out the difficulties involved in building houses at this time, and stated that we must see to it that of the houses built in Canada, as many as possible are located in defence production areas. We discussed the high costs of housing, the desirability of contemplating economic rentals, and the need to build houses only in projects sufficiently large to enable us to realize all possible construction and operating economies. It was considered that projects under section 35 should not be smaller than forty or fifty units. That is why in our discussion we talked in terms of applying section 35 only in the larger municipalities.

We have not yet received details from the government of Saskatchewan about costs and consequent rental levels, and are therefore unable to form an opinion as to whether or not housing can be produced in small projects in the smaller municipalities which will be within the range of the local rental scale. However, with due regard to the above factors, we doubt that it is practical for any of the levels of government concerned to contemplate at this time housing under this section for municipalities having populations as small as Estevan.

I would suggest to my hon. friend that there are other sections which might more appropriately be considered if operations within the scope of the National Housing Act are contemplated for Estevan.

DOUKHOBORS

QUESTION AS TO SONS OF FREEDOM MOVING FROM KOOTENAY WEST, B.C., TO DISTRICT NORTH OF KAMLOOPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. In view of the expressed desire of the Sons of Freedom to be moved from the district of Kootenay West to the Adams lake district north of Kamloops, and in view of the fact that their request has been referred to the federal and British Columbia governments, will the minister inform the house whether the federal government intends to facilitate the movement of these people from Kootenay West to the Kamloops district?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am not familiar with the problem that has been raised by the hon. member, although I well understand his desire to facilitate this movement. I understand that our estimates will be discussed perhaps later today, and in the meantime I shall be glad to look into this matter and advise my hon. friend when the estimates are under consideration.

COST OF LIVING

INQUIRY AS TO ACTION WITH RESPECT TO INCREASE IN PRICES OF MEAT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Wilfrid LaCroix (Quebec-Montmorency): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if it is the intention of the government to take immediate necessary steps to slow down the rapidly rising prices of meat in Canada which are contributing so much to the high cost of living?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The officers of my department are studying the situation of rising meat prices which are due to abnormal demand from the United States at this time. No conclusion has been reached as yet as to what can be done about it, but we will do our best to prevent meat prices from reaching too high a peak.

CUSTOMS ACT

AMENDMENTS TO CLARIFY ACT AND TO FACILITATE ADMINISTRATION AND ENFORCEMENT—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 198, to amend the Customs Act.

Mr. Knowles: What are the amendments?

Mr. McCann: One amendment has to do with grammatical construction, and the other has to do with the time within which an appeal may be made for the remission of taxes. It was six months in the bill which was passed here, and it has been extended to twelve months.

Mr. Fleming: It is obvious that the Senate has made an amendment which should have been made in this house. I think the house will welcome the amendment.

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT

GENERAL REVISION—AUTHORITY FOR CLASSIFYING WEIGHING AND MEASURING DEVICES, ETC.—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. 355, respecting weights and measures.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister say what the amendment is?

Mr. McIlraith: The amendment is to schedule II. It corrects a typographical omission of the words "the pound, which is". These were left out of the schedule in describing the standard unit of weight. It was purely a clerical omission of the words.

Mr. Knowles: Like leaving out a comma.

Mr. McIlraith: Very much.

Mr. Graydon: Is not a clerical omission a mistake?

Motion agreed to, amendment read the second time and concurred in.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Dion in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Department and missions abroad—

84. Departmental administration, $2,272,597.

Mr. Graydon: Does the minister intend to make a statement prior to the discussion of his estimates?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I have no intention of making a general statement at this time, but I shall be glad to deal with questions that may arise during the discussion of my estimates.

Mr. Graydon: Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a few remarks with respect to the estimates of the Department of External Affairs. As you know, they have just been returned to committee of supply after consideration by the standing committee on external affairs. I want to deal with only one or two matters which perhaps should be enlarged upon and emphasized at this time.

My first reference will be to the question of the proposed Japanese peace treaty and rearmament plan. I have no desire to discuss the Japanese peace treaty at this time, except to suggest to the minister that, when he is replying to the various questions that will be raised in committee of supply, he should deal with the matter of Canada's position in that regard. There must be a good deal of confusion in the public mind as to what is going on with respect to the negotiations leading up to the proposed agreement. First of all we have Mr. Dulles going to Japan and then to Great Britain. Press reports from time to time have indicated that agreements have been reached. There is one this morning from London indicating that, on the question of representation of Red China as opposed to nationalist China, some agreement has been arrived at between the United States and Great Britain, a very familiar kind of agreement in diplomatic circles—that no decision will be made with respect to that matter until later.

I think a problem must be arising in people's minds as to where Canada fits into these unilateral or bilateral negotiations which are being carried on by the United States of America and their representatives. We have not had a call from Mr. Dulles in Ottawa. We would like to know whether or not we have been kept in touch with all the developments, whether or not in his various travels abroad he has carried with him some implied or express authority from Canada with respect to our stand, and what the reaction of this country may be expected to be after the agreements have been finally drafted and put into a form satisfactory to these other countries. We have a say with respect to the Japanese treaty, and I think the minister should advise the committee what method we have employed to make our voice heard in these negotiations.

I also want to raise another question, and it is also one that I think is in the minds of the public. While the military and political aspects of the Japanese negotiations are of immense importance, and I think no one would desire to minimize their importance in any way, there is a problem concerning economics, finance and trade which I trust the government will not allow to be disregarded when the final negotiations are in progress. We must be certain that not only the political and military situations are given due consideration by the powers involved, but also the economics and trade effects of this treaty. That question should be dealt with by the minister during the course of this debate. We would be interested to learn how we fit into the picture so far as any arrangements for peace with Japan are concerned. As the minister well knows, some of the main markets of Japan are now cut off by virtue of Red Chinese domination of the great mainland of China. That in itself raises an obvious question which should not be disregarded in any consideration of a peace treaty with Japan.

I also want to mention another matter which was regarded as of sufficient importance to occupy a place in the report of the external affairs committee. I refer to the recommendation concerning the actions of future Canadian delegations at the general assembly of the United Nations. It is a recommendation with which I am thoroughly in accord. It gained unanimity in the committee, and is worth while mentioning. It reads as follows:

> Your committee also recommends that future Canadian delegations to the United Nations general assembly continue to urge that the budgetary contribution which the Soviet union and associated countries make be increased to figures which more closely correspond to their capacities to pay.

As the committee is aware, there has been a scandalous disproportion between other countries and the Soviet union with respect to their assessments and contributions to the cause of peace as represented by the United Nations organization. The budget of the United Nations of course calls for a certain percentage from each country as its share of the upkeep of that organization for the preservation and maintenance of peace. Russia has 180 million people, and Canada 14 million or thereabouts; naturally that disproportion in population causes the raising of eyebrows when we realize that the 180 million people pay a little less than seven per cent of the entire United Nations budget, while Canada, with only 14 million people, pays 3·3 per cent.

I want to commend the delegation from this country for the stand they have taken on this matter. It is not Canada's fault that we have not had a better deal with relation to the Soviet union. I think the standing committee was the place to initiate such a recommendation, and we should tell the United Nations we are not satisfied to allow a nation like the Soviet union, which calls itself a great power and shows all evidence of being a great power, to pay only a little less than seven per cent of the total budget of the whole United Nations organization. A country that can boast of 178 armed divisions and 30,000 aeroplanes, all poised for any eventuality of war, is not a nation that should be arguing that it should make a small contribution to this organization which would preserve peace. It does not make sense.

In addition, I think attention should be drawn to the fact that if the contribution is determined on the basis of the amount expended for war, then the Soviet union should make a corresponding contribution in the interests of peace. To some extent at least that would balance their activities in the international field. Moreover, they should pay more to the United Nations because they do more to sabotage that organization, and it seems to me there is no justification for the present arrangement.

I was amazed, as I suppose everyone in Canada was, at the last meeting of the United Nations to find a huge budget for the rehabilitation of Korea. That was somewhat premature, as events have developed; nevertheless something like $350 million was being set aside for that purpose, a committee was being set up, and all arrangements were being made under which we would play our part together with the other peace-loving nations in rehabilitating that war-stricken country. But of that $350 million the Soviet union were not putting up a single cent, nor was there any suggestion that they should put up any money. In other words, the people who were not to blame for the Korean problem were having to pay for the intervention of other people.

The whole picture is sordid; but by concurring in that part of the report we will tell the world that Canada is not satisfied with the way the Soviet union is meeting its obligations. It is bad enough to have them disturbing world peace as they are, without our having to pay more as our share of the cost of maintaining it. That, in simple terms, is what I wish to convey to the house—to say how strongly I endorse that part of the committee's report.

In addition I wanted to make one or two references to the recommendation with respect to the international service of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. On this subject some evidence was adduced, though perhaps not as much as the committee might have liked. This question, of course, has a dual significance, and the matter may be said to be under dual jurisdiction. Some of these recommendations might have gone further had it not been for the fact that the committee was anxious not to tread upon the toes of another committee which might be dealing with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, which of course has jurisdiction over the international service. Nevertheless it was made crystal clear that for geographical reasons, with the international service in Montreal and the external affairs department in Ottawa, questions of clearance concerning policy, details and the programs beamed to these other countries make for an unmanageable situation. That was one reason why we in the committee felt we could not go further than simply to call for closer liaison between the department and the international service with respect to policy.

However, I think most committee members have come to the conclusion that we have reached the end of the era of just trying to speak to our free-power friends through the international service. I believe the day has come when we must change our approach and try to reach some of those behind the famous iron curtain who may wish to become our friends. We are told by those who ought to know that there are millions upon millions of prospective listeners in those countries, behind the border between freedom and slavery, who are anxious to hear the message from this country, and there is a very good reason why Canada is in perhaps a much better position than any other nation in the world to speak to those people. We are not suspect as being a great power. We are not suspect as having any international axe to grind. Our reputation and prestige as a people are high, and for those reasons a message from this country would carry more weight.

I was amazed to find that only a very small percentage of our broadcasts is directed to those people. For instance, no broadcasts at all are being beamed to that great section of the Soviet union known as the Ukraine, though some of the most democratic and freedom-loving Ukrainians in the world are to be found in Canada. I mention that to suggest that the percentage of our short-wave broadcasts beamed to countries behind the iron curtain should be increased, and our whole approach to this question changed in view of the fact that we are in the twilight stage between peace and war. No longer can we be said to be in a definite period of peace. I had not intended to elaborate on that point, but I did want to suggest that there is a need, perhaps not for additional facilities, but for a change in the use of the present facilities.

Then I wanted to mention a matter having to do with questions of unanimity and unity at top levels among the major free powers. I suppose nothing has disturbed our people more than the fact that from time to time there have been superficial difficulties, particularly between the United Kingdom and the United States, at high international levels.

I have heard it suggested from time to time, as indeed it was suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North during a debate in this house on a resolution which was later withdrawn, that consideration should be given the setting up of an Atlantic union. I believe most people understand my views in that respect. I think the objective is good; but I agree with what the minister said during that debate, that there is a time and season for all things, and I am not at all sure we have arrived at either the time or the season to proceed along those lines. I do agree that it is an objective we must always keep in view, to which this generation may properly look as a plan for the future.

I have been greatly impressed, as I think every member of this committee must have been—and particularly my learned colleague from Lake Centre—with the fact that at its various meetings the commonwealth parliamentary association has done an immense amount of good in acting as a clearing house for the exchange of views not only among governments but among those who have been elected to office, regardless of their political opinions. That is one of the great advantages of the commonwealth parliamentary association, and I believe those advantages are being realized more and more as the years go by. I believe there is a need for an expansion of that type of endeavour. I throw out this suggestion to the committee: I am wondering if we should not have, as an experiment, some kind of informal meeting of representatives of the United Kingdom, Canada, and the United States, in which there could be frequent clearances of opinions as between men and women of the various political parties who have been elected to the parliaments of those countries. I am not so sure that that would not result in our finding some common denominator for understanding between the peoples of these nations.

It seems to me it is not good enough always to have governments meeting and deciding things, because all governments are not like this one in that they have not such a large majority in the legislature. A good example of this is found in the congress of the United States, and in the slim majority of the Attlee government in Britain. These are factors which might properly be considered. Personally, I should like to see some move made whereby selected representatives from this parliament, from the congress of the United States and the parliament of the United Kingdom, could get together in frequent meetings something similar to that of the commonwealth parliamentary association—not anything in the nature of a strait-jacket organization, but simply with a view to having informal discussions from time to time for the purpose of clearing up misunderstandings which arise between the peoples of those countries. There would be the additional advantage that the representatives would bring back to their respective legislative bodies, just as they do from the commonwealth parliamentary association, an appreciation of the other person's point of view, which is essential if the free peoples of the world are to march together in common understanding and with common objectives. It is only a personal proposal that I put forward, but I suggest that it is at least worthy of consideration.

I wish to refer now to a project which has been approved by every political party in Canada. It has been approved by governments, and it has been endorsed by the party to which I have the honour to belong. It has not yet, however, been the subject of the action which I believe should be taken. I should like to have seen in the report of the external affairs committee some recommendation in connection with the St. Lawrence waterway. Such a reference would have afforded the committee, for the first time since the agreement was made in 1941, an opportunity to discuss the matter and record its position. I believe this should have been done some time ago. The agreement was made on March 19, 1941. So far as Canada is concerned, the treaty that was signed at that time, and endorsed by the government, is awaiting approval by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States.

In 1895 the first move with respect to this matter was made when the United States and Canada set up a committee of inquiry. In 1932 the St. Lawrence deep waterway treaty was signed by both countries, but it failed to achieve a two-thirds majority in the United States Senate, so the matter was dropped again. In 1941 the St. Lawrence basin agreement was entered into. At the instance of the United States Senate some changes were made in it in 1949 in order to make it more acceptable to both countries.

In order to show how this matter comes within the purview of the Department of External Affairs, I might say that in between those periods the permanent joint board of defence for Canada and the United States more than once urged that this waterway ought to be completed as a defence measure. From the strait of Belle isle to the lakehead cities of Fort William and Port Arthur is a distance by water of 2,225 miles. It is perhaps the most important inland waterway in the whole world, yet in between those points there is a forty-mile bottleneck which ought to be removed. In this enlightened day and age, when the needs of trade and commerce, defence and power are all calling for the removal of that bottleneck, it does not make sense that we should delay the construction of this short protected route through the heart of a continent. There is a need for it in time of war as well as in time of peace, particularly in view of the high transshipment costs which the present undeepened waterway causes.

So far as my own part of the country is concerned we are perhaps more keenly interested in this project than some other parts of Canada. For that reason I hesitate to speak on behalf of anyone else in connection with it. On behalf of my part of the province of Ontario I want to say that we have enough power to care for our needs up to the end of 1956. Beyond that we are faced with a bottleneck so far as power is concerned, unless the 1,100,000 horsepower available in connection with the St. Lawrence river project are brought into being. In that forty miles there are 2,200,000 horsepower available to both countries. In addition to that, farther up the waterway there is another estimated two and a quarter million horsepower, but nothing has been planned yet with respect to its development.

This problem was emphasized by a recent visit to the Canadian international trade fair by representatives of the great lakes states bordering this country. Of course, they are interested in the project just as we are. They are just as much concerned as we are about the lobby which is going on now in congress. They point out that the Mesabi iron range in the state of Minnesota is rapidly petering out and that the ore which normally would come from there is being depleted. That situation, of course, creates a special need, in time of defence preparations, for the necessary raw material which is available in Canada from time to time but which needs a waterway for its transportation. Representatives of Ohio, Michigan, Illinois, Wisconsin and Minnesota have not only expressed their great anxiety, just as we have done, for a movement towards the St. Lawrence waterway development on a basis of immediate urgency, but have welcomed Canada's challenge to build this waterway alone.

I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that these states are so anxious—as we are—to have the waterway built that some discussion has taken place in their various legislatures or among their state officials with regard to finding some way, under international law, by which they could assume some portion of the cost of a joint undertaking. I want to say this—and when I do so, I speak personally; but as a matter of fact all the party platforms have called for a joint undertaking of the St. Lawrence development. Frankly, sir, I think that perhaps in the end the best thing that could happen to Canada and to Canadians would be for us to start now to build the St. Lawrence seaway on our own. There are a great number of reasons why that should be done. More than that, even if the present congressional committee makes a favourable decision—and there seems to be a good deal of doubt as to its decision—and recommends a joint undertaking on the St. Lawrence deep waterway, our experience has shown—and perhaps it is indicated in our own parliament as well—that there are a great many ways in which congressional delays can occur. Once that committee has endorsed the undertaking, some other committee or some other body through which it must go for final ratification and approval can block it in its course. One of our real problems is this: Are we now running into a long period of indecision from which Canadians may find it difficult to extricate themselves? Americans may say: Of course we are studying the matter, and we are still dealing with it; while we are still dealing with it Canadians would, of course not want to make any move with regard to it.

It seems to me that we as a nation should not delay any longer in saying to the United States government that Canada is now proposing to proceed with the great lakes-St. Lawrence waterway on its own, and that in the years ahead we shall look forward to the completion of this great project as a matter of national pride. In the past we have done great things as a nation, both in peace and in war. Let us do this one other great thing and show the United States people and the United States government, as well as our own people, that after all we have the capacity and the desire to see to it that this mid-continent waterway, the greatest of its kind in the world, shall no longer be bottlenecked by forty miles of unnavigable water.

In my opinion that is the course which should be pursued. I say it is my own personal opinion, because I do not want to bind members in any part of the house with respect to the matter. But it is my view that we should not delay a moment longer in arriving at our decision, making it known, and starting upon what would be one of the most beneficial ventures in the field of transportation, commerce and business that Canada has thus far undertaken.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, perhaps the minister will permit me also to ask him some questions, so that he may answer them when he is answering others that have been asked.

May I just say to him that if I am obliged to leave before he speaks, I hope he will understand that it is because of a firm appointment I have made, and that I must leave on that account.

First of all, I think the standing committee on external affairs performs an extremely useful function indeed. Those of us who were privileged to be members of it, both this year and in past years, I think understand how valuable this committee is to the house, since we can have before us the officials as well as the minister, and can not only ask questions about the broad outlines of our external policy, but can get many of the details that it would perhaps be difficult for us to obtain in the house.

May I also say this, Mr. Chairman, because one likes to do these things once in a while. As one who has attended a number of international conferences with officials of the external affairs department and has sat with them at the meetings of the external affairs committee, may I express my tribute to the work that the officials of that department are doing. I think the minister is to be congratulated on having around him the able officials, both in the country and outside of it, that we have in that department.

I now wish to refer briefly to what the hon. member for Peel has said in one or two connections. I agree with him that, in spite of the failure of the Canadian delegation to obtain a fairer distribution of the assessments made by the United Nations, we should not give up the struggle; we should continue to press continuously for a fairer apportionment of the costs of running the United Nations. It is perfectly true that the Soviet union is paying a relatively small amount, namely, about twice what we are paying. That amount, it seems to me, is out of all proportion to the influence and power that that great country assumes and exercises in the councils of the United Nations and of the world generally.

I should also like to say that I agree with the views expressed by the hon. member, and which have been expressed by others in this chamber, with regard to an Atlantic union. The hon. member for Winnipeg North is performing a useful service to this country—and indeed to the nations associated in the North Atlantic alliance and to other nations that might be brought into the organization,—in promoting this idea. True, it involves a surrender to a greater organization of some of the sovereignties we now possess, but in the interests of peace that course probably will have to be taken sooner or later when public opinion and world conditions are ripe for it.

I wish also to refer especially to the news reports of the proposed Japanese treaty. I quite agree with those who think that western Germany and Japan cannot be kept permanently out of the family of nations. It is now nearly six years since the war ended, and, under ordinary circumstances, history would show that by this time peace treaties should have been written. They have not been written. It is essential that those countries should now, after six years, be brought into the relationships which are normal in peacetime between nations. I just want to say this, however. As the committee knows, we thoroughly approved Canada's support of the United Nations in resisting the aggression of the North Koreans. We shared with other hon. members—and with the government, I believe—the hesitation that was felt when the 38th parallel was crossed. We certainly feared the effects of the approach of the United Nations armies to the Yalu river and the provocation that might be felt by the government of China. I view with considerable misgiving the proposal to write a treaty with Japan, leaving out nations which are involved in the Far East, at a time when, to say the very least, there is some uncertainty about the future relationships of China. I fear that what we are doing, step by step, is to push China, the new China, more completely into the Russian orbit. And I believe the new China as it exists today is the China of the future.

Mr. MacInnis: It is here to stay.

Mr. Coldwell: As my hon. friend says, it is here to stay. The government of the China of the future might not have the same attributes as the government of the China of today, but at least the revolution has occurred; the revolutionary government is in power and is going to remain in power. The future of the world depends very largely upon the manner in which we can bring about a better understanding between the revolutionary government of China—and the governments that will follow it, arising out of this revolution—and the democratic world. It was with a good deal of misgiving that one read in the newspapers this morning and heard over the radio last night of the proposal for the signing of a peace treaty to which a government of China later on will be invited to attach its signature, and, as I understand the proposal to be, to co-operate in the terms of the treaty.

There is no question in my mind that Chiang Kai-shek and the group of reactionaries, as they have been described by the hon. member for Lambton-Kent, are permanently eliminated as a factor in China. Any attempt to restore that government on the mainland of China will be, I believe, a tragedy for Asia and a tragedy for the world. We know pretty well the opinions of most members of the commonwealth of nations, including India and Pakistan. While Burma is outside the commonwealth, we hope that country will remain on the friendliest of relations with the commonwealth; and we know what their views are on this matter.

I do not know what part has been taken by the Department of External Affairs, the government or the minister in regard to these discussions; but I ask the minister very pointedly if he will indicate exactly what is the position of Canada and the policy of the government in regard to this agreement that is reported to have been made between the United Kingdom and the United States.

After all, we are a Pacific nation. Our borders are washed by the Pacific ocean on the west, and we cannot be negligent of or oblivious to what happens in the Pacific area. It would be well for the minister to tell the House of Commons and the country categorically just where we stand in connection with this matter, involving, as it does, what may be a fateful agreement or understanding.

I want to see communism stopped everywhere. I believe that totalitarian communism menaces the world, but I also believe that if we adopt policies that throw great masses of the people, whether because of their poverty and misery and want or because of situations similar to those in China today, into the orbit of the Soviet union, we are bringing about a situation which will mean a third world war and, in all probability, the destruction of the type of civilization to which we aspire. Certainly it will restrict the freedom we all wish so wholeheartedly to expand.

I know of no announcement in recent weeks that has caused me so much disturbance as the announcement made last night and repeated in the newspapers this morning. We were happy indeed when it seemed that the United States, in removing MacArthur, was endeavouring to reach the point where a negotiated settlement of the Korean conflict could be achieved.

China has unlimited manpower, and the suggestion that we can fight her successfully, that we can bomb her cities, and so on, into submission, seems to me to be quite unrealistic. With her manpower and resources she would ultimately swallow the forces of occupation of the nations that are associated together in what we call the democratic or free world. Success does not lie that way.

I would ask the minister to tell us as nearly as he can what part, if any, Canada has taken in connection with the agreement that has been reached; what the views of the government are in this regard, and what the policy of Canada is to be in connection with it. I am sure many people in this country will be anxious to have that information, and I suggest this is the opportunity for the minister to give that information.

That is the only point I am going to make this morning. I do hope we shall have a clear statement from the minister about the proposed Japanese treaty.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Peel and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar have brought up for discussion some very important questions. Most of them, if not all, were given careful consideration by the committee on external affairs, which has now reported to the house.

Possibly at this point I might be permitted to pay tribute to the work of that committee, and especially to its chairman, who has the respect, and indeed the affection, of all of us.

I hope I shall not be expected to repeat on questions of general policy statements I have made in the house and before the committee. But there are some specific questions which have been raised, and of course I shall do my best to deal with them.

The first, and possibly the most important, which has arisen in the discussion so far is that of the proposed Japanese peace treaty. Our position as a government in this matter has been made pretty clear to the house: we are in favour—and I am sure the house is in favour—of the earliest possible conclusion of such a treaty—

Mr. Coldwell: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: —so that Japan may be brought back into the family of nations and play her part as a strong democratic country, especially in Asian affairs. So we have welcomed the discussions which have taken place to that end. When we were consulted, as we were some months ago, as to the form which these discussions should take, we agreed with our friends in Washington and London that possibly diplomatic talks initiated by the United States with other governments interested, rather than a general conference, would be the best way to proceed in the present circumstances. As the committee knows, these talks have been proceeding and are now reaching finality.

In all this process of consultation we have played our part and have been informed of developments as they occur. We certainly have no complaint to make in regard to the methods that have been adopted to keep us informed. Mr. Dulles has consulted with our representative in Washington and our representative in Tokyo. I was in Washington yesterday and had a discussion with the assistant secretary of state in charge of Far Eastern affairs. There was an official discussion in Washington between United States, United Kingdom and Canadian officials a few weeks ago, which discussions were resumed in Ottawa a few days after they had finished in Washington. This question has also been discussed in London. I think it is true to say that we have been kept informed and have played a reasonably active part in the negotiations leading up to the present position.

In the early days of these negotiations a draft was circulated by the United States to the governments more particularly concerned. We made comments on that draft on May 1 and May 21 and gave our views in some detail on every single clause. Having received the United States draft, at that time the United Kingdom made certain counter-proposals of its own, and we also made known in London our views on those counter-proposals. In recent days there have been discussions in London between Mr. Dulles and the United Kingdom government designed to remove the differences which had developed in the preliminary discussions between the United States and the United Kingdom approaches to certain of these questions. Those discussions have resulted in an almost complete measure of agreement between London and Washington, and I understand that as a result a combined United States-United Kingdom draft will now be submitted to the other governments concerned for their observations. Once those observations are received it is hoped that a peace treaty may then be speedily concluded.

I am in some difficulty in making known at this particular time our final views in respect of the agreement, if it is a formal agreement, reached in London. We have not yet received any final text of the discussions in London, and I do not think it would be wise for me to express any final view in regard to this matter until that text is received. Of course the committee and parliament know that there have been one or two contentious points in these discussions. They have been mentioned here this morning. One concerns the association of China with the peace treaty, and the other is the disposition of the island of Formosa.

Our position in regard to the former is that this question of Chinese signature on a Japanese peace treaty should be postponed without prejudice to any eventual solution. I think the reason for that is obvious. I think it is known to all members of the committee that the United States has recognized one Chinese government while the United Kingdom has recognized another Chinese government. Obviously it would be difficult indeed for them to agree at this time on a Chinese signature to a formal Japanese treaty. Therefore this device has been adopted which I presume will result in a postponement of this issue for the time being, I hope without prejudice to a final and satisfactory solution.

Similarly, with regard to the question of Formosa I think we are all agreed that Japanese sovereignty in Formosa must be brought to an end. I have no doubt that that will be done in the peace treaty. I think it is also pretty clear that the eventual disposition of Formosa cannot be made in any draft treaty at this time. I do not think I can say anything more at this time on this matter.

There were one or two other points that were raised in connection with the proposed Japanese treaty. The hon. member for Peel called attention to the difficulty that we had had in pre-war times in trading with Japan, and stated that he hoped the treaty would take those difficulties into consideration. I can assure him that we have been much alive to the problem. We realize that in pre-war times there were certain difficulties in regard to Japanese trade, and I hope that the treaty will make that situation easier in the future. We have been particularly interested in the fisheries clauses of the treaty. In order to discuss those clauses the Minister of Fisheries, accompanied by some of his officials, visited Washington to take up the matter there with the United States and United Kingdom people. We hope that as a result the fisheries clauses of the treaty will be satisfactory to Canada.

Perhaps I can now deal with one or two other questions that have arisen during the course of the discussion. Both the hon. member for Peel and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar stressed the desirability of continuing the struggle in the United Nations to increase the proportion of the cost of that organization to be borne by the U.S.S.R. We have taken a most active part in that agitation, as the hon. member for Peel pointed out, and will continue to do so. The present proportions are most unfair to other members of the organization, and we hope we shall be able to make further progress during the next assembly in the direction of increasing the proportion of the cost to be borne by the U.S.S.R. and its satellite states. We made some progress in that direction in the last assembly, but not sufficient. We will not give up that struggle. If hon. members are interested in this particular question they will find it dealt with at some length at page 150 of the report of the department on "Canada and the United Nations".

Incidentally I should like to point out that the hon. member for Peel was mistaken when he said the United Nations had set aside $350 million for Korean relief. The objective which has been agreed upon is $250 million, but of course that amount has not been set aside as yet

Mr. Graydon: If I said $350 million I meant $250 million, because that was my recollection of the amount.

Mr. Pearson: I thought the hon. member said $350 million.

Mr. Graydon: I do not like to be careless with a hundred million.

Mr. Pearson: Some reference was made by both speakers who preceded me to the international service of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. This subject was dealt with at considerable length before the committee, and I made quite a lengthy statement on the matter, which will be found at page 85 of the proceedings. We are attempting to improve and develop our liaison with the C.B.C. international service. I think it is generally recognized by the two departments concerned that that liaison is working effectively. So far as we in external affairs are concerned, we have no complaint on that score. We are responsible for policy guidance in connection with the broadcasts, and our contact on policy matters is close and continuous. I hope it will continue that way.

The hon. member for Peel suggested that we extend our coverage behind the iron curtain. In view of the circumstances with which we are faced at the present I think the importance of that will be recognized by all hon. members. However, it would necessitate a considerable expenditure. It could not be done simply by transferring facilities now used for broadcasting, say to Latin America, for use for broadcasting to the Ukraine or Poland. An additional organization would have to be brought into the international service which would be familiar with this particular kind of broadcasting. The broadcasting now carried on to Latin America is to create a background for an increase in and development of our trade. The persons engaged in that work would not be satisfactory for the kind of broadcasting which would be directed behind the iron curtain.

The hon. member for Peel also made a very interesting suggestion—and he only threw it out as a suggestion—that possibly meetings of representatives of the parliaments of the United Kingdom, United States and Canada might be useful, and of course I think most members of the committee would agree. I am inclined to think, however, that that kind of interparliamentary consultation could be even more effectively carried on, if it is desirable in itself—and I think it is—if it were based somewhat more broadly than on the parliamentary institutions of the three countries. Steps toward that end are already being taken. I understand that the Council of Europe, which, as members of the committee know, represents not governments but parliaments, legislatures and all parties, has already invited observers from the United States and Canada to attend its next session at Strasbourg. The decision in that regard as to whether the Canadian parliament should be represented of course is not a decision for the government but would be a decision for parliament itself.

Mr. Graydon: I should like to ask the minister one question. He has brought up the question of the Strasbourg meeting. Has the minister any information as to whether or not representatives are to be sent from the Canadian parliament to the Strasbourg meeting? Has any decision been made?

Mr. Pearson: I do not think so. That would be a decision made by parliament, and I assume the matter would be brought to the attention of parliament by the Speaker, to whom the invitation would be addressed, if indeed it has not already been so addressed.

Mr. Adamson: Does the minister know whether or not it has?

Mr. Pearson: I think the invitation was sent a short time ago to the Speaker, but I am not certain whether he has received it yet. It would be quite simple to find out, and I should be glad to do so during the luncheon recess.

The hon. member for Peel made some reference to the St. Lawrence waterway. I listened to his remarks with great interest, and all I should like to say about it now is that the government still hopes that this great undertaking, which should be of benefit to both countries economically, and indeed politically and in other ways, can be carried out as the result of co-operative arrangements between the two countries. That is still our hope, and that is our objective. We shall be disappointed indeed if that cannot be achieved. I am inclined to agree with the hon. member that it is desirable for the Canadian parliament and the Canadian government to know as soon as possible if it can be done that way. It would be unfortunate if we were kept in a state of indecision indefinitely; therefore I hope our friends in Washington will be able to come to a decision on this matter before very long. What should be the proper course for Canada will depend no doubt on the nature of the decision reached in Washington, and I do not think it would be very wise on my part to anticipate that decision now by making suggestions for alternative courses of action. Therefore I would prefer to leave the matter at that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What did the minister mean by political benefits? He referred to economic benefits, and I should like to know what he meant by political benefits.

Mr. Pearson: I have in mind that it would possibly bring the two countries even closer together than they are now, because I think a co-operative undertaking of that kind, carried out by two peoples, should have some beneficial result on the general political relationships of those two peoples.

Mr. Pouliot: Not of narrow significance.

Mr. Pearson: I think I have dealt with the points that have been raised, and possibly I might postpone any further observations until new points are brought up in the course of the discussion.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Chairman, I will be serious, but you will excuse me, sir, if I am not solemn. A number of years ago Theodore Roosevelt used to say that to be successful in any discussion one had to use a sweet voice and carry a big stick.

An hon. Member: Talk softly.

Mr. Pouliot: Unfortunately from the end of the war until last December the United Nations had a big voice and no stick at all. There were provocative speeches at each meeting of the United Nations, and it was impossible to come to any peaceful agreement. In 1947 it was decided that Canada was to become a member of the security council. In an article entitled, "Do We Want Peace or War", which I wrote after having read a series of remarkable articles published in L'Action Catholique by Mr. Lorenzo Pare, then president of the press gallery, and who is just as modest as he is well informed, I wrote as follows:

> Let Marshall, Bevin, Bidault and the others remain silent to listen to St. Laurent speaking to Molotov. If he is listened to, the peace effort of Canada will be greater than its war effort.

Unfortunately the prime minister of the time did not accept that suggestion, and Canada was represented on the security council by a bellicose gentleman who did absolutely nothing to promote peace.

[Mr. Pearson.]

An hon. Member: Who was that?

Mr. Pouliot: If my hon. friend does not know, he should not sit here.

Mr. Hansell: It is the description we do not recognize.

Mr. Ferguson: We do not recognize him from the description.

Mr. Pouliot: That is unfortunate, but I refer my friend to the files of newspapers of the time. I must express my appreciation to the Secretary of State for External Affairs who has twice vindicated me. The first time was on June 11, 1950, in the Cartier by-election, when he repeated what I had said a long time before, that the United Nations could not guarantee the security of any country. The second time was after my remarks of June 29, 1950, about the Korean situation. I do not refer to his ironical and uncalled for comparison of the same day to Neville Chamberlain, as found at page 4392 of Hansard, but to his trans-Canada broadcast of five months later, on December 5, 1950, when he stated that an attempt through diplomacy to reach a modus vivendi with the Asian communist world is not appeasement. That is to be found at page 439 of the external affairs bulletin for December, 1950.

Well, for political reasons the prime minister of the time did not permit his secretary of state for external affairs to be in continuous attendance during the meetings at Lake Success; but the present minister had the honour to represent the whole white race on the cease-fire committee which was appointed not so long ago. His two fellow members were the president of the security council, the representative of Iran, Mr. Entezam, and Sir Benegal Rau of India. That was the first time, since Senator Dandurand presided over the league of nations and played an important part in the drafting of the treaty of Locarno, that a Canadian had been given such responsibilities, by unanimous consent of a majority of the members of the United Nations. This also was in line with what I said in the house on June 29 of last year.

I am not to go back at length over the past, but you know, Mr. Chairman, that truth is eternal and the right to express it as one finds it cannot be questioned. I spoke on June 29, 1950. The session was prorogued the next day. On July 1 a self-appointed technician in international affairs, who is just that, wrote in the editorial page of one of the Ottawa newspapers that I was not a good Canadian just because I had expressed sincerely my views. He said, "That man Pouliot is not a good Canadian." It did not impress me. No one has yet succeeded in terrorizing me, and I am completely indifferent to what is said about me by any journalist. But following the line of the United Nations some years ago, after having been abused in another newspaper by another swelled-headed editor, I went to the human rights committee of the House of Commons. There I lodged my complaint and asked for redress of the wrongs. The committee did nothing.

Some people may be concerned about what is said of them by some self-complacent members of the press gallery. I do not care. I find them bigoted and ignorant. I find them just as intolerant as anyone can be. It may have happened after a luncheon at the Rideau club; I do not know and I do not care. I just mention that to suggest to my fellow members not to pay any attention to any unpleasant remark that is made about them by any member of the press gallery.

Strange to say, after that young man went on a long trip to Colombo he stopped in Egypt and Turkey. There he went to the legislative buildings, and he was haunted by the souvenir of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and, believe it or not, by my own. I do not know if it was in Ankara or in Cairo, but he said, "Here we see also the Coldwells and Pouliots who sit here." Then after the minister had spoken as he did on December 5, that journalist repeated exactly what I had said on June 29; I did not refer to him as "that man so and so." It was of no importance at all.

I am not to speak any longer. I am going home today to refresh myself, and I thank the committee for being so attentive to the remarks I have made.

Mr. Pearkes: Last evening when the house was in committee of supply a sordid story of a disgraceful international episode was revealed, reminiscent of the dark days of the middle ages when fortresses were betrayed and commanders were sold for a bag of gold. A few years ago the Canadian government underwrote the sale of some seven ships to the nationalist government of China. I understand the loan was jointly guaranteed by the then government of China and the Canadian government. Those seven ships were operating in Chinese waters until the fall of the nationalist government. At that time the banks and other interests concerned became somewhat alarmed as to whether the Canadian shipyards would ever be paid for those vessels.

We learned last night that the Canadian government then took back those ships under Canadian registry and the Canadian flag. Since then the payments have been made to the banks because of the fact that some of those ships have carried on a disgraceful trade between the British port of Hong Kong and the communist ports on the mainland of China. We were told last night that two of the ships have been captured and taken over by the communists. Those ships were operating up the Yangtze river; but the other five ships were still permitted to ply between Hong Kong and the communist ports on the south coast of China. Apparently the communists are making no attempt whatever to seize the other five ships. No doubt the two ships on the Yangtze were seized because if they had left the mouth of the river and gone across the sea of Formosa the United States naval vessels blockading the entrance to the Yangtze river might have seized them, and they would not have been able to bring to China the commodities they were carrying in their cargoes. But no attempt was made to seize those other vessels which are operated by the Ming Sung Industrial Company, because, had they seized the vessels in the communist port, obviously they would not have been able to enter Hong Kong and take again and again to the communist ports the materials which the communists were so anxious to obtain. Eyewitnesses in Hong Kong report that essential war materials are daily included in those cargoes carried by those ships of Canadian registry and flying the Canadian flag. This happens at a time when Canadian destroyers are in the China seas; when Canadian men are fighting in Korea for democracy and are opposed by Chinese formations helping the North Koreans; at a time when not many miles away from these ports of southern China, Canadian missionary nuns have been imprisoned without just cause and have been submitted to treatment which comes quite close to being torture.

When I asked questions as to the nature of the cargo which was being carried, the Minister of Trade and Commerce informed this committee that he could not say whether the ships were carrying contraband on their trips to Canton and up the Yangtze river, but he hoped that they were not. If they were, he did not know what could be done about it. I suggest to the minister, through you, that the Canadian people expect this government will do something about it, and do it without any further delay.

I received my information direct from Hong Kong in a letter dated June 4, 1951, and sent to me personally by the general secretary of the China coast navigating and engineer officers guild. This is an organization of merchant marine officers sailing the China seas. It is a responsible organization. The communication reaches me over the signature of Mr. George T. Lloyd, general secretary of that guild. I propose to read this letter, as it contains information, and will draw the attention of this committee to the situation which I believe exists in Hong Kong today. It reads:

I am directed to draw your earnest attention to what is regarded here as a scandal exploited by a few Canadian speculative Shylocks, and which has been considered in Hong Kong to be nothing less than a profitable evasion of commonwealth maritime laws. Then there is the larger and human aspect: Canadian (?) vessels carrying war materials to Red China to murder Canadian soldiers who espouse the democratic cause and risk their lives for love of country.

The points we desire to emphasize in order to arouse public interest are the following:

1. The vessels of the Ming Sung Industrial Company (of Canada) are at the time of writing employed in the following trades: Hong Kong-Macao, passengers and cargo; Hong Kong-Macao-Canton, passengers and cargo: Hong Kong-Canton, cargo only.

2. Canton is a port under the direct control of a government with which the government of the Dominion of Canada has no relations nor political contact.

3. What are the vessels carrying? Eye witnesses state that included in the daily cargoes is essential war materials. This is cold, concrete fact.

4. These vessels are trading under the Canadian flag, and have it painted prominently on both sides. They wear the Canadian ensign in Chinese communist ports we know.

5. These Canadian (sic.) vessels are officered and manned by Chinese (one has a Russian captain), who naturally have to bow and bend to the whims of the governing authority in Canton. The manning, of course, is contrary to the manning regulations of Canada and the British commonwealth. All this is officially sanctioned and tolerated, so that speculators may profit in gold.

6. The Ming Sung Industrial Company trades in China under the flag of the "People's Republic of China"—a government not as yet recognized by the Dominion of Canada. Chinese vessels, manned by Chinese, carrying war materials to Chinese Reds.

7. Canadian vessels are required to carry officers holding certificates issued within the commonwealth. Yet the seven vessels referred to have been trading under the flag of the Dominion of Canada since July 1, 1950, with the full consent of the government of the Dominion of Canada and the Hong Kong government acting on behalf of the United Kingdom. Regulations have been evaded.

8. The merchant navy officers organizations, both in Canada and Hong Kong, have earnestly and repeatedly taken up the matter with the various governments concerned, with no result, nor has a satisfactory reason ever been furnished by the various governments as to why such a grotesque state of affairs is permitted to be perpetuated in spite of legitimate protest.

In conclusion, it must be emphasized that cargoes are arriving in Canton in Canadian (?) bottoms to the disgust and discomfort of Canadians serving overseas. Can you for one moment imagine Canadian vessels conveying war materials to communist China to be used against men and youths of our own blood and breed? If your imagination cannot rise to that level, let anyone of an inquiring mind travel to Hong Kong and see what has been described as unchallengeable fact.

The scandal exists!

[Mr. Pearkes.]

If the gold profits are being made in Canada, are blood-dipped dollars worth the lives of Canadian men and youths?

Conscience revolts and rebels at the thought of it all.

Yours faithfully,

George T. Lloyd,
General Secretary

I indicated earlier that the Minister of Trade and Commerce knew of these facts, or many of them, as is disclosed in the remarks that he made last night. I think the people of Canada would much prefer to see those ships sink to the bottom of the ocean than to feel that they are carrying war supplies to a country whose armies are engaged against the personnel of Canada. They would much prefer to write off that loss, whatever it may be. I believe that the shareholders of the banks and of the trading companies concerned would rather lose that money than feel that it is tainted with the blood of Canadian soldiers.

I should therefore like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a few questions on this point. When were the two ships that are reported by the Minister of Trade and Commerce to have been seized in the Yangtze, seized or taken over by the communists or people's republic of China? Did the Canadian government make any protest at the time that those two ships were seized? Are these ships still being operated by the Ming Sung Industrial Company? Does that company operate or maintain agencies or have connections throughout communist China at the present time?

It will be noted that in the letter I read it was claimed that ships of the Ming Sung Industrial Company were now operating under the flag of the people's republic of China in Chinese ports. I should like to know whether this Ming Sung company, which I believe is a big organization with many ramifications, operates in communist China at the present time. Then I should like to ask this question: On whose authority were those ships, their officers and crews, given exception from the marine laws passed by this parliament?

Mr. Diefenbaker: And was it under order in council?

Mr. Pearkes: That was another point I had noted. Was it by order in council? Has some secret order in council been passed, or was it just on the written authority of some minister? Finally, I should like to know how much money has still to be paid for these vessels; and if so, what payments have been made to date, and by whom.

I feel that these are points upon which the country deserves enlightenment. If the Minister of Trade and Commerce does not know how this problem can be solved, I think we must rely upon the Secretary of State for External Affairs to find a solution. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said that it was not his baby. He passed it over to external affairs, to transport, to finance, or to somebody else. But the people of Canada will not tolerate this sort of thing. Appeals are being made today for the youth of Canada to serve in Korea. The people of Canada are, I think, ashamed—and certainly I am—to think that this government has any part or parcel of any transaction which will enable supplies to be sent to the enemy. If it is a matter of money—if this government would have to pay money if the payments were not made to the shipyards—then I say: Let us pay that money and let our hands be clean. We do not want to have any money that is tainted with the blood of our soldiers.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman who has just spoken has asked for certain information. He also has put a question on the order paper dealing with this point. He will get that information; and when he gets it, I think he will be sorry that he made some of the statements he made this morning. He bases those statements on a letter, on evidence which he had with him; and from his remarks I assume that he associates himself with the accuracy of those statements, or their inaccuracy. He has called them, I think—to use his own words—"cold, concrete facts."

Mr. Pearkes: Those were the words which were used in the letter. I was quoting the letter.

Mr. Pearson: Yes; that is what I am suggesting. The hon. member has based his serious allegations against the government on a letter which he has quoted to the committee, and with which, I assume, he associates himself as to its accuracy. I want to say now, Mr. Chairman, that when he gets the information which we shall be extremely glad indeed to give him, I think he will not be so happy about the source of his information. In his remarks this morning he talked about scandals, about disgraceful trade, about eyewitnesses in Hong Kong testifying that these ships are loading war materials daily for the Chinese communists; and he has made other statements of that kind which do not correspond with the information which we have and which, I can assure him, is at least as authoritative; I think it is much more authoritative than is the letter which he has just read to the committee. When the information is given, however, the committee will itself be able to judge as to the validity of my statement.

What I want to say now is that this matter came to our attention, as it did a short time ago—

Mr. Diefenbaker: When was that?

Mr. Pearson: When we received a letter from the same organization to which the hon. gentleman has referred. We received that letter, I think, last week. That was the first time, to my knowledge—and I am speaking only for myself at this moment—that any suggestion had been made that these ships were being improperly used. As soon as that letter was received, I at once took the matter up with my colleagues in the cabinet, and we sent a telegram at once to the Canadian official representative at Hong Kong requesting him to check up on those allegations and to give us all the information that it was possible for him to give. We have also taken the matter up with the United Kingdom authorities at Hong Kong. So far, although our information is not complete, we have not received any information which would justify the allegations made in the letter to which my hon. friend has referred. On the contrary, we have received specific information challenging those allegations and stating that they could not be supported by evidence.

There will be an opportunity to discuss this matter in detail. It concerns the Department of Finance as well as the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Department of Transport. But I want to assure the committee now that we have had the charge which has been levelled against this company —that of transporting war material to China —denied flatly by representatives of the company—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Just wait a minute until the minister completes the sentence.

Mr. Pearson: —and the evidence we have received from other sources also supports that denial. It must be remembered that before the ships can leave Hong Kong, they have to get customs clearance from the government of Hong Kong. It must also be remembered that regulations are in effect in Hong Kong to prevent strategic material of any kind from going to communist China. It must also be remembered that the Canadian government has regulations to that end, and those regulations have been in effect for many months. And we have done what we can to make sure that nothing of a strategic nature can get to China at this time. I am not going to say anything further about it at this time. But we will have all the information, and I hope when we get the information it will be quite clear that this government has not connived in any way at shipments of any strategic materials to the Red government of China.

The hon. member in the early part of his speech talked about two of our ships operating in the Yangtze river. There are no ships of Canadian registry or flying the Canadian flag that we know of operating in the Yangtze river at all.

Mr. Fleming: The Minister of Trade and Commerce said so last night.

Mr. Pearson: There are two ships of this company operating on the Yangtze river, but they are not of Canadian registry, or flying the Canadian flag—and that is our latest information.

Mr. Drew: Let me ask if the minister questions the accuracy of the statement made last night by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Pearson: I tried to tell the committee we are getting as complete and up-to-date information as possible in the matter. We have been in touch with Hong Kong, and that information today is that no Canadian ship of this company or any other company was operating on the Yangtze river.

Mr. Pearkes: But they have been.

Mr. Drew: I have asked a proper question, as to whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs questions the accuracy of the statement made by the minister last night.

Mr. Pearson: I will reply when I have had an opportunity to read exactly what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said, and not until then, and not merely to satisfy the curiosity of the hon. member at this time.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I hope the Secretary of State for External Affairs will retain his usual composure. It is not a matter of curiosity. We are dealing with a statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I would hope that the Secretary of State for External Affairs does support the proposition we have had put forward so frequently, that the statements of the Minister of Trade and Commerce are to be taken seriously.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I had intended to make some general remarks with regard to the subject before the committee, and I hope to do this a little later on. What happened just before the luncheon recess aroused my curiosity, and there are a number of questions I should like to ask the responsible ministers of the crown in connection with the remarkable conditions revealed by the hon. member for Nanaimo when he read from a letter which he had received some days ago. The more one considers the answers given by ministers, the more one wonders just what are the facts.

Last evening the Minister of Trade and Commerce, with his knowledge of matters that affect all departments, went into considerable detail in connection with this curious situation which has arisen as a result of the use made of ships bearing the Canadian ensign and sailing in waters that are certainly not friendly. One cannot say that they are enemy waters; for what is taking place in Korea is not war, but rather the punishment of an international aggressor by the combined conscience of mankind.

This is a curious situation, and one which cannot be answered merely by brushing aside what has been said and making the general observation that when the facts are made available and when the government finally speaks, everything will be proper and everyone will be satisfied. Either the minister has the facts, in which case he can say that the letter read by the hon. member for Nanaimo is not correct, or he has not the facts and is merely drawing upon the hope that when the facts are available there will not be a great deal of foundation to the allegations contained in the letter read by the hon. member for Nanaimo.

Last evening the Minister of Trade and Commerce gave some information. The interesting thing in connection with this matter is that both ministers who have spoken have begun to make excuses. The attitude of the minister of external affairs was that he did not know anything about this until about a week ago. I think the letter was dated June 4. Last evening the Minister of Trade and Commerce indicated that he knew quite a bit about it, but apparently he was glad that he did not know as much as what he was asked to give information on; for he is reported on page 4125 of Hansard, speaking about these ships, as saying:

> And they are not my problem, I should say. I had nothing to do with them, except that when they got into difficulty I was called in to try to straighten out the trouble. But they have nothing to do with my department, I am happy to say.

A little later the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra made a suggestion with regard to the mortgages, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce replied as follows:

> It might not be the right thing to do. The Department of External Affairs and the Department of Finance are struggling with the situation. I should not be talking about it at all, because I know very little about it, and I have nothing to do with it.

You see the tremendous struggle that is taking place as to who has the responsibility and what are the facts. The Minister of Trade and Commerce went into details, as he usually does, but this was one time when he said that he had nothing to do with the thing at all, that it was a matter in which the Department of External Affairs and the Department of Finance were engaged in a tremendous struggle. What is all the struggle about? Why all the struggle in this matter? If the facts are known, let us know them.

I am going to ask a number of questions of the minister of external affairs arising out of the glimpse given by the Minister of Trade and Commerce last evening. Last evening the Minister of Trade and Commerce gave a number of facts, but apparently in this struggle the minister of external affairs does not know all the facts that were known to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I want to get some information from the minister of external affairs in regard to this matter. I read what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said last evening, and I shall now ask a number of questions. The answers are there, because the Minister of Trade and Commerce made it clear last evening.

Who were the two or three Canadian shipyards with which the Ming Sung Company made agreements? On what dates were those agreements made? What was the amount of indebtedness that was guaranteed by the government of Canada in reference to the sale of these ships to the Chinese government or the guarantee by the Chinese government? Who were the banks who started to worry? Last evening the minister said, as reported on page 4124 of Hansard:

> All went well until the Chinese government, the government of Chiang Kai-shek, fell, and then the banks began to worry a little about their loan. In the uncertain situation that followed, it seemed wise to transfer the ships to the Canadian flag, which was done at the request of the Ming Sung Company, which expressed a desire to protect their loans in Canada.

Who were the banks? What were they worrying about? How much were they worrying about? This could be cleared up if the minister would just produce the correspondence with the Ming Sung Company which revealed the desire of that company to protect their loan.

Then we go on from there and we find that the minister said:

> Whether the ships are carrying contraband in their trips to Canton and up the Yangtze river I cannot say. I hope they are not.

A little later last evening the minister did say that he was assured that they were not by someone in Hong Kong. Yesterday one minister of the crown did not know whether these ships were carrying contraband. He hoped they were not. Today a minister with less information is able to say that they were not. Was that information received within the last twenty-four hours, since the matter was brought before the house? A little further on the Minister of Trade and Commerce said:

> But the government has no direct interest in the situation other than that they are guarantor to a Canadian bank for part of the money that built the ships for the Ming Sung Company.

Further on the Minister of Trade and Commerce said:

> When the flag was transferred the ships were exempted from the shipping regulations which required them to be officered by Canadians.

When did this take place? Has this ever been done in other cases? Has a special regulation ever been passed before to permit ships under Canadian registry or flying the Canadian ensign to operate, if not in hostile waters, certainly not in friendly waters?

The minister went on to say:

> When they came back under the Canadian flag they were exempted from the requirements.

The question that must be answered for the Canadian people is why that was done. What purpose was there in having these ships flying the Canadian flag under Canadian registry, and exempted from the regulations and requirements applying to Canadian shipping waters as long as they operated in Chinese waters? This cannot be answered by merely expressing the pious hope that some time when the information is available it will be given, and that when it is given it will be information that will be acceptable. This information is available. Remember that the Minister of Trade and Commerce said that one of the two departments having the information, the Department of External Affairs, was struggling with the Department of Finance to find a solution to this matter. When was the order in council passed to do what is most unusual, namely, to allow the Canadian flag to be flown on a ship that is not subject to the Canada Shipping Act? When the minister replies I ask him to say whether this was done by regulation; because he has brought another department into the struggle.

Last night the Minister of Trade and Commerce mentioned only the Department of Finance and the Department of External Affairs, but this morning the Secretary of State for External Affairs brought the Department of Transport into it; so that is another department. Of course they are not engaged in the struggle, because the Minister of Trade and Commerce did not mention them last evening.

Mr. Graydon: This is no longer a limited war.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is a case of each minister limiting his responsibility to some other department, and what we are trying to find out is which is responsible. Was an order in council passed? If so, then it is one of those that I must have missed as they were tabled from time to time by the Prime Minister.

Remember that the Minister of Trade and Commerce said in effect in a very straightforward way last evening: I do not know whether they are carrying contraband; I hope not. The Secretary of State for External Affairs today, in quite a show of annoyance at the hon. member for Nanaimo, said in effect: Of course they are not. We want to get the information from the minister today through his setting out the facts, tabling the documents and making the true situation known and not obscuring it by scattering the responsibility to some other department.

This is a most serious matter. The situation in Asia is such that nothing but care and consideration must be given to the end that things will not be done that will be unjustly provocative. Surely we have not come to a situation where a ship flying the Canadian ensign operates in waters that are far from friendly at a time when we are engaged in a struggle against the onward rush of communism, and one minister can say: I hope Canadian ships are not being used to carry contraband, and another minister says: Of course they are not, but we will tell you some time later when we get full information as to what the facts are.

I rise at this time merely for the purpose of suggesting to the Secretary of State for External Affairs that he answer these questions, that he should not endeavour to brush aside the search for information of the hon. member for Nanaimo, but that he place the cards on the table and let the Canadian people know why this has happened, why even today, while we sit here, ships flying the Canadian ensign are operating into communist waters apparently for the purpose of ensuring that certain Canadian creditors will receive their money. That is not a sufficient excuse for this situation.

The minister may have his explanation available now. The one he gave this morning was not in keeping with that given last evening by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and was one that will far from satisfy anyone, regardless of political persuasion, that all is well when in June of 1951, with the Korean situation what it was, the government should follow the course of action it has followed in this matter—a course of action which, if not calamitous, was certainly indiscreet. The only explanation given as to the reason why we are doing this unusual thing is the fact that creditors under a mortgage were to be assured of payment. That is not sufficient.

I hope the minister will now be in a position, reinforced as he must be since this morning by further information, to answer some of these pertinent questions. We do not intend to pass by this matter until complete and concrete answers are given to the questions raised by the hon. member for Nanaimo. You cannot get away from the fact that the Minister of Trade and Commerce used these words.

An hon. Member: Again?

Mr. Diefenbaker: He said, as recorded at page 4125 of Hansard:

> It might not be the right thing to do.

He was referring to a suggestion of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra.

> The Department of External Affairs and the Department of Finance are struggling with the situation. I should not be talking about it at all, because I know very little about it . . .

Mr. Howe: I should have said that first.

An hon. Member: The pleading lawyer.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is a jovial and frank answer on the part of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. If he would follow that course in other cases, how much disagreement would be prevented in the house! There is no doubt about that. You will notice that the minister did not make that modest statement until after he had given an answer that is so far out of line with what the Secretary of State for External Affairs said this morning that it demands an explanation; for after all, parliament would never have known.

Everything that was happening would have been kept from parliament and the country if the hon. member for Nanaimo had not discovered a situation which demanded and still demands action. The Secretary of State for External Affairs may laugh, but this situation is too serious to be treated in a frivolous manner. This morning he was annoyed when the matter was brought up. I hope this afternoon he is in a position to give a serious, considered answer to what was a reasonable request on the part of the hon. member for Nanaimo.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat saw fit to say that I was annoyed this morning when this matter was brought up.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Just from what you showed.

Mr. Pearson: I was not at all annoyed at this matter being brought up. To use the words of the leader of the opposition, I will admit that I lost my normal composure for a moment, and I did so for two reasons. In the first place the leader of the opposition tried to make it appear that something I was saying flatly contradicted what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said last night. During the noon recess I read the remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce in Hansard very carefully, and nothing he said last night was contradicted by anything I said this morning. I suggest that if hon. members compare the two statements when they appear in print, that observation will be borne out. I lost my composure also because I felt the hon. member for Nanaimo was suggesting or leaving the implication—and if I do him an injustice in this I shall be glad to withdraw it—that in some way or other the Canadian government was conniving at a course of action which had resulted in arms being shipped to communist China which might be used against our men in Korea.

Mr. Pearkes: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I never used the word "arms" in the course of my remarks, nor did I use the word "connive".

Mr. Pearson: Well, I made a pretty careful note of some of the observations of the hon. member and he said, quoting his words, "This disgraceful trade between the British port of Hong Kong and the communist ports, being carried on by this company through ships under Canadian registry." He also spoke of the people of Canada not tolerating this sort of thing. He talked of eyewitnesses in Hong Kong reporting that essential war materials were being included in those cargoes daily. From those observations I got the impression that he accepted as a matter of cold fact, to use his own expression, the contents of a circular letter—

Mr. Pearkes: Those were not my words; they were the words of the circular letter.

Mr. Pearson: —which was mailed to him and a good many other people by an interested party, which dealt with this matter and made some damning and serious charges against the Canadian authorities. If those charges were correct, Mr. Chairman, everything that was suggested by the hon. member for Nanaimo would be justified. But may I tell him that we in the government received those charges also and we have not accepted them as being correct, as he seems to have done. In his statement this morning, and I copied this down, he said: "I will draw the attention of this committee to the situation which I believe exists in Hong Kong today". The situation he believes exists in Hong Kong today is that which is outlined in the letter.

My loss of composure on this score was due to the fact that the hon. member was willing, as I understood it, to accept those allegations. When we received that circular letter, as I said this morning, I took it up at once with my colleagues in the cabinet. We came to the conclusion that if this sort of conduct was going on; if any ship under Canadian registry was engaged in this kind of trade; if these charges could be substantiated, we would take action at once to see that it was stopped and the ships taken off Canadian registry or, as the hon. member himself said, perhaps it would be better if they were sunk. No condemnation could be too severe if that sort of action was in fact being taken by this company using ships under Canadian registry. But before we took that action we felt it would be only fair to investigate these charges and see if we could get more substantial evidence than that appearing in a circular letter. So we communicated, as I said this morning, both with the United Kingdom authorities and with our own Canadian official representative in Hong Kong. Already we have received an interim reply from the Canadian trade commissioner casting very grave doubt indeed upon these allegations. We will be receiving full information very shortly, I hope. We have asked him to make a complete investigation. We have been in touch with the officers of the company and have received from them an authoritative denial that any such practice is going on.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What are they shipping?

Mr. Pearson: As a matter which bears on their denial and as an argument in favour of the validity of their case, it should be pointed out that ships cannot leave Hong Kong for communist China which have not been cleared by the Hong Kong authorities.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What are they carrying?

Mr. Pearson: The regulations also prevent the shipment from Hong Kong of any strategic materials on a list we have drawn up with the governments of the United States, the United Kingdom and others of the United Nations. We have also been offered copies of the manifests of the cargoes leaving Hong Kong on these ships, those that have left in the past or those that may be leaving in the future, as an evidence of their good faith in this matter. We are not accepting that as a complete investigation. We want to make an independent investigation ourselves, and we are trying to do that. But I suggest that until that investigation is completed it is not fair to accept the charges in this circular letter; and we do not yet accept them.

The hon. member for Lake Centre, who wants the facts on this matter—and he is entitled to them—said, and I assume he stated this as a fact, that this morning I said these ships were not carrying contraband and thereby contradicted some of the remarks made last evening by my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I did not say this morning that these ships were not carrying contraband. This is what I said, and I quote from the report:

> So far, although our information is not complete, we have not received any information which would justify the allegations made in the letter to which my hon. friend has referred.

And I went on:

> On the contrary, we have received specific information challenging those allegations and stating that they could not be supported by evidence.

That is as far as I am willing to go now. When we receive further authoritative information it will be submitted to the house. On the basis of that information the government will know what action should be taken and will take that action. I suggest that is a proper course to follow in this matter. We are not trying to hide anything at all from the house. The hon. member for Lake Centre referred to a struggle between my department and trade and commerce regarding this matter.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No; a struggle between external affairs and finance.

Mr. Pearson: Well, he referred to a struggle between some of the departments of the government.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is what the minister said.

Mr. Pearson: If there is any struggle between government departments in this matter it is merely that we wish to vie with each other to give the most complete, authoritative, and unbiased information. Four departments of government are involved. There is the Department of Finance, the Department of Trade and Commerce, the Department of Transport, and the Department of External Affairs, all of which have a legitimate and very real interest in this question, and from all of which information will have to be obtained to answer, in the way they should be answered, the eleven questions which have now been addressed to me on this subject. Before the completion of the discussion today I hope to have answers to most of those questions, if not all. During the lunch hour, or what should have been the lunch hour, I did manage to secure some information in regard to the questions asked by the hon. member for Nanaimo. I have not got the complete information concerning the additional questions asked this afternoon. I hope to have it soon, and when I do I shall be very glad to submit it to the committee.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This does not require any intensive mental struggle in order to get the information. At this stage I ask the minister if he can produce the regulation or order in council that must have been passed at the time these ships came under Canadian registry and after the transfer, which exempted them from the requirements of the Canada Shipping Act so long as they operated in Chinese waters. That is information which he must have available at the moment. I am not saying he has the other information now, but that would start to clear up the situation.

Mr. Pearson: Well, Mr. Chairman, that is information which should of course be given to the house by my colleague the Minister of Transport. That is one of the things we have been looking into, and in a sense it was included in the questions asked this morning by the member for Nanaimo. If the committee so desires, I shall give all the information I have been able to acquire within the fairly limited time I have had to deal with these questions which were asked before lunch.

These questions, as I took them down, were as follows: The first one was, when were the two ships on the Yangtze delivered to the Ming Sung Industrial Company? As has been brought out in the discussion, two of the Ming Sung ships have been operating on the Yangtze, and five have been operating out of Hong Kong. The two ships now on the Yangtze river were delivered to the Ming Sung Industrial Company, and were moved to that river some time ago. At that time the Chinese civil war had not reached that area. During 1949 the communist forces overran that part of China which included the Yangtze river, and the vessels have since been in the area administered by the communist authorities in Peking.

The second question—

Mr. Pearkes: May I ask whether they are still operated by the Ming Sung Company?

Mr. Pearson: As I understand it, Mr. Chairman, those ships are still operated by the Ming Sung Company, but they are not operated under Canadian laws or flying the Canadian flag, nor have they any association with Canada at all. They are operated now by the Chinese as Chinese ships.

Mr. Pearkes: It is the same comapny as bought the vessels earlier?

Mr. Pearson: I am informed that is correct, it is the same company.

Mr. Pearkes: Then this company trades not only between Hong Kong and Canton but within communist China itself?

Mr. Pearson: This company, as I understand, has ships operating on the Yangtze river which is now under communist control.

The second question was, did the Canadian government make any protest at the taking over of these ships? My answer to that would be, Mr. Chairman, that Canada had no ground upon which to make a protest because the ships were not Canadian property, nor were they of Canadian registry.

The third question was, are they still being operated by the Ming Sung Industrial Company? I have already answered that in the affirmative. The fourth question, does that company maintain agencies throughout communist China? My information is that it does. The fifth question, on what authority were these ships' officers and crews given exemption from merchant shipping regulations, was it ministerial or by order in council? This deals with a point raised by the member for Lake Centre. By "these ships" of course are meant the five ships operating out of Hong Kong which are under Canadian registry. It is meant to apply to those ships only, and not the ships on the Yangtze as they are not under Canadian registry. The answer would be in part as follows, although I would ask permission, Mr. Chairman, of the committee to add further details to this answer as I receive those details, if they add anything to this answer.

My tentative answer would be that two separate exemptions are involved in this matter, one granted by the Canadian government to exempt the ships from the requirements of the Canada Shipping Act that they must have British certificated officers and crew. I believe that exemption was given by the Minister of Transport under authority conferred on him by statute. I believe I am correct in saying that.

Mr. Green: By which?

Mr. Pearson: By statute. The second exemption was granted to these ships by means of an order of the governor of Hong Kong in council under section 19 (a) of the merchant shipping act of 1899.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the date of the Canadian exemption?

Mr. Pearson: I have not the date of the Canadian exemption, but I shall be glad to get that as soon as I can.

The sixth question was, how much money is still to be paid? The answer to that is the total amount of the principal of the loan is still to be paid, namely, $12,750,000, and interest payments of about $90,000 per quarter. The seventh question was, what payments have been made to date, and by whom? I have not been able as yet to secure that information from the Department of Finance. I give those answers at this time to show the committee I am anxious to get all the information I can, and give it to the committee as quickly as possible. I shall add to this information as soon as I am able to do so.

Mr. Pearkes: I appreciate the information which has been given by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I am sorry that my questions caused him to miss his lunch today. There is still one question which has not been answered. I do not know whether the minister is in a position to do so, but the fact has now been established that these vessels, flying the Canadian flag and under Canadian registry, are conveying passengers and cargo between the British port of Hong Kong and communist ports like Canton and others. The question as to whether there is contraband of war, arms, equipment or other materials or supplies on board cannot be solved. The report from a person whom I believe to be a reliable officer of a guild of ships' officers is contained in the letter which I quoted, and is to the effect that eyewitnesses state there are essential war materials in the cargoes. It is uncertain whether or not that is so. The advice received by the minister from the officials of the Ming Sung Company is, I presume, that they are not carrying any. I should expect them to say that. I am not surprised at that denial at all.

The Canadian government officials there have not been able to advise the minister definitely as to what supplies are being carried. If the minister has any information as to the type of cargo which is being carried to communist China by these Canadian vessels I should be pleased to receive the information.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, in his remarks a few minutes ago the minister intimated that there had been some certificate of exemption given by the Minister of Transport. I wonder if it would be possible for the minister to get further details of that certificate, not only the date upon which it was given but also under what sections of the Canada Shipping Act? There are certain powers given under the Canada Shipping Act to the minister, but there are also powers which must be exercised by the governor in council. I should like to know whether this particular power is under the one or the other category. It would appear that what was given was a blanket exemption, something which, I submit, was never the intention of the Canada Shipping Act. I am quite positive that it was never intended that any minister of transport could exempt all the officers of five ships belonging to a company, as would appear to have been done in this case.

May I also ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he can tell the committee what control the Canadian government now has over these five ships plying out of Hong Kong? They apparently are flying the Canadian flag; they also have it painted on the sides of the ships; and they are no doubt getting special treatment because of the fact that they are so doing. Yet it would appear that Canada has absolutely no control over these ships. Last night the Minister of Trade and Commerce, speaking on that point, as reported at page 4124 of Hansard, said as follows:

> While they are Canadian flag ships they are not in any way subject to the direction of the Canadian government.
> They are not owned by the Canadian government. We can withdraw the flag, and that is about all we can do. But the government has no direct interest in the situation other than that they are guarantor to a Canadian bank for part of the money that built the ships for the Ming Sung company.

If that statement by the Minister of Trade and Commerce is correct, we have the situation that here are these five ships in Chinese waters using the Canadian flag, having officers and crew completely non-Canadian, and under no control whatever by the Canadian government. Surely that is an extremely unwise position for Canada to permit to arise. We should certainly withdraw from that company the use of the Canadian flag, if the facts are as indicated by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I would ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs to let us know whether or not that will be the policy of the Canadian government if those are the facts, namely to withdraw the use of the Canadian flag from that company. If the Canadian flag is not to be withdrawn, why can this situation not be cleared up, as I suggested last night, by having the five ships seized and sold under the mortgage? Apparently there are ships' mortgages on each one of these ships. They are operating out of a British port, namely Hong Kong.

Mr. Howe: The mortgages are not in default.

Mr. Graydon: They certainly would be if they are working for the communists.

Mr. Green: That would, of course, depend on the terms of the mortgages. But I would think that if this company is breaking any of the terms of the mortgages, the ships could be seized and sold. But surely we cannot allow this situation to continue if the Canadian government has any authority over these ships.

There is a power which was given under the amendment to the Canada Shipping Act, by chapter 26 of the statutes of 1938, which enables the Canadian government to prohibit the shipment of articles of war. I understand that, under that particular provision—if they are Canadian ships—and we know that they are registered as Canadian ships—this government has not only the power but also the responsibility to step in and prohibit the carrying of articles of war on any of these ships. I would ask the minister to have this particular amendment checked. I feel confident that he will find that what I have said is correct, namely that Canada is given the power to prevent the shipment of articles of war on a Canadian vessel, even though that vessel may be in a port on the other side of the world.

Mr. Lesage: You must prove that it carries materials of war.

Mr. Green: That would not have to be proved to carry out my suggestion. The government could prohibit the carrying of articles of war on those particular ships.

Mr. Pearson: We have done that.

Mr. Green: There is no evidence that that has been done. If it has been done, let the minister tell the committee when it was done and in what way.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, as to the information that the hon. gentleman asks for in regard to the action taken by the Minister of Transport, may I say that we can of course get that. He raised the question of what control we had over these ships. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said last night, of course, that we have no physical control over those ships any more than we would have physical control over any Canadian ship operating out of non-Canadian ports. I am not, of course, a lawyer, Mr. Chairman, but we have legal control over those ships at all times. If they break our regulations the government can and will take the necessary action by seizing the ships or allowing them to be surrendered; and no financial considerations will stand in the way of that action. But I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that we have to get evidence first to the effect that they are breaking our regulations; and no such evidence has yet reached us which we have been able to verify. Under our export regulations—and my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce will be able to confirm this—it would be an offence to ship to communist China strategic materials on a list which has been agreed on. If these ships were breaking those regulations, we would be in a position to take action which would stop that sort of thing, and would indeed desire to do so.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What would be the action?

Mr. Pearson: We could seize the ships.

Mr. Green: Is it the intention to allow those ships to continue under Canadian registry, operating, in one case it is said, with a Russian master and in all cases with a Chinese crew? Is it the intention to continue to allow that? The Minister of Transport may have granted a certificate some time ago, but now that this case has come to light I suggest that any such certificate should be cancelled. If these are to be Canadian ships, they should be manned by Canadian officers and Canadian crews. Then the Canadian government will have some control over what they do. The minister has said that once a Canadian ship is in a foreign port, we have no control over it.

Mr. Pearson: No physical control.

Mr. Green: Under the terms of the Canada Shipping Act the Department of Transport has extensive control over a Canadian ship, no matter where it may be in any port in the world. The foolish part of this whole situation is in allowing five ships to operate into communist China under a Canadian flag but with a crew made up of people, of whom I think some at least can be taken as being on the other side in this present international trouble. That is a very unsound policy for Canada to adopt. It is quite evident it has only been done in an attempt to save the Canadian government from having to pay some money under a guarantee pursuant to which these ships were originally built. I do urge upon the minister to give the whole situation further consideration. It should not be allowed to drift along in its present form.

Mr. Graydon: May I say to the minister that I think it will be a very startling shock to most people in Canada to know that by some act of the government we now have this scandalous spectacle if this is true: by some relaxation of the regulations with respect to the shipping act we now have a Russian captain on a Canadian ship flying the red ensign.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And something more by reason of the fact that the United States may be patrolling those areas. I would like to ask the minister this question: What difference does it make to the security of the Canadian government for the recovery of $12 million that is owing, that it keeps this ship under Canadian registry and flies the Canadian flag? What is the advantage? A while ago he said in effect "We have no physical control over that boat when it is in the east".

Mr. Green: Five boats.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, five boats. "We have no control". What was the reason for the Ming Company asking the privilege of using the Canadian flag on that boat—because it was the Ming Company that did so, according to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He said last night:

> It seemed wise to transfer the ships to the Canadian flag, which was done at the request of the Ming Sung Company, which expressed a desire to protect their loans in Canada.

What difference to the protection of their loans in Canada, whether it was flying one flag or another? You see, the difficulty about the whole thing is that we have no information as to what they carried. I asked the minister what they carried, but we have no information as to why these ships operated in those waters. Why did these ships operate under the Canadian flag? What was the reason for that? It certainly did not give security to the Canadian government or for the bank getting the money. Surely we have not reached the position internationally where we are going to allow communists—these Chinese would be communists operating in that part—and with a Russian captain in one case, to enjoy the privilege of operating under the Canadian flag. We have come to an awful situation when we place our flag in the position of being the protector of such people. What justification is there for this kind of conduct?

I wish to see the Canadian flag flown on Canadian ships, but I certainly do not want to see it flown on a ship operated by a crew of communists, enjoying the protection of the Canadian flag and all it means.

After all, our flag means more than that. I ask the minister this specific question: What method of mental gymnastics was followed for the government to arrive at the conclusion that the request of the company to be allowed to use the Canadian flag should be finally acceded to? Will the minister answer that?

Mr. Pearson: Well, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has made some statements which no doubt he can verify by facts at his disposal, but they are not at my disposal—the fact that one of these ships was under a Russian communist captain and that the crews are communist crews.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I said that was the evidence given.

Mr. Pearson: That is the statement the hon. member made. On the basis of that he has asked a question. My information does not verify that there is a Russian communist captain in control of a ship.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is a Russian captain on one of the ships?

Mr. Pearson: I do not know.

An hon. Member: You should know.

Mr. Pearson: The hon. member has been getting a lot of information in the last hour. I hope to have even more in the next hour or two. This committee should realize, and no doubt hon. members do realize, that trade with China under present circumstances, if it was ordinary trade, is not unlawful, if that trade does not involve the carrying of strategic materials. The ships of a great many countries of the world are carrying on Chinese trade at the present time. There is no embargo upon trade with China. Whether there should be or should not be such an embargo is a question of policy. But at the present time there is no such embargo.

Therefore when the hon. member conjures up a picture, which is not a very pretty one, of action taken by the use of these ships to protect those ships from United States naval patrol, which was the expression he used, that is not a very accurate picture.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the reason for it?

Mr. Pearson: The United States naval patrol could not have any concern with ships carrying goods to China which were not on the strategic list; and we have been told that these ships were not carrying such goods.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask the minister this question: Why was it agreed to by the Canadian government that these five ships should carry the Canadian flag? What was the advantage to Canada or to anyone else to grant that permit, under the circumstances? That is a question I wish to have answered.

Mr. Pearson: Well—

Mr. Diefenbaker: And when was it done?

Mr. Pearson: The only answer I can give, and I will pass it on to my colleague the Minister of Finance, is that the action was taken at the time it was taken to protect the interests of the Canadian taxpayers in respect of this loan.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: —the minister has given the most conclusive evidence in support of the suggestion that has already been made that the government should announce without further delay that they are withdrawing the right to use the Canadian flag on these ships. The minister has said that he does not know whether there is a Russian officer or not. If the minister does not know, then that means that the government has accorded this special exemption for ships flying the Canadian flag without knowing who the officers are. If that is not the most severe condemnation of the manner in which this government has dealt with this important subject, then I find it difficult to know what more conclusive evidence could be given.

But there is an important aspect to the matter to which the minister seems to attach great importance. It has come up several times, along with the question as to whether war materials are being shipped. It is a question as to the accuracy of the statement that was read into the record. Now, in so far as that statement is concerned, apart from any expression of opinion contained in that statement, which came from Hong Kong, evidently the only things in doubt are as to whether the captain of one ship is a Russian and as to whether or not they are carrying war materials.

But I submit that those are only incidental details. What has been admitted, and admitted without reservation, is that the Ming Sung Company is trading in communist China. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has stated it has agencies throughout China. It is doing business in communist China, and for all practical purposes it is a company acceptable to the communist government. And that is the company to which, without any knowledge as to who the officers are, we have accorded the special privilege of flying the Canadian flag for the protection of their nefarious business.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And at their request.

Mr. Drew: And at their request, without sufficient evidence even to inform this house as to one justifiable cause for the most unusual exception they have made in this instance—and this at a particular time when, to the regret of all thinking Canadians, the number of ships under Canadian registry is diminishing. At a time like that we find that this government has accorded this privilege of having those ships under Canadian registry, but under officers not even known by name or nationality to the Canadian government, and according them that special privilege. The Secretary of State for External Affairs could end this debate by simply assuring the committee without further delay that the government will withdraw immediately the right to fly the Canadian flag and will take appropriate steps to recover possession of these ships which they know they can take once that flag is withdrawn because the ships will then not be able to operate in the way they are now under the protection of the flag.

There is a perfectly obvious reason why they have made the request. It is to the advantage of this company with agencies throughout communist China. The conduct of the government in this case displays a strange willingness to afford additional opportunities to communist China to obtain supplies over which we have no supervision beyond the certificate that is given at the time of departure from Hong Kong.

There is another point in regard to this. When the minister says that there is an agreed list of things which may be shipped he is well aware that there has been considerable discussion in connection with supplies that are being run from Hong Kong to communist China. There has been a certain amount of disagreement between some of the governments associated with us in this common cause as to the things which should be permitted to go to communist China. Rubber is certainly one material, and yet we know that rubber has been going to communist China along with other materials that are of assistance to a country engaged in war activities. Whether or not those things are on the list, we know from discussions that have taken place that there is great concern about the delivery of things to communist China which might assist them at the very time they are sending troops to Korea to fight troops that we along with other nations of the United Nations are sending there.

Without the necessity of waiting to find out what is actually being shipped, without the necessity of checking in every detail, I submit that the evidence before this committee demonstrates that no matter what the circumstances were that led the government to this decision, the decision was unwise and should be withdrawn. I am sure that the minister would find agreement on both sides of the house if he would announce this afternoon that without further delay that will be done. I urge him, with the facts before him, not to wait longer to give that statement, and then to take the appropriate steps to obtain the security which will be obtained by the possession of the ships themselves.

Mr. Adamson: I should like to ask the minister just two questions in this regard. During the last war the false flag device was used extensively. When the United States was still neutral and the neutrality act still in force there was a desire on the part of many United States shipping interests to help the cause of Great Britain. They re-registered a great number of their ships under the Panamanian flag. This was purely and simply a device to get around, not only international law but the United States law which had been passed specifically to prevent trading with any belligerent.

I suggest that the reason these ships are under Canadian registry is the same as that which caused United States ships to be placed under Panamanian registry during a certain period of the last war. That reason was simply to carry on trade which would be illegal flying the flag of the nationals who were running the ships. On the evidence we have heard and on the facts as admitted this trade must be carried out under the protection of the Canadian flag. To carry it out under the flag of communist China, of nationalist China or of any other country would be dangerous and undesirable in some ways. The use of a false flag is well known. Every rum-runner and contraband runner has used it from time immemorial. It is a shock that the Canadian flag should be used in this way.

The cargoes leaving Hong Kong on these ships can be screened; they may be essential foodstuffs or other materials not on the contraband list, but once a ship has cleared Hong Kong there is nothing to prevent it visiting a neutral port such as Portuguese Macao and picking up contraband material and then running along the coast, almost in the protection of the coastal waters, to a communist port. I do not say that that has happened, but that is the sort of thing that the old pirates used to do along the China coast. Coastal waters are particularly difficult to search. For many years the running of arms up and down the China coast reached tremendous proportions. During the civil war in China ships had to be specially protected to prevent seizure when avelling along the China coast by means of grille work to separate the crew from the passengers and prevent the passengers seizing the ship. It has happened over and over again. Once a ship has cleared Hong Kong under the protection of the Canadian flag there is practically nothing to prevent that ship visiting a neutral or other port along the China coast, picking up contraband arms and running them into a communist port.

These are things that we would like to know from the minister of external affairs. Surely we have agents in Macao and elsewhere who could discover these facts. The thing is extremely suspicious, to place the very kindest interpretation upon it. Were we in the position of the Chinese communists and could use the flag of our enemy for our own purposes, I am sure we would do so. It was done during the last war by using the Panamanian flag, and this seems to be a similar device used to trade with countries where normal trade is restricted or prohibited by national or international law.

Mr. Fulton: There is one thing about this matter that puzzles me very much. When the minister was referring to one of the statements made by the hon. member for Lake Centre, he said that the member had made an assumption concerning which the minister did not have evidence that in his opinion would support it, and that on the other hand he did not have evidence at the moment to refute it. It had reference to the statement made in the letter read earlier that one of these ships at least has a Russian captain. My understanding is that the Canada Shipping Act—and these ships are under Canadian registry—makes it obligatory upon the owner of a ship under Canadian registry to furnish a register showing amongst other things the name of the master of the ship. I believe that is section 22 of the Canada Shipping Act.

The minister himself may not have that, but I really cannot understand why, inasmuch as this discussion has been going on since before lunch and the minister has told us he has asked the Department of Transport for certain information, that information is not available and is not given to the house. It would be so easy not to leave it on the basis of supposition. As the minister says, he has no evidence that would establish it, but it should be so easy to produce evidence that would refute it if the statement is not correct. I would ask that steps be taken immediately to obtain that information which must be on file in the Department of Transport. Can the minister not let us have that information immediately?

Mr. Pearkes: Can the minister give me some information as to the date when the Ming Sung Industrial Company of Canada was set up? I believe it was only granted federal letters patent in March of 1950. If that is so it would appear that it was set up solely for the purpose of assisting in the repayment of the money from the Ming Sung industrialists of China, that it is merely an affiliated company established for that one purpose. So far as I know—and I think this was established by the statement made earlier this afternoon by the minister—none of the principal on the original loan of $12,750,000 obtained by the company under the Export Credits Insurance Act has been repaid, and only the interest on the principal has been paid. I hope that the minister will be able to correct me if that is not so.

I should like to know when the letters patent were issued for the Ming Sung Industrial Company of Canada, whether it is a fact that they were issued in March of 1950 at the time the Korean trouble was first beginning, and whether there is nothing paid on the principal. I should like to endorse what has been said by the hon. member for York West in this respect. I believe the triangular trade between Hong Kong, Macao and Canton was only established by the Ming Sung Company after the trouble in Korea started. That would suggest that they were able to leave Hong Kong and go to Macao. What check would there then be, other than possibly through the Portuguese authorities, as to whether there was contraband taken on these vessels and carried by them to Canton?

Mr. Pearson: As to the information asked for by my hon. friend, I have already asked the Department of Finance for all relevant information on that point. I will give it to the committee as soon as I get it from the department.

Mr. Pearkes: That will include when the company was established?

Mr. Pearson: That is right.

Mr. Fulton: What about the information as to the name of the master? Is that information not immediately available from the Department of Transport?

Mr. Pearson: The matter of the information as to the name of the master and the officers is also being looked into, and I hope very much that the Minister of Transport will be here shortly.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I should like to get into the act but not in this particular scene. If anyone has anything else to ask about the Ming Sung Company I will take my seat.

Mr. Green: I should like to ask the minister to find out at the same time where these five ships are registered and the dates upon which they were registered.

Mr. Harkness: There are two or three questions I should like to ask arising out of some of the answers the minister has given.

He said that the Canadian trade commissioner in Hong Kong had been ordered to make a full investigation. When was he ordered to make a full investigation? As to the principal sum of $12,750,000 still to be paid, has the Canadian government guaranteed the whole of that? I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce said it was guaranteed jointly by the Chiang Kai-shek government and our own government. What I should like to know is whether Canada is responsible for the whole $12,750,000 if it is not paid, and to whom we are responsible, what banks, commercial shipping companies, and so on?

Mr. Pearson: All this financial information, including the point that has been raised by the hon. member for Calgary East, will be secured very shortly. On the first question I can assure him that within twenty-four hours of the receipt of the first charges against this company a telegram had reached Hong Kong asking for a complete investigation, but before that telegram reached the trade commissioner in Hong Kong we had already received a telegram from him on his own initiative giving us certain information concerning this matter because he had already heard that this letter was coming to us from Hong Kong.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Does the minister intend to give the history of the ships since they left Canada, when delivery was taken of them, the names of the ships, when they reached Hong Kong and when they went up the Yangtze? I think we already have some information on that point. Did we receive any report from the Canadian trade commissioner in Hong Kong as to the activities of these ships very much before this letter was written on June 4?

Mr. Pearson: I will have to look into that. I have not that information, but it is information that can be secured.

Mr. Green: The Minister of Transport is now in the house. Perhaps he could deal with the questions that have been raised affecting his department.

Mr. Chevrier: I have just been told that the questions were raised, and I do not know exactly what they are. Perhaps I could get them from the Secretary of State for External Affairs and deal with them in a moment.

Mr. Drew: Would it not be best to allow this item to stand in view of the fact that the minister has certain further information to obtain? The other items could be dealt with, and then it would be possible to return to this general item at which time any discussion regarding this matter or further general discussion could then take place.

Mr. Pearson: I would be grateful for that consideration, but possibly we could go on with the general discussion except for this particular subject and return to it when I am able to give the information that has been asked for. The first item is a general item which covers almost anything under external affairs.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): If we have finished with this Ming Sung business I should like to refer to the question of the peace treaty with Japan. I agree with those who have said that it is just as well to get this treaty signed and sealed, even though the circumstances may be somewhat unsatisfactory. We have reached the stage where, if it is to be done at all, it should be done quickly. Obviously the position of Russia is the same old argument disguised in different words, and if we should accept their views we would find ourselves in the same mess we have in Europe. It is quite obvious that certain basic differences between the United Kingdom and the United States have not been removed, but a very interesting formula has been adopted under which there is an apparent compromise. I cannot recall a case in recorded history, however, in which a defeated country has been able to name the government with which it will negotiate a peace treaty. That is a precedent which offers some very interesting possibilities.

I have just a word to say on the situation in Japan itself and what may be the effect of a peace treaty. Some time ago a well known general said that what had happened to Japan was the greatest reformation recorded in modern history. I may have some regard for the military ability of that general, but I have not very much regard for his political sagacity. He has fallen into the error common to many of us. We simply cannot take our democratic customs and habits and impose them upon other peple in a matter of a few short years. We can make no greater blunder than to believe we can do that. What has happened is that in Japan today there is a veneer of democracy. I am certain the situation is better than it was under the authoritarian state of 1939, but I am quite sure that once Japan regains her sovereignty even such measure of democracy as she has now will be appreciably lessened.

The question which interests me is this. There are in Japan at this moment about six million workers organized in trade unions, with more or less the same rights which we accept as normal in this country. The indications now are that many of these rights will be taken away, and many of the democratic practices which have been thrust upon the Japanese will disappear once that treaty is signed. I should like to know whether the treaty contains any safeguard to assure that at least some of these rights will be retained by the Japanese.

Mr. Pearson: I do not think I can say very much more about the contents of the proposed Japanese peace treaty than I have said already. The final draft has not yet been submitted to us. We have had a report from London that some of the differences between the United Kingdom and the United States have been resolved. Whether or not they have been resolved in a satisfactory way I am not in a position to say at the moment. As I said this morning, we have also been informed that a composite report will be submitted, and we will be asked for our observations on that preparatory to the signing of a Japanese treaty. I appreciate the point made by my hon. friend about the inclusion in the draft of certain safeguards which would guarantee democratic rights, freedom of assembly and that sort of thing; and while I do not want to go into the details now for obvious reasons I think I can say that matter has been taken into consideration in the discussions that have taken place.

Mr. Fulton: I noticed in the press last evening a dispatch concerning the forthcoming conference of defence ministers in London. I am reading from the Ottawa Journal of last evening; and the dispatch states:

> Canada is naming her top diplomatic and military representatives in London to attend the commonwealth defence conference to be held there late this month, it was learned today. Dana Wilgress, high commissioner, and Major General S. F. Clark, head of the military mission, assisted by S. F. Rae, first secretary under Mr. Wilgress, will attend the conference as observers.

I wish to inquire first whether the report is accurate as to the persons who will attend, and second, whether there is any particular significance attached to the words "will attend the conference as observers". Does that mean, as it would appear at first sight, that Canada is not going to participate fully in the conference but is merely going to be there in the role of an observer?

Mr. Pearson: I think a statement on this matter was made in the house not long ago by the Prime Minister. The conference in question, which I believe is opening in London next week, is a conference of certain commonwealth governments who in the past have been especially interested in Middle East defence questions. This matter came up at the conference of prime ministers last January, I think. It was discussed there, and at that time it was agreed that the discussion should be continued at a special meeting of the defence ministers of the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa. At that time the Prime Minister indicated that while of course we are interested in all defence questions, since this was a regional conference devoted to problems of particular interest to those members of the commonwealth and not of special interest to Canada, we would be attending not as full members but as observers; and that is the situation at the present time. The conference opens next week. We will be represented in an observing capacity by our high commissioner and senior military and political officials from Canada House.

Mr. Graydon: When the minister is there next week does he expect to attend any meetings of this commonwealth conference?

Mr. Pearson: No, I do not expect to be attending that particular conference, though I should think I would be attending a number of meetings in London next week.

Mr. Fulton: I understood the minister to say this conference is particularly concerned with middle eastern defence problems. Canada and the United Kingdom are the only members of the commonwealth who are also members of the Atlantic pact. What about the position of Greece and Turkey?

Mr. Pearson: As far as I know that question will not be discussed at this commonwealth meeting. The proposed agenda, which is still confidential, does not indicate that any such question will be up for discussion. This is a meeting of commonwealth governments interested in commonwealth defence co-operation in the Middle East area. The question of Greek and Turkish adherence to the Atlantic pact, or association with the Atlantic pact, is of course a very important matter which is now under serious discussion. I should think that would be on the agenda for the next meeting of the North Atlantic council.

Mr. Fulton: I am not going to take immediate issue with the statement of the minister because I do not feel qualified to do so; but I will say that Canada, together with all the countries in the world, must be concerned about the defence of the Middle East, as we must be concerned with the restraint of aggression everywhere in the world. That would be my view, though as I say I do not feel qualified to engage in a debate with the minister on that subject. I will put this to him, that in view of the situation which is developing in Iran and the Middle East I hope it will be easy, should it become desirable in the view of the government to do so, to change our role from that of observer to a full participant, and I hope the minister will say no obstacle would be placed in our way should we desire to take that step.

Mr. Pearson: If conditions made the alteration of our status desirable there would be no difficulty about making the change. I do not know whether it will be either necessary or desirable, but if it should become so we will be able to change our status without any trouble.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I realize that the lunch hour does not afford much time to obtain information, but will the minister tell us whether he has anything to say on the Council of Europe?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, I was able to get that information, at least, during the lunch hour. I should have remembered this morning when the subject came up that a day or so ago a message came from the president of the Council of Europe, Mr. Paul-Henri Spaak, through our ambassador in Belgium, asking me to convey to the Speaker of the House of Commons an invitation for this parliament to be represented at the next session of the Council of Europe in Strasbourg, I think in September. I have just sent that invitation on to Mr. Speaker and suggested, though perhaps I had no particular right to do so, that he might feel inclined to take up this question with parliament as quickly as possible.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that the general discussion be concluded at this time?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, in making the suggestion I did, I also had in mind the fact that some further remarks I wish to make will be related partially to the answers that will be given. In making this suggestion, it was not my thought that we should then be limited strictly to a discussion of this subject, because other remarks I propose to make are related to it. I make that reservation at this stage in agreeing to the conclusion of the discussion.

The Chairman: With that reservation, is it agreed that the general discussion be concluded?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

86. Representation abroad—operational—including payment of salaries of high commissioners, ambassadors, ministers plenipotentiary, secretaries and staff appointed as directed by the governor general in council, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act or any of its amendments, $4,492,816.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Chairman, I have something to say on this item. On more than one occasion the members of all parties in this house have stated how pleased they were with Canadian representation abroad. I find it a rather pleasant change to state that I am not at all satisfied with one aspect of it. Any hon. members who have been in the United States realize that there is a certain lack of knowledge about Canada which exists in that country. If we are to judge from a recent survey conducted by the New York Times, I would say there is a fair amount of ignorance concerning us. I was in Washington recently speaking to some men in responsible positions who were quite poorly informed as to what Canada had been doing in participating in the United Nations action in Korea. I was quite disappointed, and indeed alarmed, at the lack of knowledge which seemed to prevail.

I can only see one way out of it. Obviously the officials in our embassy at Washington do not have the time to do the sort of job which ought to be done between the embassy and the capitol. I am wondering if it is the intention of the minister or the department to create a new position as soon as possible, let us say some sort of liaison position between the embassy and the capitol to keep Americans in official positions more fully informed as to what Canada is doing.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I do not suppose any member of the committee is more aware of that problem than I am, having served both in Washington and in Ottawa. It is a matter to which we have been giving very active consideration in the department, and in that connection we have noted with considerable interest the chapter of the royal commission report on arts, letters and sciences devoted to the better understanding of Canada abroad, and the ways and means of achieving that. I believe that is a very important objective to be achieved. I for one, Mr. Chairman, am not at all satisfied with what we have been able to accomplish. Within the limits of the resources made available to us by parliament we do the best we can, but I hope we shall be able to strengthen that kind of representation abroad, representation devoted more particularly to the increasing of information about Canada in foreign countries, especially the United States of America. At the present time we are giving consideration to ways and means of strengthening the staff of the Canadian embassy in Washington in that direction. I hope we shall be able to do something in that regard before very long.

Item agreed to.

100. World health organization, $231,200.

Mr. Wright: Can the minister give us some explanation of this item, "world health organization, $231,200"? Just what is that money spent for?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, this vote appears to indicate a very substantial increase in our contribution to the world health organization. I believe the increase is due to the fact we have been asked to make this contribution available at this date. It is in fact a matter of dates. Possibly I may read a paragraph on this point.

The budget adopted for 1951 by the third world health assembly in May of 1950 amounted to $7,300,000, to be financed by contributions from member states and from other groups, despite the fact that all the income that could reasonably be expected for 1951 would be substantially less than that which was required. The Canadian delegation pressed at this recent conference for a more realistic budget, but other delegations were anxious to maintain that figure of $7,300,000, so that was the figure that was agreed upon at the third world health assembly. Subsequently, however, the executive board decided to establish a ceiling on expenses of $6,150,000 for 1951. The Canadian representatives at all meetings of the world health organization have stressed the importance of implementing only those programs to which will attach definite returns, and have urged a greater degree of co-ordination with other specialized agencies and such economy as is consistent with efficiency. That has been our stand, and the amount requested for this year is $231,200, as our proportion of the $7,300,000.

Mr. Wright: Have we any personnel who are working on this world health organization?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, we have, Mr. Chairman. The director general of this organization is a Canadian, and is the former deputy minister of health and welfare.

Item agreed to.

105. The Canadian government's contribution to the administration of the general agreement on tariffs and trade, $14,300.

Mr. Hatfield: Can the minister advise what this item is for?

Mr. Pearson: This, Mr. Chairman, represents our contribution to the administration of the general agreement on tariffs and trade. The budget is contributed by the contracting parties to that agreement, and those contracting parties include a great many countries. For 1951 the budget was set at $319,000, of which our share is $13,436 in United States dollars, or $14,242 in Canadian dollars. This is the budget for carrying on the activities of this international organization, and we are paying our percentage.

Item agreed to.

International joint commission—

107. To provide for preliminary studies and surveys of the mid-western watershed, $10,000.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): In common with other members, Mr. Chairman, I have not yet been able to read all the evidence the minister gave before the committee. It is possible that there are some questions which I wanted to ask which have been answered in that evidence, and if so I hope I shall be forgiven for repeating them. Can the minister tell me if there have been any further arrangements under vote 107 with a view to preventing future floods in the Red river valley?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, this amount, which seems to be a small amount in connection with this work, is our contribution to the original investigation. The work has been taken over now by the Department of Resources and Development. I should not like it to be thought that this amount was the only reflection of government activity in connection with this problem. This is really a matter for resources and development, and I think when the estimates of that department are up for consideration a good deal of information can be given. As a matter of fact, a good deal of information on this subject was given before the external affairs committee, and I can make the record available to the hon. member.

Item agreed to.

109. To provide for Canada's share of the expenses in connection with the St. John river reference, $50,000.

Mr. Hatfield: Will the minister explain what this vote is for?

Mr. Pearson: This vote is to provide for Canada's share of the expenses in connection with the Saint John river reference now before the international joint commission. When a new reference is made to the international joint commission it has been the practice, in the interests of convenience, for the Department of External Affairs to provide the expenditures arising out of the first year's investigation. Then the work would be taken over by the department of government more particularly concerned. This department's estimates for the current year include this item with regard to the Saint John river reference which was transmitted to the international joint commission last fall. Under the terms of this reference the international joint commission has been requested inter alia to undertake an investigation to determine whether the waters of the Saint John river system could be more beneficially conserved and regulated. This estimate of $50,000 is based upon a preliminary review of the work known to be required and possible of accomplishment during the forthcoming fiscal year. We have kept in close touch with the government of New Brunswick in connection with this work.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): On whose initiative was this investigation started?

Mr. Pearson: I think the initiative for this investigation came from the provincial government in New Brunswick.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): As to the $40,000 for professional and special services, is that for engineering services, or does it cover other special services apart from that?

Mr. Pearson: I am informed that it is for engineering services.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I notice that there is no item in connection with the Passamaquoddy tidal survey. Has the minister anything to report on that matter?

Mr. Pearson: As I think the hon. gentleman himself knows, this Passamaquoddy reference has requested the commission to estimate the cost of a full-scale investigation which would be necessary to enable the commission in turn, should it be requested to do so at some future time, to make recommendations concerning the feasibility of the Passamaquoddy tidal power project. The international joint commission has reported that a further investigation would be necessary to make recommendations concerning the feasibility of that project, and that such an investigation—that is, the preliminary investigation into the feasibility itself—would cost about $3,900,000. It was suggested that the cost might be apportioned between the two countries in proportion to the benefits that each country would derive from the completed project. That report for this preliminary $3,900,000 investigation is now before the various departments of government for consideration, and is also being considered by the United States government. No decision has yet been reached.

Item agreed to.

International joint commission—

110. To provide for Canada's share of the expense of the Niagara Falls reference, $50,000.

Mr. Catherwood: This is also a new expenditure. Will the minister give us an explanation of this item?

Mr. Pearson: The department's estimates, as proposed for the current year, include this item with regard to the Niagara falls reference which was transmitted to the international joint commission last fall. It is anticipated that some other department will be responsible for the completion of this reference after the current year. We have put in $50,000 for the initial year, in order to provide for Canada's share of studies of remedial works to enhance the beauty of Niagara falls. It is estimated that the investigation would cost us about $50,000 this year. The nature and extent of the items of expenditure for this purpose are: surveys, $20,000; modelling experiments, $25,000; travelling expenses and contingencies, $5,000. It is contemplated that the work in question will be planned by the commission and the international Niagara Falls engineering board and allocated between Canadian and United States agencies so far as may be possible in accordance with its location in the two countries.

Item agreed to.

Terminable services—

111. Commonwealth consultative committee on South and Southeast Asia (for technical assistance), $400,000.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Can the minister give the committee some information with regard to item 111?

Mr. Pearson: As I think I have stated before, when this subject of economic assistance to southeast Asia was under consideration, a consultative committee has been set up and it is now in operation, with Australia, Canada, Ceylon, India, New Zealand, Pakistan and the United Kingdom participating in that work. This committee is concerned with the administrative and executive functions that flow out of our decision to give technical assistance to these countries—to check on the projects that they would like us to help them with, to exchange technical assistance and all that kind of thing. As to question of aid to southeast Asia beyond the purview of that committee, the Colombo plan will be up for consideration shortly when an item will appear in our supplementary estimates for that purpose.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Have we sufficient technical assistance to offer to these countries in southeast Asia or is there still a shortage of it?

Mr. Pearson: It has been an extremely difficult problem indeed to get adequate skilled technical help for these projects. As the committee will appreciate, that kind of help is in great demand in our own country at the present time. This consultative committee and the agencies of our own government which are concerned with this matter are having real difficulty in securing the right of assistance; but we are hoping that we shall be able to make some progress in this matter.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Will our technical assistance program be co-ordinated with the point four program of the United States and the program of the United Nations?

Mr. Pearson: We think that the two can be co-ordinated and that they can work together. It would be a great mistake if the point four program of the United States and the Colombo plan program overlapped or got into each other's way. That is one of the things we are most preoccupied about, namely to make sure that they work together so far as possible.

Mr. Graydon: May I ask a question with regard to the point four program? It is referred to as the Truman point four program. I have always been a little bit confused in my own mind whether this point four program is really run by the United States government or by the United Nations, or really what the arrangement is in connection with it.

Mr. Pearson: It is true that this United Nations program is sometimes referred to as the point four program and that the expression was taken from a statement of the President of the United States in a message to congress in which he dealt with this subject. It is a United States expression, if I may put it that way, which has been taken over by others. The point four program is much more than a United States enterprise. It is quite true that the United States is bearing or will bear the brunt of the financial burden in this matter. That is obvious. But it is also true the operation of the United Nations program will be controlled by the United Nations, or by a special committee of the United Nations which incidentally is under the direction of a former Canadian civil servant.

Mr. Graydon: What I was trying to find out was this. We are contributing to the Colombo plan under the commonwealth arrangements. But do we contribute anything to the point four program of the United Nations, or does the United States bear the entire financial cost of that program? That is something that has always confused me, and I wonder if the minister could clarify it—because I think it is rather important.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Pearson: Well, I can understand the hon. member's confusion in the matter, because of the confusion connected with the indiscriminate use of the expression "point four". In Washington point four is considered as the United States program. Sometimes, as I have said, it is used to refer to the United Nations technical assistance program. We have nothing to do with the United States part of the program, but we do contribute to the United Nations technical assistance program. And that, in its turn, is quite separate from the Colombo plan.

Mr. Graydon: But I am still not clear in the matter. I know it is my fault—I am not suggesting it is the minister's—but is the whole technical assistance program financed by the United States? If it is not, then do all nations in the United Nations bear a share of the cost in relation to the normal assessments of contributions now in existence?

Mr. Pearson: Well, the situation I believe is that the United States does contribute to bilateral relief programs. United States programs are arranged with countries which it is anxious to help. But that is quite apart from the United Nations technical assistance program, to which the United States also makes a very substantial contribution indeed.

Mr. Graydon: In other words, they are two distinct things?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, they are two distinct things.

Mr. Knowles: I notice that last year we voted an amount equal to the amount we are now asked to vote. This will be seen by referring to page 160 of the estimates. It is also indicated that up to January 31, 1951, only $5,581 had been spent. It is indicated on that same page that it is not expected any further amount will be spent to the end of the fiscal year. In other words, out of the total amount of $400,000 the amount spent in that fiscal year was only $5,581.

Does the minister's statement about the difficulty of getting technical assistance account partly for the expenditure? Does the department hope to be able to do more along this line in the present fiscal year?

Mr. Pearson: It is true that a very small proportion indeed of the original vote was spent. It is disappointing that it took so long to get this organization going. The reason for so little money being spent was that there was so much delay in establishing the organization, having its terms of reference agreed upon, and having projects agreed upon. But we have reason to believe that this year, now that the organization is a going concern, we will not have nearly so much difficulty in spending the $400,000.

Mr. Knowles: Is this amount of money a contribution we make to the consultative committee or does it include our own expenses? For example, we sent a delegation to Colombo early this year. Did the cost of that trip come out of this $5,581, or was it in some other vote?

Mr. Pearson: No, this vote would not cover the expenses of any Canadian delegation to a meeting of that kind, nor did it cover any expenses in regard to our previous meetings at Colombo. It is purely for technical assistance in those countries.

Mr. Wright: Is any of this money spent for the purpose of bringing students from those countries to Canada for technical training? If so, what numbers are expected to be brought here in the coming year?

Mr. Pearson: We expect that a substantial proportion of this fund will be spent for bringing students to this country and giving them technical engineering training in Canada. During the last eighteen months forty-six trainees from four countries, chiefly from India and Pakistan, were placed in Canadian industries as a result of arrangements made with the countries concerned. We also encourage the establishment of students from those countries in Canadian universities for technical assistance, and some progress has been made in that regard. We are paying the expenses of the students when they are here, as well as their transportation to Canada and back.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I think this would be the item under which a person could make a few observations concerning the Colombo plan, particularly in view of the fact that this vote covers technological and other assistance being given in southeast Asia.

A number of members from the House of Commons, along with Senator Roebuck from the other place, in the months of November and December attended a parliamentary conference in Wellington, New Zealand, and Canberra, Australia, at which there were also representatives from the United States in the persons of two United States senators, namely Senator Ferguson from Michigan and Senator Green from Rhode Island. There were also representatives at this parliamentary conference from India and other parts of Asia. I am sure all hon. members of the House of Commons who were present at the conference will agree that the one message we were asked to bring back to our respective parliaments was the need for assistance to India of the kind contemplated under this item, and also generally under the Colombo plan, before communism achieves its intention of subjugating that land of India.

I believe one of the best booklets I have seen on the subject, indeed the only one issued as yet from the commonwealth parliamentary association meeting, is in the form of a report to the United States Senate, which I now hold in my hand. This was presented by Senator Green on March 22, to that legislative body. In this booklet is set forth something of what took place at that commonwealth parliamentary conference, and the ideas expressed there, unofficial though they were, from all parts of the commonwealth.

This morning the hon. member for Peel mentioned how helpful it would be if a conference of unofficial persons, representative of the various parts of the commonwealth and the United States, could be convened. The minister offered his opinion regarding that suggestion. As a matter of fact there has been such a body in existence, although unofficially, since 1943, at which time, and for the first time, representatives of the United States congress, both from the Senate and the House of Representatives, met here in Ottawa. Since that time there have been a number of meetings.

At the conference in Australia there were representatives from the United States Senate in attendance. While there were disagreements in regard to courses which should be followed by several nations, without exception every Asiatic representative made an appeal to the representatives at the commonwealth parliamentary conference to stress the absolute need that something be done by way of assistance in southeast Asia. That was the view expressed by members of the legislative councils from Singapore, Malaya, India and Ceylon. Without exception they stressed the need of something being done immediately along that line. I should like to quote a few words from the report made to the United States Senate to which I have made reference, as follows:

> India's basic requirements for improving the standard of living there must comprise the development of irrigation schemes and rural electrification. Agricultural production must be increased; India needs more fertilizers as also agricultural machinery and building materials, and she must try to find them at a reasonable cost.

Then there is this significant statement:

> The United States has an important stake in the Middle East. If 350,000,000 Indians should come under the domination of communism, the free world will virtually be split in half. Many think that as an integral phase of our global planning we must assist India to remain outside the communist orbit —must do this before it is too late and without strings attached.

That was the view, not only of the commonwealth representatives outside India and the United States representative who were there, it was stressed over and over again by the representatives from India. All of these had at one time or another fought against Britain. As they spoke I thought of the words spoken some years ago by the Secretary of State for External Affairs—I cannot quote them exactly—when speaking of the commonwealth. He referred to those members within the commonwealth who had achieved commonwealth membership by fighting against Britain while the great majority of the member nations concerned had achieved it by fighting with Britain. Without exception, those who had fought against Britain stressed a desire to see the British commonwealth preserved and maintained, without which freedom would never be assured anywhere in the world. In the maintenance of freedom they emphasized the need of support of the plan which was evolved at Colombo whereby millions of dollars in technological materials and other commodities would be provided.

As far as the Colombo plan is concerned, I doubt whether it has been sold to our own people. When I spoke about it on one occasion in this house I received three letters condemning me for supporting a proposition to give assistance to South America. That was the understanding of three correspondents with regard to what the Colombo plan actually comprised. Those letters came from three different parts of the country and there had been no collaboration, but they were all agreed that it was dangerous for Canadians to support a proposition that would bring any degree of assistance to South America.

I bring this matter again to the attention of the minister and re-emphasize the need. I realize that the government of India took a stand against the delivery to that country of low-grade wheat, either by way of state assistance or under the Colombo plan. Even if that assistance might not materially reduce the suffering that is now being endured there, nevertheless, even at this date and before the present year's crop is harvested, something should be done if it is only in the nature of a token gift of a number of hundreds of thousands of bushels of wheat. We would thus give to these people, not only renewed hope but an appreciation of Canadian assistance. Canada has a record of activities and actions, not only as a country as a whole but also its officials in the Department of External Affairs, and is held in very high regard in Asia. The recent gift of the United States of several hundred thousand tons of wheat has had a tremendous effect on the thinking of the Indian people with regard to the United States, which is sometimes described in Asia as being an imperialist country. Canada is not in the position of being suspect, however unjustified suspicion in that regard may be in regard to the United States.

Whether or not several million bushels of wheat are available, I do feel that the delivery of a few hundred thousand bushels of wheat at this time—it is available in western Canada because the crop has been harvested and threshed this spring—would go a long way today to answer the contention of communism that the capitalist countries will do nothing to preserve Asia, and India in particular, against poverty and starvation.

Asia is in revolt against poverty. Today the Asiatic is being lured toward communism by the promise of material advancement which is held out as a means whereby he can secure support. It may be too late one, two or three years from now. The attitude of the Indian delegation was that they would give support to the United Nations, but when they were asked what contribution they would give in the way of manpower toward the setting up of an international police force to maintain peace or to give assistance in punishing aggression, the answer invariably was that that was something they were opposed to.

Their concept of the United Nations and the support they should give is one of moral assistance and high idealism. Today the government of India is endeavouring to meet the challenge of communism that has overrun southeast Asia to an extent of which we in this country have no appreciation. One weapon that will do more today than any weapon of war is the weapon of food. It is the greatest answer to communism among people whose inalienable destiny has been poverty.

I do not want to reiterate what has been said so often and so well by the hon. member for Peel. With all the force that I can bring to a discussion of this subject I appeal to the minister and to the government of Canada to do something. Do not wait until the fall. Do not ask these people to accept wheat that we would not turn into flour in our own country. Good wheat is available, not in the amount necessary to meet the situation there, but the effect of even a token delivery at this time would be far greater than the delivery of many million more bushels of wheat and other assistance six, eight or ten months from now. The booklet to which I have referred sets out the situation as the result of the thinking of these United States senators on the subject consequent upon attending this conference, and they say:

> We found simple, unrealistic, and almost childlike ignorance of the communist danger with nerve centres deadened to the meaning of communism . . . Everywhere in the Far East and in the Near East we saw evidences of shrewd, insidious communist propaganda. It was handled by natives who were won over and in Moscow educated to communism. It exploited every complaint, every hope, every fear, and every condition in each country in order to induce the people to hate America and the west, and to embrace communism.

Almost every one of the representatives at the conference to which I have made reference is a graduate of Oxford or Cambridge, men who have had every opportunity in the occidental world of education and who today are members of their respective parliaments, and their considered opinion was that nothing would better meet the onrush of communism into India than help of an economic nature. Particularly so far as the people of India are concerned, who for all time have been in one of two states, underfed or famished, the greatest answer and antidote to communism would be some assistance economically, even though only a modicum, in order to remove the threat of starvation. It is for that reason that I have said these few words on this occasion, to again enjoin the minister to secure some assistance from the government. The determination has been made to contribute $25 million this year. A part of that $25 million, if delivered in the form of foodstuffs, wheat and the like, will go further to meet the challenge that faces Asia today, as it does all parts of the world, than any other investment that I can think of.

Mr. Blackmore: I should like to associate myself with the comments of the hon. member for Lake Centre, and I should like to say a word in support of the general idea of developing the British commonwealth. Far too much attention is being given to the United Nations, the Atlantic pact, and pretty nearly any sort of international organization, compared with the interest shown in the British commonwealth. It seems to me that our generation is not being taught the tremendous value of the British commonwealth. Why that should be I do not know. I hope the minister and all members of his department are enthusiastic about the British commonwealth because enthusiasm is catching. Likewise lack of enthusiasm is also catching.

In Canada there is a tendency on the part of a good many people to think that when one speaks in favour of the British commonwealth one must be an imperialist. That attitude is utter nonsense and indicates ignorance and prejudice on the part of those who so speak. The British commonwealth is a great international organization. In 1914 the British commonwealth had more power in its little finger with which to preserve the peace of mankind than the United Nations will ever have, and it did not require contributions of money from all members in order to accomplish its end. I maintain if we can restore the British commonwealth to the relative degree of strength that it possessed in 1914 we shall by that action be doing mankind the greatest service it is possible for us to render in these terrible times in which we live.

The British commonwealth can be rebuilt. All that is necessary is that first of all we have an appreciation of what it means, and then that we work together to bring back the financial, industrial, trading and military strength which was the dread of all enemies of freedom for one hundred years up to 1914. If we could only restore the British commonwealth to where it was in 1914 how much more peacefully we could rest in our beds at night. How much more securely we could live. Without wishing to multiply words, may I urge that the minister do everything in his power to rebuild the British commonwealth, not in the sense that any portion thereof should ever lose any degree of its sovereignty. The British commonwealth never was strong because of the power of any central body to coerce members of the commonwealth. Its strength lay in the fact that members of the commonwealth contributed all their means and their blood gladly, cheerfully and happily, being inspired with the great ideal of gaining freedom and security for the world. That is the sort of thing we must have in the members of the commonwealth today. I urge the minister that he spare no effort to restore to the members of the British commonwealth their strength and courage, and faith in themselves.

I do not wish to labour overmuch this one matter that I propose to mention. I have referred to it several times. Most hon. members who were in the house in 1945 will remember the attitude I took on the subject in the fall of that year. I refer to the international monetary fund. In my opinion the international monetary fund is one of the gravest dangers in the world today. I suggest to the minister that he give the most careful study to the evil implications of that organization. I should like to draw to the minister's attention, without going into too much detail, the recommendation of the ECE report for 1950. I believe I will read the comment on this report appearing in the issue of May 29, 1951, of the Christian Science Monitor.

The Chairman: Order. I believe the hon. member is out of order on this item, which is for the commonwealth consultative committee on south and southeast Asia. The discussion should be limited to this item.

Mr. Blackmore: Then I will talk about that when we go back to the first item, because this matter is of tremendous importance. I will close by saying I was going to refer to this international monetary fund and the Bretton Woods agreement as two of the greatest dangers to the British commonwealth today. If we are going to assist south and southeast Asia, as we should be able to, we shall have to abolish all such pernicious organizations as Bretton Woods. That is all I will say now; I will have more to say when we get back to the first item.

Mr. Knowles: May I say just a word on aid to India, which was dealt with at some length by the hon. member for Lake Centre. The minister knows of our wholehearted support of the purposes for which this $400,000 is being voted. He also knows of our wholehearted support of the proposal for a supplementary estimate of $25 million for the Colombo plan. He also knows of our wholehearted support for the proposal that everything possible should be done this year to assist India in respect of her need for food. I noticed that the hon. member for Lake Centre supported the idea of feed wheat being sent to India this year as part of that $25 million. I would hope that it could be in addition to that amount, and I thought at one time I heard the minister say that was the intention. It seems to me that if possible we should avoid detracting from the purpose of that $25 million, which is to help India build up her own agricultural and productive resources. With that slight qualification of the remarks of the hon. member for Lake Centre I want to tell the minister again, though he knows it very well, how actively we support proposals of this kind.

Item agreed to.

566. To authorize and provide for working capital advances in the current and subsequent fiscal years to maintain cash and bank balances at Department of External Affairs posts abroad, subject to regulations of the treasury board, the amount of advances hereby authorized outstanding at any time not to exceed $300,000.

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister explain this item? I judge it is a new idea.

Mr. Pearson: This item was explained to the committee on another occasion, though if necessary I have before me quite a lengthy explanation. I understand this is a new item made necessary by the requirements of our financing abroad. We require a certain amount of working capital to tide us over the financial year when we have obligations to discharge which cannot be met because of new money not arriving in time. That is why we are asking $300,000 for this purpose. I would be glad to go into it in more detail if the committee so desired.

Mr. Knowles: It is in the nature of an advance or loan?

Mr. Pearson: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: Actually it is repaid out of other votes of the department at some stage of the game?

Mr. Pearson: That is correct.

Item agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall we now revert to item 84? It was agreed by the committee earlier that the discussion on general matters was concluded and that further discussion would relate only to the Ming Sung question, subject to the reservation made by the leader of the opposition.

84. Departmental administration, $2,272,597.

Mr. Blackmore: May I ask the minister to answer the questions I asked on the orders of the day? I think he was to answer them during his estimates.

Mr. Pearson: That is quite true. The hon. member did ask a question on the orders of the day, and at that time he was informed that it could be dealt with when my estimates came up. In fairness to him I think I should attempt to answer that question now. The question which would have been raised by the hon. member, I think, concerned the advisability of bringing the federal republic of Germany into closer association with the community of free nations, and making peace with free Germany. I think that is what he had in mind this morning, and I might make a short statement on that matter which is a question of some importance.

The announcement was made on October 26 last of the intention of the government to terminate the state of war with Germany as soon as we were in a position to do so in concert with our friends and allies. Since that announcement last autumn we have been in constant touch with the progress made both by the occupying powers and the German federal republic on this matter. Before we or the occupying powers could take further action it was necessary for the German federal republic to pass legislation eliminating from its laws all references to the state of war. That was done by the lower house, the Bundestag, on May 30, 1951, and by the upper house as recently as June 8. The promulgation of that German law is expected within a few days.

As soon as the new German law has been promulgated Canada, as well as other countries still technically at war with Germany, will be free to terminate that state of war; and in Canada this will take the form of a proclamation in the Canada Gazette.

I think I should recall here that the announcement of October 26, 1950, to which I have referred, makes it clear that such action will be quite different from any formal peace settlement with Germany. It will in no way affect Germany's obligations in respect of such matters as debts, claims and all that sort of thing. In order that the termination of the state of war may be related as closely as possible to similar action by the occupying powers, we are in consultation with London, Paris and Washington as to their intentions as soon as the Germans have taken their action. In any event it would appear that the necessary legislation will have been passed by the west German government before the end of June, so it is only a question of days, I should think, before Canada would be in a position to terminate the state of war with Germany.

Mr. Blackmore: Would it be logical to suppose that Canada would establish an embassy in Germany?

Mr. Pearson: Yes. Once that technical change has been made the Canadian mission in Bonn will be raised to the status of an embassy, and the head of that mission will present his credentials as Canadian ambassador to the federal republic of Germany.

Mr. Blackmore: We have had a number of departmental regulations, rulings and all that kind of thing against Germany. These were drawn up during world war II, and probably they have been retained up to the present time. Have those been removed, or will they have to be removed?

Mr. Pearson: Some have been; others could not be removed until the technical state of war was ended. Once that is done the way will be open for the removal of all those things.

Mr. Blackmore: I thank the minister for his answer. I appreciate the information.

Mr. Drew: I just want to point out that when the chairman called this item he said it was agreed that the discussion would relate to the activities of the Ming Sung Company only.

The Chairman: Subject to your reservation.

Mr. Drew: I would remind the chairman that I pointed out that I wished to discuss certain subjects which would have some relation to this.

The Chairman: I said it was subject to your reservation.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I have been given by the officers of the Department of External Affairs a list of the questions asked by certain hon. members in connection with the part taken by the Department of Transport in relation to the registration of the seven ships which were discussed on these estimates this afternoon. It is not my intention to put these questions on Hansard. I think perhaps the best way in which to deal with them is to reply to them generally as I go along. It may be that I shall not be able to give all the information that is required, but I shall certainly attempt to give all the information which is in my possession.

In the first place, I find that in March of 1950 the Ming Sung Industrial Company Limited applied for Canadian registry of seven ships. The company incorporated a Canadian subsidiary, and the subsidiary afterwards received from the Ming Sung Industrial Company a bill of sale.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the name of the Canadian subsidiary?

Mr. Chevrier: I am sorry I have not got it. It is probably the same, with the words "Canada Limited" added. It might well be the Ming Sung Industrial Company of Canada Limited. I am not able to say.

Mr. Green: Where did the registration take place?

Mr. Chevrier: I am coming to that. The Canadian subsidiary received a bill of sale for the ships, and mortgaged the ships to the Ming Sung Industrial Company, that is the parent corporation. The mortgages were assigned to certain banks. I said that application was made in March of 1950, and in May, 1950, the bill of sale to which I referred originally, was registered, and the Canadian registry was affected at the city of Montreal.

Following the application of March, 1950, and later, an application was made for exemption under section 133A of the Canada Shipping Act. That is the section which requires masters, mates and engineers to be British subjects, and to hold proper certificates. Under that section the minister is empowered and has some discretion to grant exemptions to allow ships to carry officers, mates and engineers who are other than British subjects.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What section gives him that power?

Mr. Chevrier: Section 133A of the Canada Shipping Act.

Mr. Green: What year was that passed?

Mr. Chevrier: In 1948. I was saying that the minister has some discretion. When the matter was brought to my attention, I thought the circumstances were such that I should bring them to the attention of my colleagues. I did submit to them the circumstances as they were given, and by cabinet directive dated April 17, I was authorized to grant the exemption.

Mr. Harkness: In 1950?

Mr. Chevrier: All of this is in 1950. I was authorized to grant an exemption under section 133A, which I did grant on May 12, 1950.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When was that laid before parliament?

Mr. Chevrier: If you will allow me to go on I shall answer that question. The circumstances which were given were that these ships were likely to fall into communist hands unless something was done to give them the protection of the Canadian flag. It was also stated that there were no British officers, mates or engineers available, and that the only officers, mates and engineers available were those of Chinese nationality. Similarly, in Hong Kong there is a regulation which prohibits the operation of ships by other than British subjects holding the certificates of masters, mates or engineers. I understand that in Hong Kong also an exemption was granted from the British subject provision which they have over there to the seven ships, thus allowing operation in the port of Hong Kong by Chinese nationals.

As the matter now stands—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister now answer the question? When was that laid before parliament?

Mr. Chevrier: Subsection 2 of section 133A—it is not before me—

Mr. Diefenbaker: It reads:

> The minister shall annually lay before parliament a special report stating the cases in which he has exercised his power under this section during the preceding year, and the grounds upon which he has acted in each case.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, the section reads somewhat to that effect. May I read it?

> The minister shall annually lay before parliament a special report stating the cases in which he has exercised his power under this section during the preceding year, and the grounds upon which he has acted in each case.

Of course, the time has not yet expired during which the report may be laid before parliament. If the section is read carefully, I understand that the time has not yet expired.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When would the minister say that the time would lapse?

Mr. Chevrier: He would have until the end of the year?

Mr. Diefenbaker: What year?

Mr. Chevrier: The year 1951.

Mr. Graydon: There is something strange about that. I do not know what it is.

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. member had better read the section.

Mr. Graydon: I have listened to it very carefully.

Mr. Chevrier: You may read it, and put your own interpretation upon it. Those are the circumstances as they concern the Department of Transport. I believe I have answered most of the questions which have been brought to my attention. Perhaps there is one other with which I have not dealt. Is it true that the captain is a Russian communist? There is no information in the department to that effect. As a matter of fact, the names which were given when the applications were made were all of Chinese origin. So far as I am concerned, at the time the application was made and the exemptions granted, all of the officers of the ships were of Chinese origin.

Another question is, was the exemption made under order in council? The exemption was granted not under order in council but by virtue of a cabinet directive.

The next question is, will the ships be seized and sold? I believe that has already been dealt with by my colleague the Minister of Defence Production, when he stated that there was no default under the mortgage. I take it that until there is a default under the mortgage, the powers vested in the mortgagee could not be exercised.

Mr. Adamson: Can the minister say what the gross tonnage of those ships is?

Mr. Chevrier: I can get it but I have not that information before me. I have this information, that nine ships were built by the St. Lawrence Metal and Marine Works Incorporated, and the George T. Davie and Sons Limited. Two vessels were delivered at Shanghai in November, 1948, and seven vessels were delivered in Hong Kong also in November, 1948. There is no indication here of the tonnages of the ships.

Mr. Adamson: They are comparatively new ships?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, they were all new ships at the time.

Mr. Adamson: Can the minister tell us the speed or other details?

Mr. Chevrier: I am afraid I have not got them available, but I can get the details.

Mr. Graydon: They are faster than the tabling of the order in council, anyway.

Mr. Green: Will the minister read into Hansard the cabinet directive to which he referred a few moments ago?

Mr. Chevrier: I have not the cabinet directive with me; but I think perhaps I might table it on my estimates.

Mr. Green: I think it is important that we find out, during this debate, just what was contained in that cabinet directive. It seems to be a most unusual course to be followed, both by the minister and the government. This section to which the minister referred was never intended to meet a case of this kind. Section 133A of the act reads as follows:

> The minister may, if he thinks fit, and upon such conditions, if any, as he thinks proper to impose, exempt any ship—

It does not say anything about exempting seven ships.

> —from any requirement contained in sections one hundred and thirteen, one hundred and fourteen, one hundred and thirty-two and one hundred and thirty-three, or dispense with the observance of any such requirement in the case of any ship,—

And I would point out these words:

> —if he is satisfied that that requirement has been substantially complied with in the case of that ship, or that compliance with the requirement is unnecessary in the circumstances of the case, and that the action taken or provision made as respects the subject matter of the requirement in the case of the ship is as effective as actual compliance with the requirement.

The hon. member for Lake Centre will deal with clause 2 of this section but clause 1 is meant to cover only a case where it is not necessary to comply fully with the terms of these particular sections of the Canada Shipping Act. It was never intended to be used as a blanket measure to enable the citizens of another country to get the protection of the Canadian flag. In going that far the minister has stretched the section of the Canada Shipping Act far beyond any intention that was in the mind of parliament when this section was enacted.

He has said that these seven ships needed the protection of the Canadian flag and therefore this blanket exemption was granted. I would ask him to explain to the committee what right a company operated by Chinese citizens had to come to the Canadian government and get the protection of the Canadian flag? He has also made it clear that the banks had a mortgage or mortgages on these ships. Why was it necessary for the government to step in under those conditions? The situation is much worse than we were told it was earlier in the day. Apparently it was not a case of trying to protect the liability under the guarantee which had been given by the government. Here you have, in effect, a case of protecting the banks.

What is to be the position now? Two of these ships apparently are actually in communist territory. Are they still registered as Canadian ships? We understood from the Minister of Trade and Commerce last night that they no longer were in that category. I would ask the Minister of Transport to explain whether the two ships that are up the Yangtze river are still registered as Canadian ships. I would also ask him to explain what control, if any, the Canadian government now has over these ships.

The one exemption to which he has referred had to do with the officers or with certain members of the crew. What control has the Canadian government today over these ships? Furthermore, what steps would have to be taken to withdraw flag rights from these ships? Certainly it would appear to me to be a case where the flag rights should be withdrawn without further delay. I would ask the Minister of Transport to say what steps would have to be taken to bring that situation about.

Mr. Graydon: A red ensign and a red captain do not mix well together.

Mr. Chevrier: With respect to the two ships on the Yangtze river, my information is that they were never registered under the Canadian flag.

Mr. Green: The minister said there were seven ships under Canadian registry.

Mr. Howe: What minister said that?

Mr. Green: Is that right or not?

Mr. Chevrier: What I am saying to the hon. gentleman is this. My information may not be correct, but the information that is given to me is that the two ships on the Yangtze river were not registered under the Canadian flag. My hon. friend asks what control we have over the ships or whether or not we are in a position to do anything about the ships. As to granting of the exemption, I presume that could be withdrawn. What effect it would have, I am unable to say. I doubt if it would have any effect at all. I think my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce dealt fully with that matter yesterday.

As to the section not applying, the officers of my department felt that it did apply. I was of the opinion that it applied. I had some doubt as to whether or not the discretion should be exercised under the section. I consulted my colleagues, they authorized the exemption being granted under section 133A, and I granted the exemption on the date which I mentioned a moment ago.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As one department and another joins in this discussion, the problem becomes more perplexing. Now we have the minister saying that it was not an order in council. If it had been an order in council, there is under the act a requirement that it must be tabled in parliament. Section 133A reads:

> The minister shall annually lay before parliament a special report stating the cases in which he has exercised his power under this section during the preceding year, and the grounds upon which he has acted in each case.

Certainly parliament did not find out anything about this matter by means of the minister complying with the statute. Parliament found out because the hon. member for Nanaimo discovered the situation.

Mr. Chevrier: May I interrupt the hon. member?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. member for Nanaimo did not discover the situation, with all due respect to him, any more than did any of us. He received a circular letter which all of us received, outlining the circumstances.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not know who "all of us" were, because I do not know any other member on this side of the house who got a letter like that.

Mr. Chevrier: Hundreds were sent out.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They must have gone to hundreds of members on the government side of the house. The only one that was received on this side, to my knowledge, was by the hon. member for Nanaimo. Again may I point out that this section says that the minister shall annually lay before parliament a special report stating the cases in which this extraordinary power has been exercised. The order was made on April 17, 1950. Parliament was sitting at that time. Parliament sat again in the fall. Parliament has now been sitting steadily since February.

An hon. Member: January.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, January; and still this report has not been tabled. Sir, this is another example of a report that parliament had a right to expect to receive, under the law, in which ministers have failed to carry out their responsibility under the law.

I begin to wonder, having regard to two or three recent experiences in this connection, whether parliament is in fact receiving the information which ministers of the crown under the law are required to give. There can be no excuse for this report not having been laid before parliament. The year was up on April 17. Reports have been filed by the Minister of Transport for his department since that date. I am going to ask the minister—because, after all, this is the only way we will get information—in how many other cases under section 133A the minister in the last year has exercised this discretionary power.

Mr. Chevrier: I will answer. There have been a number of occasions when discretionary power was exercised under section 133A. Reports have been made from time to time under that section, and particularly since it has been amended following the war. These were war emergency powers; and sections 133A and 488A were sections which were enacted under war emergency powers, and were re-enacted in legislation following the war. There are a number of cases under which, although perhaps not on all fours with this case, exemption was granted following the war period. Reports were tabled in the house concerning those cases.

Mr. Howe: May I intervene to read a letter I think will throw considerable light upon the matter?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was asking a question, and I wish to carry on until I get an answer. Because after all—

Mr. Howe: You don't really want the information.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You have no right to butt in. When the minister has information which will answer the question which I have asked the Minister of Transport, I will sit down. But we do not want any more of these ex parte statements because he told us this afternoon that he should not have been speaking last night.

Mr. Drew: Now he thinks he should.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am asking a simple question. Since this present session began in January have any reports been tabled regarding discretionary orders issued under 133A by the Department of Transport?

Mr. Chevrier: I would have to look it up. I am not sure whether they have or not.

Mr. Howe: If the court is closed, may I now proceed? This is a letter—

Mr. Diefenbaker: "If the court is closed"—who is there to stop us?

Mr. Howe: —written to Mr. T. R. G. Fletcher, Canadian government trade commissioner in Hong Kong by the manager of Ming Sung Industrial Company Limited.

Mr. Pearkes: Is that the Canadian branch?

Mr. Howe: It is written to the Canadian government trade commissioner, the representative at Hong Kong.

Mr. Pearkes: Was it from the Canadian branch of the company?

Mr. Howe: The Hong Kong branch of the company—"Ming Sung Industrial Company (H.K.) Limited"—Hong Kong.

Mr. Pearkes: A branch, not the head office?

Mr. Howe: That is right, it is a branch. It refers to this transaction. The letter is dated June 8, 1951. It came to my hand only a few moments ago. The letter states:

With reference to our conversation this morning regarding a letter from the China Coast Navigating and Engineer Officers Guild dated June 4, 1951, I wish to present a number of facts which may throw light upon the misleading statements made by the said letter.

Our vessels in trade: Hong Kong-Macao, passenger and cargo; Hong Kong-Macao-Canton, passenger and cargo; Hong Kong-Canton, passenger only; Hong Kong-Canton (nonscheduled service); oversea Chinese sent back to China from Malaya and Indonesia and sometimes cargo.

All cargoes shipped by our vessels are cleared by Hong Kong government in similar manner as cargoes shipped by other company's vessels. We do not enjoy special facility nor are we the only shipping company in Hong Kong-Canton trade. All our trades are legitimate.

Our officers and crew are all Chinese under the exemption from merchant shipping ordinance granted by the Hong Kong government. No Russian captain or officer, or crew on our ships.

Ships in China may be required to handle any kind of transportation, but that has nothing to do with our Canadian ships in Hong Kong.

To the contrary, regulations under the said exemption have been strictly complied with by our company.

As the main accusation made by the Guild's letter is the carriage of war materials, we beg that you would give us the honour of inspecting our manifests of cargoes carried wherever you please.

One point besides the contents of the Guild's letter is that the bulk of trade between Hong Kong and Canton is handled by the Kowloon Canton Railway, a government enterprise. We are not in a position to say that Hong Kong depends on normal trade with China, but we are definite that our Canadian ships in Hong Kong would not be able to earn their direct upkeep if normal trade is denied them.

Mr. Drew: Well—

Mr. Howe: And it is signed, "C. C. Yang, manager".

Mr. Drew: Will the minister indicate whether that letter was forwarded to him, the one which he says just came to his attention a few moments ago, as the result of inquiries he had directed to the Canadian representative of the high commissioner?

Mr. Howe: No, it came through in a letter. I have made no inquiries. This was not my problem; but it was reported to me that this letter was in our files, and I have produced it.

Mr. Drew: I would ask for the tabling of that letter and the covering letter—the original covering letter which accompanied it when it arrived in the minister's office.

Mr. Howe: I will be glad to do that.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Chairman, I do not believe we can have this item pass right now, because the opposition want more information. Some of the information may not be available immediately.

Therefore I will move that this item stand, so that later on, when the information is available, the three ministers concerned can answer—finance, transport and trade and commerce—and will be at the disposal of the committee. Therefore I move that the item stand.

Mr. Drew: Before this is dealt with I would point out there are several details which should be brought forward as soon as possible so that this can be discussed with as much knowledge of the facts as we are able to obtain.

I would point out that today we have seen an excellent example of the effectiveness of committees dealing with estimates, in so far as they relate to the subjects brought before them. That was done, and the items were dealt with here expeditiously as a result of that procedure.

We are dealing now with something that has arisen outside of anything that was before the committee. And in order that we might proceed to deal with this in as effective a manner as possible it is essential that there be placed on record, not at some later date, but when we meet tonight—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The Minister of Finance will not be here this evening. I have attended a meeting, and I am not going to start a discussion about having a committee for estimates. This is a question which is not discussed to the satisfaction, as yet, of the opposition; and we want to give them satisfaction. The minister has said that he has not all the information that was asked for. You do not want to insist upon proceeding, if we admit at this stage we have not all the information? We are doing our best to get it as soon as possible.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, may I point out it is possible for the government to produce, and to produce after the dinner recess, a copy of the minister's directive, or the cabinet's directive, which gave this special exemption to these ships.

Mr. Chevrier: May I interrupt the hon. gentleman in order to get that point clear right away. I indicated that there was no order in council, but I did discuss the matter with my colleagues and got a directive from them. Directives of the cabinet are not tabled, and it has been the policy repeatedly not to do that. I might as well clear up that question so that the hon. gentleman will not think it is possible to get a copy of the directive.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You will see right now how my motion seems to be in order.

Mr. Drew: As it is after six o'clock the motion cannot be put. Six o'clock.

Mr. Howe: It does not require a motion.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I give notice now that I will move it at nine o'clock.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS

CONCURRENCE IN TENTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. H. W. Winkler (Lisgar) moved that the tenth report of the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills, presented to the house on Thursday, June 14, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS

BRITISH COLUMBIA TELEPHONE COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. 116, respecting British Columbia Telephone Company—Mr. Applewhaite—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Rights of holders.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, this bill has several features, the main one being an increase in the authorized capital of the British Columbia Telephone Company from $25 million to $75 million. As hon. members know, it has been considered by the standing committee of the house on railways, canals and telegraph lines. Before that committee a representative of the city of Vancouver opposed the passage of the bill on two grounds. In the first place it was contended that the increase sought, namely, $50 million, was excessive. In the second place the city of Vancouver has become convinced, as the result of experience before the board of transport commissioners on a recent application for an increase in telephone rates, that there are unfair contracts between this telephone company and its affiliates under which the telephone company is charged an unfair amount for certain services, and in turn passes on that excessive charge to the telephone users.

I propose to speak very briefly this evening on these two grounds of objection raised on behalf of the great city of Vancouver before the standing committee. The main objection to an excessive increase in capital is that the larger the increase the longer the time will be before the telephone company must return again to parliament. This company is incorporated under a charter passed by the dominion parliament. In that charter there is a provision which sets out that its works are for the benefit of Canada. The result of that provision is that the provincial public utilities board has no control whatever over the telephone company. It controls other utilities such as electric light companies, but it has no control whatever over this particular telephone company. The only public bodies which have any control at all are this parliament, when an increase in capital is sought or some other change in the charter, and the board of transport commissioners, which only has authority over the rates charged by the company and over the actual issuing of shares.

The city council have felt that the company has asked for too large an increase. They fear that an increase of $50 million will enable the telephone company to stay away from parliament for fourteen or fifteen years. They have no desire to hold up development or the installation of new telephones. They heartily approve of the development plans of the telephone company and it was admitted before the committee by Mr. Hamilton, the vice-president of the company, that if the amount of the increase were reduced the effect would not be to retard development at all but only that the company would have to come back to parliament at an earlier date than if the full $50 million were granted.

In the committee I moved that the total authorized capital should be $60 million instead of the $75 million which was being asked. That amendment of course was debated and it was voted down. The bill was treated as though it were a government bill. Liberal members—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Dickey: It is not true.

An hon. Member: That is right.

Mr. Green: Some hon. members may not like it, but I repeat, and the fact is, that the bill was treated in the standing committee as if it were a government bill.

Mr. Campney: Nonsense.

Mr. Robinson: How did the opposition vote on that bill in committee?

Mr. Green: We hear the hon. member for Vancouver Centre say "Nonsense". That shows where he stands on this bill.

Mr. Dickey: It is not true.

Mr. Green: Did someone have something to say?

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, is it in order when one member makes a statement for another member to say that statement is not true? There is a very definite implication in that remark which cannot be hidden.

The Deputy Chairman: It is not unparliamentary to say a statement is untrue if there is no imputation of intentional falsehood. See Beauchesne, third edition, citations 240 and 258.

Mr. Green: Well, just before this amendment was voted on, government members came trooping in from various parts of the house. Some of them had not attended at all previously. This bill was considered at several sittings, and some hon. members had not even bothered to come and learn what it was all about; yet for the vote on the amendment they trooped in and voted against it.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member has a good deal of latitude when speaking on section 1, but I do not think a discussion of incidents that happened in the committee that considered this bill has any relevancy to section 1 and what may be discussed there.

Mr. Green: The bill has been reported back by the committee, and I submit I am in order in discussing what took place during the discussion of this bill by the committee.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member is quite right, as long as his remarks are relevant to the bill. I do not think the attitude of members of the committee, or the way they voted, or the way they attended committee meetings, has anything to do with the merits of the bill.

Mr. Green: Well, Mr. Chairman, I had finished that part of my remarks. I would only add that I was amazed at the attitude taken by the government members from greater Vancouver in view of the fact that the city council took such a strong stand against this bill on the ground that the increase was excessive.

The other ground of objection was the unfair nature of the contracts between the British Columbia Telephone Company and its affiliates. I can best illustrate that objection by pointing out that the British Columbia Telephone Company is owned by a Montreal company known as Anglo-Canadian Telephone Company, which in turn is owned by the Gary group. One of their companies is the Associated Telephone and Telegraph Company of Kansas City, but in any event the real control of the British Columbia Telephone Company is in the Gary group, the parent company being a Missouri corporation. The Anglo-Canadian Telephone Company in Montreal is purely an investment corporation. It has no staff to do any telephone work, but there is what is known as a licensing contract between that company and the British Columbia Telephone Company which provides that the British Columbia company must pay one per cent of its gross revenue to Anglo-Canadian in return for technical and financial advice. In 1948 the amount paid came to $181,051. At that time the rate was 1½ per cent; it was dropped to 1 per cent just before the hearing of the rate application in 1950. Last year, when the British Columbia company had a gross operating revenue of over $16 million it had to pay Anglo-Canadian under this licensing contract more than $160,000 calculated at the rate of 1 per cent.

It is admitted that Anglo-Canadian has no facilities to supply any of these services, but it is argued that the Gary company could supply them. As a matter of fact the British Columbia Telephone Company has always been run efficiently and is perfectly able to supply all these services itself. The Gary company had no contract with the British Columbia Telephone Company, and from Anglo-Canadian in 1948 received only $3,150 for the same services, whereas British Columbia Telephone Company had to pay Anglo-Canadian over $181,000. Incidentally there are other, smaller telephone companies in British Columbia which are brothers of the British Columbia Telephone Company, being also owned by Anglo-Canadian, which were just as much entitled to these services as the main company.

The effect of a contract like that, of course, was that the telephone users of this company had to pay rates which would cover that $181,000 to Anglo-Canadian, whereas Anglo-Canadian paid only $3,150 to the parent company. That was a clear case of milking the telephone company, but in its decision on the rate application in 1950 the board of transport commissioners held they had no power whatever to consider the contract between Anglo-Canadian and the Gary group. I have here the finding of the deputy chief commissioner, Mr. Sylvestre, who had this to say on this point:

It is suggested that the payment of money by the company to Anglo-Canadian Telephone Company far exceeds the amount paid in turn by that company to the affiliates who actually provide the service. This, in my opinion, goes far beyond the board's jurisdiction.

So the board held that they could not go into this question of the contract between the affiliates. The city of Vancouver is determined that further power shall be given the board so they may investigate such contracts and thereby do justice to the telephone users.

The committee did make a recommendation on that point in its report which was tabled yesterday. It said:

Consequent upon consideration of Bill No. 116 (Letter E of the Senate) intituled "An act respecting British Columbia Telephone Company" it is recommended that your committee be empowered to make a special report on the question of extending the jurisdiction of the board of transport commissioners to enable them—

Mr. Robinson: I rise to a point of order. We are discussing section 1 of this bill, and I feel that the remarks of the hon. member are entirely irrelevant to the subject under discussion. I realize, sir, that you have quite a responsibility. Your kindness when we transgress the rules is well known, but at the moment I feel that in a discussion of this kind the rules should be strictly observed. I do not think this type of discussion is relevant to section 1 of this bill, and I must ask you to rule it out of order.

Mr. Green: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, may I say that this is a report of the committee on the British Columbia Telephone Company bill. It reads:

Consequent upon consideration of Bill No. 116 (Letter E of the Senate), intituled: "An act respecting British Columbia Telephone Company" . . .

Now, that report was submitted with the report on the bill, and I submit I am in order in discussing this recommendation which was made by the committee. If the hon. member will have patience, I am sure his pipe line bill will be reached a little later. The less he interrupts, the sooner it is apt to be reached.

The Deputy Chairman: The governing rule in committee of the whole is standing order 58, section 2, which states that speeches must be strictly relevant to the item under consideration. In considering section 1 of a bill in committee, the practice has been to allow a discussion of a general character. In relating his remarks to this bill following this general practice, the member for Vancouver-Quadra is discussing some of the incidents which occurred in the study of the bill in the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. He was about to quote from the report of the standing committee which was tabled yesterday when the member for Simcoe East rose to a point of order. The committee report was tabled yesterday, and the hon. member may therefore quote from it.

As he had not yet quoted any of the recommendations contained therein, I cannot tell whether they are related to section 1 which is under consideration. Let us hear the quotation, and if it does relate to a discussion of this bill then the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra is quite in order in quoting from that report.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, this whole question ran throughout the discussion of the British Columbia Telephone bill in the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. As a result of the discussion, we have this recommendation.

Mr. Robinson: Read the report.

Mr. Green: The report reads:

Consequent upon consideration of Bill No. 116 (Letter E of the Senate), intituled: "An act respecting British Columbia Telephone Company," it is recommended that your committee be empowered to make a special report on the question of extending the jurisdiction of the board of transport commissioners to enable them, in approving or revising tolls and charges of a company under its jurisdiction, to investigate fully and take into account transactions relating to companies having an intercorporate relationship with such company, and to make recommendations in respect thereof.

In view of the fact that the whole question of rates and the jurisdiction of the board of transport commissioners is to be considered during the autumn session of this house, I hope that attention will be paid to this particular recommendation.

Mr. Robinson: Having heard the report, I still submit it is out of order.

Mr. Green: I do hope that consideration will be given to this recommendation, and that the government will see fit to give the committee power to bring in a recommendation along the lines requested in the committee report.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words on section 1.

Mr. Dickey: Forty minutes.

Mr. MacInnis: It is a great satisfaction to me that we have so generous a person in charge of the rules of the committee. I hope you will exercise the same generosity when other speakers are on their feet.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member will address himself to the Chair.

Mr. MacInnis: I intend to do that. As a matter of fact, I did address myself to the Chair, but there is a member across the way who insists on addressing himself to me. As you did not take steps to stop him, I had to do so.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member will realize that sometimes interjections are made in certain corners of the chamber which are not heard by the Chair. I noticed that the member for Vancouver East was looking across the way, and instead of the third person I heard him express himself in the second person. He referred to "you" instead of "he", and was apparently addressing himself to a member across the aisle. In any event I took it that he was not addressing himself to the Chair. If I had heard the interjection by another hon. member, I would certainly have reminded him that he cannot interrupt the member who has the floor without his consent.

Mr. MacInnis: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I shall try not to transgress again, even if the senior member for Halifax does interject.

The main factors in connection with this bill can be put before the committee clearly and briefly. The reason for members representing Vancouver constituencies opposing the granting of the full amount of capital requested by the British Columbia Telephone Company in this bill can also be put clearly and briefly. The company asked for an increase in capital from $25 million to $75 million. When we take into consideration that up to as late as 1947 the capital of the company was $11 million, I do not believe we were being unreasonable in suggesting that they should not be granted the full amount they asked for.

I remember that this company came before parliament in 1941 for an increase of $10 million in capital. At that time the situation was somewhat similar to the situation today. We were then engaged in a war and there were shortages. We are now preparing for what perhaps may be a war, or to prevent a war, and there are shortages. In 1941 the company asked for $10 million and ultimately got $1 million. On the basis of the amendment proposed by the member for Vancouver-Quadra in the standing committee, I think we were being very generous. The company operates on a federal charter which is based on the fact that the telephone company is a work for the general advantage of Canada. There is only one occasion when the people of British Columbia, through their public representatives, can have any influence at all on the activities of this company. That one occasion is when the company comes to this parliament for an increase in its capital. The operations of the company do not come under the public utilities commission in British Columbia nor indeed under the supervision of any authority. I drew that fact to the attention of the committee by quoting from a letter that was written to me by the acting secretary of the board of transport commissioners. I should like at this time to read the relevant paragraphs in that letter. I had referred to them a complaint that came to me from a municipality in British Columbia alleging discrimination in the allocation of residential telephones; and the reply I received was in part as follows:

> I would point out, for your information, that the board has never considered that its powers with respect to telephone companies extend to the matter of furnishing or dealing with telephone service. Such powers as the board possesses are limited to matters affecting the tolls charged for the service.
> Under the circumstances the board is unable to be of any assistance.
> Yours truly,
> C. W. Rump
> Acting Secretary

The city of Vancouver, a municipality representing the largest aggregation in British Columbia of telephone users of the British Columbia Telephone Company, realize the point I have made, namely that once the company was given the capital it was asking for, it need not concern itself with any authority whatsoever inside of British Columbia until the next time it had to come to this parliament ten years from now, or whatever number of years it might be.

The city, therefore, through its corporation counsel, wrote to each member of parliament representing a Vancouver constituency and drew attention to the fact that the city was concerned in the matter and that a representative would be sent to Ottawa to appear before the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines when the bill had been referred to it. In committee the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, as he has stated, moved that the capital, instead of being increased to $75 million, be increased to $60 million. The sponsor of the bill, the hon. member for Skeena, in opposing this amendment stated that when there was a difference of opinion as between the city of Vancouver, or for that matter, as between the British Columbia Telephone Company and any organized authority or any individual, as to the amount of capital required, he would always take the word of the British Columbia Telephone Company. That may be quite satisfactory to the hon. member for Skeena, if he wishes to look with such great favour on a corporation which is in business solely for the purpose of making profits for its shareholders. When that profit must be taken out of those who use its services in British Columbia, I think the British Columbia Telephone Company is well able to look after itself and does not need the protection of elected representatives; but those who are using its services do.

Let me now state the position of those who opposed the granting of the full amount of the increase in capital sought. In the committee an attempt was made to try to show that we would be holding up a measure affecting the ability of the company to extend its services by refusing anything less than what it asked for. I think the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and I are responsible residents of the city of Vancouver. We have lived there for a long time. I have represented the city, in one capacity or another, for more than a quarter of a century; and I certainly would not do anything that would hamper its progress or interfere with the welfare of the province I represent or of the city from which I come; and I would say the same thing for the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. We are sent here by our constituencies to represent and to protect the residents of our city from exploitation by corporations; and that is what we have attempted to do.

I am not going to go over the ground covered by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra when he drew attention to what happened when the vote was taken in the committee. In the early committee sittings we had to wait for a considerable time before we could get a quorum. But on the last day, when the vote was about to be taken, the committee room was filled with members of the committee eager and ready to finish its work according to the wish of the company. That kind of thing has happened before in this house, Mr. Chairman. I think it happened last year in connection with the pipe lines bills and it was drawn to the attention—

[Mr. MacInnis.]

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I think the hon. member knows that what he is saying is not relevant to the clause before us when he speaks of the conduct of members in the standing committee.

Mr. MacInnis: I think it is relevant to the proper conduct of the country's business in this house.

The Deputy Chairman: Yes; but that does not necessarily mean that it should be discussed under clause 1. If the hon. member wished to take exception to the conduct of some members of the standing committee, he could have done so when the motion was made for concurrence in the report of the committee, if such was the case, or on some other occasion.

Mr. MacInnis: I will accept your ruling, Mr. Chairman; although I heard what happened during the last session discussed in the house. I did not make the strictures on the committee of that time; they were made in this chamber, though. I say that it is nothing short of scandalous that people who did not hear a word of the evidence should come into a committee and vote and determine what is to be done about a matter of which they know nothing. If that is the kind of protection the people of this country are going to have from their elected representatives, they are better off without it.

Mr. Thomas: I find myself in a happy position on this bill, Mr. Chairman. None of my colleagues nor I are affected in any way by this bill. The only information that we have is that obtained from the evidence given in committee and from what was said on the motion for second reading of the bill. We have no personal quarrel with this company. We can therefore speak generally on this bill, with no prejudice. There is, however, a definite principle involved. The B.C. Telephone Company is a private company—

Mr. Byrne: How do you like the provincial company?

Mr. Thomas: —and as such, has our wholehearted support. The position of this group has been made clear on many occasions. We heartily agree with the principle of private ownership and private enterprise. This company does have a monopoly on this particular business in British Columbia; but that in itself is not sufficient. It does mean that it has responsibility far greater than any company operating under active competition. They have no reasonable competition to govern their actions whatsoever.

As a result their responsibility is much greater. Also the activities of this company affect the welfare of tens of thousands of people in this country, and it is quite apparent it should be responsible to something.

Mr. Byrne: What about the board of transport commissioners?

Mr. Thomas: I will deal with that in a moment. It is quite apparent from the evidence given in the committee that the board of transport commissioners does not have sufficient authority to deal with this type of circumstance. It is also quite clear that parliament is the only body in Canada that has any control whatsoever over the British Columbia Telephone Company.

My colleagues in the committee and I opposed the bill, and supported the amendment which would cut down the capital asked for, not because we had any quarrel whatsoever with the company but because we did feel that, because the parliament of Canada was the only place in which there was any control over the activities of the company, it should be brought before parliament sooner than was indicated under the terms of the bill.

If that capital were cut down the company would have to come back within a reasonable length of time. We could look into its operations and see what it was doing. It operates as a utility, and as such it has a definite responsibility to the people generally as well as to the stockholders. If there were no deterrent whatsoever no one can say to what lengths they might go to make greater profits. As I said before, apparently the only body in Canada that has any control whatsoever over the company is parliament. The accounts of the company should be brought before this body at frequent intervals so that we may have some check upon its operations.

Mr. Hodgson: Mr. Chairman, an amendment was moved in committee, that the capital be reduced from $75 million, but the amendment was refused. This company, with a capital of $11 million, came before parliament about four years ago and obtained an increase to $25 million. Now they are back with the request that it be raised to $75 million. I am of the opinion that a seven-fold increase, from $11 million to $75 million, in a period of four years, is something more than a drop in the bucket. I am an easterner but, while I do not belong to British Columbia, I am interested in that province. Indeed I am just as interested in the welfare of British Columbia as in that of any other part of Canada because we realize that if we are to have a united country we must think of each other, and co-operate.

I was sorry in committee to see Liberal members rush in and vote in a solid bloc, just as though it were a government bill, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has said.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. As I have already indicated, we should not discuss the action of hon. members on that committee.

Mr. Hodgson: I abide by your ruling, Mr. Chairman. But the same thing happens here regularly; we do not have to go to a committee to see it. I would like to see this come to a vote, just to see how the hon. members from British Columbia will vote. Therefore I shall not take up more time.

The Deputy Chairman: I should point out that clause 1 has been amended. The amendment, at the sixteenth line, is in these words:

but no change in the rights or privileges of any class of preference or preferred shares shall be made unless the holders of seventy-five per cent in par value of the shares of such class issued and outstanding agree to same.

That was the amendment adopted by the standing committee. Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Fulton: For my own information may I ask whether it is necessary that that amendment be moved in committee of the whole or if it stands as part of the bill as reported from the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines?

The Deputy Chairman: I must ask the committee of the whole if section 1 as amended carries.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Applewhaite moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Green: On division.

Motion agreed to on division, bill read the third time and passed.

BAPTIST UNION OF WESTERN CANADA

The house in committee on Bill No. 336, to incorporate the Baptist Union of Western Canada—Mr. Diefenbaker—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Sections 1 to 18 inclusive agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Hon. members will recall that this bill was considered carefully in the committee on miscellaneous private bills and was reported to the house.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

UKRAINIAN CATHOLIC EPISCOPAL CORPORATION OF SASKATCHEWAN

The house in committee on Bill No. 337, to incorporate the Ukrainian Catholic Episcopal Corporation of Saskatchewan—Mr. Knight—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

The Deputy Chairman: This bill was considered carefully in the miscellaneous private bills committee and has been reported without amendment.

Mr. Herridge: Will the hon. member explain the purpose of the bill?

The Deputy Chairman: It has been the practice for the sponsor to explain on the first reading. This bill has had second reading and the principle was accepted. It was then considered carefully by the committee on miscellaneous private bills and we are now in committee of the whole on the bill.

Mr. Robinson: I should like to ask the sponsor if he knows any of the incorporators mentioned in section 1?

Mr. Knight: I have been in touch by correspondence with the Most Reverend Andrew Roborecki who was installed as the titular and spiritual head of the Ukrainian Catholics in Saskatchewan at a ceremony on May 3 of this year. I have not met the reverend gentleman personally, but I have been in correspondence with him.

Mr. Robinson: I notice there is only one incorporator named in section 1 and I was wondering if there will be others associated with the Most Reverend Andrew Roborecki?

Mr. Knight: There is only the one incorporator at the moment, but this bill gives him authority to appoint associates who may work with him in looking after the temporal affairs of his diocese.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Head office.

Mr. Robinson: I notice this section reads:

> The head office of the corporation shall be at the city of Saskatoon, in the province of Saskatchewan, or at such other place as may be appointed by the corporation.

Do I understand by that that the corporation could set up its head office in Ontario or some other province of Canada?

Mr. Knight: The answer to that question is "No." Two bills similar to this one have passed this house incorporating this particular organization, in one case in western Canada which would take in the districts west of Saskatoon, and in the other case in eastern Canada. Ontario would be within the eastern Canada bill.

Mr. Robinson: That being the case, would my hon. friend be agreeable to an amendment providing that the head office of the corporation would be permanently situated in Saskatchewan and eliminating the last words of the section which reads:

> —or at such other place as may be appointed by the corporation.

Mr. Knight: I see no reason why I should support such an amendment which would be contrary to the petition presented by the titular head of this organization. These people were formerly known as Ruthenian Greek Catholics, and there are 70,000 of them in the province, and I see no reason why Saskatoon would not be a good place for their headquarters. That is the desire of these people and I see no reason why I should support an amendment to the contrary.

Mr. Dickey: As I understood it, the suggestion was not that the location be anywhere but as indicated in the bill. Would the hon. member have any objection to limiting the location of the headquarters to western Canada? When the hon. member was answering a previous question I understood him to say that another bill had been enacted incorporating this organization in eastern Canada.

Mr. Knight: If my hon. friend will read section 2 of the bill he will have an answer to his question. That reads:

> The head office of the corporation shall be at the city of Saskatoon, in the province of Saskatchewan, or at such other place as may be appointed by the corporation.

I would not be prepared to support any contrary amendment.

The Deputy Chairman: It being nine o'clock, shall I report progress and ask leave to sit again?

Progress reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): It being nine o'clock the house will resume the business which was interrupted at six o'clock.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

A—Department and missions abroad—

84. Departmental administration, $2,272,597.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): When Mr. Chairman called it six o'clock I noticed that there was disagreement between certain hon. members as to the procedure to be followed in discussing this item of external affairs. During the dinner recess I did look up the authorities to see if I had been a little hasty in the motion that I proposed to move. I am always open to conviction, and I must say that perhaps I was not quite in order. I admit that very candidly. If I understand correctly the discussion that took place concerning this Ming Sung Company, what the opposition is trying to find out is if these bottoms are carrying military equipment or supplies.

Mr. Graydon: Or Russian captains.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Or Russian captains.

Mr. Graydon: And communist crews.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Or any other suggestion the hon. member may make.

Mr. Graydon: We want to smoke out the communists.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The Secretary of State for External Affairs has said that he has not full information on the questions that were put to him.

Mr. Hodgson: He should have.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That is your opinion. At all events, he has not the information at the present time. If we could let this item stand he, his officials and the other ministers interested in this question would get the information, which I do not think they can secure this evening. We could let the item stand and revert to some other item with the undertaking that the Minister of Finance, who has some responsibility in this matter, could handle the item later when we get the information. I thought I could stand up and move that the item stand.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But you cannot.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I know I am not as learned as my learned friend.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, and I realize that!

Mr. Gibson: He does not pretend to be.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I do not pretend to be, but I never laugh at people who admit that they do not know something.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not laughing.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The only motion allowed under citation 480—and you have no doubt read it during the dinner recess—when a resolution is under consideration in committee of supply, is that the amount be reduced or that the chairman leave the chair either without making a report or to report progress on certain resolutions. After stating that we have not the information ready this evening, if the government wanted to insist that we do not continue this debate I could certainly move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again this day. That would be in order. However, I do not think when we are on the home stretch, and being such good friends with the leader of the opposition, that I should deny the opposition the right to make speeches if that is what they wish, because you cannot get an answer. We have told you we have not got the information. I will not move that motion because we will make no progress, and because, having a certain responsibility leading the house, I think it would be a loss of time. I think we should all agree to let the item stand and take up another department. I suggest that is the proper way to deal with it.

Mr. Drew: If it were the fact that the essential information was not available I would be the first to concur in the suggestion. In fact I indicated earlier that I thought that if the information was not available the item might at that time stand until it could be obtained. I would point out to the minister, however, that as a result of the further discussion which took place it is now clear that most of the essential information is available. There is one subject on which the government possibly has not yet been able to satisfy itself, and that is as to the present personnel manning the ships. It may be that they have not been able to find out whether in fact a Russian captain is in charge of one of the ships. It is obvious from the letter that was read into the record just before the dinner recess that an inquiry had been directed to that subject and that a reply had been received.

While that is important, and while it would be extremely useful to know if in fact these ships, manned by other than Canadian seamen, are under the direction of Russian captains or officers, nevertheless I suggest that the information that could readily be placed before the house would make it possible for us to settle some of the principles which are now involved in this discussion. It seems to me that the only two things concerning which the government suggests it still requires information are as to the identity of the crews and whether or not the ships are carrying materials of war. There are, however, other things that could be placed before the house which would explain this transaction. There certainly must be files readily available dealing with this particular subject. The matter was placed before the cabinet, as has been explained by the Minister of Transport.

The very fact that it was placed before the cabinet brought to the attention of the Secretary of State for External Affairs the international aspect of this problem. The financial aspects are secondary to the very important principles involved in a change of registry of this kind and the transfer to Canadian registry, with the use of the Canadian flag, of ships operating in association with a company whose main business is now in communist China. It has been explained to us that this was not done by order in council but was done after consultation with the government by government directive. That directive can be placed before the committee. I hope it will not be suggested that, with this discussion having taken place yesterday and today, the government is not in a position to place that directive before the committee. It would indicate exactly what the instructions were.

It also should be possible to obtain information as to the terms of the directive and as to the circumstances under which it was made. The application which prompted a decision of that kind will be on file and would explain the grounds upon which the government made this very unusual decision. Then we also should be informed now as to how it was that the government agreed to the transfer to Canadian registry of ships which had originally been delivered to a company operating mainly in communist China, and why the government concurred in the setting up of a Canadian subsidiary of that Chinese company with head office in Montreal at a time when this company, with branches throughout China, was operating within the communist area.

I should think that would be clearly disclosed by the material which must have been on file at the time this matter was considered and the decision reached by the government. The files would also disclose, and it would be possible for the government to produce, the communications which informed this Canadian subsidiary of the Chinese company as to what the conditions and terms were under which they would operate these ships with Canadian flags and under Canadian registry.

Then we come to a later stage. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has already disclosed that this subject has been under consideration for a sufficient length of time to receive a communication from the Canadian representatives in Hong Kong. The letter he read into the record indicated that an inquiry had been directed to the Hong Kong representative of the Ming Sung Company and a reply had been received from that company denying that a Russian officer was in charge of one of the ships, and making certain statements as to the nature of the freight carried. The very fact that the government directed such an inquiry and that it has already received a reply indicates that there must be some other material that can be disclosed to the house which prompted the inquiry. Doubtless there is other information. The Minister of Trade and Commerce undertook to table the letter from which he read and the covering letter from the Canadian office in Hong Kong, and I trust that those documents have been tabled already for the information of this house.

This would give us a fairly complete picture. It would make it possible for us to see exactly what has happened in this case. It is not possible for us to understand what took place unless that information is fully disclosed. Before dinner the Minister of Transport made a comment to the effect that there was an established practice that government directives of this nature are not produced. I would hope that upon further consideration neither the Minister of Transport nor the Secretary of State for External Affairs would take such a position, because this transaction is of such a nature that the members of this house should have full information. There can be no question of security involved, or anything of that kind, which would present any reason why this house should not be fully informed as to the directive which interpreted this very remarkable decision, which resulted in the transfer of these ships to Canadian registry.

I have outlined these things that could be given the house. This must be information which is readily available now. If the minister who is leading the house, and who has stated the position of the government, will examine the suggestions I have made he will not find one that could not be complied with. Then we would be in a position to discuss this subject which is definitely related in a very important way to the policies of the government in relation to communist China and other communist countries at this time. It is known that the Secretary of State for External Affairs intends to leave Canada within the next few days. This matter involves a very important question of policy. The information I have mentioned can be produced and this whole question of policy can be considered while the minister is still here.

Of course there is one way in which this debate could be disposed of; that would be for the Secretary of State for External Affairs to adopt the suggestion which was made in all earnestness, that the government announce now that it will cancel this transfer and bring these ships back fully under Canadian control. I repeat that suggestion and urge upon the Minister of Public Works its adoption as a means not only of facilitating the business of the house but of settling something which otherwise is going to cause the people of Canada very great concern.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I do not want to cut off this interesting debate. The suggestion of the leader of the opposition is that the Secretary of State for External Affairs give assurance that we will take Canadian registry away from those ships. The answer given today by the minister was that he would not give that undertaking before he had completed the inquiry which is being made into this matter. He said that when all the facts were known the government would announce its policy. Then he went on to say that the inquiry was going on, and he did not have the full information. So I do not think it would be fair to ask the minister to give that undertaking, without even consulting his colleagues in the government. If hon. members wish to continue this debate I shall not intervene again after I sit down. The Secretary of State for External Affairs gave all the information in his possession, and said he was trying to get the information to answer the other questions asked. He has not received that information, and he says he will need time to get it. If hon. members wish to continue to speak on this subject I will not object, because I do not want to be told I am trying to railroad the house into something, as has been said before. On the other hand, the Minister of Finance did not know this matter would develop during this discussion, and he is not in the house. He is one of those interested in the matter. I am ready to listen to what hon. members have to say—

Mr. Drew: Before this discussion leaves the very amiable atmosphere in which it has been conducted so far—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It will continue in that way.

Mr. Drew: —I would point out to the minister who is leading the house that the information to which I have referred must be available.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): You must take the minister's word.

Mr. Drew: I am satisfied that the filing system is sufficiently efficient that within five minutes it would be possible for the Secretary of State for External Affairs to obtain from the appropriate department not only the government directive in regard to the transfer but also the information that was before the government at the time it made its decision. I am sure the minister would not question that. It is also certain that the government can produce from its records—and after all it is the government speaking, not an individual minister—the file containing all the information in regard to the inquiries which were directed to the Canadian office in Hong Kong, as a result of which the officials of that office got in touch with the Ming Sung Company in regard to certain details. Obviously these questions were related to information which had been placed before the government. That information is on file and can be produced in this house tonight, not a few hours from now, or a few days from now. It can be produced within less than five minutes if instructions are given the appropriate department to produce those files. That is what I am suggesting should be produced now for the information of this house.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The leader of the opposition has followed this debate quite closely, and he knows this incident began with the receipt of a letter by the hon. member for Nanaimo. The Secretary of State for External Affairs mentioned that he or someone in the government had also received a copy of that letter; and on that letter I understand external affairs is calling for an inquiry into the facts, but it has not received the information yet. As I understand it, that was the beginning. The hon. gentleman says it must have been based on something. If I correctly understand what the Secretary of State for External Affairs said, it was based on the information contained in the letter from the president of the guild to the hon. member for Nanaimo. That was the genesis of the whole matter. We admit we have not had time since receiving that letter to complete the inquiry and have all the information requested by the opposition. Believe it or not, that is the position this evening.

Mr. Drew: Does the Minister of Public Works suggest that the letter which was read into the record this afternoon by the Minister of Trade and Commerce was received as a result of inquiries which were only related to the copy of this letter to which he now refers? This is June 15, and I think it would appear fairly obvious that if an inquiry of this nature has already been conducted, a reply has been received from Hong Kong. If the people in charge had made inquiries from the Ming Sung Company, there must have been some other information before the government. Whether there was other information or this information, at least it is apparent the government made some inquiry, and has received not only the letter from the Ming Sung Company to the Canadian office in Hong Kong but it has also received the letter—which I would remind the Minister of Public Works the Minister of Trade and Commerce has undertaken to table and I hope has tabled—which was sent and which forwarded the other letter that has been read.

Now these letters are available, and they will give us some information. When the minister speaks of where this started, we are talking about the change of registry and that started by some request to the government of Canada from the Ming Sung Company, a Chinese company operating at that time mainly within the communist area of China. It was a request that ships which were then under Chinese registry be transferred to Canadian registry, and that special exemption be provided so that the ordinary regulations would not apply and those ships could be manned by crews other than Canadian crews. We want to know about that. We want to know what information the government has had in the intervening period, and what direction the government gave as to how that operation had to be carried on; what information the government has already obtained—and it has obtained some information from Hong Kong as a result of its inquiries because the Minister of Trade and Commerce has produced a letter which was written from the company, not to the government here but to our officers in Hong Kong. We can proceed with that information before us and perhaps clear the matter to some extent, even if we are not able to decide whether the captains are Chinese or Russians or what the actual trade is that is being carried on by those ships.

Before I sit down I would suggest that there is one reason why this should be discussed now with the information we have. It should not be necessary to repeat that nothing should be allowed to continue which may be inconsistent with the efforts we are making along with the other free nations in Korea. There is one rather unusual aspect of this whole situation. The ships, which apparently are among the most important ships operating out of Hong Kong, are operating on a triangular route. They are operating from Hong Kong to Macao in a Portuguese possession. While the freight may be under British certificate when it leaves Hong Kong, that offers no assurance as to what happens, quite within the laws of Macao, at the time the ships go there. The whole shipload may be unloaded at Macao and a completely new shipload of materials essential for war taken aboard, and then transferred to some Chinese port. We know that the ships are moving to communist controlled ports. With the information the government now has, I should think we could reach a decision without much difficulty as to whether or not this should be allowed to continue, even though some of the information is not yet available.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Public Works mentioned the genesis of this affair, if I heard him aright, and the genesis of it would be the circumstances under which the cabinet directive was made in April, 1950. The exemption of this company from coming within the provisions of the Canada Shipping Act was an act of the Minister of Transport. He is in the house now, and must have in his files all the information that we have requested. Section 133A to which he referred this afternoon provides that the minister may, if he thinks fit, exempt any ship from any requirement referred to therein, if he is satisfied that the requirement has been substantially complied with, and so on.

The minister received a directive from the cabinet. I would have thought that what he did under this act would usually be done under an order in council or regulation. In this case it was not so done. If it had been done by regulation or order in council, that regulation or order in council would have been, under the law, placed before parliament. However, he says he proceeded upon the basis of a directive from the cabinet. He could only proceed on that basis if he was satisfied that the request of this company was a proper one. The information asked for by us must be in the files of the Minister of Transport, upon whose shoulders the responsibility for granting the exemption rests. Who made the application for change of registry? If I understood the Minister of Transport aright, his explanation is not the same in that regard as that of the Minister of Trade and Commerce last evening. What were the circumstances upon which the minister exercised an almost judicial discretion in determining that this company should be exempt from the provisions of the Canada Shipping Act? What was the evidence before him that caused him to make a decision so at variance with what one would expect, allowing aliens, none of whom acknowledge the Canadian flag or anything it stands for, the use of the Canadian flag in China seas.

To whom was money owing in respect of the building of these ships? How did the banks find themselves in a position where some $12 million was owing to them? What were the circumstances in connection with the financing of these ships? How much money did the Minister of Trade and Commerce advance the builders of these ships through the Canadian Commercial Corporation. Those are questions upon which we have a right to have information. This information must be in the possession of the Minister of Transport for certainly no Minister of Transport would grant an exemption under section 133A on any of the evidence that has so far been placed before parliament today, either by him or by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

This afternoon production of the directive was asked for. The directive must set forth the circumstances explaining why this was done. What is the explanation available to the government in regard to the extraordinary proposition of placing these ships, certainly if not under the control at least under the active surveillance of communists in China? Certainly no one could seriously argue that such extraordinary action would be taken on the kind of evidence that the members of the government have placed before this committee during the past twenty-four hours.

Now then, there is a second phase of it, once we find out the genesis of the circumstances. It might be of interest to know who are the Canadian directors of this subsidiary. Did the banks make any advances to these directors after the exemption order was granted by the Minister of Transport? Did the parent company, the Chinese company, owe the banks? These are questions to which parliament has a right to have answers. These are questions, the information regarding which must be in the possession of the Minister of Transport or he could not have exercised his discretion in granting the order under section 133A. They must have been put before cabinet. The minister went to the cabinet for advice. What information did he provide the cabinet with? Why was this done? What is the advantage to Canada to have the ships operating under these circumstances? What Canadian wants to see the Canadian flag carried around in the China sea by those who certainly acknowledge nothing of what the flag stands for?

Mr. Blue: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Certainly.

Mr. Blue: Is the hon. member trying to win an argument or solve a problem?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not trying to convince my hon. friend, because I realize that is impossible. I am trying to point out, however,—

Mr. Dickey: Answer the question.

Mr. Graydon: They did not put the ships up for auction.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, that information the government has now.

Mr. Blue: Answer the question.

Mr. Hodgson: What respect have you for the Canadian flag? Answer that question.

Mr. Blue: Just as much as you ever had.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I would ask hon. members not to interrupt the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Blue: Answer the question.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Hon. members will realize, of course, that when a question is asked of an hon. member who has the floor, he does not have to answer it.

Mr. Blue: There is no answer.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Particularly when the question is unintelligent and unintelligible.

Mr. Blue: My colour is as bright as yours, Mr. Green.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That was lost on the desert air because it was not heard.

Mr. Drew: It has gone into the blue.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Apparently that is what this government is trying to do. We want to know those facts.

Then we come to the second stage—and the Minister of Public Works says that we have not got all the answers on that yet—namely the question as to what the situation is now, what is happening in the China sea between Hong Kong and the China ports. Information has been asked of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. When the minister says in effect "I have not that information", I would be the first to agree that he has not the information as yet. But let us get first things first. Let us clear up the genesis, to use the expression of the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. Graydon: Before the exodus came.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Let us clear up the unusual circumstances that are apparent. Why did the minister grant the exemption order? He came in this afternoon fully prepared to answer. He gave us a short answer. But many of the questions that we asked have not been answered.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, the answer which I gave to the committee this afternoon is all of the information that I had at my disposal. If the hon. member for Lake Centre is perplexed, I am afraid he is attempting to make a great deal of political capital out of this matter which is not at all as extraordinary as he or those associated with him would lead us to believe.

When I came to the house this afternoon at five o'clock or five-thirty, I asked what the questions were that I was required to answer. The leader of the opposition kindly said, in order not to have those questions repeated, that perhaps I could get them from someone else and obtain the reply. I should like the committee to be reminded of the fact that this is an application which was made in March of 1950. I do not pretend to have a better memory than any other member of parliament, and I certainly cannot be expected to carry in my head or in my mind all of the details concerning this application made more than a year ago. Armed with the questions which were given to me, I obtained the information which was available at the time; and by the time I gave it, it was five minutes to six. It was therefore impossible for me or for any other officers of the department to obtain all the information that was required by the leader of the opposition and by the hon. member for Lake Centre. As a matter of fact, a great deal if not the greater part of the information asked for by the hon. gentleman is not obtainable from my department or from my files. But since both the leader of the opposition and the hon. member for Lake Centre have repeated the speeches they made earlier, and added to them, let me repeat what I said at the time and what the position is.

In March of 1950 an application was made for Canadian registry of some seven ships, if my memory serves me aright. The application was made by the Ming Sung Corporation Limited, a foreign company; and out of that it followed that they formed a Canadian subsidiary. It was stated by the leader of the opposition that the government concurred in the formation of the Canadian subsidiary. I am not in a position to say whether it was a provincial corporation or a federal corporation. If it was a provincial corporation, surely the federal government did not concur in its formation. If it was a federal corporation, then it was incorporated in the usual manner through the office of the Secretary of State, and the government had nothing to do with concurrence in that. What the Department of Transport did—and I take the full responsibility for it—was to grant Canadian registry. There was nothing else that could be done because any other company doing the same thing that this company did—that is, form a Canadian subsidiary and get a bill of sale—had every right to go to Vancouver, to Toronto, to Montreal or to Halifax, register that bill of sale and there be entitled to place under Canadian registry the ships in question. There is nothing abnormal in that procedure.

The next thing that happened was the application under section 133A for an exemption from the carrying of British subjects as officers, mates or engineers, not of crews. The leader of the opposition said: You have all of the information required; surely you can tell us what the present personnel is, what the identity of the crew is. I have no way of finding out what is the present personnel of those ships. Neither have I any way of knowing what the identity of the crew is. But what I said this afternoon is that when the application was made for a certificate of exemption under section 133A of the Canada Shipping Act, the names of the officers, mates and engineers of those ships were furnished to us. They were all of Chinese origin, all Chinese nationalists. What happened since then I cannot say. It may be that the Secretary of State for External Affairs can obtain that information. I do not know whether he can or not. But certainly I have no way of obtaining it.

Let me go a step further. The hon. member says that under section 133A this certificate of exemption was granted, something which was a matter of grave responsibility. I consider that those matters coming under section 133A are always serious matters. When I have granted an exemption, as I have done oftentimes but not repeatedly, I have exercised the discretion myself. But on this occasion I felt that I should not do that. On this occasion I felt the circumstances warranted that the matter be revealed to my colleagues in the cabinet. And that I did. And I was given instructions to grant the exemption under 133A, which I did in the month of May or April, of 1950.

Now then, the leader of the opposition says, "Produce the directive." I will have to inquire whether or not a written directive was given. I have no recollection of whether it was or not. I do know this, that repeatedly matters are discussed in cabinet and advice is sought from them—"Here is a matter in which I require advice." A discussion follows and advice is given.

There was no order in council, so far as I could ascertain in the few minutes that were at my disposal this afternoon—about twenty-five minutes. There was no order in council given. There was approval given. And so far as I can recollect—and I might be mistaken; I might have to take it back—but so far as I can recollect there was no written directive. Approval was sought and approval was granted.

That being so, there was an oral directive that exemption be granted. And acting under that advice, and with the concurrence of my colleagues in the cabinet, I issued the exemption under 133A.

I now come to the main objections that are being raised, both by the leader of the opposition and by the hon. member for Lake Centre, who asked countless questions dealing with other phases of the matter. The financial aspects of this I have had nothing to do with. If I were familiar with them in detail I would give them to the house.

Then it was asked: Who made the application. When was the application made? What were the advantages? I repeat that I have no information of that kind available. But I did put, in the few minutes at my disposal before six o'clock, all the information that I had at my disposal and that I was able to get; and I will say this, that if the House of Commons wishes to have it I can obtain all the information that it is possible for me to get in the department.

Beyond that I cannot go. I have nothing to hide, in so far as the two matters with which I have been concerned in this application, are concerned.

Mr. Green: Whether the directive from the cabinet was in writing or oral, the exemption issued by the Minister of Transport certainly must have been in writing. We are entitled at least to have that document brought before the House of Commons. Obviously it was very far from the usual form of exemption. In discussing it last night the Minister of Trade and Commerce had this to say—

Mr. Chevrier: May I interrupt the hon. member, without any desire at all to turn him from his trend of thought. He says that this exemption was one which was out of the ordinary, or at least one that was not usually granted, and that therefore there must be some record. I said in my statement a moment ago that there were a number of exemptions granted under 133A, and they are not granted as matters which are extraordinary.

For instance, I can think, during the post-war period, of a number of exemptions being granted for engineers, mates and so on—second mates acting in the place of first mates, and third engineers in the place of second engineers, because it was impossible to get first class engineers and first class mates. And they were done as a matter of course.

Mr. Harkness: That has nothing to do with this.

Mr. Green: That is the type of exemption which was contemplated by section 133A.

Mr. Chevrier: Not necessarily.

Mr. Green: Not the wholesale exemption of masters, mates and engineers on seven vessels, obviously.

Mr. Chevrier: I noticed the hon. member made that point this afternoon, and he makes it again tonight. I notice that in prior applications under 133A more than one ship has been granted exemption. I cannot give the name from memory, but I know of one case where several applications were made under 133A, and granted at the same time.

Mr. Graydon: Ships in the China sea?

Mr. Chevrier: I am dealing with ships in Canadian waters.

Mr. Green: Here were ships operating in communist waters. At the time this exemption was granted, last April or May, all that southeast part of China had been taken over by the communists. These ships obviously were to operate in communist waters, so there was nothing ordinary, I suggest, about the exemptions.

But whatever the case may be with regard to later exemptions, the minister must have granted this exemption in writing, and I would ask that he produce a copy of that formal exemption which was issued to this company.

Last night the Minister of Trade and Commerce discussed that matter, and he is reported at page 4124 of Hansard in this way:

> When they came back under the Canadian flag they were exempted from the requirements. This was the most disturbing condition to meet and, rather than let the ships go, which might have been the wisest course, we did take what seemed to be the practical course, to bring the physical ships under the Canadian flag, but to exempt the ships from the requirements of the Canada Shipping Act as long as they operated in Chinese waters.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce there pointed out that this exemption applied only while these ships were in Chinese waters. Surely the Minister of Transport can produce the actual exemption or exemptions containing these various provisions. If that were done it would help us to get rid of the matter.

He also said in the course of his remarks a few moments ago, or at least gave me the impression, that this application for Canadian registry came out of the blue, in the ordinary way that any application would come for registration. But the Minister of Trade and Commerce made some comments on that side of the question, too, last night when he said:

> All went well until the Chinese government, the government of Chiang Kai-shek, fell, and then the banks began to worry a little about their loan. In the uncertain situation that followed, it seemed wise—

And obviously the minister meant there that it seemed wise to himself and to his fellow members in the cabinet.

—to transfer the ships to the Canadian flag, which was done at the request of the Ming Sung Company, which expressed a desire to protect their loans in Canada.

Now, this whole question obviously was considered by the cabinet a year ago. Can either of the ministers, either the Minister of Transport or the Secretary of State for External Affairs, tell us why it was that this protection of the Canadian flag was given to these ships? One or other of those ministers must know why it was that such protection was given. I would ask that they let us have that information now.

Mr. Lesage: You had an answer this afternoon.

Mr. Green: No, we did not. And if the parliamentary assistant thinks we had it this afternoon, I would like to have it tonight.

Mr. Chevrier: I will not keep on repeating the same thing several times. I have said on two occasions in this debate that I have given the house all the information at my disposal at this time. Now, I would ask the hon. member to believe me when I say that I put that information on Hansard this afternoon and again this evening, and that I have no further information. I might be able to get more details or more of the information that has been required when I look into the files, but I think the committee will agree with me that in the twenty or twenty-five minutes at my disposal I did pretty well in getting what I did get concerning a matter which took place over a year ago, and much of which had not to do with my department. My hon. friend asks for information, but I regret that I am unable to give him more than I have given. I repeat that I have given all that is in my possession and that I will do the best I can to get additional information which is in my department concerning this transaction.

Mr. Green: I ask the minister what was the underlying government policy in giving the protection of the Canadian flag to these ships? What was the reason that was done? I think that is a very material question. Here was a decision and an unusual exemption granted. What was the policy which caused that to be done? There must have been some reason that the government took that step. Why was it taken? It certainly was not merely to help out a private company, I would think. What was the reason that this unusual step was taken?

Mr. Chevrier: My hon. friend will have to ask that of some other minister. I did say this afternoon that the circumstances surrounding the application were that the ships were likely to fall into communist hands; that unless something were done to give the protection of the Canadian flag or the British flag that would happen. I also said that there were no British officers, that is mates or engineers, available in Hong Kong for the manning of these ships.

Mr. Green: What difference would it make to Canada if these Chinese ships did fall into communist hands? These were ships which had never been registered as Canadian ships, except perhaps during the course of their building. They were registered as Chinese ships under the Chinese nationalist government. Why did the government of Canada take this step in order to prevent these ships falling into the hands of the other Chinese government? What was the reason for doing that?

Mr. Chevrier: I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce covered that in his statement last night and if the hon member will look at page 4124 of Hansard he will find the answer.

Mr. Green: Is the answer because the dominion government had guaranteed the bank loan? Is that what the Minister of Transport means?

Mr. Chevrier: If my hon. friend is trying to get from me information concerning finance, then I am afraid I cannot give it to him. I have dealt with the matter as far as I can as it concerns the Department of Transport.

Mr. Fulton: In the course of his remarks a little earlier the Minister of Transport, referring to what the hon. member for Lake Centre had said, made the statement that the circumstances surrounding this transaction and its present development were not as extraordinary as the hon. member for Lake Centre and those associated with him would lead us to believe. As a matter of fact I think the committee will probably decide that on the contrary the circumstances are more extraordinary than the ministers who have spoken so far this afternoon are prepared to admit. Indeed the circumstances have been extraordinary ever since the inception of this whole transaction which has landed us where we are today.

We have heard about five ships and two ships which appear to have gone missing. I believe that there were more ships than that. I should like to hear from the government as to what has happened to the other ships which were purchased by this Ming Sung Industrial Company Limited under a government-guaranteed loan. I believe that there were more ships and I should like to have confirmation of that and to know what has happened to them. Are they in communist hands? Why were they not included in this arrangement? Are they trading with the enemy? What has happened to them?

In a further reference to the questions asked by the hon. member for Lake Centre the Minister of Transport stated that the government did not know anything about the incorporation of the Canadian subsidiary and that he did not know whether it was a dominion or provincial company. Surely the government must have known and must have had information at the time. I am not saying that the minister should remember all the details, but the government surely must have known at the time of the circumstances of this incorporation of the Canadian subsidiary because they had an outstanding loan against these ships.

If the bill of sale of the ships to be registered was in the name of the Canadian subsidiary, surely the government must have had knowledge of that bill of sale at the time they were registered and thus have known of the Canadian subsidiary. If my recollection serves me correctly, it could not have been a provincial company. As I understand the British North America Act, any firm engaged in trans-ocean or inter-coastal shipping could not possibly be incorporated under a provincial charter. It must be a firm incorporated under a dominion charter because the dominion has exclusive jurisdiction over that type of shipping. The federal government must have known at the time when this firm was incorporated. I do not think the committee should be satisfied with the refusal of information at this time on the ground, "Well, we probably do not know anything about it anyway because it may not even have been a dominion charter".

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I should like to bring to his attention a few citations which I think are appropriate on this occasion. The acting leader of the government has already stated that all the information that was available at this time was put before the committee. The Secretary of State for External Affairs made a similar statement this afternoon. The Minister of Transport has said repeatedly this evening that he has put before the committee all the information which was in his possession at the present moment, which was available at the moment. Citation 240 of Beauchesne, third edition, to be found at page 103, reads:

> It has been formally ruled by Speakers in the Canadian commons that a statement by an honourable member respecting himself and peculiarly within his own knowledge must be accepted,—

Citation 241 reads:

> A statement made by a member in his place, is considered as made upon honour and cannot be questioned in the house or out of it.

I do not think hon. members should say repeatedly that the minister should have this information now or should give the committee more information after so many statements have been made by ministers and by the acting leader of the government that all the information that is available at this time has been put before the committee. I should like hon. members in taking part in the debate during whatever time is yet available before adjournment to bear these citations in mind.

Mr. Drew: I recall no occasion on which it has been said that all the information now available is before us. It has been said—

Mr. Chevrier: I made that statement, that all the information at my disposal—

Mr. Drew: That is quite different and that is exactly what I want to point out. It is one thing for a minister to say that he has given to the house what he knows himself. The minister has a file on the Ming Sung Company. He could get that file. Even if there was an oral directive, which would be an interesting thing, there would be a copy there of the letter sent by the minister or his official to the Ming Sung Company interpreting that oral directive and telling the company under what circumstances they could have this registry transferred. The details will all be there and those details could be brought to this committee within a few minutes and presented to this committee.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps the leader of the opposition did not hear a few words of what I said. I said the Minister of Transport had made a statement to the effect that he had given all the information that was available, and I added, "at this time;" all the information that was available at this time. I am pretty sure I said that. I think the typescript copy of Hansard will prove I said that.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to split hairs, but there is a vast difference between saying that we have all the information that is available at this time and saying that we have all the information that the minister now possesses, or everything he knows at this time. What I am saying is that it is unthinkable that there is not full information in a file in the Department of Transport with respect to the Ming Sung transaction. I qualify that by saying that the minister thinks that it was an oral directive, and if so then it is absolutely certain that there is a file readily available which will contain the letter or letters which interpreted that oral directive and told the Ming Sung Company the exact conditions under which they would be able to carry out this change of registry.

Mr. Chevrier: I think that the leader of the opposition must have been out of the house when, over and above what he repeated, I added that I would get any other information that was available.

Mr. Drew: Get it now.

Mr. Chevrier: No, I cannot get it now.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I should like to point out that at the time you referred to certain citations I was dealing with the reasons advanced by the minister in support of the proposition that very probably this information was not in the possession of the government at all, and would not have been in the possession of the government at that time. I said that it might not be at the moment in the personal possession of the minister, but I was trying to show that the general information which we are seeking must be in the possession of the government for the reasons I advanced. The minister made other statements this afternoon concerning which I do not think any questions have been asked him yet, and as to which I would think he would have the information available now. I will ask him the questions and then perhaps he can tell us whether he can answer them now or later. One of the questions was actually asked by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and has not yet been answered or referred to in the minister's reply.

What power has the minister under the Canada Shipping Act to strike these ships off registry? It has been suggested that that should be done, and suggested very strongly for reasons which have been advanced. The minister has not yet stated what power he has, and what he would have to go through to do that. The other matter to which I should like to refer is that the minister stated very clearly that at the time the exemption was applied for he had doubts as to whether the exemption should be granted, and because of those doubts he referred the matter to his colleagues in the cabinet. That was the minister's statement this afternoon. I can only presume that when he made it he recollected the doubts that he had. I should like to ask him therefore what were the doubts? Why did the minister think that it might not be proper, wise or propitious to grant this exemption? What were the doubts, and what was the basis upon which those doubts came into his mind? I think that is very pertinent indeed because in this case the minister appears to have been wiser than his colleagues. If he had doubts one must assume they were removed by his colleagues whereas actually his doubts were correct and the decision of the cabinet seems to me to have been shown to be wrong. I should like to ask the minister at this time to answer these questions. Then there are some further questions that I think should be put to the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding the transaction. Perhaps the Minister of Transport would be kind enough to answer these questions first.

Mr. Chevrier: With reference to the first part of the hon. member's statement in which he referred to me as having said that there was nothing extraordinary about the transaction, I think if he looks up Hansard he will find that I was referring to the first part of this application. When I made that statement I was dealing with an application to register a ship under the Canadian flag. I stated that there was nothing extraordinary about that because that is done in the usual manner, and I tried to explain how it was done, by the filing of the bill of sale in the usual office. I am asked what power there is to withdraw. I presume there is the same power as there is to grant an exemption.

In so far as doubts are concerned, I suppose if my hon. friend were to continue his probing he could ask additional questions as to what other things were in my mind at the time. I do not know that I am required to give to the committee what the doubts were that were in my mind, if there were any doubts. What I stated was that usually an application under 133A is dealt with in the discretion of the minister in the ordinary manner, and as a rule I do not submit them to cabinet. In this case I felt that it should be submitted, and I did so. I do not think I need go beyond that. I do not think I am under cross-examination in the committee. I think that when I state that these were the circumstances I have gone as far as any minister is required to go. So far as giving the doubts that might have emerged in my mind at the time, I do not know that I would remember all of them that came up twelve, fifteen or sixteen months ago. Therefore I think I have discharged my responsibility to this house in giving the information which I have.

Mr. Fulton: The purpose of the question is to find out if possible whether there were any circumstances known to the minister.

Mr. Chevrier: In answer to two questions I placed on the record what the circumstances were which led me to submit it to cabinet, in answer to a question by the hon.

member for Vancouver-Quadra and, I think, in answer to another hon. member prior to six o'clock. That is a matter of record.

Mr. Fulton: I do not think the minister has been asked this question. Does the minister know who the directors are of the present affiliated Canadian company?

Mr. Chevrier: I presume that can be obtained but I do not know at this time.

Mr. Fulton: The minister has no knowledge at the present time concerning this company?

Mr. Chevrier: I have no recollection at this time of the directors of the Canadian corporation which made the application in March of 1950. I could hardly be expected to have that recollection.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): There are one or two questions I should like to ask the Minister of Transport. I should like to know where these ships were when application was made to have them registered in Canada. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said that two of them were on the Yangtze. I do not imagine they went up there in 1950. They must have been there before, and therefore they must have been in communist possession when registration was sought.

Mr. Lesage: Those two were never registered.

Mr. Chevrier: Was the hon. member in the house this afternoon?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Yes.

Mr. Chevrier: Does he remember that I made the statement that the information I had at that time was that these two ships were not under Canadian registry?

Mr. Green: The minister said tonight there were seven.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The statement was made that seven were registered.

Mr. Lesage: There were nine altogether.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Were there nine ships?

Mr. Pearkes: Two more.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): There is another question I should like to put to the minister.

Mr. Drew: Were there nine?

Mr. Lesage: There were nine built.

Mr. Drew: Nine built?

Mr. Lesage: Nine built. If the leader of the opposition would go back to the debates in the spring of 1949 he would find that all the fundamentals of this situation were discussed. If he will refer to the 1949 Hansard of the first session he will find that there were nine ships built.

Mr. Harkness: And sold?

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): There is another point I wish to put before the minister. The minister stated the application was grounded on the information that they could not obtain British mates, engineers and officers to man these ships. Therefore they had to be manned by Chinese. Does the minister now believe that was true; and at that time did he really believe it was true?

Mr. Chevrier: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is going a bit far when he asks whether I really believed it. Of course I believed at that time, as I believe now, that there were no British officers or mates or engineers who could be obtained. Otherwise I would not have submitted the application for the exemption to my colleagues and granted the exemption. When my hon. friend pursues the point he casts doubt upon my integrity, and if he is doing that he is acting contrary to the rules of this house.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I was not casting doubt upon the minister's integrity, but he will remember that he said this was over a year ago and it was difficult for him to remember. I was drawing to his attention that point, and I now draw this further point. Does he not recall that last year we had a very difficult unemployment situation in this country, with 400,000 people drawing relief? There must have been thousands of engineers, mates, officers and crew members available at that time to man these seven ships. The lakes were closed, navigation on the St. Lawrence was closed, and men must have been available. That is why I would like the minister to produce the correspondence with the Ming Sung Company in regard to this whole matter so the house may judge whether the decision was properly made.

Mr. Fulton: I wanted to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs some questions, but if hon. members have other questions to ask the Minister of Transport perhaps I should wait. The circumstances surrounding this transaction, which have been referred to by the parliamentary assistant, as he has pointed out are recorded in Hansard for April 7, 1949. According to those circumstances it would appear that there is a considerable obligation outstanding against these ships on the part of the government of Chiang Kai-shek. I should like to know the circumstances surrounding that obligation; what negotiations we are conducting with that government and why, if this is the situation—and if it is not I hope the minister will tell the house—and this obligation is guaranteed in part by this government, these ships in which the Canadian government has a very heavy financial interest are permitted, while under the Canadian flag, to trade with people who are at present engaged in hostilities against Canadian troops. Instead of being under the control of the government which made the loan available so the ships might in fact be delivered to the Ming Sung Company, they are now under control of the company and trading with the communist government of China. Ships made available through moneys advanced by the Canadian government on the request of the nationalist government of China, for which that government is liable under the terms of the guarantee, are now trading with what is in effect the enemy. I should like the minister to explain that situation and tell us what negotiations are going on with the Chiang Kai-shek government with respect to that liability.

Mr. Pearson: I do not think I am capable of explaining all the financial details of this transaction, which took place some years ago. No doubt when the Department of Finance estimates are brought forward the hon. gentleman will have an opportunity to get this information.

Mr. Fulton: I might save some time if I make it clear that I am not asking for the details surrounding the financial transaction. I am asking what negotiations are in process or what contacts we have with the Chiang Kai-shek government regarding the outstanding liability. I am also asking why these ships, on which the Chiang Kai-shek government has a liability to us, are now being allowed to trade with the enemy of that government, a country whose soldiers are fighting Canadian soldiers.

Mr. Pearson: As far as I know, the Chiang Kai-shek government, which is the government of China we still recognize, has no connection with or liability or obligation in regard to this transaction. As to the statement by the hon. gentleman that we are giving permission for these ships to trade with communist China, which is fighting us in Korea, these ships have no permission that is not granted to any other Canadian ship, and they are not in a special position of any kind. Under Canadian law there is no embargo on shipments to China except in respect of a list of strategic materials; and we have been informed that this list of strategic materials is being recognized by the owners and operators of these ships.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Fulton: I should like to correct the minister in both those statements, because they are directly at variance with the facts as disclosed by the record. The minister has just said that as far as he knows the Chiang Kai-shek government has no liability in connection with these ships. When the matter was being discussed in April, 1949, on several occasions the Minister of Trade and Commerce told us that the Canadian government stepped in at least in part at the request of the Chiang Kai-shek government, and that the advance made by the banks was guaranteed jointly by the government of Canada and the government of Chiang Kai-shek. So the minister's statement on the first point is not in accord with what we were told two years ago.

Then the minister said these ships were not in a different position and enjoyed no special permission with respect to trading with communist China than any other ship under the Canadian flag. I point out to him that they are in a very special position. They are under the Canadian flag, it is true, but they are manned by Chinese; and the suggestion has been made that one of the captains is a Russian. That has been neither confirmed nor denied.

Mr. Pearson: It has been denied.

Mr. Fulton: But they are manned by Chinese crews, and as far as we know by Chinese communist crews. Apparently they trade freely with communist China, and as far as I know they are the only ships under the Canadian flag carrying on that trade today. So certainly they are in a far different position than any other ship under our flag. I would like the minister, if he will, to reconcile the statements he has made with those earlier statements, and to say what is the present position in that regard.

Mr. Pearson: If I said the Chiang Kai-shek government had no obligation in regard to this transaction, possibly that was inaccurate. I might have been more accurate in saying that the Chiang Kai-shek government now accepted no obligation in respect of those ships, which have been transferred to Canadian registry. As far as the second question is concerned, these ships are subject to Canadian regulations, and are in exactly the same position legally as any other ship under Canadian registry.

Mr. Harkness: I take considerable objection to the statement by the minister that these ships are in no different position than any other ships flying the Canadian flag. The hon. member for Kamloops has already pointed out one essential difference. Another difference which is even more essential is that these ships are owned by the Ming Sung Company, whose headquarters as far as I know are in communist China. As a matter of fact I believe they are in Chungking.

Mr. Pearson: They are in Montreal.

Mr. Harkness: I believe the headquarters of this company are at Chungking. They have a Canadian subsidiary in Montreal. They have another subsidiary at Hong Kong, and so on; but actually the people who own these ships have their headquarters at Chungking as far as I know, and they are completely under the thumb of Mr. Mao. That puts these ships in a totally different position than any other ships flying the Canadian flag. In those circumstances they are really under the control of Mao and his communist Chinese government. Any orders they give in connection with these ships are carried out, I imagine, and will continue to be carried out unless our government steps in and seizes them, as has been suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, or brings them back under Canadian control. Apart from that these ships are flying our flag while actually under the command of the rulers of communist China.

There is one other matter on which I should like to comment during this debate. When speaking of the exemptions that he gave to this company, the Minister of Transport made quite a point of the fact that the names put in for these exemptions were Chinese. He seemed to be concerned at that time with disproving the statement made in the letter read by the member for Nanaimo that one of these captains was a Russian. The thing that struck me in connection with that was, why did the fact that the names of the officers of these ships were Chinese give the minister the idea that the exempting of these ships from Canadian law was the right thing to do, in view of the fact that at that time Mao was in control of China? Chiang Kai-shek had been expelled from China, and Mao and the communists were in control. The fact that the names of the captains submitted to the minister were Chinese I would have thought would have caused him to question the advisability of waiving the law in favour of these people.

It seems to me that does not in the least explain why this permission was given. It just makes the thing more obscure than ever. I am quite sure that the directive which has been requested exists. I do not understand why, during the three hours from six o'clock until nine o'clock when the committee resumed its business, this directive could not be secured. If it is not a written directive, at any rate there must have been a note made of it in the proceedings of the cabinet. I cannot understand why, within those three hours, either the written directive, or the stenographic note made of the fact that there was a directive, has not been produced for us to see. Then, we would know what the situation is. It seems to me that until either the directive or the note made of it has been produced, the government is being anything but frank in its disclosures in connection with the whole matter.

Mr. Adamson: There are one or two questions I should like to ask the Minister of Transport in order to get the matter elucidated. I am not one who does not believe the minister has acted in anything but the best of good faith. Apparently these nine ships were constructed in 1948 and 1949 specifically for this river trade or the trade on the China seas. I understand that any ships trading on the Yangtze have to be specially constructed, and therefore at the commencement of the laying of the keels for these ships the trade they were going to enter must have been fully understood by the government, the banks, the ship contractors, the Chinese company and everyone else connected with them. The use to which these ships were going to be put must have been known for a considerable time.

I understand that there were the seven ships in question, and the two others making up the nine are presently under Panamanian registry and are undertaking this trade. The first question I should like to have answered, therefore, if it is possible, is whether the other ships were built under the same financial guarantee as those ships now plying the Chinese trade to which reference has been made this afternoon. In this connection, I should like to quote an editorial in a periodical known as the Syren and Shipping, which is generally accepted as the spokesman for British shipbuilding. The article is in the May 16 issue. The first two paragraphs describe the restrictions and regulations put on shipments from Hong Kong, and the inspection and care taken to see that contraband is not shipped directly to communist China. I mention these first two paragraphs, because I do not want to distort what this semi-official periodical has to say. This is headed "The Truth About Hong Kong," and in the third paragraph, which is headed "China's Attitude", it says:

> China has all along kept very quiet about Hong Kong, as it has been of such use as a trading post for international trade—not for war stores, because of the effective control we have described—but for domestic purposes.

This is a British publication.

As we are not at war with China and have, indeed, actually granted her recognition, it follows that if there were a complete embargo on goods to Hong Kong because some goods undoubtedly find their way over the frontier in normal domestic trading, China would undoubtedly retaliate and all the cheap vegetables, etc., on which the Hong Kong workers mainly live would be withdrawn, prices would rise, raw materials which are turned into manufactured goods in Hong Kong for other parts of southeast Asia would not be forthcoming and the whole of Hong Kong's trade would be hit. This would have a cumulative effect throughout that very part of the world about which the Colombo conference met to see how the spread of communism there could be stopped. Again, attacks on Hong Kong would deprive the Far East of a great banking, insurance and shipping forwarding market offering cheap transshipment and storage of goods for the whole area. Hong Kong's place among the world's ports can be seen in the shipping figures given for 1949.

It goes on to give the number of ships and the thousands of tons which entered and left Hong Kong.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have every belief that the authorities in Hong Kong are doing everything possible to prevent arms and military equipment entering the area controlled by the communist government at Peking. But the fact that serious doubt about the effectiveness of this was brought out in the British House of Commons the other day is also quoted in the same periodical. It states:

Ships as "Vehicles" to China

A lot of trouble has been caused to the government by an answer given to Mr. R. Blackburn (Northfield, Birmingham), who wanted to know what strategic materials had been exported to China during the past three months. The reply by Sir Hartley Shawcross (president of the Board of Trade) was that there was no generally accepted definition of "strategic materials." United Kingdom exports to China in the months of January to March, 1951, in the main categories included iron and steel and manufactures thereof to the value of £230,000, and vehicles (including locomotives, ships, and aircraft) value £71,000. The total U.K. exports to China in the three months amounted to £1,291,000.

The debate continued on this subject and Mr. Shinwell was again asked about the matter by Mr. Blackburn, and again Mr. Shinwell replied that these materials had not gone into the war potential of communist China. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to distort what is the purport of these articles in this statistical and semi-official publication. But nevertheless, here we have figures with regard to a considerable amount of valuable material; if it is not directly war material, it is at least convertible into the sinews of war by manufacture or by some simple process. Again, Mr. Chairman, it is extremely difficult to say what is a sinew of war. During the last war we regarded practically everything as a sinew of war and we blockaded completely the German coast. Are these Canadian ships carrying rubber? Is rubber contraband? Are these Canadian ships carrying a drug like streptomycin? Have any permits been given for the export of scarce drugs which can be used by our own troops to put down disease? Are any of the antibiotics, which are in extremely scarce supply, being supplied by these ships? Again, these ships go to a neutral port. That neutral port is, if I know anything about Portuguese ports —and I know some of them—completely without regulations. Canadian flag ships leaving Macao could be filled with war material and the authorities in Hong Kong would have no possible way of regulating or of seeing what this ship picked up from another port, not from Hong Kong.

As I say, Mr. Chairman, I am not accusing the government of anything else but carelessness in this matter. I feel that the replies we have had have been, to say the least, evasive. The situation has been known, and must have been known, because the ships must have been constructed for the very trade in which they are now operating. Yet we find that even at this date, the middle of June, 1951, nearly a year and a quarter after the special order was made to exempt them from having Canadian crews, we get the answer: "I do not know; we have not that information." I do not know, Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Adamson: —but if I were interested in running a shipping line, I would damn well know what business my ships were in.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Order.

Mr. Adamson: If I were running a shipping business, I would know what cargoes my ships were carrying; and if I were responsible for looking after the granting of indemnities to ships, I would know what was happening.

Mr. Sinnott: It will be a long time before you are running one.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Adamson: It is a strange thing, Mr. Chairman, but the Greeks had a word for people who made baa-baa noises in the back row. They called them barbarians. We merely call them heathen Chinese.

Mr. Pearkes: Having been the first member to introduce the storms of the south China seas to the calm waters of this committee, Mr. Chairman, I should like to add a few words before you rise and report progress.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Or carry the item.

Mr. Pearkes: When the committee reassembled after the break for the luncheon hour, the Secretary of State for External Affairs referred to the fact that he had lost his usual composure just before the committee rose for lunch. During that brief period in which he was speaking before lunch he suggested that I should feel sorry for the statements I had made. He suggested that I would rue the day. He did not use those words, but in his remarks he most definitely used a tone which was almost threatening, when he said that I should be sorry for the statements which I had made.

I now want to examine the statements which I made—and I was quoting from this letter—just in order to show how far the statements which were made by the general secretary of the navigating and engineer officers guild have been borne out and supported in this discussion. The first point which was brought out in the letter was that vessels of the Ming Sung Industrial Company were trading between Hong Kong, Macao and Canton. Evidence has been produced by ministers here today to show that that statement is correct. The next one was that Canton is a port under the direct control of a government with which the government of the Dominion of Canada has no political relations. I think that statement can be accepted. It has certainly not been denied here today. The third point was: What were these vessels carrying? On the one hand the secretary of the guild reports that eyewitnesses have stated that the daily cargoes included essential war materials. On the other hand we have had produced here today by the Minister of Trade and Commerce a letter from a branch of the company concerned which states that it is not carrying essential war materials out of Hong Kong.

Mr. Dickey: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pearkes: No, I have not much time and I would like to finish what I have to say first. Then you may ask your question.

Mr. Dickey: I thought the hon. member might like to state where the eyewitnesses were located.

Mr. Pearkes: It has been shown that these vessels leaving Hong Kong can go to Macao and then on to Canton. I would like to call attention to the fact that, because of its strategic importance and because of its reputation as a port, although it is not a port of China proper, Macao has been named by the Minister of Trade and Commerce as one of those points to which strategic war materials may not be sent.

So there is at least the possibility that, having cleared from the Hong Kong government, these ships could go and pick up essential war materials from Macao for delivery elsewhere. Because quite obviously it is an entrée port into communist China.

The next point was that these vessels are trading under a Canadian flag. This was substantiated here this afternoon time after time.

The fifth is that they are officered and manned by Chinese, and that one has a Russian captain. There is no question about their being officered and manned by Chinese. There has been doubt, in fact it has been emphatically denied, that there is a Russian captain. Well, it is quite possible that such a mistake could have been made, because it is pretty hard to distinguish between some Russians and Chinese. We must remember that the Mongolian is a Russian, and a Mongolian looks very much like a Chinaman, to those who are not familiar with those people.

Mr. Dickey: Pretty weak!

Mr. Pearkes: Then the next point was that the Ming Sung Company trades in China under the flag of the people's republic of China. There has been evidence today to show that at least two vessels which were taken—if "taken" is the right word—which were operating up the Yangtze, which were built in Canada, and which were included in these original seven or nine vessels which were sold, are still operating on the Yangtze under the flag of the people's republic of China. I do not think that has been denied.

The next point is that the regulations have been evaded. Perhaps "evaded" is not quite the right word, because they were granted exemption from adhering to the Canadian regulations. The average person in Hong Kong would not know that the exemption had been granted. It is quite a reasonable assumption to make that the regulations were being evaded.

There is no question about the concern which such organizations as the merchant navy officers organization, and others, have felt about this matter. So, thus far, I see no cause for great concern on my part. I am not repentant for having brought this matter before the House of Commons. I believe it was my duty to bring it to the attention of hon. members, because it is a serious matter. Because, while there may be some slight inaccuracies, as perhaps have come out—and not yet proved—I still feel that this discussion has brought before the people of Canada a very critical, dangerous, unsatisfactory and, to use the word used last night by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, unhappy situation.

I repeat the request I made earlier in the discussion, that something be done to stop the possibility of this trade going on with Canadian ships in enemy territory. I cannot help accusing the government of being somewhat slack in this matter. They knew that these Canadian ships trading under the Canadian flag were operating in those waters since last summer. They also knew that the Chinese troops started fighting in North Korea last November; and it seems to me rather extraordinary that, so far as we can find out from the discussion today, until a week ago no attempt has been made to try to correct this situation.

I think I have dealt with those points. I do want to stress once again that the ships are operating for this Ming Sung Company—a large company which, as has been admitted today, has ramifications and branches throughout China. I would ask this question: Who is getting the protection from the action of this government? I think it is fairly obvious, in the first place, that the profits accruing from this trade must be going to the directors of the Ming Sung Company. I repeat that it is a company which has branches throughout communist China. Quite obviously if they have their branches in communist China, and if those ships are trading even with the port of Canton, then the communist government of China is also getting the benefit from this trade, because it will be taxing the commodities that come in, and the trade going on. So, from the decision made by this government, it is in some measure enabling the government of a country opposed to our troops in Korea to obtain additional revenue.

Then, thirdly, as to the holders of the mortgage, the various banks which are concerned in this matter, they are getting interest on the principal, the principal being something in the neighbourhood of $12,750,000. They are getting interest on that amount of money.

Those are the three groups which in the main are benefited by the fact that the Canadian government took ships back under the Canadian flag and continued to underwrite the loans which had been made. I was not quite clear on one point when it was stated that the Chiang Kai-shek or nationalist government of China had abrogated its responsibility. I think that is what the Secretary of State for External Affairs said with regard to the original guarantee that had been given. Does that mean that Canada has taken over the whole of the guarantee which was given originally? I understand that Canada accepted only fifty per cent of that guarantee.

I repeat that far from being penitent, as I think the Secretary of State for External Affairs would like me to be, or far from being sorry for having introduced this subject—I do not think he need take that attitude—I think it has been a discussion of value. It has been heated at times, but I do think that it has drawn to the attention of the government and of the people of Canada a situation which needs correcting and which in my humble opinion it is within the power of the government to correct.

Mr. Fulford: I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if ships flying the flags of other nations in the United Nations are plying on this triangular route? I refer particularly to ships flying the stars and stripes, or flags of the commonwealth or of France. It seems to me that this is a well established trade and that there are ships of many nations, including members of the United Nations, engaged in it.

Mr. Pearson: To the best of my knowledge there are a great many ships still engaged in the China trade. All those members of the United Nations which have accepted the obligation of preventing strategic materials getting to China do not carry such materials on their ships running into communist China at this time. There is no complete embargo on trade with China, so far as I know.

Mr. Fulford: I ask that question to indicate that others are engaged in the same kind of trade.

Mr. Drew: Reference was made by the parliamentary assistant to the minister to the debate which took place on April 7, 1949. That debate, of course, did not relate in any way to the major consideration which is before us today.

Mr. Chevrier: Oh, yes, it did.

Mr. Drew: That debate did not in any way relate to the transfer of the registry of ships that had been under the control of communist China to Canadian registry, thus being able to fly the Canadian flag.

Mr. Chevrier: You said that the debate did not in any way relate to this matter. I say it did in some way relate to this matter. Very much did it relate to this matter.

Mr. Drew: If the minister had been listening he would have heard what I said. I said very clearly that it in no way related to the major subject under discussion here, and I made it quite clear what it was and what it is.

Mr. Chevrier: You are remembering it now.

Mr. Drew: It was the transfer of these ships to Canadian registry. In so far as the interjection made by the parliamentary assistant is concerned, I would point out that he was inaccurate in suggesting that the general debate at that time had disclosed that all these ships had been delivered. It did not. It disclosed the number of ships which were under contract and at that time the Minister of Trade and Commerce expressed the expectation that the contracts would be completed later that year.

We, of course, have not had an opportunity since that time to be informed as to the fulfilment of those details. In so far as the ships which were transferred are concerned, I would suggest that when this item is called again it probably can be disposed of very quickly if the government in the meantime will have obtained the essential information which they have and which they can give to this house. They are in position—

Mr. Chevrier: That is exactly what the Minister of Public Works desired at the beginning of this debate.

Mr. Green: You had better run along and get your report.

Mr. Drew: The government has simply been evading the real facts in this case and trying to create the pretence that they cannot give information which would fully disclose what is the situation. This is an interesting sequel to the debate in 1949. It was a strange transaction then. This came before the house to ratify an irregular payment by the government. That payment was an obligation that had been incurred in excess of the original contract amount. That was disposed of at that time.

Anyone who wishes to refer to the debate on that day will see that the government was very fully informed in regard to the Ming Sung Company and in regard to the nature of its activities and in regard to where it carried on business. The thing that should be remembered in this is that this is a company primarily operating in communist China. The interesting thing is that the government was prepared to accept a statement from that company delivered to them in Hong Kong as more reliable than a statement sent here by men who were working on these ships or working on ships out of Hong Kong and who, we have every reason to believe, were interested in the welfare of the shipping.

This situation is not merely an incident, it is a symptom of conditions. If this government were really taking a firm stand in regard to communism instead of its attitude in regard to trade with communist China, this would not have happened, and we would not so easily have made this of definite advantage to a company now operating within communist China.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, on Monday we intend to take up four non-contentious bills. Three of them, Bill No. 372, Bill No. 373 and Bill No. 374, relate to income tax agreements with Sweden and France.

Mr. Knowles: There is not one with China, is there?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We do not know yet. The fourth is Bill No. 376, respecting the construction of a line by Canadian National Railway Company from Sherridon to Lynn lake. Then we will take up the resolution in the name of the Minister of Veterans Affairs to amend the Returned Soldiers Insurance Act. I could not get this through the other day because the hon. member for Royal was not here, but he assured me it was not contentious and that they were anxious to have it proceeded with. Then we will take up the resolution in the name of the Minister of Finance to make certain grants to municipalities in respect of federal properties situated therein; then Bill No. 296, an act to amend the Income Tax Act. That is the bill of the day. Then we will take up Bill No. 194, an act to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. That is not contentious either.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, June 18, 1951

The house met at eleven o'clock.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Fourth and fifth reports of special committee on veterans affairs.—Mr. Mutch.

MANITOBA NATURAL RESOURCES

APPROVAL OF AGREEMENT WITH RESPECT TO INVESTMENT OF SCHOOL LANDS FUND

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 385, to vary the Manitoba natural resources agreement.

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): This bill and the two following are identical in substance. In 1930 the natural resources were transferred to the three provinces and at the same time the school lands trust fund was transferred. That fund was then invested in government of Canada securities, and the provinces have asked that this field of investment be expanded to include provincial, municipal and school board securities. This bill ratifies the agreement.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ALBERTA NATURAL RESOURCES

APPROVAL OF AGREEMENT WITH RESPECT TO INVESTMENT OF SCHOOL LANDS FUND

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 386, to vary the Alberta natural resources agreement.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SASKATCHEWAN NATURAL RESOURCES

APPROVAL OF AGREEMENT WITH RESPECT TO INVESTMENT OF SCHOOL LANDS FUND

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 387, to vary the Saskatchewan natural resources agreement.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FAIR EMPLOYMENT PRACTICES

PROVISION AGAINST DISCRIMINATION ON ACCOUNT OF RACE, CREED OR COLOUR

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 388, to promote fair employment practices in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mrs. Fairclough: The purpose of the bill is to implement the declaration of human rights, as proclaimed by the United Nations on December 10, 1948, in so far as it applies to workers under the jurisdiction of the federal government.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING

AMENDMENT OF ACT WITH RESPECT TO DEFENCE PROJECTS, REPAYMENT OF ADVANCES, ETC.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development) moved the first reading of Bill No. 380 (from the Senate), to amend the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO INTEREST RATES, REPAYMENT OF LOANS, ETC.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development) moved the first reading of Bill No. 381 (from the Senate), to amend the National Housing Act, 1944.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY—NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Browne (St. John's West):

1. Have any payments been made to the government of Newfoundland on account of the construction of the trans-Canada highway?
2. If so, how much has been paid, and what is the mileage on which payment is based?

Mr. Winters:

1. Yes.

2. $957,843.79 has been paid in respect of subgrade construction, culverts and small bridges over approximately 72 miles out of a total length of 153 miles of grading under construction as at March 31, 1951.

Questions

HEALTH GRANTS—QUEBEC—TUBERCULOSIS

Mr. Eudes:

1. What has been done under the national health grants program to reduce tuberculosis morbidity and mortality in the province of Quebec?

2. Has there been any decrease in the tuberculosis mortality rate in Quebec since the inauguration of the national health grants program?

Mr. Martin:

1. Approximately $3 million has been spent under the national health grants program toward the control of tuberculosis in the province of Quebec. Preventive diagnostic and treatment services have been provided. Staff and equipment have been provided for diagnostic clinics, mobile clinics, and sanatoria. Drugs, such as streptomycin, para-amino salicylic acid and tibione, have been purchased for free distribution to tuberculous patients. A BCG vaccination program among children has been established. Various investigators into BCG vaccine have been carried out.

In addition, under the hospital construction grant, assistance amounting to $1,996,000 has been given toward the construction of 1,921 additional beds in eight provincial sanatoria.

2. Yes. In 1946 the tuberculosis mortality rate was 72·4 per 100,000; in 1949 the rate had dropped to 48·9 per 100,000.

GRAIN COMMISSIONERS—ANNUAL REPORT

Mr. Wright:

1. On what date was the 1949-50 annual report of the board of grain commissioners placed in the hands of the government?

2. On what date was it sent to the printers?

Mr. McIlraith:

1. First draft of report received on January 29, and completed report on February 16.

2. Final report sent to king's printer February 24.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—CIVILIAN EMPLOYEES

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood):

1. (1) On the 30th April, 1951, how many civilian employees were there in the Department of National Defence of the following classes: (a) civil servants; (b) prevailing rate employees; (c) casual employees?

(2) What is the estimated wage and salary bill for classes (a) and (b) above for the fiscal year 1951-52?

2. (1) What is the distribution of the first two classes in question No 1 by commands and areas?

(2) What are the military establishments having in the aggregate more than 500 civilian employees of the employees of the first two classes in question No. 1.

3. (1) Who is in charge of each such establishment, and is he military or civilian personnel?

[Mr. Winters.]

(2) Who of (a) the persons in charge of the above stations and (b) the total civilian employees in the Department of National Defence are employed pursuant to the terms of the Civil Service Act?

Mr. Blanchette:

1. (i) (a) 15,158 civil servants (including defence research board); (b) 10,506 prevailing rate employees (including the defence research board); (c) 5,232 casual employees.

(ii) (a) $39,926,103; (b) $18,098,487.

2. (i) (a)

3. (i) See 2 (ii) above.

(ii) (a) None.

(b) All of the civilian employees of the Department of National Defence with the exception of those of the defence research board are employed pursuant to the terms of the Civil Service Act. The Civil Service Act defines "civil servants" as all the employees of the departments of the federal government and that act make specific provision for each type of employee. Under the provisions of section 54 of the National Defence Act, employees of the defence research board are exempted from the terms of the Civil Service Act.

HEALTH GRANTS—NURSING AIDES, CALGARY, ALTA.

Mr. Dechene:

Has any assistance been given under the national health grants program to the school for nursing aides, Calgary, Alberta?

Mr. Martin: Yes. Since 1949 the national health grants program has supported the school for nursing aides at Calgary, graduating about 150 nursing aides per year. A grant of $40,000 is being made during the present fiscal year to this school.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

NATIONAL DEFENCE—EMPLOYEES WHO ARE NOT BRITISH SUBJECTS

Mr. Gagnon:

1. Are there any employees in the Department of National Defence who are not British subjects?

2. If so (a) what are their names; (b) respective positions; (c) nature of their work; (d) salary of each; (e) place of origin; (f) by whom, and on what date was each recommended?

MOTION FOR PAPERS

NORTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER BRIDGE

Mr. Coldwell:

For a copy of all correspondence, during the year 1950, and to date in 1951, in the possession of the Department of Public Works, relating to the proposed construction of a bridge over the North Saskatchewan river on the meridian line between the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The government has no objection to the passing of this motion, with the usual reservation that, if there is any correspondence with the provinces, we shall have to obtain their consent.

Mr. Speaker: Carried.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SATURDAY SITTINGS ON AND AFTER JUNE 23

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Prime Minister) moved:

That on Saturday, June 23, 1951, and every Saturday thereafter until the end of the session, the house shall meet at eleven o'clock a.m., and the order of business and procedure shall be the same as on Thursdays.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION TO MEET CERTAIN EXPENDITURES AND GUARANTEE OF SECURITIES AND INDEBTEDNESS

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to make capital expenditures not exceeding $97,737,000, and to increase the working capital of the national railway system by $20,000,000; to provide that the governor in council may authorize the national railway system to incur commitments during 1951, in addition to the authorized expenditure, in amounts not exceeding $111,512,920; to authorize the national company to issue securities to provide amounts required for the authorized expenditures; to provide that amounts available from reserves for depreciation and debt discount amortization may be applied towards meeting the authorized expenditures; to provide that the aggregate principal amount of securities not including any securities issued to secure temporary loans made by the Minister of Finance, outstanding at any time shall not exceed $101,215,000; to authorize the governor in council to guarantee the principal and interest of the securities issued by the company for the purpose aforesaid; to authorize the Minister of Finance to make temporary loans to the said company secured by such securities and not exceeding $101,215,000 in principal amount to enable the said company to meet such expenditures and indebtedness; with authority to give financial aid and assistance to other companies of the said national system and to authorize the Minister of Finance to place at the disposal of the national company or the Trans-Canada Air Lines, such amounts as may be necessary to enable them to pay operating and income charges if at any time before the first day of July, 1952, the available revenues of the national railway system or the Trans-Canada Air Lines and subsidiaries, respectively, are not sufficient to pay such charges: Provided that all such amounts shall be reimbursed to the minister from the recipients' annual revenues in so far as such revenues are sufficient, any insufficiency to be provided for by subsequent deficit appropriation by parliament.

He said: His Excellency the Administrator, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

WHEAT

CONGESTION OF FREIGHT CARS AT HEAD OF LAKES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. It arises out of the fact that, according to reports, there are some 5,000 freight cars loaded with wheat at the head of the lakes, causing a glut of wheat at that point, and by reason of lack of transportation—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I understand, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister indicate what the situation is today in the western provinces with regard to moving this wheat, and whether he expects that the present facilities will enable the wheat to be moved before the new crop is ready?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): The hon. member was good enough to telephone my office indicating that he was going to ask this question. I have a statement which I should like to give to the house. Before doing so, however, I should like to draw the attention of the house to the fact that the last time I was asked a similar question and made a statement in answer thereto it had to do with the shortage of box cars. Strangely enough, today there are in fact too many box cars, and the difficulty is with reference to the movement of the wheat by lake carriers.

It is over a month ago, as a matter of fact on May 11, that I made a review in the house of the movement of western grain. At that time I indicated that the railways and the lake operators had met in full the requirements set down by the Canadian wheat board. The Vancouver situation had been cleaned up and grain was moving freely from the country elevators to both Vancouver and the lakehead; also the lake operators were doing their share in moving the wheat from Fort William and Port Arthur to lower lake ports in the St. Lawrence. However, in the last two or three weeks, under pressure by the steel companies, some of the lake operators have diverted their ships from the grain trade to the ore trade to fulfil the requirements of our steel mills.

On June 6 the special committee which I appointed, and whose responsibility it is to see that the requirements of the wheat board are met by our transportation agencies, held a meeting and made a full review of the situation prevailing at that time. Pressure was brought to bear on the lake operators, and an undertaking has been given by them to the committee to divert into the grain trade all the ships necessary to take care of the situation which has developed at the lakehead in recent weeks. This situation, naturally, has been caused by the fact that the railways have maintained the tempo of the car loadings at the country elevators, and there has not been sufficient space in the elevators at the lakehead to unload daily the cars delivered by our two railways. The operators met with the wheat board and the grain brokers at the lakehead on Monday of last week, and have given promise to move 16 million bushels before June 23. The grain committee feels that as an immediate step this should take care of the present unfavourable position at the lakehead.

Mr. Wright: Will the action which has now been taken move all the grain which is in the country elevators and on the farms at the present time by the first of August?

Mr. Chevrier: The statement that I made dealt particularly with the movement of grain from the lakehead on ships, and not the movement from country elevators to the lakehead, which is satisfactory.

Mr. Wright: The question I am asking is whether the movement of 16 million bushels from the head of the lakes by June 23, as the minister indicated, will leave sufficient space at the head of the lakes to take care of all the grain in country elevators and on the farms at the present time?

Mr. Chevrier: I understand it will, until June 23.

OIL COMPANIES

LEASING OF FILLING STATIONS—INCREASE IN RENTALS SUBJECT TO APPLICATION OF CERTAIN RESTRICTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): I should like to address a question to the appropriate minister, and I may say that I have not given notice thereof. Is the appropriate minister aware that during recent days one of the oil companies doing business in Ottawa, and also leasing filling stations to operators, has requested some of the operators to sign a new lease effective June 1 at an increased rental, to be put into effect if certain restrictions are made effective?

Mr. Gibson: So what?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Possibly this question comes as near to being my responsibility as that of anyone else. I was not aware of the situation, and I do not know what reference it has to the work of the federal government.

Mr. Fair: In order that the minister may have an opportunity to look into this question I will send him a letter covering it, because I believe it is a matter of unfair business practices.

MING SUNG INDUSTRIAL COMPANY

ALLEGATIONS AS TO OPERATION OF SHIPS UNDER CANADIAN FLAG IN CHINESE WATERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on Friday evening, during the discussion in regard to certain communications with respect to the operations of the Ming Sung Industrial Company, the Minister of Trade and Commerce undertook to table a letter which he read into the record at that time, and also the covering letter from the office of the Canadian trade commissioner in Hong Kong. I find these have not been tabled, and would ask the minister when that will be done.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Just as I took my seat a page came and asked for the letter, and I gave it to him. I have not seen it since, but I will try to find it and table it immediately. As a matter of fact I thought the page was taking it to the table.

Mr. Drew: I would point out that two letters—the one that was read, and the covering letter of the trade commissioner, or whoever it may have been in his office—were included in the undertaking that was given.

Mr. Howe: I will table them some time today.

Mr. Drew: In view of the fact that the discussion which was under way at the time the house adjourned Friday evening related to a subject which will come up for discussion again, I would ask the Minister of Transport whether he will give an undertaking, in order to facilitate that discussion, to table the letter or letters from his department which gave the instructions as a result of which the five ships of the Ming Sung Company were transferred to Canadian registry and exempted from the provisions of the shipping act.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I indicated that as far as the Department of Transport was concerned we had nothing to hide. When the time comes, whether it be on my estimates or on some other occasion, I will give the house all the information I have. So far as the tabling is concerned, since the discussion on Friday I have not had an opportunity of consulting the files. When I do have that opportunity I will be able to determine whether or not they should be tabled.

[Later]:

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, if I may revert to motions, I wish to lay on the table of the House of Commons a copy of a letter dated June 8, 1951, addressed to Mr. T. R. G. Fletcher, from C. C. Yang, manager of the Ming Sung Industrial Company (H.K.) Limited, and the letter of transmittal, dated June 13, 1951, from R. G. Peers, of the Roy Peers Company Limited, to Mr. John J. Deutsch.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INQUIRY AS TO DEFENCE ORDERS TO MANUFACTURERS OF MOTOR VEHICLES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): I would like to ask the Minister of Defence Production what negotiations or communications are passing between his department and the motorcar industry in Canada with a view to easing employment conditions by giving defence orders.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): There have been discussions with the motorcar companies about defence orders. Development orders have been placed with two of the companies, and it is expected that the third company will receive an order very shortly. That company is exploring the type of vehicle we wish to build, and as soon as the company indicates that it is ready to close negotiations, we will be ready. There have been discussions with one of the companies about the accumulation of cars that is taking place, but nothing conclusive has been decided.

TAX AGREEMENTS

CANADA-SWEDEN—INCOME TAX—APPROVAL OF AGREEMENT SIGNED AT OTTAWA, APRIL 6, 1951

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue) moved the second reading of Bill No. 372, respecting an income tax agreement between Canada and Sweden.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Will the minister please explain this?

Mr. McCann: I suggest that it might expedite matters if I were to make the statement when we go into committee. I do not think there will be much discussion as to the principle, and when we are in committee I can give the statement and we can deal with the different sections of the bill, and with the schedules, which are the most important part of it.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. McCann: The purpose of this bill is to give legal effect in Canada to the agreement between the government of Canada and the royal government of Sweden, for the avoidance of double taxation and the establishment of rules for reciprocal fiscal assistance in the matter of income taxes, which was signed at Ottawa on April 6 last.

This agreement, in line with similar agreements we already have with the United States, the United Kingdom and New Zealand, has as its purpose the avoidance of double taxation in respect of trading profits, dividends, interest, and royalty payments flowing between Sweden and Canada. It systematizes taxes imposed on other types of income, including salaries, pensions and annuities which might be taxable in both countries.

Provision is made for tax credit, and for the exchange of information. Article III provides that one country will only tax the industrial and commercial profits of an enterprise of the other country if it has a permanent establishment in that country.

Article VI provides that the withholding tax on dividends will not exceed 15 per cent, or in the case of wholly owned subsidiaries, 5 per cent. Under article XV each country agrees to grant a tax credit for the tax on the dividends withheld by the country of source, or the exemption of such income from taxation.

Article IX provides that remuneration paid by the government of a country for services rendered to that government in the discharge of governmental functions shall be exempt from tax in the other country. Article X provides that an individual who is a resident of one country performing services for or on behalf of a person resident in that country shall be exempt from tax in the other country if he is present there for a period or periods not exceeding 183 days. This rule does not apply to public entertainers.

[Mr. McCann.]

Article XV provides that Canada will get a tax credit for tax paid in Sweden in respect of income having its source in Sweden. Since Sweden has not adopted the system of tax credits, it agrees to give relief by way of exemption from taxation so as to make the relief reciprocal.

Article XVIII provides for the exchange of information.

As I have indicated, this agreement follows the pattern of the agreements Canada already has with the United States, the United Kingdom and New Zealand.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I noticed that the minister used two phrases in comparing this agreement with those already in existence which have been tested and, I think, proved by time. He said it was in line with similar agreements with the United States, the United Kingdom and New Zealand, and then he said it followed the pattern. Will the minister be a little more specific? Can he say that it is precisely the same; or if it is not, can he indicate in what ways it is different?

Mr. McCann: In general they are the same. There may be some differences in small details, but they follow the same general pattern as the agreements we already have. The principles involved are the same; they are, of course, the avoidance of double taxation and the establishment of rules for reciprocal fiscal assistance in the matter of income tax. Then it goes into a little further detail. The agreement, in line with other similar agreements, has as its purpose the avoidance of double taxation in respect of trading profits, dividends, interest and royalty payments flowing between Sweden and Canada. It systematizes the taxes imposed on other types of income, including salaries, pensions, and annuities which might be taxable in both countries. Provision is made for tax credits, and for an exchange of information. I do not know that I can point out in detail just the differences, if there are any, with reference to each of the different types of tax mentioned, but the principles followed are precisely the same with reference to the generality of the agreement.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I really cannot ask the minister to say that every "i" is dotted in the same way. He has said the principles followed are precisely the same. We are getting the same benefits and giving the same concessions, substantially?

Mr. McCann: Substantially, that is right.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): What is the total amount involved?

Mr. McCann: This is a new agreement, and it would be impossible at this stage to give the total amount of money involved.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Let me change the form of my question a little. Have we no indication at all, from our previous contacts with New Zealand nationals or with our own nationals with investments in Sweden, whether the amount involved is comparatively trivial, or whether it is large? In addition to that, are there any large corporation interests involved?

Mr. McCann: I am informed there are no large corporations involved. We are not giving up any revenue under our system of tax credits.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Can the minister not give any illustrative figure? Can he say whether it involves incomes of $20 million, $30 million or $50 million? It would be interesting to know roughly the magnitude of the thing with which we are dealing.

Mr. McCann: At the time the agreement was made, there was an examination of the different accounts. At that time something less than $100,000 was involved. What has occurred since then I am not prepared to state.

Mr. Adamson: Are there any other agreements, or does this agreement include succession duties?

Mr. McCann: We have not negotiated any succession duty convention with Sweden as yet.

Mr. Adamson: I bring that up, Mr. Chairman, because the question of succession duties, particularly for those holding securities abroad, is one to which the government should give earnest attention. Double succession duties can be even more unfair on the Canadian taxpayer than double income taxes. Can the minister say with what countries we have succession duty conventions?

Mr. McCann: If the hon. member will look at the order paper he will see that the next bill, No. 373, is an act respecting succession duty conventions between Canada and France. We have also succession duty agreements with the United Kingdom and the United States. The succession duty agreement with France will be the third.

Mr. Fleming: The agreement provides for its ratification on the part of Sweden by His Majesty the King of Sweden, subject to the consent of the riksdag. Has Sweden ratified this agreement in that manner, and when?

Mr. McCann: Yes; it was ratified on May 16 by the Swedish parliament.

Mr. Noseworthy: There is a question on article XII, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. McCann: Might I suggest that we pass the sections of this bill and then consider the schedule? We can give the explanation of any of the articles at that time.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 and 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Orders and regulations.

Mr. Fleming: I presume that the orders and regulations issued by the minister under the provisions of this article will be tabled in the house, because they are to have the power of law. Under the provisions of the article they can have the effect of overriding inconsistent enactments.

Mr. McCann: They will come under the Regulations Act and be tabled.

Section agreed to.

Section 5 agreed to.

On the schedule.

Mr. Noseworthy: I notice that article XII speaks of professors or teachers at the university level. Does that take in secondary schools, or only schools above the secondary school level? What is the position of a public or secondary schoolteacher on exchange?

Mr. McCann: These articles are for the purpose of fostering cultural interests between the two countries. Professors or teachers from one country will be exempt from tax while visiting other countries for a period not exceeding two years. Students and apprentices from one country receiving education or training in the other will be exempt from tax in that country on payments received from home for maintenance, education or training. In this agreement it includes professors at universities, but the hon. member spoke of secondary schoolteachers. Sweden would not agree to that.

Mr. Speaker: When shall this bill be read a third time?

Mr. McCann: Now.

Mr. McCann moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Canada-France—Succession Duties

CANADA-FRANCE—SUCCESSION DUTY—APPROVAL OF CONVENTION AND PROTOCOL SIGNED AT PARIS, MARCH 16, 1951

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue) moved the second reading of Bill No. 373, respecting a succession duty convention and protocol between Canada and France.

He said: May I suggest that we follow the same procedure as in the case of the first bill, and I shall make a statement in the committee stage?

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this bill is to approve, and to declare as having the force of law in Canada, the convention between the Canadian government and the French government for the avoidance of double taxation and the prevention of fiscal evasion with respect to succession duties. The convention is set out as a schedule of the bill.

As the committee knows, we now have succession duty conventions with the United States and the United Kingdom. These have been followed as patterns in the negotiations with France. I might mention, incidentally, that these negotiations started in 1947 and the agreement was signed only in March of this year. The main purpose of this agreement is to provide for a tax credit and for exchange of information.

Article 5 provides that the country of domicile will allow credit against its duty in respect of property taxed by both countries. This credit is the lesser of either (a) its own tax on such property, or (b) the tax of the other country on the same property. This is similar to the provisions in the agreements between Canada and the United Kingdom and Canada and the United States.

Article 7 provides that the two countries will exchange information so that each will be advised of the death of its domiciled decedents and of the composition of their estates. Furthermore, each country will be advised of the composition of estates of persons domiciled in the other country, who have property situated in the first country. This is similar to the arrangements existing with the United States and the United Kingdom. The protocol outlines what assets each country respectively will expect to receive information about from the other.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): This succession duty agreement with France follows the general lines which have been followed and found satisfactory with the other countries the minister has mentioned. The principles are the same. Have any difficulties arisen with regard to the exchange of information? What I mean is this. We are broadening the thing out now to go into a country like France. Have any difficulties been raised by Canadian citizens, or are there any which have been discovered in the administration of the existing arrangements?

Mr. McCann: I can state that this bill follows substantially similar bills which we have with other countries, and that no difficulties have arisen with reference to the points raised by the hon. member for Greenwood.

Mr. Fleming: Will the minister indicate what steps have been taken on behalf of France to ratify and to give the force of law to the agreements?

Mr. McCann: They are waiting until we have our agreement approved by statute, until the joint agreement becomes operative.

Mr. Fleming: In other words, as to actual ratification, I gather that no step has been taken on behalf of France. They are waiting for this step that is being taken here today.

Mr. McCann: So far as our information goes, we do not know that they have to have parliamentary authority to ratify it.

CANADA-FRANCE—INCOME TAX—APPROVAL OF CONVENTION SIGNED AT PARIS, MARCH 16, 1951

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue) moved the second reading of Bill No. 374, respecting an income tax convention between Canada and France.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. McCann: Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this bill is to approve and declare as having the force of law in Canada the convention between the government of Canada and the government of the French republic for the avoidance of double taxation and the prevention of fiscal evasion with respect to taxes on income.

This agreement follows the pattern of the agreements which Canada already has with the United States, the United Kingdom and New Zealand.

I have already indicated in my statement on Bill No. 372 the general purpose of such an agreement. I might, therefore, confine my remarks to referring to the important sections of this particular agreement.

Article 4 provides that an enterprise of one country will be subject to tax in the other country on its industrial and commercial profits to the extent that these are attributable to its permanent establishment in the other country.

Paragraph II of article 7 is of particular interest to Canadian companies which have operated in France through wholly-owned subsidiaries. Under these circumstances, there was a tax imposed by France on the profits of subsidiary companies operating there, and another tax on the dividends distributed by a subsidiary company to its Canadian parent. There was also imposed by the French authorities a tax on the Canadian parent company when the latter declared a dividend, a part of which was considered to be the distribution of profits earned in France by reason of the Canadian company's interest in the French subsidiary. Under paragraph II of article 7, France will no longer collect this third tax, so that a Canadian parent company will not be subject to tax on the dividends it pays by reason of its participation in a subsidiary company in France.

Article 9 provides that the salaries paid by one government to its officials who reside in the other state for the purpose of fulfilling their duties will be exempt from tax in such foreign state.

Article 10 provides that the remuneration of those other than government officials will be taxed in the country in which they are employed, unless such employment is merely temporary.

Article 16 provides for the avoidance of double taxation on the types of income therein described by means of tax credits or exemption from tax.

Article 19 provides for the exchange of information.

As I have already indicated, the agreement follows the pattern that has been set by the previous agreements with the other countries I have already mentioned, and the agreements are substantially the same.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Just on that last point I should like to ask the minister a question. This looks like a much more detailed and complicated agreement than the one with Sweden. I am going to refer in a moment particularly to paragraph II of article 7, but can we say in general that the provisions included here—it is an extensive agreement—have been used and tested in our agreements with the United States, the United Kingdom and others which have been in existence for some time?

Mr. McCann: Paragraph II of article 7 is of particular interest to Canadian companies which have operated in France through wholly owned subsidiaries. Under these circumstances there was a tax imposed by France on the profits of the subsidiary company operating there, and another tax on the dividends distributed by the subsidiary company to its Canadian parent. There was also imposed by the French authorities a tax on the Canadian parent company when the Canadian parent company declared a dividend, a part of which was considered to be a distribution of profit earned in France by reason of the Canadian company's interest in the French subsidiary. Under article 7 of the agreement—and this is the important part—France will no longer collect this third tax, so that the Canadian parent company will not be subject to tax on the dividends which it passes by reason of its participation in a subsidiary company in France.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): That sounds satisfactory and convincing up to a point, but I should like to ask the minister another question. The wording of the last part of paragraph II of article 7 seems so vague and so capable of rather extensive application that I want to read it:

> The profits distributed by this latter company and subject to the proportional tax on income derived from securities, will, if necessary, be increased, for the purpose of establishing the basis of the tax, by all the profits or advantages which the former company may have received indirectly from the latter company in the circumstances provided by article 5 above.

The words: "if necessary" and "profits or advantages," and the word "indirectly," all seem to me to be capable of creating difficulties in interpretation. That is what leads me to ask the minister whether in fact this is a clause which has stood the test of time, or whether it is new or exploratory.

Mr. McCann: France agreed to eliminate this third tax, but it has insisted upon this particular reservation so that it would tax the subsidiary company, that is, the second tax.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): At this stage I do not suppose there is much point in having more to say about it, but I must say it seems to me to be full of possibilities for the ingenuity of different interpretations. However, at the moment it does not seem worth while to press it further.

Mr. Fleming: Coming back to the question of ratification on behalf of France, I presume the position with respect to this bill is the same as with respect to Bill No. 373. From the minister's answer I was not quite clear as to what the opinion of the Canadian government is with regard to steps which should be taken on behalf of France to constitute ratification by France. Both agreements—that is, the agreements which are schedules to Bills Nos. 373 and 374—provide that agreement in each case shall come into effect on a date to be agreed upon by the governments. I wish the minister would indicate what date is agreed upon or in contemplation for bringing both these agreements into effect. Can he enlarge on his answer given on the previous bill on the subject of the method of ratification by France?

Mr. McCann: It is a difference of procedure and authority. I understand that so far as France is concerned, their executive or their cabinet have the authority to put this agreement into effect. Here the procedure is different; it has to come before parliament and be given statutory effect by parliament. Therefore it is a question of who has the authority. Our understanding is that their executive body, which corresponds to our cabinet, authorizes it.

So far as the date is concerned, it is still a question for their executive authority to indicate the date on which they wish it to come into effect.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

On the schedule.

Mr. Noseworthy: I should like to ask a question about article 14. This is the article which refers to the liberal professions. I take it that teachers or professional people, Canadians, working in France, are taxed in France, and vice versa; is that correct?

Mr. McCann: Yes, professional people, teachers and professors, will be taxed in the country where they carry on their activities. If this income is taxable in Canada, France will allow a tax credit; if it were the other way around we would allow a tax credit. That is the reciprocity in it. They do not have to pay double if they get the tax credit. A Canadian teacher over in France, if he were taxed there on his Canadian income, would get a tax credit for the amount of tax that he has to pay, and vice versa.

Mr. Noseworthy: What is the position of Canadian teachers on exchange with France where the salaries are paid by the Canadian school authorities? Are they taxed in France or in Canada?

Mr. McCann: If they were teaching in France, they would be taxed, if they were earning income there.

Mr. Noseworthy: Where the French tax does not correspond to what the Canadian tax would be, they are taxed in Canada for the difference?

Mr. McCann: That would be right. They would be taxed in Canada on their world income. If the amount of tax that they paid in Canada was not equal to the amount of tax that they paid in France, they would have to pay the difference between that amount and the amount to be paid, but they get a credit for the amount of tax that they pay in the country in which they are carrying on their teaching or student activities.

Mr. Adamson: Only if they have a Canadian income. Surely the income derived from their work in France is not subject to tax in Canada, is it?

Mr. McCann: No; this provides for people who have two incomes.

Mr. Adamson: Exchange, yes.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR CONSTRUCTION OF LINE FROM SHERRIDON TO LYNN LAKE, MAN.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 376, respecting the construction of a line of railway by the Canadian National Railway Company from Sherridon to Lynn Lake in the province of Manitoba.

Mr. Green: Is it the intention of the Minister of Transport to make a statement?

Mr. Chevrier: On the resolution I dealt with the reasons for the construction of this line. I need not repeat what I said at that time, but briefly perhaps I should summarize the essential features of this bill. They can be divided into four parts.

First, the Canadian National Railways has agreed, subject to the approval of parliament, to construct a line a distance of 155 miles from Sherridon in the province of Manitoba to Lynn lake in the same province. The cost of the line is to be $14,725,000, $10 million of which is to be financed by the Canadian National Railways and the remainder by the government.

The Canadian National Railways has entered into an agreement with Sherritt Gordon, the main features of which are as follows: Sherritt Gordon will build the necessary plant and other buildings required to develop the mine, together with a concentrator capable of concentrating 2,000 tons of ore per day. Sherritt Gordon will also build a refinery at Edmonton for the purpose of taking care of the concentrates of nickel.

After the completion of the line the company will agree to pay Canadian National Railways $350,000 a year for a period of twenty years. Then the mining company agrees to locate its plant upon the line of Canadian National Railways and ship its production and products over the C.N.R. line. On the other hand, Canadian National Railways agrees to build a line which will be ready for operation by November 1, 1953. It agrees also to operate it in accordance with the traffic and the needs of the traffic prevailing in the area. The railway further agrees that after it has carried an amount of traffic equivalent to 1,880,000 tons of outgoing traffic it will pay Sherritt Gordon mines $2.25 per ton in excess of the 1,880,000 tons until the sum of $5 million has been paid. Canadian National Railways has an agreement or undertaking from the government that any amount in excess of $10 million will be paid by the government, and that amount is estimated at $4,725,000.

The whole reason for the construction is the mineral development that has been found in the area contiguous to Lynn lake in the province of Manitoba. In 1937 Sherritt Gordon Mines Limited began a large scale program of exploration work in the area of the Pre-Cambrian lavas north of Granville lake in northern Manitoba. The result of this work was discovery of gold made at Lasthope lake in 1938 and the discovery of nickel and copper sulphides in small outcroppings near Lynn lake in 1940. Since that time the exploratory work has been going on, and in fact up until the end of 1950 the exploration and development work of Sherritt Gordon has been going on and there has been established the presence of eleven sulphide bodies containing, above a depth of 1,700 feet, a total of 14 million tons of nickel-copper deposits.

Metallurgical tests have indicated that copper concentrate and a nickel concentrate of a satisfactory grade and recovery can be made by treating the nickel-copper sulphides in a flotation mill. The copper concentrates would be shipped to the Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting Company at Flin Flon, and the nickel concentrates would be treated in the proposed ammonia leaching plant to be constructed at Edmonton, Alberta.

The Sherritt Gordon discoveries became generally known during the winter of 1946-47, and a large number of claims were staked by various companies and interests, both large and small, in that area. At the present time the only known mineralized bodies of significance are on claims held by Sherritt Gordon. During the past four years Sherritt Gordon has established the presence of the nickel-copper ore bodies which I have mentioned, and a shaft has been sunk to a depth of 1,024 feet. Mineralized bodies have been investigated underground, but the development work has now ceased pending the completion of plans for production, namely, the construction of the railroad. These deposits cannot be taken out of that area until the railroad is constructed.

I should like to bring to the attention of the house the necessity of speed of construction. It is of the greatest importance. Time is of the essence. Everything must be in readiness by October, 1953, at which time the railway company has undertaken to have its line ready for operation. As a matter of fact, the date is November 1, 1953. That is why there is a need for speed in the construction. As hon. members who come from that area know, the period during which construction work can be carried on is a limited one, a matter of some months, so that the railway company will have to move quickly and expeditiously if this line is to be completed by November 1, 1953.

As I indicated in the earlier discussion on the resolution, when debate is completed on the second reading of the bill I propose to move that it be referred to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines for further study.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, the members of the official opposition believe that this mining development is of great importance, and we support this bill which will provide for the construction of a railroad line by Canadian National Railway Company from Sherridon to Lynn lake in northern Manitoba.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) has given the house something of the interesting story behind this project. Apparently large reserves of nickel and copper and cobalt have been discovered at Lynn lake. Under present conditions these are classed as strategic minerals. The minister stated that the government of Canada is paying direct whatever is required to construct this railroad line over $10 million. During the discussion of the estimates of the Department of Defence Production the minister of that department indicated that this amount was estimated at $4,725,000, and was to be given by way of direct capital assistance from his department on the ground that this is defence production. We do not quarrel with such an expenditure under those conditions.

As hon. members know, Sherritt Gordon Mines Limited has been and is a very enterprising company. The annual report for last year shows that at present metal prices the gross value of the recoverable nickel and copper in the ore reserves at Lynn lake amounts to over $175 million—that is without completing the exploration work. It is hoped that there is a great deal more ore there than the amount already found. The report also indicates that the plan of development is to produce approximately 17 million pounds of refined nickel metal per year, 9 million pounds of copper, 300,000 pounds of cobalt and 70,000 tons of ammonium sulphate fertilizer.

We are also very much interested in the fact that the company has a market available for these products. The report sets out that a contract has been made with the stockpiling agency of the United States government for the sale of a substantial portion of the anticipated nickel, copper and cobalt output for the first five years of production. It also indicates that contracts have been made with four of the large nickel consumers among the United States steel producers covering the balance of the nickel and cobalt output for the same period. Apparently the company does not expect any difficulty in disposing of the ammonium sulphate fertilizer and the balance of the copper production at prevailing prices.

They are planning to spend on this development something over $28 million. That amount is over and above the cost of the railway, as I understand it, so that this is a very substantial development.

We are glad to see that they are going to take the nickel concentrates to the vicinity of Edmonton for refining there by natural gas. In recent years members have heard a great deal of talk in this house about natural gas. Here is a case where a large mining company is taking its product to Alberta because natural gas is available there. So far as I know, this is one of the first cases in which that has been done, and it will mean a great deal for the province of Alberta and of course for the dominion at large.

[Mr. Green.]

We believe strongly that northern Canada holds the key to the future greatness of this country. Naturally we are very glad to see the developments in northern Quebec and Labrador, where they are opening iron properties. In northern Ontario, you will remember, Mr. Speaker, the great discoveries in the Cobalt area when we were younger than we are now, but still in this present century. Then there were the subsequent gold developments which led to a tremendous increase in the wealth of Ontario and of the whole of Canada. Now we have a similar development in northern Manitoba, and also the finding of uranium ore in northern Saskatchewan. I believe that if a young Canadian were asking for advice today he could be very well told to "go north, young man," just as many years ago young Americans were told to go west. Personally I think the future of Canada depends on how rapidly and efficiently we open up the north country.

There is one thing we do not understand about the bill, and that is the form in which it is drawn. There is no mention whatever of the agreement between Canadian National Railway Company and Sherritt Gordon Mines Limited. In fact there is no mention of the company in the bill at all. Nor is there any mention of the Department of Defence Production. We find that the mileage is to be 155, that the cost is to be $14,725,000, and that the average cost per mile is to be $95,000 with the power to spend fifteen per cent over that figure. But a person reading the bill and then listening to the explanation of the Minister of Transport would think that he had the wrong bill.

Mr. Chevrier: That he had what?

Mr. Green: It may be that the bill is in the proper legal form, but I think the agreement should be mentioned therein and should be made a schedule thereto. Without the agreement between the mining company and Canadian National Railway Company there is no justification for a railway. This is not the ordinary case of the construction of a railway. This is a special case in which a company is involved and is willing to pay several million dollars to Canadian National Railway Company. I believe that there should be some mention of the mining company in the bill, and that the whole agreement should be made a schedule to the bill.

I presume that the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines will be considering the measure within the next day or two, and I urge upon the minister that in the meantime some thought be given to amending the bill in the committee so that the whole picture will appear. It is hard enough to understand statutes even when they are carefully drawn, but in this particular case one would be like a babe in the woods in trying to find out from the bill what is actually taking place. I repeat that we hope the minister will give some thought to inserting terms in the bill which will make its purpose much clearer than it is at the present time.

Mr. G. M. Murray (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I merely wish to say that we in northern British Columbia are very enthusiastic about the development that is taking place in northern Manitoba, because we have the same problems in northern British Columbia as they have in northern Manitoba. I think the extension of Canadian National Railways in that region will merely be a pattern which will later be followed in British Columbia. I am sure the minister will agree it is high time that he extended the Northern Alberta Railways westward into the fertile wheat fields, the oil fields, and to that region where there is also coal and lumber. As the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) has said, these developments are good for the whole of Canada. At Lynn lake you have an industry which will help other industries. The farming industry, for instance, will have a market there. The smelter will produce commercial fertilizer which will be so necessary in that part of Canada. That region is not very far from a fertile farming area, as members from Saskatchewan and Manitoba can tell us.

The country needs population. Of course this is a defence project, but I believe that the feeling in that northern country, where there is fertile land and white settlers, is that extending these railroads is an essential part of our defence program.

I would point out to the minister that we need a railway beyond there, to connect Vancouver with Alaska. This very day, labour trouble on the Pacific coast is tying up all our coastal shipping, so that the great military establishments of Alaska are cut off from both the United States mainland and British Columbia so far as water is concerned. So we are back in the traditional Liberal atmosphere now, with new railways being projected and carried forward into the very richest parts of this continent.

Mr. G. D. Weaver (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to take up much of the time of the house this morning, but I feel I should say a few words on this bill, because the construction of this railway is a matter of vital interest to a large number of my constituents.

The Sherritt Gordon mine went into operation in 1930, and the mine at Sherridon is now worked out. In the last few years the new mine at Lynn lake has been developed; and the closing down of the old mine and the opening of the new have been beautifully co-ordinated so that it requires only this railway to complete the whole project. The old mine will shut down some time this fall, and the surface mining equipment, including the concentrator, will be dismantled and taken over winter roads 150 odd miles to Lynn lake by caterpillar tractors. A large number of the houses of the town will be transported north in the same way. The concentrator will be set up, and when the railway reaches there in 1953 they will be all ready to transport the concentrates to the new refinery at Edmonton.

On a previous occasion I gave the house some figures to illustrate just what an operation of this kind means to the Canadian economy. The mine at Flin Flon came into operation in 1930 with ore reserves of approximately 19 million tons. Now, twenty-one years later, Flin Flon is a town of 12,000 people, and last year produced $40 million worth of metals. At the present time it still has ore reserves amounting to 19 million tons. In 1949 it paid into the federal treasury in ore royalties and direct taxes some $5,500,000, almost the amount now being paid out of the federal treasury to construct the line to the new operation. In indirect taxes the mine paid in the neighbourhood of a million and a half. In proportion to population these payments in taxes amount to about five times the national average. In the last twenty-one years approximately $450 million worth of metals have been produced at the Flin Flon mines. There is a factor to be added to primary production to reach the gross national product attributable to that production, and that factor has been worked out at approximately two and a half. The minister gave the production from this new development as approximately $14 million a year for the next twenty years, or a total of $280 million. Multiplying that by the factor of two and a half gives you an increase in the gross national product of the Canadian economy in the next twenty years of approximately $700 million.

The amount being paid from the federal treasury for this development is only five-sevenths of one per cent of that $700 million, and those figures do not take into account the value of the ore that may lie beyond the last drillhead. In working out the economics of a proposition such as this you cannot go beyond the last drillhead because there is always the distinct possibility that there is no ore beyond that; but you do not know until the drill has been pushed through. In the case of the Flin Flon mine, as I have shown, we have mined three times the ore that was blocked out at the time the operation started. Therefore it is reasonable to suppose that a considerable amount of ore lies beyond the last drillhead, and that the addition to the gross national product may be three times the figure I have mentioned.

Some hon. members have raised the point that the mine at Lynn lake will be the only source of revenue for this railroad. I would point out that in northern Manitoba we have a very large fresh water fishing industry. Some ninety-five per cent of that fish goes to the United States and brings in United States dollars. Last year in the neighbourhood of six million pounds of fish were taken in northern Manitoba. The greater part of that fish comes in by tractor train over winter roads to the present railhead. This railway will move that frontier back approximately 150 miles, thus benefiting all the fishermen in northern Manitoba.

No doubt hon. members are also aware of a recent article in the New York Times referring to uranium deposits at Black lake in northern Saskatchewan, in which it was mentioned that railway facilities would be required. I would point out that if this railway were eventually extended from Lynn lake to lac du Brochet, around north of Reindeer lake and Wollaston lake, it is the logical line to be extended to the vicinity of Black lake. From there it is only a short jump to lake Athabasca, Hay river and Great Slave lake, and from there it is still only a short jump to the Mackenzie valley and across to the Yukon and Alaska, covering the area just mentioned by the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Murray). Another point in that connection is that this line would run completely through the great Canadian shield, which, as everyone knows, is the greatest source of minerals in the world, and which is the foundation for Canada's greatness in the years ahead.

Therefore I do not look upon this proposed extension as a railway for Lynn lake only. This is really for the development of Canada, and the Lynn lake mine is merely the spark justifying that development economically at the present time. I want to commend the Canadian National Railways for being prepared to undertake this operation, and I would like also to commend the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) for being prepared to recommend this operation to his colleagues and through them to parliament and through parliament to the people of Canada. His faith in our northern country will not be misplaced.

[Mr. Weaver.]

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): My colleague from Manitoba who preceded me has given a pretty good description of what this railway means to our province. I want to assure him and the minister that we who live in the south are wholeheartedly behind this project. We know the tremendous benefit it will bring to the north, and you cannot benefit the north without benefiting the south at the same time. I have had the pleasure of being up in that northern country, and I know the tremendous amounts of fish caught there. We can do with some good fish in the south, though we have our lakes there also.

As the hon. member has said, this development will establish a new frontier, and will mean a great deal to everyone in our province. I congratulate the minister upon pushing this measure forward, and I am sure it will prove to be of benefit not only to Manitoba but to the whole of Canada.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Mr. Speaker, I want to point out one thing to the minister. I am wholeheartedly in favour of this bill. The reason for the discovery of these nickel properties is that the original prospectors were looking for gold. This is just another example, therefore, of the usefulness of gold to the development of our country. Gold is the magnet which draws prospectors into the north. Gold is the magnet which is responsible for the development of other metals in our country. The original discoveries of the various mines in northern Quebec and around Noranda and Rouyn were the result of the search for gold. Gold has been and still is the main metal of our mining development, and this Lynn lake discovery is merely an example of its power to push back the frontier.

There is another thing that has made the development of this property possible, and that is the tremendously important work being done by Canadian scientists, many of them in the department of mines, with regard to geophysical surveys. Without the geophysical survey method it is doubtful—I believe "doubtful" is the right word—whether this property would have been developed as quickly as it has been. Possibly it might not have been developed at all. The geophysical method established what is known as the anomalies, and showed that there were large deposits of metal or substances heavier than the normal rock. The diamond drills definitely proved these deposits. First you have gold bringing the prospectors. Then you have the scientists, the geophysicists who showed that there was a body of different mineral there. Then you have the mining engineer who proved the property; then the capitalist and miner who developed the mine. It is all one Canadian team which has done this job.

With regard to the whole railway question, Mr. Speaker, I expect that the profits which will eventually accrue to the Canadian people through the development of our mineral resources in northern Manitoba, Saskatchewan and possibly the Northwest Territories will be a far greater source of revenue to the railways than those obtained from developing the port of Churchill, probably many times more, and in this way will prove the wisdom of constructing the Hudson Bay railway.

It will do one more thing which we must bear in mind. It will show that the western provinces have an enormous potential so far as mining is concerned. We used to think of the three western provinces as being tied to a wheat economy. The disasters which resulted from trying to run that great area on a one-crop economy have in the past brought financial problems and despair. In my opinion, this development of the rocks of the prairies will prove to be of greater value in the next quarter century than the wheat economy for the same period.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

RETURNED SOLDIERS INSURANCE ACT

PROVISIONS WITH RESPECT TO BENEFICIARY RESTRICTIONS, APPORTIONMENT OF INSURANCE, ETC.

The house resumed, from Wednesday, June 6, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Lapointe—Mr. Dion in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Returned Soldiers Insurance Act for the following purposes:

To strike out from the act certain parts that no longer apply due to the fact that the time of taking out new contracts of insurance has expired;

To increase the amount of insurance moneys payable under the policy at the time of death of the insured;

To reduce to some extent administration difficulties now found in the act and to bring the act more in line with the Veterans Insurance Act in the matter of beneficiary restrictions and particularly in the manner of changing of beneficiaries and altering mode of apportionment of insurance;

To remove certain restrictions respecting the payment of insurance benefits to the estate of the insured; and

To waive premiums on life contracts when the insured reaches his eighty-fifth birthday.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May we have a statement on this matter?

Mr. Mutch: When this resolution was introduced on June 6, the minister made certain explanatory remarks with respect to it. Hon. members will recall that he said this is the original Returned Soldiers Insurance Act which was passed at the end of world war I. The amendments contained in the bill are basically to delete certain parts of the act which are no longer operative and to bring it in line with a similar act dealing with the second world war. It is proposed to send the bill to the committee on veterans affairs for study.

There is nothing much I can add at the moment to what the minister said when the resolution was introduced. The main financial change is to make it possible to pay $2,000 rather than $1,000 on the face value of the policy, which conforms with the proposal in the second bill, and to continue paying the balance of the contract on an annuity basis.

Mr. Wright: The resolution states that the purpose of the bill is to remove certain restrictions respecting the payment of insurance benefits to the estate of the insured. I have had some correspondence with people who have been insured under the old Returned Soldiers Insurance Act and who were having difficulties with respect to this particular matter. Can the parliamentary assistant give us some explanation of just what is contemplated under this change?

Mr. Mutch: The main change is the one I mentioned a moment ago, that whereas it is at present possible to pay only $1,000 in cash and the balance of a contract in the form of an annuity over a period of years, it is now proposed to pay $2,000 in the original payment. That is the principal one. The second change affecting payment is that some of these contracts were on the pay-life basis. It is now proposed that all payments shall terminate at the age of eighty-five, on the pay-life contracts.

One other change that I should perhaps mention is this. There has been some little difficulty in dealing with the total disability clause, and it is proposed to make it conform to the bill which recently went through this house declaring that in the case where total disability is for one year, it is presumed to be permanent.

Mr. Herridge: It is intended to increase the amount payable at death from $1,000 to $2,000. Is that intention based on the government's appreciation of the fact that the dollar is worth only fifty cents?

Mr. Mutch: The former statement is correct.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No. On June 6 I asked the minister a question which is reported at page 3791 of Hansard as follows:

I should like to ask the minister if he will give us some figures showing just what has been the extent of the operations under the Returned Soldiers Insurance Act which, I understand, affected the situation after the first war, and also what has been the extent of the operations of a similar kind since the second war.

I realize that the matter will come before the special committee, but I think it will be interesting for the committee of the whole to have these figures before the bill to be based on the resolution goes to the special committee.

Mr. Mutch: As to that, Mr. Chairman, may I say that I was not present in the committee of the whole when the questions were asked, and I did not ask for the information so as to bring it with me today. I was not aware that it had been asked for in the committee of the whole. When the bill is before the special committee, however, the administrator of the act will be present and will be prepared to answer questions. I should point out that the committee uses Hansard, and that there will be an opportunity again in the house for members to satisfy themselves with respect to it. I might point out that the special committee has now concluded its deliberations, with the exception of these insurance bills, and is waiting for this one to be referred to it. I am sorry that I did not have the figures available this morning.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (for the Minister of Veterans Affairs) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 389, to amend the Returned Soldiers Insurance Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: Do I understand that the house wishes that this bill be read the second time now?

Mr. Mutch: I should like to have it sent to the special committee.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Abbott (for Mr. Lapointe) moved the second reading of the bill.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am not going to object to this procedure, but it is a highly undesirable practice; unless it is a case of real emergency, I think it is a pity that consent should be asked. If consent is refused, it almost seems as if we were grudging and un-co-operative. I am not objecting to it, but I am raising this point for future consideration.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the special committee on veterans affairs.

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

MUNICIPAL GRANTS ACT

PROVISION FOR GRANTS TO MUNICIPALITIES IN LIEU OF TAXES ON CROWN PROPERTY

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide that the Minister of Finance may, out of moneys provided by parliament, make certain grants to municipalities in respect of federal property situated therein.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Should we not have a statement from the minister?

Mr. Abbott: I am in the hands of the house, Mr. Speaker. The bill which will be founded on this resolution puts into statutory form order in council P.C. 741 of February 17, 1950, which authorizes grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes on federal properties under certain circumstances.

The house will recall that for the first year —it may be two years now—we provided the necessary funds by an item in the estimates. But at the time I announced the new policy and the formula upon which these grants would be continued, I said that at the appropriate time a bill would be introduced to provide for permanent legislation for the making of these grants. I had contemplated making a brief statement on the operations of the act when the bill was called for second reading. I thought perhaps the house might like to see the bill, that I would make a brief statement on second reading and it could be discussed then. But I am quite prepared to make that statement now if the house prefers it. It seemed to me that, at this stage of the session, matters might be expedited if we got the bill before the house. But whatever the house wishes is agreeable to me.

Mr. Fleming: Let us have it now.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If it would meet with the convenience of the minister, I think we might have the statement now.

Mr. Abbott: It is quite satisfactory to me. My suggestion was just an endeavour to expedite matters. Perhaps the committee on rules will provide some help in that respect.

As I said, this bill puts into statutory form the provisions of order in council P.C. 741 of February 17, 1950, which authorizes grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes on federal properties under certain circumstances. Hon. members will recall that this new policy announced by the government in November, 1949, was given parliamentary sanction by means of a vote in the 1950-51 estimates which was governed by the provisions of the order in council to which I have referred. Both in November 1949 and during the past session I undertook to put this policy into statutory form during this session of parliament.

The policy of making grants in lieu of taxes to those municipalities in which there are abnormal concentrations of federal property has been a new venture, and, as in all new ventures, there have been some delays and a few misunderstandings during the first year of its application. I am satisfied, however, that this first year of practical experience has shown that the general principles and policies laid down have worked well and have given a large measure of satisfaction to the municipalities concerned.

The grants authorized by the bill are related to federal properties considered necessary for the functioning of government, but not including properties administered by crown corporations, commissions, boards or agencies established to perform special functions, such as the national railways, the national harbours board, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and the like. These companies, commissions, boards or agencies have been instructed to negotiate arrangements with municipalities for allowances in lieu of taxes that are fair and equitable having regard to all relevant circumstances.

The grants provided by this bill are of three kinds: ordinary grants in lieu of general and school taxes; grants which provide a measure of relief to municipalities for loss of revenue in cases where taxable property has been acquired by federal government and thus converted into tax-free property; and grants in lieu of special assessments for local improvements.

The ordinary grants are governed by the formula which I referred to in my statement of November, 1949. Under section 125 of the British North America Act no lands or property belonging to Canada are liable to taxation. This is a sound general principle, since most federal properties exist to provide a definite service to the citizens of the communities in which they are situated. We have to realize, however, that with the expansion of functions and the growing complexity of government, concentrations of government property have developed in certain municipalities, and that in many cases these federal offices or properties serve a national or regional purpose.

It would be quite impracticable to look at every piece of federal property and decide whether or to what extent it serves primarily a local function or a regional or national function. We have therefore had to fall back on the degree of concentration of federal property in a municipality, together with an appreciation of the burden which it imposes upon the municipality, as the test to be applied in arriving at a basis for ex gratia payments.

Our preliminary surveys indicated that, in total, federally owned properties constituted about four per cent of the value of all properties in the municipalities affected. We therefore took this four per cent as being "normal" and decided to base our grants in lieu of taxes on the amount by which the value of federal property exceeded four per cent of the value of all property in a municipality. The formula for ordinary grants set out in P.C. 741, and now incorporated in this bill, gives effect to this principle.

There are, of course, many types of federal property which confer obvious and substantial benefits on the local community, such as parks, museums, irrigation works, reforestation projects, breakwaters, and aids to navigation. In respect of such properties as these the government will, of course, make no ex gratia payments to the municipalities in which they are situated.

There are also provisions for appropriate reductions in the grant in cases where the burden imposed upon the cost of municipal government by a federal property is not material, or where the government does not accept from a municipality services which the municipality customarily gives to taxable properties.

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): I agree with the resolution, but I am interested in federally owned properties in the municipalities which so far at least have not been eligible to receive any of this money or these grants. I refer to a modern inland navigable canal with lands, raceways, together with buildings for weir control, bridge control, elevators, power houses, electrical buildings and so forth, which in many cases far exceed the four per cent suggested as necessary by the Minister of Finance.

Hon. members may wonder what services a municipality may have to render to a canal. I know of some municipalities where police protection has been called so often by the canal employees and by others that the canal property has become part of the regular beat by car of the municipal police. Fire departments too are on call for fires and for drownings. They maintain resuscitation equipment, small boats and grappling equipment in order to recover bodies of those drowned. A dozen calls or more a year made by a fire department during a navigation season is quite a considerable service to render to a canal, particularly when the whole fire department might be engaged in relays of four or five men each for a period of twenty-four to forty-eight hours in recovering the body of someone who has been drowned in one of the canal pondages or weirs.

In the Niagara district we have the Welland ship canal, which runs across the counties of Welland and Lincoln. It runs through the city of Welland and the towns of Port Colborne and Thorold, and several villages and townships. I admit that a fair number of people are employed in the operation of the canal, and also in the industry that has settled in the Niagara district because the canal is there. But on the other hand, many of our municipalities provide services, and they also assume much greater cost in their own operation because of the canal. I think that at least some of these costs should be assumed by the people of Canada as a whole.

With the increasing canal traffic there is much inconvenience to road and pedestrian traffic. It is acute, particularly in the city of Welland. Something better will have to be evolved to deal with this situation, which is becoming worse year by year, and it will be much aggravated when and if the St. Lawrence seaway is completed. Even now the bottleneck of traffic is very bad. I was told that in one twenty-four hour period last fall when the canal was busy the bridges were up slightly over six hours in twenty-four hours.

The city of Welland has to employ extra police to deal with this traffic. The municipalities also provide police protection to ships and to canal property generally. On frequent occasions I have seen our municipal jails and the county jails taxed to capacity by those who have violated the laws in connection with the operation of the canal. Our municipalities also provide fire-fighting services to ships and to canal property.

Our larger urban areas will require two sewage disposal plants instead of one, that is, one on each side of the canal. As hon. members know, these plants are not only expensive to build, but are costly to operate. They must also have fire-fighting equipment on each side of the canal, because of the uncertainty of being able to cross the canal on short notice. In places our townships must have two roads instead of one, a road on each side of the canal.

The present Welland canal was completed in 1931. In Port Colborne it assumed a new course. It went down through the main street. From lake Ontario to a point above Thorold it also assumed a new course in ascending the Niagara escarpment. This means that in some places we have the present canal and the remnants of other canals. Therefore in certain areas we have much crown property held in respect of these canals.

I am not too familiar with conditions existing in other municipalities, but a year ago, when these grants were first announced, I submitted a brief to the Minister of Finance, and I am sure that this brief contained many features common to other municipalities along the Welland ship canal. For instance, in Thorold, with a total area of 1,435 acres, 500 are taken up with crown lands. About 40 acres have been turned back to the town, still leaving 450 acres of crown lands. We get no local improvement assessments in connection with streets facing the canal property, and the taxpayers maintain the roads crossing the canal property.

Around 1910 and later the government expropriated streets in the towns, in which expropriation the towns acquiesced. I cannot help but pay tribute to the business acumen of the department which has charged us for water services and power lines passing under and over some of the streets that were obtained for nothing. My mind has always been given to research, and I find that certain street allowances were afterwards sold for cash, the same streets that had been expropriated for nothing. I am not complaining about this, because I know the present Minister of Transport knew nothing about it. I could only think ill of him if this condition persists.

The Welland canal is of benefit to the people of Canada as a whole, and we feel that the people of Canada as a whole should bear some of these costs. The Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario has recognized a similar condition in the neighbouring city of Niagara Falls and the adjoining township of Stamford, because they make a payment in lieu of taxes for the power canals and the power lines running through that territory.

I appeal to the Minister of Finance to include canal property in this bill and thus give consideration to the municipalities located along the Welland ship canal.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I have a few brief observations to make with reference to the resolution now under debate, which reads:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide that the Minister of Finance may, out of moneys provided by parliament, make certain grants to municipalities in respect of federal property situated therein.

This subject has been under debate in previous sessions, and I do not know that anything very new is likely to be put before the house at the present time. However, as the present resolution contemplates the introduction of a bill I should like to make a brief comment upon it.

In the first place, the idea of having a statute to deal with this matter, instead of leaving it, as has been the case hitherto, to be disposed of by order in council with a grant of money in the estimates, seems to me to be eminently sound and desirable. I for one should like to express gratification that we are now going to have this matter dealt with by statute and not by order in council. It seems to me that is a distinct advance.

In his statement this morning the minister went back to that provision of the British North America Act which exempts all federal property from taxation by the provinces or municipalities. It seems to me that the implications of that provision of our constitution have been greatly exaggerated in the minds of hon. members opposite in the light of the practices of the present day. In 1867 the functions of government were so narrow compared with the functions exercised by government today that the situation hardly admits of comparison at all. The government has extended its functions more and more widely, and with that extension of functions has gone, to a degree not foreseen by the fathers of confederation, the occupation and ownership by the federal authority, either by the crown or its agencies, of more and more property in municipalities.

I do not need to remind hon. members, many of whom have had long municipal experience before they came to this chamber, of the fact that very often in municipalities property owned and occupied by the crown in the right of the dominion, and its agencies, is frequently as valuable property as is to be found anywhere in the municipality. Neither the letter nor the spirit of that section of the British North America Act, it seems to me, has been any sufficient justification for the way in which the crown in the right of the dominion has been claiming immunity from taxation at the hands of municipalities. Year by year, decade after decade, the functions of the federal government have been extended and the occupation and ownership of property in municipalities have gone on apace.

What does the minister offer to us as the basis on which grants may be made in the future? Let us recognize at once he is not proposing that any federal agency, or the crown in the right of the dominion, should be submitted to taxation. What is proposed is a system of grants in lieu of taxation. Even in the case of incorporated crown agencies, such as those the minister mentioned this morning, the Canadian National Railways, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and others, the minister is not proposing that they should be submitted to assessment and taxation by the municipalities, but simply that they should be put in the position of negotiating grants in lieu of taxation. Of course I think it would be quite unwarrantable to expect that these agencies are going to be paying taxes in keeping with the taxes that would be paid if the same property were owned and occupied by a private corporation or person. The situation still remains a very lopsided one as far as relations between municipalities on the one hand and the crown or its agencies on the other are concerned.

The formula that the minister proposes to carry forward into a statute, as indicated this morning, is this formula of the 4 per cent, and he is treating the 4 per cent as the normal proportion of the assessment in any municipality which may be represented by property owned by the crown in the right of the dominion, or its agencies. So far as anything underneath that is concerned, he will not regard it as such a concentration as to warrant payment to the municipality of anything in lieu of taxes.

I wish to express my opinion that this is a much too rigid and ungenerous formula to meet a situation of this kind. The situation is much more serious in the case of many municipalities, and is much more precarious in some of them than such a formula will ever redress. Moreover, while I acknowledge that there will have to be some yardstick to measure the size of grant, nevertheless it seems to me that to apply one so rigid to all municipalities right across Canada, regardless of the extent of municipal functions, is going to bring hardship and discrimination. I should like to see some recognition of one or two factors as applied to the proper determination of the amount of these grants, which it seems to me are very relevant.

May I mention in the first place the fact that many of the functions of the crown in the right of the dominion, or its agencies, are revenue-producing. The minister speaks as though all that the dominion is doing is to give a service, and as the service is usually for the local benefit of the municipality or the people therein, there is no great reason why the dominion should contribute by way of a grant to the expenses of municipal government. That completely overlooks the fact that many of the functions of the federal government are revenue-producing, and I cannot see any reason why the crown should continue to claim the benefit of an archaic exemption when the functions for which it is occupying a particular property in a municipality are not merely in the nature of services but are revenue-producing functions.

In the second place, I think regard ought to be had to those functions of federal government activity which are directly competitive with the functions of certain taxpayers. Where you have the crown engaged in an activity or in the discharge of a function which brings it directly into commercial competition with a taxpayer, I do not see any reason why the crown should continue to assert its right to enforce what I have referred to as an archaic and, I think, obsolete immunity and apply it to circumstances that certainly were never foreseen by the fathers of confederation eighty-four years ago.

Let me mention one or two of these by way of example. Canadian National Railways in its functions is in many localities directly competitive with the Canadian Pacific Railway. In some of its functions the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is directly competitive with some of the privately owned stations. The minister said this morning that as to those two crown agencies, Canadian National Railways and Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, it is proposed that—

Mr. Abbott: I was speaking of all crown agencies. I simply used those two by way of illustration.

Mr. Fleming: I quite appreciate that. I am not confining my observations to those two at all. The minister indicated that as to those two, and I take it others in a similar position, they are to be free to negotiate with the municipality to make a grant to the municipality. What will be the basis upon which the grant will be arrived at we are not told. I think it is safe to say, in the light of past experience in such matters, that they will not be paying the full taxation rate that they would be paying if they were private occupants or owners of the same property in the municipality. It seems to me that in a case of that kind, where a crown agency is directly competitive with some taxpayer, there is no reason whatever to justify this continued assumption on the part of the crown of its right to exemption from municipal taxes.

[Mr. Fleming.]

On the subject that is close to the concern and thought of many hon. members, housing, I recall the experience that many municipalities had with respect to what would have been municipal taxes on housing. Both in the case of Wartime Housing Limited and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, you will recall, Mr. Speaker, that on the properties owned by these corporations, erected by them very often on land contributed by the municipality at $1 a lot, there were no taxes payable, and all that the municipality received was a small grant in lieu of taxes. That small grant in many cases, certainly in the case of the larger urban municipalities with very heavy expenses of municipal government and the heavy cost of municipal services, had the result that they did not receive more than one-third of what they would have collected from the same properties if they had been owned by private taxpayers. There cannot be any justification for the continuation of that kind of treatment of the municipalities.

The municipalities are discharging functions that are vital. When I say that I do not mean only that many of the services they provide are essential to the conduct of civilized life, such as health, education, police and fire protection, welfare services, sewage disposal, and so on; I am thinking also of the vital contribution the municipal government makes in this country to the functioning of democracy.

For many years the costs of municipal government have been soaring, but the taxation base has remained virtually unchanged. Apart from licence fees and a few trifling incidentals, that base is confined to the taxation of real estate. With the pyramiding costs of municipal government; with more and more services demanded by the people, which services in many cases can be best and most efficiently rendered by the municipal governments, since they are closest to the people, it seems to me extremely unfair that when the federal government moves in and occupies property in the municipality, that property should be exempt from taxation. Especially is that so where it is being used for such purposes as I have mentioned, those which are competitive with the interests of private taxpayers, and those which are revenue-producing. So I say we must have regard to the fact that while the cost of municipal government has been increasing by leaps and bounds, the source of revenue has been virtually frozen. Thus when properties in these municipalities are occupied by the federal government or its agencies you have situations which are fraught with the greatest danger to the solvency of the municipalities.

I express the opinion that the formula the minister is proposing to continue does not meet the requirements of the municipalities. I do not believe it is fair or adequate, nor is it based upon a realistic appreciation of the need.

In the last analysis I suppose dollars and cents count in matters of this kind. In referring to the estimates of the department I was interested in item 127, under the heading of grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes on federal property. The minister is proposing only a slight increase this year. The estimate last year was $1,655,000 while the amount parliament is being asked to appropriate for the same purpose this year is $1,845,000, an increase of $190,000. Reference to page 173 for the details shows that of this total in 1950-51 the grants to municipalities amounted to $1,600,000. This year it is estimated that they will amount to $1,800,000, an increase of only $200,000. Measuring $1,800,000 against what the municipalities of this country lose in taxes through federal occupation of property, it seems to me that even to mention figures like that reveals at once their utter inadequacy.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, while welcoming in principle a statute to deal with this matter instead of continuing the expedient followed heretofore of passing an order in council and providing an amount in the estimates, I do urge that provision to meet the legitimate claims of the municipalities ought to be on a far more adequate scale than can possibly be the case with figures like these.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I was not in the house this forenoon when the minister introduced this resolution; and since there will be a debate when the bill is introduced I wish at this time only to say that I support completely the points just made by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming). Those of us who have had experience with municipal life, and who are watching the struggle of municipal governments today to provide funds for the many things for which funds are required, must be aware of the difficulties with which most municipalities are faced. I suggest, before the bill is introduced, that there is only one fair way by which the federal government can pay money in lieu of taxation on federal property. That is, this property should be assessed the same as other property in the municipality, and the dominion government should pay its fair share of the taxes. I am quite sure that anything short of this will never meet the requirements of the municipal authorities. I suggest that would be the fairest way and really the only acceptable way to deal with this matter.

Mr. H. P. Cavers (Lincoln): I desire to say a few words in support of the case made out this morning by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan) in regard to certain lands made available to the federal government for the construction of the Welland ship canal across the Niagara peninsula. To a large extent the canals built in Canada have followed the original watercourse, but in the case of the Welland ship canal we find that the lands taken by the government cut across the face of the Niagara peninsula. These lands include many valuable fruit and farming areas, and even extend through some of the larger municipalities in that district. I refer particularly to the towns of Thorold and Port Colborne, and the city of Welland. These lands that have been taken for federal purposes are lands which otherwise would be assessable for municipal purposes. The municipalities have been deprived of their rights to levy taxes on these particular lands. The argument has been put forward that a structure such as the Welland ship canal is of great benefit to the commerce of the country, and in particular to the district in which it is located.

I believe that in addition to the great good that comes to the dominion and to the locality, the local municipalities are required to provide many services for the federal institution. One of the most costly services provided for the Welland ship canal is police protection. The northern part of the Welland ship canal passes through the township of Grantham which is in the constituency I represent. The police force maintained by the township of Grantham is, on occasion, required to spend a considerable time providing police protection for the ships, and the seamen engaged on those ships, which pass through the canal. Then, there is the matter of fire protection and life-saving services which occasion considerable expenditure. I am informed by the mayor of the city of St. Catharines that it costs the fire department $250 each time it responds to a call in the township of Grantham. It can be seen that this adds considerable expense to the municipalities concerned. In addition to that, the firemen are sometimes called to the canal for the purpose of conducting dragging operations to recover a body.

The municipalities affected are required to provide sewage disposal, and this is an additional cost. Traffic bottlenecks are created because of the canal. At Homer, on the Queen Elizabeth way, where this large traffic artery of the province of Ontario crosses the Welland canal, traffic officers are required to see that traffic moves in an orderly fashion. The same situation applies at Welland where traffic on the main street of the town is held up for many hours during the day. The same condition occurs in Port Colborne. This traffic situation comes into the picture again when municipalities are required to maintain two roads, one on either side of the canal right of way.

Something has been said about the matter of income to the federal government. I believe that the federal government does derive some income from the Welland ship canal. Within the last three or four years there has been established at Port Weller a shipbuilding plant in the drydock owned by the Department of Transport. I assume that a rental is paid. I believe it is a fine thing to have an industry of this kind, which provides employment for the people of our district, but I point this out because I believe some revenue is derived from this undertaking. Then there are canal lands which have been expropriated but which are no longer used for canal purposes. These lands have been conveyed, for a consideration, to individual owners, and I am told that in some cases the lands that were acquired at low rates have been sold at considerable profit to the department concerned. I urge the Minister of Finance, in the bill which will follow this resolution, to give consideration to providing grants for municipalities in respect of lands taken for federal purposes.

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): I should like to say a word on this subject. I happen to be one of those in whose constituencies there are crown companies, in my case the Polymer Corporation. I do not need to say that we appreciate the Polymer Company being there, but I believe we have to understand, as apparently some people do not, that while a great industry creates a lot of employment it also brings a lot of headaches in the way of increased education costs, highway costs, police and all that sort of thing. Up until the first of the year the Polymer Company was in the township of Sarnia, but since the amalgamation it has been situated in the city.

Since the construction of this industry in Sarnia, small annual grants have been made. I believe they started at $5,000 or $8,000, and the last one was around $10,000. I should not like the minister to take these payments as the basis for future adjustments. At the time the representations in connection with the grants were made, they were made primarily on the basis of roads. As a matter of fact, there was an urgency to have the plant completed, and like most municipalities the township had bylaws governing the time of the year when trucks could use the highways. I happen to be one of those who made the representations to Polymer for a grant towards the upkeep of the roads. With regard to education, the costs became so high so quickly it was necessary for several of the school sections to go to the province to get grants to help them. One school section which had one schoolteacher was obliged, within two or three years, to add three more rooms to the school.

I do not know whether the minister thinks it fair, in the final stages of the discussion on the resolution, to consider what aid could be given to municipalities having such a crown corporation. This aid is especially necessary in connection with roads and education costs. A great many of the employees of the Polymer Corporation still live in the township. I hope the minister will make some comment on this. According to the statement of the Polymer Corporation, the total cost of the fixed assets was $57,853,906; depreciation reserve totalled $24,217,793, leaving a cost less depreciation of $33,636,113. While the cost of the land is small, I am not sufficiently familiar with the assessment act to know how machinery and equipment are assessed. I have an idea that they are exempt. I believe that roads and buildings, electrical connections and so on are taxable. I do not know whether or not it would be fair to ask the minister to look at the statement, and say what the assessment might be.

Mr. Abbott: I did not want to interrupt my hon. friend, Mr. Speaker, but he perhaps does not appreciate that the payments by crown corporations for taxes do not come under the measure to be founded on this resolution. I announced some time ago, as a matter of government policy, that these various crown agencies, crown companies and the like, were instructed to make with the municipality in which they operated appropriate arrangements for the payment of moneys in lieu of taxes but they are not provided for under this act or the item in the estimates which relates to it.

Mr. J. L. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I am going to take a rather unusual position today, inasmuch as I am not speaking for the people of Comox-Alberni but rather as a taxpayer here in Ottawa; unfortunately I am one. I do not know who is to blame for this terrible situation we have in this city with regard to municipal taxes. If I thought it was the minister, I am afraid that I would be tempted to make a kind of rough speech; but I am not convinced that it is entirely owing to the improper basis of taxation on federal government property that is, in fact, the cause of the difficulty which we experience here.

I well appreciate the fact that the federal government provides many services to this city of Ottawa such as maintaining the parks, driveways, the museum, and all the sights we have here that cost the municipal authorities nothing. But it seems to me that the taxes here have got into the position that they are almost confiscatory. They are actually double what they are in the great city of Vancouver. I of course appreciate the fact that Vancouver does not supply the heat, the cold and the flies that we get here as part of our municipal services. But it seems to me that the federal government surely cannot be treating this town fairly when the taxes in the city of Ottawa are double what they are in the city of Vancouver.

I have a three-bedroom home out here on the federal driveway. The driveway is maintained by the federal government, but I can say that on my three-bedroom home I pay a tax of $760 a year; that is for land tax and water tax. The sum of $760 a year is a great deal of money or it used to be considered a great deal of money. I have a colleague, also from British Columbia, who has a modest family home on a fifty-foot lot, and he pays $550 a year. I think hon. members generally do not appreciate the terrific scale of taxation that is in effect in Ottawa. Actually I am afraid that many civil servants will contemplate going up the Gatineau and putting up a wigwam, because I am almost certain that a man earning a normal salary cannot afford to pay his civic taxes.

I am not going to blame the minister for the situation. It is probably caused by a combination of circumstances. But it seems to me that the government, being the largest employers here in Ottawa, would be well advised to take an intelligent interest in this great problem that concerns every citizen of Ottawa.

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word or two on this question of taxation of federal property and the position in which municipalities find themselves. I think I have mentioned this matter on a couple of former occasions. But since that time the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) stated, on June 7, that some 75 acres were going to be added to No. 27 ordnance depot at London. That addition will affect London township. Continued expansion is going on at Westminster hospital in Westminster township. Certainly the income tax building at London, Ontario, went out of the ownership of private individuals in Montreal and is now a federal building. That is a further loss of, I believe, some $8,000 in taxes to the city of London. If this trend continues year after year, we are going to get to the point where there will be few people left to pay taxes, and a great deal of taxes to pay. I hope the minister will review this whole question because there is getting to be a great concentration in London and London district, because of their importance in western Ontario.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Fleming: Will the minister indicate the total paid out, during the fiscal year, of the $1,600,000 that was appropriated for this purpose? If the list is not too long, will he give the municipalities that received any grants? If the list is long, perhaps he could indicate the number, and some of the larger amounts paid, including Ottawa.

Mr. Abbott: It is not too long, Mr. Chairman. I should be glad to put it on Hansard if it were of interest. As to the total paid out, the figures here are $1,578,251.13. That covered the ordinary grants under the four per cent formula and, second, grants in lieu of taxes on government grain elevators—that is, as distinct from properties owned by harbour commissioners or independent corporations; transitional grants respecting newly-acquired properties and grants in lieu of special assessments for local improvements. The biggest grant was, of course, to the city of Ottawa, amounting to $962,392. The second largest was to the city of Halifax, amounting to $197,394; the third largest was to the city of Calgary, $43,300; the fourth was to Saint John, New Brunswick, $42,210. Perhaps it would be of interest to the committee if I were to place the list on Hansard. It is not unduly long. I should be glad to do that.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the minister the consent of the committee that the list be placed on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Municipal Grants Act

Mr. Abbott: The list is as follows:

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister referred to crown corporations as being in a sort of betwixt-and-between class. They were not treated like ordinary taxpayers. On the other hand, they were commissioned to make some kind of deal. Is there any basis on which that deal is made? What I mean is this. Crown corporations perhaps have a certain basis for negotiating from the very fact that they are crown corporations and have to some extent the weight of the government behind them. Can the minister indicate whether there is any principle, shall I say, which is being followed? While I am on my feet, may I also ask this question: In applying this percentage across the board, does the department arrive at its own figures or does it take the assessment figures of the various municipalities?

Mr. Abbott: As to the first question, I do not know that there is any fixed formula so far as crown corporations or agencies are concerned. They have been instructed to make with the municipalities arrangements on a fair and equitable basis. The reason for that is that the character of the operations of these crown corporations varies a good deal. For instance, the Polymer Corporation, which is in the constituency of the hon. member for Lambton West, is pretty well, one could say, an entirely commercial operation. There are, however, other crown agencies whose operations could be categorized as partly commercial and partly a general type of service. The arrangement therefore is that each crown agency negotiates its own tax arrangements with the municipality.

On the second point, as to the valuations, I made it quite clear in my statement of November 14, 1949, that the crown must reserve to itself the right to establish the valuation. These are ex gratia payments and, for reasons which I think are fairly obvious, the crown could not put itself entirely in the hands of the local assessors. In most cases of crown property, not too much attention has been paid to the real value of the assessment because it had no practical significance in the past. But what has been done in the case of the different municipalities where grants are payable is for officials of the municipal grants division to confer with the local assessment authorities and to endeavour to arrive at an assessment which is accepted as mutually satisfactory. In one or two cases, I think here in Ottawa and in Halifax, we retained an outside real estate adviser to help in arriving at an assessment.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I appreciate what the minister said about there being certain cases where crown property in a municipality was in the nature of an amenity and might fairly go without taxes. As I understood him, the minister took the case of Polymer—

Mr. Abbott: Just as an example of a crown corporation.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Yes. Was I correct in understanding that the implication of what he said was that Polymer, being a commercial enterprise, would in a measure at any rate be subject to the same taxation considerations as would another comparable enterprise in private hands?

Mr. Abbott: I think the practice of Polymer would be that followed by a great many large industries of that kind which are established in various localities. Certainly in my own province it was quite common practice for them to arrive at special tax agreements with the municipalities, which would be frequently confirmed by legislation. In the case of Polymer, I know that they have been told, in common with other crown corporations, to negotiate an appropriate agreement for payment in lieu of taxes to the municipalities. It is not under this bill—my hon. friend appreciates that.

Mr. Murphy: I know; I was wondering whether the minister could tell us when this new principle begins. He has said that it applies with respect to crown corporations. Does it begin in 1950 or 1951?

Mr. Abbott: I cannot say from memory, because the administration of it does not come directly under the municipal grants division, which is in the Department of Finance. It is a matter for the crown corporations themselves, and I will have to verify what the policy is.

Mr. Murphy: Suppose the crown representatives and the assessment officials could not agree with respect to a crown company. What would be the procedure?

Mr. Abbott: The government does not intervene directly in the case of negotiations with crown corporations. Since, as I say, in the case of federal property that is owned directly and property that is owned through the intermediary of a crown corporation, it is exempt under the British North America Act, the payment is ex gratia payment, so that in the case of a difference of opinion the government's valuation must stand.

Mr. Fraser: Although the government's properties are exempt, water rates have to be paid.

Mr. Abbott: They do not have to pay water rates, but they do. We have always paid water rates and local improvement taxes.

Mr. Fraser: In the event of fire in government properties, what do you do? Do you help out the municipalities on the cost?

Mr. Abbott: Under the formula where the concentration of property is in excess of normal the government pays a grant to a municipality which is to cover the proportion of municipal services which government property receives.

Mr. Fraser: What I was getting at was the fire we had here a couple of weeks ago at which the whole Ottawa fire department was employed for some hours. Will the city of Ottawa be reimbursed for that?

Mr. Abbott: I would not think so, no; we pay a very substantial amount to the city of Ottawa, nearly a million dollars, for certain municipal services, and I would think that would include the services of the fire department where needed.

Mr. Mott: I should like to say a few words on this resolution. I compliment the minister and his department on the wonderful job they have done. I spent many years in municipal offices, and one of the things we had to contend with at all times was complaints based on grants in lieu of taxation, not only from the dominion government but also from the provincial government. In British Columbia we did go so far as to get grants in lieu of taxes on their property which was doing a commercial business. The only one which was placed in that particular category was the liquor stores, which are generally contained on small lots in the city or town. In my own city of New Westminster, British Columbia, I think our grant was around $27,000. That is the amount we received from the dominion government in lieu of taxes.

I do want to congratulate the minister and his department on the two civil servants who represented the department in making the final arrangements with our own city solicitor, the comptroller, mayor and council of the city. They speak of them in the highest praise. I am very sorry to hear that only a few weeks ago one of these civil servants passed away. I believe that the city's own assessor assessed the property in the neighbourhood of $30,000. The final agreement between the city assessor and the government's assessors was $27,000. The city received very favourably the amount set by the dominion government, and of those who represented the department and made the assessment they speak in the very highest praise, for the work that they have done. I think that the dominion government has taken a step in the right direction. If our provincial governments would only follow they would also be taking a step in the direction that has been long needed in every municipality in the Dominion of Canada.

I am very glad to be able to rise in my place in the House of Commons and pass that praise to the department, and to those in the department who are doing that work throughout Canada. I do not think that the way it was handled in my city was any exception. All through the dominion they have done wonderful work, and I am sure they deserve all the praise that we can give them.

Mr. Fleming: The matter of the basis on which crown corporations are making grants in lieu of taxes has a very direct bearing on this question. The minister has indicated that negotiations are authorized between the crown corporation and the municipality. I should like a little more light on the objective of the crown corporations in such a case. Is it, within the scope of government policy, a case of seeking to arrive at a fair grant, having regard to the general basis of assessments in the municipality, or to make some convenient arrangement with the municipality that may not necessarily have any direct reference to the prevailing rate of assessment throughout the municipality?

Mr. Abbott: Well, I am afraid I have not been personally in too close touch with that aspect of it because, as I have said, this does not come under the municipal grants division of the Department of Finance. But in the statement which I made on November 14, 1949, outlining in more detail the proposed policy, I said this, as reported at page 1706 of Hansard of that date:

> In the case of government-owned railways operated by the Canadian National Railways, agreements have been entered into with the cities of Halifax and Saint John for the payment of reasonable amounts in lieu of taxes. I understand that the Canadian National Railways will endeavour to work out similar arrangements with other municipalities through which the government-owned railway runs.
> In general, as I have indicated, the policy will be to have crown corporations work out arrangements with municipalities which are fair and equitable under all circumstances.

That is the general policy, but I am afraid I cannot give my hon. friend very much more detailed information than that.

Mr. Fleming: As a statement of principle it may be a very choice kind of statement to say that they are told to do what is fair and reasonable, but that can mean almost anything. I do not wish to prolong this discussion, but I would like to say that in such cases as we have been discussing, that is to say, crown corporations which are engaged in commercial operations, what would be fair and reasonable in the way of payment on their part is a payment that would be equivalent to the taxes that would have to be paid if the property they are occupying had been occupied by a private taxpayer. Nothing short of that is fair or reasonable under the circumstances.

May I give you an illustration in my own city of Toronto? The Toronto transportation commission is municipally owned and yet in recent years it has been paying taxes on the properties it occupies in the city like any other private taxpayer. It was not always so, but that is the direction in which they have moved and that situation has existed in recent years. I think it is a sound principle to follow.

Mr. Abbott: It is really only a bookkeeping operation, is it not?

Mr. Fleming: The system is operated independently of municipal revenues, and has been for thirty years. It manages its own revenues and expenditures.

Mr. Abbott: I think it would be desirable for accounting purposes, but the municipality owns the corporation and any profits would go to the municipality.

Mr. Fleming: Profits are retained as reserves by the commission. Without dragging the matter out further it seems to me that the fair principle to follow in a situation of that kind is to pay the same assessment as is paid by other property in the municipality.

One final word on the matter introduced by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni in regard to Ottawa: I know there are different aspects to this question, but I wish to say that I share with him the view that having regard to the extent of federally owned and occupied property in Ottawa, the extent of the services that the municipality is called upon to provide, and the vaulting rate at which municipal taxation and the cost of municipal services have soared skywards, the present grant to the city of Ottawa should be reviewed. I do not think by any stretch of the imagination it can be said to be adequate.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Chairman, I hope that the payments made by Polymer to the municipality in the past few years will not be used by any department as a basis for negotiation in connection with crown companies or federal properties. The payments made by Polymer have ranged from $5,000 to $10,000, which is only one-tenth or one-twentieth of what the taxes would be under a proper agreement. I repeat, I hope that in any negotiations between the department and any municipality these payments will not be used as a basis.

Mr. Balcom: Mr. Chairman, this matter of municipal grants has been of great importance to certain cities across the country, and I might just mention my own city of Halifax. I was impressed with what the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and the hon. member for Eglinton have said with regard to the high tax rate in Ottawa. Considering the difficulties under which we operate in Halifax, I must say that our tax rate is much lower. It may be that the hon. members will consider coming down there to live.

I should like to re-emphasize the position of our city, which has been put forward on several occasions by the board of trade. The minister has been asked to give consideration to this matter and he has undertaken to do so. Fifty-one per cent of the properties in Halifax are non-taxable and the result is that the taxpayer must carry a much heavier load. I do not overlook the fine reception the minister has given to our delegates and myself personally when he has been approached in regard to this matter. He has been most considerate and the delegates have gone home satisfied that they were treated fairly. I thought that on this occasion I should say a word on behalf of Halifax when these grants are being considered.

Mr. Bater: Mr. Chairman, in considering the basis of assessment in any urban municipality, will the property of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation be taken into account?

Mr. Abbott: I believe so.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Abbott thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 390, respecting grants to municipalities.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INCOME TAX ACT

The house resumed, from Wednesday, June 13, consideration in committee of Bill No. 296, to amend the Income Tax Act—Mr. Abbott—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 21—Rates.

The Deputy Chairman: There was an amendment to this section moved by the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the members of the armed forces will appreciate the concessions which have been granted in this amendment. While it was hoped that they would be granted a complete exemption from income tax, these credits will go a long way toward meeting the situation. The only observation I desire to make is to ask assurance that the benefits granted under this bill will apply to those who receive benefits under the various pieces of legislation which have been passed in connection with members of the special force.

It will be noticed that in the amendment the zone in which these benefits will apply is described. This credit is to be given to members of the naval, army or air forces of Canada who are on duty in a zone outside Canada prescribed by regulations made on the recommendation of the Minister of Finance. I should like to direct attention to P.C. 2930 which was promulgated on Monday, June 11, and which deals with the areas in which the benefits under such acts and regulations as the special forces veterans benefit regulations, the Veterans Rehabilitation Act, the Veterans Insurance Act and the War Service Grants Act will apply.

In those acts and regulations the area in which they are applicable is defined as being service in a theatre of operations which means such service as the governor in council may designate from time to time. P.C. 2930 goes on to define what that area is in section 1 which revokes section 3 of the special force veterans benefit regulation as follows:

> For the purposes of these regulations "service in a theatre of operations" means the service of a member of the Canadian forces from the time of his departure from Canada or the continental United States of America including Alaska to participate in military operations undertaken by the United Nations to restore peace in the republic of Korea until
> (a) he returns to Canada or the continental United States of America including Alaska, or
> (c) the unit with which he is serving, having ceased to participate in such operations, arrives at the place to which it has been assigned,

The point I want to make is that the benefits under this amendment should apply to everybody who is taking part in these special operations. The proposed amendment will apply to everybody who is taking part in these special operations. I suggest that it might be desirable not to make it applicable to other people who are not benefiting from the veterans legislation. One does not expect these benefits to be handed out to everybody. For that reason I wanted to draw this order in council to the attention of the committee. I believe there is sufficient flexibility in the regulations so that if the 27th brigade or other special forces go to Europe an amendment could be made to the regulations by the governor in council.

He could designate as a theatre of operations any new area overseas where Canadians were taking part.

Mr. Abbott: I think the definition my hon. friend has indicated seems to be a pretty good one for our forces in Korea. As he has pointed out, the section in the act is drawn in such a way as to leave flexibility so that by regulation, that is to say, by order in council on the recommendation of the Minister of Finance, the benefits of the section can be extended to other service personnel who may be serving outside Canada. Quite frankly I must say I have anticipated that if and when our brigade group is serving in Europe, let us say, a similar privilege would be extended to them. I agree with the hon. member that it is desirable that this benefit should at least be co-terminal with those who are eligible for veterans benefits, and it may well be that it should cover some wider ground.

Mr. Fair: As one of the first members to bring this matter to the attention of the Minister of Finance earlier this session, I want to thank him for the consideration he has given in the announcement he made not many days ago. I feel we owe this to our servicemen, and I hope it will be extended as far as reasonably possible to those men and women who may be in the fighting forces. It was a wrong that has been rectified, and I want to thank the minister for his consideration.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Abbott: I do not want to hold up my own section, but perhaps members of the committee who are interested might find it of value if I were to put on Hansard, as I do during the budget speech, tables showing the effect that this tax will have on various ranks, and with various marital statuses. If I have the unanimous consent of the committee, I should like to do that.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the minister leave to put these tables on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Abbott: The tables are as follows:

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 22—Foreign business corporations.

Mr. Fleming: There are several points I should like to raise with respect to section 22. In the first place, it will be noted that the section applies to foreign business corporations, and the effect of subsection 1 is to require an application of the kind contemplated here to be filed within 120 days from the end of the year. The question immediately arises: Why 120 days? The Companies Act makes a clear distinction between those companies whose business is carried on abroad and those companies whose business is domestic. I would suggest that the flat provision of 120 days from the end of the year is not entirely fair to corporations whose undertakings are largely carried on outside Canada. I should like to refer to section 112, subsection 1, of the Companies Act which reads:

> At each annual meeting the directors shall lay before the company
> (a) a balance sheet made up to a date not more than four months before such annual meeting:
> Provided however that a company which carries on its undertaking out of Canada may by its bylaws extend this period to not more than six months.

I suggest in the case of such a corporation, one which carries on its undertaking outside Canada, that similar recognition should be made in this section of the difficulty of closing its books and making its return. I would urge that in that case the time allowed should be extended to six months.

Then there is a further question. In paragraph (b) of the proposed new subsection 4 of section 64, the benefit is narrowed by these terms to companies of an industrial, mining, commercial, public utility or public service nature. I should like to ask the minister why there is any necessity for narrowing this provision to companies of these particular natures. Why should it not be made broader?

Mr. Abbott: The present wording is not very narrow. This definition was put in because it was called to our attention that one or two foreign business corporations, which had their head offices in Canada and which were paying some taxes here, in fact were carrying on their operations entirely abroad, but because of a technicality they might be subject to double taxation, and under those circumstances they would be obliged to remove their offices from Canada. We could not see any particular advantage to Canada in losing the taxes which they were paying. Therefore this latter part of the amendment, subsection 4, was provided to meet these cases. As my hon. friend is aware, there are not a great many of these corporations now. They are relatively few. There are one or two very well known ones. I suppose Brazilian Traction is one of the best known.

As to the first part of my hon. friend's question concerning the 120 days or four months, that provision was in the Income War Tax Act and has not been extended. Paragraph (ii) of section 1(b) is intended to be a relieving section because under the old section as it stood after the expiry of 120 days they simply lost their right to qualify as what we used to call 4-k companies, being foreign business corporations. Now they do not lose their status as such, but if they fail to file within a certain time and in the prescribed form there is a mild penalty for failing to do so within the normal period of 120 days.

Mr. Fleming: Would it not be reasonable to allow them six months?

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. Abbott: Well, 120 days has always applied to these companies, and for that reason we did not think of changing it.

Mr. Fleming: When you look at the recognition given by the Companies Act to the position of such companies, would it not be reasonable to put their tax position on the same basis?

Mr. Abbott: I will have a look at it again; I confess the point had not occurred to me.

Mr. Fraser: Is that the end of their calendar year or their fiscal year?

Mr. Abbott: The end of their fiscal year.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): It seems to me the request of the hon. member for Eglinton to have the 120 days extended to six months is reasonable unless there is something against it, particularly when you consider the terms of the dominion Companies Act which seem to me sound.

Section agreed to.

Section 23 agreed to.

On section 24—Undistributed income on hand.

Mr. Fleming: This relates in part to the subject matter covered by section 30, but I take it that if this section is now carried our opportunity to discuss the broad question of the distribution of these surpluses under section 30 of this bill will not be restricted.

Mr. Abbott: Oh, no.

Mr. Fleming: There is one specific point I would like to raise under subsection 5, which provides that this section shall be deemed to have come into force on June 30, 1950. In other words, it is made retroactive for practically twelve months, certainly ten months prior to the introduction of the budget resolutions. I am told that litigation is pending in which the definitions provided in section 24 and the new provisions there are likely to have a very direct bearing. For that reason I strongly urge that a section of this kind ought not to be made retroactive. Surely in legislation imposing taxation above all other kinds we should avoid retrospective enactment. In this case, in view of the fact that the rights of persons now engaged in litigation are likely to be affected by this enactment, I would urge that it should not be given retrospective effect.

Mr. Abbott: I am told this date was selected because it is the date on which the definition of undistributed income was brought into the act. This is a pretty technical section, as my hon. friend will appreciate, and I am told that it was discussed with the tax foundation, who felt that it was satisfactory. It is really corrective. Some of the provisions are relieving; some might be interpreted as being more restrictive, but I think on balance it is more relieving than restrictive. I am told that the appropriate date to bring in these changes is the date on which undistributed income was defined under our act last year.

Mr. Fleming: Suppose the minister were a litigant who was affected by some of the more restrictive features of this amendment and did not receive the benefit of any of the less restrictive features.

Mr. Abbott: Certainly I would not want to take away the right of anyone who is now in litigation, but the assistant deputy minister of national revenue who is sitting in front of me tells me he does not know of any such case and certainly I had none under consideration when this section was being prepared. It was not intended to legislate anybody out of their rights. Of course it only affects undistributed income.

Mr. Fleming: Someone spoke to me the other day, indicating that the rights of his clients were going to be affected by the retrospective operation of this amendment.

Mr. Abbott: I would be surprised if that were the case. If my hon. friend wants it to stand I have no objection, but I would hope that we might pass it.

Mr. Fleming: I do not wish to hold anything up at this stage of the session, but after all what purpose can there be in enacting retroactive legislation now simply because of the definitions introduced last year? It does not seem to me we should go back and change the definition as of that date.

Mr. Abbott: Sections such as these are introduced as a rule because of representations made to us that this should be done. This section in fact reflects the departmental practice since this question of undistributed income was first defined in last year's act, and I really would be very much surprised if any matter now in litigation would be prejudicially affected by the provisions of this section.

Section agreed to.

On section 25—Mining companies.

Mr. Herridge: I would like to urge the minister, in preparing his budget next year, to make some similar provision for those who are practising forest conservation and silviculture, because these are the people who will be providing wealth for future generations, from which they themselves will receive no direct benefit at the present time. I know the government is conscious of the need for forest conservation. So are many people across Canada, and I do believe something should be done to assist those individuals who are doing something to benefit future generations. They are expending money which will bring them no direct benefit, and I feel that those people undertaking forest conservation are doing something very worth while. We know we have to protect our forests if we are to have a consistent yield of forest products. We have to protect them if we are to protect our water resources; and we have to protect our forests if we are to prevent land erosion through floods. Some exemption from taxation for those willing to do this sort of work on behalf of future generations would be a good investment because it would bring the country wealth in later years. It would also be a good investment because large sums of money would be saved which otherwise would have to be expended to repair water damage and soil erosion as the result of overcutting. I would like the minister to give his opinion on this suggestion, but before he does so I believe another hon. member would like to say a few words on the matter.

Mr. Gibson: I know the minister has had this question and the lack of a forest policy for Canada brought to his attention already, and certainly I do not want to take the time of the house unnecessarily in presenting a point I believe his experts are studying now. I only want to point out that British Columbia is recognizing the fact that we must encourage people to plant timber for future generations. The provincial minister of mines and forests introduced a resolution at this session of the British Columbia legislature which provided for a two-thirds reduction in taxation on land which the owners would undertake to use as forest farms, and I should think the government here would be well advised to go along with that policy and co-operate in every possible way in this worthwhile project.

It is generally assumed down here, of course, that anyone taking up a forest management licence in British Columbia is getting something of great value and that as a result their capital interest in timber must be increased. Actually that is hardly the case. At the present time if the owners of standing timber in British Columbia enter into one of these forest management licences they must expect to have their present cutting rights abridged to a very great extent. It is only their realization that in the public interest they have a responsibility that could possibly justify their entering one of these contracts, because certainly the present generation will get no personal benefit. I was rather shocked to learn, as a matter of fact, that the Department of National Revenue was imposing taxation on funds expended by timber companies in British Columbia on the mapping and planning of these forest management licences. It seems to me that is entirely inconsistent with the policy announced in this house by the Minister of Resources and Development, who said we were going to set aside $2 million for the purpose of assisting the provinces to take a forest inventory. I think we should co-operate with the provincial governments in every possible way, and with regard to timber we should take the same attitude that we take to oil and minerals. I would ask that the minister give this matter his usual able consideration.

Mr. Abbott: I think I did mention at the resolution state—and if I did not I do so now—that this very important question is now being considered by my colleague the Minister of Resources and Development, and I believe he has been having some discussions with the provinces about it.

Mr. Herridge: I am very pleased to hear that.

Section agreed to.

On section 26—Right to file consolidated return.

Mr. Abbott: I have a small amendment which I would ask one of my colleagues to move. It is to substitute in subsection 4 the following: "This section is applicable to the year 1952 and subsequent taxation years."

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am glad the minister has amended this section in one respect, and I very much hope he may amend it in another. I am troubled indeed that the right to file a consolidated return is to be done away with. We have had no explanation as to why this is being done. I am going to ask the minister to give an explanation, and then I wish to say something more. First I want to draw attention to two or three vital points in that connection. This is a right which has existed since 1932. I imagine we will all agree that if it is withdrawn now it will be extremely difficult to ever reinstate it. This practice has been followed by a considerable number of corporations, and they have actually paid an additional rate of two per cent for the privilege. Before I go any farther I wish the minister would give us the reasons for making this important change.

[Mr. Gibson.]

Mr. Abbott: The principal reason of course is that, now we have introduced into the act the principle of carrying losses forward and backward, this has ceased to have the practical significance it used to have. Only in the case of a consistent loser would it be of any benefit. In the case of companies jointly controlled, having one company that never made anything and another one that nearly always did, there would be some advantage in consolidating and paying the extra two per cent in respect thereto. It was thought desirable to eliminate this provision from the act. There is no desire to penalize the comparatively few companies that are still availing themselves of this privilege. It is for that reason I am proposing that it shall not be applicable except to the 1952 and subsequent periods. This will provide ample time for such companies as are still using this privilege to make proper arrangements so that they will not be unduly penalized.

I may say that the amendment to become effective in 1952 was introduced as a result of representations made to me that it might be difficult for one or two companies to so re-arrange their affairs that they would not be penalized.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am still bothered by this, because as I gathered from the minister he does not regard it as a very important matter. He has not give any overwhelming reason for the change, and I should like to answer the reason he has given, because I have representations on that point to the following effect.

The general assumption that the introduction of loss carry-over provisions has eliminated the advantage of consolidated returns is no doubt substantially correct so far as a comparison of aggregate revenue yields is concerned. But it does not apply to certain advantages of a more technical character, as in cases where consolidation permits separate incorporation of a certain part of a business for reasons of provincial law, or meets the case of a chronic loser. In such cases the use of consolidated returns allows flexibility of corporate organization which may be advisable for reasons of business where tax considerations are secondary. Again I want to put this point to the minister. I am doing it because it does seem to me a case where the point is substantial, and unless there is a great balance of convenience I hope the minister will listen.

The next point I wish to make is connected with the proposed repeal of section 75. As I understand it, that is not dictated by calculation of alternative revenue yields, and it is therefore primarily a matter of administrative convenience. If that is the correct inference, I would strongly urge that the convenience and established practice of the taxpayers concerned, whoever they may be, should receive at least equal consideration before this amendment proceeds further. May I earnestly say to the minister that it seems to me the reasons that have been given are not at all conclusive. Unless some real disadvantage is suffered by the public service, surely the convenience of the long-suffering taxpayer could receive some consideration.

Mr. Abbott: I considered these questions because of similar representations made to me by the tax foundation. I felt that, on balance, this was a case where we should do away with this provision.

Mr. Fleming: I must express regret at the decision made by the minister. However, if he is not prepared to change his mind I shall pass to another point on this section. Has the minister noted the form of the draftsmanship of this section? Where is this section going to go in the act? It does not purport to be amending any section in the act at the present time. All it does is repeal section 75, and then it goes on to enact a new provision without indicating where it is to go in the act.

Mr. Abbott: Section 75, of course, of the act which is repealed is the section giving the right to file consolidated returns. This section 26, subsection 2, will not go into the Income Tax Act at all. It is purely a transitional provision. It will provide for the clearing up of matters by the companies who have been filing under this right. During 1952 and subsequent periods, section 75 will cease to be in the act.

Section agreed to.

Sections 27 to 29 inclusive agreed to.

On section 30—Corporation election.

Mr. Fleming: Section 30 is a very important section. I believe there is a number of points that are likely to arise under this section. This is the section by which the government proposes to extend in one case, and narrow in another, the right given to corporations last year to distribute surpluses on the payment of a 15 per cent tax thereon. On the one hand I believe the committee will agree with the minister in his budget statement that the amendment made last year in the enactment of section 95A fully justified itself in the use made of it. Undoubtedly more use was made of it than the minister contemplated at that time, because the device of incorporating stockholding companies for the purpose of qualifying as private corporations with no more than 75 shareholders was hardly foreseen last year by the minister, and certainly the wide use that has been made of it. In proposing now to extend this right more widely, I believe the minister is only recognizing what has largely become an established fact.

At the same time, one wonders why the minister selects a broad class of corporations as an exception to what has now become the general rule that any corporation may distribute its accumulated surplus. This exception is found in subsection 2, lines 36 and 37 of the bill, and instead of being a private corporation as defined by the act, namely one having not more than 75 shareholders, these narrowing words are used:

> A corporation other than a subsidiary controlled corporation.

So that there are no benefits to be extended to a corporation where the dominant shareholder is a corporation. But I think that this exception, made to what has now become the general rule, does not adequately take into account the position of minority shareholders. These minority shareholders may be large in number. It may be that the control held by one dominant corporation is a very tenuous measure of control indeed, yet in such a case the position of the minority shareholders receives no consideration whatever under this legislation. As a matter of fact, I think one could go further and say that corporations which derived benefit under this section will now lose it under the narrowing provisions of this amendment. I can think of a number of corporations which acquired the right to pay the 15 per cent tax on distributed surpluses last year which will lose that right under this amendment.

For that reason, Mr. Chairman, I would urge that if the provision has justified itself, as the minister indicated in his budget speech, and as I think most people recognize, then there is no reason for introducing this qualification. Why not make it general, and in that way avoid doing injustice to the minority shareholders? There are other aspects of this matter which I should like to discuss, but perhaps it would be more orderly if we took them one at a time.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May I add a word before the minister answers the member for Eglinton. I should like to endorse as strongly as I can what the member for Eglinton has said. It seems to me that this section is discriminatory to a high degree against minority shareholders; in other words, against people who are apt to be the small holders. Unless there is some overwhelming reason for it, I do not think there is any justification, as you are leaving the minority shareholders, perhaps 49 per cent of the corporation, with what was a valuable right, conveyed so short a time ago, now entirely destroyed. I earnestly hope that the minister will see his way clear to deal with the matter.

Mr. Abbott: As my hon. friend appreciates, it is a loophole provision. There is a wide-open street there which we were afraid, without too great difficulty, could be made the subject of great abuse. This was a new provision introduced last year. As members of the committee have said, it introduced a special privilege to enable the distribution of surpluses on payment of a 15 per cent tax. I think it was a desirable piece of legislation. It has now been extended to public companies. It may be, to use the language of the tax foundation report, that the weight of the plug may be out of proportion to the size of the loophole, and we are prepared to explore alternative measures that can be entertained at this stage.

I will be prepared to pursue alternative measures. I have not been able to find anything yet; so that at this time I think that this is a provision which must be inserted in the act.

Mr. Fleming: I wish the minister would be more explicit. I do not think he has covered the whole ground by any means.

Mr. Abbott: I have done the best I can.

Mr. Fleming: On this point I have more confidence in the minister than he apparently has in himself. I think he can do better.

Speaking of loopholes, obviously the 1950 legislation left a great big loophole. I doubt greatly if the department foresaw the loophole there was in the 1950 legislation. The fact of the matter is that the minister derived a great deal of revenue from the fact that there was a great big loophole. If I am not mistaken, his revenue from this source, this new section 95A, was about $95 million in the last fiscal year. It contributed greatly to the surplus which the minister was able to report to the house in his budget speech. Much of the surplus is attributable to the fact that a loophole was left in last year's legislation.

I am sure that every lawyer in the house is aware of the loophole, Mr. Chairman, because the right was confined to private corporations, and they were defined as corporations having no more than 75 shareholders. A great many incorporations resulted for the purpose of consolidating stock ownership, in order to bring the stock ownership within the definition of a private corporation. So let us not be too seriously talking now about a loophole. It was last year's loophole that was the big one, and the minister's budget was the beneficiary of that loophole.

The minister accepts the principle of last year's legislation. He says he approves it to the point where he is prepared to extend it more widely. He therefore proposes to eliminate altogether the requirement of last year's legislation that it be confined to corporations having no more than 75 shareholders. But then he comes along and proposes to take away the right from some corporations that already have it, having qualified last year as private corporations. He proposes to take that right away from them this year. Surely if the principle were sound last year, it is sound this year.

Mr. Abbott: It is for the future, not for the past.

Mr. Fleming: Oh, yes. I appreciate the fact that this provision is not retroactive. It does not have to answer for that additional vice. We will acquit it of that charge.

Mr. Abbott: The matching provision does not apply to this type of corporation in the future.

Mr. Fleming: All right. There is the point. I say that if the principle of last year's legislation was sound, and if it is so sound that it deserves quite wide extension as is proposed in this amendment, then I cannot for the life of me see that the minister has made out any case for carrying that extension to the point where he not only withdraws it from some corporations which would acquire it this year but also withdraws it from some that acquired it under last year's legislation. It seems to me that he has not taken account at all, in his explanation, of the position of the minority shareholders in those cases. It may be that the minister has some legitimate concern which he has not yet expressed to the committee as to the position of the majority or dominant shareholders in a case of that kind where one corporation holds the control of the other. But he has not dealt with the question of the position of the minority shareholders, and it may be an important one in that particular company. It seems to me that they are the people who are deserving of the utmost consideration in a case of this kind.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Chairman, I am going to be persistent enough also to have another go at this matter. It seems to me that what is happening is that by reason of the chance of abuse the minister is ready to accept the certainty of doing a grave injustice to a considerable number of people of the kind that most deserve the protection of this committee, namely the smaller people in the main. I am not suggesting for a moment that the minister—

Mr. Abbott: There is almost certainly abuse.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have considerable confidence in the minister's staff. The minister says there is almost certainly abuse. I will not quibble about words. I will say to him that there is an absolute certainty—no doubt whatever—that as it is now an injustice is being done to the minority shareholders. Will the minister say there is a hardship where I called it an injustice? Is the minister agreed that there is a hardship?

Mr. Abbott: No. I do not think there is a hardship. Minority shareholders are always subject to certain disabilities and this may happen to be one of them.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Oh, I do not think that that answers the point.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend knows just as well as I do what is going to happen; or if he does not, he is the only man in Canada who does not. This matching legislation was designed with the idea in mind that half of the profits of the corporation would be distributed and be subject to tax and the other half could be created as a tax-free surplus by paying 15 per cent. If the situation of a parent and subsidiary is involved what happens is this. Half is distributed in accordance with the provision of the act as it now stands. It goes to the parent but it does not pay any tax unless the parent should see fit to distribute that. It is only the remaining half of which some may happen to go to the minority shareholders—if there are minority shareholders. The remaining half pays tax at the rate of 15 per cent. So you could have a situation where the only tax that would be paid would be 15 per cent and the parent could accumulate and accumulate on that basis. That never was intended; and unless I can find some other way of making sure that it cannot be done, that provision cannot stay in this section. If, incidentally, some minority shareholders are inconvenienced, that is unfortunate. But certainly they are no worse off than they were before this section was put into this act.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I do not think the minister has answered my point at all. I accept his rebuke if he wishes to give it. But it does not affect the point at all. It simply means that—I will not say because no effort has been made, for of course some effort has been made—because they have not yet finally found a satisfactory way of doing it, these people have to suffer.

Mr. Fleming: If the minister's heart is not to be warmed on that point, I will try him on another one. This is a point that I think must be within the minister's knowledge as having arisen under last year's legislation. It is a point of some difficulty. When the minister brought in his legislation a year ago he intimated—in fact I think he said this on several occasions—that the way in which the corporation, having paid this 15 per cent tax on that undistributed surplus, could then effect distribution among the shareholders, was through such forms as stock bonus, issuance of preferred stock and so on. I do not think that due account could have been taken at the time of the effect of one provision of the Companies Act on this matter. I believe this problem has arisen in the experience of a number of companies. As I understand it, the idea back of section 95A was to eliminate a surplus as a surplus and to effect distribution. Of course there are many corporations which did not have preferred stock or did not have the right to issue preferred stock, which in the meantime have acquired that right, have issued preferred stock, have made their election, paid their 15 per cent and wish to distribute by way of redemption, in whole or in part, of preferred stock where the preferred stock was issued in amounts equal to the amount of the surplus heretofore undistributed, now distributable by paying 15 per cent tax. They run up against the provisions of section 61 of the Companies Act, in the case of dominion corporations. I am sorry to bring in a long section in a technical discussion, Mr. Chairman, but I think I have to quote most of this rather long section to the minister to illustrate the point, which is this: While the purpose of the legislation was to eliminate what had been undistributed surplus from the company's balance sheet as a surplus, as I understood it, nevertheless it seems to me that the effect of section 61 of the Companies Act, as applied to companies incorporated under that act or subject to it, is to prevent that surplus from being removed from the balance sheet of the company—

Mr. Abbott: May I interrupt my hon. friend to make a brief comment? The purpose of the section was to facilitate capitalization of an earned surplus. It was not necessarily or primarily intended to facilitate the distribution of the capitalized surplus if it had been capitalized. I know that in fact in law it has not been too difficult to effect that distribution, but the primary purpose was not to facilitate an easy distribution; it was to facilitate an easy capitalization without attracting too high a tax.

Mr. Fleming: I think that some of us formed a quite different impression from the statements that were made last year, and certainly when wide publicity was given to the new section 95A it was done on the basis of this provision now making it possible to effect distribution tax-free of—

Mr. Abbott: I did not make the publicity about it.

Mr. Fleming: —what hitherto had not been distributable tax-free apart from the 15 per cent. I do not know whether the minister had this particular problem brought to his attention, but section 61 of the Companies Act in effect provides:

> The redemption or purchase for cancellation of any fully paid preference shares, whether the same are created by by-law pursuant to the provisions of section 59, or by the letters patent or supplementary letters patent, in accordance with any right of redemption or purchase for cancellation reserved in favour of the company in the provisions attaching to such preferred shares, . . . shall not be deemed to be a reduction of the paid-up capital of the company, if such redemption or purchase for cancellation is made out of the proceeds of an issue of shares made for the purpose of such redemption or purchase for cancellation, or if—

Then I pass over (a) and (b) in the hope that the minister is familiar with them and I do not have to take the time of the committee to read them. Then follows this provision:

> And subject as aforesaid any such shares may be redeemed or purchased for cancellation by the company on such terms and in such manner as is set forth in the provisions attaching to such shares, and the surplus resulting from such redemption or purchase for cancellation shall be designated as a capital surplus, which shall not be reduced or distributed by the company except as provided in sections forty-nine to fifty-eight, both inclusive, of this act.

Mr. Abbott: Which relate to the reduction of capital.

Mr. Fleming: Sections 49 to 58 relate to the reduction of capital. I am not the only member of the legal profession who has had to deal with this problem. These sections do not make provision for the elimination of the surplus as a surplus from the balance sheet of the company. I think that is a matter of quite general concern at this stage when so many of the corporations which proceeded under section 95A last fall are now proceeding to redeem in whole or in part preferred stock that was issued at that time as a means by which the distribution in the first instance was permitted after payment of the 15 per cent tax.

Mr. Abbott: Well, it is some little time since I have been able to earn a modest living by giving advice on these matters, but I did assume when we introduced this legislation last year that the capitalized surplus could only be withdrawn by way of a reduction of capital under sections 49 and following of the Companies Act. It was not then intended that it should be automatically paid out as dividends. The main underlying purpose of the legislation was to enable earnings which in fact had been reinvested in the business and were shown on the company's balance sheet as an unearned surplus of capital, and under the proper circumstances, to be withdrawn from the company.

From what I have seen and heard, while we may have given a little extra work to the members of parliament in the accounting and legal profession, I must say that it has not proved an insuperable difficulty to get out this capital surplus if it is desired to do so. Mind you, I think that in most cases where this surplus has been capitalized there has been no intention of withdrawing it from the company. I think that in a good many cases it has been necessary to leave it in there as working capital, or as a reinvestment in the business, but it was desirable, in order to eliminate the double punitive taxation features of succession duties and income taxes, to provide this way of dealing with that capitalized undistributed surplus.

Mr. Fleming: It may be that what the minister has had to say today does clarify the situation, although it is not the interpretation that was widely put on the remarks the minister made last year in indicating the purpose of the section, because under what has become the common practice now, where preferred stock was issued following the election under 95A, and the companies now are proceeding to redeem that preferred stock in whole or in part, they cannot even by the fact of that redemption effect the reduction in surplus that I think it was generally felt they could.

Mr. Abbott: That may be. I had always assumed that they would have to get supplementary letters patent to authorize a reduction in capital.

Mr. Fleming: I would say myself that even if they have the full right to redeem the preferred stock, and proceed to do so, that still does not eliminate the surplus from their books. It remains as a capital surplus, and they would have to take another means altogether to eliminate that capital surplus from the company's balance sheet.

Section agreed to.

Sections 31 to 37 inclusive agreed to.

On section 38—Reference to Income Tax Act,—References to this act.

Mr. Fleming: This section is so broad that it is a little hard to see the end from the beginning. Subsection 5 reads:

A reference in any other statute or in any rule, order or regulation made under any other statute to the Income War Tax Act shall, as regards any transaction, matter or thing in a period to which this act is applicable, be construed to be a reference to this act.

Then you have the like provision in the new subsection 6 which reads:

A reference in any other statute or in any rule, order or regulation made under any other statute to any provision in the Income War Tax Act shall, as regards any transaction, matter or thing in a period to which this act is applicable, be construed to be

(a) if there is a provision in this act relating to the same subject-matter, a reference to that provision, and

(b) in any other case, a reference to the provision in the Income War Tax Act referred to.

It is pretty hard to see all the cases to which a provision of this kind might be made to apply. It says: "any statute, any order or regulation". I do not know how many of these there are. It would take a pretty careful review to go through them to satisfy oneself that one had exhausted the list. This is a form of general legislation which should be approached with the greatest possible care.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend appreciates that it is almost like an amendment to the Interpretation Act, the Succession Duty Act, the Income War Tax Act and there are probably a good many others. One way to do it would be to open all these acts and bring in a technical amendment to substitute the Income Tax Act for the Income War Tax Act. This seems to be the practical way of doing it. I am assured that there is no substantive effect other than the one which I have indicated.

Mr. Fleming: Some of us may have a certain concern about applying the provision of a new act in place of an old one without actually seeing the particular provision that is supposed to be amended.

Mr. Abbott: It can only affect matters which have arisen since June 30, 1948, when the present Income Tax Act came into force, and which superseded the previous act. Any matters which had arisen prior to that date would of course have to be governed by the provisions of the old act.

Sections 39 and 40 agreed to.

On section 7—Dividends received by a corporation.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to raise again the question I raised the other day and which the minister said he would consider, that is to say, whether the adoption of the winding-up priority as a sort of working rule would cover the cases where you have A and B shares with different priority as to earnings but with equal rating as to capital distribution.

Mr. Abbott: I am told that this is a most complicated question. It relates, of course, to the blocked surplus. In order to effect what may be necessary it will require two definitions and they will have to integrate the blocked surplus with dividends. It has not been possible to work that out. I am informed that the Department of National Revenue are working on this problem and if, as was the case in connection with other amendments, a suitable solution is found we will make it applicable to the same taxation period.

Section agreed to.

On section 12—Defence surtax.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): There is a question I should like to ask with regard to section 11. I appreciate that that section is carried, but the minister made a statement which puzzled me at the time and I have thought about it since. The minister stated that the introduction of the words "directly or indirectly" was a relieving provision.

Mr. Abbott: I did not say that; I said that the section as a whole was a relieving provision.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Perhaps I misunderstood the minister, but I do not think entirely. He was applying this to those words which are new words.

Mr. Abbott: Subsection (b) is the relieving part of the section.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I directed the minister's attention to the fact that certain people were suffering by reason of the change, and he answered that there were more people interested in the relieving nature of this provision. I find it difficult to understand the relieving nature. Is the minister not extending the number of corporations which can get benefits?

Mr. Abbott: The best example under (b) is the brother and brother corporation. As the law now stands, if one brother has a corporation in which he has controlling interest and another brother has another corporation in which he has a controlling interest or of which he is the sole owner; and if neither of them has any interest in the other, as the definition now stands, because of the blood relationship between the two owners—I cited the case of brothers who might not even be speaking to each other—it might be pretty difficult under those circumstances to determine which corporation would be entitled to the benefit of the lower rate on the first $10,000 when only one could get it. This subsection (b) will permit that type of corporation to qualify as a small corporation and have the benefit of the lower tax rate.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Does it add to the number of corporations getting the benefit?

Mr. Abbott: It will add considerably. In the example I cited, both corporations would get the exemption. The only part of the section which could be considered as imposing any greater obligation on the taxpayer is the insertion of the words "directly or indirectly" in (a). I think that that must flow as a matter of course. If the real owner of two corporations puts shares in the name of someone else purely as a nominee or as a dummy he should not get the benefit of the special tax treatment which a section of this kind gives. I think it is quite proper in any section of this kind to use the legal phrase "owned directly or indirectly."

Mr. Fleming: I know that concern has been expressed by some—

Mr. Abbott: Is this on section 12?

Mr. Fleming: No, on section 11.

Mr. Abbott: We passed that section.

Mr. Fleming: The other day the minister spoke about the retroactive feature and there are those who are engaged in litigation who have expressed concern.

Mr. Abbott: As I indicated the other day, the simple thing to do would be to make it 1951. I indicated that I would be prepared to do that. I know if I do it at my hon. friend's suggestion, or at the suggestion of the hon. member for Greenwood, they will get inquiries from people who are penalized as a result of that action. I have not the slightest objection to doing it, but I do not want to take the responsibility of doing it. I think the balance of convenience is wholly in favour of making the definition of related companies and thereby broadening the application to start right from the time we put that conception in the act, namely, in 1949 and the subsequent taxation years. The only retroactive effect it could have on the litigation my hon. friend is referring to would be through the use of the phrase "directly or indirectly." I do not know what the law is in Ontario, but in Quebec we have a pretty well defined rule that you cannot do indirectly what you are prohibited from doing directly. It is a question of fact whether a corporation is owned by one person or another.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I should like to go back to the discussion we were having last Wednesday when this came up and when the minister explained to us what had happened since the making of the budget speech. I want to read to the minister what he said in his budget speech which to me appeared to be departed from in the budget resolutions. I am doing this because I think if the matter is left as it is now it will create a serious situation indeed and one which I hope we can persuade the minister to consider seriously. The minister is reported on page 1810 of Hansard as saying:

> I am conscious of the fact, however, that this 20 per cent surcharge will weigh very heavily on those kinds of companies which for a variety of reasons, public control of rates or otherwise, are never able to earn more than a very modest rate on their capital. To such companies the next few years can offer little expectation of increased profits, yet many of them are engaged in activities which will require them to raise very large sums of additional capital for essential expansion.

I draw the minister's attention to that because my belief is that as matters stand that will be almost impossible of accomplishment. The minister continued:

> If we are not to cripple their borrowing capacity we must not cripple their capacity to earn their normal profits after tax. For these reasons I propose that the 20 per cent defence surcharge shall not operate so as to reduce the net income after federal tax, but before any provincial income taxes, of any company to a point below a five per cent return on capital employed.

Then I should like to refer to last Wednesday when the minister said:

> I found I simply could not evolve a definition which would be fair to all taxpayers. Therefore I am reluctantly forced to drop what I hoped might be a relieving provision.

I want to emphasize at the outset that what I am concentrating on is the minister's statement of April 10 when he spoke about utility corporations, particularly when he pointed out first of all the narrowness of their earnings which in a great many cases are fixed by regulating boards so that there is just enough to carry on with, and second, when he pointed out that they were going to need great expansion and would have to be in a position where their borrowing power was not crippled. I might add here that I think the Minister of Defence Production has been at great pains to indicate the importance of public utilities and the necessity of their expansion.

It is with that in mind that I wish to make certain representations to the minister. I want to emphasize again the position of utility companies if the matter stands as it is now. In most cases they are just getting enough earnings. They will have to apply for increased rates if the matter stands as it is. The increased rates which they will have to charge will just be added on to the cost of living and will be another addition to the inflationary pressure. First of all I want to ask the minister if he agrees so that we shall see whether we have a common basis. I want to ask the minister whether he agrees that if the matter stands as it is now there will of necessity be applications for increased rates. I also want to ask him if he agrees that corporations will be in the ironical position where they will really have to ask for $2 for every $1 that the minister is going to get because of the fact that they only get half of their earnings anyway. The tax is now up to 50 per cent. In other words, if a company has to raise money to pay the surcharge, if it has to apply for additional rates, it will have to get $2 for every $1. I should like to know whether the minister accepts that view because what I want to go on to say is to some extent based on that proposition.

Mr. Abbott: Of course public utility companies are no different from any other company in theory so far as the imposition of corporation taxes is concerned. Those taxes must be passed on to the purchaser of the service or the goods of the corporation which pays the tax. In the case of public utility corporations they have to go to a board, some public body, to get an authorized rate increase. In the case of commercial corporations they have to add it on to the price, or squeeze their profits and dividends a bit, or both. However, in essence what people should always realize is that the corporation tax has to be paid by the people who buy the service of the corporation or who buy the products that it manufactures. That is the only way it can be paid. The corporation has not any money except what it obtains from the people to whom it sells its goods. If it does not at least sell for its costs and a reasonable return on its capital, then over a period of time I suppose the inevitable happens as it has in other places and it goes bankrupt. There is nothing new about that. Of course I agree with my hon. friend.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am grateful that the minister agrees with me although he took quite a long while to say yes.

Mr. Abbott: Oh yes, but it requires a little explanation.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to remind the minister that I am basing myself on the often very sound authority of the minister himself.

Mr. Abbott: No sounder.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to repeat what he said. At page 1810 of Hansard he said:

> I am conscious of the fact, however, that this 20 per cent surcharge will weigh very heavily on those kinds of companies which for a variety of reasons, public control of rates or otherwise, are never able to earn more than a very modest rate . . .

That is the great and very important difference, just as he has pointed out, between those companies and companies which are not restricted in that way. As we all know, those companies which come before boards are usually allowed just enough to get by, and just as soon as they have extra charges then they are in trouble. I have already said that the present situation will be inflationary, to use that word that we are all getting so tired of. I want to remind you, Mr. Chairman, again of the importance of the utilities and of the absolute necessity of their being able to expand. Then I want to come to the point which the minister makes that it is not possible to find a definition to deal with the situation. That is the thing that I do not like to accept, and which I do not think we should accept, because I think it is far too serious for the whole economy of the country.

The minister says he has been unable to work out a definition of capital employed which would be satisfactory from the point of view of its general application to all companies. I am talking particularly, as I said, about utility companies, and that is what I want to emphasize. I do not believe it would be difficult to devise a definition to apply to public utilities which is the field most pressingly involved, and which by the nature of the budget address it was chiefly intended to cover. We have a very useful precedent in the United States because earlier this year the United States congress had to meet the same problem.

Mr. Abbott: That is under the excess profits tax act of the United States?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Yes, I will come to that. I will make that clear. Congress stipulated that electrical, gas, telephone, transit and water utilities were exempt from the provisions of the excess profits tax act, which the 20 per cent surcharge takes the place of in Canada, up to 6 per cent return on capital employed in the case of all but telephone and gas utilities where the allowed return was 7 per cent. I come to what I think is the most important point of all. The definition of return on capital employed covered dividend requirements of common and preferred shares, interest on bonded indebtedness and surplus. The same sort of treatment would meet the requirements of the public utilities in Canada that the minister has been talking about, and it is no less essential for the war preparedness effort here than it is in the United States.

When this matter came up last Wednesday the minister spoke as if it might work into possibly a major reconstruction of our tax system next year, but what I want to represent to the minister is that the present situation is going to create a difficult if not impossible situation this year. I hope the minister will agree, and if he does not I think it is desirable that he should say so, that the utilities will have to raise millions of dollars of new capital this year as well as next, and anyone who has any knowledge of the capital markets appreciates that the monetary policy against inflation that the country has been following since April makes it more difficult than previously to raise new capital through bonds and preferred stocks. To apply a 20 per cent surcharge to utilities would so depress their earnings as to make it impossible for them to raise capital through the sale of common stock this year.

When I say "impossible" that is perhaps a strong word. I am speaking of the difficulties which it is reasonable to take into account, and I come back again and again to emphasize the minister's own words. I submit again that if the minister had confined himself to the objective which he laid down in April with regard to utilities the problem would have been a very different one, and that we might not have had the minister coming to us last Wednesday and confessing failure.

There is another point that I should make. Inevitably we are going to have a demand for increased rates which will bear hard on everybody, and even then the situation will not be wholly cured because the increased rates probably will not become effective in the immediate future. Therefore I put it to the minister that the present situation is one that he cannot possibly tolerate with equanimity, and that to merely say it cannot be done and leave it at that is to fail to deal with a problem which I think cries out for a solution. I suggest to the minister that our problem is the same as the problem they had in the United States, and that mutatis mutandis the solution which has worked there might very well work here.

Mr. Low: I thought when the minister brought down his budget that this abatement of the 20 per cent surcharge was a wise provision, and I still think so. It is particularly wise, I think, when we begin to apply it to the group of corporations in the country known as utilities.

Mr. Abbott: I thought my hon. friend was asking me to increase the corporation tax.

Mr. Low: Not at all; not on this part. I have always had in mind this abatement provision and the 5 per cent. I think the minister knows that quite well. Certainly I agreed with him and with all those who took the position that in no case should we tax corporations to a point where they would net less than a fair percentage on the capital employed. I realize all too well how difficult it is to determine in formal language and for all corporations the meaning of capital employed, but a suggestion was just made by the hon. member for Greenwood which I think is wise and quite possible of application here. That is the definition as laid down in the United States under the excess profits tax, which provides that in the case of utilities there are three component parts to the capital employed, the share capital, the bonded indebtedness and the surplus. Certainly it should be possible to spell out in any amendment a specification of that kind applying particularly to utilities, so I would ask the minister to give very careful consideration to including for this year at least the provision of the abatement principle for utilities, if not for all corporations.

I should like to emphasize a little more one point made by the hon. member for Greenwood. If the abatement provision is withdrawn, as the minister suggests he is going to withdraw it, not only will it be necessary for many of the utilities to apply to the public service commissions for increases in rates. It will also be necessary for many of those corporations to wait for months before they can apply any such increase. As everyone knows it takes all the the way from three to six, seven or eight months to get permission from a provincial commission to apply a new rate, and in the meantime these utilities are going to suffer. They will be put in a very embarrassing position, and this at a time when the Minister of Defence Production is asking them to go all out to aid defence production. It does not seem to me that the two ministers are quite in accord. Certainly I would suggest that the Minister of Finance give careful consideration to the case that has been presented by the hon. member for Greenwood, and I support his request that for this year at any rate the abatement principle be applied to the utilities and that capital employed be defined as has been suggested, to include bonded indebtedness, surplus, and share capital.

Mr. Fleming: Six weeks ago the house adopted a resolution to this effect: that in respect of income earned after the commencement of the 1951 calendar year a corporation shall pay a defence surtax equal to 20 per cent, subject to the provision that the tax should not reduce the corporation's taxable income after payment of ordinary income tax to an amount less than 5 per cent of the capital employed. That was a decision of this house; the house adopted that resolution. I fail to see how it is possible for the minister to come forward now with a proposal that has the effect of tearing up the second half of that resolution.

Mr. Abbott: It has been done plenty of times before. Occasionally my hon. friend or other hon. members suggest that I should be more generous in the budget, and sometimes I have acceded to that request. In that case the resolution would have been on a basis much less favourable. It works both ways.

Mr. Fleming: That was a decision of this house, and for the life of me I do not see how the minister can now, during the same session and within a matter of weeks, invite the house to revoke and repudiate that decision.

Mr. Abbott: Why not?

Mr. Fleming: This is not just a case of carrying a budget resolution into legislative form. In this case the bill has undertaken to do that, and the minister comes along and invites the house to reject a section in his bill and with it to repudiate a decision taken by this house a matter of six weeks ago. I submit that cannot be done.

Let us have regard to this fact. The hon. member for Greenwood read to the committee the language used by the minister in his budget speech at page 1810 of Hansard for April 10, where presumably he gave reasons justifying this abatement clause or limitation so that a corporation's taxable income after payment of ordinary income tax should not be less than 5 per cent of the capital employed. This raises a question of fundamental ambiguity in the budget speech in describing the purpose behind this budget resolution. In his budget speech the minister supported this proposal on the experience of public utility corporations.

Mr. Abbott: Not exclusively.

Mr. Fleming: There is the point. In his budget speech the minister supported the proposal on that ground and did not mention any other.

Mr. Abbott: Yes, I did. Read the language.

Mr. Fleming: I will read the paragraph. The minister said:

> I am conscious of the fact, however, that this 20 per cent surcharge will weigh very heavily on those kinds of companies which for a variety of reasons—

Mr. Abbott: "A variety of reasons."

Mr. Fleming:

> —public control of rates or otherwise, are never able to earn more than a very modest rate on their capital.

Mr. Abbott: Pretty general.

Mr. Fleming:

> To such companies the next few years can offer little expectation of increased profits, yet many of them are engaged in activities which will require them to raise very large sums of additional capital for essential expansion. If we are not to cripple their borrowing capacity we must not cripple their capacity to earn their normal profits after tax. For these reasons I propose that the 20 per cent surcharge shall not operate so as to reduce the net income after federal tax, but before any provincial income taxes, of any company to a point below a 5 per cent return on capital employed.

The minister has now cleared up quite satisfactorily, I think, what was to most people who read that paragraph an ambiguity, because I believe most people in reading it thought the minister was supporting the proposed 5 per cent saving clause on the basis of the experience of public utility companies alone. Now he has indicated that this was an example—

Mr. Abbott: They are an outstanding example, but they were not by any means the only group in my mind.

Mr. Fleming: All right; we have that clear, that the minister did not have in mind public utility companies only.

Mr. Abbott: The language was quite clear.

Mr. Fleming: He had in mind in general companies which will not be able to increase their earnings in the coming years. The minister gets his budget resolutions adopted; and now, having indicated to us that this is intended to apply broadly to all corporations, he invites us to accept the failure to define the capital employed and on that ground to tear up or repudiate a decision taken by this house six weeks ago.

When I first read the section I felt that the first point I should like to raise was the fact that in subsection 4 of the new section 37 of the act the minister was reserving the right to define the capital employed by regulation, rather than have it written into the act. For my part I wanted to see that definition written into the act, because it seemed to me something of sufficient importance to warrant its being so written into the act. If it were possible to define it by regulation, it ought to be possible to do it with equal facility by statute. But the minister invites the committee to accept his conclusion that it is not possible to prepare a definition of the expression "capital employed."

Mr. Abbott: Not possible to satisfactorily define it.

Mr. Fleming: All right, to define it satisfactorily. There is no quarrel on that; it is a matter of terms. I would be the first one to recognize the difficulty facing the minister in working out a satisfactory general definition to apply to all cases. But I do not think we can accept that as sufficient ground for repudiating a decision taken by the house, a decision that was an essential feature of the budget proposals of the minister. In justifying this second increase in the corporation tax within about nine months, the minister laid great stress on the fact that it was not going to prevent any corporation from earning a rate of five per cent on its employed capital. Unquestionably, there are difficulties. Anyone who had any experience with our Excess Profits Tax Act will not be unaware of the difficulties of defining capital employed.

But I submit we must go on with this problem, and find a satisfactory definition of capital employed. For the sake of bringing that about, I am prepared to curb my own objections in order to provide the minister and his advisers with sufficient time. I do urge that the problem should not be treated in the way the minister invites us in his amendment to do, simply admit defeat and cast out a saving provision which was an integral part of the general proposal for an increase in corporation taxes. The member for Greenwood and the member for Peace River have quite rightly stated that if you do not add such a saving provision as this in the case of public utilities, then inevitably those public utilities are going to have to go to the boards that set their rates and make applications for increases. One of the things that will happen will be another application by the railways of this country to the board of transport commissioners for another increase in freight rates. The same will be true of the Bell Telephone Company, and other public utilities that are subject to the jurisdiction of provincial boards in practically every province in this country. The public is going to be called upon to pay.

Surely, Mr. Chairman, we are not going to accept defeat in a matter so important. Surely, we are not going to perpetuate a situation now by means of which we are going to embark on a program of repudiating decisions of this house. We must now tell the public utilities up and down this country that if they are going to maintain the rate of return on their employed capital—it is not a very large return at best—then they shall have to launch their applications now for an increase in rates. It is just as inflationary as it can be, and it is going to defeat many of the pleas that the Minister of Defence Production is making to these corporations to expand their output.

Let us recall what the Minister of Finance said in his budget speech, that the next few years could offer little expectation for increased profits, yet many of the companies are engaged in activities which require them to raise very large sums of additional capital for essential expansion. With the curbs there are on credit now, that additional capital for essential expansion is not going to be available to those companies. I urge the minister not to be content to accept defeat in his efforts to bring about a satisfactory definition of employed capital. The committee recognizes the difficulties. No one who knows anything about this problem will underestimate the difficulties with which we are faced, but surely we are not going to admit we cannot work out a definition, given the time and the opportunity of consultation with the advisers of the government and others. I would urge that in something so important, so integral a feature of the budget proposals of the minister, this committee should insist that the scheme of those proposals be proceeded with, and that a definition be worked out. This would enable the decision of the house to be implemented.

Mr. Abbott: There is really nothing I can add to what I said the other night on the technical point raised by the hon. member. The government's budgetary proposals are always subject to revision until the acts implementing them are finally passed by the house. It is true that it is fairly rare for a minister of finance to suggest taking away something he hoped to be able to give to some taxpayers; that happens to be the case here. More often some additional concession is given, as is the case in the special tax exemption for the armed forces. No one regrets more than I do that it has not been possible to evolve a satisfactory definition which would be fair to all taxpayers. As I said the other day, we have made extended efforts to do so and we have failed. So far as I am concerned I can only say to the house that for this coming year, for the reasons I have given, the twenty per cent surcharge will apply to all corporations who have profits during the year.

Mr. Gibson: I would be interested in hearing the minister's reply to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Greenwood concerning the taxation of public utilities. Would it not be generally better to put public utilities in a different taxation set-up from the ordinary company? Probably the minister will confirm this, but I have always felt that British Columbia suffered a greater disability, since most of the public utilities are privately owned, than the people of Ontario where they have the Ontario Hydro Electric Power Commission.

Mr. Abbott: That, of course, is a situation which has existed for some time. It is true not only of the province of British Columbia but also of the province of Quebec, where we have large privately owned utilities. We now have some that are publicly owned. In the province of Ontario power interests are principally publicly owned, but that is not true of telephone companies. Power companies are perhaps entirely publicly owned, with the exception of some in northern Ontario. There is no doubt it would be desirable to try to evolve some tax plan which might be more equitable. As my hon. friend appreciates, there are considerable difficulties. Perhaps a fairer way might be to put the load directly on the consumers instead of collecting it through the corporation tax. As I said a few minutes ago, that is what the corporation tax does; it collects from the consumers the corporation tax imposed in this particular situation.

I am sorry now that I made this proposal at all. I hoped that it might be possible, during this period when we were putting on this twenty per cent surcharge, to evolve some definition which might give some measure of relief to certain companies. It has not been found possible to do it. No one regrets it more than I do. As I said a moment ago, I have to take the position that the twenty per cent surcharge on profits will apply this year to all corporations.

Mr. Low: Will the minister comment on the provisions of a United States bill which defines capital employed as share capital, service and bonded indebtedness.

Mr. Abbott: This is a very complex question. That definition is contained in the Excess Profits Tax Act, and we have not such an act now. It is a little difficult to justify, in principle, as capital employed, borrowed money the interest on which can be deducted from the gross income for the purpose of arriving at taxable income. We have explored all these different formulae. We have tried to find one that would be fair to everybody. We have considered the American definition. I can only assert that the best brains I have available to advise me have not been able to get a proper one. So I am not prepared to recommend—and I am repeating myself time and time again—this type, and I therefore ask one of my colleagues to move an amendment that it be dropped.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I do not like to persist but I feel extremely unhappy about this matter, and I want to ask one or two more questions.

Mr. Abbott: I find that the amendment was moved.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Does the minister think that I exaggerated the difficulties which may likely face public utility companies, and does he think I exaggerated the important part they may have to play as part of the defence effort? If I am wrong on all that, or if I am conjuring up a bogey, maybe I should not say anything more. But I should like to know whether the minister agrees with that. Because if he does, then it seems to me he is putting us—and, if I may say so, himself—in a rather extraordinary position by saying this thing cannot be done. He has done what is now required, before, in different situations. It is being done elsewhere in almost identical circumstances. I come back and repeat my question: Does the minister think I am exaggerating the difficulties which may face the public utility companies?

Mr. Abbott: I do not know whether my hon. friend is exaggerating them or not. These added taxes will of course impose a heavy added burden on the public utility companies. It will also impose added charges on a good many other companies. Public utility companies, because of the fact that they have to apply for an increase in rates, may find it more difficult than others. But the difficulty created by the added tax is not confined to public utility companies.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No. But the minister was the first to point out very clearly in his budget speech that their position is radically different.

Mr. Abbott: No, it is not. I only used public utility companies as an illustration of a wider group; and if my friend will read what I said—and he does not need to read it into Hansard again, because it has already been done two or three times—he will see what I said. Those words in my budget speech were carefully considered. I can assure my hon. friend that they were not words quickly written down, haphazardly. They were carefully considered. We deliberately brought in a reference to public utility companies as illustrative of corporations which were particularly affected by increased corporation tax. I am neither condemning nor justifying public utility companies. I should like to see them and some others get some relief from this 20 per cent surcharge, but I have not been able to find a way of doing it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am not trying to tie the minister to any interpretation of his speech on April 10 that he does not like. I am asking a question with regard to the difficulties. I want to say also that I appreciate the difficulty. I can well understand that the minister has been under a great deal of pressure and that is why he is so bored at listening to me this afternoon.

Mr. Abbott: I have had all the representations that my hon. friend has had.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): We have wound up here in a situation which is entirely different from that in which we have ever wound up before in my experience, by being told that there is something that cannot be done because we cannot define what we want to do. To me that seems to be extremely unsatisfactory, to put it mildly. The minister has admitted that what inevitably is going to happen is that the public utility companies, whose earnings are so streamlined that they just get by—

Mr. Abbott: Some of them get by better than others.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister has admitted that what we are going to have is applications for increased rates in a good many cases and that the companies will have to ask for twice the amount because they get only half the returns themselves, fifty per cent or a little more, owing to taxation. Therefore we are going to have this additional burden in costs. Meanwhile we are going to leave the public utility companies in that position which I think would be unsatisfactory to the Minister of Defence Production. The Minister of Finance has not said that there is any impossibility in the formula which I read him and which I believe is the one used in the United States. He has not said it is impossible. He has said that he looked at it. But I am putting it forward again as something which, so far as I can see, is eminently possible in connection with public utility companies. I still hope that the minister is not going to bang the door. I think that the hon. member for Eglinton made a constructive suggestion when he said—I have no doubt unwillingly, but nevertheless he did say, seeing the difficulties and trying to get over them—to leave it to regulations. I would associate myself with him, although also unwillingly. In the light of that surely the minister is not going to tell us that he is going to bang the door and is going to create the situation which may at the very least be embarrassing and at the worst be extremely serious, by leaving this situation as it is now for a year.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Chairman, I cannot add anything to what I have already said. I am afraid that I have repeated myself too much already. I have given this matter my best consideration. I have come to a conclusion. I have a certain responsibility here which I have to discharge, and I am endeavouring to discharge it. The amendment which I have asked my colleague to move, and which has been moved, represents my best judgment and I am not prepared to recommend any other action.

Mr. Drew: Just before this motion carries, I should like to ask one question. I have not been here during the entire debate because of discussions which are taking place elsewhere. But the minister in effect is now saying: I am withdrawing this proposal because of the difficulty of definition. It has been pointed out to the minister that a similar definition was employed in a manner which the minister evidently felt he was able to interpret with sufficient accuracy on an earlier occasion. Before this is done and a further load in freight rates and a burden through other public utilities are imposed by this act, it seems to me that we should have a better understanding than apparently now is being offered as to why a definition that worked earlier will not work in this case.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend was not in the chamber at the time, but I discussed the definition in the Excess Profits Tax Act which we had in effect during the war, and those who had practical experience in its application know that there was not one company in one hundred to whom that definition applied. Most of them had an attributed standard profit set by the board of referees. If we are going to have to set up a whole paraphernalia of an excess profits tax act with a board of referees, I pray that it may not be in the immediate future.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want finally to express my regret that what we are going to do here is to create a situation where, as the minister has admitted, public utility companies will have to come and apply for increased rates and they will have to apply for twice what they need, in the sense that they will get only half of the amount because of the taxation situation. That means that we are going to have an additional rise in the cost of living.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Fleming: No; put the question, Mr. Chairman.

Amendment agreed to: Yeas, 40; nays 18.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment carried. Shall clause 12 as amended carry?

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. Drew: On division.

The Deputy Chairman: May I say that if a vote has been taken, and the members counted, it is considered as having been on division.

On section 15—Withholding.

Mr. Abbott: May I say that my colleague the Minister of National Revenue would like to make a statement on withholding tax which was raised under this section.

Mr. McCann: Some hon. members have expressed concern that the new tax deduction tables, which are to become effective as from July 1, 1951, provide for greater deductions than the 20 per cent defence surtax. Similar complaints have been received from outside quarters. First of all, let me state definitely that the tax itself is not increased by one cent more than my colleague the Minister of Finance announced in his budget address. However, the proportion of the tax that is collected in the least painful way, that is, at the source, from wages and salaries, has been increased.

Barely two months ago, many editorials and news stories called attention to and criticized the department because large balances of taxes were payable by wage earners last April. Generally speaking, these payments ranged from $15 to $25 per person, and in the aggregate they totalled about $40 million, to be paid largely out of the pockets of the working people at that time.

The feeling may have developed during the years after the war, when taxes were declining, that there was a strong tendency towards the creation of overpayments, although this tendency was not fostered by the basis of tax deduction. There seems to be little doubt that the wage earner prefers that his tax be paid as fully as possible by deductions at the source. The department subscribes to this view, but it was not deemed practicable to issue a new and slightly higher table of deductions until such time as a general adjustment of taxes was before parliament. There were two sound reasons for this. First, a change of this nature places a severe strain on the payroll operation of all employers—large or small—and it is desirable that the number of such changes should be kept to an absolute minimum. Secondly, the employee would in many cases interpret the change to be an increase in tax imposed by my department without sanction of parliament.

When the budget was brought down this year, necessitating the issuance of a new set of tables, the opportunity for revising the basis presented itself. It was realized, however, that circumstances were not wholly favourable because, for a majority of persons, the deduction per pay period would increase by more than 20 per cent. On the other hand, we were confronted with the fact that the year-end balances would automatically be 20 per cent higher in the future if we did not do something about it immediately.

A careful study was made of all the factors bearing on the problem and it was decided to recast the tax deduction tables in such a way that the least possible amount should be left to be paid at the end of the year, but that in the process no person should deliberately have an over-deduction made at the source. The steps taken to accomplish this were, first of all, to narrow the range of the income brackets within which a specified amount of tax deduction was to apply. When the income bracket is narrowed, the tax deduction becomes more precise. Secondly, the amount of tax specified for a given bracket was the full amount payable for the income which constituted the bottom of the bracket—that is the highest level. For an income which is in the middle of the bracket, the rate of deduction falls slightly short of 100 per cent of the tax payable; while at the top of the bracket, the deduction is still further short of the full tax. That is, we range it for an income that runs from $40 to $50 a week.

The average weekly wage across Canada in February, 1951, was $47.76, according to the dominion bureau of statistics. In the new tax deduction table, this wage falls within the weekly bracket $47.50 to $48.49. That is the dollar range. To illustrate my point, I will show below the effect of the new basis of tax deduction at 10 cents intervals of income within this bracket for a single person with no dependents. There will be shown the percentage deduction, the balance payable at the end of the year and the amount of charitable donations, over and above any investment income that might be earned, that would be required to convert the balance payable into a refund.

Single—No dependents

Weekly income	Annual Tax Payable	Tax deduction per table 7		Balance due following April	Donations required to offset balance
		Amount	Per cent
$47.50	$275.88	$275.60	99·9	$0.28	$ 1.37
47.60	276.93	275.60	99·5	1.33	6.52
47.70	277.99	275.60	99·1	2.39	11.71
47.80	279.05	275.60	98·8	3.45	16.91
47.90	280.11	275.60	98·4	4.51	22.11
48.00	281.17	275.60	98·0	5.57	27.30
48.10	282.23	275.60	97·6	6.63	32.50
48.20	283.29	275.60	97·3	7.69	37.70
48.30	284.35	275.60	96·9	8.75	42.89
48.40	285.41	275.60	96·6	9.81	48.08

It is now necessary to deal with the question of charitable donations and their influence towards the creation of refunds under the new table. At the same time, the influence of investment income of wage earners must also be considered because these two factors tend to counteract each other. Any income which is additional to the wage income increases the balance payable at the end of the year because, generally, such income is not subject to tax deduction at source. Charitable donations or allowable medical expenses tend to reduce the balance payable. In the year 1949, the total investment income of wage earners and salaried people was $71½ million. On the other hand, their charitable donations claimed totalled $53½ million and the medical expenses totalled $23½ million. Over the whole picture, therefore, the investment income exceeded the charitable donations and almost equalled the combined donations and medical expenses. However, the investment income of employees is undoubtedly concentrated into fewer hands than are the allowances and for this reason the figures may be used only as a general indication of the relative weight of these two opposing factors.

Turning to something more specific, a study of twenty thousand returns of employees, filed in our Toronto and Winnipeg district offices, showed that charitable donations were claimed as follows: Of the 20,000 taxpayers 69 per cent made no claim or claimed less than $5; 12 per cent claimed from $5 to $14; 5 per cent claimed from $15 to $24; 3 per cent claimed from $25 to $34; 2 per cent claimed from $35 to $44; and 9 per cent claimed $45 or more.

We come finally to the actual increase in tax deductions which arises purely from the revised basis and is over and above the 20 per cent increase resulting from the defence surtax. Across the whole field of wage earners, it is estimated that the increase might be about 5 or 6 per cent. In the case of those taxpayers who are earning a low income, the percentage increase might be much higher. As an extreme case, the weekly deduction for a single person without dependents, earning $25 a week, will be increased from 55 cents to 95 cents, or by 40 cents, whereas the defence surtax would only result in an increase of 10 cents. But this same person, instead of having $20.20 to pay at the end of the year, will in future have only $4.60 to pay at the end of the year. Percentages are misleading in these cases because the amounts involved are small. However, if percentages are to be used, it is true that the tax deduction has increased by 73 per cent instead of by the expected 20 per cent. But on the other hand, the year-end balance payable has been reduced by 77 per cent.

As stated at the outset, there has been no increase in the actual tax liability other than the authorized 20 per cent surtax. What has been altered is that the tax liability is spread more evenly throughout the year with a consequent lightening of the burden at the year end. In so far as the department is able to determine, this is the arrangement most suitable to the vast majority of wage earners. If the transition had occurred at a time of declining tax rates, I am sure there would have been no adverse comment. It is perhaps understandable that complaints have arisen when the effect of the change-over is added to the effect of the increased rates. However, had we neglected to make the change-over, the condition would be 20 per cent worse next April.

Finally, I should add that in those cases where the incidence of intermittent employment, charitable donations, or unusual medical expenses, brings about over-deductions of tax, refunds can and will be made within a very short time after the taxpayer files his annual return. This year, for example, all district offices had processed refunds within two to four weeks after the receipt of the returns. If the taxpayer will file his return promptly, the department will see to it that he gets his cheque with all possible dispatch.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, the minister has just given us a very interesting statement. I have given this matter considerable attention since the minister made his previous announcement. While I realize that many people would like to have the tax deducted at the source, while I realize that for most of them this is a most convenient method, there still are those who have hospital and medical bills to pay or who habitually donate to charities. I ask the minister if he will not given consideration to making appropriate alterations in the TD-1A form on which employees indicate their deductions so that when people are faced with what they know are going to be prolonged medical expenses they may indicate the approximate amount of those expenses and not be asked to pay income tax on them at the time they are paid.

I think this could be done with a simple alteration to the form. In spite of statistics to the contrary, many people do contribute heavily to charities. It is not fair that they should have to pay income tax on what they contribute and then have to wait nearly a year before they get their money back. The minister has said that it is the intention of the department to make refunds in a short time, but we must realize that no taxpayer can complete his return much before March 1 because he must wait until February 28 before his employer completes his return on the wages or salary paid. A refund could not be received until April at the earliest, and I think most people would do pretty well to get their refunds by June. When I say six months I think I am being quite optimistic.

The money is in the hands of the government and it is the old story that when the government owes you money, you do not get interest, but when you owe the government money, you pay interest. I think this objectionable position could be corrected, by making alterations on this form.

Mr. McCann: We will look into the matter raised by the hon. member for Hamilton West. It is just as hard for the taxpayer to anticipate what his medical expenses will be as it is to anticipate what his increased income may be.

Mrs. Fairclough: That may be, provided you do not have a specific instance. If you know that someone in your family has gone to hospital, if you know how long he may be there and how much you must pay per week, plus the surgery bills, you can make an estimate of the money you will have to spend before the end of the year.

Mr. Fleming: I think the statement made by the Minister of National Revenue has been useful and I am glad he has given us such an extended statement. However, I think he has revealed a more stringent approach to the problem than some of us had supposed would be made. I am not going to criticize the department for breaking down the present categories with a view to narrowing them. That is a perfectly reasonable approach. But when we find deductions scheduled to take 99·9 per cent of the income tax in certain categories, it seems to me that that is going too far. That is the whole basis of my reaction to the statement.

The fact is that you are going to create a great deal more work in the department and add to the administrative tasks of those who review the applications for refunds. It is going to mean that far more people are going to be overpaid than has hitherto been the case. In the meantime they will have to forgo interest, and wait until the department makes a refund. I agree that the department is showing better results in connection with refunds, but there is no sense in trying to extend these deductions to the point where inevitably you are going to increase the number of overpayments and the consequent applications for refund.

The minister has mentioned that this is not an increased deduction of 20 per cent to take care of the surcharge. That is perfectly obvious. Instead they have provided for its being pushed up by 73 per cent. It seems to me quite obvious that the department is going too far in this matter. The department is simply creating inconvenience for many taxpayers and more work for itself. A more moderate approach to this question would have been infinitely desirable.

Section agreed to.

On section 19—Refunds.

The Deputy Chairman: There was an amendment to section 20 moved the other day by the Minister of Agriculture. Does the committee wish me to read it again?

Mr. Abbott: The amendment that was introduced the other day was with respect to section 20. The amendment which I am now proposing is with respect to section 19, which replaces section 52 of the act relating to refunds. The hon. member for Eglinton raised the point that in the new section as amended reference had been omitted with respect to refunds without application therefor. I was informed that there was no intention of changing the law, and the section has now been redrafted to make it quite clear that upon the mailing of the notice of assessment for the year the minister may refund without application therefor where any overpayment has been made on account of tax. The amendment is to provide for the case where deductions have been made and no return filed. The taxpayer becomes entitled to a refund, and the section will now provide that if he wishes a refund he must file a return within two years in order to get that refund. I think that covers the point raised by the hon. member for Eglinton.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I move:

That subclause (1) of clause 19 of Bill 296 be amended by deleting subsection (1) of section 52 of The Income Tax Act set out therein and substituting the following therefor:

"52. (1) If the return of a taxpayer's income for a taxation year has been made within two years from the end of the year, the minister

(a) may, upon mailing the notice of assessment for the year, refund, without application therefor, any overpayment made on account of the tax, and

(b) shall make such refund after mailing the notice of assessment if application therefor has been made in writing by the taxpayer within twelve months from the day on which the overpayment was made or the day on which the notice of assessment was sent."

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Fleming: It is six o'clock. I should like to look it over. There is an amendment to another section standing, and I do not think we will lose any time.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Fleming: I think the amendment introduced just before the six o'clock adjournment makes a decided improvement in section 19 of the bill. I should like to ask one question in regard to the effect of the alternative provisions of clause (b) which reads:

shall make such refund after mailing the notice of assessment if application therefor has been made in writing by the taxpayer within twelve months from the day on which the overpayment was made or the day on which the notice of assessment was sent.

I take it the department is going to interpret that as giving the taxpayer the benefit of both those dates, and that the twelve months will operate from the later of the two?

Mr. Abbott: That is correct.

EMERGENCY GOLD MINING ASSISTANCE ACT

MODIFICATION OF APPLICATION AS TO LAST QUARTER OF 1950 AND EXTENSION IN MODIFIED FORM TO 1951

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys) moved the second reading of Bill No. 194, to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

Mr. Adamson: Is the minister going to make a statement?

Mr. Prudham: Yes. At the resolution stage we had a very comprehensive and constructive debate. The speeches were on a high level, and many helpful suggestions were made. I had prepared a rather full statement for delivery at this second reading stage, but at the insistence of the opposition I was persuaded to put it on the record at that time. My colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) will make a statement covering the international monetary fund and free market aspects of the problem. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, and with the consent of hon. members I would ask that his statement follow immediately upon the conclusion of my remarks.

During the time that has elapsed since the first reading of this bill we have undertaken a very careful review of the whole situation, and as a result of our study the government is now prepared to propose in the committee stage an amendment that will broaden the application of cost aid and give further assistance to the gold mines. Hon. members will recall that on the introduction of Bill No. 194 to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, certain questions were raised in respect to possible decreased payments to British Columbia lode gold mines as a result of the revision of the formula to be applied this year, 1951. The recent change in the formula for 1951, as in the bill now before the house, allows for payments on more assistance ounces than the original formula; and, assuming a similar production in 1951 as in 1950, it is estimated that five mines in British Columbia namely Bralorne, Cariboo Gold Quartz, Island Mountain, Kelowna Exploration and Pioneer, will be paid in 1951 on 103,250 assistance ounces in comparison with 98,086 assistance ounces in 1950, an estimated increase of 4·2 per cent in the number of ounces. In the British Columbia submission received by a number of hon. members, Polaris Taku was included. It is understood that this mine is being closed and the mill being taken over by other operators. It will thus receive payments for only a small production of 1951 previous to the cessation of operations. For this reason it is here omitted for comparative purposes of payments in 1950 and 1951.

Assuming that the production of the five British Columbia mines will be the same in 1951 as in 1950, applying the new formula as contained in this measure those five mines will receive $71,000 additional in cost-aid payments. The amendment we plan to propose in committee stage will give further cost aid to these mines. It is expected that the additional cost aid will compensate, if not fully at least to a large extent, for the reduction in the exchange premium. If the cost of production increases the amount of cost aid payments will likewise increase.

Hon. members will recall that when Bill No. 194 was introduced reference was made to the fact that smaller total payments were made to the mines in Canada in 1950 under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act than in 1949. Payments in 1949 amounted to $12,500,000 on 3,614,000 ounces of gold production eligible for assistance. In 1950 the assistance is estimated at $9,200,000 on 3,874,523 assistance ounces. The explanation for the decrease in payments is due to the fact that the Canadian dollar was devalued in relation to the United States dollar and the $3.50 per assistance ounce was deducted from the assistance paid on all ounces eligible for assistance. In 1950 the exchange premium received by the gold mines amounted to about $11,500,000. Thus in that year the benefits received by the mines over and above the price of $35 an ounce was $20,700,000, including cost aid amounting to $9,200,000. In 1949 the exchange premium received by the gold mines amounted to $3,100,000. Thus in 1949 the benefits received by the mines over and above the price of $35 an ounce was $15,600,000, including cost aid of $12,500,000.

It should be remembered in making this comparison that gold production was increasing, so that production from lode and placer mines eligible for assistance was 236,000 ounces greater in 1950 than in 1949. It should be remembered also that during this period costs were rising and the formula under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act is designed to give greater aid with higher costs. On the same production and same costs in 1951 as in 1950 it is expected that the amount of assistance that will be paid under the measure now before the house will be $10,500,000. If, as in 1950, a gold production of 3,850,000 ounces is eligible for assistance, the amount of premium at a discount of 6 per cent for the Canadian dollar in relation to the United States dollar will be about $8,085,000. Thus in addition to the $35 an ounce the gold mines are expected to receive from assistance and the dollar premium a total of $18,585,000 in 1951. Thus the amount that will be received by the gold mines under the conditions outlined above will be approximately $2,100,000 less in 1951 than in 1950, but will exceed the 1949 figures by approximately $2 million.

The amendment which we propose to introduce in committee is designed to increase cost-aid payments to the mines by further substantial amounts. Some hon. members drew the conclusion that because the number of mines receiving assistance decreased last year, there must have been a number of companies going out of existence. What was actually happening was something very different. Following the devaluation of the Canadian dollar on September 20, 1949, the gold mines received $38.50 per fine ounce of gold produced and sold to the Royal Canadian Mint. In the months of 1949 after devaluation the gold mines received not only the benefit from devaluation but also the full amount of cost-aid. By the amendments of December 10, 1949, the amount of cost-aid was reduced to the extent of $3.50 per ounce by changing the cost-aid formula rate from cost minus eighteen to cost minus twenty-five. This eliminated from emergency assistance benefits mines whose costs per ounce were between $18 and $25. What these mines lost by cost-aid was offset by the increased exchange premium. Although not an exactly technically correct description of the method adopted, this is the practical effect of what has been done.

Accordingly, when the hon. member for Eglinton stated that the total number of mines being assisted was dropping from 111 in 1948 to 95 in 1949 and to 75 in 1950, the adjustment I have just described accounts for the non-appearance of several mines on the list of those receiving emergency aid. But the explanation of the chief discrepancy in the totals given of mines being assisted is that the hon. member was quoting totals appearing in the 1950 annual report on the administration of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. These totals were incomplete because the necessary audits were delayed in the case of certain applications, especially in regard to placer mining companies in northern British Columbia and the Yukon.

Reference to the 1951 annual report shows that instead of a decrease in the number of mines assisted, the total in 1948 of 117 was increased to 121 in 1949. The total given for 1950, namely 83, is of course not a complete figure but there is no reason to suppose that the 1950 total will not be as high as that of 1949, less probably three or four mines. The aim of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act that this bill amends was, as the name implies, to assist the gold mines during an emergency period, and it is generally admitted that the act has operated successfully to accomplish this purpose. It is believed that the revision now being presented will accomplish a similar purpose.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): As my colleague the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham) indicated, Mr. Speaker, I intend to make a comparatively brief statement supplementing what he has just said. The house will recall that on December 27 last a delegation representing the Canadian gold mining industry in all parts of Canada came to Ottawa and made representations to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and a group of his colleagues. These representations related to the prevailing difficult conditions in the industry resulting from the increasing cost of production in the face of a fixed price for the industry's product, and included recommendations for various changes in legislation or policy designed to assist the industry in meeting the prevailing conditions and to avoid the closing down of mines with the hardships that this would cause to a number of small northern communities largely or wholly dependent upon such mines. Two of the major recommendations made by the delegation were that the Canadian gold mining industry should have access to premium markets on the same basis as other countries, and alternatively that the assistance payable under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act should be increased.

I made a statement in this house on March 9 in which I referred to the government's awareness of the special difficulties facing the industry. In referring to the question of premium sales I told the house that we had initiated discussions with officers of the international monetary fund, in order that our mines might obtain access to premium markets for gold under arrangements similar to those which the fund had agreed upon in the case of South Africa. We were informed that the fund's staff was studying the situation arising out of the sharp increase in premium gold sales, and were requesting the executive board of the fund to give urgent consideration to the question. We were asked to defer the submission of a formal proposal to the board, pending the outcome of the general review which it was undertaking.

The executive board considered the problem and passed the resolution which I quoted in my statement on March 9. This resolution noted that:

> the board considers the existing arrangements and practices of several countries, including South Africa, are no longer a satisfactory basis to implement the fund's gold policy and directs the staff of the fund urgently to elaborate, after consultation with the countries concerned, more effective measures than the existing ones.

That consultation has taken place. Officials representing some of the major gold producing and importing countries, including Canada, met with fund officials in April and exchanged information about the administrative arrangements in effect in these countries for the control of the export and import of gold. The results of this review by the fund are not yet available.

With the matter under such active consideration at the fund, we felt that it would be inappropriate for us to press our proposal for premium sales, at least for the time being. This is a question in which all members of the fund, including Canada, have an interest, and in which all have undertaken certain responsibilities. We believe that we should consult together in seeking to establish a consistent policy that can be enforced. It is particularly important in this period of international tension that we co-operate wholeheartedly with our friends.

In view of this decision, the government gave further consideration to possible adjustments in the payments to be made under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, with a view to carrying out certain modifications which should more effectively assist the industry in overcoming the special difficulties with which it is confronted in the present circumstances. In my statement on March 9 I referred to the changes which we intended to bring before this house in the form of amendments to the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. These amendments are contained in the bill which we are now considering. When we are in committee, as my colleague the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys has indicated, a further amendment will be proposed to this bill regarding the base year in the formula. We believe that this new program, which extends the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act on a modified basis to the year 1951, will be of further assistance to the industry generally in meeting rising costs of production, and will enable the continued operation of many mines in northern communities wholly or largely dependent on them.

I believe that the changes now proposed in the act would in fact be of greater assistance to that segment of the industry in need of help than would be the case under the alternative proposed of access to premium markets. Frankly, the government feels that the possible benefits to be obtained at the present time by exporting gold at premium prices have been exaggerated. We have given consideration to premium sales because the industry has requested it, and because we believe that Canadian gold mines should be in the same position with respect to these sales as the gold mining industry of other countries, particularly those which are members of the international monetary fund. Nevertheless, the best evidence at our disposal suggests that the industry, under present circumstances, will be assisted more effectively by the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act than it would be if there were no restrictions on the international sale of gold.

Let me illustrate this by references to the experience of South Africa. It is reported that in the calendar year 1950 the premiums received by the South African gold mines from the sales of gold at prices above the official price amounted to £2·1 million or approximately $6·4 million. In that year the total gold production of South Africa amounted to approximately 11,660,000 ounces. In other words, the average premium per ounce accruing to the industry amounted to 55 cents. By way of contrast, the assistance payments to Canadian gold mines eligible for Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act aid are expected to average about $2.40 for each ounce produced in 1950, including the increases for the last quarter of 1950 proposed in the present amendment. On the basis of total gold produced in Canada the average assistance would amount to approximately $2.10 per ounce.

It may be suggested that calculations should be based on current prices rather than 1950 prices. There was certainly a sharp rise in premium prices in January and February of this year. The South African figures reported for the first quarter of this year reflect this increase. These reports show that the average premium received in the first quarter—that is, the first quarter of this year—amounted to approximately $1.90 per ounce, when spread over the whole of the South African gold production. The price since then, however, has fallen off in spite of the fact that South Africa has been following a policy of limiting premium gold sales to about 40 per cent of production.

I would like to contrast these figures with the assistance to the Canadian industry under the proposed amendment to the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. Assuming the same production in 1951 as in 1950, the average return to that portion of the industry eligible for assistance under the act will amount to something of the order of $2.90 per ounce, or about $2.50 for each ounce of gold produced in the country.

I think it is clear from these figures that we are justified in assuming that the industry under present conditions would gain more under the act than from premium sales. I exclude, of course, those mines not eligible for assistance under the act; that is, mines producing other metals to the extent of at least 30 per cent of the total value of their production. But the mines which produce gold more or less as a by-product have the advantage of the sharp increase in base metal prices which has taken place during the past year and are not in the same position as mines which obtain the bulk of their income from gold production.

Over the past few years the premium price has been very sensitive to fluctuations in world demand and supply conditions. For this reason, if our mines were to depend upon the premium received from export sales in lieu of the certain returns which they now receive under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, their incomes would fluctuate sharply with the rise and fall in the premium levels. The situation would be particularly difficult for those marginal mines which receive the maximum assistance under the act. As a result of the changes now proposed, mines with a cost of production in excess of $45 per ounce would receive $11.50 in assistance per eligible ounce or $5.75 for each ounce produced in 1951. These mines know where they stand under the act; a fluctuating return from premium sales would place them in a much more difficult position in planning their future operations.

Quite apart from these considerations, there is another important point I would like to raise in connection with premium sales. I believe that the stability and prosperity of the gold-mining industry depend primarily on the use of gold as a monetary metal. A very large proportion of the gold produced during the last half century has gone into monetary reserves; gold has been used by nations as a standard of value for currencies, as a foreign exchange reserve, and as a backing for domestic currency. It has retained its position as a national and international standard of value largely because its price has remained relatively stable, and has not moved up and down with every change in the general price level.

All of us are keenly aware of the difficulties experienced by the gold mining industry at the present time. The fact that the government has put into effect such a program of assistance as the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act is, I think, a clear indication of our concern for the industry's continuing welfare. There may be different views about the appropriate price of gold at any given time, but it seems clear that if the official price were subject to rapid fluctuations or if gold were to be treated as an ordinary commodity like any other metal, there is a grave danger that the long-term stable market for gold as a monetary standard might be impaired. I think that the gold-mining industry as well as the government must bear this in mind in considering the various alternative methods of dealing with the present problems facing the industry.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have had the minister's statement before I spoke, because I propose to deal with the subject along the lines that he has spoken. I think my remarks will deal in detail with exactly the statement he has given to the house, and I think they will show the mistakes in the present policy, both of the government and of the international monetary fund.

The bill before us does not deal only with the gold mining industry, but because of the monetary policy of the government it involves the whole question of money and inflation. No industry has the right to ask the taxpayers of Canada to support it unless they, through their government, impose conditions upon it which make operation economically impossible. The gold-mining industry today suffers from this; and while I shall support the bill, it will neither save the industry from destruction nor prevent further deterioration in the value of the national currency.

At the present time a great deal is being said about inflation, and there is a clamour for such devices as price controls and other artificial restrictions in order to curb it. One fundamental fact, however, is never mentioned and that is that inflation is politically popular. The promise of more inflation has elected every democratically-chosen government for the last twenty years in every free country. It is a sure-fire bait for the electorate. They love it and want more of it. The leaders of all political parties which form the governments, certainly of the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada, know this and realize that if they are to be returned, they must continue the same policy.

I have used the word "inflation", but this is just another way of saying a political promise of something for nothing. A policy of economy never wins elections. It never has and probably never will. The people of all the free countries have an opportunity to end inflation at the next election, but they will not do it; first, because they do not want to and second—and this is tragic—because they might not find a political party to vote for whose policy would effectively do so. So deluded and frustrated have the people become that no political party would dare to advocate the politically unpopular measures necessary to restore equilibrium to the economy even at today's inflated level. What I propose to say now therefore will certainly not be popular.

The issuing of money for which no goods or services are provided is the cornerstone on which every successful political party builds its policy. This is deliberate inflation, yet it will go on until it has ruined a large enough percentage of the politically-active electorate to enable the government to be turned out. It is already ruining those who are on fixed incomes, on pensions or depending on insurance, and it will also ruin those who have had their bargaining position impaired by age.

Neglecting inflation is like trying to appease dictators. Some people think they can profit by it and encourage it; some actually do profit by it for a short time. But when it really gets going it destroys everybody. The dollar today is worth about fifty cents in terms of pre-war dollars. Yet workers see no danger in being paid $2 for every dollar they earned in 1939, even though it may cost them more than $2 to buy as much as $1 bought before the war.

The principle of the bill before us concerns the bonusing of an industry and the reason that this is necessary is directly due to the government's monetary policy. Therefore some mention must be made of this at this time. Inflation, as has been said, is the result of too much money chasing too few goods. As the government, through the Bank of Canada, exercises a very great control over the money supply, it is interesting to note what has happened in this regard since the beginning of the war. The money supply can be divided into three headings. First, total currency and active bank accounts; second, inactive bank deposits; and third, dominion government securities. In 1938 the total of these was $5,831 million. As of the end of December, 1950, which is the last definite figure available, this had risen to $18,781 million, an increase of some $13 billion, or nearly three and one-quarter times the pre-war figure. During this time the physical as against the monetary volume of business had nowhere nearly tripled. As an example of this I shall quote carloadings, which are generally considered to be a reliable index of the physical volume of production. In 1937, 2,634,000 cars loaded; in 1950, 3,906,000, or an increase of one and a half times, as against three and a quarter times for the money supply. In other words, there is now over twice as much money available for each freight car loaded as there was before the war. This is a rough, but I consider significant, indication of the condition of too much money chasing too few goods. I took the 1937 figure rather than the first war years because trucking competition to the railways had not at that time been diminished by war restrictions.

Having shown that the money supply has increased over twice the rate of the physical production of goods, and is continuing to do so, we have two courses open to us to check inflation. The first is to increase greatly the supply of goods, and the second is to curb the increase in the supply of money. It is in this last way that we can do most to check continued inflation, although we must have increased productivity at the same time. I believe that we can use our gold to aid us in preventing further excessive increases in the money supply.

Inflation can take place despite the fact that the national budget has been balanced. I wish to emphasize this point because many people believe that if the government balances its budget there can be no increase in the money supply. This unfortunately is not true, as the figures I have just quoted show. An unbalanced budget will of course add to the danger but inflation certainly takes place even though a government budgets for and attains a surplus of revenue over expenditures.

It seems to be forgotten that currency has two functions. The first is as a medium of exchange, and the second is as a store of value. It is this second function of currency which has been destroyed by government action. At the present time a man would be a fool to hoard currency as a means of providing security for himself in the future, as it is obvious that currency is going to be worth less and less as the years go by. Many people are now questioning the wisdom of holding a large, or even a moderate percentage of government securities, or any fixed return obligation such as bonds or non-participating preferred stocks, because the income from these sources has a constantly decreasing purchasing power. At the same time anyone who is now dependent for his future security on life insurance must have grave doubts as to the amount of security he will have when the policies are due. Therefore today the prudent man endeavours to put his savings into common stock equities or real property. Now this is all very well for anyone with a reasonable amount of capital, but the ordinary worker who can only safeguard his future through such measures as insurance or pension plans of some nature must rely for his security not only on the number of dollars he will have at a certain time, but on the purchasing power these dollars will command at the time he is ready to use them. Under the present circumstances he has no guarantee of any security whatsoever. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in order to safeguard the very lives of the majority of our citizens we must take steps now to see to it that the currency is not further debauched. We know from world history and from bitter experience that no practical system of price control will prevent this. We know that no government in history has ever been able to manage currency, and that all attempts to do so have resulted in ruin. The only safeguard that has ever worked is a gold currency, or a paper currency, exchangeable into gold at a fixed rate. In this regard I was very pleased tonight to hear the minister state that he still has confidence in gold and that gold is the one sheet anchor which has preserved and will preserve the stable economy of any country. This therefore, that is the preservation of a gold currency or a stable currency, should be one of the goals of all responsible governments. Unfortunately there are no signs that it is so by any government in the world today, with the possible exception of Switzerland.

There is another matter which is causing me, and should be causing both this and the United States government, great concern, and that is how are they going to be able to go to the public in an emergency and ask them to buy bonds; with a continual lowering of the purchasing power of the dollar how are the people going to be persuaded to buy bonds when they know that every coupon they clip will be worth just a little bit less than the one before, and that the capital repayment they will get at maturity will suffer the greatest depreciation of all?

There is nothing wrong with Canada's credit. There is abounding faith in our future through the development of our natural resources. If the supply of money continues to go up twice as fast as the physical production of goods, then how can anyone honestly recommend an investment in terms of money, which is obviously going to deteriorate in its relationship to goods? A currency exchangeable on sight demand into gold at a fixed rate will obviously maintain its value in terms of gold. Throughout the history of the world gold has always maintained its value in terms of goods. Irredeemable paper never has. Surely, Mr.

Speaker, it is vital to our national security to prevent further rot in the currency. Surely this must now be plain to most members of the house, even though the people themselves are only now vaguely beginning to be aware of their danger.

Before we can return to a fixed gold standard we must establish what gold is worth, and the only way to do that is through the operation of the free market. No one at this time can arbitrarily state what gold is worth in terms either of the United States or of Canadian paper currency. However, just as the Canadian dollar has stabilized itself in terms of the United States dollar when it was allowed to go free, so will the Canadian dollar and the United States dollar stabilize themselves in terms of gold if a free market were established. In this question there are people and many learned economists who believe that we can return to a gold standard today or that the United States could at the present value of $35 an ounce. I disagree with them, Mr. Speaker, because I feel with the tremendously inflated currency base in the United States, and the tremendously inflated bond issue and national debt, if the United States dollar were put on a gold basis, and were made freely exchangeable into gold, there would be a run on the hoard at Fort Knox, which would rapidly deplete the gold holdings of the United States, so that they could not maintain it. That is exactly what happened in 1926 in England when the British pound was put back on the gold standard at the old rate of 84 shillings to the ounce. When stability has taken place, a return to the full gold standard will be possible without fear of draining the gold reserves of the country, unless the national government decides on a policy of violently unbalanced budgets. If this happens, the gold outflow will force any government to balance its budget. In Canada, where we have rigidly pursued a policy of balanced budgets, there should be no danger of the loss of gold so long as this fiscal policy is pursued.

Having discussed briefly the economic conditions of a free gold market, let us see how this would assist the gold mines. First, I want to make it abundantly clear that the gold mines never asked for any bonus, all they ask is the world price for the product they produce. If gold is not worth more than $35.00 an ounce on the open market, no gold miner will complain, and it is certainly not the taxpayers' duty to pay him more. However, the facts of the case do not show this to be true. Let us take the case of South Africa, where a degree of free marketing has been allowed during the past year. When I say a degree of free gold marketing, there are certain very definite strings to it. First, only 40 per cent of the total production of any month can be marketed, and it has to be marketed during that month, irrespective of market conditions. It cannot be held for better prices. This is the first restriction. The second restriction is that the gold marketed is industrial gold of 22 carats fineness, and not bullion. Gold bullion is what is required on a free market and it should be available in convenient coin sizes, as well as in bars. The third restriction is that gold can only be sold in countries who are members of the international monetary fund. Despite this, the operation has been highly profitable.

For the record, I will give the profits made on this transaction. These figures show the excess over the statutory price gained by African mines for the various periods quoted in pounds sterling:

For the 3 months ending Dec. 31, 1949—	£847,691
For the 3 months ending Mar. 30, 1950—	649,738
For the 3 months ending June 30, 1950—	99,923
For the 3 months ending Sept. 30, 1950—	534,112

The Economist, London, England, in their April 28 issue shows a total added income to the mines from sale of gold for these purposes for the calendar year 1950 as being £2,123,547 and for the first quarter of 1951, ending March 31, £1,937,977.

It is quite obvious from the above figures that the demand on this market for gold and the price offered have been increasing rapidly from the end of June, 1950. If for purpose of rough calculation we assume the pound to be worth $3, the dollar equivalent of the extra income for the whole of 1950 becomes, roughly, $6 million. The total production of gold from the Rand as per the South African "Mining Journal" of February 24, 1951, and for the calendar year 1950 was 11,659,000 ounces. The added income to the mines for that period, therefore, and for total ounces produced worked out at between 50 cents and 60 cents an ounce. For the first quarter of 1951, however, total production in January was 954,791 ounces, in February, 886,057 ounces. For March the figure is not yet available, but assuming 900,000 ounces gives a total production of some 2,750,000 ounces. The added income of almost $6 million for this same period shows additional price per total ounce production of something over $2.00 an ounce.

Knowing something of the growth and demands of this market during the past war, it seems obvious that had the South African mines been permitted to sell 40 per cent of their total production on a cumulative basis and not restricted to month to month sales, the 1950 benefits would have been materially increased.

Had we followed the courageous lead of South Africa in breaking the frustrating ties of the international monetary fund, which we could have done just as legally as South Africa, the net result would have been a gain on an average output of four million ounces a year of approximately $4.50 an ounce on 1,600,000 ounces per annum, being 40 per cent of our total production, or, expressed in dollars, $7,200,000 a year or over $14 million in the two years since the South Africa plan has been operating. These figures are based on the free marketing price of gold in New York which has fluctuated between $41 and $43 per ounce in the same period. Another way of showing this is to say that South Africa is now making a profit of $2.00 per ounce on her total production, and had we adopted this measure we would now be obtaining approximately $8 million more per annum for our gold production.

In this connection it is interesting to note that the United States allows Alaskan producers to sell commercial gold against what is known as warehouse receipts. This is a device by which these producers obtain the world price for commercial gold. This policy is designed to help Alaskan miners and thereby keep as large as possible a population in Alaska for reasons of national security.

In this regard I would like to mention an article in the Financial Post for April 14 of this year because this paper seems to represent the anti-gold policy of the Department of Finance. As a matter of fact, it seems to be almost a spokesman for the department. In this article it belittles the benefits of the free market to the gold mines. Taking the four statements made by this journal in order, I shall make the following rebuttal:

First, the figures given do show that the free market has steadily risen. The lowered profit of under £100,000 for the three months ending June, 1950 was reported to be caused by Russian sales, particularly in Switzerland, not in order to depress the market but to buy war material. The restrictions imposed on the South African mines prevented them from withholding their production during the period of this weaker market and, thus, a lower profit was obtained.

The second statement that the free market is not capable of absorbing all Canadian production is, I think, manifestly untrue—firstly, on the figures of the bank for international settlements at Basle in Switzerland, where the amount of gold that has disappeared into private hands during the past years is actually greater than the total Canadian production at the present rate, and secondly, on the personal observation of men who have actually seen free markets in operation and state that in many cases over a million dollars worth changes hands daily. The actual figures of gold going into private hands during the year 1950 can be shown as follows:

The world gold production for the year is estimated at $850 million. The gold holdings of governments who are members of the international monetary fund was, on December 31, 1949, $35,410 million, and on December 31, 1950, this had risen to $35,830 million, or an increase of $420 million. Taking this from the stated world production of $850 million during the same period, it is easily seen that no less a sum than $430 million actually went into private hands. The figures are from the international financial statistics published by the international monetary fund in April of this year. Actually the figures shown by the federal reserve system at Washington show that even less gold was made available to the monetary authorities of the various governments. The seriousness of this is that as a decreasing amount of gold is being made available to governmental fiscal authorities the time will soon come when new government paper either in the shape of currency or bonds will have no gold backing whatsoever. The consequences of this must be obvious. Continuing with the free gold market, when this operated before the opening of the 1914 war governments had ready access to gold for their own monetary purposes. The only thing they had to do was to pay a fair price for it on the open market or establish convertible gold currency. They had one of two alternatives. Today owing to the strange regulations of the international monetary fund, despite everything we are doing we are driving gold underground. On their own figures more than half the gold production of the world went into hoarding.

One thing we want to do is to stabilize the world's currencies. One way in which we can stabilize the world's currencies is to give them a gold backing, and the one way they can get a gold backing is for the monetary authorities of the various governments to have access to the production of gold. At the present time, on the international monetary fund's own figures, more than half the gold is going to private hoards or through various devices on different markets of the world. If a free gold market were established without restrictions, how many Americans and Canadians would immediately, as a hedge against further inflation, like to buy a little gold? From personal observation I know their number would be legion. I feel certain that if all restrictions on the sale of gold were removed we would have no difficulty in selling all our production at a price at least $10 over the present statutory price, and probably a great deal higher at the present time.

Refuting the third item of this article, the costs of putting gold into marketable form are not excessive. They run to a maximum of about 30 cents an ounce. The mint charges for this service are from three to ten cents an ounce, and they are making a reasonable charge. They have a sliding scale depending upon the fineness of the gold. On top of this, the Department of Finance collects a handling charge of 20 cents an ounce. The costs of over $2 per ounce, which the South Africans are forced to pay, are caused entirely by the fantastic regulations of the international monetary fund.

The procedure is as follows: Refined gold is produced from South African ore in the refinery in that country. This bullion is then adulterated down to 22 carats by the addition of an alloy. The so-called commercial gold is then shipped to the purchaser who has to manufacture it into objects of art, which generally take the form of easily poured little golden statues, and which are shipped out of the country to non-members of the international monetary fund where it is then re-refined to produce bullion and coins. Naturally, therefore, the cost of first refining the gold, second adulterating it down to 22 carats, third casting it into objects of art and shipping these to non-member countries, and fourth re-refining them into bullion is an expensive operation. The entire cost of this, which is somewhere in the nature of $2 an ounce, is directly due to the ridiculous regulations of the international monetary fund. How much more profitable this market would be if South Africa could obtain this extra $2 an ounce is obvious. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this regulation has been deliberately made in order to make the South African operation as unprofitable as possible.

The fourth point in rebuttal is the substantial sales actually being made in increasing volume by South Africa. These figures I have already quoted. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, on these figures the operation of this extremely restricted market has been most profitable to South Africa and, judging from the latest figures, there has been a profit of over $534,000 in the last quarter. In the last available quarterly statement it appears that this market will be very much more profitable to her in the year to come. With regard to the expense and the establishment of a free market, I am convinced that an exchange mechanism could be established for buying and selling bullion similar to the bullion markets which existed before the first war, and that an extraordinarily handsome profit could be made by the brokers if they charged a tenth of 1 per cent commission. Probably it could be done for a great deal less, and I am certain the mining industry would be prepared to establish such a market without cost to anyone.

As a matter of fact I have been told that that is so, and certainly the gold mines of Ontario and the mines generally would be prepared to establish a bullion market similar to the one established in London, and would operate it without cost whatsoever. The device would be the establishment of a non-profit corporation, which is a familiar financial device.

The plight of the gold mines is well known. It can, however, be stated in quite simple terms. The cost of producing a unit of gold has gone up 68 per cent since before the war, and is steadily increasing. The price received is actually less now than obtained in 1939. What other product, whether raw or manufactured, could be sold today at pre-war prices without the producer going bankrupt? The gold mining industry, in simple terms, is going bankrupt.

Here are the facts. In 1940 the industry made a net profit of $55 million. These figures are from the Canada Year Book. In 1947 this had been cut to $6 million after taxes, and half of this came from investment income. In 1950, without investment income, the industry made no profit, and today it is operating at a loss. I should like to mention that for the first time in our history mineral production in Canada passed the billion mark, and actually was, according to the latest D.B.S. estimate, more than 1,041 million. Of this gold was the largest single item, amounting to approximately 16 per cent. The importance of this industry cannot be overestimated, and despite the fact that our production increased last year the facts are plain for anyone to see. You cannot run an industry unless you are making profits. Unfortunately all of us know many enterprises that have had a big turnover and yet have gone bankrupt.

The effect of the bill is that the people of Canada have to pay through this subsidy approximately $12 million this year in order that the government may sell Canadian gold to the United States treasury at a price below that obtainable in the world market, and by so doing make a present to the United States of not only the subsidy but also the difference between the price we could obtain on the free market for all our gold production and the sum obtained at the statutory price of $35 an ounce imposed on us by the Bretton Woods agreement. In other words, the Canadian people are bonusing the American people by $5 to $10 an ounce on nearly 4 million ounces or, conservatively, $25 million to $30 million this year, assuming a mean differential of only $7.50 per ounce.

Another question enters here. Today we are mining the rich ores of the mines. If this chamber could be considered an ore body, we are merely taking out the rich ore in the centre strip between the two lines of desks, leaving the great mass to the walls of the chamber untouched. That is a scandalous destruction of natural resources, because once the rich ore has been taken from a mine the low grade ore can never be recovered. Were we able to mine the ore bodies to their full width I am certain that the 4 million ounces, more or less, that we presently produce could be increased by at least 50 per cent within a period of three or four years. Given a production of 6 million ounces or the figure of 7 million ounces which has been mentioned to me, at the free market price of approximately $50 an ounce we are losing from $350 million to $400 million a year. We are jeopardizing an industry capable of producing that amount of new wealth every year. We are jeopardizing an industry that in those circumstances would cost the Canadian taxpayers nothing, an industry that above all others would help us in our adverse international balance of payments. We are doing that because of our adherence to the theories of the international monetary fund.

Not only are we doing this but, because our gold industry is operating at far below its productive capacity if the free market price were obtainable, we are losing the opportunity of selling much more of the prime product of our international trade. Today our unfavourable balance of payments with the United States is probably running at the rate of something over $400 million a year, and we cannot afford to lose any market. The free market price for gold in coin form is between $50 and $55 an ounce in Paris this week. I use Paris as being the best known and most steadily quoted rates. The average for the past year in coin form has fluctuated only some $7 an ounce or in the range of $47 to $54 an ounce in terms of United States dollars. Here I emphasize that the dollars quoted are United States dollars. The value of gold as against paper standards on the free market in Paris places the United States dollar at a discount of between 40 and 50 per cent in terms of gold. That is approximately what it has been depreciated to in purchasing power. Bar gold and raw bullion are quoted somewhat lower because the form they are in is not so convenient or acceptable to buyers. In this connection, England recently minted sovereigns and, I believe, gold thalers, a coin acceptable in the Near East. Italy has also minted gold coins, and probably many other countries have wisely done so. If a consumer wants goods in a certain form and will pay for them it seems to me only good marketing practice to let him have them. Actually one can expect that if a free market were established in Canada the difference between the price of gold in coin form and the price in bar form would decrease until it almost disappeared. For the sake of convenience the gold coin will probably always sell for slightly more per ounce than the gold bar. Naturally bullion fineness of 24 carats is essential in all sales. Bullion is bullion, not 22 carats industrial gold or tubes of 80 per cent placer gold dust. Bullion is what is wanted on a free gold market; nothing else should be recognized or sold.

The value of gold to the economy of Canada has been questioned by the Social Credit party. As this party is from Alberta and Alberta quite rightly has pinned its faith on the oil industry, I think it would be interesting to hear what the leaders of the oil industry think about the gold industry. Last September when the provincial ministers of mines met in Victoria they were addressed by Mr. Auxier, president of the natural gas and petroleum association, which is the spokesman for that industry. In discussing the magnificent future he stated:

> By the end of 1952 it is hoped that the Canadian oil industry would save Canada in foreign exchange $130 million annually or nearly as much as Canada's great gold industry.

That is what the spokesman of this industry had to say about gold mining even in its present depressed state. Were the gold industry to be given its head there is no doubt that for many years to come it would be a greater contributor to Canada's foreign exchange than the oil industry. Yet because of a slavish adherence to the instrument of a discredited economic theory, we are kicking the gold industry out of the window. The question which must be asked now is, is our membership in the international monetary fund worth the gold industry? I agree with hon. members of the Social Credit party that they were alone in sensing the danger of this international agency. I regret that I supported it; but originally it was to be an agency for the stabilization and freeing of world currencies. Actually the operations have been the absolute reverse; instead of freeing currencies and stabilizing them, nowhere in the world do you find freely exchangeable moneys except where there is a gold standard; and as I have pointed out before, the operation of the international monetary fund if anything has driven gold underground.

In resolutely opposing a free market the international monetary fund is doing the one thing that is destroying a return to the gold standard and fastening upon the world controlled currencies, restricted currencies, blocked currencies and several types of currency for every nation. Nothing is so holding up the recovery of Europe as the international frustration caused by currency control. Nothing so militates against us in Canada as our inability to freely exchange our currency with the nationals of other countries in payment for goods or services without either their government or our government interfering in the transaction. I say in all seriousness there is no agency today outside the communist world which has such a great potential for evil as the international monetary fund, and I am convinced that unless and until we withdraw from membership in that hydra-headed monster, the brain child of the Keynesian theorists, neither we nor the rest of the world with whom we wish to trade will recover. This device has been the supreme instrument for placing international trade in a strait-jacket. Unfortunately it has now become the instrument of policy of the United States treasury, and as such is undoing a great deal of the good of the Marshall plan. Having been in Europe for three months this year I can testify that nowhere did I see free currency. Everywhere there are restrictions between countries: national bank restrictions, currency restrictions, restrictions on export sales, restrictions on imports so that the recovery of Europe is being delayed. The efforts of the magnificent Marshall plan were being frustrated and jeopardized because there was no adequate, free currency in Europe. I believe in all seriousness that a freely interchangeable currency is an absolute necessity for world recovery.

In this regard, I should like to quote from a speech made by O. Glen Saxon, professor of economics at Yale University, speaking before the thirty-first annual convention of the national association of mutual savings banks on May 7 of this year. In discussing the evils of the present economic theorists in the United States government, he stated that they had: (1) Devalued the dollar forty-one per cent in terms of gold; (2) partially remonetized silver further to dilute the money supply; (3) operated on an unbalanced budget for twelve years; (4) repudiated the gold clause in government bonds and outlawed the gold clause in both past and future contracts, private and governmental; (5) made all United States money irredeemable in gold, except at the discretion of the treasury, and subject to progressive partial and possible total repudiation through inflation; (6) established arbitrary and artificially high values for foreign currencies; and, lastly, drained away the gold reserves of foreign nations and forced them to managed currencies, and created a monopoly of gold in the United States.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is this that is destroying world trade. Gold has been and always will be the lubricating medium on which the machinery of world trade operates. Until gold comes out of hoarding at Fort Knox and from private hoards throughout the world, it cannot fulfil this essential function. Therefore, it is imperative that we do everything to start gold flowing in the veins of international trade once more. Freeing it from all restrictions is the surest way to do this.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): When the resolution preceding this bill was before the house, Mr. Speaker, the members of this group all refrained from speaking, in order to facilitate the passage of the resolution that afternoon. I just want to take a few minutes to place before the house the position of the members of this group with respect to this bill and this type of legislation. This is a very unusual bill because it is sponsored by a government that refuses to subsidize the necessities of life; it is supported by an official opposition that is opposed to subsidies in principle; it is supported by the Social Credit group whose main argument in support of their policies indicates their belief that gold is not the true measure of value or the necessary basis upon which to issue money or credit; it is supported by the members of this group as a purely temporary measure, as a pill you might say to relieve the pains of economic indigestion that are affecting the gold industry today. Now, all these groups are supporting this bill for various reasons. But, Mr. Speaker, the bill is opposed by the independent coalition member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson), who on February 12 expressed his disappointment at the introduction of this measure by the government.

I want to deal briefly with his remarks, because at that time he did advance a somewhat new economic theory. The member for Comox-Alberni has not issued a written manifesto or policy, but I believe he has indicated the general outline of his policy in the remarks he has made in various debates, particularly in connection with this bill.

Mr. Gibson: I did not have a Regina manifesto, anyway.

Mr. Herridge: The member supported the C.C.F. policy by endorsing public ownership of pipe lines. He supports Progressive Conservative policy by being a strong supporter of free enterprise. I would judge from his remarks on the occasion of the introduction of this bill that he advocates a sort of super social credit, because he believes in issuing currency and credit and upon the unknown quantity of gold in the earth owned by somebody else. We shall hear more about that later, I believe. It is obvious that in his approach to this bill, and by his remarks on various other bills, the member has indicated he has an all-embracing, somewhat crystal gazing program.

Mr. Gibson: Empirical is a better word.

Mr. Herridge: It is obvious that in connection with this bill he supports the principle of free enterprise to the full, because he says to the gold mining industry "Root hog or die." He supports our C.C.F. principles by suggesting that credit should be based on natural wealth, and not on mined gold. He supports the Social Credit policy by his obvious advocacy of the suggestion that currency and credit should be issued debt free on a private mystery. Without doubt the hon. member's policy in connection with this bill is a strange amalgam of economic theories, which indicates he does have a different economic policy from anyone else. We have on the one hand, Mr. Speaker, the organized trade union movement so far as the gold mining industry is concerned; management so far as the gold mining industry is concerned; the federal government, the provincial governments, municipal governments: in fact we have all Canada supporting this bill for various reasons, at least as a temporary expedient to assist the gold mining industry of this country. On the other side we have the member for Comox-Alberni. Before proceeding with my arguments in connection with this bill, I must say that I admire his tilting at the windmills of circumstance.

Mr. Gibson: You are the windmill.

Mr. Herridge: I salute him as the greatest Don Quixote who has been produced in Canadian public life since confederation.

I have listened to the various members supporting this bill for different reasons and from various points of view. I have listened to the chorus to gold sung by the member for Cochrane, and the member who just preceded me. I have listened to the policy advocated by the member for Comox-Alberni. I wish to make our position in connection with this bill quite clear. It appears to us that from the days when men worshipped the golden calf mankind has been inclined to be hypnotized by gold. I find that on page 1686 of Hansard for April 6, 1951, the member for Cochrane states:

> I have an appeal to make at the present time, first of all to the national treasury, asking them to use all their influence to assist the gold mines, because the yardstick of gold must of necessity be maintained, . . .

We cannot agree in any sense with that position as advocated by the member for Cochrane. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in a few words I want to define our point of view concerning what wealth and money is, and our attitude towards the gold standard.

In our opinion wealth is something that sustains life or contributes to the well-being of society. A piece of bread, a bin of coal, a lovely flower, all contribute to life. Gold in the vaults at Ottawa, a bank note or a silver coin do not do this until they are exchanged for something else that is real wealth. We cannot eat money, nor can we drink it. It ministers to life only when it is exchanged for something else. The commodities which do sustain life are real wealth, and these are produced for us by the primary producers, the tillers of the soil; those who go down to the sea in ships; the lumbermen; the miners; and those who in a secondary way further the process of production or give services that make these products available to mankind. Now, Mr. Speaker, that is our definition of real wealth as opposed to the conception that looks upon gold as real wealth, and the real basis upon which currency and credit should be issued in this country. We believe that money is the financial wheel of our civilization carrying the accumulated labour receipts from one person to another and from one corner of the earth to another, even from one generation to another. Remember that it is the commodities that are important, not the wheel that circulates them; for it is through the commodities that our means of livelihood comes. For an individual to hoard gold, as money, is no more sensible than it is for a man to hoard wheels, in our opinion. Money is but a wheel in the financial world, and no amount of gold in the nations' treasuries can bring prosperity unless it is used to move commodities.

Just a brief word with regard to the gold standard. To many in this house the gold standard is almost sacred. We have been told that we must not meddle with this bulwark else the whole fabric of civilization will come tumbling about our ears. Some leaders, with an almost benediction hush in their voices, have informed Canadians from time to time that the country's honour was at stake and that the present international financial arrangements must not be molested, regardless of the fact that Canada has long since announced that no citizen would be paid gold in return for its currency, but that it was to be kept for the manipulations of the international bankers. We all know, Mr. Speaker, that so far as our internal currency is concerned, it is not in any sense of the word based on gold.

I cannot emphasize too strongly the fact that we in this group believe that man's labour on the earth is the only source of wealth and that gold has nothing to do with it; that our currency and credit have real value and that, to work effectively, must be based on the production of those who produce in this country and not upon the production of gold as in the past. We admit that the Bretton Woods agreement is an attempt to bring some stability to this artificial measure of value in the world, to bring some order out of chaos. The agreement indicates that even international bankers realize the necessity for some measure of planning. I should like to bring that fact to the attention of some of my friends to the right who were rather critical of the members of this group when they emphasized the fact that if we are going to have some order in international affairs and in our domestic economic affairs it is necessary to do some planning. Even international bankers have found it necessary to do some planning in order to try to bring order out of chaos in the establishment of the international monetary fund.

Mr. Low: Planning for whom?

Mr. Herridge: Those signatory to the agreement. A good many people are of the opinion that United States interests are receiving first consideration, because of the strength of that country, in the administration of this fund. I was greatly interested in the remarks made by the previous speaker when he said he had voted for the Bretton Woods agreement, but that the international monetary fund and the Bretton Woods agreement had not functioned quite as well as he had expected when he supported that measure. I am of opinion, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member is not alone in Canada in that connection. While it was looked upon at the time as an attempt to bring some international economic order out of chaos, a good many people are beginning to think that American interests are dominating the policies of the international monetary fund. For instance, at the present time, as I think the previous speaker mentioned, when he discussed the technical details of gold—and I have not the ability to do that because, as a matter of fact, I have never had any gold; I am advancing our general opinions and approach to this question.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): The Kootenay country has.

Mr. Herridge: But not I personally. The district I have the honour to represent has mined gold extensively throughout the years, is mining gold at the present time, and has large reserves of gold ore in various mines that are not being operated.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): You are going against your own people.

Mr. Herridge: The hon. member for Cariboo does not understand what I am talking about, Mr. Speaker. If the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Murray) will just exercise his patience and exercise his intellectual equipment to the ultimate of its capacity until I am finished, I am optimistic enough to believe that he will have at least an infinitesimal appreciation of the subject I am trying to elucidate.

As the hon. member said, we know that actually gold on the open market is worth $5 to $10 an ounce more than is being paid at the present time. I think there is no doubt about it that we are receiving less than our gold is worth, in real value. I know that the trade unions and the managements concerned say that Canada should not be restrained to $35 an ounce by the international monetary fund. I think the government should give serious consideration to these representations.

In addition to that, we have the attitudes of governments towards the gold standard. I just want to give an illustration, for the benefit of my friend the hon. member for Cariboo. When governments come to think in terms of real value and real wealth, we find that they do not talk in terms of gold. Quite recently there was a hearing in the United States in connection with the application of the United States government for the building of a dam at Libby on the Kootenay river, which would flood a certain portion of the constituency of the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne). The matter was brought before the international joint commission, for the members to hear of the circumstances. What do I read? The government of British Columbia gave serious consideration as to what the form of payment should take in compensation for this damage to Canadian territory. To support my argument that governments know what real value is—that it is not gold, not currency, not money—I will quote from the brief of the government of British Columbia when considering compensation in connection with the application to build that dam. It reads as follows:

> Because of the difficulties inherent in the fluctuating value of the dollar and the varying exchange rate, the province submits that the final settlement shall be in terms of an amount of electrical energy delivered at the international border at specified points for use in the province of British Columbia.

It is evident that the province of British Columbia knows what real value is; industrial power delivered to British Columbia can only be of increasing value throughout the years, and they were not willing to accept $1 million, $2 million, or $3 million in compensation for this damage and for the use of this water.

Then again I find that the East Kootenay Power Company Limited make a similar representation. I quote from their representation as follows:

> It is submitted that a loss of this magnitude requires compensation to a like degree, and in a form not subject to the vagaries of rates of exchange or purchasing power of currencies.

They believe in the delivery of electrical energy. Again they are indicating their belief in what is real wealth, namely electrical power, not fluctuating currencies, gold or things of that sort.

Then the British Columbia Electric Company Limited made their representation:

> That the logical way to compensate British Columbia for the economic loss which it will suffer from the flooding of the Kootenay valley is to arrange for a block of power from the Libby project to be set aside for the government of British Columbia.

That indicates the attitude of governments and of large corporations when they are considering what is real wealth. They know that human energy, human skills and ability, industrial power and natural resources are the bases of all real wealth today; and they are asking for industrial power in compensation for damage done to Canadian territory. They did not ask for a gold brick or for payment in dollars. They know what is real value.

In passing, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I noticed the other day in the Nelson Daily News of May 16, a daily published in my constituency, a headline which reads: "Money market may curb B.C. plans. Cities, school boards face same difficulties. $40 million credit to be sought in east or United States by Anscomb, deputy". The article goes on to say:

> Mr. Anscomb will leave for the east shortly with his deputy, J. V. Fisher, to attempt to borrow the funds required for British Columbia's planned capital works.

To go to New York to borrow that money which will be based on British Columbia natural resources, British Columbia labour and British Columbia industrial power is something that we in this group do not agree with. We in this group say it would be far better to take this gold, keep it in Canada if you want to issue your credit and currency on it and not go to New York to borrow money. Better still to issue loans to our provinces, to our municipalities and to our school boards, based on the natural resources, the industrial production and the labour power of the province. There is no necessity to go to the United States, because these people lend that money exactly on that security. We in this group cannot see why this government cannot use the machinery of government, the Bank of Canada, to finance sound capital investment by the provinces and by the dominion government itself.

We find that representations have been made to the government for gold mining assistance. Representations have been made through the labour organizations directly concerned with the gold mining industry. As I said before, the labour organizations advocate a free market for gold. I do ask the government to give serious consideration to these representations.

The government has had representations from the gold mining industry, from the Canadian Metal Mining Association, the British Columbia Mining Association and representatives of municipalities. I had the pleasure of being with the representatives of some northern Ontario and Quebec municipalities when they made representations to two or three members of the government. I was impressed indeed with the presentation made by a lady reeve, from one of the northern municipalities. She made a very capable and effective presentation of the case for these municipalities.

On top of that, the government of British Columbia has indicated its position. The legislature of British Columbia unanimously adopted a resolution urging continuation of assistance to the gold mining industry under present circumstances.

We in this group support this bill because we must give human, practical, and immediate consideration to the needs of 23,000 miners and to 125,000 Canadians who are directly affected at this time by the gold mining industry. Second, we support this bill because the present condition is caused by international and government action.

Third, we believe the miners are entitled to fair wages and satisfactory housing, and that it is necessary to protect the life savings of many of those people in homes, small businesses and service in the communities surrounding the mines affected.

Fourth, we believe it is necessary to protect the large public investment, federal, provincial and municipal in the communities and areas surrounding the gold mining districts.

Fifth, under the present economic system we in Canada receive goods in exchange for gold sold to the United States. In our opinion, the world of the future will not use labour to take gold from one hole and place it in another in order to protect a gold standard. But in the meantime we must be realistic, for in return for our gold we get commodities and goods that we require.

I have read the report of the Gold Mining Assistance Act, and I have read several of the speeches made, and I may make an observation or two in committee. I noted in reading that report that several large companies operate very profitable enterprises; that is, several very large and very profitable enterprises are receiving assistance for the operation of a mine or two, the operation of a non-profitable gold mine or two.

First, when considering assistance under this act, Mr. Speaker, the total operations of any corporation should receive consideration. If the company has diversified its operations so that it is carrying on large operations in several spheres, the very fact that it operates a relatively small gold mining operation at a loss should not be considered. I think the total position of the company concerned, shall I say, should be considered when dealing with a question of assistance to these companies.

I do not intend to say very much more, Mr. Speaker, but I may ask a few questions when the bill is in committee. We in this group are particularly concerned about the standard of wages received by the employees of the gold mining industry. To date gold miners have been paid lower wages than miners in other hard-rock mines. The owners have constantly maintained that they could not afford to pay higher wages.

The minister when speaking said that the assistance provided in the bill would enable the companies to make a legitimate profit. According to my understanding of the word "legitimate" it means a lawful or regular profit. In view of the word "legitimate" meaning a lawful or regular profit, and the large lawful profits being made by many companies today, the word could possibly mean that some of these companies would make a very large profit, because the word legitimate simply means a lawful or regular profit. We maintain that when companies are receiving this assistance from the government the first claim on the production and the first claim on this assistance should be a satisfactory standard of wages in relationship to the mining industry as a whole, and proper working conditions. We urge that in granting these subsidies the government should insist as a first qualification for assistance that the miners in the industry receive the standard wages and the same working conditions as miners in other hard-rock mines.

In conclusion, I again state that we support this measure as a necessary temporary expedient because it involves the livelihood of 23,000 miners and the welfare of 120,000 Canadians, and because of the large public and private investments in mining communities and the surrounding areas; but we do realize that this is no final solution. It is a purely temporary measure, that in effect indicates the inconsistencies and contradictions of our present economic system.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, we in this group in the past have supported legislation to subsidize the gold mines because so long as it is considered in the national interest to encourage the production of gold in this country we should I think be prepared to allow the producers to receive a fair price. Hon. members will recall that back in 1945 under the Bretton Woods agreement we fixed the price of gold at $35 an ounce. Since that time costs have steadily risen, and therefore it would seem only fair to allow a subsidy at this time.

However, I would draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that during the past three years some $30 million have been paid in subsidies to gold mines, and employees of the gold mines, I believe number somewhere in the neighbourhood of 23,000. Now, keeping that picture in mind, remember what happened in this house when it was proposed that $65 million should be paid for wheat delivered over a period of five years to 250,000 wheat farmers. Many of the people who are advocating that this subsidy should be paid spoke against that payment of $65 million being made to the wheat producers. Mind you, that was not a subsidy; that was merely a repayment of a loss suffered by the farmers as a result of government policies. I mention that fact because we should be a little more consistent in this house on the question of subsidies, and deal with them in a fairer manner.

However, in spite of that fact, I say we support this subsidy; but I would point out that as war or fear of war may expand the demand for goods in this country I think that the gold miners could probably be better employed elsewhere because already I understand there is developing a shortage of miners, and also I understand that already there is looming a shortage of mining engineers. I say that because after all monetary gold does not provide any essential service. As a matter of fact, at all times when it has been urgent that the production of the country be increased as rapidly as possible we have been forced off the gold basis. We have found that we could not bring about a rapid increase in our production as long as we were on the gold basis. That is what happened in 1940 and we are still off the gold basis.

The hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) and other members of the Conservative party have referred to the part played by gold in balancing our trade with other nations. That is true, and it has been especially true so long as our trade followed what was called the triangular pattern. This pattern was referred to often by the former minister of finance, Mr. Ilsley, who pointed out that we had a large favourable balance of trade with the sterling areas and a large unfavourable balance of trade with the United States and therefore we would have to insist that countries in the sterling areas pay their deficits in either United States dollars or gold in order that we might make up our deficit with the United States.

I have often wondered why we should consider it the responsibility of nations in Europe to make up our unbalance of trade with the United States. Unfortunately, as a result of that policy, we have found nations in Europe curtailing their imports from this country in order to avoid having a deficit with us and being under the obligation to hand over United States dollars or gold in order to balance their payments.

It is a good thing for the country that today we have a Minister of Trade and Commerce who apparently realizes the true functions of trade. Last year the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) pointed out that the only way to overcome the difficulties that were encountered in that triangular form of trade was to increase our sales to the United States and increase our purchases from the sterling area. As a result of that attitude we find today that we practically have a balanced trade with Europe instead of a large favourable balance of trade, and we are doing everything we can to balance our trade with the United States by increasing exports.

In order to make a maximum contribution toward supplying the needs of backward nations and for the purposes of building up defences, I think the members of the United Nations should do everything in their power to discourage the production of what might be termed useless goods. It will be recalled that that was the policy during world war II. When it became essential during world war II that we increase the production of munitions and food we curtailed the production of gold. When you realize the situation in the world today it is quite evident that there is a great need for expansion in the production of food to feed the starving people in many countries. After all, we cannot feed gold to those people. I should like to refer to the report of the director general of FAO for 1949-50 and I quote from page one as follows:

> There is far too little food for the world's hungry mouths, and the yearly increase in production is not enough to keep pace with the increase in the number of human beings. A third of the world's people enjoy health, wealth and well-being to a comparatively high degree; the other two-thirds live on intimate terms with poverty, hunger, disease, illiteracy and premature death. Even where production is most highly developed, farmers are subject to the vagaries of markets to such an extent that they run heavy risks by planning ahead for abundance. These bitter contrasts break out in discontent and rebellion because —and this is the most significant development of our time—every day more people realize that such conditions are no longer necessary. Modern advances in science and technology make greatly increased well-being possible for all mankind, and there is no insurmountable barrier to that achievement.

When you have that sort of situation in the world where not enough food is being produced to meet the needs of the people I think it is rather futile to suggest that you can stabilize world currencies by putting them on a gold basis. If you put currencies on a gold basis and at the same time have a shortage of food, will that gold prevent inflationary pressure in the demand for goods? Certainly it will make no difference whether that currency is on a gold basis or not unless there are goods to satisfy the demand created by that money. Therefore, the only way to avoid inflation, the only way to stabilize the currencies of the world, is to increase production so as to make sure that there will be a sufficient amount of goods and services to satisfy the demand created by the money in circulation.

When the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) spoke on the resolution stage he supported a free market for gold and gave South Africa as an example of the benefits that accrue to nations when they are able to sell some of their gold on that market. There are a number of reasons why I would oppose a free market for gold under the existing set-up, that is so long as our currency is valued in terms of gold under the international monetary fund.

The first question I would ask is: Would the gold mine operators actually be better off if they were able to sell their gold in a free market than they would selling it under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act? I listened with interest to what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) said. He stated that in his opinion the gold mine operators probably would not be any better off by selling their gold on a free market than they would under this act. I was interested in that because those views correspond closely with the views expressed by the Financial Post and the Financial News. I do not think anyone will suggest that either the Financial Post or the Financial News is opposed to the production of gold. I should like to quote from a statement which appeared in the Financial Post of April 14, 1951, under the heading, "Free gold market not so profitable. Cost-aid returns seen just as great." This article by Gordon M. Grant reads:

> Statisticians see several factors indicating the current $42 an ounce free market price for gold might prove illusory when it came to realizing the extra benefit on the entire Canadian output.
> 1. The free market has not "steadily risen." It collapsed early in February, 1950—South Africa had to discontinue sales then—and only recovered the latter part of last year.
> 2. Efforts to liquidate entire Canadian gold production at $42 an ounce could easily break the market, inspire increased selling by South Africa.
> 3. Costs of putting gold into marketable form, and selling it, might run $3.20 an ounce or more—about half the "extra" gold mines might hope to secure. South Africa is reported to find it unprofitable to sell gold below $38.20 United States on the free market.

And again:

> Early experience of South Africa gold mines with premium sales on the free market shows that returns were much less than the extra amount Canadian gold mines received under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

And further down:

> In recent months, it appears pretty definite that South Africa has been able to sell 40 per cent of her output on the free market—and perhaps at the $42 United States price per ounce. But averaged over her entire output, the extra revenue is only providing a gold yield of about $37.80 United States per ounce. From this figure must be deducted the expenses of fabrication and selling on the free market. These expenses are important because marketing costs on sale of gold to the Canadian mint are relatively negligible. Even with sale of 40 per cent of their output on the free market South African gold mines are probably no better off than Canadian gold mines under the set-up for 1951.

I shall not take the time to quote from the Financial News, but the article in that publication was exactly the same as the argument put forward by the Financial Post. There is another point I should like to raise. Under the international monetary fund gold is used as the yardstick and currencies are valued in terms of gold. That being the case, would it be wise to make gold subject to the vagaries of international gamblers and financiers? It seems to me that you can hardly expect to stabilize currency by using gold as a standard of value if it is subject to wild fluctuations in such markets as Hong Kong, Bombay and other hot spots of the world. On the other hand, I would have absolutely no objection to a free market for gold provided first of all that it was divorced entirely from our monetary system. On that basis I would be prepared to support a free market, but would those people who are today asking for a free market be willing to accept it on that basis? I would say they would be most bitterly opposed to a free market for gold if gold was divorced from the monetary system. They realize that a part of the prestige that gold has today is the fact that it is used as a yardstick for our currency. Furthermore they want to have that prestige for gold apparently without accepting the responsibility that goes with it, the responsibility of stabilizing the price of gold.

Under the international monetary fund, which has been referred to during this debate, gold is the only commodity which nations can use as of right to liquidate their external trade deficits. That being the case, would it be wise to allow the price of gold to be dominated by such spots as Hong Kong, Bombay or any other spot in the world today where there is fear and uncertainty? In such places we find people trying to change their worldly assets into the form of gold so that they can pack it up and take it out of the country. One wonders how long a market of that kind could last. Moreover, where would they get the currency with which to buy our gold, and would the currency thus obtained be of any use for the purpose of balancing our trade with the United States, which is the main purpose of gold today in so far as Canada is concerned?

When the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) spoke he mentioned that I did not oppose section 8 of article IV of the international monetary fund. Section 8 reads:

> The gold value of the fund's assets shall be maintained notwithstanding changes in the par or foreign exchange value of the currency of any member.

It is true that when the bill concerning the monetary fund was before the standing committee on banking and commerce I did not oppose that section for the obvious reason that I had bitterly opposed sections 1 to 6. Once sections 1 to 6 had been carried it was obvious that section 8 was required to carry out the purpose of sections 1 to 6. Section 1 reads:

> The par value of the currency of each member shall be expressed in terms of gold as a common denominator or in terms of the United States dollar of the weight and fineness in effect on July 1, 1944.

In other words, we opposed gold being used as a yardstick for the currencies of the world. We opposed the idea of all currencies of all member nations being valued in terms of gold. Furthermore, we opposed a subsequent section which made it impossible for a nation to change the value of its currency to a greater degree than 10 per cent without the permission of the fund. Sections 1 to 6 carried; and, once they had been carried, obviously section 8 was necessary to implement those sections. But I would point out that article IV was not the main article that we opposed in the Bretton Woods agreement. The chief reason we opposed the Bretton Woods agreement was that gold is the only commodity a creditor nation is obliged to accept in payment of debts owing to it.

In other words, we criticized the monetary fund because it gave the creditor nations the right to demand payment in gold for their balances held abroad, instead of placing upon them the obligation to accept payment in the only commodity with which most nations could pay, goods and services. I should like to refer to what I said at that time because the hon. member for Cochrane seemed to be a little bit confused and seemed to think that we were supporting gold as the basis. At page 131 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the standing committee on banking and commerce of December 13, 1945, I had this to say with respect to Bill No. 238:

> It is interesting to note under this agreement that gold will be the only commodity in the world that a creditor nation is obliged to accept in payment of its debt. I realize it is not done directly. It is done via the fund. That makes no difference, and the witness agreed with me, no substantial difference. What is bound to be the result of that situation? It is all very well to call it a breathing spell, but they will not be able to breathe very long under a proposal of that kind, because when you realize the size of nations' unbalances of trade and the fact that they can only borrow up to 25 per cent of their quota in any one year they will not even be able to obtain enough currency from the fund to pay off the unbalance of trade. So it will not in reality prove a breathing spell. The situation that will face a debtor nation will be this. They will either have to cut down their standard of living to the very minimum, cut off imports, which will be contrary to the purpose of the fund, because the purpose is supposed to be to expand trade, and if a nation as a result of this is forced to cut down imports and reduce its standard of living to the minimum it would be directly contrary to the purpose of the fund. Instead of the fund helping to bring about an expansion of trade it will be helping to develop economic nationalism, the very thing it is supposed to prevent. I do charge that under this act that is exactly what will happen . . .

Is that not exactly what happened with regard to Europe? They found that they suffered from unfavourable balances of trade with the dollar countries and therefore they placed restrictions upon imports of goods from the dollar area. They cut down their standard of living to the minimum and adopted a very strong form of economic nationalism within the sterling area. I am not going to try to take any credit for the fact that we foresaw what was bound to happen at that time because it was so obvious that under the international monetary fund that was bound to be the consequence of such a policy. At that time we advocated an alternative, and again I should like to refer to page 131 where I said:

> What we want in the act mainly is a provision that a debtor nation in order to pay for its imports shall be recognized as paying for them when they establish a credit within their country in favour of a creditor nation and that that credit can be used to buy anything purchased within that country. Then if the creditor nation is not willing to accept goods from a nation with which it has a credit if it desires to trade on a multilateral basis it may trade the credit established on that basis for the credit of another country on a multilateral basis. So I say if the great industrialized nations are really sincere in this matter they should have shown it at this time and been willing to have an article to that effect put in the Bretton Woods agreement.

When we insisted time and again that an article of that kind should be put in the Bretton Woods agreement to ensure that the debtor nations would be in a position to pay off their debts by shipment of goods we were told that was a question of trade agreements, that it did not come within the confines of the international monetary fund, that it would be taken care of later on by some form of international trade organization. What happened when the international trade organization was set up? We found that it still further aggravated the situation because it introduced the policy that is often referred to as a policy of non-discrimination.

We in this group are therefore opposed to the currency of this nation or, if we had the power, the currencies of any nation, being valued in terms of gold because the real value of a nation's currency depends upon the amount of goods and services that that currency will buy, and no amount of gold will change that. If you do not have the goods and services within the country, then no matter how much gold you have unless you can exchange it for goods that currency will become worthless because there will not be any goods for it to buy. If you had an island in the middle of the ocean with stocks of gold and no goods, the currency of that island would be absolutely useless. The only thing that makes a currency of value, as I say, is the goods and services that can be bought with it.

We have heard members of the Conservative party, particularly the hon. member for York West, advocating a return to the gold standard. Thank goodness the people of Canada will never tolerate the restoration of the automatic features of the gold standard, because we are not prepared to permit our people to be disciplined in that way. What does that mean? It would mean that any time our standard of living got a little higher than that of other nations and the prices of goods in this country rose above the prices in other nations so they were not buying our goods freely, gold would flow from this country to other nations and as a result currency would be withdrawn from circulation, unemployment would increase, production would go down and goods would pile up. After a while, of course, the presumption is that the process would be reversed; the prices of goods would fall, gold would come flowing back and the situation would be restored. The people of this country are not prepared to see men unemployed while at the same time we have great resources to be developed, resources which if developed can satisfy the needs of all the people of this country.

However, as I have already said, as long as we are members of the international monetary fund and therefore encouraging the production of gold, I believe legislation such as this is justified temporarily. We in this group do believe, however, that at the very earliest opportunity the articles of the international monetary fund should be thoroughly overhauled and gold displaced as the yardstick, and that the currencies of the world should be supported by a goods basis instead. I remember a westerner once coming to Ottawa and advocating that our currency be tied to wheat instead of gold. To those who feel we must have our currency tied to one commodity instead of to a price level I say it would be far more reasonable and logical to have wheat as the basis for our currency than gold, because wheat is of great use in the world. It would mean that if our currency were tied to wheat, any nation in the world obtaining our currency would know it could be exchanged for wheat, which is so urgently needed in every part of the world today. Starving nations would be glad to get our wheat, whereas gold is of little use to them unless they can turn around and exchange it immediately for goods. So if we have to tie our currency to one commodity I say wheat would be far more sensible, because we always have plenty of wheat and any time our currency got into the hands of another nation they could redeem it in this country for wheat.

As I listened to the hon. member for York West I could not help thinking how many forms of bugs we have in the human race. We have the gold bugs, who want to develop gold. We have the jitterbugs who want to develop the jitters. We have the firebugs, who want to develop fires; and we have other people who are just plain bugs. If you think too much about gold you may develop that attitude.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, this bill was given first reading in this house on April 6, two and a half months ago. Many of us hoped that in the interval the government would evolve some new policy or some amendment which would really meet the situation. While a slight amendment has been indicated by the minister, we must view the situation as one for which the government has failed to propose an adequate remedy. While of course the bill will be approved, since it is a good deal better than nothing, nevertheless it seems to me to be open to four fundamental criticisms. In the first place, it is inadequate in the provision it makes for the gold industry. In the second place, it is only temporary, just a makeshift and stopgap. In the third place, by its very nature it is necessarily discriminatory. In the fourth place, it is only an artificial remedy. The amendment simply represents more tinkering with that artificial, inadequate remedy. In brief, I think we must have either a free market or a realistic and adequate price for gold.

Some of the statements offered in the house this evening concerning gold have been a little surprising. In some of the speeches, if I may say so, there has been a want of appreciation of the part gold has played in the history of the world, in the history of trade and the history of currencies. Gold has always been the universally accepted medium of exchange throughout human history. Today no one can estimate the importance of gold to our economy or the economy of the world without due recognition of that fact. It is not simply a matter of the gold standard, though that has a bearing. It is a question of recognizing the part gold has had to play and still has to play in providing a means by which nations of the world may trade with one another and find something all will agree upon as a medium for settling their commodity trading balances. All the world over gold has that peculiar and unique value and position. Today all countries, even Russia, seek gold, while the Kremlin is putting obstacles in the way of trade among the nations of the world.

Canada has a peculiar interest in this subject as a producer. When I hear hon. members belittling the place of gold in the world's economy I think they fail utterly to recognize the importance of gold production in our history, in the Canadian economy and in its good health.

At this late hour I am not going to indulge in quotations as to the importance of gold. When I spoke on April 6 I quoted what I thought were authoritative statements by persons such as Dr. Camsell, who have had a long connection and intimate experience with this subject. Gold played an invaluable part in preserving the economy of this country during the depression days. As much as any other industry in this country the gold industry pulled us through the worst of that depression experience.

Gold Mining

It would be well also to bear in mind that in Canada the ownership of gold mines is very widely distributed. It is not a case of concentrating wealth in the hands of the few. Gold shares, representing ownership of this industry, are widely distributed.

Gold has had a unique position and use in the history of this country also in providing the means of settling our commodity trading deficit with the United States. There has always been a market in that country for our gold production. During the years when our trading deficit with the United States was very high we were glad indeed to turn to our gold production as a means of meeting that deficit on commodity trading account. I have some figures, and to save time I should like to put them on the record if the house will permit me. They are taken from the government publication Foreign Trade, volume 9, page 993, of June 2, 1951.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the hon. member may place the figures on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fleming: The figures are as follows:

Canadian Trade with the United States (Excluding Gold)

Name	Average 1935-39	1938	1946	1947	1948	1949	1950	1951 3 mos.
			(Millions of Dollars)
Imports from U.S. ...	418·7	424·7	1,405·3	1,974·7	1,804·8	1,951·9	2,130·5	678·1
Exports to U.S.	321·3	270·5	887·9	1,034·2	1,501·0	1,503·5	2,021·0	529·6
Trade Deficit	87·0	146·0	496·7	918·01	283·6	427·8	80·0	139·5

From "Foreign Trade" Vol. IX, page 993, June 2, 1951

Those figures take us to the end of the third month of 1951. The record for the fourth month of this year shows a deficit of $93 million on our trading account with the United States. This has been a continuous feature of our history.

The dominion bureau of statistics daily bulletin of April 24 notes that on our current account with all nations in 1950 we had an excess of all types of imports over all types of exports of $316 million. It comments that these adverse trends were only slightly offset by a rise from $139 million to $163 million in gold available for export. This recalls to the minds of all who study this problem that gold is one commodity to which we have always been able to turn to help meet this chronic deficit of our commodity trading account with the United States.

Now, the gold mining industry has sustained great areas of this country, particularly in the two old provinces of Ontario and Quebec, but not confined to those provinces. It has been an important factor in the economic life of Manitoba and British Columbia. The needs of this industry today, and the way in which it has become a plaything of national and international policy, are reflected in the way in which some of these great mining camps, which were marked not long ago by flourishing and growing cities, are today presenting a picture of shrinkage and steady decay. No Canadian who has any appreciation of the sound elements of the economy of this country can sit back and contemplate with any degree of indifference or satisfaction the way in which the communities directly owing their economic life to the great mining camps of this country are suffering. We must open our eyes to this threatening situation, and the manner in which those areas have been suffering. If this industry is permitted to decay, no longer are these communities going to be great markets for the products of other industries. What is to become of the savings of the workmen in those areas represented by their investments in their homes? These are not vague possibilities. These are real dangers that are confronting these mining areas today, and the people who owe their livelihood to the health of this industry.

The Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham) on April 6 quite properly paid a tribute to the part played by gold in sustaining the search for and the production of base metals. With the critical shortage of some of these base metals today as the world scrambles for commodities essential for rearmament, we must not overlook or minimize the importance of gold as supporting the search for these base metals.

Now, sir, a crisis is rapidly developing in our gold mining industry in Canada. When I spoke on April 6 I made some reference to comments made by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) when he spoke in Timmins prior to the last general election. I believe the best recent summary of the situation I have found appeared in the last issue of the Monetary Times, in an article written by Mr. E. C. Gould, the financial editor. He sums up the situation in two or three paragraphs which read as follows:

> The truth of the matter is that at many Canadian gold mines, a greater part of the ore mined since 1946 has been taken from underground workings, completed and financed in prior years. Owing to an increase in costs and the resultant reduction in the volume of profitable ore, the development of a ton of new ore is now three to four times the 1939 cost. Based on the current price for gold, this situation makes it uneconomical for many mines to open up new levels and they are gradually depleting the ore developed in prior years with a shutdown in prospect unless early and substantial relief is forthcoming. As a result, the gold mining areas are becoming depressed and the former rich relation of the mining world can no longer meet the high cost of existence from the returns of a fixed income. So far have we departed from the "age of gold" that now "the lowly hen must be laughing at the goose that laid the golden egg."
> The plight of the gold industry was described by Prime Minister St. Laurent as early as June, 1949, in a way that left little hope for profitable speculation. "Many gold mines in Canada," he said, "now are just staggering along because they are being squeezed between the fixed price of gold, $35 per ounce, and the high cost of production per ounce of gold recovered . . . The grim shadow of mine shutdowns has been hanging over many gold mining properties."

That is a quotation from the speech which the Prime Minister made at Timmins during the election campaign in 1949. The article continues:

> Since June, 1949, this gloomy picture has certainly not improved for costs have increased $3.75 per ounce and the rate of gold assistance has been reduced.
> According to figures, based on profits published in the Bank of Canada statistical summary, the average total earnings per year, for the years 1946 to 1949, for 38 gold mines were less than 30 per cent of the average for the years 1938 to 1940. A comparable figure for 643 Canadian companies, representing all industries, is 180 per cent for the same periods. The ratio of gold mining profits, therefore, is one-sixth of the average of all Canadian industries when compared with the average for 1938 to 1940.
> The following is a picture of the current situation in the Canadian gold mining industry, outlined by the president of one of Canada's more successful gold mines in an appeal for what he terms the "adjusting of gold to a sound price basis": "The number of gold mines in Canada is being steadily reduced as mines are forced to close down due to rapidly rising costs while the price received for gold is below the 1939 level. The increase in average operating costs since 1939 is equal to over $15 per ounce or 75 per cent. Since 1946, when the price of gold was reduced to $35 in Canada, costs have increased by about $9 per ounce, made up of increases in wages of about 50 per cent equal to $6 per ounce and in supply costs of over 50 per cent equal to $3 per ounce. The cost of developing a new mine, building a plant and bringing the mine into production on a basis of 500 tons per day has increased from approximately one million dollars in 1939 to a minimum of two million five hundred thousand dollars in 1951, while the estimated profit per ton of ore is now only a small fraction of the 1939 figure."

This is a matter of concern to all Canadians.

The fundamental problem of the gold mining industry today is not lack of markets, it is the price. This problem is the result of price control. Here is one commodity that has been singled out above all others for the application of price control. That has been in effect now ever since—

Mr. Abbott: For seventy-five or eighty years.

Mr. Fleming: But on a very different basis now, if you please; that is the very point of this objection. I think that is the fundamental fallacy of the government's approach to it. Gold has been singled out for price control under an international agreement to which this country is a signatory, and so far as we have been permitted to know the government has been content to accept that ceiling on a product which Canada produces in large quantities. When Canada submits to a ceiling price, Canada necessarily absorbs a loss. Again, it is not all Canada that is absorbing this loss. The government has not approached this problem the way they approached the problems created by price ceilings in some other important Canadian products. Here the government has been content, apart from the altogether inadequate assistance provided by the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, to see the gold mining industry absorb these losses that are imposed upon it by a measure of price control on an international basis which the government of this country has supported. The result has been discrimination practised upon this industry, and a retarding of the growth of this industry; setbacks to this industry from which it will take a long time, and much more prosperous conditions, if it is ever to recover.

The Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham) took some satisfaction out of the fact that last year there was a slight increase in national production of gold over the year 1949. If he looks at the figures for the first three months of this year he will see that we are now showing a slight decrease in monthly production. I may attempt this prophecy also, Mr. Speaker: if the present measure, even with the indicated amendment, is all that this government has to offer to the gold-mining industry, we are going to see a continuation in the trend evidenced in the production figures for the first three months of this year. That is something that is fraught with serious dangers for the economy of Canada.

I must take issue with the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys with regard to some of the inferences which he has drawn from the report on the administration of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1951. In the year 1948, 117 gold-mining companies received benefits under this act; in 1949 the number was 121; but in 1950 the number has dropped to 83, which is just two-thirds of the number in the previous year. What may we expect for 1951? Unless something is done to give help and hope to this gold-mining industry I may confidently venture the prediction that fewer gold-mining companies are going to receive assistance from this act.

Let us just look at the figures. In 1948 the government paid out through this act $10,500,000. I shall just give the round figures. In 1949 they paid out $12,500,000. But in 1950 the amount dropped to just a trifle over $7 million. This year the amount estimated was $9,200,000; the amendment contemplates another $900,000, or $10 million in round figures, an amount substantially below the figures of 1948 and 1949. In other words, while the needs of the industry have grown apace as costs have been soaring, the government contributes less in order to try to repair the damage the government policy has done to that industry deliberately, by following a policy of lopsided and discriminatory price control.

I spoke of rising costs. I think a study would repay hon. members of this house in order to see how costs have been rising in the gold-mining industry, and to see just how much more it costs today to produce an ounce of gold than it did five, ten or fifteen years ago. If I had the time to do so, or were not concerned about wearying the house with statistics, I should like to put some figures on Hansard in that respect. I will just shortly give you a sample in passing, Mr. Speaker, of the kind of competition that the gold-mining industry is up against. There are many miners engaged in the gold-mining industry who today are working at rates substantially below those prevailing in some of the other mining industries. How do you expect the gold-mining industry to compete for miners with some of the other industries like nickel, for instance, for which there is an ever-expanding market at an uncontrolled price? Here is a dispatch from Port Colborne, dated May 22, which reads as follows:

> New agreement reached by the International Nickel Co. of Canada Ltd., and the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers will mean wage increases of from 23 to 26 cents per hour plus a 40-hour week. The agreement affects 14,500 workers here and in Sudbury.

Then further down:

> New wage rates will run from $1.53 to $1.88 per hour, except for partially incapacitated employees, who will receive $1.46.

The gold-mining industry cannot compete with wage rates like those as long as it is left to languish under this price control system imposed upon it by the government. Consequently men are driven away from the gold-mining industry into these other mining industries. But think of the hardship that imposes upon these people, in giving up their residence in areas where they have lived their lives, made their livelihood and invested their life savings in homes. They are now called upon to leave those areas, sell their homes at a sacrifice, and go to other areas in order to find work in mines which produce metals other than gold.

We in this house, Mr. Speaker, if I may say so, often fail adequately to realize the simple fact that an extremely narrow margin in costs or in price makes a world of difference with regard to turning what may be marketable ore into useless rock, or vice versa.

Proceeding as quickly as I can, Mr. Speaker, I come to the question of our national interests. As to the gold-mining industry, Canada's interest is all on the side of the producer; because our interests as consumers of gold are trifling as compared with the interests of Canada as a producer of gold. When we look at the government policy of discriminatory price control practised on this commodity, in which Canada's interest is altogether on the side of production, we must wonder, Mr. Speaker, that this commodity is chosen to be sacrificed on the altar of high government policy.

I would not be disposed to take a narrow view of this subject if, on international balance, Canada were receiving some quid pro quo in return for the sacrifice it is making of its interests as a gold producer, and provided that some attempt were made, as between our government and the gold producers of this country, to lift the burden of the sacrifice off the shoulders of that one industry. But where do we find some quid pro quo in this scale or in this international balance? The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) can point to the need of international co-operation. Here is, on Canada's part, an exceedingly costly contribution to international co-operation. I think that the Canadian gold producer is entitled to ask for something in return for this contribution that is being exacted of him toward international co-operation or better international relations. Why should he be singled out, and why should his interests be sacrificed on this altar of international relations? We have heard nothing from the government to justify the singling out of the gold-mining industry for that unhappy role.

Looking back to 1945 when we entered the Bretton Woods agreement, I would point out that we then had a quite different world situation before us than this one we face now. One has only to look back at the preamble to the Bretton Woods agreement which in the light of the unhappy world conditions of 1951, reads today almost like a fairy story. Yet the gold-mining industry of this country, by government policy, tied to this international agreement, is made to suffer because the world has not been able to translate into actuality that pretty picture that we drew in 1945.

Let me now mention one or two facts of recent history. The international monetary fund, in its policy, has been largely under the domination of the United States, from the outset. The interest of the United States in the matter of gold is, on balance, fundamentally strongly on the side of the consumer. The United States has been over the years a vast net importer of gold. It is difficult to see how there can be a harmonization of the interests of Canada and the interests of the United States in a fund of that kind; it certainly cannot take place as long as United States interests as a gold-consuming country or a gold-importing country are to dominate the international monetary fund's policy.

Recently we have seen some indication of an attempt on the part of the international monetary fund to influence policy in regard to the revaluation of the currencies of Europe. I have a press dispatch from Geneva, dated May 27:

> The United Nations Economic Commission for Europe urged today an immediate and drastic revaluation of European currencies to turn the mounting tide of inflation.

But the international monetary fund within a week showed that they were opposed to it. This is a dispatch from London that appeared in a Canadian newspaper of June 4. I read a few sentences:

> Considerable stimulus has been given to the controversy over the possibility or desirability of the revaluation of sterling by the recent declarations of the Economic Commission for Europe and the International Monetary Fund. Interest is added to their views by the fact that they are strongly opposed to each other.
> The international monetary fund has expressed the opinion that no upward revaluation of sterling should be undertaken or contemplated until there has been a general relaxation of restrictions on international payments. The Economic Commission for Europe declares boldly in favour of revaluation, arguing that revision of exchange rates is one of the most effective means of fighting inflation.

But, sir, so far as we can see the policy of the international monetary fund is going to prevail.

In recent months, in fact over the past year, the United States has been obliged to export gold, largely owing to the increasing health of Britain's international trade, and Britain has been importing gold over the past year. The international financial news survey, a publication of the international monetary fund of May 11, says this in its opening paragraph:

> Net gold sales by the United States to other countries amounted to $898 million in the first quarter of 1951, which corresponds to an annual rate of $3,590 million. This was a rise of about one-sixth above the already high fourth quarter of 1950.

The annual report of our own Canadian foreign exchange control board for the year 1950 reminds us on page 17 of this fact:

> In order to meet the demand by Canadians substantial amounts of sterling were obtained by Canada from the United Kingdom in exchange for gold.

Gold has been going to the United Kingdom on account of Canada's trading relationships with her, too. Then, sir, in the Federal Reserve Bulletin of March, 1951, at page 257 in an article entitled: "The international movement of gold and dollars in 1950", one reads this paragraph:

> Improvement in the gold and dollar positions abroad was widespread in 1950, as shown in the accompanying table and chart. Only a few countries, including Belgium, Norway, and Venezuela, failed to add to their holdings. Almost two-thirds of the over-all increase was concentrated in the United Kingdom and Canada. These two countries, however, distributed their gains differently. The United Kingdom converted practically all its current dollar receipts (1·0 billion dollars) into gold, in addition to obtaining another estimated half billion dollars in gold from other sources. On the other hand, Canada's gold reserves increased by only $100 million in this period, while its dollar balances rose by over $500 million and were largely invested in United States government securities.

Continental countries participating in the European recovery program purchased about $380 million in gold from the United States during 1950 (of which about $200 million was included in monetary reserves) and added about 400 million to their dollar balances.

Now sir, in the face of that fact I submit to you that Canada has not been paying sufficient attention to gold, not even to her own gold supply, because if we look at the government publication, "The Canadian Balance of International Payments, 1950", at page 6 we will see some very startling figures. If I may put these figures on Hansard without reading them it would save time of the house.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. gentleman permission to put them on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fleming: The table follows:

Canada's official holdings of gold and United States dollars[1]

(In millions of United States dollars)

	Gold	United States dollars[2]	Total
December 31, 1944	293·9	608·3	902·2
December 31, 1945	353·9	1,154·1	1,508·0
December 31, 1946	536·0	708·9	1,244·9
December 31, 1947	286·6	215·1	501·7
December 31, 1948	401·3	596·5	997·8
December 31, 1949	486·4	630·7	1,117·1
December 31, 1950	580·2	1,161·5	1,741·7

[1]Exclusive of working balances and gold held against postal savings bank deposits, but including private balances of 98 in 1939 and 2 in 1940

[2]Includes United States exchange and short-term securities of the United States government.

I invite attention to the fact that during the year 1950 our gold holdings increased by only $100 million, while our holdings of United States dollars increased by over $500 million. Now, Mr. Speaker, we are not paying enough attention in this country, at least government policy is not paying enough attention, to the signs of the times and the way that the gold is being taken up by other countries, all these countries of Europe to which reference has been made; and we are laying up a store of United States dollars when under present conditions we might far better be laying up a more ample supply of gold in which to invest our reserves.

Has the international monetary fund played fairly with Canada as a great gold producer?

Gold Mining

The international monetary fund for over a year has been turning a blind eye to the fact that South Africa, the world's greatest gold producer, has been marketing 40 per cent of its monthly production in what the minister called today a premium market; in other words, markets outside the monetary fund—and there are lots of such markets. For let us bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, that many countries of the world which are important traders in gold are not members of the international monetary fund, and pay no attention whatsoever to the restrictions imposed by the international monetary fund upon its members. And there are, of course, great free gold markets today in the world. We find some of them in Europe and some of them further east, which pay no attention to the restrictions imposed by the international monetary fund, not even in some countries which are members of the international monetary fund. For instance, France has a very important market for the trading of gold that pays no attention to the restrictions imposed by the international monetary fund.

South Africa gold mines have been selling in the free or "premium" market 4·8 million ounces of gold in a year; in other words, 20 per cent more than Canada's total gold production. South Africa has been selling that quantity in what the Minister of Finance called the "premium" market. Canada faced with that situation, I submit, Mr. Speaker, just cannot sit back and watch her interests being dissipated while South Africa enjoys that very substantial advantage—and substantial advantage it is, sir.

If you will look at our own government publication called Foreign Trade for May, 1951, at page 839 you will find an article entitled "Gold-mining industry essential to economy of South Africa" written by the Canadian government trade commissioner to that country. In that article you will find this paragraph:

As in the case of other gold producing countries, South Africa is keenly interested in the prospect of a higher official price for gold, in fact she is the chief promoter of such an increase. A growing percentage of her production, in the form of processed and semi-processed metal, is being sold on the free market. This percentage today is put at over 40. The price in the opening days of 1951 reached $44.50 per ounce in Europe and about $35 in the Far East.

Then, further down:

Sales of other minerals by South Africa last year broke all records, according to statistics recently published by the Mines Department.

There you see South Africa pursuing her interest in this matter and enjoying a substantial advantage because of the fact that she markets 40 per cent of her monthly gold production outside the restrictions imposed by the international monetary fund.

Now, sir, what was Canada's position? What was the position that the Canadian delegate to the international monetary fund took when this question of freeing the shackles on South Africa came before that fund for consideration and when the fund decided apparently to permit South Africa to take this large percentage of its gold production outside the confines of the international monetary fund? I would like to hear the Minister of Finance tell the house just what was the position taken by the Canadian delegation on that question at the meeting of the governors of the fund. Did Canada acquiesce? Was Canada silent? Did Canada put forward any plea for similar treatment on her own behalf? Well, if she did not, Mr. Speaker, I say that this government failed to discharge an important duty that it owed to the gold mining industry, a very leading foundation for Canada's whole economy.

Sir, my time is passing quickly. I wish to conclude by indicating what I think are the courses of action open to Canada in a realistic appreciation of this situation, and due appreciation of where Canada's interest lies. The first course would be through the international monetary fund. That will necessitate effective demand on the part of the Canadian government for revision of the policy of that fund, and a demand for treatment similar to that received by South Africa. If the United States resists in order to avoid what it might consider to be domestic inflationary pressures, then I think we must have regard for Canadian interests and no longer submit this important gold industry to the sacrifices that it has been called upon to make.

The governors of the fund meet next September, and unless out of that September meeting comes a drastic revision of the policy of the fund as it affects the marketing of Canadian gold and the price for Canadian gold, this parliament will have to face up to the necessity of giving serious consideration to withdrawing from the fund. I would not wish to see a withdrawal from the fund without one last supreme effort being made to bring about in the interests of Canada a drastic revision in the policy of the fund. Therefore I say that this September meeting must represent Canada's offer of a last opportunity to the fund. If the fund is not prepared to proceed with due regard for Canada's interest, then Canada will have to face a serious alternative.

Of course, that alternative is to fall back on the free market, which means selling gold in any form in Canada or elsewhere. There are a number of free markets in certain areas in the world today. A big free market exists in Portugal, there is a market in the east and so on. Of course United States policy with reference to the purchase of gold can have an important effect upon the future of the free market. That is why I should like to see something done, if possible, through the agency of the international monetary fund in the way I have indicated. If they will not proceed to revise their policy in the light of Canadian interests then I think we will just have to accept the situation and sell our gold in the available markets.

Here is evidence of a recent sale by La Luz mine in Nicaragua at $41.50 per ounce in the free market for all gold produced in the six months ended March 31, 1951.

I must bring these remarks to a close, but in doing so I wish to support a program offered by the Northern Miner in its issue of May 3, which reads:

> Our proposition is: Give the citizens and corporations of Canada the right and opportunity > to buy gold > to hold or sell gold > to export gold > in suitable form, of certified fineness, at open market prices, openly arrived at.

Harking back to their December issue, they urge the government to:

> 1. Instruct the Department of Finance to remove all discouragement to the purchase, holding, or sale of refined gold by Canadians.
> 2. Instruct the Royal Canadian Mint to sell refined gold, in suitable and certified form, and at current open market prices, to Canadians for safekeeping.
> 3. Endeavour at the international monetary fund, and through other channels, to persuade the fund and other nations to recognize the traditional usefulness of gold as a medium in which people of all countries can hold some of their individual savings in a form to protect themselves against inflation and currency depreciation, and
> 4. Endeavour to persuade the fund and other nations to recognize this private market for gold as worthy of consideration in establishing or revising the price of gold rather than, as at present, imposing harsh controls, even in wealthy North American countries, in order to contain this demand and maintain the market at the monetary price set by the United States dollar parity established in 1934.

Also it was recommended:

> 1. That Canadian gold mines be allowed at least as much liberty in exporting gold to non-monetary markets as South Africa, the largest gold producer and member of the fund, has provided to her producers, or
> 2. If the Canadian government feels it must restrict exports as the fund requests, then let it pay to producers required to sell at the price established by the fund, a compensation payment equal to the difference between this price, and the current price ruling in the non-monetary market from which producers are barred by the action of the fund.

The gold mining industry does not ask for any handout; it does not want to be a burden on the Canadian taxpayer. Take the shackles off, and give it its freedom, and it will take its chances with world conditions.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Calculation for 1950.

Mr. Prudham: Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to offer to this clause. It is considered advisable that a new clause 1 be substituted for clause 1 as it now stands. By redrafting the clause a possible ambiguity is removed. The amendment also establishes clearly the method of arriving at the number of ounces to which the $3.50 reduction will apply. Accordingly I will ask my colleague, the Minister of Finance, to move an amendment by which subsection 5 of section 3 as enacted by clause 1 will be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

(5) Notwithstanding anything in this section, the sum that may be paid in respect of gold produced from a mine and sold in the designated year nineteen hundred and fifty, shall be the amount calculated as prescribed in subsection two, two (a), three or four, as the case may be, less the amount obtained by multiplying three dollars and fifty cents by a fraction of the number of ounces to which the rate of assistance was applied in such calculation the numerator of such fraction being the aggregate of

(a) gold produced from the mine and sold during the first nine months of that designated year, and

(b) gold produced from the mine during the first nine months of that designated year and sold after that period of nine months, if in the opinion of the minister the gold could have been sold during those nine months, and the denominator being the total number of ounces produced from the mine and sold in that designated year, and for the purposes of this subsection the governor in council may make regulations for determining the day on which gold shall be deemed to have been sold.

Mr. Abbott: I so move.

Mr. Prudham: This amendment does not change the intent or application of the act, it merely incorporates in the act what we had intended to do by regulation.

Mr. Drew: In view of this very simple amendment would the minister explain just what its effect will be.

Mr. Prudham: The administration of the new section 3 (5) will prevent problems arising in the determination of the day on which gold shall be deemed to have been produced and sold during the first nine months of 1950.

There is a period of time in all cases between the date when gold bullion, gold ore or gold concentrate leaves a mine and the date when settlement thereof is completed by the Royal Canadian Mint, a smelter in Canada or a foreign smelter.

In the case of the majority of the mines which ship gold bullion to the mint the period is very short and it is expected that the date of production and sale will be the day on which the mint issues the cheque in payment for the shipment.

However, in the case of operators who ship gold ore to a Canadian smelter or who ship concentrate to a foreign smelter the lapse of time is as much as three months or more. These cases are the main reasons why regulations are required.

Mr. Adamson: I understand the basis of this regulation is that if the gold is sold on a certain day and the exchange rate is such and such on that day, the premium and the assistance will be calculated as of the specific date on which it is sold.

Mr. Prudham: This section relates to the last three months of the year after revaluation.

Mr. Adamson: It only deals with the period after the Canadian dollar was set free.

Mr. Prudham: That is right.

Mr. Drew: I do not often attempt to introduce a note of levity, but perhaps we should congratulate the draftsman on what I am sure is the longest uninterrupted sentence that has found its way into any statute.

Mr. Abbott: Don't make any bets on that.

Mr. Fleming: I have one question about the date of coming into effect of this amendment. I take it the amendment replaces the provision contained in the bill to be inserted as subsection 5. Is the provision of section 1, subsection 2 of the bill to apply? It provides that this section shall be deemed to have come into force on the 15th day of June, 1948.

Mr. Prudham: Yes, subsection 2 still stands.

Mr. Gibson: I know that the committee is very anxious to get this bill through tonight, and because of that fact I will make my remarks very brief. However, I should not like to allow the hon. member for Kootenay West to get home entirely free with some of the remarks he made earlier this evening. It was a typical C.C.F. statement of policy. I gathered he was speaking for his party, and it was typical of the usual woolly thinking that comes from them. Like Don Quixote he certainly rode his horse madly in all directions, and he succeeded very well. He was for a subsidy and yet he opposed it in principle. That is a very good way of getting money. You allow somebody else to take the responsibility but you still like to get the money. It almost seemed to me that he was making a bid for what they tell me is quite a substantial Social Credit vote in Kootenay West.

However, one thing that was very plain was that he made it abundantly clear that his policy and mine are diametrically opposed, and that certainly gives me great satisfaction. I am now more convinced than ever that there must be something in the policy that I was intending to suggest that is pretty nearly right. As I said, Mr. Chairman, it is getting late, and I know there is hardly time for one more long speech on gold-mining assistance. There is only one thing I should like to say. A number of members have emphasized very much—and I think it is a point well taken—the job we are doing to try to assist the gold mines. I think it is working out to be somewhat of a disservice to them. I think we are encouraging the gold mines as we do a man swimming out from shore. We are trying to get them farther out and into more trouble. It is like feeding somebody ground glass. We are taking advantage of our gold mines. Necessarily they are having to pick out their high grade ore. What I am afraid of is that the time will come when mines, which under ordinary and normal circumstances would be producing gold mines, will have picked out all their high grade ore, and they will not have an economic operation any more.

It has been suggested that I am not sympathetic to the gold mines. My family has been associated with the gold-mining industry of Canada for the last fifty years, and I certainly appreciate very much the tremendous impetus they give to our country in times of deflation. I think it is unfortunate that the government is doing things in such a niggardly way. Under the policy that we are following now I think we are doing a disservice to these mines that have to pick out their high grade ores in order to keep in operation. I feel that we cannot afford the manpower, certainly in the base metal mines of Canada. We are very short of miners, and if certain marginal gold mines closed down now it would not be too great a hardship.

With respect to the $10 million that the government intends to use for the production of gold, I suggest that the government might use some of that money to assist mines that are forced to close down to maintain their properties in good condition. I say that because to me it is tragic that we are taking this permanent asset, gold, and selling at below cost of production. The time will come in Canada when we will need that gold badly to bolster our economy. That is only a thought for the government. I am certain that the government is not too proud of their present policy. I think, Mr. Chairman, you will remember what happened when it was first introduced. It came about through the fact that we lost a by-election in Pontiac at a time when the government did not feel they could afford to lose a by-election, and I think they whisked this policy up out of thin air. It is getting very late, and I see that the Minister of Public Works is very much concerned, so I am going to let him get off the hook.

Mr. Adamson: To reply to what the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has said, he expressed what a lot of shareholders of the gold mining companies have themselves been saying. I have here the report of McIntyre Porcupine Mines Limited, and as it has been published I do not mind giving these figures. The shareholders were asked three questions. The first one was:

> Are you in favour of Canada's gold mines being given free access to the world markets for gold, at home and abroad?

The reply was yes, 1,278; no, 20; and undecided, 12. These are interesting questions. The second question was:

> Should we, in order to give support to our employees and the mining communities in general, continue to struggle against almost impossible odds until our resources are exhausted?

The reply was yes, 130; no, 1,042; and undecided, 138. The third question was:

> Should we, in order to conserve our valuable ore assets, give consideration to suspension of operations until we can reopen the gold mines under more favourable conditions?

The answer was yes, 988; no, 176; and undecided, 146. I want to put that on the record because there is a tremendous body of information among shareholders that this unequal struggle against an impossible formula should be ended. I do so as a warning to the government. It is only because this company, like many others, realize that they have a responsibility to the Dominion of Canada, to the community in which the mine is situated and to their employees that the decision to continue operations is made. I know personally a great many gold mines which would be much better off if they were closed down, and it is only because of their feeling of national duty that they continue to operate.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 2—Application of act to 1951.

Mr. Prudham: I have an important amendment to propose to section 2. Since the introduction of the bill we have made a further and careful study of the needs of the industry at this time, and we are now prepared to make a further extension of the cost-aid by giving the mines the option of 1948, 1949, or 1950 as the base year. This will make the cost-aid more flexible in its application to the varied conditions which exist in the different mines. Those mines whose production has been falling would undoubtedly choose the 1950 base year. Those whose production has been increasing will have the option of choosing 1948 as a base year. It is estimated that this extension of the cost-aid will increase the expenditure by about $700,000. I move that clause 2 of the bill be amended by substituting for paragraph (b) of the proposed new section 3A the following:

(b) the expression "base year"

(i) in the case of a mine in which the first year of production commenced on or before the first day of January, nineteen hundred and fifty, means the calendar year nineteen hundred and forty-eight, nineteen hundred and forty-nine or nineteen hundred and fifty, as the operator of the mine may elect, if in the year elected the mine was in production for at least six months, and where the mine was in production for less than six months in each of the said years, means the first period of twelve months following the first day of July, nineteen hundred and fifty, in which the mine was in production for more than six months, and

(ii) in the case of a mine in which the first year of production commenced after the first day of January, ninteen hundred and fifty, means the first year of production.

Mr. Abbott: I move accordingly.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will give third reading to Bill No. 296, to amend the Income Tax Act, and to Bill No. 194, to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. Then we have some small bills: No. 385, to vary the Manitoba natural resources agreement; No. 386, to vary the Alberta natural resources agreement; No. 387, to vary the Saskatchewan natural resources agreement. Then Bill No. 380, to amend the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act; Bill No. 381, to amend the National Housing Act. We spent some time on housing last week, when the estimates of that department were passed. Then we have two resolutions in the name of the Minister of Finance concerning the financing of the Canadian National Railways. They are formalities, I am told. When we have completed these non-contentious matters we will move to go into supply and call two departments, and consider the estimates of mines and technical surveys and public works.

Mr. Drew: Would the minister indicate what is planned for Wednesday?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I have not really looked over the order paper but I would try to move up some resolutions, though not those having to do with old age assistance or assistance to the blind. We will move to go into supply also on Wednesday.

Mr. Drew: I was wondering whether either external affairs or national defence might be called on Wednesday. I think perhaps we might have some indication as to when we will again deal with external affairs.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Probably after meeting the cabinet tomorrow I will be in a better position to say when we will take up external affairs, and I will let my hon. friend know.

It being five minutes after eleven o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, June 19, 1951

The house met at eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CONCURRENCE IN REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON SOUND-AMPLIFICATION SYSTEM

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to present the report of the special committee appointed on the 8th day of June, 1951, to consider with Mr. Speaker the matter of an amplification system for this house. The committee begs leave to report as follows:

Your committee has considered types of installation used by other parliamentary bodies and has come to the conclusion that a sound-reinforcing system similar to the one which is installed in the House of Commons chamber in the houses of parliament in London, England, known as a low level system, would be the most suitable for our chamber. This system is designed specifically so as to make it possible for everyone in the chamber to hear any member who may be speaking, and to have his voice reproduced in all sections of the house at the same level as the speaker's natural voice.

The conclusion which has been reached by the committee for the installation of this system in our chamber is in accordance with the opinion expressed by government officials who are recognized specialists in this type of work. Also the assistant chief engineer of the Ministry of Works in the United Kingdom has inspected this chamber and has reported favourably as to the use of a similar system.

The committee was informed that in the British house the equipment is on an annual rental basis operated by trained employees of the company, and that it has been found advantageous. The company renting the equipment is under contract to keep it in proper working order at all times, to replace any parts which may give out or need replacement, and to instal improved equipment as, if and when it comes on the market. In other words, the company is required to keep and to operate the whole installation at peak performance at all times at its own expense.

Your committee therefore recommends that a sound-reinforcing system, similar to the one in the House of Commons chamber at Westminster, should be installed in our chamber, and that appropriate action be taken accordingly.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): If I have the unanimous consent of hon. members I should like to move, seconded by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew):

That the report of the special committee appointed on the 8th of June to consider with Mr. Speaker the matter of an amplification system for this house, presented this day, be now concurred in.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in supporting the motion and hoping that there will be unanimous consent, may I say that I know that the Prime Minister, you, Mr. Speaker, and others have observed the system in operation in the British House of Commons. I think those who have will be pleased with the recommendation to adopt a system which has proved so entirely satisfactory, and which will carry the voice in a natural way without any of the mechanical disabilities that accompany some other systems.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, if there is no opposition from any other part of the house to the motion for concurrence in this report, there certainly will be none from this group. We want to see the matter proceeded with as quickly as possible, and are pleased to give unanimous consent.

Motion agreed to.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

RECOMMENDATIONS OF ROYAL COMMISSION—INTERIM GRANT TO CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—ASSISTANCE TO UNIVERSITIES

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when I indicated to the house on June 4 that the government intended to propose a session of parliament to begin in October, I stated that in the next few weeks the government would have to give consideration to the recommendations of the royal commission on national development in the arts, letters and sciences, and that some legislation arising out of its recommendations would probably be proposed before the end of this year.

After a preliminary examination of the report the government has come to the conclusion that there are two matters on which interim action should be taken at the present session. One of these is broadcasting. It is intended to leave until the session to be held later this year the matter of changes of a permanent character in the legislation, but, as hon. members are aware, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has for some time been faced with the serious problem of attempting to meet rising costs from a relatively fixed income. In order, therefore, to tide the corporation over until appropriate legislative provision can be considered, an interim grant will be proposed in the supplementary estimates shortly to be presented by the Minister of Finance. This grant will be designed to cover the urgent requirements of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for the rest of the present fiscal year.

The government has also reached the conclusion that it is in the national interest to take immediate action to assist the universities to perform functions which are quite essential to the country, and indeed to the proper administration of the government of the country. We are not yet in a position to ask parliament to accept any permanent scheme for this purpose, but we have decided that grants should be made available for the forthcoming academic year along lines recommended by the Massey commission. An item will, accordingly, be included in the supplementary estimates of the Minister of Finance of a sum approximately equal to fifty cents per capita of the present estimated population of the country.

It is intended that this amount should be divided among the provinces in proportion to their population, and that within provinces the division among institutions should, as the commission suggested, be in proportion to their enrolment of students at university level. Parliament will be asked to empower the governor in council to make regulations to ensure these ends and to enable the Minister of Finance to seek the advice and assistance of an advisory committee or committees to be drawn from the national conference of Canadian universities.

In making this announcement I feel I should emphasize that the federal action is intended to provide a necessary supplement to the assistance to universities already made available by the provincial governments, and it is our earnest hope that no provincial authorities will regard this federal contribution as in any way replacing their own obligations to the institutions which they have been supporting in the past.

These federal grants are designed, moreover, primarily to assist the universities to maintain the highly qualified staffs and the working conditions which are essential for the proper performance of their functions—in other words, to maintain quality rather than to increase existing facilities. It is our feeling that if in any province increased facilities involving increased capital outlays are required by the universities, these should be met from the usual sources rather than from federal assistance. The recommendations of the commission with respect to scholarships will be considered and dealt with later.

I might add that in making these recommendations to parliament it is intended to avoid any possible suggestion that we are interfering in any way with the policies respecting education in the respective provinces. It is for that reason we wish the Minister of Finance to have the power to consult with and get assistance from the conference of Canadian universities for the purpose of drafting regulations that will provide for the allocation of this grant in proportion to the population of each province, and within each province in proportion to the number of enrolments of students of university rank in the institutions. I am sure there can be no suggestion that in doing this there will be any interference with the absolute autonomy of the provinces and the provincial institutions in the field of higher education.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure hon. members generally will welcome any measure of assistance given in this way to the universities of Canada. In view of the fact that on behalf of the party I have the privilege to lead I proposed some time ago that these grants should be made as soon as possible, naturally we will welcome the grants to whatever extent they are made at this time.

I think there will also be general agreement with the view expressed by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) that a method should be adopted which will retain the complete jurisdiction of provincial authorities over education within the province. It will be necessary, of course, to recognize that this is only a temporary measure, because some recognized system will have to be established by which the amounts granted to the provinces will be related in the total to the requirements of higher education in this country.

There is a problem here which is not faced in the United Kingdom, but I would point out that there they have had for a great many years a system of university grants from the national treasury. Those grants are administered by the university grants committee, and are based not only upon the attendance at the universities but also upon the service they are performing in relation to the national development and cultural advancement of the country. It would not be simple or easy to have a similar system here, and perhaps it would not be desirable in view of the fact that education is under provincial jurisdiction. We have the advantage, however, of two bodies which can be of immense assistance in connection with the support of education, whether it be at university or secondary and primary school levels. We have a conference representative of the universities, and we also have the Canadian Education Association, which is an excellent example of the measure of co-operation that can be established among the provinces in any field of common endeavour. At such time as it may be decided to extend still further the grants into the primary and secondary field of education, that body would be of great assistance in the advice and supervision it could extend. I feel sure that in this field, as well as in the field of universities, hon. members will agree that it is necessary to establish very clearly the jurisdiction of provincial governments.

So much for these grants to the universities. I can only repeat that without being able to say how adequate or otherwise they may be, we will all welcome the statement that they will be made at this time without waiting for another session.

The Prime Minister has combined with the announcement with regard to grants to the universities the statement that there will be a supplementary estimate to provide additional funds for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. It may well be that that proposal will not meet with unanimity. Naturally, without knowing exactly the method by which the allocation will be made, it is not possible to consider the effect of this announcement, but I do point out at this time that this is not likely to facilitate the procedure in this house which many hon. members had hoped might lead to a fairly satisfactory disposition of some of the business now before us. Many hon. members will feel that the granting of additional money to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation without an examination of other aspects of this problem is something that they will not welcome. We all recognize that from its inception the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has enjoyed certain monopolistic privileges which do not receive unanimous support. I certainly would not wish to leave the impression that when that subject comes forward there will be the unanimity that there is in the support for grants to universities.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Although there is no motion before the house, Mr. Speaker, perhaps you will grant me the privilege of thanking the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) for the announcement he has made this morning concerning grants to universities. There may be some debate as to the method or basis upon which such grants should be made. I noticed no mention of an allotment of grants on the basis of need, but we will leave that for the moment.

The Prime Minister has taken a step in the right direction. I hope that as a result of this action the universities will be able to reduce their fees, so that a university education may not be denied to any deserving student. I congratulate the Prime Minister and his government upon the step which they are now taking.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): I am quite sure I speak for my colleagues when I say that we are very happy that the government is taking this step now to provide some form of interim assistance to the universities. I believe it is timely, because the universities are probably making up their budgets for the next year and they will want to know just what they can count on by way of supply. I should like to say to the government that I look upon this as the first step in a program, which we hope will be implemented throughout the years, designed to give further aid to education, and not confined to the university level.

With respect to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, I suppose it is only natural that the government would want to provide them with some further measure of temporary relief. We agree that government policy is to help the C.B.C. to expand its facilities, and they should do what they can now. But we reserve the right to discuss fully and in detail what further assistance should be granted when the matter of the Massey report is brought before the house during the autumn session.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

AGREEMENT AS TO ARMED FORCES STATIONED IN OR PASSING THROUGH NATO COUNTRIES

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I wish to make a statement, Mr. Speaker, with regard to an international agreement which was signed in London today by Canada and other parties to the North Atlantic treaty, and which is to be announced at about half past eleven our time in both London and Washington. It is entitled "Agreement between the parties to the North Atlantic treaty regarding the status of their forces," or, in abbreviated form "The NATO forces agreement." I am tabling the text of the agreement now for the information of the house. I have two copies in English here. We would have had it translated, but there is also an official text in French which is coming over from London, and we did not want to take the risk of making a translation that might vary in some details from the official text.

This agreement sets forth the rights and obligations of North Atlantic treaty countries in respect of their armed forces stationed in or passing through other North Atlantic treaty countries. The agreement is subject to ratification, and, of course, the approval of parliament will be sought prior to ratification. That will not be during the present session.

At the outset I should like to emphasize that this agreement does not deal with the question whether troops are to be sent abroad; and it has no connection with the question of command of integrated NATO forces. It is solely concerned with the laws and regulations which are to govern an armed force after it has been sent, by mutual agreement, into another North Atlantic treaty country.

It is a fully reciprocal agreement and will give valuable protection to Canadian servicemen serving in the integrated force. At the same time the rights of the receiving country are fully respected. The agreement provides that "it is the duty of a force...to respect the law of the receiving state, and to abstain from any activity inconsistent with the spirit of the present agreement, and, in particular, from any political activity in the receiving state."

General Eisenhower, in a statement issued today, says that it is a most important agreement, one of great significance to the integrated force under his command.

As there will be full opportunity for detailed discussion of the agreement in parliament in due course, I do not propose to take up time now with a clause by clause explanation. I will, however, list the main subjects dealt with in the agreement. They are:

1. The criminal and disciplinary jurisdiction of the military courts of the visiting force and the jurisdiction of the civil courts of the receiving country;

2. The application of the tax laws and customs tariff of the receiving country to the visiting force;

3. The application of the immigration regulations of the receiving country to the members of the visiting force;

4. The settlement of claims for damage or injury arising out of the activities of the visiting force;

5. The procurement by the visiting force of goods, accommodation, labour and services from sources in the receiving country;

6. The wearing of uniforms and the carriage of arms.

From this brief description of the scope of the agreement, hon. members will realize, I am sure, that the twelve negotiating countries, with their differing laws and legal systems, had to be willing to compromise in order to arrive at any agreement. It was realized that many countries might have to modify their laws to take account of the presence of other NATO forces in their midst, but an attempt was made to reduce to a minimum the need for legislative change. The legal authorities of the Canadian government are studying the agreement to determine whether legislation will be necessary and if so, its scope and extent. It is expected that the whole question will be brought before parliament at the next session.

In conclusion I should like to quote the statement made today in London by the chairman of the North Atlantic council of deputies. He said:

> The agreement on the status of armed forces which the North Atlantic treaty governments have signed today is an important addition to the structural framework of NATO. We believe we have developed a multilateral charter that provides a uniform and administratively workable basis for an orderly, consistent, and fair relationship between forces from one NATO country and any other NATO country where they may be assigned to serve.
> The agreement is part of the collective defence effort and is essential for the development of the integrated force under General Eisenhower's command. It gives the governments and the military authorities simple, practical procedures for regulating a complex relationship. It guarantees the members of the armed forces adequate legal protection, and at the same time, without infringing on the authority of the military command, fully recognizes the peacetime rights and responsibilities of the civilian authorities in the host countries.
> The development of collective defence in peacetime requires that forces of various countries which form part of the integrated force for the defence of the North Atlantic treaty area be stationed in various other countries. They must be free to move from one country to another, in accordance with the demands of strategy and the orders of the supreme command. It is essential that there be uniformity of arrangements governing their status in countries other than their own and their relationship to the authorities and people of those countries. The conclusion of this agreement is an important step in our common effort to organize integrated strength adequate to keep the peace.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I am sure that the house will welcome this further evidence of increasing measures of co-operation between the North Atlantic treaty nations. I think also that there will be general acceptance of the Prime Minister's statement that we welcome evidence of the increasing integrated strength of the United Nations.

I do not wish to appear to use this announcement as a vehicle for remarks about another subject, but in view of the critical importance of another matter that has been discussed, may I, in welcoming the announcement of this agreement, express the hope that, through the good offices of General Eisenhower, there may also be unanimity in another field and that it will not be too long before we also hear the announcement of an agreement in regard to the standardization of small arms and field weapons.

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

CHANGE IN PERSONNEL OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. L. D. Tremblay (Dorchester) moved:

That the name of Mr. Conacher be substituted for that of Mr. Goode; that the name of Mr. Thomson be substituted for that of Mr. MacDougall; and that the name of Mr. Cannon be substituted for the name of Mr. Laing, on the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Motion agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE

VARIOUS AMENDMENTS RELATING TO OFFENSIVE WEAPONS, PENALTY FOR OFFENCES OF A SEDITIOUS NATURE, IMPROPER USE OF MAILS, ETC.

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 391, to amend the Criminal Code.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): This bill contains the annual crop of amendments to the Criminal Code which are the result of suggestions which come to us from various sources, such as the attorneys general's departments which are charged with the enforcement of the criminal law in the various provinces; provincial and municipal police forces; the Royal Canadian Mounted Police; national organizations; various departments of the federal government, and, last but not least, officials of the federal Department of Justice itself. These suggestions, in the nature of things, result in a rather mixed grill, and it is therefore difficult to give a short description of the subject matter which will be comprehensive. The following, however, will indicate some of the proposed changes:

1. Amendments consequential upon the enactment of the National Defence Act;

2. A revision of the sections of the Criminal Code which relate to offensive weapons;

3. A clause increasing the penalty for offences of a seditious nature;

4. Clauses relating to the improper use of mails and to theft from the mails, and the penalty therefor, and the delivery of the mail by walking letter carriers;

5. A prohibition of the loitering about school grounds of those who have been guilty of certain offenses arising out of sexual aberration;

6. Creation of a new offence in relation to driving while one's ability to drive is impaired by alcohol or any drug, and provision for the taking of chemical tests of a sample of bodily substance for use as evidence in cases involving drunken driving, or driving while the ability to drive is impaired by alcohol;

7. Definition of a prohibited act for a purpose prejudicial to national security, and the penalty therefor;

8. Provision for a device requested by the attorney general of Ontario to assist in the apprehension of bookmakers;

9. A clause to remove any doubt that women are qualified to serve on juries in criminal cases when they are qualified under provincial law to serve on juries in civil cases.

There are also other provisions of a minor nature, such, for example, as that removing doubt that notice of appeal must be given by the appellant to the Supreme Court of Canada within fifteen days after the judgment appealed from is pronounced, or within such further time as may be allowed.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have no thought of making any extended remarks with regard to the announcement that these amendments will be introduced. I do not know whether the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier), speaking today on behalf of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), attached any particular significance to the words "mixed grill".

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I did not prepare this statement.

Mr. Drew: In view of the minister's extremely exact mind, and his taste for some of the good things of life, I thought he might have had the idea that this measure was going to be as hot as a mixed grill should be. Perhaps that significance is not to be attached to the words he used.

In addition to those mentioned, there are some amendments which, if they are effective, will be welcomed. I should like to ask him if one of the recommendations that has been made a number of times is covered, namely, that there be some effective provision to deal with subversive activities such as those carried on by agents of the Kremlin in this country during this period of crisis.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I mentioned a clause increasing the penalty for offences of a seditious nature.

Mr. Drew: But no new provisions.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Inquiries of the Ministry

MING SUNG INDUSTRIAL COMPANY

QUESTION AS TO OPERATION OF SHIPS UNDER CANADIAN FLAG IN CHINESE WATERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, arising out of a cable I received this morning from Hong Kong confirming the statement already made that strategic cargoes are loaded at Macao for Canton in Canadian-flag vessels. Can the minister say whether he has any further information as to the nature of the cargoes carried in the Ming Sung vessels?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Perhaps my hon. friend would tell me from whom he received his cable.

Mr. Pearkes: My cable is from the China coast guild.

Mr. Howe: I have no information at the moment. We hope to have some shortly.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

C. D. HOWE COMPANY LIMITED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): In the absence of the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer), I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State or to his parliamentary assistant in connection with an order for return made on Monday, May 21, in connection with a question asked by the hon. member for Three Rivers. On June 14 the Secretary of State said, as reported at page 4068 of Hansard:

> I shall make inquiries and endeavour to expedite the return.

May I have an indication from that department as to when the return may be expected?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I will bring to the attention of the Department of the Secretary of State the remarks made by the leader of the opposition. The Secretary of State is away this morning on other business, and he has no parliamentary assistant. I will communicate with the department and will try to ascertain when the return may be expected.

Mr. Drew: Through you, Mr. Speaker, with the desire to expedite such business as is before the house, I would point out that it is highly desirable that orders for returns which have been standing for some time should be completed as soon as possible.

[Mr. Drew.]

INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. 296, to amend the Income Tax Act.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I want to say just a word before this bill receives third reading. I want to express my regret again that the Minister of Finance made no attempt in any way to meet the views with regard to the five per cent feature of clause 12. I think the matter was much more serious than he appeared to regard it. It is just not possible for me to believe that the matter of finding a definition is insuperable. I want to record again my agreement with the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) for suggesting, though he would have much preferred to avoid the necessity of so doing, that it might be left to a regulation. All of these the minister turned down flat. Sometimes one feels that the minister is less co-operative than at other times.

I also want to repeat what I said a moment ago: really I cannot believe that the impossibility of finding a definition was the only factor; I think it is a fair inference that the minister had changed his mind on the situation, which, as he pointed out yesterday, he was entitled to do. Nevertheless—and again I refer to what the hon. member for Eglinton said—to throw overboard, I suggest with no adequate reason given, what had been passed by this parliament at the suggestion of the minister himself in his budget speech, to have that done as it was done yesterday, is just a fresh instance which makes us feel how low this parliament has sunk in the eyes of the government.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Drew: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed on division.

EMERGENCY GOLD MINING ASSISTANCE ACT

MODIFICATION OF APPLICATION AS TO LAST QUARTER OF 1950 AND EXTENSION IN MODIFIED FORM TO 1951

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys) moved the third reading of Bill No. 194, to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): I have just one brief comment to make on this subject. In view of the inadequacy of the relief provided for the gold mining industry by this measure, and the critical condition in which that industry finds itself today, will an opportunity be provided at the fall session of parliament to review again the position of the gold mining industry? I would urge that there is no reason why that should not be done. I can see many reasons why it ought to be done. I can see abundant reason why it should be regarded as an urgent enough matter to claim the attention of parliament at the session three or four months hence.

I would ask from the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys or from the Minister of Finance assurance that an opportunity will be afforded to parliament to review this whole question of the position in which the gold mining industry finds itself in consequence of government policy. May I emphasize the fact that it is tied up directly with government policy in reference to the international monetary fund. The governors of that fund are meeting in September. It will be a meeting of the highest importance, and parliament should have some report from the government in regard to what will take place at that September conference and an opportunity of expressing itself on the action of or position taken by government representatives at that conference.

In particular I would suggest this is a matter that is eminently suitable for review before a committee of this house, and I offer the further suggestion that the method found for promoting a review of government policy in regard to this whole subject should include a reference of the matter to the standing committee on banking and commerce, where officials could be heard and could give their evidence.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING

AMENDMENT OF ACT WITH RESPECT TO DEFENCE PROJECTS, PAYMENT OF ADVANCES, ETC.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development) moved the second reading of Bill No. 380, to amend the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act.

Mr. Fleming: Is the minister going to make a statement now?

Mr. Winters: This is a short bill containing only four sections. As hon. members know, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act was enacted in 1945, and has not been amended since. In the meantime the operations of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation have changed quite substantially. It has got into fields of construction and other operations not contemplated at the time it was set up to administer the National Housing Act. Some of the changes are quite incidental. For example, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act designated the responsible minister as the Minister of Finance. It is now proposed to change that. The board of directors is specifically designated so far as those appointed from within the public service of Canada are concerned. It is intended now to make that more general to provide additional flexibility.

A further change sought is one designed to increase the power of the corporation to borrow from the treasury by an amount equivalent to the investment of the corporation in foreclosed properties. Hon. members will recall that under section 24 the corporation is limited in its borrowings from the treasury to an amount owing to it on loans made under the various housing acts. The effect of this limitation is that the capital of the corporation becomes invested in foreclosed properties as they are acquired by the corporation. Already the units constructed by Housing Enterprises Limited have been taken over by the corporation, and some $24 million of the corporation's capital position is invested in this asset. What I believe was originally intended was that the borrowing power of the corporation should be limited to its over-all investment—including foreclosed real estate—in the National Housing Act. The effect of the proposed amendment is to place the corporation's investment in foreclosed properties in the same position as that of outstanding loans.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not think this measure calls for extended comment on second reading. The amendments, on the whole, are of a formal nature. No question of policy in regard to housing is raised by any of these amendments. The house had an extended and timely debate on housing policy ten days ago; accordingly, I do not think that further comment on the present bill is required on second reading.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I just wish to add this thought. Without raising any question of general policy, I suggest to the minister that he give consideration to the evidence of great difficulty on the part of many of those who wish to build houses in carrying forward their projects under the present arrangements.

We will all hope that the situation which has been indicated in Windsor, and in some other cities, rectifies itself in the near future, but at this particular time our housing projects offer an opportunity for employment which would be beneficial not only to those seeking employment but also to the people who wish to build houses.

No matter what statements may be made as to the number of houses built; no matter what statements may be made as to the provisions which are put forward by this government in co-operation with other governments, the simple fact remains that throughout Canada in the larger centres, and in some of the smaller communities as well, the housing situation is very serious. Many people are not able to obtain the houses they require. No matter what explanation we are given, that is the fact. Everything we can do should be directed toward the solution of this problem. I think this should be given particular attention at a time when it may be possible to obtain more workers in this field than could be obtained a relatively short time ago.

Mr. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, I should like to suggest to the minister that he should consider the possibility of expanding housing in Canada today. In Toronto—

Mr. Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but this bill does not permit a general discussion of the housing question. The discussions should be limited to the provisions of the bill. Probably in view of the remarks that have been made already, I should allow the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Hunter) to make a brief statement.

Mr. Abbott: It should be made on the other bill.

Mr. Hunter: My references will be brief.

Mr. Winters: May I suggest to the hon. member for Parkdale that his remarks could more properly be made on Bill No. 381, which is to follow this, and which deals with an amendment to the National Housing Act. That act has a more direct bearing on the housing situation generally.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Corporation to comply with directions of governor in council for minister.

Mr. Fleming: There is a question I should like to raise on this clause, as to how far the corporation is merely an agent of government policy and how far it inaugurates policies on its own initiative in regard to housing in general. Would the minister make a statement as to the precise relationship between himself and the government on the one hand, and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation on the other, in regard to housing policy in general?

Mr. Winters: Mr. Chairman, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation was set up under the existing act in 1945 to administer the National Housing Act, which, as the hon. member knows, prescribes precisely the operations of the government in the field of housing. Since that time, and in carrying out its functions, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has developed a most efficient organization across Canada which the government found very useful in contemplating operations that were not so precisely defined under the National Housing Act.

As the hon. member knows, under an arrangement with Defence Construction Limited made recently, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is embarking on a broader program of construction operations. Therefore it was deemed advisable, in order that there should be no question of reporting to parliament or of the minister's responsibilities to parliament, that this section should be put into the act to make it quite clear that on matters of policy, and in fact to the extent defined by this section, the minister or the governor in council shall have direct control over the operations of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

In a more direct reply to my hon. friend's question, matters of policy in the field of housing are determined by the government and carried out by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Mr. Hunter: I just want to have it made clear by the minister how far the exercise of the powers, duties and functions goes. That is to say, from now on the minister may exercise or direct the exercising of any of its powers, any of its duties and any of its functions and the corporation will be bound by that direction?

Mr. Winters: That is correct.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Board of directors.

Mr. Fleming: Will the minister indicate what changes he contemplates making in the board of directors of the corporation in the light of this section?

Mr. Winters: There are no changes in contemplation in the structure of the board of the corporation. This is merely to provide for flexibility in the event that more flexibility is required.

Mr. Fleming: In other words, you are simply seeking to widen the opportunity of selection on the part of the minister?

Mr. Winters: That is correct.

Mr. Fleming: But you have not in mind at the moment any use of that opportunity?

Mr. Winters: That is correct.

Section agreed to.

Sections 4, 5 and 6 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO INTEREST RATES, REPAYMENT OF LOANS, ETC.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development) moved the second reading of Bill No. 381, to amend the National Housing Act, 1944.

He said: On May 11 I made a statement to the house concerning changes to the National Housing Act. At that time I pointed out that in recent months mortgage interest rates, like other interest rates, had risen, and as a result lending institutions were participating in a lesser degree in National Housing Act loans. Other forms of investment have become relatively more attractive to lending institutions, and even in the mortgage field itself higher interest rates on conventional mortgage loans had the effect of reducing the interest of the lending institutions in loans under the National Housing Act.

This bill has the effect of making it possible for the government—within prescribed limits —to change the rate of interest payable by the borrower under National Housing Act loans. The bill authorizes the governor in council to establish interest rates payable by the borrower, provided that such rate, when established, shall not exceed two per cent in excess of the average yield upon long term government securities. This flexible approach departs from the fixed rate contained in the National Housing Act, 1944. However, hon. members will recall that the National Housing Act, 1938, provided that the rate of interest payable by the borrower was to be established by the governor in council. It is felt that this flexibility is desirable so that the government will be in a position to keep interest rates under the National Housing Act in relative conformity to other interest rates.

As I indicated in my statement of May 11, it is the government's intention, if this legislation receives the approval of parliament, to establish an interest rate, payable by the borrower on joint loans, of five per cent. In such circumstances the lending institutions, upon their share of the joint loan, would earn a gross interest rate of five and a half per cent, and Central Mortgage would earn three and a half per cent on its share of the joint loan. Upon approval of this legislation it would also be our intention to adjust interest rates for other types of loans under the act by a similar one-half of one per cent. For instance, loans to limited dividend companies under section 9 of the act would be made at 3½ per cent. The rate of interest upon rental insurance loans would be at 4¾ per cent. Loans to primary producers would be at 4½ per cent. The changes in the act, other than the one to which I have referred, give effect to the interest rate being established by the governor in council, and in themselves effect no change.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, there are some features of this bill which I think the house will view with regret. The minister has sought to make out his case for assumption by the governor in council of the power to fix interest rates under various sections of the act by the plea that this will have the virtue of flexibility. That same argument might have been used not many years ago with opposite effect when complaints were being made that the rates then prevailing under the act were too high, and that construction of more housing would have been encouraged and assisted had the rates been lower. But we heard no talk from the government at that time about the virtue of greater flexibility in these rates.

I view with some degree of misgiving any further step by way of amendments to the housing act which takes legislative power away from parliament and vests more power in the governor in council. The demonstrations we have had in recent months of the way in which the governor in council not only uses the power it now possesses, but arrogates to itself powers that belong only to parliament, are not likely to commend to the house the assumption of further power on the part of the governor in council at the expense of parliament.

What have we seen done by the cabinet under the powers contained in the act, and indeed beyond the powers contained in the act? On February 5 we saw the governor in council completely nullify an important enactment of parliament in November, 1949, the importance of which was emphasized in 1949 not simply by opposition members but by the government, and which was put before the house and the country as the fulfilment by the government of a solemn promise made to the people of Canada in the election campaign of the previous spring.

The essence of the bill is to eliminate from the act a number of provisions establishing the rate of interest, and, in lieu of such provisions, to vest in the cabinet the power to determine such interest rates. If one had confidence that the rates would be established in a realistic manner, with due regard for the serious housing situation we still have in this country and the means available to the government to assist in meeting it, there might be less objection in principle than there is to amendments of this kind. But one cannot see anything in this bill except the assumption on the part of the cabinet of the right to determine interest rates under a number of sections of the act. Last February the government tore up the provision made by parliament with reference to the one-sixth additional loan. A month ago they announced an increase in the rates of interest to be permitted under part I of the housing act, and presumably what parliament is being asked to do now is to give belated approval to a decision already taken by the government far in excess of any power it possesses under the act.

I, for my part, and with reference to this government, do not approve legislation that gives them these additional powers. I am not satisfied by any means that they have wisely, correctly or responsibly used the powers they already have under the act. They certainly have not used them fruitfully. On the contrary, in many important respects they have nullified provisions that parliament has made. I urge that the government would be better advised to apply their ingenuity and the powers they already possess to assist in the construction of more houses rather than in reaching out for more powers of this kind. Let them devote their energies to putting drive, impetus and energy behind the efforts that are being made by private builders, limited dividend housing corporations, municipalities and provinces to get more houses built.

Let the minister use his influence with the Minister of Defence Production to see that the importance of constructing houses is recognized when it comes to the allocation of essential materials. The minister indicated in a speech made in London a week or ten days ago, which was referred to in the house the following day, that no priorities have yet been established in favour of housing with respect to building materials. As long as that situation prevails, housing is going to come out second best in the competition with other forms of building enterprise for the limited and now quite inadequate supply of building materials available. I urge that the government open their eyes and see the serious situation in which the country finds itself at the present time as the result of inadequacy of housing, and use the powers they now possess to redress that serious situation instead of reaching out for powers which will be used by the government to raise interest rates.

The increase of one-half of one per cent in the interest rates announced by the minister is not, as I said before, nearly as serious an obstacle in the way of increased housing as some of the other mistakes the government has made. One in particular which they made last February, when they cancelled the provision of the act providing for the additional one-sixth loan, came on top of the freezing of lending values under the act, a policy which I submit was directly contrary to the expressed determination of parliament.

The increases that the minister has announced are not necessarily the end of increases of interest rates under the act, and if the bill before the house today passes the government will be in a position to increase further the interest rates prevailing under various sections of the act without ever coming back to parliament for approval. At least this may be said for the present provisions of the act fixing the rates of interest right in the terms of the legislation, that the government cannot change them without coming back to parliament. Parliament then has an opportunity to express its views on any proposal for an increase. If we ever had a situation in this house where members supporting the government would view the Canadian housing situation in its naked and ugly reality, then we might have the occasion in this house to express our disapproval by rejecting the proposals of the government for such changes as upward increases in interest rates.

Because it is so vitally important that parliament should retain control over policy in these matters, that parliament should be consulted before upward adjustments in interest rates are made under the act, I think the house should reject the request of the minister for more and more power to make such changes in interest rates as are proposed in this bill. It is true that some limitations upon the power of the minister to make these upward adjustments are proposed in the bill, but no one can foresee the extent to which interest rates may be varied under this bill. I believe parliament ought to retain the right to say, in the light of increases or decreases in prevailing interest rates in the bond or mortgage markets, whether corresponding changes should be made in the rates to be charged under this bill. Let parliament retain power for once. Let parliament retain the right to say now and in the future whether conditions do or do not justify increases in these interests rates.

Under the National Housing Act interest rates have been considered of very great importance. Right from the time this bill was introduced in 1944, interest rates under the act have been properly regarded as one feature of the legislative housing program of very high importance. Now the government is saying: Turn over to us the power to set the interest rates, and to do so without consulting parliament. In the light of its experience and the treatment its legislative enactments have received at the hands of this government, I do not think parliament is justified in giving the government this further power and at the same time giving up its own control over these interest rates. In the mind of the government unquestionably that would be equivalent to approving what it has done in nullifying enactments made by parliament in this very act. I hope nothing parliament may do will give any measure of approval to what this government has done, without the slightest consultation with parliament, to the enactments we adopted in the fall of 1949 with high purpose and high hope, which this government has chosen to destroy. The sort of bill we have before us invites an extension of the powers of the government. By its actions in the past the government has not justified any such extension of its powers at the expense of parliament.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Certainly there is need for some legislation such as this at the present time in order to meet the housing situation. As I understand it, building is practically at a standstill. I have personal knowledge of builders who took orders for houses months ago, but who have refused even to turn a sod in order to proceed with those houses until the matter of interest rates is settled. What has happened in the building industry is that the finance companies have gone on strike. There has been what labour would call a sit-down strike so far as the finance companies are concerned in relation to national housing. They just refuse to lend money at the interest rate set forth in the statute, and they will continue to do so until the matter of interest rates is settled to their satisfaction. Consequently some such legislation such as this is needed.

The need grows out of government policy. The housing policy of this government, as set forth in the National Housing Act, is tied hand and foot to the finance companies. The government, the builders and the purchasers of this country are completely at their mercy so far as building houses under that act is concerned. These companies are in a position to determine whether or not they will lend money at the rates set forth in the statute. They are in a position to determine to whom they will lend money. They, not the national housing authorities, must approve the borrower if the money is to be made available. So long as the government is wedded to these concerns, as it is, just so long will it be necessary for us to provide legislation such as this, or we will get no money. What we need in Canada today is houses. The government's policy provides for the building of houses only through loans made by finance companies. So long as that policy prevails we must meet the terms of those companies or get no houses.

Now the question comes up that has been raised by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), whether these rates should be determined by the governor in council or whether the authority should be retained by parliament. Here again, as long as the policy of this government prevails, which I presume is supported by the party to which the hon. member for Eglinton belongs, if we are to get money there must be some flexibility in the regulations governing the making of loans. If we were to fix a definite rate of interest and three months later such fluctuations had taken place in the bond market that the finance companies refused to lend at that rate, as they might, we would be left without the finances necessary to build houses. The need for this flexibility is due entirely to the policy followed by the government in relation to this whole matter of financing the construction of houses.

The second point is that I do not know whether it makes a great deal of difference in this particular parliament whether the government or parliament has the right. With the majority the government has, I see no difference between what parliament says and what the government says. I have not witnessed any occasion here on which any considerable number of members on the other side of the house were in opposition to any measure or policy introduced by the government. So I think in this house government policy and the policy of parliament are synonymous. There are those of us on this side of the house, of course, who will oppose government policy. Probably there are those of us who will be critical, but my experience here has been that the majority is always willing to go along with the government regardless of what the measure may be. So far as the building of houses is concerned

I do not think it will make much difference whether parliament has the last word in determining the interest rates, or whether the governor in council has the last word, because whatever measure the governor in council recommends to this house is likely to be supported by the Liberal majority.

There are two or three things in relation to this bill that I want to mention. I hope that this measure will be helpful, and that these rates will meet with the approval of the finance companies who control our national housing policy. The government, even the governor in council, is completely at the mercy of these finance companies so far as securing money to build houses is concerned. If the government were willing to give direct loans under the National Housing Act, except somewhere in the backwoods where the finance companies will not make a loan, then there might be some chance of the government asserting its independence of these finance companies. Personally I can see no reason whatever for the government catering to these finance companies to the extent that, no matter how desperately houses may be needed, the government must leave the financing to them. If the project is located in territory in which the finance companies have no offices, where it is going to be a little costly for them to send valuators and they do not want to make a loan, then the government will make one. They made one last year, I believe, to one farmer in Canada.

The first thing the government should do is to revise its policy with respect to the making of loans, and, if the finance companies will not lend money under proper interest rates where houses are needed, then the government should make the loan directly. The second change needed is the restoration of that additional one-sixth loan. There are still a great many people in the middle class brackets for whom national housing units are suitable, and who would buy houses if the down payments were within their reach. The one-sixth additional loan was very popular. A high percentage of the houses built under the National Housing Act while the one-sixth loan was in effect were built with the assistance of that one-sixth loan. If we want to provide houses for people we must first make it possible for the houses to be built, and then for the purchasers to be able to secure them. The removal of that one-sixth loan has created a difficulty which will deprive a great many people of homes they would otherwise be able to secure. With the cost of houses running from $8,000 to $10,000, and the down payment demanded now, the National Housing Act does not provide houses for the great mass of the people who need them. No matter what change we made in the interest rate, it would not affect the great mass of people. Those who are in greatest need of houses can only be provided with houses under a joint partnership of the federal and provincial governments for the construction of low rental housing projects. If such agreements can be reached and more houses built under those agreements, then there may be some prospect of those in the lower income groups securing houses.

Another thing which is necessary is that definite priorities should be established on building materials for use in the construction of houses. The minister's report recognizes that residential properties never get the first opportunity of securing building materials. In a market such as we have today, houses are simply left out of the picture. There is no question about it; unless the government can establish some priorities on building materials for residential properties, housing projects are going to be hampered more and more by material shortages.

I believe that the restoration of the one-sixth addition loan, the establishment of priorities for building materials, and a change in government policy to the point where the government will make loans directly through the National Housing Act, are needed in order to meet the housing requirements of the Canadian people.

I am going back to one other question which I discussed with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). I cannot understand why the government cannot give some assurance to United States investors that the money they invest in a housing project, if that project can be liquidated within a period of three or four years, can be taken back to the United States. The minister's answer was that it has been government policy to permit foreign investors who might liquidate their assets to take those original assets back to the United States. The minister states that that continued to be government policy even during the war years, and is government policy now. But the foreign exchange control board will give no assurance whatever to a United States investor that the policy may not be changed overnight. They will give no assurance—

Mr. Abbott: That is one of the incidents of control.

Mr. Noseworthy: —that if in two years' time those assets can be liquidated there will not be a foreign exchange control board regulation which will prevent those assets from being taken back to the United States. I cannot see where Canada would lose by giving some such assurance.

Let us assume that here is a building project and here is American capital up to, let us say, a quarter of a million dollars; and there is American capital available for housing projects in Canada under the National Housing Act if those investors could be assured that when the project is completed, when the houses are sold, when their assets are liquidated, they will be able, if they so desire, to take that money back to the United States. I cannot for the life of me see how Canada is adversely affected by giving some such assurance. Without it, we shall not get for investment some of that money at least; and the worst that we could expect is that these original investments, which we would not have received in any case, are the only ones that would be restored to the country of their origin.

The minister has not shown me how the giving of any such assurance for a limited period—I can understand that you would not want to give it for an unlimited period of time—would adversely affect the Canadian economy. If the minister convinces me, he will certainly have to give something more than the bare statement which he made when I raised this question before.

Mr. John Hunter (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) object to these interest rates being made more flexible. Goodness knows, some of his party should realize that with other interest rates going up and down, flexibility must be made possible in these interest rates. I feel, however, that that view is no more inconsistent than is the general policy of that party.

As to the objective of this bill, namely, to make interest rates flexible under the minister, I feel that it is a sound move and a necessary one if we wish to get more money out on the market under the National Housing Act. A large percentage of the money comes from the lending institutions; and in order to get it out, we have to meet the current interest rates. I note with regret, however, that there is nothing in this act to indicate that housing is to be promoted more rapidly than it has been promoted in the past, and there is nothing in the statement of the minister to indicate that housing will not fall off. I am not particularly concerned about the one-sixth loan, which is the one-sixth second mortgage. That is only one method of achieving the same thing. The question of a low down payment can be met equally by having a more realistic lending value.

But the point is this. We are either going to have to accept this as a straightforward anti-inflationary measure, or we are going to have to accept the view that housing is something more than materials and dollars and cents—of course those things are obviously important—and that it has a social value. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, housing is one of those things that go beyond dollars and cents and beyond shortages of building material. Housing is something that affects the whole nation. It does so in many ways. By a shortage of housing, and by the use of obsolete housing, we place ourselves in the position of paying large bills through taxation and in other ways. We all know the social need for housing. If hon. members were acquainted with some of the frightful conditions existing in some places in Canada —for instance, in the city of Toronto—they would realize that housing is not just a matter of dollars and cents.

I have the greatest admiration for the cleverness of the president of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, but sometimes I wonder whether his wisdom matches his cleverness. I have great admiration for his intelligence, but sometimes I wonder whether his humanity matches his intelligence.

The question of housing is one that must be taken from the point of view of human suffering and human welfare. For instance, if we were to adopt an anti-inflationary measure, a real one would be the cutting off of the old age pension. But obviously we do not cut off the old age pension because that is a social welfare measure which is much needed in this country. Similarly, we do not cut off the family allowance. Obviously to do that would be an anti-inflationary measure. We do not do it, obviously because it is a social necessity.

I urge the minister to consider seriously whether housing does not come under the same category. If he considers the matter seriously, I think he will find it does. I know that he set it second to national defence. I think he must realize that something must be done, and soon. I think he will find that housing has been and is recognized by this government as a matter of social welfare.

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words generally about this bill. I have spoken on it on various occasions, and I have expressed myself clearly with regard to it. I think that the time has come—and I believe that everyone in this house recognizes it—when housing must be considered as an emergency measure. It is an emergency measure from more than one point of view. It is an emergency measure from the standpoint of the morale of the people of Canada. You cannot expect people who are living in unhealthy conditions, in unhealthy surroundings, to have the moral standards that we require of the Canadian people. Social life is affected directly by the housing problem. No matter where you go, if you find congested living conditions, you find deterioration in the social standards. That is not good from the point of view of the standard of citizenship. It is not good for the building of Canadian morale.

It is true that there has been an increase in the price of building materials, but there has never been any decrease in the desire of people to obtain houses. The only thing that stopped the building of more houses—the only thing that lessened the increased construction of new housing—was the fact that the lending companies went on a sit-down strike. I can understand any business concern, labour organization or industrial concern going on a sit-down strike if they are not making a reasonable profit. But surely this cannot be said of the lending institutions. It would seem to me that five per cent is an exceptionally good return on one's capital. I know that most individuals would be well satisfied if they could get a five per cent return on their capital. Not only that, Mr. Speaker, but this enterprise is the more enticing because the government guarantees them against twenty-five per cent loss. I do not see where you could find a better investment for mortgage companies in the building of houses. Yet we have come to the point, as the minister indicated in his speech the other day, where building is being retarded because the lending companies will not make the necessary loans, and their excuse is that they could make better investments in other fields. It should not be forgotten that the government came to the assistance of the lending companies not many years ago when this national housing program was put into effect. The lending companies were practically at a loss to make investments, and the government started the national housing program. Then the lending companies were able to find a lucrative field of investment. They received a guarantee against loss.

It seems to me that since we have guaranteed the companies against loss they should be a little bit reasonable in this time of emergency in housing. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that a few years ago we reduced the interest rates on annuities. That was the only field in which the ordinary little man had a chance to invest his money with a chance of fair return. It used to be four per cent, but the government took the view that four per cent on annuities was too much in comparison with the interest rates on other securities.

Mr. Abbott: Earning power of government bonds.

Mr. Johnston: Yes.

Mr. Abbott: The interest return on government bonds.

Mr. Johnston: Yes; but look at government bonds today. The government appealed to the people to invest their money in bonds. This was the one sure investment. You would not stand any losses there. But look at government bonds today. All the other companies are demanding increases in interest rates. We have the lending companies in the housing field—an essential activity, one that is necessary to the well-being of Canada—saying that they will not lend any money unless they get an increase in rate. But the government do not say that since other fields of investment are increasing interest rates, therefore they are going to increase the interest return on annuities, or that they are going to pay higher interest rates on government bonds. There should not be such a great divergence between the interest rates which the lending companies get on their money, and that which private individuals get on theirs.

It may be said that there is a greater risk from the point of view of the lending companies, but in this particular field there is no risk. Experience has proven that the companies have not taken any loss whatever under this plan. Building costs have increased because of increased wages, but there is some excuse for that, because increased wages have to be paid on account of the general rise in the cost of living.

Then we have had an increase in the cost of materials. That too was probably necessary under these conditions. It seems to me that this bill is not so much concerned with assisting housing as it is with assisting lending companies. The bill is wrongly entitled. It should be a bill to assist finance companies.

Even though this increased rate of interest is applied, people are going to take advantage of it because they must have houses. But just look at the position in which it puts the purchaser of a house. I am saying to you, Mr. Speaker, that five per cent is too much for a man to pay to get a house built. He just cannot pay that kind of interest. When he was speaking the other day I think the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) made the same suggestion that I have made on many occasions, namely, that the government itself should go into the lending business for house building. It is so necessary from more than one point of view.

If the government can borrow money at three per cent or less, then why can they not lend it out under this national housing program? They do not even have to lend it at three per cent; they could lend it at an even higher rate and still be away below what the lending companies are asking. If we really consider that housing is so necessary, and if the government are so desirous of everybody having a house in which to live, a home in which to raise a family, surely this could be done.

I think, too, that this would be an opportune time to reinstate the additional one-sixth loan. It is difficult for people now to get money to start out. In fact it is just impossible under this plan for people to get sufficient money to make their down payments under the housing plan.

I should like the government to reconsider their stand on national housing. We should not now increase the interest rates to the common man who must have a house. The common man must have a house. Even though the government decides to allow this increase, the people will have to accept it. They have no alternative, because they must have some place in which to rear their families. But it seems an arbitrary way of forcing these people to come into line.

I have never contended that individuals or companies should work for nothing. I have always maintained that everybody is entitled to a fair return on money invested or on services rendered. But I do not think we would be imposing a hardship on anyone in this instance, particularly with all the guarantees behind it, if we asked that this increase in interest rate be not implemented at this time.

I should like to suggest very seriously that the government go into the field of lending money at a much lower rate of interest than is provided for under this plan.

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I want to let the minister know that I do object to this increase in interest rates. In my experience in Canada I do not think there is anything that has broken more people than high interest rates. To be anything in Canada you must have your own house. If a man has to pay more interest over a period of years than he pays for his house, it just breaks him. I have seen this even in the farming business. I have known men who bought farms and who have paid far more in interest than they ever paid for the farm. And that sort of thing breaks the back of so many people.

I agree with what the hon. gentleman who preceded me (Mr. Johnston) said about the government lending the money. I do not see why they should not lend the money. They do it in other countries, and they could do it here. If the rates are not satisfactory to the insurance companies who are lending money at the present time, then the government should look after the people first.

I appeal to the minister to take a trip to New Zealand and see what they have done there. I am not going to go into it. I am not going to put it on the record, but if the minister wants the information I can give it to him, because I was there and saw it at first hand, along with some of my colleagues in the house.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I doubt very much if this measure is worth all the time we are giving to it this morning. What this country needs is a measure that will help people who need houses and who are not able to finance them, either to build or to buy houses. This bill will not assist in that way. Those fortunate persons who can come within the provisions of the National Housing Act in connection with building houses could build them without the National Housing Act. If the minister is going to do something to enable the ever-increasing number of families in Canada who need houses to get them, something better than what is contained in this act will have to be provided.

I am an inveterate reader of newspapers, and I seldom open a paper these days without finding statements by jurists who are called upon to deal with delinquents that our deplorable housing conditions are leading to crime and immorality. Social workers say the same thing. If a sufficient number of houses could not be built under the interest rate provided heretofore in the act, the raising of the interest rates is not going to facilitate building.

I do not believe that we should blame the lending companies for wanting higher interest rates, because, after all, they are in the lending business to make a living. Regardless of whether we believe that an interest rate of five per cent, six per cent, or whatever it may be, is high enough, is not particularly important to the lending companies. What is important is the rate they can get by holding out by refusing to lend money unless they get those rates. The people need houses, and need them badly, and I suggest to the minister that he bring in a measure that will help the people to meet that need.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Mr. Fleming: In view of the appearance in this section of the term "lending value", I should like to ask the minister if any change is contemplated by his department or by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in regard to the present method of determining lending value. Is the department still adhering to the retention of the lending value as of January 1, 1950?

Mr. Winters: Yes. The policy is still to adhere to the lending value prevailing at January 1, 1950, for reasons which I am sure are obvious to all hon. members and which have been discussed previously in this house. It is an anti-inflationary measure designed to act in the interest of home owners in seeing that they do not pay more for their houses than they have to under the circumstances.

Mr. Fleming: It may be an anti-inflationary measure, but it is also an anti-house building measure, as things stand at the present time.

MANITOBA NATURAL RESOURCES

APPROVAL OF AGREEMENT WITH RESPECT TO INVESTMENT OF SCHOOL LANDS FUND

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 385, to vary the Manitoba natural resources agreement.

Mr. Drew: Explain.

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there is really very little I can add to the explanation I gave on the resolution stage. The bill actually dates back to 1879 when the Public Lands Act of Canada was passed setting aside two sections in every township for school purposes. The proceeds from the sale of the two sections were to be put in a trust fund and the interest from that trust fund paid to the provinces for school purposes. There was a provision in the act of 1879, similar to the provisions in most federal acts concerning trust funds, that those funds should be invested in government of Canada securities.

In 1930 the natural resources were transferred to the three prairie provinces, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, and those trust funds were also transferred. Final transfer has only been completed as of July 1, 1950. The premiers of the three provinces have now asked that, since these trust funds are now under the jurisdiction of the provinces, the provinces be allowed to invest not only in government of Canada securities but in securities of the provinces, or municipalities in the provinces or of local school boards. The federal government has agreed. In the appendix to each one of these three bills you will find the agreement between the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), speaking for the federal government, and the premier of Manitoba, the provincial treasurer of Saskatchewan and the premier of Alberta, speaking for the various provincial governments.

The sole intent of these bills is to give the provincial governments, who have control over school lands trust funds, the right to invest the proceeds from the sale of these lands in provincial, municipal and school board securities as well as in government of Canada securities.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May we have the figures to show the amounts involved?

Mr. Sinclair: The amounts involved that I can give are shown on page 51 of the public accounts for this year. These were the amounts in trust in 1930 when we turned these amounts over to the three provinces. Since that time of course the provinces have probably sold more lands and set up their own trust funds. However, so far as the federal government is concerned, the Manitoba amount is $5,919,862.05, the Saskatchewan amount is $17,809,039, and the Alberta amount is $9,564,569.20. On these we were paying 4 per cent. We are very happy to have the provinces take these things over because after all we do not get 4 per cent when we issue securities ourselves. The provinces have asked for this so that they will be allowed the extra field of investment for their funds.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): In other words, this is provincial property, and all this is doing is to alter slightly their powers of investment.

Mr. Sinclair: Quite right.

ALBERTA NATURAL RESOURCES

APPROVAL OF AGREEMENT WITH RESPECT TO INVESTMENT OF SCHOOL LANDS FUND

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 386, to vary the Alberta natural resources agreement.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

SASKATCHEWAN NATURAL RESOURCES

APPROVAL OF AGREEMENT WITH RESPECT TO INVESTMENT OF SCHOOL LANDS FUND

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 387, to vary the Saskatchewan natural resources agreement.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

Canadian National Railways

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR REFUNDING OF FINANCIAL OBLIGATIONS AND ISSUE OF SUBSTITUTED SECURITIES

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to provide for the refunding of matured, maturing and callable obligations of the Canadian National Railways and for the issue of securities guaranteed by the Dominion of Canada in respect of such refunding to an aggregate principal amount not exceeding $200 million.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): May we have a statement now?

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there are two main C.N.R. bills as far as finance is concerned which come before parliament. One is the annual bill, the resolution concerning which will be discussed after this one, for the financing and guaranteeing of C.N.R. obligations. The second is this refunding measure which is not an annual bill. The bill to be founded on this resolution is to provide for the refunding of Canadian National Railways securities maturable or callable in the years 1951 to 1955. Provision is made either by the issue of railway bonds guaranteed by the government or by temporary loans from the government. The amount provided is $200 million, the same as was provided in exactly similar acts passed at the 1935, 1938, 1944 and 1947 sessions. I have a table of the maturing issues in the period to which I have referred. I think it would be very useful if I could put it on Hansard now so that when the bill comes up for second reading hon. members will see exactly the field which is being covered. If I have unanimous consent, I would ask that this table of the issues which are either maturing or callable in the period of the resolution shall appear in Hansard.

Mr. Fraser: What is the total?

Mr. Sinclair: The total is $216,734,265.23.

Mr. Speaker: Has the parliamentary assistant leave to have this table included in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Sinclair: The table is as follows:

The usual practice is to borrow temporarily from the government and issue securities to the public at the appropriate time and in an amount suitable to the market for refunding and other purposes. Of the $200 million authorized by the 1947 act, the last C.N.R. refunding act, $104,642,000 has been financed by public issues and the remainder by government loans.

I have a second statement which I am sure would be very useful for members to study before the bill is introduced covering this operation. It has to do with the refunding and calling operations covered by the 1947 act. If the house will give its consent I will put that on the record too.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house that the hon. gentleman shall have leave to put this table on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Sinclair: The table is as follows:

Mr. Wright: I would like to ask a question, but if this is going to committee I can ask it there.

Mr. Sinclair: It is.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Mr. Wright: What rates of interest did these issues bear, and is it anticipated they can be refunded at the same or lower rates?

Mr. Sinclair: The rates vary, of course. In the last four years all the issues that were callable have been called, as will be seen from this table. Some of them carried interest as high as 4½ per cent, and obviously it was good business practice to call those bonds and refund them. The actual refunding which has been done since 1947 has been at a cost to the company in January, 1949, of 3·075 per cent; in September, 1949, 2·96 per cent; in January, 1950, 2·95 per cent and in June, 1950, 2·72 per cent.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I understand that the basis of calling is what one would expect, purely a calculation of ruling interest rates, those at which they can be refunded. Perhaps we can have a little more discussion of this a little later on.

Mr. Sinclair: That is quite right.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Fournier, Hull (for Mr. Abbott) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 392, respecting the Canadian National Railways, and to provide for the refunding of matured, maturing and callable financial obligations.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PROVISION TO MEET CERTAIN EXPENDITURES AND GUARANTEE OF SECURITIES AND INDEBTEDNESS

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Finance) moved:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to make capital expenditures not exceeding $97,737,000, and to increase the working capital of the national railway system by $20,000,000; to provide that the governor in council may authorize the national railway system to incur commitments during 1951, in addition to the authorized expenditure, in amounts not exceeding $111,512,920; to authorize the national company to issue securities to provide amounts required for the authorized expenditures; to provide that amounts available from reserves for depreciation and debt discount amortization may be applied towards meeting the authorized expenditures; to provide that the aggregate principal amount of securities not including any securities issued to secure temporary loans made by the Minister of Finance, outstanding at any time shall not exceed $101,215,000; to authorize the governor in council to guarantee the principal and interest of the securities issued by the company for the purpose aforesaid; to authorize the Minister of Finance to make temporary loans to the said company secured by such securities and not exceeding $101,215,000 in principal amount to enable the said company to meet such expenditures and indebtedness; with authority to give financial aid and assistance to other companies of the said national system and to authorize the Minister of Finance to place at the disposal of the national company or the Trans-Canada Air Lines, such amounts as may be necessary to enable them to pay operating and income charges if at any time before the first day of July, 1952, the available revenues of the national railway system or the Trans-Canada Air Lines and subsidiaries, respectively, are not sufficient to pay such charges: Provided that all such amounts shall be reimbursed to the minister from the recipients' annual revenues in so far as such revenues are sufficient, any insufficiency to be provided for by subsequent deficit appropriation by parliament.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Could we have a statement on this?

Mr. James Sinclair (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): This is the annual bill in connection with finances and guarantees for the C.N.R. I would like to have been able to say that it is in the same form as in previous years, because that always helps get the resolution and bill through, but actually this year it is not in quite the same form.

Each year the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) presents the report of the Canadian National Railways to parliament, and that report is referred to the committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government. At the same time the budget of the C.N.R. for the coming year is discussed by that same committee. This year the committee first met on April 12, it had seven meetings, and presented its final report to parliament on May 1 approving of the capital expenditures of the C.N.R. and the budget for the coming year. This resolution is to implement that report.

Ordinarily this resolution is in three parts. The first part authorizes the C.N.R. to issue securities up to the amount of the approved capital expenditures. It is a growing railway and requires additional capital each year. The second part permits the government to make loans to the C.N.R. against its securities until such time as the company thinks it fit and proper, according to the market, to float an issue. The third part of the ordinary resolution authorizes the government to make advances against the budget of the C.N.R. if their operating revenues are not sufficient to cover the cost of operation. If at the end of the year the operating revenues have not been sufficient, of course that means the C.N.R. has a deficit which is then voted by parliament.

This year, however, there is one change to which in fairness I must direct the attention of hon. members. That is the provision in the early part of the resolution to increase the working capital of the national system by $20 million, and then the following sentence:

—to provide that the governor in council may authorize the national railway system to incur commitments during 1951, in addition to the authorized expenditure, in amounts not exceeding $111,512,920; to authorize the national company to issue securities to provide amounts required for the authorized expenditures—

In the last two years I have had to prepare myself in advance on the details of the railway budget, because I am not a member of the committee, but this year I am very glad to have the assistance of my colleague the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Transport, who will now explain to the house why these two new clauses have been inserted in the annual resolution.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Transport): Probably I should first explain the need for the additional working capital of $20 million. I think hon. members will realize that need when I simply mention that the cost of materials and supplies is very much higher than it has been in recent years. Consequently the amount of cash a corporation of this size must have available necessarily must be greater than in previous years. That, of course, is also shown up in the increased revenues and expenditures. It is felt that the present working capital of the road should be increased by $20 million in order that at all times the railway company may meet its obligations as they become due, and may be able to take advantage of trade discounts and such things as are known to all businessmen.

The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sinclair) has indicated that there is another new feature in this annual resolution. That is the provision this year that the government may authorize the national railway system to incur commitments during 1951 in a sum not to exceed $111,512,920 for orders for equipment that probably should be taken into account this year rather than next year. I would like to give the house a little explanation of why it is felt this step should be taken since, as I say, it is something that has not been a part of similar resolutions in previous years. In view of, first, the current and anticipated restrictions on steel and other materials in short supply; second, the progressively increasing lapse of time between the placing of orders for new equipment and delivery of those orders by manufacturers; third, the urgent necessity of replacing obsolete equipment no longer efficient or economical in operation; and fourth, providing additional rolling stock to meet current and expected increases in traffic; the management of the Canadian National Railways considers it essential that 1952 deliveries be assured by placing orders earlier than has been the practice heretofore. Until firm orders are placed no steel can be allotted these days for the manufacture of the equipment that they see will be required in the future.

In addition to the needs of the road for 1952 that are already seen and for which this additional provision should be made now, in April of this year the company felt it advisable to make a detailed study of the equipment requirements for a period as long ahead as five years, and it has recommended that on a five-year basis equipment purchases should normally include the acquisition of 4,360 new freight cars per annum. Of this number some 2,500 will be offsetting annual retirements due to obsolescence and those that have become inefficient and uneconomical in operation. This also includes 1,860 that are expected to accommodate an estimated ten per cent increase in business at the rate of two per cent per annum over the five-year period. Approximately 30 baggage express cars per annum will be needed over this period to provide for average annual retirements, and to bring this class of equipment up to approved passenger train standards.

As to motive power, no exact prediction could be made by management when this decision was made in April, with respect to the number of road and switching units which should be purchased annually between the years 1952 and 1956 inclusive, inasmuch as such purchases would necessarily depend upon the acceleration or deceleration of the over-all dieselization program and the availability of equipment and servicing and repair facilities, as well as upon other factors which are not susceptible of exact calculation at the present time. Taking all these factors into account, it is recommended by C.N.R. management that orders be placed immediately for 24 road diesel locomotives and 25 diesel switching units to constitute the 1952 complement of the five-year program.

As hon. members know, the budget of the Canadian National Railways is annually presented to a committee of this house, namely the committee on railways and shipping. The records of that committee do contain a list of equipment that is included in the 1951 budget of the Canadian National Railways, so I do not think that needs to be repeated now. With respect to those purchases of equipment wanted in 1952 that it is felt should now be placed in the form of orders, in order that all members of the house may have a full appreciation of what is involved I shall, with the leave of the house, place on Hansard a table showing the list of equipment that it is felt should be ordered now. It will then be available to members when the bill is up for discussion.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am grateful to the two parliamentary assistants for explaining as clearly as they have the difference between this resolution and the resolution which has been more or less routine in the past. When we go into committee of the whole, there are one or two questions I should like to ask. At the moment I am not clear how much of these new commitments and obligations were in fact discussed in the committee on railways and shipping when it was in session. That, however, can wait until we are in committee of the whole.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): First of all, I am looking back now to the resolution of a year ago, and to the budget the railway presented a year ago. At that time the capital budget of the railway was set out at $24 million, and the authority requested was for the same figure. In looking at the relevant figures before the committee this year, the one is $40 million and yet the figure we have in this resolution is not $40 million, following the practice of a year ago, but $97 million. May I have that point explained first?

Mr. Benidickson: The item of $97 million is made up of new equipment totalling $54,702,823; miscellaneous equipment, $1,853,-897; the acquisition of securities, which was explained to the committee, totalling $3,712,000; additions and betterments, $37,-302,823. All of these items, of course, are items taken directly from the 1951 budget figures which were presented to the committee on railways and shipping. There is no change in any of the figures that were presented to that committee.

Mr. Sinclair: The other point raised by the hon. member concerns the difference between the 1950 resolution and this resolution. First of all the resolution speaks of $97 million capital expenditures and then $20 million working capital. At the bottom of the resolution the government is authorized to extend temporary loans to the railway up to only $101 million. In last year's resolution these two amounts were the same. Last year we had a long discussion on the position of the company concerning depreciation allowance and debt amortization charges which could be used as cash to purchase equipment.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): They are going to be used this time.

Mr. Sinclair: Actually, what could have happened last year, for example, is that the $24 million was authorized for bond issue of the Canadian National and the government permitted to make temporary loans up to the amount, until the railway floated its bond issues; but that latter guarantee could have had added to it the cash available through the depreciation account and the amortization account. It was because of the comments of members last year that the Department of Justice redrafted this section to show that of the $117,737,000 covered by these first two items at the beginning of the resolution the government could only make temporary advances of up to $101,215,000, the balance being covered by those two items of depreciation and amortization.

Now, if the committee would like to have on the record the two calculations of the reserve of depreciation and the debt amortization available, I could put them on Hansard very easily. I could read it into the record, although it would be dull, or I could simply place it on Hansard if the committee agrees.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am still left with one question unanswered. I realize that the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Transport has explained these other items. He has said something about which I was not sure before, that these other items were in fact mentioned in the railway committee. What is not yet clear to me is that a budget was put before the committee in due form, as it was a year ago. A year ago we approved a capital budget of $24 million and we subsequently authorized the same amount. This time, following the same practice so far as I know, we approve a budget of $40 million but we are now faced with a request for authorization of $97 million. The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Transport says he has given the other items. What I want to know is, either what was before the committee was a budget or it was not a budget. I want to know where it leaves the committee.

These committees are either considering and recommending budgets, or they are not. So far as I can see here, subject to what may be said, we approved $40 million and we now find ourselves faced with $97 million. I believe that is qualified to the extent that we have inserted in here definite authorization to use the depreciation and amortization. That qualifies the figure, but it does not make the difference between $40 million and $97 million.

Mr. Benidickson: Would the hon. member tell me from what source he is quoting the $40 million?

[Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood).]

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Yes, I am quoting the report of the committee on railways and shipping, page 136, showing a summary of financial requirements for the year 1951, which also includes 1950. I assume that, when I found the figure of $24 million for 1950 was the figure which was used in the resolution, I would find the $40 million figure, the corresponding figure in this statement, used in the same way. The explanations which have been given as to the difference in the other points of the resolution, I understand, and I think they are intelligible; but I still do not understand this one. The parliamentary assistant sought to explain it by mentioning certain figures which made up the difference between the $40 million and the $97 million. But I still come back to the point that we approved a budget in that committee; and if I am right in thinking that it was a $40 million budget, and that we now have this huge larger amount, it makes me wonder how much the meetings of our committee really meant. This matter can wait over, if the parliamentary assistant prefers that it should, until we have the bill before us. There is no need to delay matters now.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, that can be done, and I will take note of the hon. member's question. But I think he will note from page 136 that my figures are all there. It is just a matter of using them in a different way. The requirements for additions and betterments, new equipment, and acquisition of securities is set out on page 136 of the railways and shipping committee at $56,737,000. We are making no change in practice in the matter of using such moneys as are available from reserve for depreciation and discount amortization, which amount to $16,522,000. That means that with respect to these things we would require normally in cash $40,215,000. That is perfectly correct. But later on we will explain to the hon. member that there will be a departure from last year's practice in that formerly we have shown—a net figure —a figure that eliminates from gross C.N.R. requirements such sums as the road itself is able to finance as a result of selling equipment trust shares. That is a practice which was explained to the railways and shipping committee. It is felt that, in view of the unfavourable market conditions for raising money in that form at the present time, one should not count on that being a source of finance. Consequently, in this bill parliament will be asked to provide finance and securities for the entire amount of the capital requirements of the road.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am not going to pursue the matter further; I am not going to disagree with that statement. I am only reverting to what I said, namely, that on the face of it, it is no answer to refer me to the figure of $56 million because there is a corresponding figure to that in 1950. We can leave the matter now, however, until we get to the second reading stage.

Mr. Fraser: Does the parliamentary assistant mean that they are going to stockpile a little bit more this year? Is that the idea?

Mr. Benidickson: No, Mr. Chairman. As I think the hon. member will find, when he has time to read the statement that I have given, it is not a matter of stockpiling. It is a matter of necessity, of the requirement to place an order earlier these days than was necessary last year, owing not only to steel rationing and so on but to the general pressure on supplies of the kind that would be wanted by the road in 1952. We must place orders now which normally might have been placed, we will say, at the beginning of 1952.

Mr. Fraser: And this revolving fund that we have will not look after the matter. Is that the idea?

Mr. Benidickson: I do not see the point respecting a revolving fund. We are not dealing with money. We are dealing with placing orders for equipment. It is hoped that, by placing orders now, this equipment that would be required in 1952 will be delivered in 1952. But if conditions worsen, of course we would not even get delivery in 1952. But the situation emphasizes the need of planning for a longer period ahead than has been the custom.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): By the use of the word "commitments", I take it that it is intended to indicate that it will be an obligation, not an expenditure?

Mr. Benidickson: That is correct. It is not expected that much, if any, of this equipment would be delivered in 1951; but it should be ordered now in order to assure that it would arrive some time in 1952.

Mr. Fraser: That will tie up steel a little bit more, will it?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I understand all that. But I should like to add this comment to what I said before. When we get to the second reading stage, I hope that we can get a figure that is as specific as possible with regard to commitments and that we may be told whether any of them are likely to develop into expenditures.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Fournier, Hull (for Mr. Abbott) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 393, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures made and capital indebtedness incurred by the Canadian National Railways system during the calendar year 1951, and to authorize the guarantee by His Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPPLY

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

MING SUNG INDUSTRIAL COMPANY

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I propose to avail myself of the opportunity afforded by this motion to raise a subject which I think should be dealt with by this house without further delay. I think the facts have been adequately ascertained to call for a decision by the house, regardless of party, that action should be taken to prevent the possibility of any abuse of the privileges accorded to the Canadian flag in the ports of the world and in the shipping lanes between those ports. I propose to introduce a motion which will ask for an expression of opinion from this house in regard to this subject.

When the matter was before us earlier, we were dealing with it by a process of question and answer. During the course of those answers considerable information was obtained, but further information is available; and I am going to submit to the house what I regard as facts sufficiently convincing to call for action without any further inquiry being necessary. This matter is of sufficient importance to call for a review of the essential facts.

The whole transaction has its beginning in the arrangements that were made for the manufacture in Canada of nine vessels to be delivered to a Chinese company known as the Ming Sung Industrial Company Limited. That company is a large Chinese shipping company with head office in Chungking, and with branches throughout China in the larger cities. It has been in operation for a long time. That company sought to acquire Canadian-built vessels for its business. At the time that these contracts were entered into, there were certain government powers which made it possible for the government to make special provision for the manufacture of these ships.

Ming Sung Industrial Company

The contracts were given to three shipping companies, all of them well known companies, which in due course completed the contracts, and the ships were delivered. On November 12, 1946, the Canadian government, by P.C. 4690, provided, under the provisions of the Export Credits Insurance Act, that Canada should give a guarantee in an amount not to exceed $12,750,000, which would provide a blanket guarantee of payment of the money required for this purpose, which money was to be advanced by the Imperial Bank of Canada, the Bank of Toronto and the Dominion Bank.

The government in China of that time joined in the guarantee; but, as is generally known, the situation has changed since that time to a point where the government of Canada obviously is called upon to accept the full, or practically the full, responsibility for this payment. Certain security was given in the form of mortgages on the ships by the companies.

On May 16, 1950, order in council P.C. 4690 was amended by P.C. 2453. By that time the banks had each advanced one-third of the total amount required. The order in council passed on May 16, 1950, included this paragraph:

That since the date of the execution of the said supplementary agreement, the Chinese company has proposed that it will sell and transfer to Ming Sung Industrial Company of Canada Limited, a company incorporated under the Companies Act (Canada), hereinafter called "the Canadian company", seven of the said ships or vessels (now said to be in or near Hong Kong) and that they shall then be transferred to Canadian registry under the Canada Shipping Act and that the Canadian company shall execute and deliver a mortgage or mortgages thereof in form registrable in Canada in favour of the Chinese company for the amount of the purchase price, namely, $12,750,000, payable as to principal and interest thereon at the same times, in the same instalments and at the same rate of interest as the Chinese company's indebtedness to the said banks is payable as aforesaid, and that said mortgage or mortgages shall thereupon be assigned by the Chinese company to the said banks as additional security for the said indebtedness.

In that way the Ming Sung Industrial Company of Canada Limited, a Canadian subsidiary of the Chinese company, whose head office and whose main operations were then inside communist China, became the owner of the ships; and in the process of becoming owner by this order in council was to receive Canadian registry for these seven ships. That, as we have been informed, has led to the operation of these ships from Hong Kong to Macao and Canton under the Canadian flag, with the ships carrying the Canadian flag painted on the side

[Mr. Drew.]

Under the Canada Shipping Act there are of course certain requirements as to the qualifications of the master of the ship, and as to the qualifications and identity of the crew, as well as the nature of the operations. Section 133A of the Canada Shipping Act does include a provision which makes it possible to vary the requirements of the Canada Shipping Act which would ordinarily apply.

There is no question whatever that these ships could not have operated under the Canadian flag and with Canadian registry unless they had had exemption from the Canada Shipping Act, because the operations of these ships and the crews of these ships did not conform with the Canada Shipping Act.

Section 133A was an amendment to the Canada Shipping Act which became law on June 30, 1948. It reads as follows:

(1) The minister may, if he thinks fit, and upon such conditions, if any, as he thinks proper to impose, exempt any ship from any requirement contained in sections 113, 114, 132 and 133, or dispense with the observance of any such requirement in the case of any ship, if he is satisfied that that requirement has been substantially complied with in the case of that ship, or that compliance with the requirement is unnecessary in the circumstances of the case, and that the action taken or provision made as respects the subject matter of the requirement in the case of the ship is as effective as actual compliance with the requirement.

(2) The minister shall annually lay before parliament a special report stating the cases in which he has exercised his power under this section during the preceding year, and the grounds upon which he has acted in each case.

That is the quotation that I am reading into the record. According to the statement of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier), which he made in this house on Friday, June 15, it now appears that in March of last year these seven ships were exempted by the Minister of Transport after authority was given to him by what he called a directive of the cabinet. On this point the Minister of Transport had this to say, as reported at pages 4188 and 4189 of Hansard:

Now then, the leader of the opposition says, "Produce the directive." I will have to inquire whether or not a written directive was given. I have no recollection of whether it was or not. I do know this, that repeatedly matters are discussed in cabinet and advice is sought from them—"Here is a matter in which I require advice." A discussion follows and advice is given.

There was no order in council, so far as I could ascertain in the few minutes that were at my disposal this afternoon—about twenty-five minutes. There was no order in council given. There was approval given. And so far as I can recollect—and I might be mistaken; I might have to take it back—but so far as I can recollect there was no written directive. Approval was sought and approval was granted.

That being so, there was an oral directive that exemption be granted. And acting under that advice, and with the concurrence of my colleagues in the cabinet, I issued the exemption under 133A.

I shall not comment further at the moment in regard to the most interesting fact that so important a directive was made orally and that we therefore have on the record, so far as is now available to us at any rate and subject to any subsequent correction offered by the Minister of Transport, this important exemption without any written evidence of the circumstances under which it was made and the reasons why such an exemption should be given.

The Minister of Transport says that the last paragraph of the section I have just read means that he can table in parliament at any time during this present year a report as to the exemptions made. The minister indicated that he had not tabled any report on this exemption and he indicated also that there was nothing unusual in that because he would have the balance of the year in which to table such a report. However, we all know that as a matter of administrative procedure things of this kind are checked carefully by competent departmental officials and it does seem surprising, to say the least, that we should be near the end of this session without any statement which would explain so important and so unusual an exemption as this particular exemption. We had every reason to believe that this session would be a full, regular session when it began.

When I say "so unusual" I do so having regard to the nature of the exemptions that are usually made. There is a most interesting fact in connection with this. A report of the exemptions was tabled by the minister during the present session. Sessional paper 124A-2, tabled Thursday, February 1, 1951, is headed as follows: "Report of exemptions authorized by the Minister of Transport under section 133A, Canada Shipping Act, 1934, as amended". That gives a list of the exemptions approved by the minister under section 133A of the Canada Shipping Act, which I have just referred to and read. In order to indicate the nature of the exemptions that were approved under this section I should like to read the first one for January, for February, for March and for April, which are as follows:

Date	Name of Ship	Relaxation	Reason
January 13, 1950	Gulfport	Ship permitted to clear for voyage with 2nd mate holding inferior certificate.	Voyage just outside H.T. limits for which properly certificated 2nd mate not available.
February 27, 1950	General Burstall	Ship permitted to clear with master holding inferior certificate.	To avoid interruption of Newfoundland coasting vessels—pending obtaining of certificates.
March 14, 1950	Theron	Ship permitted to clear with uncertificated master.	No master available with required certificate and experience.
April 25, 1950	Mont Royal	Ship permitted to clear with master holding inferior certificate.	No master available with required certificate and experience.

So it goes right through the whole year. I point out that this is not a report just for the first few months; it is a report which starts in January and ends in December. The interesting thing is that nowhere in this report is to be found this particular relaxation or any reference to the exemption made under section 133A of the Canada Shipping Act.

I think hon. members of this house might well ask why it was that a report tabled in accordance with section 133A and covering the whole year from January to December should include all these other exemptions and make no reference to this particular exemption which had such special and important consequences.

There is also the fact that this is an exemption of a very different nature. This exemption has much wider consequences than those relating simply to the qualifications of masters, mates or others called upon to work on these ships. We have been told also that there are export permit regulations involved in this matter, and that such regulations relate to the type of export which may be made to certain countries.

Ming Sung Industrial Company

On page 16 of the published copy of the export permit regulations issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce appears a list which indicates that Hong Kong and Macao are both included in the areas under control. Apparently Macao is still on the blacklist. We are told that some measure of protection is assured that there will not be an improper carrying on of trade from Hong Kong because an export certificate must be granted by the authorities in Hong Kong which we are to assume would accord with the general agreements which have been entered into; but it must be remembered that the British authorities in Hong Kong are concerned primarily with British trade and the observance of British law and are certainly not concerned primarily with Canadian trade and the enforcement of Canadian law.

In so far as we might look to the British government for assurance that they are satisfied with the trade, perhaps it might be a matter of interest that only today an Associated Press dispatch from London refers to an announcement made in the British House of Commons relating to a Hong Kong dispatch reading as follows:

> Britain announced today she is taking steps to block all shipments of strategic goods to red China through the crown colony of Hong Kong. Sir Hartley Shawcross, president of the board of trade, said all exports from the United Kingdom to Hong Kong and China will go under licensing control next Tuesday. No licences will be granted for goods which in the present circumstances could be of strategic and military importance. Shawcross made the announcement in the House of Commons. Britain previously banned the export of rubber to communist China.

The very fact that this statement was made in the House of Commons in London today indicates that the British government itself is not satisfied with the measure of control on shipping in and out of Hong Kong. In any event that does not answer the question with respect to Macao. Macao, which is a Portuguese possession, does not offer any security similar to that which may be offered by Hong Kong, whether or not we are entirely satisfied with that measure of protection. In these discussions it seems to me that what should be borne in mind is that it should not be necessary for us to wait to have it proved to us that contraband or war materiel, whether it be arms or simply supplies that will assist communist China, is going to a nation which at the present time is sending armed men to fight against young Canadians in Korea. Whether or not it can be proved that that is so, if the possibility is there we should stop it, and we should stop it without delay. It can be stopped by the simple process of withdrawing the exemption which has been accorded to these ships operated by a company masquerading under a Canadian charter.

When this subject was discussed in the house on Thursday last, in response to a statement by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes), who introduced this subject as the result of a message he had received from Hong Kong, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) said, as reported at page 4124 of Hansard:

> The ships were sold in the ordinary way through a commercial transaction, and the ships passed to the flag of China, subject to a mortgage held by the Canadian shipyard and deposited with the bank that lent the money.

The minister went on to say that all went well until the Chiang Kai-shek government fell, when the banks began to worry. He said that happily the loans were not in default but he added: "The government is not happy about it." The Minister of Trade and Commerce said that the ships were sold in the ordinary way through a commercial transaction. This does not seem to be an ordinary transaction. In the ordinary course of events someone who buys something pays for it or at least pays something down. Most of us would like to find some device by which it would be possible to buy the things that we require without paying anything down.

Mr. Howe: May I call my hon. friend's attention to the fact that the Chinese government paid 15 per cent of the cost of the ships in United States dollars.

Mr. Drew: That is—

Mr. Howe: The Ming Sung company paid 15 per cent of the cost of the ships to the shipyard, payment being made in United States dollars.

Mr. Drew: Was that paid by the Ming Sung company or the Chinese government?

Mr. Howe: The Ming Sung company.

Mr. Drew: I understood from the record that is was the Chinese government.

Mr. Howe: It was the Ming Sung company that paid the cash.

Mr. Drew: Then according to the minister 15 per cent was paid by the Ming Sung company at a time when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) is insisting on our people paying a much larger sum—

Mr. Abbott: This was not at that time.

Mr. Drew: I recognize that, nor were these Canadian purchasers.

Mr. Abbott: We also sold to France and some other countries.

Mr. Drew: At any rate the Canadian government guaranteed this loan and the banks, acting in their ordinary capacity as banks, simply carried out a regular transaction with a government guarantee. The banks advanced the money required to complete this purchase. Nine of these ships were delivered. They were not all of the same type. Some of them were specially made Yangtze river boats which are specially designed to operate in the shallower waters of the Yangtze river. The others were regular cargo vessels, and of course these cargo vessels would seek to do business in other waters. Apparently the Yangtze boats are able to operate to Hong Kong, or so it would appear because in the publication issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce known as "Foreign Trade", under date of June 16, 1951, there is this news report:

Hong Kong-Canton passenger service resumed.

Hong Kong, June 1, 1951.—(FTS)—On May 21, the S.S. Chien Men, a Canadian built river vessel belonging to the Ming Sung Industrial Company, departed on the first trip signalling the resumption of regular passenger service between Hong Kong and Canton. Although the Ming Sung vessels have been running a weekly service to Canton via Macao, and ferrying Malayan-Chinese repatriates to the mainland, for several months, this sailing of the Chien Men marked the first resumption of direct scheduled Hong Kong-Canton service since the latter port was occupied by the Chinese communists almost two years ago. The new service will operate three times a week, leaving Hong Kong every Monday, Wednesday and Friday.

That raises two points. One is the arrangements under which the Chien Men, under Canadian registry, is able to operate satisfactorily into a communist controlled port. The other is what is meant by the reference to the repatriation of Malayan-Chinese to the mainland. So far as I know, the only mainland to which these repatriates could be delivered is the mainland of communist China. I think the house should be informed whether this is taking place under some agreement with the international Red Cross, whether it is the repatriation of wounded prisoners of war, or whether this is a restoration to Chinese soil of those who were engaged in any activity which left them outside their home lands. Ordinarily it is essential that there be very exact information as to the reason for affording safe conduct to people back to a soil from which armed men come to engage in battling those who go from Canada to the battle line on which the people of both these nations are now engaged.

When the minister says that this was an ordinary transaction, he no doubt has reference to its being an ordinary transaction of the nature that is carried out when the government has full and arbitrary powers which are exercised without the ordinary supervision of parliament. He also doubtless refers to the sort of things that could be done under emergency legislation, because these contracts were carried out under the special authority given the government at that time.

This contract was carried out by highly reputable companies; but one company did raise a special problem. That was George T. Davie and Sons Limited of Levis, Quebec, which had been operating for some time. Unfortunately the president, Mr. Davie, met his death in a tragic automobile accident. It then became necessary for the government to intervene, and the Canadian Commercial Corporation had some responsibilities in that regard. In that connection I might say this company was shown to have been incorporated on November 26, 1941, with an authorized capital of 2,500 shares. The president was Andre Delagrave of Quebec city; the secretary was Maurice Paquet of Lauzon; a director was Brenda Delagrave of Quebec city, and the solicitors were St. Laurent, Gagne and Taschereau of Quebec city. This company continued to operate and was the subject of the special arrangements, which have not yet been fully disclosed, through the agency of the Canadian Commercial Corporation. As a result of the combined activities that were carried out, the contracts were fulfilled.

The next important stage in these proceedings after these ships were delivered follows as a result of the occupation of the Chinese mainland by the communist government which is now in power. As a result of that an application was made for the incorporation of the Ming Sung Industrial Company of Canada Limited, which company was incorporated on March 13, 1950. I have not the permanent board of directors, but the provisional board of directors are shown in the record; and the solicitors filing the application were Duquet and MacKay of Montreal. That company was organized to take over the ownership of these ships now operating in the China sea, from Hong Kong to Macao to Canton, in the circumstances indicated.

An interesting point is that the head office of the company is shown as Charlottetown. However, inquiry by telephone in Charlottetown produced the report that the telephone company has not heard of this company, which has no telephone number there. What operations are being carried on in Canada by the Ming Sung Industrial Company of Canada

Limited of course are not yet disclosed, other than the operation of these ships in that area. Another interesting point is that when an inquiry was made as to the activities of the Ming Sung Industrial Company of Canada Limited, apparently it was necessary to direct that inquiry to Hong Kong. While this is a Canadian company, evidently that was the place where the information could be obtained. And the information obtained there, such as it was, came from another subsidiary, the Ming Sung Industrial Company of Hong Kong Limited. So we see this combined picture of the company operating in communist China: the Ming Sung Industrial Company of Hong Kong Limited and the Ming Sung Industrial Company of Canada Limited, both taking the best possible advantage of the best of all possible worlds. Undoubtedly this is a very satisfactory transaction from the point of view of the company operating in the communist area and the company operating in Hong Kong and the company which has the advantage of a Canadian flag and exemption from the ordinary provisions of Canadian law.

Then when we come to the directorate of the Ming Sung Industrial Company of Canada Limited, these are the officers, though I certainly do not guarantee the pronunciation: Directors, Tso-Fu Lu, Hong Kong; Tomas S. J. Wang, Montreal; Chen-Chi Yang, Hong Kong; Shong-Sung Tong, Hong Kong; Y. C. James Yen, New York; R. G. Peers, Montreal, vice-president; R. D. MacKay, Montreal, secretary-treasurer. This is the company which now operates the service that has been described.

Undoubtedly it would be a matter of interest to learn whether the statements contained in the message received by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) had yet been fully checked. I submit that the only statements contained in the letter which came from Hong Kong and which has been placed before this house which have not been fully proved are, first, the statement that there is a Russian captain in charge of one ship and, second, that munitions of war are being carried. It has been agreed by the government that this change of registry did take place last spring. The government have stated that they are aware trade is going on with Macao; and it is very interesting that the trade with Macao apparently began just after the Korean hostilities opened. At that time, of course, there would be obvious reasons which need not be explored, since they are self-explanatory, why certain facilities would be afforded at Macao which might not be available at Hong Kong, no matter how wide open the provisions were there at that time, and the provisions were sufficiently wide open to call for criticism in the British House of Commons. That criticism has continued and has led to the announcement in London today by Sir Hartley Shawcross to which I have just referred. The government was fully informed in regard to the details of this transaction and in regard to the change of registry. There is an order in council dated Tuesday, May 16, 1950, which fully sets out the original arrangements for the construction of the ships, the advance of the money by the banks, the terms under which repayment was to be guaranteed, and also the setting up of the Ming Sung Industrial Company of Canada Limited. So the setting up of this Canadian subsidiary of the company which operates in communist China was not merely an ordinary commercial operation; it was fully approved and recognized by the government in that order in council. I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that instead of reading this order in council to the house in full it be placed on Hansard associated with today's recorded debate. Otherwise I shall be called upon to read it in full, since it sets forth the full details of this transaction.

Mr. St. Laurent: It was tabled at the time.

Mr. Drew: I realize it was tabled, but there is a vast difference between tabling it and having it on the record in the context so that those who are seeking to follow the context may know what is in it. I am not questioning the propriety or the impropriety of tabling it. That act makes the information available, but it does not carry the information in a way that entry on Hansard does. If it is agreeable, I shall put it on Hansard.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Drew: The text of the order in council follows:

P.C. 2453

AT THE GOVERNMENT HOUSE AT OTTAWA

TUESDAY, the 16th day of May, 1950

Present:

His Excellency

The Governor General in Council:

Whereas order in council P.C. 4690 of 12th November, 1946, made under the authority of section 22A of part II of the Export Credits Insurance Act, authorized the Minister of Finance on behalf of the government of Canada to give the guarantee requested by the government of the republic of China, as therein set out, of (a) the guarantee of the government of the republic of China of the payment by Ming Sung Industrial Co. Ltd. (hereinafter called "the Chinese company") of the cost of Canadian produced goods to be purchased by the Chinese company from exporters and the cost of Canadian services to be supplied to it to a maximum amount of $12,750,000 in lawful money of Canada to be advanced by Imperial Bank of Canada, the Bank of Toronto, and the Dominion Bank pursuant and subject to an agreement dated 30th day of October, 1946, between the Chinese company and the said banks, and (b) the securities given by the Chinese company for repayment of the said amounts so to be advanced pursuant to said agreement;

And whereas pursuant to the said order in council the Minister of Finance did duly execute on behalf of His Majesty a guarantee in writing dated the 13th day of November, 1946 in the form so requested and authorized, a true copy of which is hereto annexed as schedule "A";

And whereas pursuant to and in accordance with the terms of the said agreement dated the 30th day of October, 1946, the said banks did each advance to the Chinese company the sum of $4,250,000, the said advances together totalling $12,750,000, the amount so guaranteed pursuant to the said order in council, which advances are repayable in accordance with said agreement in ten equal instalments on the 30th day of June in each of the years 1951 to 1961 inclusive with interest thereon at the rate of three per cent per annum payable on the last days of March, June, September and December in each year, which interest has been paid by the Chinese company up to and including the 31st day of March 1950;

And whereas the said agreement of 30th October 1946 contained a provision that in respect of the said advances and as a condition thereof and as additional security therefor, the Minister of Finance might require that the Chinese company execute and deliver to the said banks forms of assignment and hypothecation to be prescribed by the said minister of all the Chinese company's right, title and interest in or to any related contract specified by the said minister;

And whereas in pursuance of such requirement by the Minister of Finance and in the form prescribed by him, the Chinese company did by three instruments, duly executed and delivered by it and each dated the 5th day of May 1947, hereinafter called "the assignments", assign, hypothecate and pledge to the said banks as additional security for their said advances all right, title and interest of the Chinese company in or to certain contracts specified by the Minister of Finance between the Chinese company and Canadian contractors, namely, Geo. T. Davie & Sons Ltd. and St. Lawrence Metal and Marine Works Inc., for the construction and equipment of nine ships or vessels, and the said ships or vessels and all equipment, stores, material, parts, tools and furnishings in connection therewith;

And whereas the Minister of Finance reports that it is expedient in the interests of the government of Canada as guarantor under its guarantee aforesaid that the Chinese company and the said banks should enter into a supplementary agreement with reference to the said ships and vessels in the form hereto annexed as schedule "B", which has been executed as of the 10th day of March 1950 by the Chinese company and the said banks but has not been delivered and is held in escrow pending approval thereof by the governor in council; and

That since the date of the execution of the said supplementary agreement, the Chinese company has proposed that it will sell and transfer to Ming Sung Industrial Company of Canada Limited, a company incorporated under the Companies Act (Canada), hereinafter called "the Canadian company", seven of the said ships or vessels (now said to be in or near Hong Kong) and that they shall then be transferred to Canadian registry under the Canada Shipping Act and that the Canadian company shall execute and deliver a mortgage or mortgages thereof in form registrable in Canada in favour of the Chinese company for the amount of the purchase price, namely, $12,750,000 payable as to principal and interest thereon at the same times, in the same instalments and at the same rate of interest as the Chinese company's indebtedness to the said banks is payable as aforesaid, and that said mortgage or mortgages shall thereupon be assigned by the Chinese company to the said banks as additional security for the said indebtedness;

Therefore, His Excellency the Governor General in council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Finance, is pleased to order and doth hereby order as follows:

1. The said supplementary agreement dated as of the 10th day of March 1950 between the said banks and the Chinese company in the form hereto annexed as schedule "B" is hereby approved and the execution and delivery thereof by Imperial Bank of Canada, the Bank of Toronto and the Dominion Bank is hereby authorized and requested without prejudice to, or in any way affecting, the rights of the said banks or any of them under the guarantee of the government of Canada dated the 13th day of November 1946, schedule "A" hereto.

2. The said banks are further authorized upon the request in writing of the Minister of Finance to take from the Chinese company assignments of mortgages made or given to it by the Canadian company upon any of the said ships and to release or discharge any mortgage or mortgages so assigned upon the same terms and conditions as are set out in paragraph 3 of the said supplementary agreement, schedule "B" hereto, with respect to mortgages to be executed by the Chinese company in favour of the said banks.

3. Nothing done or purported to be done by the said banks or any of them in pursuance of the said supplementary agreement, schedule "B" hereto, or of this order, including, without limiting the generality of the foregoing, the taking, releasing or discharging of any mortgage or mortgages of any ships or vessels referred to in the said supplementary agreement, whether such mortgage or mortgages is or are made and given by the Chinese company to the banks or their nominee or is or are made and given by the Canadian company to the Chinese company and thereafter assigned to the banks or their nominee, shall prejudice or in any way affect the rights of the said banks or any of them under the said guarantee of the government of Canada.

4. In so far as the said guarantee of the government of Canada is concerned, the said banks or any of them shall be under no obligation to take any steps or proceedings to perfect, enforce, or realize upon the security of, any such mortgage or mortgages given or assigned to them or their nominee as aforesaid. If the said banks or any of them at the request of the Minister of Finance shall take any such steps or proceedings, the said minister is hereby authorized to agree to indemnify the said banks or any of them against all loss, costs, damages and expenses sustained or incurred by them or any of them in connection therewith.

A. M. HILL
Assistant Clerk of the Privy Council

The text of this order in council indicates that the government contemplated the transfer of these ships to the Ming Sung Industrial Company. I shall read a short extract from part of it to indicate the knowledge of the government at that time. It reads:

since the date of the execution of the said supplementary agreement, the Chinese company has proposed that it will sell and transfer to Ming Sung

Ming Sung Industrial Company

Industrial Company of Canada Limited, a company incorporated under the Companies Act (Canada), hereinafter called "the Canadian company," seven of the said ships or vessels (now said to be in or near Hong Kong) and that they shall then be transferred to Canadian registry under the Canada Shipping Act and that the Canadian company shall execute and deliver a mortgage or mortgages thereof in form registerable in Canada in favour of the Chinese company for the amount of the purchase price, namely, $12,750,000 . . .

That is all I intend to quote at that point. It will be seen that by this order in council the government not only indicated its acceptance of the Ming Sung Industrial Company of Canada Limited as the company to which these ships were to be transferred by a Chinese company operating in communist China, but in that very order in council it also provided for the registration of these ships under Canadian registry.

We then have this situation confronting us. The ships were sold. They were operated by the Ming Sung Industrial Company Limited, with head offices in communist China. It obviously became impractical for that company to operate these ships in waters where such naval vessels as were posted by the government of Chiang Kai-shek were operating, and whatever the purpose was, protection to operate in that area was accorded these ships by this transfer to Canadian registry and the transfer to a Canadian company with head offices in Charlottetown. These ships are not operating under Canadian masters, nor are they operating under masters who are British subjects. They are operating with Chinese crews, and they are operating into a communist controlled port. They are operating out of Hong Kong into Macao. The invitation of the Ming Sung Industrial Company of Hong Kong to examine the manifestos of these ships is meaningless as any evidence of security, because those ships can go to Macao, unload everything they have and then take on board a load of contraband which could be delivered to communist China.

I urge, Mr. Speaker, that when these facts are presented it shall not be suggested there is any implication that this government was consciously aiding an enemy in the receipt of supplies. On the other hand, we must examine the facts as they are. I submit that the unchallenged facts, completely ignoring the question as to whether there is a Russian captain—I must say that I do not know that a Chinese communist is any better than a Russian communist—the fact remains that the evidence is clear, with what we already know, that these ships have been accorded special privileges which would make it possible for them to carry materials that would assist the enemy, at a time when that enemy is sending its troops to fight our troops in Korea. I am not splitting words. I say "the enemy". The Chinese who are firing rifles and artillery weapons and manning the aircraft, if they are, which are attacking our men in Korea today, are Chinese sent by the Chinese government. We must act with full recognition of the reality of that grim truth.

Recognizing that truth, and with the sordid history of trading with the enemy under disguises of various kinds in the past, I suggest that this house would simply be carrying out the obvious course dictated by common sense and respect for the dignity of our flag if the special exemption accorded by this government to the Ming Sung Company and those ships were immediately withdrawn. For the reasons I have stated, and so that the house may be in a position to indicate its views simply related to that one act, which would be fully effective, I am presenting a resolution calling for the withdrawal of that exemption. In case anyone may say: But that deals only with the exemptions, may I point out that immediately the exemption is withdrawn these ships cannot operate any longer under the Canadian flag. The resolution is therefore drawn with a recognition of that fact.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes):

That all the words after "that" to the end of the question be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

this house is of the opinion that the exemption granted under section 133A of the Canada Shipping Act by the Minister of Transport on May 12, 1950, to the seven ships or vessels owned by the Ming Sung Industrial Company of Canada Limited and registered under the Canada Shipping Act should be immediately withdrawn.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I believe that this is at least the fourth occasion, Mr. Speaker, when this matter of the operation of these ships built in Canada, and still of Canadian registry but now operating out of Hong Kong, has been discussed. I quite appreciate the interest hon. members have in the assertions that were contained in a circular letter addressed by a gentleman from Hong Kong on June 4 to certain members of this house, and to certain newspapers. We had heard from our trade commissioner that this letter was coming forward, and before the matter came up here I can give the house the assurance that I was as much concerned as any hon. member of this house has been since the matter was raised here.

I do not think it would be boasting for me to assert that I would deprecate as much as any person in this house anything that could render more difficult the task of those brave young Canadians who are supporting the cause of the United Nations in Korea at this time, and who are having such distinguished, if you will, but dangerous military operations to conduct against personnel, including large numbers of Chinese soldiers, who are there, without its being possible to cast the least doubt upon it, with the authority of the present government of the mainland of China. Because this charge was a serious matter and was so regarded, it was gone into extremely carefully. I should now like to make a rather full statement of the manner in which the whole incident has arisen.

It will be remembered—and I do not think I will be contradicting any of the facts asserted by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), although I think they will perhaps appear in a somewhat different light when the circumstances are taken into account—it will be remembered that these ships were a part of a certain number of ships that were being built here in Canada for foreign purchasers immediately after the cessation of hostilities. It will also be remembered that there was great anxiety in many quarters in Canada about the possibility of serious unemployment developing here after the cessation of the activities that had been so magnificent, so outstanding, during the war production period. At that time parliament, on the recommendation of the government of which I was a member, authorized loans to foreign governments for the purpose of enabling them to place contracts with Canadian firms. Some of those contracts were placed with firms in Canada, one of the firms being this firm at Lauzon, George T. Davie & Sons, Ltd., to which the hon. member referred as having at the time as its president one Andre Delagrave. The hon. member perhaps did not know that Andre Delagrave was the brother-in-law of the late Mr. Davie who had died in this automobile accident, and that he took that position in order to protect the interests of the Davie family. The lady mentioned—I am not quite sure of the name but I think it was Brenda Delagrave—

Mr. Drew: I must confess that I have sent my papers up to Hansard.

Mr. St. Laurent: In any event, the lady mentioned was the member of the Davie family that Mr. Delagrave had married and whose interests he was seeking to protect. That is, of course, neither here nor there. It is just a fact that explains how it was that George T. Davie & Sons, Limited, had as its president Andre Delagrave.

Ming Sung Industrial Company

These ships were built, and I understand that a good job of work was done and that they were put out in an extremely workmanlike manner for the special conditions of the trade in which they were to engage. At that time the arrangement that was made was that fifteen per cent would be provided in United States dollars—and United States dollars were not plentiful anywhere—by the purchaser who would borrow the rest from Canadian banks and would take an export credit insurance policy under the set-up that was established by this parliament for the purpose of enabling foreign buyers to provide work in Canadian plants. Then there was the guarantee of the government of China, but that was not regarded by our banks as sufficient, any more than was the guarantee of the government of France or the government of several other countries whose citizens were placing orders in this country. It was for that purpose, and because of that necessity, that parliament set up this export credit insurance scheme.

The ships were later transferred by this Ming Sung company, a Chinese company, to a company established in Canada which, as the hon. gentleman has said, had its head office in Charlottetown. Anyone who has had any experience over the last twenty years in the practice of law and in having to advise foreigners who were setting up companies in Canada knows why Charlottetown was frequently selected as the place to have the head office of a company. Before I came here I advised on the incorporation of a great many companies that had their head offices in Charlottetown, and I think there were offices there which were simultaneously the head offices of tens of different companies. That feature presented nothing surprising to anyone who had been familiar with the practice which was due to the fact that provincial corporation taxes were less onerous there than they were in some other jurisdictions.

The ships were transferred from the Chinese company to this company incorporated in Canada but having Chinese nationals as a majority of its directors. But that again was nothing surprising. All hon. members of this house who are lawyers know that it quite frequently happens that there are set up for clients residing abroad Canadian companies which have one, two or three Canadian directors but whose real directors, those who control the policy, are non-residents of Canada. The ships were transferred from the Chinese company to this Canadian company, and a mortgage on the ships was given to the Chinese company and transferred by the Chinese company to the banks as additional security. This Ming Sung company is a trading company that, from the information we had been able to secure, has been in existence for a long time and has a variety of trading interests in Asia. According to the information we got, it is a company that has always lived up to its contractual obligations and has always taken care of its debts as they mature. As a matter of fact, that is what has been done up to the present time with regard to the construction costs of all these ships.

We felt that it was desirable to make as secure as could reasonably be done the claim of the Canadian banks against the owners of the ships. In order to enable that to be done these ships were exempted from certain provisions of the Canada Shipping Act. The hon. gentleman inquires how it happens that in the list of exemptions that was tabled on the 1st of February this special one was not indicated. Well, that list is a tabulation made by the director of nautical services from the reports, or from the files, that come from various inspection districts, of which there are seven or eight throughout Canada. There is one in Vancouver, one in Quebec, one in Saint John and there are several of these steamship inspection offices to whom the owners of a ship which is not able to comply with all the requirements of the act make application for an exemption. A great many of these exemptions are granted throughout the year.

The director of the nautical services made up from his files a list of the exemptions that had been granted, and that is the list which was tabled in this house as sessional paper 124A-2 on February 1, 1951. How does it happen that he did not put this other one in? He did not put the other one in because it did not come through the ordinary channel of the district inspectors' offices.

This is something out of the ordinary. We have not a steamship inspector in Hong Kong, and there are not very many Canadian ships that are operating in foreign waters. There were not a very large number of ships built in Canada for the foreign trade.

This is a matter which had been handled here in Ottawa. I inquired, as the leader of the opposition is inquiring, why was this not in the list. It was not in the list because there was no file in that collection of files dealing with it, and as a matter of fact it is not required to be tabled until the end of this year. But it is true to state that it was not tabled at the very beginning of this session. The information about it is available and will be tabled almost at once.

Here I simply wish to make the statement that I was just as much concerned as anyone can be, and that I am satisfied so far that what has been done was done properly, though I would be happier if this exemption had been included in the ordinary list. There was no desire to withhold anything. There had been another exemption under another section of the Canada Shipping Act, section 406, I think, which is covered by an order in council passed on May 5.

These ships—we are talking about five now—were exempted, all seven of them, from the requirements of carrying radio operators. That was done by the order in council which names the ships, and which was tabled—it was passed on May 5, and was included in the monthly summary of orders in council tabled on June 14. In any event, it was disclosed at once because it was felt that it was the proper thing to do. Now, it may be that it will turn out it was not the wise thing to do, but at the time everyone would have considered that it was the proper thing to do. It was a method that was being taken to protect, in so far as we felt it reasonable to protect, the claims of the banks for the amounts they advanced, and to protect the Canadian taxpayer against the effect of the guarantee which had been issued under this insurance scheme of export credits.

Some days before the matter was raised in the house we received information from the trade commissioner that this circular letter, or something of that kind, was going forward, and was going to the newspapers. The trade commissioner said that he was going to check because the information was from a biased source, namely the China Coast Navigating and Engineer Officers' Guild, which was not too happy over the fact that any British ship was being allowed to operate without having its personnel of officers and engineers British subjects. It was a trade situation that was displeasing to the guild of China coast navigating and engineer officers, because it allowed Chinese subjects to take jobs which otherwise would have been exclusively reserved to British subjects; the commissioner said he was going to check the assertions that were made. When the matter was first raised in the house the explanation of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) was that he was waiting for further information in that regard.

Well, now, the information we have up to the present time—we have not yet received positive information about what goes out of Macao, which is a Portuguese port, but the information we have with respect to Hong Kong is that nothing goes out of there that is on the list of embargoed commodities of the United Kingdom and its crown colonies.

There are things which are on our embargo list, which we do not allow to be exported from Canada to China, but we felt that if ships were operating on the high seas it would not be proper for us to determine what should be the policy of the port of a friendly nation, an allied nation, a commonwealth nation, with respect to commodities that it would allow to go to communist Chinese territory.

We feel that the government of the United Kingdom, the people of the United Kingdom, would be just as much concerned if there were materials under their control going to China that could be of any help to the Chinese against British soldiers who are fighting side by side with our sons in Korea. We think that we are not the only holy people in the world, and that there are others who have the same reaction to humanitarian and patriotic consideration that we have, and that it is proper for us to say what Canadian commodities will not be exported out of Canada to China, but that it is proper for the government of Hong Kong, the government of the United Kingdom in its crown colony of Hong Kong, to say what it considers can be exported out of Hong Kong toward China, without endangering the safety of the soldiers from the United Kingdom who are fighting alongside men from others of the United Nations in Korea.

With respect to Macao, Macao is a Portuguese port. Portugal is one of our allies in the North Atlantic treaty arrangement. I would imagine that though Portugal is not a member of the United Nations, because by the veto of the Soviet representative it has been kept out, it would be quite as much concerned as are we about support or comfort given to this aggression in Korea, because the North Atlantic treaty was formed for the very purpose of protecting North Atlantic countries against aggression. We think that by discouraging this aggression in Korea we are likely to be able to prevent aggression elsewhere. Because that is our position we are risking a great many Canadian lives and spending a great many millions of Canadian dollars.

Until we have evidence to the contrary, we think it is fair to assume that the Portuguese authorities at Macao would no more than the British authorities at Hong Kong willingly allow contraband to be carried by these ships into Chinese territory.

Mr. Drew: I did not want to interrupt the Prime Minister, but just so that he may help us in understanding this will he state why, if there is such confidence in what is being done at Macao, Macao is still on our own blacklist according to our records?

Mr. St. Laurent: I would not call a blacklist a list of countries for which export permits have to be obtained. I should not like it to go from this house that the attitude of the Canadian parliament is that our Portuguese allies under the North Atlantic treaty are on our blacklist. I do not think that that would be helpful.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, just a moment; Macao is quite different from Portugal proper. Macao is included in the list of these areas to which I have just referred, not Portugal or Portuguese possessions. It is the specific port of Macao that is mentioned, for reasons which I think the Prime Minister understands.

Mr. St. Laurent: The reason for this list is that we consider it preferable that no strategic materials get into that area. That is our view. We think that no strategic materials from Canada should get into that area. It may very well be that there would be no legitimate trade in them, but there is always the possibility of contraband. Though we on this side of the house do not agree with certain generals of our great allies south of the border that there should be a blockade of China, we do feel that all reasonable precautions should be taken to keep out of that area at this time such strategic materials as may be useful elsewhere. It is for that reason that exports to certain Asiatic countries cannot be made without permits.

The payments to the banks on these Chinese ships have always been regularly made, but that would not be a weighty consideration if in our opinion there were any serious grounds for thinking that the continuation of what is being done would in any way endanger any of our Canadian young men on the peninsula of Korea. That is being checked just as carefully as possible.

The hon. gentleman says, "You can tie up these ships by withdrawing the exemptions which you have granted." Probably that could be done. I imagine that the manner in which the Ming Sung Company has always conducted its operations would make it comply with any regulation that was effective in Hong Kong. Without transferring the registry of these ships to some other country they certainly could not operate with Chinese officers if these exemptions were withdrawn. I do not think that that should be undertaken lightly. I do not think it would be fair to the Canadian taxpayer to put him in the position of having to make good this guarantee unless there is more to suggest the possibility of wrongdoing than this circular letter from a source which our trade commissioner describes as being biased. That does not mean it is dishonest, but one knows how easily rumours can get started and how easily they can be propagated.

I have not yet felt that our responsibility—I take it as seriously as any member in this house—to the men we are sending to Korea requires us to take that step without further evidence that there was more than a possibility of there being contraband carried to this area. The fact that we have certain commodities that we do not allow to go to China but which up to the present time have not been prohibited from shipment out of Hong Kong does not in my view justify us in withdrawing these exemptions which have been accorded. I think it would be an indirect attempt to say to the United Kingdom government that we think they have been or are being unwise in the kind of commodities that they allow to be loaded on ships trading out of that port.

All hon. members know that the British and the Americans, or some of the Americans, have not seen eye to eye as to the proper policy or the extent of applying restrictive policies to trade with China. Some people believe that there should be an armed blockade of China preventing all kinds of trade and traffic with that country. There are several hundred million Chinese in that territory, there are several hundred million in the other Asiatic countries, and I think it would be a sorry state for the western world if all those human beings were driven permanently into the communist camp. The policy that this government and our Department of External Affairs have been trying to follow is to bring about some kind of negotiated settlement of the Korean incident in the hope that it will not become necessary permanently to treat as belonging to the iron curtain part of the world those great Asiatic populations.

These are our views which are just as honestly entertained as are entertained the views of some of the citizens of our great American ally who think that there should be at once a complete naval blockade of China. I do not doubt the honesty of such views, though I do doubt their wisdom. In this regard, what has been done up to the present time by this government with respect to these ships is what I think any government from any party in this house would have done up to this time. Whether another government made up from another party in this house would at this time withdraw the exemptions that have been accorded I am unable to say. I do not think they would. From what we have been able to ascertain through these sources up to the present time I think it would be unwise to withdraw these exemptions and thus brand the owners of these ships as unreliable. If we branded them as unreliable and put them in the position where they cannot operate, it would be natural for them to say, "Well, you will just have to wait for your money". That again would not be enough to stop us from acting if there were any serious indication that harm to the cause of the United Nations and our men in Korea was being occasioned by the operations of these ships. But we must not lose our perspective. There is no doubt that Chinese troops are engaged in the operations in Korea, but there are between 400 million and 500 million people in China, and it is by tens of thousands that those who are engaged in warlike operations have up to the present time been counted. The rest of China is living; the rest of China is carrying on some part of its normal life; and I think there is justification for what has been up to the present time the view of the British government that it would be unwise to cut off trade in non-war commodities between Hong Kong and the mainland of China.

As to the ferrying operations to which the leader of the opposition referred, I am not in a position to give any information. Hon. members will realize that we do not attempt to put inspectors on these ships to see what they are doing. It is my understanding that Malaya is the place where Mr. Malcolm MacDonald is the governor. It may be that he would feel there are some Chinese Malayans or Malayan-Chinese whom he would like to see back on the mainland just as we would be quite happy to see anyone ferrying some who are here in Canada at the present time and to whom we would bid bon voyage if they were leaving to go back behind the iron curtain. That is one possibility. I do not know whether or not that is the real explanation, but I would not be surprised if the former high commissioner to Canada would perhaps feel that it would make his situation more comfortable if there were fewer of those who have any desire to go back to the mainland of China remaining under his government.

The hon. member referred to a press dispatch in which Sir Hartley Shawcross was said to have stated that the list of embargoed commodities out of Hong Kong to the mainland of China was going to be increased. We would welcome that. We have not the same opportunities for knowing the situation as have members of the United Kingdom government, but if they were to adopt the list of commodities that we have said will not be exported from Canada to China we would be inclined to feel that it was at least confirming the wisdom of our selection. On the whole I prefer to believe that it would not be wise for us to adopt, vis-à-vis our partners in the North Atlantic treaty alliance, a holier-than-thou attitude.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I wish to point out that no suggestion in my remarks was directed to criticism of the British authorities in Hong Kong.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Drew: Nor was anything that I said suggestive of a blockade, nor did anything that I said indicate that we were taking any action in relation to the Chinese government, no matter what we think of it. I would point out what I was proposing was that a very special exemption be withdrawn from a Canadian company. The government of China would have absolutely no right to complain if we issued such directions to any Canadian company we saw fit, and that is what I am suggesting.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, in rising to support the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) that this house is of the opinion that the exemption granted under section 133A of the Canada Shipping Act should be removed from the seven vessels owned by the Ming Sung Industrial Company, there are certain points that I should like to bring to the attention of the house which I think emphasize the importance of taking action now and not delaying until further reports may be gathered. I suggest there is sufficient evidence at the present time to justify withdrawing the exemption. I am not surprised that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) admitted concern over these very unfortunate circumstances that have arisen in connection with this trade. I am sure that we are all concerned about this matter because it may directly influence the course of the operations in which our troops are taking part in Korea at the present time.

Far from being any holier-than-thou attitude, the leader of the opposition was merely recommending taking reasonable precautions against the firm operating these vessels under the Canadian flag. The Prime Minister referred to the fact that this matter had been before the house on four occasions. The previous occasions were when the house was in committee of supply dealing with various estimates, and hon. members may not have had the opportunity then of expressing their opinions as to the correctness of the course recommended in the amendment. Considerable emphasis has been laid upon the fact that the letter I received from Hong Kong was sent to other people. The letter was addressed to me personally. I can hardly call it a circular letter. I did not know that anybody else had received it when I first raised the matter.

It was stated that those who had sent the letter were biased. They are vitally concerned with the matter being a guild or union of responsible ships' officers who have been employed in the navigating and engineering services of vessels plying in the China seas. I am prepared to accept their opinion just as readily as I will accept the opinion voiced by the Chinese officials of this Chinese company who, I must also point out, would be equally biased. This morning I rose before orders of the day were called to point out that I had received a cable from Hong Kong this morning in which confirmation was given of the statements that had been made in the letter. This certainly is not a circular letter; it is a cable addressed to me at the House of Commons, Ottawa:

Reference Canadian flagged vessels trading locally. Confirm strategic cargoes loaded Macao for Canton.

It is signed by the China coast guild. There is confirmation of the statements previously made in the circular letter of June 4. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) referred to the fact that the Ming Sung Industrial Company were always able to take care of their debts. Well, at the present moment they are engaged in a very lucrative trade. The fact that this trade is lucrative is borne out by figures in the last edition of Foreign Trade, published under the authority of the foreign trade service of the Department of Trade and Commerce, under date of June 16, 1951. These figures show the increase in trade between Hong Kong and various countries in the first quarter of this year over a similar period a year ago. At page 1066 under the caption "Hong Kong trade is largest with China" we find this statement:

Trading returns for the first quarter of 1951 reveal significant changes in the relative importance of Hong Kong's traditional partners, when compared with returns for the same period in 1950. The following table, in terms of millions of Hong Kong dollars, indicates alterations in the proportion of the colony's trade enjoyed by certain countries.

The table shows China and in brackets "including Macao"; and it is rather significant that Macao should be linked so definitely with China here. In the first quarter of 1951 the total trade with China is given as 1,028 million Hong Kong dollars, and the percentage of the total trade is 35·7. For the first quarter of 1950 the total trade with China including Macao was 512 million Hong Kong dollars, so in the last twelve months the trade has doubled. I am not going to quote figures for the other countries mentioned, but the final note of this paragraph is also rather interesting:

It is noticeable that trade with the United States, usually Hong Kong's second most important trading partner, has declined by 40 per cent. The drop is directly related to that country's embargo against China, and its rigid control over export shipments to Hong Kong.

When one considers that this Chinese company is carrying on a major share of the trade between Hong Kong, Macao, Canton and China, and that this trade has doubled in the past twelve months, it should be well able to take care of the interest on this debt, which was originally some $12 million.

It has been stated that this company has been trading in China for a long time. It has been pointed out that the headquarters of the company are listed as being at Chungking, China, with branches at a number of Chinese ports including Shanghai, Tsingtao, and so forth. Undoubtedly this company operates in accordance with the instructions given it by the Chinese government. It could never carry on its activities all through red China unless it adhered to those instructions; and I do not suppose there is the slightest doubt but that the Chinese government makes a very good thing out of the activities of this company. No doubt the ordinary taxes would be imposed; and I think it is a pretty well known fact that in addition the handouts given by trading companies to Chinese governments of the past have been on a pretty generous scale.

Another point of interest, which I think should emphasize the necessity of taking action now, is this transfer or repatriation of Chinese communists from other parts of Asia. It will be recalled that in the letter read to the house on June 15 by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, addressed to the Hong Kong representative of the government by Mr. C. C. Yang, a member of the Ming Sung Industrial Company, he gave the routes being followed by the various vessels:

Our vessels in trade: Hong Kong—Macao, passenger and cargo; Hong Kong—Macao—Canton, passenger and cargo; Hong Kong—Canton, passenger only; Hong Kong-Canton (nonscheduled service).

Overseas Chinese sent back to China from Malaya, Indonesia and sometimes cargo.

It is rather a coincidence that in the Associated Press dispatches coming from Singapore last Monday we are told:

Glittering promises and come-back-to-China groups are luring hundreds of wide-eyed Chinese students from Singapore to communist China.

The prospect of becoming leaders of the masses . . . is held out to the youngster. Police have located undercover rings specializing in this work . . . .

[Mr. Pearkes.]

The situation was dramatized by the pick-up in Hong Kong recently of six Chinese school girls from prominent families . . . .

Propaganda cells work in schools and social organizations that glorify red China, police said. At the same time, alluring letters from students already in China are bait for new converts.

So that when you read that in conjunction with the report from Foreign Trade read by the leader of the opposition, in which it mentioned that one of these vessels the Chien Men is carrying Malayan Chinese repatriates to the mainland of China, it is quite obvious the type of the repatriate who is being taken back. No one would be so naïve as to think that communist China would permit anything but communists to return to China. Canton has been in the hands of the Chinese government now for the past two years.

There is one other point which I wish to bring out, and that is in connection with the statement made by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) when he was giving the reasons for granting the exemption. On page 4172 of Hansard for June 15 this statement is made:

It was also stated that there were no British officers, mates or engineers available, and that the only officers, mates and engineers available were those of Chinese nationality.

This was referring to the time the exemption was given, which was in April of 1950. It is rather difficult to reconcile that statement with the statements which were being made in the spring of 1950 by the Minister of Transport, who was pointing out that it had become necessary to reduce the Canadian merchant marine. Many ships were being sold out of the Canadian flag, and a policy was being adopted of reducing the number of vessels we had to little more than a skeleton fleet. On page 2236 of Hansard for May 5, 1950, the Minister of Transport made the following statement in speaking on his estimates:

In passing, however, I might remind the house that Canadian costs of operation are about double British costs, and in order to maintain the Canadian shipping industry it was decided to permit owners to transfer to United Kingdom flag.

A little later he said:

At the time of such statement there were 174 Canadian owned ocean-going vessels. Two were sold since that date . . . transfers to United Kingdom flag have been approved in respect of 93 ships, and transfers in respect of 23 ships are still pending.

It will be recalled that the government policy announced about that time was that a subsidy would be given to maintain a fleet of Canadian-owned ships, I think it was about 40 vessels. This was a large reduction from the 200 odd merchant vessels we had during the war. In order to encourage merchant seamen to find other occupations, the Minister of Veterans Affairs at that time introduced a system of extending vocational training courses to members of the merchant marine. Surely that indicates that there was no dearth of Canadian seamen at the time this exemption was being granted. The minister has not told us what steps he took to find out whether or not there were Canadian or British officers, mates and engineers available. I wonder whether he relied entirely on the word which had been given, no doubt by the Ming Sung Company.

With these facts before us, the fact that even now there should be no shortage of Canadian seamen available and anxious to find employment, the fact that it has been proven beyond doubt that material which may easily be of strategical value to the enemy is passed by these ships into communist held ports, the fact that there is a movement of Chinese communists from other ports in Asia being transported by these vessels into communist China, who may be used as leaders in various walks of life and perhaps in the armed forces which are now in operation against our own men, I feel that there is no time to be lost. It would be an exceedingly wise precaution to withdraw this exemption from these vessels now. The Canadian banks and Canadians may suffer financially a little bit. It used to be considered that $12 million was a large sum, but I do not think that $12 million is so huge a sum that it could not be taken care of by the government if the government felt it was in any way obliged to refund that amount of money.

I repeat what I said the other day. I believe Canadians would rather lose that money than think that that money was derived by possibly helping the enemy. The evidence seems to me to be so clear that I repeat I think it would be a wise course to suspend the operations of these vessels by withdrawing the exemption which was granted. For these reasons, I am supporting the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): There was one feature of the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) this afternoon which caused me great concern, and that was the fact that he seemed to place so little importance on the manner in which Canada gave these ships the privilege of using her flag. The Canadian merchant marine has a proud record. We have a very good Canada Shipping Act, designed for supervising the operations of that merchant marine. Yet if actions of this kind are taken to any extent, that Canadian registry will be in danger of being classified in the same way as we now class Panamanian registry. The Prime Minister knows that many ships were placed under the flag of Panama under conditions which certainly did not lead to an increase in the respect for that flag.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has not dealt particularly with this section 133A of the Canada Shipping Act. If he will refer to it I am convinced that, being the great lawyer he is, he will realize that that section was never designed for a use such as that to which it has been put in this present case.

The section provides that the Minister of Transport may grant exemption from the provisions of four other sections of the Canada Shipping Act. One of those four sections contains the requirement that there must be a certified master and other deck officers; a second requires that there must be certified engineers; a third provides for the production of the master's certificate when he wants to get a clearance from the customs authorities in the various ports; and the fourth section has to do with clearance for a coastal trip. In respect of each one of those provisions it obviously was intended to provide for exempting a ship where no danger to that ship would follow. For example, the last half of this section 133A reads that the minister may grant these exemptions

> . . . if he is satisfied that that requirement has been substantially complied with in the case of that ship, or that compliance with the requirement is unnecessary in the circumstances of the case, and that the action taken or provision made as respects the subject matter of the requirement in the case of the ship is as effective as actual compliance with the requirement.

In other words, this section 133A is merely meant to provide that the minister may grant an exemption where, for example, the ship will be in no danger if an officer holding a certificate not up to the standard is in charge on that particular trip. That fact is confirmed by this list of exemptions which was tabled by the Minister of Transport early in the present session. Most of the exemptions dealing with officers of the ships provide for the carrying of a master with an inferior licence. There are a few which provide for the carrying of a master who has not a certificate, and I think there are two dealing with mates who have an inferior certificate. Then there are exemptions for engineers, chief engineers, second engineers and so on. That is the kind of exemption which was provided for by this section 133A.

There was never any intention that it should be used to enable Chinese ships or ships of any other nation to use the Canadian flag. I do not believe it was contemplated by a Canadian parliament that there would be action taken of this kind under which seven ships belonging to China have been allowed to use the Canadian flag. In effect, they have been given a wholesale exemption. The result of the exemption given is that Canada has said: "Here, you can use our flag; and as long as you pay back this money, we do not care what else happens." I can see that the reason for that action was to make the repayment of the money more certain. But it is breaking down the Canadian shipping laws and taking away the value of the Canadian flag on a merchant ship.

While this fact that the ships are trading with communist China is to me a serious matter—and I do not want to leave the impression that it is not—the other serious factor, and the one which appeals to me, is that we have allowed the Canadian flag to be used in this way.

I suggest to the Prime Minister that he could get over the difficulty by allowing this company to register its ships in Hong Kong. Let them go under the merchant shipping act. If that is done, there can be from Hong Kong a direct control over the ships, a much better control than we can exercise from Ottawa. If, as the Prime Minister says, the owners of these ships are reliable businessmen, surely that would not endanger the amount of money that the Canadian government has tied up in this deal. The business-like way to handle the situation now would certainly seem to be to get these ships transferred from the Canadian registry. They are not Canadian ships. There is no reason at all why they should be classed as Canadian ships. The only thing Canadian about them is that they were built here; and they were put under Canadian registry for a purpose which was never contemplated under the Canada Shipping Act.

I urge upon the Prime Minister that he give consideration to having the ships transferred to the registry in Hong Kong, and in that way seeing to it that they no longer use the Canadian flag. Even if they have not already got into trouble, even if they have not already done things which have hurt the reputation of this nation, they are apt to do something like that in the days that lie ahead. There is still war going on in Asia. The Chinese government is still fighting the United Nations' forces in Korea. Sooner or later the fact that these ships are carrying a Canadian flag may bring great discredit to our nation. I urge upon the Prime Minister that steps be taken to have the ships transferred from the Canadian registry.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to add just a word to what has been said. There were two things said by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) to which I wish to advert briefly. First of all, although the Prime Minister did not make a great point of it, he spoke of the money side; he spoke about the getting back of the money as being one of the reasons against taking the action suggested by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). On that matter I just wish to say this. At the present time we are presumably spending millions of dollars every month in Korea for the purpose of protecting the lives of our own men; and it seems to me that if there is any appreciable risk of any added danger, we should not take that risk.

The second thing, and the one that I wished to stress more particularly was this. The Prime Minister seemed to suggest or rather he in fact suggested—and with considerable seriousness—that to take the action proposed, which after all is merely to withdraw a privilege which has been given, might really permanently turn against us the minds of hundreds of millions of Chinese not only in China but throughout the world. If that were true, it would of course be a dreadful and alarming thing. But I suggest to the Prime Minister that actually infinitely more serious things than that are happening at the moment. As he has said, we are actually fighting the Chinese in Korea. We are killing them and, alas, they are killing us. Therefore the suggestion that this withdrawal of a privilege from half a dozen ships, which I suggest 99·9 per cent of the Chinese throughout the world will never hear of, might prejudice our relations with those people to an extent even comparable with the prejudice which comes from the fact that we are now fighting them, is one that I confess I find to be extremely unconvincing.

PRIVATE BILLS

THE SCRIPTURE GIFT MISSION (CANADA) INCORPORATED

The house in committee on Bill No. 267, to incorporate the Scripture Gift Mission (Canada) Incorporated—Mr. Fleming—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. Cruickshank: Mr. Chairman, I should like a little—

An hon. Member: A little light.

Mr. Cruickshank: I want to be very brief because I want these bills to go through. I should like a little information from the sponsor of the bill which he has assured me he has available. I presume that all these directors are residents of Canada.

Mr. Fleming: The residences of the incorporators are set out in section 1 of the bill. They are all residents of Canada with the exception of Mr. Henman and Mr. Johnson.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 and 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Objects.

Mr. Robinson: Subsection (b) of section 4 reads as follows:

> For the advancement of Christianity to publish and circulate the holy scriptures and portions thereof, and for that purpose to sell or make grants of copies thereof, or of portions thereof, or extracts therefrom, to missionaries and others, to facilitate their dissemination, and for the purposes aforesaid to solicit and receive subscriptions, donations and legacies from the public.

I am quite sure that the sponsor of the bill probably had no part in its drafting, but I am wondering whether the latter words of that subsection will be sufficient protection for the corporation if it should be granted incorporation. In legal terminology the word "legacies", in Ontario at least, has a rather confined meaning. It would seem to me that if the section is left as it is now there will be no possibility of this corporation accepting devises of real estate, for instance. Has the sponsor given any thought to that particular phase of the bill, and whether the wording should not be enlarged so as to enable the incorporators to accept devises of real estate and other things which to my mind would not be covered by the present wording of the bill? I thought that the bill might be allowed to stand while the sponsor considered the appropriate wording of an amendment which would allow this corporation to accept the widest number of gifts possible.

Mr. Fleming: I think if the hon. member will refer to section 9 of the bill he will see that that point is fully covered.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the section carry?

Mr. Robinson: No, it does not carry. Section 9 of the bill deals only with the power of the corporation to acquire, purchase and hold real estate. There is another section of the bill, if the sponsor has read it, which refers to devises. I should think it would be very appropriate that the sponsor should give some thought to amending subsection (b) of section 4, which may very well curtail the gifts that this estimable institution may obtain in the future.

Mr. Fleming: The applicants for incorporation are satisfied with the form of the bill. Section 9 makes it quite clear that the corporation has power to receive lands, real estate and interests in real estate by way of devise.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Robinson: No, I do not think it should carry yet. Before leaving subsection (b) of section 4, I might say that I hope the sponsor of the bill is right in his interpretation that the corporation will not be precluded in the future from accepting gifts such as I have mentioned. In subsection (d) of the same section one of the objects is stated to be to administer in Canada the property, business and other temporal affairs of the corporation. At the present time is there a corporation which has property, business or other affairs, and will such property be transferred after incorporation to the new company? If so, I should like to know what property and what business the incorporators have in Canada.

[Mr. Robinson.]

Mr. Fleming: There is no corporation of this name at present. There is an unincorporated society which has been carrying on this type of work in Canada for the last eighteen years, and which is a Canadian offshoot of the parent society in England. The unincorporated society now carrying on work in Canada has no property at the present time. It has an office in Toronto; but a gift of land is being made to the society, and that is one reason for the application for incorporation.

Mr. Robinson: Subclause (e) mentions that one of the objects is to establish, support and maintain a publishing house for the purpose of printing and disseminating gospel literature for the support of the doctrines and faith of the corporation. I would like to ask the sponsor whether a publishing house is in existence in Canada at present, and what literature is being disseminated.

Mr. Fleming: There is no publishing house as such at the present time. The society has quarters on Spadina avenue in Toronto consisting of small office space. The society is dedicated to the work of disseminating the scriptures, usually in the form of gospels and portions. Last year in Canada, for instance, 353,409 portions of the gospels and booklets and portions from the holy scriptures were distributed in fifty languages.

Mr. Stick: What section are we discussing?

The Deputy Chairman: We are now considering section 4.

Mr. Stick: Have we passed the first three sections?

The Deputy Chairman: Yes; they have been carried.

Mr. Stick: It seems to me we are discussing the bill all over the place and not sticking to the section.

Mr. Dickey: I wonder if the sponsor would tell us whether the intention is to actually set up a printing establishment where this printing will be done, or is it simply the intention to set up an organization to prepare material and have the printing done outside their own premises under contract, or something of the kind?

Mr. Fleming: I do not believe any decision has been reached on that matter yet. The plans of the incorporators probably have not extended that far up to the present. It would be a matter for decision by the board of the new corporation as plans advance.

Mr. Dickey: I take it they have no facilities of that kind at present?

Mr. Fleming: No.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Power to make by-laws.

Mr. Robinson: Has the sponsor compared this clause with clauses in similar bills; and if so, are these powers wider or of the same import as clauses in other bills of a similar nature?

Mr. Fleming: I think it will keep me sufficiently occupied answering for this bill without answering for other bills I may or may not have seen. All I can say is that as to bills designed for the purpose of incorporating religious organizations, I think this bill can be said to be in the usual form. The details of the powers set forth in section 5 I think are absolutely necessary and in good form.

Mr. Robinson: I will rest my comments on section 5 there, though I know my hon. friend would not do so if the bill were sponsored on this side.

Section agreed to.

Sections 6 and 7 agreed to.

On section 8—Committees.

Mr. Robinson: There seems to be some difference in meaning between section 6 and section 8. Section 6 reads:

Subject to and in accordance with the by-laws enacted by the corporation under section five of this act, the board of trustees of not less than six and not more than twenty elected by the corporation shall manage all temporal matters of the corporation.

Section 8, on the contrary, reads:

The corporation may exercise all its powers by and through such committees as it may appoint from time to time by by-law.

There seems to be a discrepancy between the wording of section 6 and that of section 8, and I am wondering if the sponsor would not feel easier in his mind if that discrepancy were cleared up. Again I suggest that the bill be permitted to stand until he has considered this point and perhaps introduced an appropriate amendment.

Mr. Fleming: I appreciate the unselfish solicitude of my hon. friend. I do not suppose I can convince him there is no discrepancy; however, if he will give due weight to the opening words of section 6 I think he will see there is no discrepancy such as the one he claims to have found lurking in the proverbial woodpile here. Section 6 begins with the qualifying words "subject to and in accordance with the by-laws enacted by the corporation." Section 8 makes provision for carrying on certain aspects of the work of the corporation by special committees appointed by by-law.

Mr. Robinson: I appreciate the very adequate explanation given by the hon. member, but section 6 mentions the temporal matters of the corporation. Can the hon. member explain what the temporal matters are, and how he distinguishes those from the powers mentioned in section 8?

Mr. Fleming: It will give me great pleasure to have a chat with my hon. friend later and explain what temporal matters are.

Mr. Robinson: Well, I do not feel I have had an adequate answer to my question.

Section agreed to.

Sections 9 and 10 agreed to.

On section 11—Obligation to dispose of lands.

Mr. Robinson: Subsection 1 reads:

No parcel of land or interest therein at any time acquired by the corporation and not required for its actual use and occupation, and not held by way of security, shall be held by the corporation—

Would the sponsor say what is the meaning of the words "not held by way of security"?

Mr. Fleming: The bill makes provision for the corporation to hold mortgages on real estate. That is one of the ways in which they may invest any funds available for investment. Lands "not held by way of security" would include lands not held by way of mortgage.

Mr. Robinson: Does the hon. member mean that for the words I have just quoted we could substitute the words "and not held under mortgage"?

Mr. Fleming: I am afraid the hon. member is putting an interpretation on my words which strains them. I think his alternative suggestion would somewhat narrow the language of the bill and in that way would be a detriment rather than an advantage, much as I appreciate his helpful suggestion.

Section agreed to.

Sections 12 and 13 agreed to.

On section 14—Execution of documents.

Mr. Robinson: I have something to say on this section with which I am quite sure my hon. friend will agree. It reads:

Any deed or other instrument relating to real estate vested in the corporation or to any interest in such real estate shall, if executed within the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada, be deemed to be duly executed if there is affixed thereto the seal of the corporation and there is thereon the signature of any officer of the corporation duly authorized for such purpose, or of his lawful attorney.

It seems to me that the latter words of the section "or of his lawful attorney" are a departure from ordinary business practice.

I should think it would be usual in the case of most corporations to appoint two, three or more signing officers who can sign in one another's absence. It seems to me also that it is a dangerous precedent to allow a corporate officer to appoint an attorney. In fact, I may go further and say that I doubt if it is within the powers of a corporate officer to delegate his authority. I believe this clause should be amended so as to eliminate the latter words, and use the signatures of the principal officers of the corporation instead of a lawful attorney.

Mr. Fleming: It is a pleasure, Mr. Chairman, to see the way in which the hon. member has given careful study to this bill. I appreciate that he has done that out of recognition of the importance of the bill.

I have no doubt that the corporation will make adequate provision for the appointment of alternative signing officers. However, as to the concluding words of the section to which the hon. member has drawn attention, may I say that they are by no means unusual. If he will look at the next bill on the order paper, Bill No. 268, an act to incorporate the Polish National Catholic Church of America in Canada, section 14—

Mr. Croll: On a matter of privilege, I object to getting into the argument on this particular bill in any way at all.

Mr. Robinson: I assure the hon. member I have also examined Bill No. 268 with similar care.

Mr. Fleming: I simply draw to the attention of the committee the fact that the bill to which I have just made a very respectful and deferential allusion contains in section 14 the precise counterpart of section 14 of the bill now under review, including the words "or of his lawful attorney".

Mr. Robinson: I have no doubt there are many precedents in this file of documents which I have before me of similar language. The question which I asked the hon. member was this. As a practising lawyer in Ontario, does he not feel that these words in this bill are superfluous, and perhaps a derogation from established authority? If necessary I intend to move that the words "or of his lawful attorney" be eliminated from the bill. I would much prefer to merely make the suggestion and have the hon. member who is sponsoring the bill move the amendment.

Mr. Fleming: I believe, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member will agree that I am sponsoring quite enough now without taking on any amendments.

[Mr. Robinson.]

Mr. Robinson: Then may I move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena:

That the words at the end of section 14 of this bill "or of his lawful attorney" be eliminated.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The standing orders require that amendments be given to the chairman in writing. I understand the hon. member is now writing out his amendment. Before he sends it over may I say that I have heard it, and consider that it would be a rather important amendment. I should like to draw to his attention standing order 113 which says:

No important amendment may be proposed to any private bill, in a committee of the whole house, or at the third reading of the bill, unless one day's notice of the same has been given.

The amendment, therefore, would be out of order at this time.

Mr. Robinson: In answer to that, since the hon. member sponsoring the bill refuses to sponsor the amendment, perhaps he does not consider it important.

Mr. Applewhaite: Speaking to the point of order, I must admit Your Honour's decision is well taken. I might take a few moments of the committee's time to point out to the hon. member who has moved the amendment that he is not entirely debarred from his remedy. Citation 811 of Beauchesne says that it is the correct course, in all cases where it is necessary—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. If the hon. member wishes to make a suggestion to some other hon. member he must not do so on the section of a bill. I have made my ruling and the ruling is not debatable. The hon. member of course may appeal it, but it is not debatable.

Mr. Applewhaite: I would not appeal your ruling but might I, with deference, suggest that we might have had time to discuss the point of order.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member will agree with me that whenever an amendment has been proposed it is for the chairman to decide whether or not it is to be accepted. I have decided I could not accept it because of standing order 113. That ruling being made, and being based on a standing order which is very clear, I do not think I should ask the opinion of hon. members. A point of order is discussed at the request of the chairman when he has some doubts as to whether or not a certain amendment is in order. But when he has no doubt whatever, it would be useless to waste the time of the committee by asking the opinion of various members.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Chairman, I do not dispute your ruling, and I assure you that I am merely trying to be helpful.

Section agreed to.

Sections 15 and 16 agreed to.

On section 17—Investment of funds.

Mr. Robinson: Section 17 reads as follows:

The corporation may also invest and reinvest any of its funds—

(a) in any bonds or debentures of any municipality or public school corporation or district in Canada, or in securities of or guaranteed by the government of Canada or of any province thereof;

(b) in first mortgages or freehold property in Canada and for the purposes of the same may take mortgages or assignments thereof whether such mortgages or assignments be made directly to the corporation in its own corporate name or to some company or person in trust for it, and may sell and assign the same;

(c) in any securities in which life insurance companies are authorized from time to time by the parliament of Canada to invest funds, subject to the limitation on investments in stocks, bonds and debentures set out in the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932.

I feel that this is a most important section of this bill, in view of the provisions of section 4, which I previously drew to the attention of the committee and which provides that this corporation may accept subscriptions, donations and legacies from the public. I should like to ask the sponsor whether the provisions of section 17 limit the corporation to the same investments which would be authorized, say in Ontario, as trustee investments.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I think it is quite obvious that the provisions of section 17 speak for themselves, and will not admit of any derogation on the part of provincial legislation. However, with due regard for the importance of the language used in the section, I think the hon. member will agree it is highly important that the powers thereby conferred should be put to work. The powers in section 17 of the bill can be put to work only if the corporation really has funds to invest, and as its only source of funds for investment or any other use in connection with this work is, as the hon. member has indicated, by subscription or charitable donation, may I say to the hon. member that I, on behalf of the corporation, shall be extremely glad to receive his subscription so that we may put these powers of investment to work.

Mr. Robinson: I assure the hon. member that I shall be glad to forward a subscription. But at the same time my question has not been answered by any manner of means. I asked a direct question, namely whether the sponsor has examined the terms of section 17 to ascertain whether the subscribers to this corporation will have the same treatment as is afforded to investors in trustee investments in the province of Ontario. I have taken that province as an example because I know it better than the others. But I think it is a perfectly fair question to ask the hon. member whether this company is limited to the trustee investments such as we know them in the province of Ontario.

Mr. Fleming: The limitation so far as the investment powers of the corporation are concerned is defined in section 17, not by the Trustee Act of the province of Ontario. I think it will be clear that the provisions of section 17 are not identical with those governing the investment in trustee securities on the part of corporations or trustees subject to the Trustee Act in the province of Ontario.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Chairman, I must confess that I am entirely dissatisfied with the answer which has been given to my question on section 17. I should therefore like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena, that the committee rise and report progress.

Motion negatived.

POLISH NATIONAL CATHOLIC CHURCH OF AMERICA IN CANADA

The house in committee on Bill No. 268, to incorporate the Polish National Catholic Church of America in Canada—Mr. Croll—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Sections 1 and 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Head office.

Mr. Robinson: I was wondering if it were necessary to have the wide powers as to head office that are requested by section 3 of this bill. Section 3, subsection 1, reads as follows:

The head office of the corporation shall be in the city of Toronto, in the province of Ontario, or at such other place in Canada as may be decided by the corporation.

I should like to inquire of the sponsor whether it would not be agreeable to eliminate the latter words of the section so as to keep the head office of the corporation in Ontario.

Mr. Croll: Mr. Chairman, that is a highly desirable recommendation, but I do not think I would suggest it to the committee. As a matter of fact, it may be that the organization is considering Midland, and I would not want in any way to deprive that worthy city of having the head office of this fine corporation.

Section agreed to.

Sections 4 and 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Management.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Chairman, I presume that the sponsor of this bill has now had some notice of the question which I intend to ask. Here again this section seems to me to be linked with section 8. Section 6 is similar to a section in the bill we were considering a few moments ago. Section 6 reads as follows:

> Subject to and in accordance with the by-laws enacted by the corporation under section five of this act, the board of trustees of seven members elected by the corporation shall manage all temporal matters of the corporation.

Section 8, on the contrary, reads as follows:

> The corporation may exercise all its powers by and through such committees as it may appoint from time to time by by-law.

On the previous bill I had, from a member of the legal profession, an answer to a somewhat similar question. I should like to know whether the sponsor of this bill considers my objection to be valid or whether he would prefer to have the sections stand as they are. I still feel that there is some discrepancy between the wording of the two sections, and that it would be advisable for the sponsors to consider them carefully before they insist on passing them.

Mr. Croll: All I can say, Mr. Chairman, is that I agree with the view of the hon. member for Eglinton with respect to the interpretation of this section. Since the committee has seen fit to endorse his view, I ask that it also endorse this section.

Section agreed to.

Sections 7 to 10 inclusive agreed to.

On section 11—Obligation to dispose of lands.

Mr. Robinson: I should like to have the views of the sponsor of this bill on the exact meaning of the words "and not held by way of security" in line three of section 11, subsection 1.

Mr. Croll: Mr. Chairman, I cannot add anything to what has already been said with respect to this section. It is in identically the same terms as the other one.

Section agreed to.

Sections 12 and 13 agreed to.

[Mr. Croll.]

On section 14—Execution of documents.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Chairman, I was wondering if the sponsor of this bill, who was in the house when I was inquiring with regard to a similar section in the previous bill, would not agree to the elimination of the last five words of the section, namely "or of his lawful attorney"?

Mr. Croll: Mr. Chairman, I thought the hon. member's argument was extremely well made indeed but that it did not have much substance to it. I think that section 14 should stand as it is.

Section agreed to.

Sections 15 and 16 agreed to.

On section 17—Investment of funds.

Mr. Robinson: I should like to ask the sponsor of this bill whether this section protects the shareholders or members of the corporation to the same extent that the Trustee Act in Ontario, with regard to trustee investments, protects, for instance, the beneficiaries of estates.

Mr. Croll: Paragraph (c) is a new one that was added to these bills this year in view of the amendment that was made last year to the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act. It was first incorporated in the United Church Act. It was felt that it gave the necessary protection as indicated by the hon. member for Simcoe East.

Mr. Hunter: I am not sure whether the sponsors have considered this paragraph, but it is usual for trustees or for those acting in a fiduciary capacity to go not over 50 per cent, or at the most 60 per cent, on first mortgages. While I am not suggesting that the people who are in this bill as the original incorporators are incompetent in any way, in view of the fact that they are acting as trustees, and will be acting as trustees of very large sums of money in the future, I have no doubt, it has struck me that the sponsor may very well have neglected to investigate the very wide powers of investment in first mortgages which they have, and they may wish to have that restriction put in that is normally put in the powers of trustees, and which may just have slipped by. I would suggest that a percentage be inserted, and it would be a wise precaution.

Mr. Robinson: I should think that we should have an answer to the question that has just been asked. It goes to the root of the question that I asked previously.

Mr. Croll: This is a normal clause in all these bills. It was examined very carefully in committee. We think it gives ample protection both to the public and to the incorporators. That is all I can say.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Robinson: I do not feel that that is sufficient. For instance, the hon. member who has just spoken mentioned paragraph (b) which deals with first mortgages. But paragraph (a) deals with bonds or debentures of any municipality or public school corporation or district in Canada, or in securities of or guaranteed by the government of Canada or of any province thereof. I would not like to be dogmatic about it, but I doubt very much whether under our trustee investment laws in the province of Ontario it is possible to invest in the debentures of a public school corporation, and we are perfectly justified in asking why this corporation should have wider powers of investment than are allowed to corporations of a similar nature.

Mr. Croll: The powers are no wider than those which are normally given under these conditions, and time and again they have been endorsed in this house and as late as ten minutes ago.

THE UKRAINIAN CATHOLIC EPISCOPAL CORPORATION OF SASKATCHEWAN

The house in committee on Bill No. 337, to incorporate the Ukrainian Catholic Episcopal Corporation of Saskatchewan—Mr. Knight—Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. Knight: On a point of order, I think section 1 is carried.

The Deputy Chairman: Yes, section 1 is carried.

On section 2—Head office.

Mr. Knight: On Friday night the hon. member for Simcoe East was good enough to suggest that I should accept an amendment to this clause. At that time I was not able to hear him distinctly at this distance in the chamber, but in reading the matter over in Hansard I thought that the hon. member's suggestion was a very good one, and I thank him for it. I propose to take advantage of it. In doing this I may say that I have the assent of the parliamentary agent of the proposed corporation. The amendment affects clause 2, subsection 1, and would have as its object inserting after the word "place" the words "in the said province". Perhaps one of my colleagues would be good enough to move this amendment. Clause 2, section 1, would then read:

> The head office of the corporation shall be at the city of Saskatoon, in the province of Saskatchewan, or at such other place in the said province as may be appointed by the corporation.

If that suits the will of my hon. friend I shall ask my colleague to move the amendment.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): I so move.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Applewhaite: Has it not just been ruled that at this stage in the committee of the whole an amendment to a section cannot be made?

The Deputy Chairman: At this point I must decide whether or not the amendment is material or important. I have heard the hon. member for Saskatoon read his amendment, and in the course of his remarks he said that he has the assent of the parliamentary agent. Furthermore, I consider that this amendment is not a material or important one and therefore I have decided to accept it. If the hon. member for Skeena and others consider that the matter is doubtful, I am prepared to put the question as to whether or not the amendment is important.

Mr. Applewhaite: Mr. Chairman, I have no intention of criticizing the ruling which you made. Doubtless you were justified in making it, but I gather you would consider it desirable that the practice should be as uniform as possible. May I say this with respect, and not by way of criticism. If the question whether or not a motion is important is the decisive factor as to whether or not it should be made at this time—I know the word "important" is in standing order 113—I would suggest that the question of its importance is one on which the house might on occasions at least see fit to make representations. In this case, sir, I am willing to accept wholeheartedly what I understand is your decision, that the amendment is not important.

Private Bills

On section 9—Execution of documents.

Mr. Robinson: As the sponsor of this bill has been so kind as to move the amendment which I suggested a few days ago, I wonder if he will be willing to consider an amendment similar to those I suggested in connection with like sections in two other bills which came before us this evening. Section 9 reads:

Any deed or other instrument relating to real property vested in the corporation or to any interest in such real property shall, if executed within the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada, be deemed to be duly executed if there are affixed thereto the seal of the corporation and the signature of any officer of the corporation duly authorized for such purpose or his lawful attorney.

As I have said on two previous occasions tonight, I believe the concluding words of the section "or his lawful attorney" are a departure from business practice as followed by most corporations. I believe it would be possible for the corporation by means of a bylaw to authorize two, three, four or more signing officers so that they would never be without an officer to deal with a matter of this kind. As I said before, I feel it is dangerous to allow an officer of a corporation to delegate his authority to someone who is not responsible to the shareholders or members of the corporation. I ask the sponsor of this bill, as I asked the sponsors of the previous bills, to agree to the elimination of the last four words of this section. I hope the sponsor will be as kind in this respect as he was in respect to section 2.

Mr. Knight: As my hon. and learned friend knows, these matters are beyond a layman and I can only quote two other authorities, the hon. and learned member for Spadina and the hon. and learned member for Eglinton, who have stated that this is the usual form of incorporation and that these words are customary. I appreciate my hon. friend's interest and sincerity in wishing to have this bill drawn up properly. As I said before, I cannot let my limited knowledge of the law accept the amendment unless it is endorsed by the legal firm who is looking after the interests of this corporation.

Mr. Robinson: I have no desire to put my hon. friend in any embarrassing position with respect to the wording of the section. This matter is of some importance and I suggest that it might be well to allow the bill to stand until the hon. member may have the advice of the solicitors as to whether they consider the amendment which I have suggested to be desirable. I suggest that the bill stand until my hon. friend has had an opportunity to obtain that advice.

[Mr. Applewhaite]

Mr. Gibson: I was wondering about this section and perhaps my legal friends can advise me. The section reads:

Any deed or other instrument relating to real property vested in the corporation or to any interest in such property shall, if executed within the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada, be deemed to be duly executed—

What is the inference to be drawn from the words "executed within the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada"? Probably the sponsor could answer that question.

Mr. Bryce: We did not hear what you said.

Section agreed to.

Section 10 agreed to.

On section 11—Investment of funds.

Mr. Robinson: This section is considerably broader than the sections in the two bills we considered earlier this evening. The section reads:

The corporation may invest its funds, or any portion thereof, either directly in the name of the corporation or indirectly in the name of trustees, in the purchase of such securities as it may deem advisable, and also may lend its funds or any portion thereof on any such securities.

That is practically a blank cheque to this corporation to invest in any securities whatsoever and to lend its funds on the security of any securities whatsoever. I objected to the safeguards which were contained in the previous bills, but this section goes immeasurably farther than the sections in the previous bill. I consider it to be very broad and I was wondering if the sponsor could say whether that particular aspect has been considered and whether this section has been compared with similar sections in other bills.

Progress reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): The house will resume the business which was under consideration at six o'clock.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND TECHNICAL SURVEYS

Administration services—

217. Departmental administration, $398,452.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Mr. Chairman, this is an important department affecting all of Canada, some parts more than others, and perhaps we should have a statement from the minister as to the main activities of the department last year and what is proposed for the current year. We have a large variety of mines in Nova Scotia, more particularly coal, but gold and other minerals are found in small quantities. We have hopes of developing this phase of mining activity. Some hon. members have a particular interest in some of the items, and in the meantime perhaps the minister would make a general statement.

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): The branches of this department are the mines branch, the geological survey of Canada, the surveys and mapping branch, the geographical branch and the dominion observatories. The functions of these branches may be described briefly as follows: The mines branch undertakes in its laboratories the analysis of ores and minerals of economic interest, metallic, nonmetallic, radioactive and fuels, their production, processing, utilization and marketing, the investigation of metals and alloys and their properties and uses. The information thus secured is made available to the mining and metallurgical industries of Canada with a view to stimulating the production, use and export of the country's mineral wealth.

The geological survey of Canada carries on geological studies in the field and office designed to promote the discovery and development of Canada's mineral resources. The results of investigations are made available to prospectors and other interested parties in the form of geological maps and reports. It also carries on surveys using the recently developed airborne magnetometer. The branch provides, free of charge, identification of mineral specimens submitted by prospectors and the general public, and checks samples for radioactivity.

The surveys and mapping branch is made up of five divisions. They are as follows: Topographical survey, Canadian hydrographic service, geodetic survey of Canada, legal surveys and aeronautical charts, and map compilation and reproduction. Their main functions are as follows: The topographical survey division is the primary mapping organization of the federal government, and is responsible for topographical mapping on scales of four miles to one inch and larger, from both ground and air surveys. It carries out the surveys for the control of air photography, details topography from both ground surveys and air photographs, and prepares the resulting maps to the manuscript stage.

The Canadian hydrographic service is responsible for the charting of the coastal and inland waters of Canada, and for the study of the water levels on the great lakes and the St. Lawrence waterway. It carries out hydrographic surveys and investigations, and publishes charts, sailing directions, tide tables and other results of its work.

The geodetic survey of Canada provides a national system of precise triangulation and level control on which are based detailed topographical, hydrographic and other surveys. It provides control for air surveys in remote areas by means of astronomical fixations. The geodetic survey is currently co-operating with the national research council and the Royal Canadian Air Force in the development of shoran apparatus, and techniques designed to obtain geodetic measurements from aircraft.

The legal surveys and aeronautical charts unit carries out surveys of dominion land under the direction of the surveyor general. It is also responsible for the preparation of air navigation charts used in the "Canada Air Pilot", and for this purpose plots air photographs on scales smaller than four miles to one inch. It maintains a central distribution office for all maps prepared in the surveys and mapping branch.

The map compilation and reproduction division is the division which is responsible for the drafting of the maps produced by all divisions of the surveys and mapping branch, and for the printing of both maps and charts. To carry out this function it has specialized compiling, drafting, photographic and lithographic units.

The geographical branch is a comparatively new one, having been organized in 1947 with the objective of collecting and making available geographical data on Canada and foreign countries for the use of government and other interested organizations. It is currently engaged in the preparation of an atlas of Canada, and the compilation of geographical data on strategic areas in northern Canada and on the east and west coasts.

So far as the dominion observatories are concerned, the main observatories are located at Ottawa and Victoria, B.C. They are responsible for scientific studies in stellar and solar physics, in terrestrial magnetism, in gravity and seismology. From Ottawa Canadian standard time is broadcast over station CHU for the benefit of surveyors, aerial navigators and ocean shipping.

Mr. Herridge: When the estimates of the Department of Resources and Development were under discussion I asked a question with respect to the development of the surveys of the Columbia river basin in which my constituents and the people of British Columbia generally are interested. At that time the Minister of Resources and Development advised me that I should direct my questions to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys when his estimates were before the committee inasmuch as there had been a transfer of funds after they had been voted in the estimates of the Department of Resources and Development. I should like to ask the minister if he can give this committee some information as to the drilling that is taking place along the Columbia river with a view to finding suitable foundations for dam sites, what has been the result of the drilling done to date, the various points at which it has been undertaken, and what dam sites are to be investigated in the current year.

Mr. Prudham: This department does not carry out any development work. We merely act in an advisory capacity to the Department of Resources and Development and the Department of Public Works. I believe the Department of Public Works is doing the drilling that the hon. member has mentioned. We have undertaken to compile eighty-eight map sheets for that area. Thirty-six are completed and some survey work only is completed on the balance. We have one geologist on the dam sites that the hon. member has mentioned.

Mr. Herridge: So far as drilling is concerned, should I direct my question to the Minister of Public Works when his estimates are under discussion?

Mr. Prudham: I believe so.

Mr. Adamson: I should like to ask the minister a question about the water levels on the great lakes. At the present time the water levels particularly of lake Ontario and surrounding waters are abnormally high. It is generally considered that they follow a certain cyclical trend. We used to call it the old seven year cycle or seven year sine. Three or four years of abnormally high water have rather upset all previous calculations, and it is causing a great deal of damage to the shore line. I should like the minister to say whether the geodetic survey has made any study of the level of the waters of the great lakes, and I would ask him whether he has any statement to make on the abnormally high water level which has persisted for a number of years.

Mr. Prudham: This department has taken levels through the hydrographic survey branch and has made the information available. That is as far as our responsibility goes.

Mr. Adamson: Is nothing done about run-offs? Is nothing done about the flow of rivers? Is nothing done about the flow of the Niagara river and the St. Lawrence river?

Mr. Prudham: I believe that comes under the water and power bureau of the Department of Resources and Development.

Mr. Adamson: That brings up the next question. Where does the Department of Resources and Development stop and where does the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys start? Where is the division of authority between the two?

Mr. Prudham: This is a technical department only; we do not do any development work. We carry out survey projects for other departments.

Mr. Adamson: That was the policy of the old department of mines; they did not do any development work. I remember the survey and prospecting parties going into the field, and the one thing they were afraid of was that they might find an ore deposit. I assume the minister is equally hopeful that they do not find anything of commercial value. All they want to do is chart the geology of the country. With respect to the geological survey, would the minister say how many parties are out this year, where they are; who is the chief of the geological survey branch and if possible who are the chiefs of the various parties?

Mr. Prudham: I think we can give that information when we come to the particular item if that would be satisfactory.

Mr. Adamson: That is perfectly satisfactory. Now I should like to ask a question with regard to the air survey. Would the minister say how much of the dominion has been mapped and what is the program for the coming year with regard to topographical mapping through the air survey? At the same time could he explain the "Canada Air Pilot", whether it is on a route basis or an area basis.

Mr. Prudham: The department tries to photograph from the air about 200,000 square miles a year. For the actual topographical mapping survey work we have about sixty parties in the field.

Mr. Adamson: That is, as distinct from the geological survey, there are sixty mapping parties? Are these all airborne, and how many personnel would be in this group?

Mr. Prudham: The average party consists of five or six persons, and they are usually transported to the remote areas by air and then left to do their survey work on foot.

Mr. Adamson: It is the old method of triangulation and ground survey; it is not done by aerial photography?

Mr. Prudham: These survey parties establish control points which can be related to the aerial maps.

Mr. Adamson: I would be interested to learn how much of the country is being mapped, because I realize there is a tremendous job to be done in mapping the country both topographically and geologically. In Canada we have pioneered in air mapping, and I wonder if the minister could say how much has been mapped, what is the furthest boundary north, how much it is expected will be done this year, whether we are mapping north of the tree line yet, whether we are mapping in the Northwest Territories, whether we are dealing with specific things such as river basins, and in short a general statement. I appreciate that the topographical mapping of the country presents the department with a tremendous job and I would like the minister to explain what is being done.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): A great deal of topographical work has been carried out in the northern reaches of the Cariboo, some of it in co-operation with the Americans in Alaska. In our own district the work of photographing from the air is well in advance of anything the United States is carrying out on its side of the line. I happen to know that from conversation with some of the surveyors and I thought it would be of interest to hon. members.

Mr. Prudham: Practically all Canada to the remote north has been photographed and mapped by the trimetrogon system. They are now proceeding to photograph it by vertical photography, and relating it to the control points established by these topographical parties. About two-thirds of the photography by the second method has been completed.

Mr. Adamson: Has it been carried on north of the boundaries of the three prairie provinces? Have those provinces been mapped?

Mr. Prudham: The trimetrogon work has all been done.

Mr. Adamson: Those maps are available?

Mr. Prudham: They are available at eight miles to the inch only.

Mr. Adamson: There are no maps at four miles to the inch or one mile to the inch for that territory?

Mr. Prudham: Not yet.

Mr. Fraser: Has the air force helped in that work?

Mr. Prudham: The air force has been doing a great deal of that work. This year of necessity they have had to curtail their activity, and for that reason we are having to engage more private companies to do it.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Since hon. members began putting questions to the minister on mapping, topographical surveys and so on, I have been examining the estimates. If it is the wish of the committee to have a discussion on item 228 now, let us do so, but if not let us pass the first item. Twice I have asked if the first item, departmental administration, is carried, and each time I am told it is not. Everyone is discussing mapping and topographical survey, a discussion which should take place on item 228. Let us carry the first item; the sooner we do so the sooner we will reach item 228.

Mr. Fraser: I thought while we were in the air we should finish it.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps we should come down to earth.

Mr. Murphy: Under this department is survey work carried on in connection with uranium?

Mr. Prudham: Yes.

Mr. Murphy: Would the minister tell the committee the extent of the work that has been carried on during the past year?

Mr. Prudham: That comes under a specific item, and I would prefer to wait until that item is reached.

Mr. Adamson: Under this item would the minister explain what facilities his department has in Ottawa? Some of the most efficient methods now being used in connection with our present mining development were developed by our scientists and engineers and chemists and physicists here in Ottawa, and I should like to know whether the ore dressing laboratories and other facilities of the old department are now under this department or whether they are under the Department of Resources and Development? I should like to know where the division is, because the work being done by these scientists and engineers in these laboratories has been pioneer work in ore development and ore treatment, not only in Canada but in the world.

Mr. Prudham: That all comes under this department now. We have a radioactive laboratory in the mines branch for the testing of radioactive ores and a laboratory under the geological surveys for the identification of minerals, in addition to these other laboratories which the hon. member has mentioned. We have the mineral processing division, the industrial minerals division, the fuels division, the physical metallurgy division and the minerals resources division.

Mr. Adamson: All these laboratories are situated in Ottawa?

Mr. Prudham: Yes, on Booth street.

Item agreed to.

Explosives Act administration—

218. Administration, operation and maintenance, $88,164.

Mr. Fraser: Does an individual have to have a permit if he has an explosive in his possession, that is for stumping powder and things of that kind?

Mr. Prudham: I see a provision for a two-dollar fee for individual permits, so I presume that is so.

Mr. Thomas: Before this item carries, will the minister tell the committee just how much control his department has over the storage of military explosives, shells and things of that kind?

Mr. Prudham: This department has no control over the storage facilities of the armed forces. If there should be an explosion, we would investigate the catastrophe with the armed force concerned.

Mr. Fraser: The minister mentioned a two-dollar fee for a permit. Does he mean to say that a farmer has to have a permit and pay two dollars in order to blow up stumps on his property? I do not think that is proper. The two-dollar fee would be for those who buy explosives in carload lots, and store them.

Mr. Prudham: There is no fee charged an individual doing that type of work.

Item agreed to.

Mines branch—

219. Mines branch administration, $70,093.

Mr. Follwell: I believe this is the item under which I should ask the question supplementary to the one asked by the member for York West concerning aerial survey mapping of the Northwest Territories. He received a rather sketchy answer, but perhaps it went as far as the minister was able to go at this time. Will the minister state just how much of the Northwest Territories has been mapped by aerial photography, and if there has been any particular aerial photography done in the Baffinland area?

Mr. Prudham: Is this item 219, Mr. Chairman?

The Deputy Chairman: Yes, item 219.

Mr. Prudham: I do not think the question relates to that particular item.

[Mr. Prudham.]

Mr. Follwell: The reason I asked it, sir, is that the item refers particularly to mineral resources investigation. I presume that would be investigation of mineral resources, but I could be wrong.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): Under this heading, might I ask if there is any intention of reviving a provincial-dominion arrangement whereby trails and transportation facilities are opened up into new property? Some years ago the government of Canada contributed probably one-half to projects of that kind. I think it would be important to canvass the possibilities of reopening such an arrangement. In my own district a good many new mines were brought in as a result of the co-operative efforts between Ottawa and the department of mines at Victoria. In some cases private corporations were able to contribute something towards the building of a road into a new property. I believe that this properly comes under this heading, and I should like the minister to say whether he intends to reopen this provision?

Mr. Prudham: In answer to the member for Hastings South, may I say that the territory has been completely mapped by the trimetric system, and they are now proceeding with more detailed surveys. Some districts have been quite completely mapped, and others have not been. If there is any particular area the hon. member has in mind, we could perhaps give more precise information.

Mr. Follwell: The particular area I mentioned was the Baffinland area. Are there any aerial photographs available of that area now?

Mr. Prudham: Yes, Mr. Chairman, aerial photographs are available by the trimetric method.

Mr. Adamson: That is eight miles to the inch?

Mr. Prudham: Yes, eight miles to the inch. In answer to the hon. member for Cariboo, the development of roads into mining areas in the Northwest Territories would come under the Department of Resources and Development. This department would most likely be called in for advice and information on the geological prospects in the area before such a grant was considered.

Mr. Benidickson: I understood the federal government has associated itself with the province of Manitoba recently in connection with a mining road into a camp which I believe was called Snow Lake. How recently have any joint arrangements been made in that territory?

Mr. Prudham: That road was started by the old department of mines and resources. This new department has had something to do with the completion of the road, and I believe it is now completed.

Mr. Benidickson: What percentage of the cost of that road was borne by the federal government?

Mr. Prudham: I am sorry, but that information went to the Department of Resources and Development when the departments were divided.

Mr. Benidickson: During the past year have there been any requests from the province of Ontario for assistance in connection with the construction of the mining development roads?

Mr. Prudham: There have been general discussions with mining officials in Ontario, but no specific requests.

Mr. Wright: Do these mining survey parties carry the necessary instruments for the detection of uranium ore when making geophysical surveys and other surveys?

Mr. Prudham: Yes, Mr. Chairman, the parties carry detectors when they are in an area in which there are prospects of that kind.

Mr. Follwell: Will the minister state whether any investigation is being conducted by his department in regard to finding tin in Canada? Are there any known deposits of tin in Canada now that are of commercial value?

Mr. Prudham: Several prospects have been investigated but there have been no worthwhile results.

Mr. Wright: When these parties have been out, have they made any discoveries? Have any mineral claims been filed by survey parties from the minister's department during the past year, with respect to either uranium or other minerals?

Mr. Prudham: I do not know whether I quite understand the question. Does the hon. member mean to ask whether any claims have been filed as a result of our surveys?

Mr. Wright: Yes; by the department itself, not by individual prospectors.

Mr. Prudham: No. Any government official is barred from staking claims.

Mr. Wright: The department itself does not stake claims?

Mr. Prudham: No.

Mr. Wright: Do they present the information to Eldorado which is a mining company and which has an exploration department or subsidiary?

Mr. Prudham: Yes. The information that our parties gather is available to private prospectors, to provincial governments or to anyone who is interested in developing the resources.

Item agreed to.

Mineral resources investigations—

220. Administration, operation and maintenance, $1,622,676.

Mr. Bater: I should like to advise the minister that I am interested in the Lloydminster oilfield. I notice that in the sessional committee on railways and shipping owned and operated by the government, on Tuesday April 17, 1951, Mr. Donald Gordon, president of the Canadian National Railways was asked whether that heavy type of oil in the Lloydminster field is suitable for use in locomotives. Mr. Gordon's answer is as follows:

> Bunker C oil is used in our oil-burning locomotives; but diesel oil is used in our diesel operations. In western Canada our operations are almost entirely oil-burning. In fact, west of Edmonton we operate entirely with a converted type of oil-burning locomotive in which we use bunker C oil. I might say that we are concerned about the supply of bunker C oil and we would like to see a very much greater development at the Lloydminster field.

I should like to ask the minister if this is the department that might assist in the further development of that field, as this oil is so necessary for the use of the oil-burning locomotives.

Mr. Prudham: In our department we have a top-ranking authority on oil and gas in Canada in our director of scientific services. The department has made a geological survey of the Lloydminster area and has gone as far as it can in that regard. The information is available to anyone who is interested in exploration.

Mr. Murphy: This item is for $1,622,676, approximately $101,000 more than it was a year ago. It includes administration, operation and maintenance. Can we get a breakdown of those figures? There are apparently three different items.

Mr. Prudham: I would refer the hon. member to page 246. A complete break-down is given there. The salary allotment of this vote has been increased by $106,133. The remainder of the requirements have been reduced by $4,400, the vote as a whole being increased therefore by $101,733. With reference to salaries, although the number of positions provided for has been reduced by sixteen, statutory increases and general salary increases recently granted make necessary the provision of the additional funds.

Item agreed to.

Mines branch—

221. Construction or acquisition of new equipment, $296,000.

Mr. Adamson: What new equipment?

Mr. Murphy: I asked a question a few minutes ago. Can the minister now make a statement under this particular item? He might give the committee the information his department has.

Mr. Prudham: Would the hon. member give me the question again?

Mr. Murphy: A few moments ago I asked about the number of surveys that were being made. I will ask a few more questions which the minister can answer at the same time. Is the department working in conjunction with any other department in making those surveys for radioactive ore and with what results? If the minister is in a position to state the areas in which prospecting has been carried on, we should like to know.

Mr. Prudham: No survey work is done under the mines branch administration. That is all chiefly laboratory work and research. I will try to answer that question under the geological survey item when it comes up.

Mr. Murphy: A minute or two ago the minister said that some of the survey parties carried equipment—I imagine that would include geiger counters—where there is likely to be uranium. I do not know, but I imagine that statement rather needs an explanation. I cannot understand how they could determine where there is likely to be uranium and where there is not likely to be uranium, because it has been discovered in most unlikely places. The minister should know, anyway.

Mr. Prudham: The general areas where these strategic minerals are likely to be found are fairly well plotted; and whereas the areas are not specifically known, they are generally known. When parties go into any of these particular areas, they go with the equipment that they think will be most useful.

Mr. Murphy: Pursuing that subject, I should like to ask another question. Would it not be possible for the survey parties to carry geiger counters in these unlikely areas or would that not be convenient?

Mr. Prudham: All parties that go into the radioactive areas of the Pre-Cambrian shield carry these geiger counters.

[Mr. Prudham.]

Mr. Noseworthy: I notice that, as shown at page 247, in this particular division there are 168 permanent positions and 237 temporary ones. Can the minister explain why that branch requires so many more temporary employees than permanent ones?

Mr. Prudham: This particular department has grown rapidly with the growth of radioactive research. Many of these employees are mill men and mechanics, and some of them are not the type that would likely become permanent. I think that is partly the explanation.

Mr. Noseworthy: Just how long does an employee require to be with the department in order to secure a permanent appointment?

Mr. Prudham: I understand that a branch of any department has to be established long enough to gain a certain standing with the civil service commission. Permanent appointments are decided by the civil service commission.

Mr. Noseworthy: The minister says "long enough". Will he specify just what "long enough" means?

Mr. Prudham: I understand that any portion of a department that is considered to be a permanent operation is eligible to have its employees established on a permanent basis.

Mr. Noseworthy: Does the explanation that the minister gives for this particular branch apply to all branches within his department? I computed that there are 745 permanent employees and 1,134 temporary employees in his department listed in the details of the services.

Mr. Prudham: This department has been in being only a very short time. I am told that the proportion of temporary employees in this department is no larger than in other departments of the government. I do not know that I can be any more explicit than that.

Mr. Adamson: This is a new branch dealing with radioactive ores.

The Deputy Chairman: We are dealing with item 221, construction or acquisition of new equipment.

Mr. Adamson: I am dealing with the second part of that item, investigations of radioactive ores.

Mr. Lesage: That is the heading for the next three items.

The Deputy Chairman: As it is shown on the resolution that I have before me item 221 has to do with construction or acquisition of new equipment, $296,000. Item 222 is investigations of radioactive ores, administration, operation and maintenance $240,760. Shall item 221 carry?

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Before the item carries I should like an explanation of the large expenditure on new equipment in the two years, last year and this year. The amount of half a million dollars was expended or asked for, for the acquisition of tools and machinery and acquisition of research and scientific equipment. Last year the amount was $242,000. What is the nature of that machinery? Where is it used, and what class of work is it utilized for?

Mr. Prudham: This vote provides for the purchase of capital equipment items for use in the laboratories and machine shops, and for replacement of motor vehicles.

Construction of a new machine shop and stores building is well advanced, and it will be occupied during this fiscal year. A large part of the machine tool equipment in use in the old shop is obsolete and incapable of doing fine work to the close tolerances required for development of metals for defence purposes. Lack of space in the old shop prevented the purchase and installation of any new equipment. With the additional space and improved facilities provided by the new building, it will be possible to instal new, modern lathes, shapers, milling machines, grinders, et cetera and $50,000 has been requested for this purpose.

An amount of $242,000 has been included for the purchase of scientific apparatus and machinery for use in the laboratories, and ore dressing and metallurgical mills. Approximately $136,000 of this amount is a revote for equipment for which funds were provided in 1950-51 but which was not delivered in that year. The balance is for new equipment for research on improved ore dressing and metallurgical processes in connection with strategic minerals and metals for defence purposes.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Where are these new buildings being located? Are they distributed in different provinces? Are any assigned to the maritime provinces, for instance?

Mr. Prudham: No; the new buildings are on Booth street here in Ottawa.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): The whole development is concentrated in Ottawa?

Mr. Prudham: Yes, that is right. There is a very good reason for that. At the present time they are working very closely with the Chalk River project and with the national research council.

Mr. Fraser: There is one question that I should like to ask. In the details on page 248 I find "memberships, $1,000". It has been increased by $200 over last year. What is that for?

Mr. Prudham: That amount is for the membership fees of the scientific staff in their various scientific societies and organizations.

Mr. Adamson: What are the societies and organizations? Has the minister a record of them?

Mr. Prudham: I have not a complete list, but there is the Engineering Institute of Canada and the Canadian Institute of Mining and Metallurgy.

Mr. Adamson: Does the minister know how much each of these gets?

Mr. Prudham: No; I have not the details here, I am sorry.

Mr. Murphy: I notice one item here, "sundries, $6,500". Last year it was $15,400. Can the minister explain the difference?

Mr. Prudham: That shows a reduction. The reason we are able to show a reduction there is that the new method of compiling the estimates made it possible to break the sundries item down into specific items a little closer this year.

Mr. Murphy: Did any part of the difference between $15,400 and $6,500 go into any other departments?

Mr. Prudham: No; it is allotted to specific items.

Mr. Murphy: Can the minister tell the committee any particular items that were left out this year to represent the difference? It is a little over a third of what it was last year.

Mr. Prudham: That item is smaller because we are not providing for so many unforeseen contingencies this year as last year. There is a good reason for that. The estimates are more specific this year, and probably a good portion of the money is allotted to specific items in a definite estimate. Probably a lot of this money is allotted to specific items.

Mr. Murphy: What does the item represent? Will the minister give some illustrations?

Mr. Prudham: This provision is for unforeseen expenses and contingencies not provided for in other primaries. Many of the costs chargeable to this item are expenditures for towel service, laundry, obtaining industrial water, gasoline samples and so on. A decrease of $4,500 is based upon recent experience and the intention to exercise the utmost economy.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): The item covering subscriptions, textbooks and other major library acquisitions is $8,500 this year as compared with $9,200 last year. What is the total investment in the library? Where is the library located? Is it open to the general public or only to the technicians and scientists of the department?

Mr. Prudham: The books referred to are available to the general public if they care to go to the Booth street office and inquire. This allotment covers the acquisition of reference text books for the mines branch library which services the department as a whole. The requirements for scientific textbooks do not diminish and the costs show a rising tendency, hence an increase in the allotment is required to cover greatly increased costs of binding and taking care of library acquisitions.

Mr. Adamson: Does the department support the Canadian Arctic institute and the Canadian astronomical society? I understand that both societies receive grants from the department and I was wondering whether that was done through this or some other department.

Mr. Prudham: I am told that if the Canadian Arctic institute is conducting a special project which this department thinks has merit we try to support it, but not on an annual basis.

Mr. Adamson: What about the astronomical society?

Mr. Prudham: Some of our scientists have membership, but not the department as a whole.

Mr. Noseworthy: The first item on page 248 is $8,500 for overtime pay. What class of employee is paid overtime and what is the basis, straight time or time and a half?

Mr. Prudham: This item is to provide for the payment of overtime to prevailing rates employees as provided by order in council. The increase of $2,500 is due to an increase in the hourly rates of pay for prevailing rates employees, the urgency of work on defence requirements and the need to accomplish moving of machines to the new mechanical shops with a minimum of interference with production.

Mr. Noseworthy: I take it that none of these employees who come within the civil service would be eligible for overtime?

Mr. Prudham: I have not that information, but I shall be glad to get it for my hon. friend.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Prudham.]

Investigations of radioactive ores—

222. Administration, operation and maintenance, $240,700.

Mr. Follwell: How many mines are producing scheelite, and has the government entered into any arrangement with them by way of subsidy or special payment?

Mr. Prudham: There is only one active mine, which I believe is owned by the Department of Defence Production.

Mr. Follwell: The department owns the mine?

Mr. Prudham: Yes.

Mr. Follwell: Is the department negotiating with any mines at the present time, apart from the one the minister speaks of, for the production of scheelite?

Mr. Prudham: No.

Mr. Follwell: Is there any special inducement held out to geologists or prospectors to go out and look for thorium and uranium? Just how is the quest for these metals handled?

Mr. Prudham: The development of radioactive ores is carried on largely by the crown company, Eldorado Mining and Refining Company. The incentive to contractors and developers is handled through that company.

Mr. Follwell: The minister is unable to answer my question with regard to special inducements that are offered.

Mr. Prudham: I am not able to answer that question.

Mr. Adamson: On many occasions I have been asked what happens when a prospector brings a piece of radioactive ore to the department. I have had several complaints that they did not seem to be particularly interested. A prospector may have a sample of ore from a deposit which he may or may not have staked. He gets a geiger counter reaction from the ore but is interested in finding out from the department how much uranium oxide there is in the sample. The percentage of uranium oxide in the ore indicates its value; it does not matter what reaction you get on the geiger counter. What is the procedure when a sample of ore is brought in to the department? What happens? And how is the prospector or developer informed about the value of the ore so brought in?

Mr. Prudham: When a sample is sent in it is given a geiger counter assay and the percentage of radioactive material is determined. This usually takes about a day. If the hon. gentleman knows someone who has been brushed off I should like to know about it and have the hon. gentleman tell him to come around again.

Mr. Adamson: They were not particularly interested in stating whether there was a geiger counter reaction. You could probably get a radioactive reaction from a geiger counter in this chamber. It is the percentage of uranium oxide that is of value. Does the department make a report giving the percentage of uranium oxide? Does the department say: We have received the sample, we have assayed it, it has a certain percentage of uranium oxide in it, and we think you had better go out and stake the deposit? Or does the department say: This is a valuable deposit and we think you should turn it over to the Eldorado Mining and Refining Corporation? I should like to find that out because the development of radioactive ores and uranium oxide is one of the most important we can carry on at the present time in Canada.

It is not particularly attractive commercially. There is only one buyer. There is a set price, and it is not a simple thing for the average prospector to discover. He gets a reaction on a geiger counter and he says: I have a deposit of uranium. Frequently he has not, but the decision whether he has or has not is one that the department, through technical officers, can make for him, or at least tell him whether he should go on. I should like to know what happens when a man brings in a sample of ore. I know the geiger counter readings and I know what happens, but what I am interested in is whether the department tells him it is a certain type of rock, what he should look for, and advises him how to continue the development of a potential property.

Mr. Prudham: Both thorium and uranium are radioactive, and to have a complete analysis of a sample there would have to be a chemical analysis which would take longer. That would be done by the mines branch if it was thought the sample warranted that amount of work. It can be told by preliminary tests whether it is rich enough for chemical analysis. Chemical analysis can take as long as a month to complete, but that is done whenever the specimen warrants it.

Mr. Adamson: Can the minister say what percentage of uranium oxide they consider valuable?

Mr. Prudham: 0·50 per cent or more.

Mr. Adamson: Half of one per cent.

Item agreed to.

224. To provide for payments to McGill university in connection with the development of a coal-fired gas turbine, $75,000.

Mr. Follwell: The minister might give a report to the committee on the development of this coal-fired gas turbine. I understand that the Union Pacific Railway is using such a gas turbine on some of their lines running west to the coast. I am wondering if it would not be well to have a report as to what particular development is being carried on, and what progress is being made by this group at McGill university.

Mr. Prudham: An order in council was passed on November 4, 1950, authorizing the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys to enter into an agreement with McGill university under which the university will be reimbursed for its costs in developing a coal-fired gas turbine in an amount not exceeding $125,000. The work of developing a prototype turbine will be carried out in the dynamics laboratory of the university under the direction of Professor Donald L. Mordell. A successful design is expected to reduce railway transportation costs and the costs of electric power developed from coal, and will assist the Canadian coal industry by widening its markets. At the present time I understand the project is still on the drawing board and they are not quite ready to start the actual construction of the experimental model.

Mr. Adamson: There is no prototype yet?

Mr. Prudham: No.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I notice that this experiment is being carried on at McGill university. I would think that an appropriate place to have this undertaken would be at one of the colleges in the maritime provinces. The maritime provinces produce coal, and it is most necessary that there be a permanent market for the product. I would ask the minister if any such experimental work has been pursued in any of the maritime universities.

Mr. Prudham: In this particular case the job went to the man with the idea. Professor Mordell was the originator of this idea, and it looked so good that the department decided to back him on it. As he is a professor at McGill university the experiment is being carried on there. I think I can tell my hon. friend that if any similar good ideas come out of the maritimes we will be glad to look into them.

Item agreed to.

Geological Survey of Canada—

225. Geological survey administration and miscellaneous services, including the expenses of the national advisory committee on research in the geological sciences, $156,527.

Mr. Adamson: I should like to ask the minister to give me the number of parties who are doing surveys this year, who is the head of the service this year, and what districts the parties are in. I should like this information because I should like to know, and I think the mining people would like to know, what new maps can be expected in the forthcoming year. I should also like to ask what provincial governments are co-operating at the present time in this work. I know that the department of mines of Ontario is doing a similar type of work. What co-operation is being received from provincial governments and in what districts?

Mr. Prudham: This information has already been released to the press. The geological survey has eighty-eight parties in the field. Assessment of strategic minerals including tungsten, molybdenum, chromite and antimony, which are essential to Canada's defence program, will form an important part of this year's program of the geological survey. The work is to include further examination and mapping of the Quebec-Labrador iron region, mapping of areas believed to be favourable for the occurrence of oil, gas and coal, and examination of uranium-bearing deposits. The staff of the regional office established in Calgary last year will examine a great number of drill cores and cuttings available in that area to aid in the interpretation of the stratigraphy of the oil fields. Examination of glacial deposits including gravel, clay and sand, and the study of the ground water resources, will be extended to include the important industrial areas of Montreal and Vancouver. A special detailed study of the Sydney coal fields of Nova Scotia will be continued as an aid to the industry in planning further development of coal deposits. Parties have been arranged as follows:

Northwest Territories	7
Yukon	5
British Columbia	16
Alberta	11
Saskatchewan	5
Manitoba	6
Ontario	6
Quebec	7
Quebec-Labrador	4
New Brunswick	3
Nova Scotia	3
Newfoundland	7

In addition six geologists will be assigned to the strategic minerals investigation in various parts of Canada, and two to the investigation of radioactive minerals. The head of the department is Dr. W. A. Bell.

Mr. Kent: The minister said there were seven geological survey parties for Newfoundland. I wonder if he would say in what parts of Newfoundland that work was carried out.

Mr. Prudham: At Campbellton, there is one-mile mapping of base metal areas, and the same at Springdale. At Holyrood there is an examination of manganese deposits and stratigraphic studies. On the coast of Labrador there is reconnaissance relating to metallic minerals. In western Newfoundland there is examination of chromite deposits. At Terrenceville there is a continuation of geological mapping. In Ungava there is a detailed examination of the iron belt. At Willbob lake there is continuation of one-mile mapping of the iron belt, and the same at Griffis lake. At Grand Falls there is four-mile mapping of the iron belt.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Is the minister familiar with the bill recently introduced in the provincial legislature which would turn over to a corporation all the natural resources still ungranted? Will that affect the geological surveys the government is carrying on?

Mr. Prudham: I am not aware of the situation referred to by the hon. member, but it would not affect our surveys.

Mr. Sinnott: Would the minister be good enough to give us the location of the surveys in Manitoba?

Mr. Prudham: In southwestern Manitoba, continuation of four-mile mapping of drift cover and study of ground water resources; at Cranberry Portage, one-mile mapping of metal bearing areas, and the same at Elbow lake; at Churchill, stratigraphic studies relating to oil and gas, and the same at lake Winnipeg.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Who determines the areas to be studied by the geological parties? On previous occasions I have brought up this matter, and I am wondering why no party is investigating the west side of Placentia bay, which is highly mineralized and which has been recommended to Mr. Howse on many occasions for that purpose. I believe recently the premier of Newfoundland has become interested; still we cannot get a geological survey there. I wonder if the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo could use his influence with the government to have a party sent there. For many years crown grants have been made to people who have worked mines in that area, but without good geological reports it is impossible to properly develop them. I wish the government would give consideration to placing a party in that field soon.

Mr. Prudham: These survey programs are always planned in co-ordination with the provinces so there will be no overlapping.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): That would be with Mr. Howse down there?

Mr. Prudham: That is right.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Then I take it Mr. Howse has not recommended that any survey party should go to that area.

Mr. Prudham: We usually accept his recommendations, but we do not necessarily act in all cases on the recommendations of the provincial governments.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Can the minister say whether Mr. Howse has made any recommendation that a party should survey that area?

Mr. Prudham: We have not that information.

Mr. Riley: Would the minister let us know the location of the proposed surveys in New Brunswick this year?

Mr. Prudham: At Woodstock, one-mile mapping of metallic minerals and manganese deposits; at Bathurst, the same; at Fredericton, mapping of the drift mantle.

Mr. Follwell: I understood the minister to say there would be six geological survey groups in Ontario. Would he tell the committee where they will be operating and what they will be doing?

Mr. Prudham: The geological survey parties in Ontario will be working in the Ottawa area, survey of ground water resources; southwestern Ontario, stratigraphic studies relating to oil and gas; the same in the Niagara escarpment; in southwestern Ontario, collection of data on oil and gas wells; at Rice lake, continuation of mapping of the drift mantle.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): There are three such parties in Nova Scotia. The minister has given the particulars for the other provinces; I would like them for Nova Scotia.

Mr. Prudham: At Sydney, detailed study of the coal field; at Truro, one-mile mapping of industrial mineral area; at Stewiacke, mapping of drift mantle.

Mr. Fraser: A moment ago the minister mentioned Rice lake. Is that Rice lake, Ontario?

Mr. Prudham: Yes.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Is any aerial magnetometer surveying going on in Newfoundland this year under the auspices of the federal parties?

Mr. Prudham: No magnetometer survey work is planned for Newfoundland this year. The department has only one plane equipped for that purpose, and it is being used in areas where it is thought that strategic metals may be found.

Mr. Adamson: I was interested and pleased, I may say, to see that the department is doing so much work in connection with our ground water resources. I assume it is preparing water tables of certain areas of Canada. Having in mind the chronic water shortage in large areas of the United States, has the minister any information on the extent of the ground water resources and the lowering of the water tables in the prairie provinces and in southwestern Ontario? I know that the water table is going down, and it is causing some concern in certain areas. Is this condition general, and is the department in any way concerned over the destruction of our essential ground water resources?

Mr. Prudham: Our department is carrying out a study of the water resources, chiefly in Ontario and the prairie provinces. This action is taken in co-operation with the provinces, so there is no overlapping of such work.

Mr. Adamson: I know that the province is doing that work. As a matter of fact, I have some friends actually engaged in the ground water surveys at the present time. Is any information available? Are the ground water levels dropping? Is there any concern about our essential ground water resources? After all agriculture, and as a matter of fact life itself, depends on water. It is one of the most serious questions today in the Pacific coast area of the United States, particularly California. The destruction of the ground water resources in that area seriously jeopardizes the whole population.

Mr. Prudham: It is only within the last few years that we have started this type of survey. So far it has been conducted only in certain districts, and I have not got the complete results here. I can say that certain industrial areas are becoming concerned about the water supply, and the results of our survey show that they have reason to be worried.

Mr. Adamson: That is exactly the information which I believe the country should have before we reach the stage of a chronic lack of water. What does the department intend to recommend? Where are the districts which are already showing shortages of ground water? Has the government, through the department, any suggestions for the preservation of this source of life? Large areas in the world have been destroyed through the destruction of the ground water reserves. I do not think anything could be more important than this work that the department is doing.

Mr. Balcom: Can the minister tell me whether any surveys have been made in Nova Scotia?

Mr. Prudham: In relation to water?

Mr. Balcom: Yes.

Mr. Prudham: No, there have been no surveys in Nova Scotia.

Mr. Adamson: Has any work been done on the Peel plain and the interlobate moraine in Ontario?

Mr. Prudham: Not specifically, Mr. Chairman. At the present time we are endeavouring to train a competent staff, and probably next year we shall be asking for a bigger vote for this purpose. I hope the hon. member will remember it at that time.

Mr. Adamson: I shall certainly support the minister. He mentioned some areas in which there is already a shortage of ground water. Can he say where those areas are? I believe it is important, particularly in planning defence construction. If a defence plant were built in a district in which you are going to have a shortage of ground water, you are going to add a tremendous burden of expense in the operation of that plant, in connection with housing and other ancillary operations. Can the minister say where there is a shortage of ground water at the moment?

Mr. Prudham: I am not prepared to say where there is a shortage. There is a special study being made of the Montreal area and the Ottawa area this year. The results are not yet known.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I should like to have a statement from the minister with respect to the enormous iron ore bodies in Labrador. I understand there is one survey party making an examination of those ore bodies. What progress has been made, and what progress has been made in surveying the enormous ore deposits at Steep Rock in western Ontario?

Mr. Prudham: The department is making a study of the area, and making maps. We are working closely with the companies that are engaged in the development work there. The Ontario department of mines is carrying on a geological study of the Steep Rock area.

[Mr. Adamson.]

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Where do the minister's department and staff co-ordinate or overlap with the provincial departments of mines? Most of the provinces have mining departments of their own. He states he works in co-ordination with them, but where does the primary responsibility rest?

Mr. Prudham: That work is co-ordinated through committees that are set up. There is what is called a provincial mines ministers' conference. In some cases the provinces ask our department to make a general survey, and they carry out detailed studies of the ore bodies.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): Has the minister's department made a complete survey showing the tonnage of iron ore in the Labrador area and in the Steep Rock deposits? Has there been an estimate of the tonnage in those respective districts?

Mr. Prudham: This department does not carry out any drilling or any work that would prove up tonnages, but we do record the information that is gathered by the companies doing the development work.

Mr. Adamson: What about the geophysical work that is carried out under this item? How many of these survey parties are conducting geophysical surveys? I mention this, Mr. Chairman, because the modern method of prospecting is through the discovery of what are known as anomalies which are discovered by geophysical methods. They do not show that there is an ore body or they do not show that there is any particular type of ore there; but they certainly show that there is an alteration of the density of the rock underground and show a contact zone between the two different kinds of rocks which is generally a host condition to ore of various kinds. For instance, Lynn Lake I think was initially discovered almost entirely through geophysical methods. It is a method that is being perfected or is being largely developed by Canadian engineers and Canadian scientists. What are the department doing along geophysical lines and what are they doing with regard to geophysical work from the air?

Mr. Prudham: We have only one airborne magnetometer. As to Lynn Lake, I think the hon. member is mistaken. That survey work was done by ground work.

Mr. Adamson: Yes; but it was geophysical work.

Mr. Prudham: We hope to have our airborne magnetometer working in the eastern townships this year. We still have to depend upon a supplementary estimate if we put it to work.

Item agreed to.

Surveys and mapping branch—

228. Surveys and mapping branch administration, $39,255.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to ask the minister if he has any parties working on this work in Labrador this year.

Mr. Prudham: In Newfoundland we have a party working on a one-mile topographical survey in the Avalon peninsula southeast; a one-mile topographical in the Avalon peninsula southwest and also in the Harbour Grace district.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Has the minister anything in Labrador?

Mr. Prudham: In Quebec, New Brunswick and Newfoundland we have a one-mile topographical survey as a helicopter operation. We have a geodetic survey doing triangulation work in the Knob lake area, from Knob lake iron area to Fort Chimo and also an exploratory party establishing control areas in the Ungava peninsula.

Mr. Sinnott: It is definitely known that in the lake Dubonnet, Bird river and Cat lake area, there are large deposits of minerals. I should like to ask the minister if he will investigate and have this matter brought to the attention of the officials during this coming year?

Mr. Prudham: I think the mineral my hon. friend refers to is spodumene. At the present time, at the mines, branch experiments are being carried on with the mineral to determine its content.

Mr. Sinnott: There is plenty of nickel, copper and zinc in the same area.

Item agreed to.

Topographical surveys, including expenses of the Canadian board on geographical names—

229. Administration, operation and maintenance, $1,367,946.

Mr. Adamson: This is the topographical survey as distinguished from the geological survey. This is the survey giving the physical outline of the country. I should like to know how much of the country is mapped. A minute ago the minister said that apparently there was some distinction as to jurisdiction between the provinces and the Northwest Territories, and that the Minister of Resources and Development had the Northwest Territories and that the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys had the provinces. At least that is what I gathered from his remarks. I assume that this topographical survey is being done eight miles to the inch, and that it is being done by aerial photographs. I should like to know how this is co-ordinated with the detailed maps of the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Prudham: The army survey establishment works co-operatively with the topographical survey. So far as this work is concerned, there are no provincial boundaries.

Mr. Adamson: Therefore you map the Northwest Territories through this survey?

Mr. Prudham: Yes.

Mr. Adamson: How far north have the maps been completed so far?

Mr. Prudham: So far, only in the Yellowknife area and in certain blocks north and northeast of the Yellowknife area.

Mr. Adamson: You followed the Mackenzie river and other water courses. Have you plotted river basins and drainage areas or have you plotted the northern limit of trees and the northern limit of certain types of vegetation?

Mr. Prudham: The whole area has been mapped by air photography but larger scale maps only have been produced so far in the areas that are highly mineralized and are likely to be available for immediate development.

Mr. Adamson: Those are topographical maps?

Mr. Prudham: Yes.

Mr. Adamson: And the maps are at the present time eight miles to the inch or four miles to the inch?

Mr. Prudham: Four miles to the inch.

Mr. Adamson: And it is the intention of the department to map an inch to the mile?

Mr. Prudham: Yes; in mineralized areas.

Item agreed to.

Canadian hydrographic service, including Canada's annual contribution of $5,750 to the international hydrographic bureau—

231. Administration, operation and maintenance, $1,575,902.

Mr. Follwell: I should like to ask the minister what is planned with regard to hydrographic surveys this year and how many boats will be used.

Mr. Prudham: The projects for this year are as follows: charting Newfoundland and Labrador by the ship Acadia; charting Newfoundland and gulf of St. Lawrence by the ship Cartier; charting Newfoundland and Nova Scotia by the ship Fort Frances; charting Newfoundland and Nova Scotia by the ship Kapuskasing; charting Hudson strait and Labrador by a chartered vessel; charting British Columbia by the William J. Stewart; charting British Columbia by the Parry; charting the great lakes by the ship Bayfield.

Mr. Adamson: Have we a contour map of the ocean shelf along the Grand Banks? I mention this because the United States hydrographic board have recently intensified their work mapping the coastal shelf, particularly the Atlantic coastal shelf. Are we co-operating with them and mapping this shelf on a joint basis? Is there any work being done on the southern limit of perma frost? Will that come out of this item? Are we doing any work particularly along the shores of Hudson bay?

Mr. Prudham: Our department has not done any work in that area in recent years, but the joint defence planning board—I think that is the name—of the United States and Canada have a long range program. I believe that the United States navy are carrying on some work in that area at the present time.

Mr. Adamson: Does the minister's department co-operate with the United States navy and carry on joint surveys of the ocean shelf? It is very important not only from the defence point of view and the fishery point of view, but its importance is becoming more and more realized as the years go by, particularly with regard to the shore shelf of the oceans surrounding Canada.

Mr. Prudham: There is no official joint program, but there is a long range general program, and there is close co-operation between the two.

Mr. Adamson: I do not know whether it would come under this item but does the minister do anything with regard to the southern limit of perma frost and the depth of perma frost surrounding Hudson bay? Have any drillings been made with regard to the depth of perma frost, the intensity of perma frost and the southern limit of it on the continent? I realize that it is a comparatively new study, but it is one of the most important investigations that we can make.

Mr. Prudham: Both the geological survey and the dominion observatories are carrying out studies on perma frost this year. There is an investigation being carried on at Resolute bay.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Prudham.]

Canadian hydrographic service—

232. Construction or acquisition of new equipment, $168,916.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): What is this appropriation for? I cannot help noticing, and I suppose other hon. members as well, that a great many votes are being asked for for construction or acquisition of new equipment. I mentioned one earlier. Just recently we called item 230, which had to do with the same subject, and hon. members on the other side of the house called "carried". I notice that some hon. members over there are more interested in having it carried than in obtaining information. I do not think anyone in the committee is disposed to hold up this minister's estimates, but when item 230 was carried it provided for $134,000 for the construction or acquisition of new equipment. The item which we have now called is for the construction or acquisition of new equipment and the amount is $168,916. Down below we have another item, item 237, which is for construction or acquisition of new equipment, and the amount is $135,335. Will the minister give some explanation of these large expenditures following other expenditures and probably others in previous years? Where are these acquisitions stored? What does the total amount to? I assume a tabulation is produced each year and kept by the department, and an inventory is kept, and the material is properly looked after, and not left out in the weather as we have heard happens with machinery that is purchased in the western provinces. We have heard complaints that farm machinery is purchased out there and allowed to be exposed to the weather and deteriorate. Can the minister give the committee some information?

Mr. Prudham: The item of construction and acquisition of new equipment is charged to each branch in the department, each being a separate item. This particular item, 232, has to do with Canadian hydrographic service. This vote is to provide mainly for the acquisition of equipment required for the charting of Canadian coastal and inland navigable waters, the investigation of tides and currents, and the preparation of plans and specifications for a new hydrographic ship for northern waters.

We had that item in the estimates this year, a vote of some two million dollars for a new ship which is very badly needed, but in the interests of economy we were asked to take it out of the estimates. We did. An item was left in the estimates for the preparation of the plans for that ship so that we can proceed when the money is available.

Item agreed to.

235. Legal surveys and aeronautical charts, administration, operation and maintenance, including a grant of $350 to the Canadian Institute of Surveying, and the expenses of the board of examiners for dominion land surveyors and payment of fees of B. W. Waugh, J. L. Rannie and J. E. R. Ross, members of the board, and A. W. Cole, secretary of the board, $548,907.

Mr. Fraser: Can the minister give us a little more detail here, because we have legal surveys and aeronautical charts? Then we have administration, operation, maintenance, and then we have fees. I should like to have it split up so that we shall know what it is.

Mr. Prudham: This vote is for legal surveys and aeronautical charts, including a grant of $350 to assist in printing the publication of the Canadian Institute of Surveying and Photogrammetry and $4,250 to cover the fees and other expenses of the board of examiners for dominion land surveyors.

The purpose of this vote is to maintain the legal surveys and aeronautical charts division which undertakes all legal surveys of crown lands in the Yukon and Northwest Territories, of national parks, and Indian reserves, and legal surveys required by the departments of the government of Canada; the preparation of electoral district maps; the plotting, preparing and maintenance of aeronautical charts of all kinds for civil and military purposes; the preparation of air flight manuals; the maintenance of a central distributing agency for charts, maps, plans and technical publications, and the maintenance of the central office for indexing, filing and recording survey returns and plans and supplying information from them. This vote also includes provision for the fees and expenses of the board of examiners for dominion land surveyors. In previous years this was a separate vote.

Mr. Fraser: That is the reason I asked it.

Item agreed to.

Map compilation and reproduction—

237. Construction or acquisition of new equipment, $135,335.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): We have the same item here again. What is it for? The minister did not answer my last question. What becomes of the machinery after it is acquired by the department from year to year? Is it kept under proper care and is an inventory taken from year to year? I am not going into what has been voted under this item in previous years as it runs into enormous sums for the acquisition of machinery, and so on.

Mr. Prudham: Because of national defence requirements and a general increase in our survey program, there has been an enormous increase in our mapping programs. This vote provides for the acquisition of map reproduction equipment. Because existing government map producing plants have proved to be inadequate in keeping pace with the demand for maps for civil and military purposes, and because they lack the facilities to produce the type of maps required today, consideration has been given to setting up a modern map production unit to handle all government map printing. With this end in view, the services of an independent expert on map printing were retained to make a survey of existing facilities and to make recommendations for an adequate plant. His report has been received and in it he recommends the equipment which should be acquired to bring about the desired improvement in map reproduction. The amount submitted in this vote is for the purchase of this new equipment.

I can assure the hon. gentleman that this equipment is well cared for. It is kept in central warehouses in various areas where it can best be distributed to the survey parties in the field.

Mr. Black (Cumberland): What is the total investment in machinery and equipment under this heading?

Mr. Prudham: I am sorry, but we have not a complete up-to-date inventory.

Item agreed to.

Geographical branch—

238. Geographical branch—administration, operation and maintenance, $240,711.

Mr. Adamson: Does the department co-operate with the American geographical society, which is probably the world's finest mapmaker. The present head of this society is a Canadian, which prompts my question.

Mr. Prudham: I understand that the geographical societies of Canada and the United States are private societies. There is no direct co-operation or co-ordination between our branch and those societies.

Item agreed to.

B—Dominion coal board—

243. Administration and investigations of the dominion coal board, $108,685.

Mr. Hansell: Are there any signs of large developments in the coal-mining area west of Okotoks and High River in the Priddis area, and south in Alberta? I am not asking that developments be carried on there because I know that a strip mine is turning out fairly good coal, but I do believe the possible development of this area has been somewhat over-expressed. The story has gone out that great things are about to happen in that area and I should like the minister to tell us if that is so. I am inclined to think that that expectation is without very much hope.

People have been induced to invest money when perhaps the investment will not be to their benefit, at least for a long time. I do not know whether the minister has any information, but I think it is important that people should know whether they can expect any great developments if they invest their money. I recall two years ago a man came to me and said that a railroad was to be built into this area within sixty days. I said, "I am not a betting man, but I do not like the truth to be misrepresented. I am willing to bet you $100 that there will not be a tie or piece of machinery in there within the next six months, let alone the next sixty days". He said he had inside information. I said, "I do not care what information you have, put up your hundred bucks". He did not put up his hundred bucks, but I happen to know that others did put money in and, I am afraid, lost it. That is why I am asking the minister if he can state whether there is any expectation of great commercial development in that area.

Mr. Prudham: I have no information and I do not know of any prospective development.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Black (Cumberland): I think we have made pretty good progress. This item is of importance to all Canada and I do not think we should rush it through. I have no criticism to offer of the work done by this board over the years; on the contrary, I pay it a great tribute for the work it has done in connection with the development of our coal areas.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we will give third reading to Bill No. 381, to amend the National Housing Act; then Bill 390, respecting grants to municipalities; Bill No. 376, to authorize the Canadian National Railways to construct a railway from Sherridon to Lynn lake; Bill No. 392, respecting the Canadian National Railways and to provide for the refunding of financial obligations; and Bill No. 393, to authorize the Minister of Finance to meet certain capital expenditures and capital indebtedness of the Canadian National Railway system. We will afterward move to go into committee of supply and consider the estimates of finance, public works and secretary of state.

Mr. Fleming: In that order?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Finance will be first.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, June 20, 1951

The house met at eleven o'clock.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

EXEMPTIONS UNDER PROVISIONS OF SECTION 133A

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I wish to table a report showing certain cases in which ships were exempted under the provisions of section 133A of the Canada Shipping Act, 1934, from the obligation of carrying certificated masters, mates and engineers.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Ottawa, June 16, 1951

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Robert Taschereau, a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, acting as Deputy of His Excellency the Administrator, will proceed to the Senate chamber on Wednesday, the 20th June, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
sir,
Your obedient servant,

J. F. Delaute
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION—CONTRACTS IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Browne (St. John's West):

1. What contracts have been made in Newfoundland since April 1, 1949, by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation?

2. What are the details of the contracts, including nature and amount of same, whether tenders were called for, and if contractors are to be compensated by fixed fee, percentage or otherwise?

PRINTING CONTRACTS LET BY KING'S PRINTER—USE OF UNION LABEL

Mr. Knowles:

1. To what private firms were printing contracts let by the king's printer during each of the years 1948, 1949 and 1950?

2. What was the amount of printing, by dollar value, let to each of the above firms during each of the above years?

3. Which of the above printing firms are authorized to use the union label of an allied printing trades council?

Mr. Bradley: Return tabled.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CORRESPONDENCE WITH MING SUNG INDUSTRIAL COMPANY AND DAVIE SHIPBUILDING COMPANY

Mr. Green (for Mr. Diefenbaker):

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, and other communications since January 1, 1949, and to date, in connection with the nine ships built for the Ming Sung Industrial Company Limited and/or its Canadian subsidiary, by the St. Lawrence Metal and Marine Works and Davie shipbuilding company, which have passed between the government of Canada and (1) the said Ming Sung Industrial Company Limited and/or its Canadian subsidiary or on behalf of either of said companies; (2) the Davie shipbuilding company, or any of its officers or other persons on its behalf.

Mr. Abbott: The hon. member is not in his seat, and I wonder if the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra would mind letting this stand. I wanted to have a word with the mover about it.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

MING SUNG INDUSTRIAL COMPANY—CORRESPONDENCE WITH GOVERNMENT OF HONG KONG

Mr. Green (for Mr. Diefenbaker):

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, and other communications which, since January 1, 1949, and date hereof, have passed between any department of the government of Canada and any official of the government of Hong Kong, relating to exemptions granted to the Ming Sung Industrial Company Limited, under both the Canadian and British shipping acts of the said company.

Mr. Lesage: I would ask that this stand for the same reasons.

Mr. Green: I am moving it for the hon. member for Lake Centre.

Mr. Howe: This will take a considerable time to answer. Some of the correspondence, of course, is in Hong Kong. If the matter could be permitted to stand until we can discuss it with the mover, I think time would be saved.

Mr. Drew: This is a request for correspondence in regard to a specific subject. It will be noted that a short time ago it was possible to get a letter back from Hong Kong within a few days, demonstrating the facilities afforded now by air service. Certainly the correspondence here could be tabled. In any event, the only correspondence this government could table is correspondence under its own control. I believe that this could be proceeded with without the necessity for any delay.

Mr. St. Laurent: The hon. member perhaps will recall that that correspondence is usually in the form of cipher telegrams, and could not be produced in the text because that would give clues that would be helpful in breaking down the cipher. Correspondence with the government of another country is not produced without the consent of that government, and that consent would have to be obtained. I do not think it is unreasonable to ask that this stand for twenty-four hours until we can see just what correspondence there is here, and what paraphrasing it might be necessary to do to avoid giving clues that might be of assistance in breaking down the cipher.

Mr. Drew: If it is a matter of twenty-four hours, that is reasonable. But some of these delays, as indicated by other questions on the order paper of a similar kind, take many weeks, and that was what I had in mind. Certainly I would concur in the suggestion that this matter be allowed to stand for twenty-four hours.

Since the question has been raised at this particular point, Mr. Speaker, perhaps it might be appropriate if on a question of privilege I refer to a report that has been tabled. As I understood the answer given last Friday night by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier), it was to the effect that their records showed that the masters of all the ships were Chinese. I find that it appears quite clearly that this is not the case, because the master of the Yen Men is shown by the report now tabled as P. Hanisch. I do not think that is a Chinese name.

Mr. Abbott: How do you know?

Mr. Drew: I suggest it sounds more like a Russian name than a Chinese name.

Mr. St. Laurent: We are much obliged for the expert opinion.

Mr. Abbott: There is no privilege in this.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The next notice of motion—

Mr. Drew: I am sorry, sir; I thought you were calling "order" because you were going to raise some point. I believe there is a question of privilege here. I raised it not only as a question of privilege but as a matter of major public importance. The rules are quite clear with regard to the introduction of a discussion of this kind at this point in the proceedings.

Mr. St. Laurent: I do not think the Speaker can stand for that.

Mr. Speaker: I am not so sure that the rules are so clear in regard to that, but I do think the leader of the opposition should be allowed to make a brief statement on the question of privilege.

Mr. Drew: I was pointing out that in addition to the question of privilege, there is the other matter. In view of the fact that we have had certain rules clarified during this session I would point out that nearly every day some minister of the crown, whose position is no higher that that of the leader of the opposition in regard to the introduction of subjects in the house—

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Drew: You will find that by practice the leader of the opposition is granted the same privilege in introducing subjects for discussion. I am not now referring to motions or other such matters having to do with the business of the house; but the practice is quite clear that where questions of importance are raised the leader of the opposition may appropriately reply to them. There is also the fact that on matters of major public importance, I think the rules will indicate—I am not going to argue it now—that a subject may be introduced under the general acceptance of the proposition that under our system, with government on one side and opposition on the other, the leader of the opposition should be granted an opportunity of expressing his views, not merely by way of question but by way of statement. I make that observation now in the hope it may be given consideration at some other time.

I am bringing this subject forward in regard to the explanation that was given for permitting these ships to have this special exemption from the Canada Shipping Act.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I believe I should point out to the house that it is not in order for a member of the government or the leader of the opposition, on the order for motions, to raise questions which are likely to be controversial and to be debated at the time. The only matters that are allowed to be introduced are statements upon which the house will enter into a debate at a later date. There has been a practice that when important statements are made by a member of the government, the leader of the opposition and the leaders of the two other groups are allowed to make brief statements. I do not think the matter which the leader of the opposition is discussing at the present time is in order, because it is of necessity a controversial issue and will result in a debate. But I did say, and I am standing by my former ruling, that I feel I should allow the leader of the opposition to make a brief statement at this time as a question of privilege.

Mr. Drew: I did indicate that I was raising it, Mr. Speaker, because I thought it was proper following the other matter. I should be happy to defer it until the orders of the day are called, but with your permission I will simply refer to it in the hope that some further explanation may be obtained as to the reason for the relaxation of this important regulation concerning those who may be masters, mates or engineers on ships under Canadian registry. It is stated that no British subjects with proper certificates of competency were available for employment. I would hope that later today the Minister of Transport will indicate to this house what evidence he has that there were no Canadians or British subjects with proper certificates of competency to handle these ships before this unusual exemption was given.

Mr. Chevrier: I believe I indicated the reason for that in the earlier debate. I stated that information was received from Hong Kong to the effect that no British officers, engineers or mates were available for service on these ships; that was the reason for recommending the exemption under section 133A.

Motion stands.

MING SUNG INDUSTRIAL COMPANY—MORTGAGE ON DAVIE SHIPYARD

Mr. Fulton:

For a copy of the mortgage between George T. Davie and Sons, Limited, and the government, on the Davie yard, referred to by the Minister of Trade and Commerce as reported in Hansard for April 7, 1949, at page 2430.

MING SUNG INDUSTRIAL COMPANY—DIRECTIVE OF CABINET COUNCIL AUTHORIZING EXEMPTION FROM PROVISIONS OF SHIPPING ACT

Mr. Green (for Mr. Diefenbaker):

For a copy of the directive of the cabinet council, March or April, 1950, which authorized the exemption of the Ming Sung Company, in respect of five ships, from the provisions of the Canada Shipping Act.

Mr. St. Laurent: The government cannot consent to this motion, for many reasons. One results from the express terms of the oath of office of the members of the privy council. It reads in part as follows:

> You do solemnly promise and swear that you will serve His Majesty truly and faithfully in the place of his council in this His Majesty's Dominion of Canada; you will keep close and secret all such matters as shall be treated, debated and resolved on in privy council, without publishing or disclosing the same or any part thereof, by word, writing, or any otherwise to any person out of the same council, but to such only as be of the council . . .

That is a part of the oath of office. Now, this motion calls for a copy of a directive of the cabinet council of March or April, 1950. The Minister of Transport stated in debate the other night that there had been an oral directive. Whether or not it is proper to call it a directive is a matter which might be discussed. What happens is that when a minister of the crown has, by statute, the power to do a certain thing, and it is a mere matter of routine he does not necessarily discuss it with his colleagues. But because his conduct involves the responsibility of all the members of the government, if it is a matter about which he is in any doubt or about which he feels there may be some embarrassment, it is usual for him to discuss it with his colleagues before making his decision. The result of that discussion may be called a directive, or it may be called an opinion. It is an expression of the views of his colleagues upon the manner in which he might exercise the powers that are given to him by statute. Prior to 1940 no memoranda were kept of such discussions or decisions in council. During the war, in 1940, it became the practice to keep memoranda of the discussions in the war committee of the cabinet; and in 1944 or 1945 the practice was started of keeping memoranda of these discussions which took place in cabinet. But these memoranda cannot be published.

When this question was raised I suggested that I might get permission from the administrator not to table them—they certainly could not be published in that way—but to show them confidentially to the leader of the opposition. On consideration, however, it was found that such a procedure would establish a precedent which might some day embarrass whomsoever occupies the office I now occupy, and that it would not be proper to establish precedents which would in any way depart from this constitutional tradition that the matters treated, debated and resolved on in privy council cannot be published to any who are not of the privy council.

Although I do not wish to establish any precedent that would impinge upon that traditional constitutional rule, I think that such information as can be given in confidence to any member of parliament who is desirous of obtaining it, and can be given without violating the express terms of the privy councillor's oath, can be expected to be given. But from the time of confederation up to 1944 there were no memoranda of what took place in these deliberations, and nothing in writing resulted except the recommendations that were put before the governor general and that received his assent.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Before the leader of the opposition speaks, may I remind the house that, under standing order 51, these notices of motion for the production of papers are to be put forthwith without debate. I hope there will be no misunderstanding of the rules. I cannot allow debate. On the other hand, I think I should allow the leader of the opposition to make some reply to what has been said.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, it was because the Prime Minister had carefully explained the reasons that I felt it was appropriate that some comment should be made, because these records establish a precedent in regard to matters of this kind. The Prime Minister has referred to a well-established and reasonable tradition which has been recognized, namely, that discussions in the privy council are indeed privy only to the members of the council itself. In fact, the very word "privy" indicates the nature of those discussions.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

On the other hand, the Prime Minister refers to a change which took place in the procedure some years ago. It was, in fact, Mr. Lloyd George who for the first time permitted anyone outside of the actual membership in the council to be present; and he permitted a secretary of the council to keep the memoranda to which the Prime Minister has referred. There has always been the recognized principle that, until many years afterwards, and the government itself decided that the reasons for secrecy had disappeared, those memoranda would not be disclosed. I point out, however, that there is a distinction to be drawn between disclosure of the discussions which take place in the meetings of the council, and the result of those discussions. I submit that the oath of office to which the Prime Minister has referred is one that applies strictly to the discussions in the meetings of the council, but not to the result of those discussions, upon which some subsequent action may be taken.

In this case we are dealing with a directive which produces a positive result outside of the privy council. It produces a result precisely the same as that produced in other cases by order in council. Most certainly the rules of secrecy referred to by the Prime Minister do not apply to orders in council. That is one of the most clearly established rules that this house has insisted upon recognizing. An order in council is the result of secret discussions which must not be disclosed, but the order in council becomes a functional interpretation of those secret discussions, which then produces action in accordance with those discussions.

This directive under a particular section of the Canada Shipping Act is in precisely the same category and is, I submit, under no greater measure of protection as to secrecy than is an order in council itself. In fact I submit it would produce a highly improper situation if simply by the device of not having a written directive and relying on an oral directive, we were then to be told that we could not know what the considerations were which produced such an extraordinary result as that which followed in this particular case. Here we have a situation where most important provisions of the Canada Shipping Act were waived so that ships could be operated, contrary to those provisions, in distant waters. If this principle is to apply to a directive of that kind, then the terms of secrecy might be extended to all the acts of the government made as a result of discussions in cabinet council, and the house would be left in ignorance with regard to some of the most important things that the government might do.

I therefore suggest that the Prime Minister should reconsider the decision he has made. With regret I wish also to indicate in advance that I would certainly feel that we should vote against any decision which would indicate acceptance of that point of view.

Mr. St. Laurent: I wish to make only a brief reply. The leader of the opposition says —and he is quite right—that orders in council are not covered by the oath of office. They are published, and they are regularly tabled. The practice has now been established of producing every month a summary of the orders in council passed during the previous month.

In connection with these other matters, may I say that the effective act is the act of the minister. When he consults his colleagues beforehand he does so for courtesy reasons, because of the fact that his act will involve the responsibilities of his colleagues; but the official act is the act which he performs as minister, and that act was the exemption which he granted.

The government must insist on its obligation to the crown to maintain secret the decisions made, the opinions expressed and the debates which take place in council, otherwise than through the production of orders in council or the production of the official acts of the individual ministers under the statutory powers they are exercising.

AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRY—EFFECT OF RESTRICTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. F. Brown (Essex West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Defence Production or the Minister of Finance. Would either of those ministers inform the house as to the results of the imposition of credit restrictions in the automobile industry, and whether any further action is contemplated in the immediate future?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I can answer my hon. friend by telling him what the effect of the consumer credit restrictions has been on the automobile industry. These restrictions form a part of the government's anti-inflation program. My own view, for what it is worth, is that what appears to be a falling off in sales in the automobile industry has been due rather to production and purchasing in anticipation of tax increases, or something of the kind, and that for the time being the market is saturated; but that is a matter of personal opinion. There is certainly no intention to make any immediate change in consumer credit restrictions.

Mr. Bryce: I should like to ask a supplementary question to that asked by the hon. member for Essex West. Will sufficient defence contracts be supplied to the automobile firms to keep them fully employed?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): The employment situation in the automobile industry is being obscured by the strike at the Canadian Acme Screw and Gear company. Acme is a principal supplier of parts to the automobile industry, and until the flow of parts is restored, the unemployment situation will not be clear so far as the government is concerned. However, we will endeavour to make defence work available to the automobile industry, as we have to all industry, and we are hopeful that some relief may come through that source.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

THREATENED STRIKE IN WEST COAST SHIPPING INDUSTRY—VANCOUVER ISLAND FRUIT GROWERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of Labour make a statement about the threatened strike in the west coast shipping industry? The fruit growers on Vancouver island depend almost entirely upon shipments by boat and barge.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Our conciliation officers in British Columbia are in close touch with the situation. I shall obtain an up-to-date report and inform the house tomorrow.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

DISTURBANCE AT WAINWRIGHT, ALTA., MILITARY CAMP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence, based upon a report appearing in this morning's Citizen to the effect—

[Mr. Brown (Essex West).]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member should put his question without quoting from the newspaper.

Mr. Fair: Will the Minister of National Defence make a statement as to the disturbance at Wainwright, Alberta, last night, in which some of the recent arrivals at this military camp were involved, and as a result of which the town hall and some of its contents were damaged?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have already received a report on the incident. A disturbance occurred when approximately forty soldiers interfered with members of the Canadian provost corps at Wainwright in connection with the detention of one man. This disturbance was speedily brought under control. Some damage was caused. Personnel concerned are being kept in barracks, and other steps are being taken.

HEALTH INSURANCE

PROPOSALS OF CANADIAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION—QUESTION AS TO GOVERNMENT PARTICIPATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Charles Henry (Rosedale): I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. Has the government given or will it give consideration to government participation in recent proposals of the Canadian Medical Association for national health insurance in Canada?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The hon. member sent me notice of his intention to ask a question, along with some interesting clippings from newspapers concerning the proposals referred to.

The government, as such, has not yet given consideration to these recent proposals, but I know from conversation with them that several members of the government, as Canadian citizens, myself included, have noted with great interest the reports of these proposals, and have welcomed this further evidence of the concern of the medical profession in Canada to increase the efficiency and scope of their assistance to their fellow-citizens in their traditional role of good Samaritans. Their profession, like the other professions, is organized and operates under provincial legislation and, under that legislation, their associations enjoy a large measure of professional autonomy. I think that circumstance is all to the good, and if, in the exercise of that professional autonomy, they can arrange to provide all Canadians with the medical care any of them may require, from time to time, on a prepaid basis, I am sure most of us will feel that also is all to the good. I have no doubt that all levels of government will be most anxious to see them succeed in that undertaking, and to consider with them what part those governments should take in helping to make the plan succeed and extend to the whole population.

Mr. Knowles: Supplementary to the question asked by the hon. member for Rosedale, may I ask the Prime Minister whether the government will consider setting up, either in the fall session or in the session of 1952, a special committee of parliament to go into this question of health insurance?

Mr. St. Laurent: That is something with which we shall have to deal a little later than this morning. I have said that I am sure that all levels of government—and that includes this government as well as others—will be most anxious to do everything they can to make it possible for the medical profession to carry out this undertaking under their autonomous powers. I think that it would be a most happy solution if the medical profession would assume the administration of, and the responsibility for, a scheme that would provide prepaid medical attendance to any Canadian who needed it.

HOUSING

HOME IMPROVEMENTS—QUESTION AS TO PAYMENTS UNDER NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. Earl Catherwood (Haldimand): May I ask the Minister of Resources and Development if the government has given consideration recently to bringing into effect part IV of the National Housing Act authorizing payments for home improvements?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): This matter has received consideration on many occasions, but the government does not believe that the general implementation of the home improvement section of the act would be prudent at this time.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

C. D. HOWE COMPANY LIMITED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Before the orders of the day are called I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State. Yesterday, in his absence, the Prime Minister replied to a question I asked. I would point out to the Secretary of State that on June 14 he indicated that he would make inquiries and endeavour to expedite the bringing down of a return which was ordered on Monday, May 21, in response to a question asked by the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer). Can the Secretary of State indicate when that return will be available?

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State): Could the hon. member give me some indication as to the subject matter?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I am sorry I overlooked bringing this matter to the attention of the Secretary of State. However, I have made inquiries and I find that this return requires the getting of information from the board of grain commissioners. We have not received that information, and that is why the return has been delayed. If the hon. gentleman, speaking for the hon. member for Three Rivers, wishes to have the return filed without the information from the board of grain commissioners, that can be done at once.

Mr. Drew: I welcome the Prime Minister's statement, and would ask that the information available be tabled at once. The information to be obtained from the board of grain commissioners can be tabled when it is received.

Mr. St. Laurent: On that understanding I shall ask that a partial return be prepared and tabled at once, and the other information will be tabled as soon as it is received.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO INTEREST RATES, REPAYMENT OF LOANS, ETC.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development) moved the third reading of Bill No. 381, to amend the National Housing Act, 1944.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, there is just one comment that I wish to make by way of clarification.

I think it is quite evident, in view of the present position of the market, that if loans are to be obtained to assist in house construction under part I of the National Housing Act there will have to be some increase in the prevailing rate. As the act now stands I do not think there is any alternative. But that is no justification for the type of amendments to the act that are contained in this bill.

It has been a feature of the act from its first enactment in 1944 that the rate of interest, which is a most important factor in the whole housing plan, should be established and fixed in the legislation. Parliament is meeting now so frequently and constantly that it would not be difficult to have parliament deal with any changes needed from time to time in so important a matter as the interest rate. There is then no justification for giving to the governor in council this very broad power of fixing the rates prevailing under the various parts and sections of the National Housing Act.

It means that if this bill is adopted and that power given to the governor in council, parliament will not be consulted with reference to any future changes. Parliament will have less and less voice and less and less control in the direction of housing policy and the carrying out of the intent of parliament as reflected in the legislation adopted here.

I indicated yesterday what I thought was a proper perspective of the changes in rate, and that the increase of one-half of one per cent in relation to the whole housing problem would not be nearly as serious a matter as other retrograde steps the government has taken over the past year and a half. I do wish to make it clear that if we are to have loans available under the present scheme, it is obvious, considering the competitive conditions existing today in the mortgage market, that there must be this adjustment of one-half of one per cent. Nevertheless, that is no justification for the type of amendments contained in the bill now being submitted for third reading.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, this bill is objectionable to all realistic people, because the interest rates are altogether too high, and the terms under which loans may be obtained in order to build houses are altogether too difficult. The result is that probably fifty per cent of those who ought to be building houses under this act are unable to do so. I do not see how any conscientious member of parliament can support legislation under which such conditions obtain.

The argument that might be advanced that this bill is necessary because of war conditions, the danger of inflation, and all that sort of thing, might be a bit more impressive but for the fact that similar arguments have been advanced ever since 1946, when the nation became, at least on the surface, free from war. Now the indications are that there is just not going to be anything like adequate provision for building houses for the ordinary man in Canada.

It is argued that this bill is anti-inflationary. I take quite a different view. One of the most important elements in the cost of living at the present time is the cost of shelter. The cost of housing for ordinary people right here in Ottawa is completely prohibitive, at least it is exorbitant and practically prohibitive because it is depriving these people of a great deal of money they should have for other purposes.

So far as I can judge, a person would not be going to extremes if he called a bill like this pro-communist. It is one thing to talk against communism, and another thing to do something about removing the things which breed communism. When one considers the resources we have which could be used to build houses, it is no wonder that people begin to feel disgusted with democracy. They ask what is the matter anyway when a country like Canada, governing itself, is unable to do any better in respect of housing than this government has done in past years—or apparently contemplates doing in the years ahead. A bill like this is inflationary in the broad sense of the term, and it is actually pro-communist because it will create conditions that will breed discontent, which may lead to extreme thoughts such as the communists entertain.

Because of that fact, and because I do not believe any person facing realities can support this legislation, I move:

> That Bill No. 381 be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole, with instructions that they have power so to modify the bill that:
> 1. The building of houses for Canadians shall depend upon the need of Canadians for houses, and their desire and willingness to build houses, limited only by the availability of Canadian resources, material and human, requisite for building houses;
> 2. The availability of financial assistance for building houses shall be governed, not by the willingness or unwillingness of mortgage companies or other lending agencies to lend upon certain terms, but shall be governed by the credit of Canada, the result being that money shall be created and advanced by the Bank of Canada to prospective builders for as long a period as thirty years, if need be, and at interest rates not exceeding one per cent per annum, or at most, actual cost.

I do not think that proposal is in any way extreme. It is time this country began to face its financial matters realistically. It is obvious that the financial system under which we are endeavouring to carry on is breaking down when conditions such as those which obtain in connection with housing prevail throughout the country. Consequently, so far as I can judge, the proposals I make in this amendment are moderate.

In the first place, as I have suggested in the amendment, the Bank of Canada could be used to finance housing in Canada. If it cannot, it is high time the people of Canada knew that fact and were told why it cannot be so used. According to the Bank of Canada Act it is possible for the Bank of Canada to take $1 of gold and upon it to create four one dollar bills, giving those dollar bills an apparent twenty-five per cent gold backing. But that twenty-five per cent gold backing is not effective, to the degree that gold must be surrendered in exchange for that Bank of Canada $1 bill. On April 10, 1933, the gold redemption clause in Canada was suspended by order in council which means that it is utterly impossible for any person to present a $1 Bank of Canada bill and obtain gold for it, or to demand anything for it except another Bank of Canada bill. This means that the apparent gold backing of the bill has no effect whatever on the actual value of that bill, and therefore should have no effect whatever on the limitation of the number of such bills that could be printed.

Then under the Bank Act it is possible for any ordinary bank, say the Bank of Nova Scotia or the Bank of Montreal, to take a $1 bill of the Bank of Canada and legally create $20 of credit upon it. In actual practice they create $10 or $11 of credit. I notice the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) leaving, just when he should be right here. He has a pretty difficult thing to defend, and he cannot defend it.

Just to show that there is nothing extreme in what I have said, that is, that the Bank of Canada can take $1 of gold and print four one dollar bills, and that the ordinary chartered bank can take one of those bills and legally create $20 of credit or in practice $10 or $11, so that legally in Canada it is possible for our banking system, the central bank and the commercial banks working together, to take $1 of gold and expand it to $84 of currency and credit, I am going to read a short extract. Some people may doubt what I say, so to reassure them, I am going to read from a book called "The Canadian Banking System", by Professor James Holladay, the text of which was copyrighted in 1938. I refer to page 140:

> The Bank Act of 1934, however, sets up a specific quantitative reserve which the chartered banks are required to hold against their deposit liabilities. In form, this reserve must consist of a deposit in and notes of the Bank of Canada. In amount, it must be equal to five per cent of the deposit liabilities in Canada. As a result, the chartered banks as a group can legally create deposits amounting to $20 on the basis of a one-dollar reserve. A much larger secondary expansion is made possible, however, for the Bank of Canada is required to hold only a twenty-five per cent reserve against its liabilities, which in turn constitute the reserves of the chartered banks. Consequently, the Bank of Canada can expand a dollar into $4 of liabilities which, if borrowed by the chartered banks, will enable them to lend an aggregate of $80 against a primary deposit of one dollar. This compares with a possible legal expansion of $28.50 under the federal reserve system in vogue in the United States.

In the face of those facts it is fantastic to argue that the banking system of Canada cannot create the money which is necessary to build houses. I propose that the Bank of Canada should create money, and advance it for the purpose of building houses. Just to show that the general philosophy of creating money is completely sound, I should like to refer to the case of the British Bradbury which was used during world war I, right in the midst of the most terrible war mankind had seen up to that time.

When war broke out in August, 1914, the Bank of England found itself in difficulty within a very few days because people were calling for gold, and the supplies were being exhausted at an alarming rate. The bank therefore notified the government that real difficulties were going to develop unless something was done. The British government passed an act called the "Currency and Bank Notes Act of 1914". The first section of this act provides as follows—and I read from a very fine book called "Currency, Credit and the Exchanges," by Dr. William A. Shaw, secretary to His Majesty's treasury. This book was published in 1927. On page 14 it states:

> The treasury may, subject to the provisions of this act, issue currency notes for £1 and for 10s., and those notes shall be current in the United Kingdom in the same manner and to the same extent and as fully as sovereigns and half-sovereigns are current and shall be legal tender in the United Kingdom for the payment of any amount.

In issuing these treasury notes the British treasury created an absolutely new form of currency. May I read from page 15 of this book, "Currency, Credit and the Exchanges":

> At the instigation of the treasury, therefore, the British legislature was consciously instituting a new form of currency. Whence was the idea of such a currency derived? In this matter it is necessary to distinguish. The innovation, whether deliberate or accidental, did not consist in the denomination. One pound notes were well enough known in England as well as in Scotland, for they were issued by the Bank of England from 1797 to 1825. The real innovation consisted in taking away from the banks the right of issue of this emergency currency. The issue of it was reserved to the state, and the banks were employed only as distributors.

Much of the comment to be found on that page of this most excellent book will be worth-while reading for all those who desire to know something about how we may get out of the financial difficulty in which we are now. The new note was called the Bradbury. These Bradbury's were supplied to banks as extra currency which they might use instead of gold, so that in no case would the Bank of England have too great a demand on its supply of gold. The Bradbury displaced gold in Britain's economy during the war. It was used to buy every bit of gold which had been in circulation in England, so that the supply of gold and specie could be used by Britain in her difficult circumstances to buy goods abroad in case she desired so to do.

The amount of Bradbury's which came to be in circulation in Britain, purely as a result of people carrying on their business in a normal way, amounted to £354 million in 1920. Any hon. member can check that on page 38 of the book to which I have been referring. The Bradbury's were backed by the currency note redemption fund which by February 11, 1927, contained £56·25 million of Bank of England notes, £6,300,000 of silver coins together with £231,951,041 of securities that earned between £9 million and £10 million a year for the treasury, which could be used in defraying its expenses.

A very valuable bit of comment upon the whole question of the Bradbury appears on page 66 of this book by William A. Shaw. He says:

> The episode of the British treasury note experiment transcends in importance any other event in the economic experience of the modern world. On the practical side it has emancipated us from the grip of an imperfect gold currency system and of a costly and cruel bank rate system. In comparison with such an achievement the erection of the federal reserve system in the United States is halting and imperfect. But the treasury note episode has not merely this practical value. It has an equally significant import in the domain of theory. By its means we have evolved the true theory of money, and in the light of this theory our currency and banking legislation need no longer be the process of blindfold groping and experimenting which it has been in the past.
> This theory of money rests upon one basic principle—viz., that goods purchase goods. In this axiom the word "goods" is used for brevity's sake as comprehending all economic goods or services which, as possessing economic value, possess thereby exchange value.

In time past this year I have argued on several occasions that it is quite evident that the amount of money whch can be put into circulation in a country depends entirely upon the number of exchanges which the country desires to make, and the amount of goods and services which enable those exchanges to be made, as for instance on April 19, April 30, May 1, May 3, May 22, May 23 and June 4. My position is borne out by the second paragraph of the quotation which I have just read.

Further valuable comment upon the Bradbury is found on page 71 of this book. It says:

> By such a chain of reasoning I think it will be clear that a community's purchasing power is the totality of its exchangeable goods, and that in the case of a paper currency the community's currency is simply a function and not a value or an addition to total values.

This statement would warrant a great deal of careful elaboration and study, but we shall not take the time to do that here. After all, we are talking about housing and how to get the money to finance the housing which this nation needs. Another most valuable comment upon the Bradbury experiment is to be found in the preface to the book, page 5. It is as follows:

> It has solved the century-old problem of an automatic currency control, and has thereby opened up the prospect of a scientific method of credit administration; and in addition it has led to the building of a pattern exchange mechanism, which is peculiarly adaptable to the British empire, and which is instantly realizable if we wish it.

What is being discussed here, Mr. Speaker, is, after all, altogether too profound for some people.

Mr. Abbott: I believe the hon. member is completely out of order on this bill, and that is why I am afraid I have not been paying as close attention to him as I ordinarily would.

Mr. Blackmore: I doubt very much if I am out of order, for the simple reason that I moved the motion at the beginning and I am now discussing that motion. I am quite in order.

Mr. Speaker: I shall have to consider whether the amendment is in order. It did occur to me that the hon. member was discussing general financial questions rather than the principle of this bill. I suggest to him that he complete his remarks as soon as possible.

Mr. Blackmore: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I shall endeavour to do just that. But you realize, sir, that it is one of the most frustrating things in the world for a member of parliament to come into this house year after year after year, representing a nation in which nature abounds with resources, and find the government sitting here twiddling its thumbs and failing to solve the problems which obviously it can solve physically, and pretending that the reason why it cannot solve the problems has to do with finance. If there is anything that could be more appropriate than discussion of finance in connection with the problem of housing, I must say that on the spur of the moment I cannot think of it. However, I will close this discussion promptly.

A valuable comment upon this whole Bradbury experiment, which I believe hon. members who are following me—and a number are—will desire to hear about, is to be found in another book by the same Dr. William A. Shaw, entitled "The Theory and Principles of Central Banking," copyrighted in 1930, after this great student of money had had time to give four years of further study to the whole Bradbury situation.

Since I have referred to Dr. Shaw, I think it would be well for me to give the house some idea just how big a man Dr. Shaw is. In the first place, he is a doctor of letters; he is editor of the calendar of treasury records at His Majesty's public records office; he is the author of "The History of Currency," "English Monetary Writers," "Currency, Credit, and the Exchanges During the Great War," "The Coming Reaction: by Legislator," and so on. I believe those qualifications give everyone justification for listening to his words with at least a moderate amount of attention. May I read a comment in this 1930 volume on the whole Bradbury question; it will be found at page 50:

It was only by accident during the great war that Great Britain stumbled upon the true principles of paper money issues. In the first financial shock caused by the outbreak of war the British treasury offered to the banks the help of an emergency loan currency for which the banks should pay interest. They unanimously declined to avail themselves of such form of relief, and thereupon the treasury offered to sell them currency notes at full face price without limit, and at the same time opened a currency note redemption fund for the purpose of retiring the issue as soon as the need for it was over. To the treasury's surprise the currency note quickly struck root, and proved itself completely acceptable, and gradually the treasury realized that the whole circulation of the country could be changed over to paper and the gold withdrawn. The change-over was accomplished with astonishing ease and speed by 1916. By the restrictions which were later placed on the movement of gold this currency note circulation became virtually inconvertible, though it was not declared so by law until 1925.

To this currency note circulation there was at first no limit fixed. It could fall or rise unhampered, according to the community's demand or need for it, and in the remaining years of the war and of the armistice period it bore the strain of increased prices and enormously increased production without friction or effort. For the first time in history the world had a sample of a truly automatic currency, issued only by the state, sold only at full face value, supplied or retired in complete accordance and response to the community's unfettered demand or need.

After ten years of illuminating experience this perfect, uncontrolled, and uncontrollable automatic currency system was thrown over, the automatic principle was surrendered, and our currency, although declared by law to be inconvertible paper, was placed, or was supposed to be placed, under the control of the Bank of England, and became once again sensitive, or was supposed to be made sensitive, to the vagaries of a fluctuating gold cover fund. Why was this retrograde step taken, and why did England thus throw over the pure theory of currency issue, which she had accidentally discovered and so wonderfully exemplified to the world?

The answer is threefold.

(1) The financial mind of London, both in the treasury and in the city, never assimilated the currency note concept, nor ever grasped the pure theory of currency issue which it exemplified. To this day the assertion is still made that the rise of prices which occurred during the war and armistice period was due to the currency note as an inflationary agent; whereas, in fact, the direct opposite was the case. The rise in prices preceded and caused the increase of the currency, and exactly the same increase of prices occurred in the United States, which was throughout on the freely acting gold standard, as in the United Kingdom under the currency note. It was only on the continent of Europe and in countries where the currency system was neither the free gold system of the United States of America, nor the self-regulating paper system of Great Britain, that price movements occurred of so abnormal a nature as to be attributable to currency inflation.

I am not going to read the remainder of the passage now.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Blackmore: But on page 54—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have allowed the hon. member to read a long extract from the book written by this well-known author. May I suggest to him now that he conclude his remarks.

Mr. Blackmore: Yes, I shall be glad to conclude my remarks.

It may be said that this proposal that I have made would cause inflation. This question has been raised several times. I wish to point out that the supply position in this nation, as I set it forth on June 4 of this year, is good. May I cite as further evidence of that fact a statement which was put on the record by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) as reported at page 4078 of Hansard, the second paragraph of column one, where he says: "There is another matter—." I am not sure that I would be in order in reading that passage.

Mr. Speaker: I doubt if the hon. member would be in order in reading it at this time.

Mr. Blackmore: I will go on to say what he showed. He conveyed the ideas: first, that civilian producers have exceptionally heavy stocks in Canada; second, that these civilian producers are likely to run into consumer resistance; and third, that we can have a flourishing civilian economy. How one can reconcile the danger of inflation from sufficient expansion of currency to build houses for this nation with that statement of the supply position in Canada, I think it is impossible to see. Consequently, Mr. Speaker, I would contend—and I believe on sound grounds—that the proposal that I have made would not cause inflation. I therefore feel that we are justified in supporting the amendment I have made to the motion for third reading of Bill No. 381.

Mr. Speaker: An amendment has been moved by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore). Is there a seconder to his motion? If not, the motion will have to be dropped.

Mr. Low: I will second it.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) seconds the motion, which is as follows:

That Bill No. 381 be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole, with instructions that they have power so to modify the bill that:

1. The building of houses for Canadians shall depend upon the need of Canadians for houses, and their desire and willingness to build houses, limited only by the availability of Canadian resources, material and human, requisite for building houses;

2. The availability of financial assistance for building houses shall be governed, not by the willingness or unwillingness of mortgage companies or other lending agencies to lend upon certain terms, but shall be governed by the credit of Canada, the result being that money shall be created and advanced by the Bank of Canada to prospective builders for as long a period as thirty years, if need be, and at interest rates not exceeding one per cent per annum, or at most, actual cost.

I doubt whether this amendment is in order on third reading of the bill. I would refer hon. members to Beauchesne's third edition, paragraph 710, part of which I shall read:

The question for the third reading is put immediately after the report from the committee of the whole. All amendments which may be moved on a second reading of a bill may be moved on the third reading with the restriction that they cannot deal with any matter which is not contained in the bill.

I shall also read paragraph 711:

When a motion is made "that the bill be now read a third time," the same kind of amendments are permissible as on the second reading, i.e., amendments postponing it for three or six months.

Paragraph 1 of the amendment deals with a matter which, in my opinion, is not contained in the bill. According to the reference which I have read, the amendment must be within the scope of the bill. The first paragraph is not within the scope of the bill.

As to the second paragraph, on a motion for third reading the bill may be sent back for amendment in any particular; that is, for amendment of any clause or clauses of the bill. But it could not be sent back for amendment in such a way as to alter the whole principle of the bill. In my opinion the second paragraph seeks not only to alter the principle of the amending bill which is now before the house, but also to alter the principle of the main act. Such an amendment could not be moved in the house on third reading; that is to say, a motion could not be made that the bill be not read a third time, setting forth the reasons given in the amendment. This being so, in my opinion it could not, on third reading, be sent back to the committee for amendments of this character. Accordingly I must rule the amendment out of order.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Before third reading is given I should like to say just a word. It will not take me too long.

I sat in the house yesterday and heard the speeches that were given on the second reading of this bill. I could not help but draw one conclusion. As I listened to these speeches the minister was reminded of things that he already knew. He was reminded of the importance of housing to the welfare of the family; that housing consisted of a material house, but within the house there lives a family making up what is known as the home. I think we sometimes get confused in our terminology, and perhaps that confusion is designed. We talk of home owners. They do not own homes; they own houses. The home is the institution that lives within the house. Housing is important therefore by reason of the fact that it contributes to the welfare of the home, or it could very easily contribute to the delinquency of family life.

We are told that the three great institutions in the world are the home, the school and the church. We usually say that, and place the home first. When it comes to caring for the welfare of the people in terms of home and family life, the policy of the government is contained within the strict confines of its monetary policy. We cannot do this and we cannot do that. No matter how desirable it is to the welfare of the people, or no matter how physically possible it is, we cannot do it because of some sort of financial restrictions. Therefore I am to conclude—I cannot help but conclude—that the policy of the government is more concerned with the perpetuation of an iniquitous, evil monetary policy or system than it is concerned with the welfare of the people.

I will simply conclude by saying that the financial brains of the government, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) if you want to pool those brains and put them within his skull—

Mr. Noseworthy: There would not be room for them all.

Mr. Hansell: In his monetary policy the Minister of Finance is contributing to the perpetuation and the strengthening of a great Frankenstein that will break itself, and is in the process of breaking itself, and in that process will break the people and the nation; in his financial policy he is just as much a slave to the dictates of that Frankenstein as any slave was to the lash of the taskmaster's whip. I say that, and I am not mincing my words when I say it. It is my profound conclusion that their policy to keep and preserve that Frankenstein is more important to them than the policy of keeping the family and the home and the life of our people intact and building through the homes and the life of our people a great nation.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

THIRD REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. Sarto Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, by leave I would ask that the house revert to routine proceedings.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. gentleman leave?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): I have the honour to present the third report of the special committee appointed to study the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, and amendments thereto.

EXCISE TAX ACT

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 294, to amend the Excise Tax Act. He said: I should like, by leave, to make this motion now in order that the bill may be included in the royal assent which I understand is to be given later this day.

The amendments are in line with similar amendments that were made to the Customs Act, substituting twelve months for six months. I think the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) is aware of the nature of the amendments.

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

MUNICIPAL GRANTS ACT

PROVISION FOR GRANTS TO MUNICIPALITIES IN LIEU OF TAXES ON CROWN PROPERTY

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 390, respecting grants to municipalities.

Mr. Drew: I assume the minister has said all that he proposes to say.

Mr. Abbott: Yes; I indicated on the resolution stage that I would be prepared to make my statement either then or on second reading. It was suggested that I should do it then, and I did so. It will be found at page 4216 of Hansard.

Mr. J. S. Sinnott (Springfield): I wish to say a few words on this bill. Since I was the reeve of a municipality over a period of years I realize the extent of the relief that these municipalities are to receive from the federal government. I take issue with the hon. member who had a few words of complaint about the taxes in the city of Ottawa.

Mr. Gibson: Does the hon. member pay any?

Mr. Sinnott: I am amazed at the complaints coming from the lumber king.

Mr. Gibson: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I may direct a question to the hon. member? Does he pay any taxes in the city of Ottawa? Has he any idea what the taxes are in the city of Ottawa?

Mr. Sinnott: Possibly before I get through the hon. member will know.

Mr. Sinclair: Just contain yourself over there.

Mr. Sinnott: So far as the city of Ottawa is concerned, the hon. member should know that the services rendered ought to be taken into consideration.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I think that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni asked an interesting question. Perhaps the hon. member could tell us whether he pays corporation or other taxes here in Ottawa.

Mr. Croll: He is entitled to make his speech.

Mr. Sinnott: When I get through with my speech, possibly the leader of the opposition will be able to contribute something.

When you own property along Island Park drive or along any of those other millionaire roads paid for by the federal treasury—I understand the roads were built by the federal authority—the roads are policed by a federal department; the grass is cut by a federal department. Members come here to Ottawa to perform a service for their constituents. When they come here I propose to see that they live within their means. However, if they acquire these properties with huge assessments they must know what their taxes will be, if the tax is to be levied in accordance with the assessment. If they can afford to buy these expensive properties, naturally they should suffer the consequences.

I do not think the hon. member meant to begrudge the city of Ottawa a few paltry dollars. Why, a man coming from British Columbia, a man of his type, would consider that little sum of $760 only as pocket change.

An hon. Member: Peanuts.

Mr. Sinnott: Yes, peanuts. He has referred to another member from British Columbia who, while living within his modest means, is taxed at $550. Yet that gentleman does not complain.

Mr. Gibson: What position does he hold?

Mr. Sinnott: These members live in castles, in ivory towers; but when taxes of this kind are imposed they complain. They want to have their assessments lowered, so that they may have the benefit of lower assessments at the expense of the little fellow, the poor man.

I believe the assessment commissioner in Ottawa is efficient, and that assessments are carried out in accordance with proper values. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni would be well advised, if he cannot afford these luxuries, to dispose of his property and to buy another in which he could live within his means.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, this is a bill of some importance. Because of its importance I must express regret that it has been available to hon. members for so short a time. It is now exactly 12.45 o'clock, and this bill has been distributed in the House of Commons for only one hour. I doubt very much if hon. members have had the opportunity to read it.

Mr. Abbott: Its terms are almost identical with those of the order in council which has been in effect for some time.

Mr. Fleming: I obtained a copy of the bill from the distribution office just before coming into the house at eleven o'clock. In a matter of this kind, anxious as we are to co-operate in furthering the business of the house, and always recognizing the difficulty of pushing ahead with legislation in these days when we are sitting long hours, as well as the difficulty of having legislation printed in time for hon. members to review it, the inadequate notice we have had as to the provisions of this bill is most regrettable, measured in the light of its importance.

Yesterday we discussed the general scheme when the resolution was before the house, and I do not propose to retrace that ground at this time. However, in the limited time at my disposal I propose to make a brief review of the contents of the bill, and to offer some observations in regard to it.

I am sure the house will be glad to see a bill dealing with this subject, but I think it will view with disappointment the fact that the bill maintains a rigid formula, and is even more ungenerous toward municipalities than most of us had understood during the discussion on the resolution. After a review of the bill it can only be said that the provision made here for grants to municipalities is not only ungenerous but niggardly.

What is the scheme of the bill? No crown property, no property of any agent of the crown, whether incorporated or otherwise, is submitted to taxation at the hands of a municipality. What is provided here is authority to the minister to make grants within certain very narrow provisions laid down in the bill.

Then, as to the way the scheme seems to work out, one progresses from one limitation to another. In the first place, in reckoning the value of crown-owned property in a municipality, the first thing done by the crown is to eliminate a great deal of such property. The crown eliminates:

(i) real property forming part of an undertaking in respect of the conservation, irrigation, reclamation, rehabilitation or reforestation of land,

(ii) a park, historical site, monument, museum, public library or art gallery,

(iii) an improvement to land or structure that is not a building designed for the shelter of people, plant or movable property,

(iv) real property under the control, management or administration of the national railways as defined in the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act, 1933, or a corporation, company, commission, board or agency established to perform a function or duty on behalf of the government of Canada, or

(v) real property leased by His Majesty to a tenant from whom, by reason of such tenant's interest in that real property, a municipal taxing authority may collect real estate tax.

So we make those five deductions first of all from the value of real property owned by the crown or its agencies in municipalities.

The next such deduction is to remove from the total of crown-owned property, federal property that does not accept from a municipality any service referred to in the following terms: a service that—

(a) the municipality customarily furnishes to real property in the municipality; and

(b) is, in the opinion of the minister, a material service.

That is another far-reaching limitation, because if we take out of the total of federal properties those which have services only in respect of public roads and sidewalks, we have taken out of the category of properties with which the granting provisions of this bill are concerned, a great deal of property.

The third limitation is that the total of all such properties—that is to say, having eliminated all those properties in the sections I have referred to up to the present time, of which there are approximately seven categories—must exceed four per cent of the taxable property of a municipality, including that portion of the crown-owned property remaining after the subtraction of the properties in the seven categories I have mentioned.

So that unless the property survives all those tests there can be no benefit to the municipality whatsoever. But, sir, even at that point there is a fourth limitation that enters into account. It is this: that the minister is under no obligation to accept the valuation placed upon a property by a municipality.

Under this bill he retains virtually unlimited power to set the value that is to be put upon the crown property after reducing it by the elimination of property in the seven categories I have mentioned. Therefore he is going to have a perfectly free hand in establishing the values of crown property.

If the property survives all these limitations, a grant may be made. If you examine the provisions in regard to the grant you will see that in the first place it is not equivalent, even as applied to the limited value of crown property remaining after these various deductions have been made, to the rate of taxation as applied to other property in the municipality. The formula that is applied to determine the grant in lieu of taxes is equivalent to seventy-five per cent of the rate applicable to other property in the municipality.

The sixth hurdle in this sequence is that if the minister still chooses he is not under any obligation to make a grant on the foregoing basis. He may decide instead simply to pay for the services furnished to the crown property. In determining the amount to be fixed for the services, the minister still has a free hand. It is for him to determine what value shall be placed upon the services received or what deductions shall be made from the grant by reason of services that the minister considers the crown does not require at the hands of the municipality.

Then we come to the seventh obstacle in the sequence. Even if some municipality survives these six tests with respect to crown-owned property within its confines, the minister may still refuse to make any grant at all. There is no obligation upon the minister under this bill to make a grant even in those circumstances. The bill specifically and expressly provides that no right is conferred. If any hon. member attaches importance to the words "the minister may . . . out of moneys provided by parliament, make a grant to the municipality" and construes these words as imperative and the equivalent of "shall", I would point out that the draftsman of the bill has taken great care to make it clear that the word "may" means "may" and not "shall".

Mr. Abbott: Quite properly so.

Mr. Fleming: Not only has he stated that no right to a grant is conferred; he has been careful to insert the words "in his discretion".

Mr. Abbott: It has always been perfectly clear that these are ex gratia payments and not payments as of right.

Mr. Fleming: That is perfectly clear in the bill, and the minister made it perfectly clear yesterday that parliament was providing only for ex gratia payments and there would be no compulsion applied to the federal government.

It seems to me that a review of the bill in these stages indicates that the benefits which a few municipalities are going to derive are very limited indeed. This is not an act of generosity on the part of the federal government, because—

Mr. McIlraith: Oh, yes; it is a great improvement.

Mr. Fleming: The hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) says that it is a great improvement. Where is the great improvement? Apparently the hon. member for Ottawa West is a champion of things as they are as applied to municipal assistance from the federal government.

Mr. McIlraith: I am thoroughly familiar with it.

Mr. Fleming: If the hon. member is satisfied with the deal Ottawa is getting today from the federal government in respect to property owned or occupied by the crown in Ottawa, all I have to say to him is that I think Ottawa is not getting a square deal.

Mr. McIlraith: I said it was a great improvement over the old situation.

Mr. Fleming: An improvement over the old arrangement? I should like to see where the improvement lies.

Mr. Abbott: $900,000 worth.

Mr. Fleming: This bill simply purports to put into statutory form the terms of the order in council which hitherto prevailed. Where is the great improvement? I think hon. members who are concerned with the affairs of municipalities in this country, and particularly with the burdens that are cast upon the taxpayers in them by the ownership of property by the federal government, will not be satisfied with the limited help offered by this bill to the municipalities. If the hon. member for Ottawa West is satisfied with this; if he can see a great improvement in it, then I think he is viewing the acts of the federal government in this particular, as is not infrequently the case, through rose-coloured glasses, or indeed through magnifying glasses.

I fail to see where municipalities like Ottawa will be able to see any great improvement in this bill. Just look at the figures to be found in the estimates. Last year the minister budgeted for grants to municipalities, under the order in council which preceded this bill and which has been in effect for the last year or so, in a total of $1,600,000. He is asking the house to approve in this year's estimates a total of $1,800,000, an increase of just $200,000. The figures that he gave us yesterday indicate—

Mr. Abbott: The original estimate was $1,600,000 more than they had been paid before.

Mr. Fleming: Of course it was, but I think the minister had better bestir himself and do something worth while before cackling too loudly over a most inauspicious beginning at extending a measure of belated justice to the municipalities.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. Fleming: I think I can conclude briefly, Mr. Speaker. Prior to the luncheon recess I was stressing the fact that as the bill is drawn it sets up a series of hurdles or obstacles in the way of municipalities qualifying for the grant. The whole emphasis is placed upon the erection of obstacles in the path of municipalities seeking any assistance from the federal government, regardless of the extent to which ownership by the federal government of property located within the municipality reduces the total of assessable property upon which the municipality may levy its needed taxes.

Just prior to the noon recess it was suggested that this represents a great improvement. I take issue with any suggestion that this bill makes any great improvement in the relations between the federal government and the municipalities in reference to the exemptions now enjoyed by this government. It is true that the introduction of this limited method of assistance is some improvement over the system which prevailed prior to 1950, under which the municipalities received nothing; but I think the argument is quite untenable, as one hon. member argued this morning, that this bill represents a great improvement. All that was paid by way of assistance to the municipalities under this grant last year was $1,578,251.13, and by no stretch of the imagination can it be said that there was any very tangible assistance given them. All that is contemplated for the present year is a modest increase to $1,800,000.

I have already indicated that having regard to the extent of federally-owned property in this city, and the very high cost of municipal services, Ottawa is not receiving sufficient assistance from the federal government.

Mr. McIlraith: We agree with that.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. Fleming: I am glad to hear the hon. member say he agrees, because I had a very different impression from his comment this morning, when he praised this legislation as a great improvement.

Mr. McIlraith: It is a great improvement, a wonderful improvement.

Mr. Fleming: I do not think there is anything great about it. If it is an improvement, it is a very modest improvement over an even more modest ancestor.

What is the extent of the assistance? If hon. members will look at the statement at page 4224 of Hansard for Monday, June 18, they will see that the ordinary grants under the four per cent formula, which is now to be carried into this legislation, provided only eighteen municipalities with a total of just $1,389,929.41. Then six western municipalities received grants in lieu of taxes on government grain elevators aggregating $74,186.80. Five municipalities received transitional grants respecting newly acquired properties totalling $1,663.19, and twenty-two municipalities received grants in lieu of special assessments for local improvements amounting to $112,471.73. Those four subtotals make up the grand total of $1,578,-251.13. If that can be called great by any stretch of the imagination, all I have to say is that I do not understand the meaning of the word. I should say that as compared with nothing before, that is a very attenuated attempt at a beginning; and to assert now that, because we are being asked to appropriate $200,000 more this year than was available for these grants last year, that is a great improvement, suggests to me, as I said this morning, that the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) is just viewing this proposal through a magnifying glass.

This bill does not make any attempt to draw certain distinctions which with great respect I think might well be drawn in an approach to a matter of this kind. The four per cent formula, hedged around as it is with such a multiplicity of hurdles and obstacles, is a test that is far too rigid and exacting. I believe there must be some test, some yardstick applied; I do not suggest that the grant should be simply decided by the minister in every case without due regard for some established yardstick. But the yardstick that has been selected here, it seems to me, fails to take account of some aspects of the matter which I think should be taken into consideration.

As I mentioned yesterday, there is the fact that in many cases property owned by the crown in the right of the dominion is not used simply for the purpose of rendering a service to the people of the municipality. In many cases it is put to a revenue-producing use; yet there is no attempt in this bill to recognize that fact. Nor is there any attempt to recognize the fact that frequently a use made of property by an agency of the crown may be directly competitive with the interests of persons who are taxpayers in the municipality. In fairness I should say I believe there is some hope of adjustment there, in that certain of the crown agencies mentioned by the minister yesterday are to be invited by the government to make grants to the municipalities in lieu of taxes. But if you examine the formula by which these crown agencies, whether corporate or otherwise, are to be guided in arriving at the amount of the grant they should make in lieu of taxes, the minister goes no further than to say it is to be fair and reasonable. As a yardstick that is just about as vague as anything could be. Unless the government goes further and lays down the rule that these corporate emanations of the crown should pay, in respect of property owned and occupied by them in these municipalities, the same rate that they would pay if they were private taxpayers, then justice will not be done to the municipalities in respect of those grants.

I cannot find any warrant for some of the other fine distinctions drawn in this bill, especially in the matter of services. The bill rejects services rendered by the municipality by way of building roads and sidewalks, and they do not enter into the calculations of the Minister of Finance in arriving at the grants to municipalities. Surely that is drawing too fine a line; that is grossly unfair to the municipality, especially in the light of the fact that the costs of municipal services have been rising to such prodigious heights in recent years.

One can only express regret, Mr. Speaker, that the emphasis placed in this bill is negative, that the whole stress put upon the bill is upon the negative features and the difficulties put in the way of municipalities seeking to qualify to receive even the modest amounts provided here. The first requirement, it seems to me, is an altogether fresh and realistic approach to the problems of these municipalities. We would like the Minister of Finance to do something to assist at that very important level of government. This bill, I am sorry to say, will contribute very little to the accomplishment of that worthy purpose.

Mr. J. T. Richard (Ottawa East): I shall be brief, Mr. Speaker, but I would not want this house or the people of Canada to think that the people of Ottawa do not appreciate what is being done in this bill, nor on the other hand to believe that they are fully satisfied with what they are receiving. I believe we should put first things first. Some years ago the city of Ottawa was receiving nothing. It was difficult, and it took time, to convince the people at large in the Dominion of Canada and the members in the House of Commons that the municipalities which had public buildings of the government of Canada within their boundaries should receive any special grant. The first grant given to the city of Ottawa was for the sum of $100,000. It was given by means of a vote from year to year, and a few years ago it was raised to $300,000.

Under this formula, which is rather complicated and which is incorporated in a statute, the city of Ottawa has received $962,000 for this year. That is more than three times the amount received in the previous year. The formula was arrived at by mutual understanding. I would not want this house to think there are any serious differences between the assessors of the city of Ottawa and the assessors who act on behalf of the government of Canada. There is, however, one point on which there is disagreement, and that is that the formula allows only seventy-five per cent of the excess over four per cent to be taxable at the public school rate for the city of Ottawa.

Nevertheless under this formula the city of Ottawa is certain of a fixed sum based on the assessment from year to year. I only wanted to point out that if anyone wishes to say this is a niggardly sum or that there has been no improvement, certainly the people of Ottawa do not feel that way. They are looking forward to improvement in the formula, and to an increased grant as the development of the city progresses. There is one thing that should be remembered, and that is that the city of Ottawa also receives some benefits from grants made to the federal district commission. Again there is agreement between the city and the federal district commission. I am sure that the government and the members at large look upon the city of Ottawa as a national capital and will be only too glad to approve this legislation. Perhaps they can improve it, as I have suggested, by making a grant to the full one hundred per cent instead of the seventy-five per cent.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): As I listened to the member for Ottawa East (Mr. Richard) I was reminded of the biblical parable of the poor man who was satisfied with the crumbs that fell from the rich man's table. It would seem to me that his point of view was that of the poor man who was grateful for any crumbs which fell from the rich man's table, even though now those crumbs may seem to be like crusts of bread.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): I am glad you consider a million dollars a crumb.

Mr. Noseworthy: I believe that parable well represents the point of view expressed. Actually in the past that has been very much the position of the municipalities in their relationship to the federal government. In recent years the federal government has been prepared to pass out a few crumbs to the municipalities, and some, not all, of the municipalities have been grateful for those few crumbs.

The thing we have overlooked in this discussion is that Ottawa is not the only city concerned with this bill. In considering the bill I should like to emphasize the note which the member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) struck in his concluding remarks, concerning the importance of government at the municipal level in any democratic system. The tendency here seems to be to underestimate the importance of municipal government. Any services that a municipal government can render to a community should be rendered by the municipality because that government is closest to the people. The further removed any government is from the people, the less efficient that government is likely to be. In a democratic system we must not take any measures that will remove from the municipalities the responsibilities for those phases of government which they can render best.

In recent years the municipalities have found they have not sufficient income to meet many of the responsibilities which are theirs to perform. Their field of taxation is pretty well limited to real property, and is probably the most limited of all levels of government. We saw that in the depression. It was not the federal government or the provincial governments who went into bankruptcy, but scores and scores of municipalities across this country found themselves going into bankruptcy. We, and other individuals, hesitate to render very much aid to education. We still leave the cost of education to be borne largely by municipal governments. There is a fear that, if the federal government put too much money into education, in some way they will have a voice in the curriculum and in the administration of the school system. I should never want to see in this country an educational system whereby all financial responsibility for it was removed from municipal governments. Those countries in which educational costs have been centralized and have been borne entirely by central governments have shown us that there is always a tendency for the local people to lose interest in their schools; and what applies to the school system applies to many of the other services that the municipalities render. My point is that municipal government is so important in a democratic system that we must do nothing to undermine government at that particular level.

In the past it was taken for granted that crown properties should be exempt from taxation. But gradually over the years the federal government has adopted the practice, as I mentioned at first, of giving a few handouts to the municipalities. This bill provides for nothing more than larger handouts by the federal government to the municipalities. The amount that the municipality is to receive in lieu of taxes for federal properties is still largely left to a matter of dickering between the municipality and the federal government. That, I submit, is just not good business practice. There is only one way in which this matter can be handled properly in the interests of the municipality and in the interests of good democratic government. The federal property should be assessed on the same basis as is any other property in the municipality and the federal government should expect to pay municipal taxes on that property on exactly the same basis as does any other property owner in the municipality. If the federal government has reason to believe that the assessment is too high or that it is unfair, it has the opportunity—as has any other taxpayer in the community—of going before a board and there arriving at a fair assessment. So long as the question of payment in lieu of taxation is left as it is, a matter of negotiation between municipalities and the federal government, so long will you have discrimination. You are opening the door there for political patronage on the municipal level, just as we find political patronage existing within other services at the present time.

Government buildings or government offices are placed in certain municipalities, certain towns and cities, because in the opinion of the federal government authorities that is the centre from which those offices can best serve the community, the province or the country at large. As to Ottawa, I do not think Ottawa as a city had a great deal to say about whether or not this should be the national capital. Ottawa was chosen as the national capital because it was felt that this was the one place in Canada that would best serve such a purpose at the time when the selection was made. Whether the hon. member for Ottawa East (Mr. Richard) and other Ottawa members are quite content with the handout that Ottawa gets from year to year—

Mr. McIlraith: He did not say that.

Mr. Noseworthy: —is not a matter of importance. It is neither here nor there as far as the discussion of this bill is concerned. Whether or not the people of Ottawa are satisfied is probably another question. But whether the municipality concerned be Ottawa, Toronto, Montreal or the smallest municipality in this country, I can see no good reason why the federal government should not be required to pay taxes on all federal property, assessed by the same method as are other properties in the municipality.

There was, of course, a day when municipalities thought that there was some advantage in getting a government office or a government building established within the municipality. There were benefits. There are, of course, benefits which accrue to any municipality; but there are also responsibilities and there are also services. It is to the certain advantage of a city or town that any industrial enterprise should be established in that city or town; but because the city or town is going to derive some benefit from the establishment there of the industry or commercial enterprise is no good reason why the citizens of the city or town should give that enterprise property tax-free in perpetuity. That practice is being rapidly abandoned. Cities and towns which in times past sought to attract industrial enterprises by granting exemption from taxation have come to change their point of view; and today the general practice is that even those enterprises which at one time were considered to render to the municipality sufficient service to warrant exemption from taxation are being taxed today. There is an increasing demand that all such properties should bear their fair share of municipal taxation. I think it would be difficult for anyone to give good, sound, logical reasons why the citizens of any particular municipality should be called upon to support a federal government office or building which serves not only the municipality but, in some cases, the country, in other cases the province and in still other cases the surrounding countryside.

There is another feature to be considered. Actually what the government is doing in this bill is merely passing on to the municipalities what they have taken from them by reason of government policy which has led to the present rising cost of living. Within the last year every municipality in this country has had to raise its tax rate because of the rising cost of living which has resulted from this government's policy. Many municipalities have had to step up their tax rate as much as twenty mills owing to the rising costs of material and services. For that this government's policy is to a large extent responsible. In increasing the size of the handout that the government are giving to the municipalities by this bill, they are simply handing back to the municipalities all or part of what they have taken from them as a result of their policy which led to that rising cost of material and general living. In the light of the importance of municipal government, and in fairness to all municipalities, because so long as this present system is followed there is bound to be a certain degree of unfairness as between municipality and municipality, the question of the taxes the federal government should pay on any government piece of property in a municipality should not be left to negotiation so that some municipalities can get a better deal or drive a harder bargain with the federal government than others. It should be on a straight assessment basis, and the federal government pay their taxes as other taxpayers in the country.

Mr. J. L. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): I am glad to see that the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott) is in his seat this afternoon. In his remarks this morning he said something about me which in fairness to other hon. members in the house I think I should answer. Being in a charitable frame of mind this afternoon, I should like to think that his remarks this morning came from the fustian part of his nature instead of being dictated by that keen, analytical financial mind of his which has been so keenly developed during his long term of office as the reeve of the municipality of Brokenhead.

There was only one of his comments that I resented slightly. He suggested that in my remarks on the resolution stage I had complained personally of paying what I considered to be high taxes in the city of Ottawa, and that I had suggested, by inference or in some other way, that they should be unloaded in some manner at the expense of the little fellow. There is only one thing that I can say to him. I have always flattered myself that in a small way I have tried to carry my fair share of whatever burdens came my way; and even if I could not do it I would probably be like the hon. member. I would get out and try to earn enough money at some extramural activities, possibly in the grease business, or something of that kind, which would allow me to maintain my fair share of whatever burden I would be asked to carry.

Mr. Stick: Small town mentality.

Mr. Gibson: In his remarks he referred to the modest little house in which I happen to live on Island Park drive, which he referred to as millionaires' row. I am afraid he does not know his geography in Ottawa very well. Certainly, the one millionaire's row we have here—and he has probably driven around it and seen the great estates—is in Rockcliffe, where the true millionaires of this town live. I gather their taxes are very very low. I think probably he has inadvertently put his finger on one of the main difficulties in the Ottawa taxation situation. It is the fact that our Ottawa city council has seen fit to acquire large sections of adjoining townships and have left out this one very desirable location, which contains people who are able to pay very heavy taxes. They have been left out of the scheme of things here.

That Ottawa has not taken in Rockcliffe is one of the factors contributing to the very high rate of taxation here. I notice that some of the newspapers have mentioned that for the first time a member of parliament from other than Ottawa ridings has taken some interest in the taxation problems of Ottawa. That may be a fair comment, but let me point out to them that I was trying to do a service to the other hon. members here, because after all we as members represent the city of Ottawa as well as our own constituencies. I was trying to point out to the other hon. members that from my own personal experience, and from the experience of other hon. members who have found it necessary to purchase homes in Ottawa, we have suddenly become very conscious of the difficulties with which the taxpayers of Ottawa are faced in meeting this terrifically high municipal taxation that is in effect in this town.

It just appears to me, as I said in my remarks during the discussion on the resolution stage, that Ottawa is in effect, by virtue of the fact that most people living here are civil servants, a company town; and it seems to me that we as members of parliament, and indeed the government, should be very much concerned with the welfare of our employees, just as we would expect any company which was running a company town to be concerned with the welfare of its employees.

I realize that at the present time the government probably has not the power, but I would suggest that it might be a very worthwhile thing for this government to consider asking the citizens of Ottawa or the council of Ottawa whether they would not consider having one of the keener minds on our treasury board associated with them on their board of control. I say that because I feel that they could well use some of the expert financial advice that is given to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) by these experts in their regular capacity.

Mr. Stick: Free of charge.

[Mr. Gibson.]

Mr. Gibson: As I understand, we have a precedent in the town of Yellowknife in the Northwest Territories. We have three representatives on the board there, and I do not think we would be breaking any new ground by trying to make the same arrangement in the city of Ottawa. I would even go further than that. Now that we have this great map in the buildings here showing what Ottawa is eventually to become under the Greber plan, I think it might be an excellent idea for this government to give consideration to the establishment of a federal district here to administer the affairs of this town, much in the same way as is done in the federal district of Columbia. I think there is much more validity for such a suggestion in Ottawa than there is in the district of Columbia. I would suggest that that might very well be done. Under a plan like that it would be possible that the residents of Ottawa would feel that they were being justly treated. Perhaps we would have to establish a tax rate for the residents of the city on a composite basis. We might take towns like Victoria, British Columbia, Regina, Saskatchewan, and Hamilton, Ontario. These are three average towns across Canada. After doing that we could probably set a composite tax rate comparable to theirs that might make the residents of Ottawa feel that they were being fairly treated.

I should like to point this out to the Minister of Finance also, if he feels that we are being fair to the city of Ottawa—I am not going to say that we are not—by giving them $1 million now, or $900,000 and some odd: surely we can go back over the period of years when we gave them only $100,000 and say that if the $900,000 that we are giving them now is fair, when we were giving them $100,000 we were being grossly unfair to them. The city of Ottawa must have a very high bonded indebtedness by virtue of the fact that the federal government was not paying its fair share of the tax burden in this city in those years.

There is another point about this city. I believe that there is far too much taxable land that is tax free in this city. I saw a news item the other day which said that there was a curling club in this city tax free, and a lawn bowling club tax free. I think these are the kind of things that a federal government representative on the board of control, which I suggested, might well look into, and probably try to assist this city in getting itself into shape to give its citizens a tax rate that is comparable to the tax rates of other cities in Canada. I think that the federal government could very well concern itself more directly with the problems of its employees who live in this city of Ottawa.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I think all of us want the city of Ottawa to get its due, and I believe we can agree that it will, so long as the two members representing Ottawa East and Ottawa West hold their present jobs.

But Ottawa is not the only city in Canada. There is Fort William, a city we consider just as modern, just as progressive and just as clean as Ottawa. Those of us in Fort William are going to present this legislation and the speeches supporting it, to our city administrators, so that they may present their case and receive the benefits to be received by other cities in Canada.

Let me pay my tribute to the federal district commission, because I believe they spend their money well. Around these parliament buildings I have never seen a man leaning on his shovel or his hoe, or riding in his wheelbarrow; and on that one occasion each year when we want to use the lawns the federal district commission could not be more courteous. We are grateful to them for that.

I know the city of Ottawa has two sources of revenue in addition to those mentioned by the hon. member for Ottawa East (Mr. Richard). It has the attraction of the House of Commons, so that tourists may visit these buildings, or people from the constituencies may see their members in action. The city has the further advantage of the salaries paid to those who work in these buildings. These people, in their turn, pay taxes, such as those to which references were made by the hon. members for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott) and Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson). Those of us from Fort William believe we should qualify because, in addition to our large customs building, which houses the income tax branch, and the branch of the Department of National Revenue, we have the old post office which has been refitted for income tax purposes, and the large post office which houses the branch of public works, the mounted police and other utilities. We would not be without one of them because we believe they bring in revenue while adding dignity to our city.

I thank the minister for having introduced the legislation. We will be on his track later on.

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the minister and the government upon the principle that will be included in the law of this country when the bill is passed. My colleague from Halifax expressed his views in the matter on Monday, and I should like now to adopt his remarks.

I must say I was surprised by the language of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) in describing the bill, and by his attitude toward the legislation. I understood that the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) was in agreement with him; but perhaps I should not be too surprised by the attitude of the hon. member for York South. Certainly I am as much in disagreement with him as with the hon. member for Eglinton.

Mr. Fleming: Did the hon. member ever sit on a municipal council?

Mr. Dickey: No, I have not. But if the hon. member for Eglinton had any knowledge or appreciation of the difficulties that have faced municipalities this legislation is intended to assist, he would not have taken the attitude he took this afternoon.

Mr. Fraser: The hon. member for Eglinton has had a good deal of municipal experience.

Mr. Dickey: I am sure the hon. member has full knowledge of the very real problem facing all municipalities in this country. It is quite obvious however that he does not have any appreciation of the special problems of municipalities having a high proportion of federal tax-exempt properties within their boundaries.

Mr. Fleming: Like Ottawa.

Mr. Dickey: Yes, and like Halifax and other cities.

Mr. Fleming: I was prepared to give them more than the minister does.

Mr. Dickey: We in Halifax thought that when the federal government a couple of years ago announced the policy of paying special grants in lieu of taxation, a great step forward had been taken. We feel, in addition, that their action in bringing in this legislation and incorporating this principle in a bill to become the law of the country is a further step forward. Certainly I agree with the hon. members for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) and Ottawa East (Mr. Richard) in the remarks they have made concerning the effect of the bill.

The minister, in discussing the matter at the resolution stage, dealt at some length with one of the main points which I shall discuss briefly this afternoon. His observations appear at page 4224 of Hansard where he states that he made it quite clear in his statement of November 14, 1949, which was the original negotiation announcement of this policy, that the crown must reserve to itself the right to establish the valuation. I do not think we can quarrel too much with that statement. The crown naturally would have to take special care to see that valuations of property were done in a fair and reasonable manner. Then he went on to say:

> These are ex gratia payments and, for reasons which I think are fairly obvious, the crown could not put itself entirely in the hands of the local assessors.

I agree with the minister that from the legal point of view these are ex gratia payments, but that is only from the purely legal point of view. As well as being ex gratia, these payments are ex justitia; they are based upon justice and reason.

The minister went on to describe arrangements which would be made for agreement between the federal government and local assessors, and pointed out that in one or two cases, one of which was Halifax, the department had retained outside advisers to assist in coming to a conclusion.

The city of Halifax is appreciative of the efforts made to reach a fair and equitable settlement in the matter, so far as grants to Halifax are concerned. However, I am sure the minister is fully aware that only the first step has been taken. We hope that it is not just the first step and that in the next few years as this legislation becomes more familiar and as we get used to its administration there will be room for adjustments which the cities and municipalities think should be made.

I think the government has been right in drawing up the bill in the way they have. I would point out to the minister that the real test of this legislation will be the manner in which it is administered. I am sure that he will give special attention to matters of that kind which will be coming up in the future.

The hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) suggested that this bill would open the door to political patronage at the municipal level. I do not know just what the hon. member intended to convey by that statement, but certainly the meaning I took from it was quite unpleasant. I am sure that many of the municipalities receiving assistance under this bill will quite properly resent that kind of implication. He said also that these payments were handouts. I want to assure the hon. member that nobody in Halifax, Ottawa or any of the other municipalities that have been faced with these special problems considers these payments to be in any sense handouts. We are not happy to have suggestions of that kind made in this house.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word about this bill and apparently I should govern my remarks by the list that has been presented.

[Mr. Dickey.]

I notice from the list that Halifax is getting $197,394 under this four per cent formula. Being a family man, I appreciate what constitutes a formula. These formulas are put out in little tins, some containing peas, some containing carrots, some containing beans or other things, and they are just about as sensible as this four per cent formula.

Getting down to my own riding, I notice that Maple Ridge receives $53.66 under the four per cent formula, and $126 even under the three and a half per cent formula, which is the smaller tins of peas and beans. I have great sympathy with Halifax but—

Mr. Croll: There is another one for Maple Ridge, $53.66.

Mr. Cruickshank: The hon. member is bringing to my attention the fact that $53.66 is also being paid to Maple Ridge, but I mentioned that. This legislation is mainly due to two hon. members from British Columbia. Some years ago the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) introduced a resolution along these very lines. He is now in a more fortunate position to bring about legislation of this kind. As long as he listens to some of my advice he will help to bring about legislation that may be of assistance.

The other hon. member who has assisted in this is the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). If I understood correctly what he said, he was contending that government properties should be subject to regular assessment and pay taxation at the regular rate. I agree entirely with that. I can see no reason why government property should not be assessed in the normal manner and taxed at the regular rates.

When I first came to Ottawa the grant being made to this city, if I remember correctly, was $100,000. At that time I sat where the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson) now sits. I objected strenuously to that grant being made. But I had the privilege of visiting Washington, the great capital of the United States, and I saw what the forty-eight states had done to build up the capital of that country. I began to realize that Ottawa was not the capital of Ontario, it was the capital of the dominion, and I was ready to agree to an increased grant. I repeat that government properties should be subject to regular assessment and taxation just the same as any other business or residential property.

If this city is the capital of Canada I contend that its form of government should be similar to that of Washington, D.C. I do not want to say anything derogatory about the local government of Ottawa, but I might mention that in Vancouver, the third city of Canada with a population of some 400,000, there are only eight aldermen and no controllers. You would need to be a mathematician or a member of the Department of Finance to keep track of the number of controllers and aldermen in this little town of 135,000 people.

If the people of Canada are to put up the money, as I believe they should, to make this the most beautiful capital on the North American continent, then they should be protected by a form of government similar to that in Washington rather than the present government. Whenever you pick up either the Journal or the Citizen you see where Charlotte and Tardif are quarrelling over a pinball game or something else, and all the time we are putting up the money. I disagree strongly with that idea. I do not care whether Charlotte and Tardif like it or do not like it; if they come out to British Columbia we will show them how to run a great city without government assistance.

I want to come back to these figures. It is easy for the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Dickey) or for the hon. member for Vancouver North—I should correct that and say "Coast-Capilano"; they gave up a good name and took on a poorer one—to argue as they have, but I think something should be said in fairness to the minister and the system he is trying to bring into effect.

In my riding is located the largest army camp in western Canada. The government has been criticized over that camp, even by the people of Chilliwack. That camp has now been set up as a permanent army camp to form part of our national defence. Its payroll contributes largely to the welfare of the district. Many people criticized the government for taking four or five hundred acres out of taxation.

Within two miles or so of where I live is one of the finest airports in the Dominion of Canada comprising 900 acres. I have in my office, from the days when I used to be a member of the municipal council, a file filled with criticisms of the federal government and the Department of National Defence because there would be no taxes received from these 900 acres of what had not been very profitable land—I will put it that way. For the last five years some 900 children within my own district would not have had the benefit of education of any kind but for the facilities of that camp. During the disastrous floods of 1948 the people who had to be evacuated would have had nowhere to go if it had not been for the facilities at that airport. In the plans now being formulated for the evacuation of civilians from Vancouver and New Westminster in the event of bombing, it is planned to have evacuees handled at this airport.

I am saying this to point out to those in my own riding that it is not simply a question of saying they have lost the municipal revenue from some 900 acres of land. They must not forget what they have gained through the facilities at the Abbotsford airport in the way of education for their children, accommodation during the floods of 1948 and so on. The same applies to the Chilliwack army camp. However, I do not think the minister has gone far enough. The present formula is a step in the right direction, but eventually these grants should be made in every municipality, regardless of size. That should apply whether it is the great city of Ottawa, the lesser city of Halifax, or even the little area out here called Carleton, where the residents apparently have to walk 200 yards to get their mail, which I admit is a great drawback and hardship, particularly when you consider some of the speeches they have to carry home with them. However, I agree with those hon. members who have suggested that there is only one proper formula to be applied in connection with the taxation of this property; that is, government property should be assessed and taxed in exactly the same way as other property, with the same right of appeal to the assessment courts or other civilian courts.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the discussion that has taken place has related substantially to Ottawa, but it has also dealt with other cities and municipalities in which particular members are interested. It seems to me that for the reasons put forward by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) all hon. members should be interested in the situation in this city. I believe the hon. member put his finger on the crux of the situation when he said this is the capital of Canada, and that in considering the provision to be made for it and the plans that will be carried into effect for its improvement we must regard this as the property of all Canadians. I am not going to discuss the suggestion he has made as to the method of government, other than to say that he has put forward something which definitely will call for consideration in the years ahead as the over-all plan takes more complete form.

I was struck by the attitude of the two Ottawa members who have discussed this subject. The hon. member for Ottawa East (Mr. Richard) has said he feels sure the people of Ottawa would not wish to have the people of Canada generally think they are not grateful for what they receive under the existing provision. Then of course, to be sure, he is on the other side of the argument as well: he goes on to state that neither does he wish to say they are entirely satisfied. Having sought to place himself in both camps in that respect, he leaves it in that position. The hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) fairly well sums up his position when he says he thinks this is an improvement.

Mr. McIlraith: He will sum it up in due course.

Mr. Drew: I am going to sum it up, because so far the hon. member has simply left it at that. I would be grateful if he would be a little more exact as to what he thinks should be done.

Mr. McIlraith: We give the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) precedence here.

Mr. Drew: I might remind hon. gentlemen, including the hon. member for Fraser Valley, that Carleton county now embraces a very substantial part of the city of Ottawa, so I am speaking also for one segment of this city. It should be remembered that we are dealing with what was regarded simply as a temporary expedient to meet a situation everyone recognized had to be faced in some way. The hon. member for Ottawa East said he thought there had been little disagreement as to the assessment of the property in question. That is correct. As I understand, there has been no disagreement. I also understand it has been agreed that the buildings in the city of Ottawa owned and operated by the Canadian government, other than the parliament buildings themselves, should be assessed at a figure which, if taxes were paid in the ordinary way, would have produced during the past year a tax of $3,338,900, as compared with the $962,392 the city received. Certainly $962,392 is not an insignificant figure; nevertheless we must appreciate that any payment, no matter how large or small it may be, is adequate or inadequate in relation to the figure for which it is substituted.

It has been pointed out that in this city other payments are made, and also that certain other services are rendered by the dominion government in connection with policing and activities of that kind. Of course those are not in substitution for the local responsibilities in that respect. The city of Ottawa carries on all the ordinary functions and responsibilities of a city of this size. The figure being paid, therefore, must be related to what would be received from those buildings were they not operated by the government. Making full allowance for any services that are rendered, comparing the $962,392 with the $3,338,900 which would have been received from those buildings on a normal assessment rate and normal taxes, then I say that without question the amount being paid to the city of Ottawa, the capital of Canada, is not adequate to give the city a fair return for the taxes it is compelled to give up in relation to those buildings.

Having said that, I want to point out that there are buildings which fall into different categories, and in discussing this whole subject we must remember that fact. For instance, as has been pointed out by some hon. members, there are buildings that are definite attractions from the tourist point of view. Others, while perhaps providing no utility service or no revenue service, might be placed in a special category. They are only a relatively small part of the buildings or operations under consideration. Then there are those operations which are of particular service to the community, such as post offices and buildings of that kind. Those should be placed in a special category, and some return made for the property set aside for those purposes. There is a third category, and that is the category to which the consideration of the members of this house must be directed, whether or not we at this time deal with that subject in any effective way. In that category come those buildings and those activities, industrial or otherwise, which operate on a revenue producing basis and which should pay taxes the same as any similar activity.

At a time when the government is extending its activities into many fields for defence production, in the form of crown companies and otherwise, this is something which must be faced. It certainly is not fair to any community, and all communities in Canada depend largely or in many cases almost entirely upon taxes obtained from real estate, to take over large areas in those communities, whether they be urban or rural municipalities, calling for the services that are necessary in such an area, policing, educational and others, and then not pay the normal tax rate for the property. I can think of many extremely important undertakings which were opened up during the last world war which caused great difficulties for the municipalities in which they were located. The people of those municipalities would have been the very last to have expressed any wish that those operations or undertakings should not go forward in the area. Nevertheless they did face great difficulties as a result of what was done.

Take as an example the great explosives plant at Ajax. This called for a large tract of land, not only for the explosives plant but also for the houses required for the workers who went to that new and segregated community. Under the general provision that governments do not pay taxes, almost insurmountable problems were created in regard to educational and other facilities of that nature. Then in the case of the very large aircraft development at Malton, great areas were set aside for the plant and still larger areas to house the workers who came there to take part in that production. Again that area certainly welcomed a development of that kind, but it created immense difficulties. Since that time special steps have been taken and it has been possible to meet these particular problems, but that redress cannot begin to take care of all cases of that kind. Once again we are confronted with the necessity of a large expansion of defence production. Once again it will be necessary for the government to take over new tracts of land or acquire additional land in areas where there is already production of that type. I am satisfied that some steps must be taken to meet such a situation.

As for the bill which is before us, it is simply a bill to interpret in statutory form the order in council which introduced this device last year. As has been pointed out by some of the members, there does not yet appear to be any clear reason why four per cent happens to be the figure of concentration which becomes the starting point for taxes of this kind. Without in any way reflecting on the motives which prompted the remarks of the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Dickey), it is perhaps easy to understand why he regards with a greater measure of approval this hit or miss system, and that is all it is, than might the members from other communities of a similar size. Halifax receives the second largest payment of any city in Canada. As compared with Ottawa, which received $962,392, the city of Halifax receives $208,489.93. I have no doubt that the city of Halifax should receive that, and probably a great deal more. However, that is a very substantial payment in comparison with the city of Vancouver, for instance which receives a total under these various types of payment of $172.12. There will not be any suggestion that there are not large government operations in the city of Vancouver which should be contributing their share, and which are earning revenues which could provide some contribution to the ordinary services maintained by the city of Vancouver.

It is noticeable that neither the city of Montreal nor the city of Toronto receives any payment under this. It is all very well to make facetious remarks about cities such as Montreal and Toronto not deserving any payments, but the fact is that if a system is sound every city should be dealt with on the same basis.

Mr. Croll: Toronto is receiving about $8,000.

Mr. Drew: Is it in one of the smaller categories?

Mr. Cruickshank: It is with Maple Ridge, I guess.

Mr. Drew: It is in the same category as Maple Ridge; that is correct. Under grants in lieu of special assessments for local improvements Toronto receives $8,874.13 as compared with the $208,489.93 for Halifax and the sum of $172.12 for Vancouver.

Mr. Knowles: They would not get a very large subway for that.

Mr. Drew: No, not very great. The member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor), whom all of us love—I use that word advisedly—does sometimes rather strain that affection by the blanket approval that he gives to all those associated with him. I do admire his loyalty, but his unfailing certainty that all is well in this best of all possible worlds so long as things are done by Liberals is sometimes a little difficult to accept as an unqualified principle, no matter with what amount of affection we may regard the hon. member.

Mr. Abbott: There may be the odd exception that proves the rule.

Mr. Drew: As the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) says there may be the odd exception where perhaps that applies, but as a blanket principle it is a rather difficult principle to accept. The member for Fort William, having given his unqualified assurance to the people of Ottawa that all will be well so long as the present members for Ottawa East (Mr. Richard) and Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) straddle the fence in the way that they have today, he then goes on to say that while it is true Fort William has not come in for benefits, he is going to pack his bag and go back there to make them do their best to get under the fire. The member for Fort William will have to make some new suggestions to them, because they were not able to qualify under this four per cent formula during this current year. There were a lot of municipalities in Canada that were not able to qualify, no matter how deserving they may have been. It is significant that throughout the whole of Canada, including cities, towns and villages, there were only eighteen that were able to qualify for the ordinary grants under the four per cent formula. May I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that if a principle is a principle at all and not just something pulled out of a grab bag, then it is something that will apply to every municipality where operations or undertakings of the same kind, carried on by the dominion government, are carried on for the benefit of the people in those communities and for the benefit of the people of Canada generally.

This bill now before us perpetuates an ineffective, inefficient and unsatisfactory procedure that was adopted as a temporary expedient by order in council. I recognize the fact that a temporary expedient is better than none; but I do not think it should be written into the form of a statute and purport to interpret, as one hon. member put it, a principle in the form of law when it establishes no principle that any of us can possibly discern. It is perfectly true that, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) interjected, this is the taxpayers' money. Certainly it is the taxpayers' money. But all of the money that is paid into the municipal, the provincial and federal treasuries across Canada comes from the same set of pockets across Canada.

Mr. Abbott: Will my hon. friend allow a question?

Mr. Drew: Certainly.

Mr. Abbott: I know that he is conversant with this matter. Does he know whether the province of Ontario pays any taxes to the municipality on provincial buildings in various municipalities?

Mr. Drew: As a matter of fact they are not paying in respect of a number of properties which would fall into the same category. But I would point out that they are making certain provisions for the municipalities by the diversion of moneys received from such things as the gasoline tax and other taxes, to support the municipalities. They are also paying to the municipalities, for the very purpose of relieving their municipal tax rate, 50 per cent of all the costs of education in the province of Ontario. This year, in the province of Ontario alone, this amounts to a payment of close to $50 million to the municipalities for that one reason. The province of Ontario—and I am only saying this in response to the question put by the Minister of Finance—through its government, has sought to recognize the difficulty of the municipalities in this respect.

Mr. Cruickshank: The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) will admit that is in the last couple of years, though.

Mr. Drew: I will admit that it was introduced during the second year that I happened to be premier of that province; and that is the same law that is in force today.

[Mr. Drew.]

In any event, when there is any division as between federal and provincial governments, I am quite prepared to have my remarks apply to the principle involved, and I do not wish to have any qualifications in regard to that principle, whether it be at the provincial or at the federal level. I am satisfied that as governments—whether they be federal, provincial or municipal—go into the operation and ownership of properties which earn revenue, those properties should pay taxes on exactly the same level as will any other property in those communities. I believe in free enterprise. I believe in free enterprise being protected against specially-subsidized government operations in the same field. In many of these cases governments are getting into operations where they compete with these organizations which, as ordinary corporations, must pay taxes. I am satisfied that it is in the interests of good government and of efficiency of operation to have those organizations pay taxes which put them on the same competitive level as any other organization in the same field.

Mr. Abbott: Will my hon. friend allow another question?

Mr. Drew: Yes.

Mr. Abbott: I do not want to interrupt him, but does he know whether or not the Ontario hydro pays municipal taxes on its installations?

Mr. Drew: They do not, on the same level. But may I also say that they have been making certain special allowances to the municipalities.

Mr. Abbott: But on the reasoning that my hon. friend was adopting, they should pay taxes on the same basis.

Mr. Drew: I thought I had made it clear that I asked that there be no reservations made in my remarks in regard to that point.

Mr. Abbott: That is fine.

Mr. Drew: No matter what may have been sound in the past, I think we have come to the time when, if governments at any level are going to extend into operations which compete with ordinary operations, they should pay taxes on those operations so that they may be subject to the same tests and the same standards of efficiency as is any other operation engaged in the same business.

As to this present bill, naturally it is one of those cases where it is wise to accept whatever is put forward on a provisional basis. But I can only express regret that a method which is so unscientific and inadequate for the purpose of balancing up these payments across the country is to be perpetuated in statutory form. Nevertheless, since the government puts this proposal forward as the means by which it is going to continue whatever payments are being made, I am making these remarks now to urge upon the government that, in view of the fact that there is to be a second session this year, they be prepared to review this whole subject with the idea of examining this matter on the basis of some sound principle.

I would hope that they would come forward with a plan which will deal with properties of different kinds: those properties that are simply for the general service of the people of Canada, such as these buildings in which we are now meeting; those buildings which perform a special service for the locality such as post offices and buildings of that kind, and which are not operating anything in the nature of a business; and those operations that are straight business operations, operating in many cases in competition with private businesses. In that case I would hope that the government, within this present year, would be prepared to accept the principle—a principle that I regard as a sound one—that where the government goes into operations of this kind, those government operations will pay taxes.

Mr. Abbott: Ottawa would not get much on that basis.

Mr. Drew: I am quite prepared that Ottawa should stand on exactly the same basis as any other municipality in regard to whatever principle is applied. But I would point out again that, excluding these parliament buildings, the buildings in the city of Ottawa which are operated by the government and which are collecting revenues of various kinds, are assessed at a level which would have produced during this current year a total of $3,338,900 instead of the $962,392 they are receiving.

Mr. Sinclair: Plus the cost of the district commission, of course.

Mr. Drew: I was careful to point out that any special return they are receiving from the district commission or otherwise should be balanced against anything they receive; but that, subject to those balancing figures, the figure that the city of Ottawa receives should be a figure which bears some closer resemblance to the actual amount of revenue they would receive from those properties in the ordinary course of events. I do not see how the city of Ottawa is going to be able to carry on the services it is called upon to perform as the nation's capital as well as a city of homes and ordinary activities—whether it be under a regular municipal government or under a district commission such as has been suggested by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank)—unless they receive a more adequate return for the number of buildings that have been taken over and are being taken over all the time.

In this case, Mr. Speaker, I have put these remarks forward recognizing the fact that we are going to have another session; seeking also to emphasize the fact that any system which only provides payment to eighteen municipalities throughout the whole of Canada in relation to government operations cannot be a sound system; and suggesting that there is no reason for this arbitrary 4 per cent basis, but that the members of this house should be called upon to consider some scientific formula which will not only be good for the present but will meet the situation which is created with the ever-increasing entry of the government into business activities and other activities of various kinds across Canada.

Mr. David A. Croll (Spadina): May I first remind the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) that the first direct grant made to municipalities in order to relieve the burden on those municipalities was made not while he was in office but while the Hepburn Liberal government was in office.

Mr. Drew: Oh, no, Mr. Speaker. Reference was made by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) I think to the system of grants to education at the level that was mentioned of 50 per cent.

Mr. Cruickshank: No.

Mr. Drew: That was introduced while I was in office; but may I point out—

Mr. Cruickshank: No, Mr. Speaker. Even the leader of the opposition cannot put words in my mouth.

An hon. Member: No, sir.

Mr. Cruickshank: I admire his versatile veracity, but if he will check Hansard he will find that I said no such thing.

Mr. Fraser: You made some reference to when they came into being.

Mr. Cruickshank: Do I have to take on the hon. member for Peterborough West while I am endeavouring to look after the leader of the opposition? If the leader of the opposition will check what I said he will find that I said, through the daily press the present government of Ontario are boasting particularly of what they have done in the last year or a year and a half. I think that can be checked in Hansard, and certainly it can be checked in the daily press.

Mr. Drew: I do want to keep the record straight. I certainly had no thought, and have no thought, of trying to put words in the mouth of the hon. member for Fraser Valley because, as a matter of fact, that is not necessary. The fact is, my reference related first to the question asked by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) who asked whether the province of Ontario recognized those obligations, and I pointed out that the government of Ontario had undertaken to relieve the municipalities of the burden on real estate by assuming 50 per cent of the educational costs. It is quite correct, as the hon. member for Fraser Valley has pointed out, that these figures have increased year by year, but that was the formula which was effected several years ago. In regard to what was said by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) when he said that this was introduced by Mr. Hepburn, the idea of grants by a provincial government to municipalities, I would remind him that the first grant to the municipalities by a provincial government was back in 1867, and not in the time of Mr. Hepburn. May I say that I also have a very high regard for Mr. Hepburn, a higher regard than some of his associates have displayed on different occasions.

Mr. Knowles: Who came first, the hen or the egg?

Mr. Croll: Just to put the record straight, I must repeat that sometime in 1934—perhaps it was in 1935—when the municipal problem was presented to the government of Ontario we gave them one mill on their assessment in order to assist them, in lieu of taxes and in lieu of other matters. In addition to that, we gave increased grants for education, which were later further increased.

Mr. Fleming: And took the municipal income tax away from them at the same time.

Mr. Croll: Let us get back to this bill.

Mr. Abbott: Hear, hear.

Mr. Croll: This bill in a small way deals with a very special problem. The members who represent constituencies that have benefited have come here and have said that it is a very nice bill indeed. No one begrudges the amount of money that is being paid out to them, the million and a half dollars.

Mr. Cruickshank: We do not go quite that far.

Mr. Croll: Of course, as the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) has said, it is an improvement. I share his views to a great extent, except that I do not share the violence of his language in the description of the bill.

Mr. Fraser: You should.

Mr. Croll: As the leader of the opposition has said, it is really a faltering step. At the present time Ottawa will receive almost 75 per cent of the amount of money to be paid out. I emphasize—and I express the opinion of the house—that no one begrudges a nickel of that. This is our capital city. This is our pride and joy, and we take a great deal of pleasure in it. We want it to be a beautiful city, we do not mind whatever money they require to spend in order to make us more proud of it; but it seems to me that we are approaching this on entirely wrong principles.

I have not been able to find a principle in the bill, although I have tried. I thought that after the hon. member for Fraser Valley had spoken I would understand the bill thoroughly and that he would explain it clearly. But he got off onto some baby food, and I did not get much information from him.

Mr. Blackmore: Skim milk.

Mr. Croll: Skim milk for the rest of the country. None of the 18 cities concerned begrudge the amount that Ottawa will get. I think it is a good idea, but the point I make is that the 4 per cent formula does not do justice to Ottawa, and it does less than justice to a great number of municipalities. I am going to remind the Minister of Finance about something that he said. Let me say further that, as I see the problem, the dominion government ought to pay taxes in the same way as everybody else pays taxes. This is not a recent view that I have held; it is a view that I have held for a long time. I quote him in order to emphasize my argument. When the question with respect to tax exemption for our fighting men in Korea was raised by the opposition the Minister of Finance said: "We do not want to set up a special group of taxpayers in this country."

Mr. Abbott: It has been done by our constitution, and for very good reasons, too, as my hon. friend knows perfectly well.

Mr. Croll: Whether it was constitutionally possible or not, my hon. friend found a way of getting around it and did grant that exemption finally.

Mr. Abbott: I am speaking of the exemption of the dominion government, not the service people. I am saying that is preserved by the constitution.

Mr. Croll: Of course it is preserved by the constitution. We have modified the constitution from time to time. I remember the day when you used to have to obtain a fiat if you wanted to sue the dominion government, and unless you got a fiat you were out of court. We have modified that, and no one was particularly hurt by the result that people are getting a greater measure of justice.

To suggest that crown corporations should be invited to make contribution is wrong. It is either right or wrong. The crown corporations ought to pay taxes in the same way as everyone else pays taxes.

Mr. Abbott: That is not under this bill. I have said that before, Mr. Speaker. This bill has nothing to do with that.

Mr. Croll: I am just pointing out the shortcomings of the bill so that the minister can consider it at a future time. Certainly we are going to endorse this bill.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): When?

Mr. Croll: When you increase the four per cent formula and pay a proper tax. One of the objections made by the minister was that he did not think the dominion government ought to be put into the hands of the local assessors.

Mr. Abbott: Only as to valuation.

Mr. Croll: Yes; the suggestion is of course that the local assessors might raise the valuation some. That is not beyond the realm of possibility. Local assessors have been known to do that, but there is a way of meeting that. If the local assessors did the dominion government in, they could stand being done in every now and then. They do other people in very well. Besides, there is a formula—

Mr. Abbott: Always the people pay, anyway.

Mr. Croll: The argument everlastingly has been made when the municipal officials went to the provinces and asked them to pay taxes or went to the dominion and asked them to pay taxes: What difference does it make? The money is taken out of one pocket and put into another. But you take it out of different pockets. The pockets do not belong to the same people. That is the trouble. The municipalities will not even have any pants with pockets in them if you keep on refusing to pay your full share of taxes. In so far as the provincial government not paying taxes is concerned, here is an opportunity for the dominion government to set an example. After all, this is the Great White Father. We are the people who have an over-all responsibility. If we begin paying taxes on government property the municipalities will drive the provinces into the position where they will have to do the same thing.

It seems to me that is an excellent example of what is possible. We should have gone the whole way. It is an important matter to the municipalities. They have turned every way, trying to find a few dollars here and there, and yet on the other hand they see these large government buildings, which bring them some advantage, not paying taxes. That is a sore spot.

Mr. Abbott: Very few of them refuse those buildings.

Mr. Croll: Of course not; why should they? They are a part of Canada—and there are decided advantages to the local people. But there are disadvantages, too. It seems to me the government might well consider going the whole way and making it easier for the municipalities, which will bring them taxes not only from the dominion but from the provinces.

I would have thought that on this occasion the government would have taken advantage of the expression of feeling in the house when the original motion was debated, and settled this matter once and for all. I do hope that in due time the minister will set an example for the provinces. The federal government is doing a very good job of educating the people in the payment of income tax. It would be good for the dominion to feel that it is paying its share, so that the municipalities will not feel that they have been done in by the dominion government. I do hope the minister will give consideration to the requests made here from all sides of the house.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I for one am frank to say that I welcome the bill, and consider it a great improvement in the treatment of this subject. When I was first elected to the House of Commons in 1940 this subject was generally ignored. There was however a specific bill giving an annual grant of $100,000 to the city of Ottawa in lieu of taxes. When that bill came before the house at my first session one hon. member in the opposition put forward the proposal that it be cut off altogether, and that there should be no grant whatever. The idea was not popular, however, and out of fairness I must add that the opposition did not pursue it. Indeed the hon. member who made the proposal receded from it.

Treatment of the subject was postponed during the war years. In 1944, we were able to have a joint committee of both houses of parliament to deal with the subject. Unfortunately that committee was set up at the end of the session and its work was cut short by the termination of the session. However, it did one useful thing in that it served to acquaint all hon. members with the nature of the problem, and focused it on their minds.

The grant involved in the city of Ottawa bill was increased in the following year to $300,000. In the last year there was a temporary order in council making provision for an interim payment, and today we have this bill. When I say the bill represents a great improvement I believe any hon. member who has examined developments on this subject since confederation will agree with me.

I was somewhat disappointed at the violence of the language of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) in dealing with the subject, and his attempt to hammer it into the position of being some party matter that could be bandied back and forth between the parties. I do not believe we can deal with the municipalities of this country on that basis.

Their true position is that merely of statutory creations of the various provinces. In Ontario the municipal act and the present system of municipal government were brought into legislative being by the Baldwin government in 1849, which is one hundred and two years ago. There has been no change in the principle of that legislation since that time. It has been patched up a little each year, but the basic principle has never changed.

The situation is that we have municipalities, the creatures of the provinces, saddled with responsibilities in social welfare and other fields that were never thought of one hundred and two years ago. It is a completely changed set of obligations, and all costing large sums of money. Along with this however they have had the same basis of finding revenue, namely out of the land tax on real estate. I suggest the problem is not one that can be solved by the dominion government alone. It is a very difficult one, and perhaps one the dominion government may be wise not to stress too strenuously. Provincial-municipal difficulties are very real, and we could easily do more harm than good by interfering in something outside our legislative competence and jurisdiction. While we realize where the responsibility for that problem lies—and I have every sympathy for provincial and municipal governments in trying to face up to it—it seems to me that there needs to be a complete revision of the jurisdiction as between municipalities and provinces, and a revision that will put the financial responsibilities now placed on the municipalities into line with their sources of revenue.

I believe that would be a common ground for almost all parties in the house, and all members who have given any real thought to the situation. It is not good enough in dealing with the subject to say, "Oh, if the dominion government pays taxes, just like any other taxpayer, the problem will be solved." It just is not that type of problem.

I for one will welcome the day when a provincial government will come forward and will really look at the municipal legislation and make an attempt to bring municipal authority and responsibility into line with municipal financial sources of revenue. When that is being done, and as part of the process, I have no doubt at all that we will have to look at the responsibility as between the dominion and provincial governments. I welcome the opportunity of doing that, and I will welcome the day when we can do it. I look forward with eagerness to that day, and I hope it may be done in my time.

I for one am not satisfied with the one-hundred-and-two-year-old system. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) dealt with the grant to Ottawa, and seemed to single it out. I do not know what view he was seeking to convey, but he did make use of some biblical references. I did not like particularly his use of biblical references as related to this subject—but that is neither here nor there. I do object strenuously however when he describes as a crumb a grant of one million dollars to a municipality trying to carry on. I suggest it is something different from that, and that a million dollars of the taxpayers' money is not a crumb either to the municipality, the dominion government or to anyone else.

I noticed today that, regardless of the position hon. members may have taken as to the adequacy or inadequacy of the bill, there is one refreshing change. There seems to be unanimity as to the idea that something should be done. It was interesting and refreshing to observe that the disagreement was only as to the details as to what and how much should be done.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), who represents the adjoining constituency, made one reference with which I am strongly in accord. He used the hydro as an example of an enterprise which was carrying on business in competition with ordinary business and not being taxed in the ordinary way. I was glad to hear the leader of the opposition make that direct and unequivocal reference to the desirability of its paying taxes as an ordinary taxpayer.

Mr. Drew: I do not want to interrupt the hon. member for Ottawa West, because I think we are in almost complete agreement on the general purposes, but I would point out that I was referring to those aspects of that commission which are in competition with other business.

Mr. McIlraith: I so understood the leader of the opposition.

Mr. Drew: I want that to be clear; I do not want to be misunderstood. There are certain services performed by the hydro electric power commission that are general services and which are not in competition with any other business, but they are also in business which is competitive. What I said applies to that as well as to the other.

Mr. McIlraith: I think there was a perfectly clear understanding of the remarks of the leader of the opposition. I am afraid that I cannot differ with him on that point. As I said, I welcome his statement. However, I was sorry to hear him use the figure obtained from the city hall about the tax the dominion government would pay—$3,339,000—because a figure taken in that way is misleading. It is not a complete and accurate figure. The leader of the opposition gave some reason why it is not wholly accurate and there are other reasons which are quite obvious. If the dominion government paid taxes on all properties it would involve the city in providing all the services that are provided for the ordinary taxpayer.

The point I wish to make in that connection, and this point is particularly strong in my mind as a result of my work on the joint committee a few years ago, is that to arrive at a correct figure requires a good deal of detailed examination of the services being rendered and whether or not they are normal services rendered to any taxpayer, and so on. That varies sharply from one municipality to the other, as I learned in the committee. That was the sole point I wished to make in referring to it.

It is well also to realize that this matter of the dominion government making large grants to municipalities raises another implication which has been put forward here today. If you are making large grants to a municipality, are you going to have a say in the administration of its affairs? That is a question which I am sure the municipalities will wish to consider most carefully. I think it is something that ought to be foreseen.

The question of a federal district commission has been put forward in this house for many years and has received a great deal of consideration. I do not think it is relevant to a discussion of this bill, but perhaps it should be remembered that the district commission does some good work in the area that is of benefit to the area as well as to the rest of Canada. These things should be considered in detail.

Then as to the amount of the grant, I seem to have troubled the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) when I said that I welcomed this bill as a great improvement. In my opinion the amount is not adequate, but at least we now have a formula upon which we can put forward representations concerning the inadequacy and what I would consider the improper allowances in computing the grant. Mention could be made, although I do not think it is relevant on the principle of this bill, as to whether one type of building should come under one subsection and so on.

Mr. Fleming: Is it not rather violent language on the part of the hon. member to talk about these being improper allowances?

Mr. McIlraith: Inadequate allowances.

Mr. Fleming: The hon. member said improper.

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps I am subject to correction by the hon. member for Eglinton on that point. With his precision of language, he would have used the word "inadequate" instead of "improper". I am not able to define clearly when an inadequacy becomes an impropriety. You could argue about that at some considerable length. I gladly substitute the word "inadequate" for "improper" if the hon. member will find it more agreeable. Without taking more time, I believe I have expressed my views in general on the bill. I want to close with the note on which I began, and that is my appreciation to the government for at long last bringing forward this overdue bill. I welcome the opportunity to declare myself as supporting the principle of the bill.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, for just a few minutes I should like to speak in support of the position taken on Monday by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) and the position taken in the house today by a number of hon. members on the government side, particularly the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll). It seems to me that just as the federal government expects the people of Canada to pay their taxes, the federal government should come clean on this matter and pay grants equal to what would be the municipal taxes on government-owned property.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) relies strongly on section 125 of the British North America Act which reads:

No lands or property belonging to Canada or any province shall be liable to taxation.

The hon. member for Spadina has already pointed out that until recently we had the fiction—I use that word advisedly—that the crown could not be sued without the consent of the crown, in other words without the grant of a fiat. During this session we have passed legislation doing away with that fiction. There are other fictions to be found in the British North America Act itself. For example, we have section 9 which reads:

> The executive government and authority of and over Canada is hereby declared to continue and be vested in the Queen.

We know what that means; we understand that language, but in point of fact the authority in charge of this country consists of the ministers of the Canadian cabinet. Similarly there is section 54 which reads:

> It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any vote, resolution, address or bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue, or of any tax or impost, to any purpose that has not been first recommended to that house by message of the Governor General in the session in which such vote, resolution, address, or bill is proposed.

There again is a fiction that does not bother us very much. Every time a money bill is brought in a minister stands up and says that His Excellency the Governor General recommends the bill to the consideration of the house, but never since I have been here has there been a message from the Governor General brought into this house assuring us of that fact. We know what happens, and as a matter of fact I prefer it that way; it is the government that takes the responsibility for money bills, not the person who happens to be the nominal head of the country. I emphasize the point that the exact wording of section 54 of the constitution is being completely disregarded; we treat it as a fiction. Well, if that is the case with these other sections of the British North America Act which I have cited, I think we could do the same with section 125. We need not amend it. We can leave it there and continue to claim that property belonging to Canada is not legally liable to taxation, but that need not prevent the government from making grants in lieu of municipal taxation. One might find certain classes of property such as post offices, which are in every community, and which might not be included; but apart from a very few exceptions like that it does seem to me, as the hon. member for Spadina has said, that the government should come clean and pay grants in lieu of taxes on federal property to all municipalities in which federal property is situated.

As the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) says, this four per cent formula that has been worked out is something definite. It improves the position of Ottawa, and I for one do not begrudge that at all. But, as has been clearly pointed out, it still leaves Ottawa about $2 million short of what it would get if it received the taxation that could be levied on all federal property in this city if they had the right to do so. In view of the unfairness of this situation to Ottawa itself, in that it does not get the full amount it should, together with the uncertainty as to the wisdom of this formula which has been expressed just as forcefully on the government side as on this side, I think the suggestion of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) should be taken seriously and this bill should be laid over at least until next session.

I have heard a number of hon. members opposite express some concern about the language of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), which was referred to as strong and violent. I did not realize that his language was quite as strong as that; he did not even shout as loudly as he sometimes does. I noticed that what really exercised the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) was the way the hon. member for Spadina spoke. It was not the language he used; it seemed to me it was the force of his argument that really bothered the minister. Quite frankly I feel that this legislation should not be proceeded with at this time; in fact I am rather startled that the government should ask that this bill be dealt with this session, particularly in view of the desire to get the urgent business through. I wonder why a contentious measure of this kind should be brought forward, particularly when on the basis of the order in council and an item in the estimates the various cities that have been getting these payments could continue to get them and in the meantime this matter could be given further study. I suggest in all seriousness that the minister should discuss with some of his colleagues the advisability of having one of them move the adjournment of this debate, and let this matter stand over until the fall session for further consideration, which I would hope might result in a fair deal for all our municipalities.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): On a measure as important as this I think all groups in the house should state their position. I do not like the idea of making grants to municipalities from the federal treasury, and I do not think the bill should provide for grants at all. My own view is that the municipalities of Canada ought to be able to present to the senior governments assessment notices and tax bills just as they present them to ordinary citizens. However, I concede that the British North America Act does circumscribe the federal government with certain constitutional limitations which may necessitate a change in that act sometime in the future; but we should be looking forward to the day when that change can be made, so the municipalities will not have to come hat in hand, like a bunch of beggars, asking the federal government for a handout. That is not the right way to do business at all. Under the circumstances I think the bill is taking the wrong approach.

There is another thing I do not like about it. When we take the position we have taken in this bill we hedge our offer around with qualifications and escape clauses to the point where no one is certain what the bill means or when a municipality may have any rights. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has placed in the bill certain qualifications which, while making it appear that he is being very generous to the municipalities, make sure that the grant is not going to be established as a matter of right in any circumstances. I do not like that approach to the matter. At the same time I am prepared to admit, together with the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll), the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) and various others, that it is a faltering step in the right direction. We hope the federal government will get its feet under it and be ready to take a proper step toward relieving the municipalities of the burden imposed upon them by the fact that the federal and provincial governments have very large amounts of property in those municipalities.

I am not saying that even if the terms of this bill were extended and a more generous formula applied, that would solve the problems of the municipalities. I think the hon. member for Ottawa West put his finger upon a very important point. One of the things I have had against the people of Ontario, to be quite frank, is that they have been so slow to make changes which have been proved necessary for many years.

Mr. Blue: Oh, we are not so slow.

Mr. Low: Anyone who comes from the west notices that the first thing. Out there we do not wait 102 years to make a simple change in the municipal act. I think it is high time we got out of the rut, out of the cave we have dug ourselves into down here, and made some changes so the municipalities would have a chance to get along. I quite agree with the hon. member for Ottawa West that it is high time the municipal act was changed. But even if that were done there would have to be some change also in the attitude of the people in the municipalities.

Mr. Blue: We are doing all right.

Mr. Low: If we could get some of these people who conduct sales out in the country to just confine themselves to their sales we might be able to make some progress in this house.

Mr. Blue: Well, the auctioneer does not hit a hard blow.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I would ask the hon. member not to interrupt the hon. gentleman who has the floor.

Mr. Low: The situation in Ottawa, taking that as an example, is not solely the result of too small a grant from the federal government; I am free to admit that. My position is similar to that of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson); I own a home in this city, and I pay taxes on it.

An hon. Member: You live in Ontario.

Mr. Low: I do; and I like Ontario very much. But even if the grant to the city of Ottawa were increased there would have to be quite a number of changes in the attitude of the city fathers here and the board of control, before they could overcome their problem. They have made a number of blunders in this city of late which have put them in a difficult position. I have been interested in studying the taxation situation in this city for some time. I note, for example, that in 1930 public school supporters in this city paid 31·75 mills on their assessment. The rate continued to increase until it reached a peak of 39 mills in 1936. After remaining at that point for about four years it began to decline, until in 1945 it was back almost to where it was in 1930. Since then it has gone up every single year. The rate last year was 47½ mills, and this year another substantial increase has been announced bringing it up to around 52 mills. Thus in a period of six years we have had an increase of something like 20 mills in this city. One of the blunders that I think they made here that caused a great deal of difficulty and which has placed a tremendous burden upon the taxpayers is that they bit off a whole lot more than they could chew in this annexation business. They were prompted, of course, by the federal government's great plans for a greater and more beautiful capital city for the dominion. We all agree that this capital city should be a real capital city, but we do not believe that the city should be asked or prodded by the federal government or anyone else to take steps that are too long for it to be able to keep its own balance. Now, they have done that. They went ahead and annexed in one step too much territory around the whole city. They find now that they have to provide services for this district and are spending huge sums of money in order to provide those services in districts where the people were quite content to live without them for a time.

What is the situation now? The tax rates go up and up until, as the member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson) has said, the people are practically burdened down. That in itself is bound to bring a reaction in the sale value of the property as time goes by. When speaking of the member for Comox-Alberni, I am reminded that he made a rather interesting suggestion. I believe he suggested that the city of Ottawa ought to have a member of the treasury board sitting with the board of control to determine some features of the government of the city. As I say, I was interested in the suggestion, not so much because I agree with it, but because it might be a place for the Minister of Finance to have his colleague the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott). If the member for Springfield were put on the board of control as a representative of the federal government, he and Charlotte ought to do a pretty good job of governing Ottawa. I am quite certain he would add weight to the board of control at any rate.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni is quite right, taxes in this city are outrageous.

An hon. Member: What has this got to do with Bill No. 390?

Mr. Low: It has quite a lot to do with it. I am coming to that point. One of the reasons that taxes in the city of Ottawa are outrageous is that the government of Canada has failed to take its responsibility when it was one of the prime movers in the attempt to build a bigger and better capital city of Ottawa. It is chiefly because of the plans laid by this federal government that the city of Ottawa found it expedient to take the steps in annexation which I have outlined. As I have already pointed out, the steps they took in annexation have brought upon them a much bigger burden of taxes than the people ought to have to bear.

Mr. Riley: In Carleton?

Mr. Low: I am not confining it to any particular area, but it is certainly true in Gloucester where I live.

Mr. Gour (Russell): I shall take care of that.

Mr. Low: In that area taxes over the period of the last two years have increased up to three hundred per cent. That is the way they treat the people in those areas who have not services and have no prospect of getting services for some years to come. Surely, that situation places a responsibility upon the federal government, and they ought to be recognizing that responsibility. Instead of bringing in a bill of this kind they ought to bring in a bill that would provide the municipalities in which there is a substantial amount of federal government property with the right to present a tax bill to this government the same as the municipality presents to any holder of property, whether it is business or residential. Those are some of the reasons why I cannot support the principle of the bill.

(Translation):

Mr. J. O. Gour (Russell): Mr. Speaker, circumstances make it necessary for me to say a few words in this debate.

(Text):

During the past five years expropriations by the various federal departments have taken place in my riding, and part of it was annexed by the city of Ottawa. I have the honour to have the leader of the Social Credit party as one of my constituents. He said he voted for me during the last campaign, but I am not so sure about that. It is really a pleasure for me to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) upon the measure this government has taken to ameliorate the tax burden of our citizens. In my opinion it is peculiar for people to criticize him for improving the situation. There should be no criticism when there is improvement. I shall not say anything about the city of Ottawa because there are two members here representing the city and proud to do anything they can for their people. If they are able to get a little more money from the government for these properties, I think they are right in doing so. I hope they will succeed in getting more, because a great part of my riding has been annexed by the city of Ottawa.

When the time comes for the minister to give the cheque to the city of Ottawa I should like him to remember to give more of the money for the part of Gloucester that the city annexed. It is quite true, as the leader of the Social Credit party has said, that the taxes in the annexed part have more than trebled, and it will be years and years before the city council can give those ratepayers any better service. I am not asking the government for anything, nor am I criticizing the administration of the city of Ottawa. I do not think it is fair for the members of this house to criticize the administration of the city council, a body elected by the public. I think these people should be more careful of the way they talk. I am just asking for more generous treatment of the annexed district of Gloucester until such time as the city is in a position to give service by way of sidewalks and so on to which the residents are entitled.

I should like also to say a word to my friend the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) who has expropriated about 3,000 acres of land in Gloucester for the Uplands airport. The township of Gloucester will no longer collect taxes on those 3,000 acres. I should just like the minister to reflect on the fact that the township of Gloucester will have to build roads at a cost of about $20,000, because of this expropriation. In the last three years, through expropriation or annexation by the city of Ottawa, the township has lost about two-thirds of its taxable land and is still obliged to build roads. I am sure that with the good Minister of Finance that we have, and the way this government wants to aid the municipalities, some way will be found to help them. I am not like some people who want the federal government to throw its money about. The minister has to be careful about that. It is all right for our good friends to say that this government should throw its money about, but when the time comes for taxes they do not say the same thing.

There is one thing I want to say in conclusion. Any minister of the government is always welcome to have buildings constructed in my riding. I am always happy to see these buildings erected, and I shall soon ask you to build some more. At the same time I hope that he will find his way clear to give a little more help with regard to taxation.

(Translation):

Mr. J. A. Bonnier (St. Henry): Mr. Speaker, I notice that since he has come to town, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) seems to be much more generous than when he was in Toronto—

Mr. Chevrier: You are right.

Mr. Bonnier: When he was in Toronto, the Ontario government derived its revenue from Ottawa just as the Quebec government counts on Montreal. In fact, the people of Montreal provide the government of the province of Quebec with approximately 40 per cent of its revenue. In other words, this percentage of revenue in the city of Montreal is appropriated by the provincial government, and the Ontario government behaves in the same way. The latter derives part of its revenue from Ottawa while the dominion government continually spends large sums of money in the capital. That is the difference between the two governments.

The government of Ontario operates its liquor stores. It also levies important revenues through a tax on gasoline. In addition, it draws large sums of money from its automobile licence bureau. In other words, no branch of the provincial government spends money in Ottawa, while the federal government provides a livelihood for approximately 90 per cent of Ottawa's population. The citizens of the capital city should therefore be happy to obtain a grant from the federal government.

The dominion government derives no revenue from Ottawa; on the contrary, it spends large sums here. When parliament is in session, members spend thousands and thousands of dollars in Ottawa.

That is the difference between the two governments. When the leader of the opposition was in Toronto, the Ontario government, of which he was the leader, was not over-generous. Why? It is true that the position of leader of the opposition in the House of Commons is quite different from that of premier of Ontario.

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, most of the discussion on this bill so far has been centred around buildings in cities. I see that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has ordered in another drink, so perhaps he is going to give us in the near future something worth while by way of relief.

Mr. Abbott: It is water.

Mr. Fair: I understand that is all that is allowed in this particular part of the house.

There is another section of the country that I think should also be taken care of, namely the country districts in which military camps are located. This morning for a moment or two we discussed the camp at Wainwright. This last spring particularly—and the same thing has happened in other years as well—many of our roads up in that part of the country were destroyed because of military trucks and other heavy equipment being used on them. We do not have paved roads up in that part of the country. While the municipality banned trucks and other heavy traffic from the roads, they were not able to prevent military equipment from passing over and breaking up those roads. When the minister is giving consideration to this matter, I think he should also consider some grants or taxes—and I think taxes would be a more appropriate name—to take care of damage done to the roads, and other such things.

I might also state that in that particular town of Wainwright, provision is being made, at the expense of the taxpayers of the town and district, for school and hospital accommodation of some of the personnel at the camp as well. Those who have advocated taxes on government property are, I believe, taking a step in the right direction. Now that the government has made a small move, I hope they will continue—that after creeping they will walk—and will carry on their program until justice is done in connection with the taxation of federal buildings and other property.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. Riley: I should like the minister to give some information with regard to the national harbours board property which is of considerable value in several of the ridings in various parts of the country. I know that the municipalities are anxiously awaiting some word about a formula for grants from the federal department in lieu of taxation with respect to this valuable property which is also a burden on the municipalities as to services.

Mr. Abbott: As I may have mentioned on a previous occasion, corporations such as the national harbours board have been instructed to negotiate with the municipalities appropriate tax agreements for the facilities owned by those harbour boards. Docks, of course, would not be included in the negotiation, but things such as grain elevators and other facilities would be included.

While I am on that point, there is something else that I perhaps might mention. It may be of some interest to the committee. While I of course have no accurate figures, I should point out that in connection with these various types of crown corporations, including Canadian National Railways, we estimate that the grand total of municipal taxes paid in the course of the year is probably some $7,500,000.

Mr. Fleming: There are a couple of questions that I should like to ask with regard to section 2 of the bill. In the house yesterday there was some discussion concerning canal properties and canal works. Is it a correct interpretation of the provisions of section 2, subsection (c), that in reckoning up the amount of class A federal property, canal properties would be included?

Mr. Abbott: I would have to verify that. I would think that the bed of the canal would probably not be included, but that any structures along the canal or land which was owned in connection with the canal might be included. I will, however, inform myself upon that point. I may have that information before the committee rises.

Mr. Fleming: I have a further question with respect to section 2 (c) (iii) which reads as follows:

> an improvement to land or structure that is not a building designed for the shelter of people, plant or movable property.

[Mr. Fair.]

We use the word "shelter" rather loosely. I should like to ask the minister if that is intended to include housing.

Mr. Abbott: No, it is not intended to include housing. I think the purpose of this section, as my hon. friend will appreciate, is to include such things, perhaps, as the pergola on the grounds here outside this building, a bandstand in a park and that sort of thing.

Mr. Fleming: The word means shelter from the elements, but does not include housing?

Mr. Abbott: Quite so. If housing is under the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation it is of course subject to taxes.

Mr. Fleming: Paragraph (e) defines real estate tax as a tax other than a water tax. There are rates on water in municipalities that can hardly be called a tax on water. They are rates paid in return for the purchase of the water supplied, and therefore if the expression "water tax" is intended to include water rates I doubt very much whether this is an accurate expression.

Mr. Abbott: I was endeavouring to turn up what I said about it in the statement that I made in the house on November 14, 1949—I cannot do it readily. But substantially what we do with respect to water rates is this. We pay for water supplied to government buildings. We prefer to do that on a meter basis. If meters are not available we negotiate an arrangement for the actual water service provided.

Mr. Fleming: A straight purchase?

Mr. Abbott: That is a straight purchase. In the definition, the real estate tax is to include the general municipal services other than the provision of water, which in some cases is provided by privately owned public utilities.

Mr. Fleming: If it is the intention of the minister to do that, does he not think there should be a change in the paragraph from water tax to water rates?

Mr. Abbott: We do not make grants in lieu of business tax, water tax or any tax levied on occupants as such.

Mr. Knowles: May I point out that the city from which I come does not include the water rates in the ordinary municipal tax bills as is done down here. But we do have taxes for the construction of, for example, the greater Winnipeg water district project. It is not a tax for the supply of water, but it is a tax for the building of a municipal improvement. I think the hon. member has something in the suggestion he is making that this wording needs to be looked into.

Mr. Abbott: This has been very carefully considered by the people who have been administering this act over the last year and a half. The essence of my point is that the federal government pays for the water which it receives from the municipalities, either on a meter basis or otherwise, but that it will exclude from the taxes to which this section makes reference any tax so called which is described in the municipal tax by-law as relating to water.

Mr. Knowles: My point is, if Winnipeg were fortunate enough to qualify under the four per cent formula, which it does not, we would then be faced with the section of the act which would say that we could not take into consideration including what we might get from the federal government for that greater Winnipeg water district tax, which is not a rate for the supply or purchase of water, but a tax for the construction of a municipal improvement.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend is quite right, because the construction of the water plant must be amortized out of the price paid for the water, and that would be excluded.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Two classes of federal property.

Mr. Fleming: The minister should make some further statement as to the way subsection 3 is to be interpreted. Powers are conferred on the minister here, in the determination of what is classed as property, which are very, very broad. They include federal property that accepts from a municipality a service that the municipality customarily furnishes to real property in the municipality and is, in the opinion of the minister, a material service. I would ask the minister to indicate to the committee what is the type of service that is regarded as a material service.

Mr. Abbott: The usual type of municipal service, police, fire and that sort of thing; but the provision and upkeep of roads and sidewalks is not a material service within the meaning of the bill.

Mr. Fleming: It is quite clear that the upkeep of roads and sidewalks is excluded from the definition of service.

Mr. Abbott: That is right.

Mr. Fleming: That is provided by subsection 2, but when we come to class B property we find that it clearly suggests that there are other forms of normal municipal services that are also to be excluded in addition to the exclusion of the provision and upkeep of roads and sidewalks. Since the minister is going to be the judge and the interpreter of this section I would ask for a clear statement of what are services that are not material.

Mr. Abbott: Oh, many services; for example, the generally accepted municipal services such as the provision of police protection, fire protection and the other ordinary services which are generally performed by municipalities, garbage collection, and so on, services which are ordinarily performed by municipalities are regarded as material services; but some municipalities give special services to their residents—I think that is probably recognized —which are far from being the general type of municipal service. I do not want to be tied down to them. I do not know exactly what they would be, but the generally accepted municipal services, such as garbage collection, police, fire and so on, are clearly within the definition.

Mr. Graydon: Schools, too?

Mr. Abbott: Oh, yes. That is a separate heading.

Mr. Fleming: What about things like community halls, day nurseries, supervised playgrounds, and services of that sort, which are well established services in our urban centres? They have been established for a long time and are regarded as normal services.

Mr. Abbott: I should think it would be rather doubtful whether they would be included.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Grants in respect of federal property.

Mr. Knowles: I may have missed it, but I do not see anywhere in the bill any clause calling for an annual report to parliament. The reason I ask this question in relation to this section is that with respect to this section, as with respect to section 3, we are giving certain powers to the minister. In view of the type of administration carried on, it seems to me that it would be desirable to have an annual report to parliament of the administration of this act. Can the minister say whether or not that was given any thought or whether it was an oversight?

Mr. Abbott: I should think that consideration was given to it, but the report would be in essence the table which I put on Hansard a day or two ago as to the grants paid during the preceding year. This of course will be contained in the public accounts of Canada and in the Department of Finance there will be an item, as there is in the supplementary estimates which I will be tabling within a few days, I hope, an item of the cost of administering the municipal grants division. And on that section when we are in committee I will give any further information that may be necessary. It did not seem desirable to go to the additional trouble of drawing a formal report.

Mr. Graydon: During the course of time the minister must have had some representation from the municipalities as to how these grants have been working out under the order in council arrangements of previous days. Has any representation been made by the municipalities to allow the ordinary assessment and taxation procedure which is applicable to private enterprise or ordinary ownership in a municipality to apply to government buildings in this country?

Mr. Abbott: I do not think there has been, because, as I said when this policy was announced, the government would have to reserve to itself the final determination of the valuation. Perhaps I should say that in arriving at that it is the practice of the municipal grants division, which is set up in my department, to have an officer of the division consult with the local assessor, and they discuss the valuation. In some of the larger cities such as Halifax and Ottawa we have retained the services of outside real estate experts to check the valuations and I think I am right in saying that there have been no serious differences of opinion with any of the municipalities over the valuations. But the value of government property as carried on most municipal assessment roles was pretty much out of date. No real attention was paid to the properties because they were not paying taxes. Now that we have nearly completed a fairly comprehensive survey I believe we are beginning to get the thing on a fairly even keel. I believe investigations are still going on in some municipalities; for instance, in Halifax there is still some difference of opinion as to certain buildings there. But we are having further checks made. That is the system followed.

Mr. Graydon: In simple terms under this measure, or under the order in council which applied previously, would the dominion government on the average pay as much taxes to a municipality as a similar project or a similar undertaking which was not under government auspices?

Mr. Abbott: Making allowance for the four per cent, which is considered a normal proportion of government properties in a municipality, and taking into account that the formula provides for the payment of only 75 per cent of the balance, I believe it does. The reason 75 per cent was included is that, among other things, it is recognized that in every municipality there is a very considerable amount of tax-exempt property, in addition to government property. It was felt some recognition must be given to the fact that government property and services do bring benefits to the municipalities. That is why 75 per cent of the excess, rather than 100 per cent, was fixed.

Mr. Fleming: I am concerned about the words "in his discretion". How is this discretion to be exercised? If there are principles to guide the minister, I think he should state them to the house.

Mr. Abbott: I do not wish to take the time of the committee. However, if my learned friend would do me the honour of reading my statement of November 14, 1949, he would see that I set out in detail the principles—and they are repeated in this bill.

Mr. Fleming: That is just a formula.

Mr. Abbott: But it is essentially an ex gratia payment, and it remains as such. That is why the words "in the discretion of the minister" are put in, namely to preserve the ex gratia principle. But my hon. friend will appreciate that the basis upon which the minister exercises his discretion is the application of the formula set out in the act.

Mr. Graydon: Is there any distinction between a property in which the title is in the crown, and a property of a company operating under its own name, but which is actually a crown company?

Mr. Abbott: This act does not cover crown corporations. As a matter of government policy they have been instructed to negotiate fair and equitable tax agreements with municipalities. For instance I am told that each year the Canadian National Railways pay about $4,500,000 in municipal taxes, and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation pays something in the order of $2 million.

Mr. Graydon: The minister says that crown corporations enter into agreements with municipalities. If a crown company decided not to enter into an agreement with a municipality, what would the municipality's position be?

Mr. Abbott: They would not have any taxes. I dealt with that subject the other afternoon when the hon. member was in a committee. However, crown corporations have been instructed to negotiate tax agreements with municipalities on a fair and equitable basis. As the hon. member probably knows, in many provinces—I am not sure about Ontario—it is common for large industries to negotiate tax agreements with municipalities. Sometimes those are confirmed by legislation. Crown companies have been instructed to follow a similar practice. Harbour boards, I know, are negotiating with different municipalities now in connection with taxes on their elevators.

The Deputy Chairman: May I remind hon. members that we must proceed to the Senate at 5.45 and, unless the bill is passed, we shall have to report progress.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall section 4 carry?

Mr. Fleming: No.

The Deputy Chairman: Mr. Speaker has just indicated to me that we need not interrupt proceedings until we receive the summons from the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod.

Mr. Graydon: So far as the minister is aware, has there been any complaint by municipalities with respect to assessment and taxes in respect of crown companies in various sections of Canada?

Mr. Abbott: I am not too well informed on that, because crown companies do not come under my jurisdiction. They are under various departments. I do know however that discussions are going on with municipalities to arrive at settlements. But some of those would be under the Department of Transport, others under the Department of Trade and Commerce, and so on.

I anticipate that reasonably satisfactory arrangements will be arrived at in all cases.

Mr. Graydon: It seems to me that sooner or later, because of the increase in the number of crown companies, some definite policy will have to be laid down in connection with dealing with crown companies, as in respect of dominion property covered in this bill. While there may not be many serious difficulties at the moment, from time to time we know there have been serious differences of opinion between crown companies and municipalities. That could be normally expected.

It seems to me however that municipalities ought to have some idea of the broad general policy the government proposes to employ in the matter of taxation of companies in which the dominion government has the sole interest. I urge upon the minister that before too much time elapses, now that the trial and error method has been employed from time to time, some definite policy should be laid down in connection with these companies. This is due to the municipalities; they should know where they stand in the matter of government policy on this point.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the section carry?

Mr. Fleming: No. As the minister suggested, I shall examine the principles he laid down in his speech of November 14, 1949. Was that a lengthy list of principles?

Mr. Abbott: It was a lengthy statement, but I am afraid I have not the reference in Hansard before me.

Mr. Fleming: Was it a list of principles the minister laid down as a guide to himself in the exercise of this discretion? The mere application of the formula is no answer to the question as to the principles which should guide the minister in the exercise of a discretion under section 4. That is what I am after. This will not be a completely unfettered discretion. It is a discretion which should be exercised according to some established principles.

Mr. Abbott: It is rather difficult to establish a principle in respect of an ex gratia payment, except that if certain conditions are complied with, payment will probably be made.

Mr. Fleming: I do not wish to argue the case with the minister—

Mr. Abbott: I have nothing to add to what I said in my statement of November 14.

Mr. Fleming: I do not wish to argue the point with the minister, but I would point out that when parliament has conferred a discretion on the minister, then parliament is entitled to know definitely on what principles the minister is proceeding in exercising his discretion. The fact that this is an ex gratia payment, and not a payment the municipalities will receive as of right, it seems to me makes it all the more necessary that there should be a statement of principles by which the minister proposes to be guided and bound in exercising his discretion.

Mr. Abbott: I cannot add anything to what I have said.

Mr. Gibson: Can the Minister of Finance state on what basis taxes will be paid on the Prime Minister's residence and Rideau Hall?

Mr. Abbott: The Prime Minister's residence would be included in the general formula and the value of the property would be considered. The formula set out in the bill would be applied and it would be lumped together with other government property.

Mr. Gibson: There must be some figure at which the Prime Minister's residence and Rideau Hall are assessed.

Mr. Abbott: That might well be, but I have not that figure here.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Grant where class A property exceeds four per cent of aggregate of assessed values and accepted values.

Mr. Fleming: I have in mind property exempt from ordinary assessment for general rates but liable to local improvement rates, and am wondering if a difficulty is not presented by the definition of taxable property in subsection 2.

Mr. Abbott: Taxable property is defined in section 2 as meaning real property in respect of which a person may be required by a municipal taxing authority to pay a real estate tax. The term "taxable property" as used here would exclude church and other property which would not be liable for special assessment.

Mr. Fleming: I do not think the minister has dealt with the real difficulty. In the province of Ontario when we want to make it clear that local improvement rates are not included, we spell it out expressly. I should think that a local improvement rate is a tax on real estate.

Mr. Abbott: If it is a tax on real estate then it comes within the definition of taxable property in section 2 (f).

Mr. Fleming: Let us have it clearly understood that you are including in your denominator and also in arriving at the extent of your class A property all property which is exempt from general assessment or general rates but which nevertheless is subject to local improvement rates. As far as Ontario is concerned, that would include practically every class of property, even though as in the case of church property it may be exempt from general assessment.

Mr. Abbott: I am not familiar with the tax situation in Ontario but taxable property will include property as defined in section 2 (f).

Section stands.

Progress reported.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Administrator desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the house went up to the Senate chamber.

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the house that the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Administrator had been pleased to give, in His Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bills:

An act to amend the Petition of Right Act.
An act to amend the Juvenile Delinquents Act, 1929.
An act to amend the Prisons and Reformatories Act.
An act respecting Units of Length and Mass.
An act respecting Indians.
An act to amend the Customs Tariff.
An act to incorporate Champion Pipe Line Corporation Limited.
An act to incorporate Independent Pipe Line Company.
An act to amend the Customs Act.
An act respecting Weights and Measures.
An act to incorporate The Baptist Union of Western Canada.
An act to amend The Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act.
An act to amend the Criminal Code (race meetings).
An act to incorporate The Scripture Gift Mission (Canada) Incorporated.
An act to incorporate The Polish National Catholic Church of America in Canada.
An act to amend the Quebec Savings Banks Act.
An act to amend the National Housing Act, 1944.
An act respecting British Columbia Telephone Company.
An act to amend the Excise Tax Act.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

MUNICIPAL GRANTS ACT

PROVISION FOR GRANTS TO MUNICIPALITIES IN LIEU OF TAXES ON CROWN PROPERTY

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 390, respecting grants to municipalities—Mr. Abbott—Mr. Dion in the chair.

Section 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Grants in respect of property acquired after December 31, 1948.

Mr. Fleming: I have a question on section 6. Subsection 1 confines the powers granted by this section to cases where federal property has been acquired since December 31, 1948. What is the reason for that limitation?

Mr. Abbott: Because the policy which is contained in this act was announced in November of 1949, and it was decided that it would be made effective for the year then current; that is, from January 1, 1949, and that it would not be made retroactive behind that date.

Mr. Fleming: Is the position of the minister not sufficiently protected by section 8 of the bill, without confining to cases where the government acquires the property after December 31, 1948, the power granted by section 6 to make grants thereunder?

Mr. Abbott: I think really the intention was to make it perfectly clear that it was not intended to go back of January 1, 1949.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Knowles: By leave.

Mr. Abbott: By leave of the house.

Mr. Abbott moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR CONSTRUCTION OF LINE FROM SHERRIDON TO LYNN LAKE, MAN.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. 376, respecting the construction of a line of railway by Canadian National Railway Company from Sherridon to Lynn Lake, in the province of Manitoba (as amended).

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Sections 1 to 8 inclusive agreed to.

On section 9—Fencing.

Mr. Green: I believe an amendment to section 9 was moved in the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. Have you a note of that amendment, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Chevrier: My hon. friend is correct in his statement, Mr. Chairman. The words "and station grounds" are to be removed from section 9.

The Chairman: I have the amendment here. Shall section 9 as amended carry?

Section as amended agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR REFUNDING OF FINANCIAL OBLIGATIONS AND ISSUE OF SUBSTITUTED SECURITIES

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 392, respecting Canadian National Railways and to provide for the refunding of matured, maturing and callable financial obligations.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. Fleming: I have a question with regard to the amount to be financed under this bill in general. As the parliamentary assistant said when he spoke on this matter yesterday, the four previous similar bills in 1935, 1938, 1944-45 and 1947 each provided for the same amount of refunding, namely, $200 million. May I ask him if that power of refunding in the aggregate up to $800 million was fully used up hitherto or is any balance of that amount still available for refunding?

Mr. Sinclair: No, Mr. Chairman. This $200 million is not advanced as a sum. It is authority either to issue bonds up to the amount for the specified period or alternatively for the government to advance funds to the railway until such time as they choose to make a refunding issue. As to the last $200 million, for example, the second table which I put on the record at the resolution stage showed that in this period there have been issues of $151 million made for the four-year period, of which $104,641,528, were for refunding purposes. The other was for capital expenditures under the other bill. On the other hand, if he will look at the first table which I put on the record at the resolution stage, he will see that the total of issues maturing and also issues which could be called in the period under this bill is $216 million. Therefore $200 million is a fairly good estimate of the actual amounts which are maturing and the amounts which may be called in this period.

Mr. Fleming: That does not give me the information I sought, Mr. Chairman. In the four previous bills a total of $800 million has been made available for refunding purposes. How much of that total has been used for that purpose, and how much is still available for the purpose of refunding, and will continue to be available in addition to the $200 million being made available under this bill?

Mr. Sinclair: In my answer I gave only a figure for the last issue of the $800 million. I am informed that $22 million is still available of the entire total of $800 million guaranteed.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

On section 6—Cancellation and cremation of original securities.

Mr. Knowles: I notice a word in this section that I confess I have not previously noticed in legislation, namely, the word "cremation". Apparently once these securities are no longer any good, authority is granted for them to be cremated. Why is that word used? Are these like living creatures of some sort? What is done with their ashes?

Mr. Sinclair: They are burned, and the same thing is done with their ashes as is done in the funeral process of cremation, they are scattered; but the word is used in all these statutes for the destruction either of securities or of currency bills. They may be cremated, it being the most secure way of making sure that the actual certificate is destroyed.

Mr. Knowles: Is there any special significance attached to the use of that word? It simply means, I take it, that they are definitely destroyed.

Mr. Sinclair: I think, with the exception of the hon. member, every hon. member in the house knows pretty well what it means.

Mr. Fleming: Total destruction by burning.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION TO MEET CERTAIN EXPENDITURES AND GUARANTEE OF SECURITIES AND INDEBTEDNESS

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 393, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures made and capital indebtedness incurred by the Canadian National Railways system during the calendar year 1951, and to authorize the guarantee by His Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, there is one comment that should be made on the principle of this bill in the light of the discussion yesterday, and the very useful and complete information then submitted to the house by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sinclair) and the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Benidickson).

The bill, as they have pointed out, follows the pattern of previous bills in relation to C.N.R. financing with the exception of three particulars. The first is the provision of working capital to the extent of $20 million. The second is the authorization to make advance commitments of $111,512,920, and the third is the authorization to use $16,522,000 from reserves for depreciation and debt discount amortization to meet authorized expenditures. One can say, I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that this illustrates the difficulties, when the crown is embarked on a commercial enterprise like the operation of a great railway system, of observing the rules in regard to parliamentary control over finance that we are accustomed to insist upon in the case of financing year by year. It is obvious, I think, Mr. Speaker, that a case has been made out in these particulars in the light of what was said yesterday by the two parliamentary assistants, for the departure from the ordinary practice that no commitments ought to be made in advance of the year in which the sums are to be voted.

The case was made clear yesterday that the company requires an additional $20 million of working capital, and that these commitments are made necessary by reason of the present rather overtaxed condition of the market in which the company must make its purchases of needed equipment.

The third point in regard to the use of the reserves for debt retirement amortization is a perfectly sound principle, in that the government now brings to parliament for approval the application of funds held for this purpose by the railway in order that they may now be applied to the purpose authorized by the bill in other respects; but that there is no possibility now of those being applied without direct parliamentary approval so as to reduce the net amount that would be applied otherwise in the way indicated to make capital expenditures.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Sections 1 and 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Capital expenditures authorized.

Mr. Sinclair: There has been an error in printing clause 3. In the second line of the section which begins:

The national railway system is hereby authorized to make capital expenditures in the calendar year . . .

The figure 1951 should be inserted. I would ask a minister to move:

That the figure 1951 be inserted after the words "calendar year" in the second line.

Mr. Gregg: I so move.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 4—Issue of securities.

Mr. Fleming: Subsection 2 of clause 4 reads:

Amounts available from reserves for depreciation and debt discount amortization may be applied towards meeting the authorized expenditures.

It will be noted that on the righthand side of the sheet, the figure of $16,522,000 is called an estimate of the amount available from reserves for depreciation and debt discount amortization. I noticed that when the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance was speaking on this matter yesterday he said, as recorded at page 4298 of Hansard:

Now, if the committee would like to have on the record the two calculations of the reserve of depreciation and the debt amortization available, I could put them on Hansard very easily. I could read it into the record, although it would be dull, or I could simply place it on Hansard if the committee agrees.

I understand that that information was not placed on Hansard, so that we have not on record the detail of the estimate of this figure. It would be well, Mr. Chairman, to have that figure on Hansard.

Let us bear in mind that it is only an estimate, whereas the effect of this bill would be to make the amount, whatever it may eventually prove to be, entirely available for the purpose of being applied towards meeting authorized expenditures. Will the parliamentary assistant do that? Will he also indicate the date on which this estimate was made and the likelihood there is of any very wide departure from it when the amount is finally ascertained?

Mr. Sinclair: Perhaps it was my fault that this statement which I asked to have included, and which was sent to Hansard, was not included. Actually I did not secure the consent of the house. I should have asked formally for the consent of the house. For that reason Hansard did not include the statement. The statement actually was made by the railway officials before the railway committee when the budget of the Canadian National Railways was being discussed. I will very gladly read it now if the committee wishes the table and statement which I wanted to put on record. It is as follows:

Reserves for depreciation
Estimated total 1951 accruals	$22,824,000
Less estimated charges for retirements, etc	6,672,000
Estimated 1951 increase in depreciation reserves available for capital expenditures		$16,152,000
Debt discount amortization
Estimated amortization charges through Income Account, year 1951	$ 643,000
Provision for discount which may be suffered on new bond and equipment trust issues in 1951	273,000
Net available for capital expenditures		370,000
Total		$16,522,000

This sum of $16,522,000 is mentioned in the explanatory note on the righthand side. These funds are available out of revenue. They are funds put aside for depreciation and funds put aside to amortize debt discount. Of course the natural place to invest those funds, on the part of the railways, is in their own securities. That is the provision made there.

Mr. Benidickson: I might point out that is the same figure as appears at page 136 of the proceedings of the sessional committee on railways and shipping. It was to page 136 that the hon. member for Greenwood was referring in his remarks yesterday on the resolution.

Mr. Fleming: Would one of the parliamentary assistants deal with my second question, which had to do with the date on which that estimate was made, and whether time has advanced sufficiently to enable them to indicate how close that estimate will be to the exact figure, because the bill will authorize the use of whatever sums are in those accounts, regardless of how close they may prove to be to the estimate.

Mr. Benidickson: It is a fairly accurate figure, because it is based on the assets known to be available at the end of the 1950 calendar year; and it takes into account additional assets that will come into the company this year, if this bill passes. The figure is available fairly early in the year for the C.N.R.

1951 budget, and C.N.R. witnesses have an opportunity to present the budget to the parliamentary committee on railways and shipping. It should be a fairly accurate figure.

Mr. Gibson: I should like to point out, for the edification of the two parliamentary assistants, that the course being followed by the Canadian National Railways is diametrically opposed to everything that has been suggested by the Department of Finance in respect of private business in Canada. In this instance they are taking $20 million more working capital, and placing very large orders in anticipation of shortages.

Mr. Sinclair: The Department of Finance has never suggested that industry essential to our defence requirements should be curtailed. I cannot think of anything more essential to Canada's defence plans and to Canada's ordinary industrial expansion than to see that we have adequate transportation facilities.

Section agreed to.

Sections 5 to 9 inclusive agreed to.

On section 10—When revenue of Trans-Canada Air Lines and subsidiaries insufficient to meet operating and income charges.

Mr. Fleming: Could the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Transport refer to page 138 of the report of the committee, and explain the item of $41 million for 1951 in connection with equipment trusts. Who holds the certificates issued under equipment trusts? Are they held by the Minister of Finance?

Mr. Benidickson: No, they are usually financed outside the Department of Finance. That is why in previous years we dealt here only with the net amount. But, as I explained yesterday, it is not anticipated that there will be a good market in the current year for that type of financing. It is expected that the normal securities will have to be provided to the Minister of Finance for the whole cost of equipment and that is why the gross amount is asked for this time in this bill.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Knowles: By leave.

Mr. Abbott moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

SUPPLY

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

HEALTH INSURANCE—PROPOSALS OF CANADIAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair I should like to speak for a few moments on a matter which arose when we were on the orders of the day this morning. I do so because I was astounded at the answer the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) gave to a question put to him by the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Henry). I was still more startled by the answer he gave to a supplementary question of mine with reference to the same subject.

The hon. member for Rosedale asked the Prime Minister if the government had given or would give consideration to government participation in proposals recently put forward by the Canadian Medical Association, with reference to prepaid medical care. In his answer the Prime Minister indicated that the hon. member for Rosedale had sent him a number of newspaper clippings to make clear the import of the question he asked. The Prime Minister said it was quite clear from those clippings that what was proposed by the medical association was that they should make use of their autonomous powers within the provinces to organize and administer a scheme of prepaid medical care. To my amazement the Prime Minister said that he, as an individual, and other members of the cabinet as individuals were greatly interested in these proposals and welcomed them as further evidence of the concern of the medical profession to increase the efficiency and the scope of their assistance to their fellow Canadians, acting in the role of good Samaritans.

As he went on to answer that question, and indeed in his answer to my question, he made it clear—although I must say in all fairness he was speaking somewhat off the cuff in his answer to my question—that he actually welcomed the idea of a form of health insurance being administered, not by the government but by the medical profession under its own autonomous powers.

I confess this attitude struck me as a case of the Prime Minister's backing away from declared Liberal proposals with regard to health insurance, and I felt it might be well to ask him at that time if consideration would be given at the next session of parliament to the setting up of a special committee to go into this whole question.

The Prime Minister replied to that by repeating the sort of statement he had made to the hon. member for Rosedale, and concluded with these words, which I noted:

I think that it would be a most happy solution if the medical profession would assume the administration of some plan that would be responsible for providing prepaid medical attendance to any Canadian who needed it.

I did not mind the Prime Minister congratulating the medical profession on any evidence of social responsibility that they may give, but I suggest that entirely apart from the views that we in this party hold, the Liberal party is already committed, and has been across the years, to the proposition that if we are going to have a proper program of health insurance it must be administered in the name of all the people by their government.

I just said that the Liberal party has been committed to that principle across the years. I shall go all the way back to 1919. I hold in my hand a copy of the report of the national convention of the Liberal party—this is the convention before the last one—held in Ottawa on August 5, 6 and 7, 1919. I find that the hon. gentleman who was later at that convention elected the leader of the Liberal party was speaking to a lengthy resolution on labour and industrial conditions. There were a number of subdivisions and Mr. Mackenzie King was speaking in support of the propositions set out in that resolution. I quote from page 127 of this official report:

That in so far as may be practicable, having regard for Canada's financial position, an adequate system of insurance against unemployment, sickness, dependence in old age, and other disability, which would include old age pensions, widows' pensions, and maternity benefits, should be instituted by the federal government in conjunction with the governments of the several provinces; and that on matters pertaining to industrial and social legislation an effort should be made to overcome any question of jurisdiction between the dominion and the provinces by effective co-operation between the several governments.

I well remember reminding Mr. King of the support he had given away back in 1919 to the principle of health insurance. In 1948 when Mr. King announced in this house the health grants program which is now in effect —a program only one-fifth of what the federal government proposed to the provinces in 1945—he himself went back and referred to that resolution of 1919 as a piece of unfinished business, something that he and the Liberal party had been committed to since 1919.

I jump across the years to the next Liberal convention, the one held in Ottawa in 1948. I have in my hand two pieces of evidence with respect to that convention. One is a copy of the Ottawa Citizen of Monday, August 9, 1948, in which are listed the twenty-one planks of the new platform adopted by the Liberal party at that convention. Plank 11 reads:

A comprehensive social security program.

I have also obtained a copy of the resolutions adopted at that convention in which resolution No. 11 relating to social security is spelled out as follows:

The Liberal party stands for a national program of social security in collaboration with federal and provincial governments with the following objectives: useful employment for all who are willing to work, standards of nutrition and housing adequate to ensure the health of the whole population; social insurance against privation resulting from unemployment, from disability, from ill health and from old age.

The program will include a steady extension of insurance on a contributory basis to protect all citizens from a temporary loss of income and to provide for their old age; health insurance covering medical, dental, surgical and hospital health services on a contributory basis; more equal care and opportunity for all children through family allowances; and pensions for the blind.

It will be noted that there was nothing in that plank adopted at the convention here in Ottawa in 1948 suggesting that the Liberal party would be satisfied with a program of prepaid medical care administered apart from the government by the medical association. The Liberal party reaffirmed the position taken by Mr. King in 1919 calling for a government program of adequate health insurance.

That was the declared policy of the Liberal party, declared in 1919 and reaffirmed in 1948. Its newly elected leader, the present Prime Minister, made a number of speeches during the year that followed the adoption of that new platform. Some of them were collected in the Canadian Liberal, a quarterly publication put out by the Liberal party. I hold in my hand the issue for the fall of 1949 and I find on pages 20, 21 and 22 a report of a national broadcast made on December 16, 1948, by the Prime Minister. From that speech I wish to quote one paragraph:

As for health insurance, the Liberal party has repeatedly said the federal government should help with a sensible and practical nationwide scheme whenever the provincial governments can reach a satisfactory agreement for dominion-provincial co-operation.

It is true that the Liberal party and the government keep talking of this in terms of dominion-provincial co-operation, and with that I agree. However, there is no suggestion anywhere in any literature of the Liberal party that this should be done apart from the government, that it should be administered by the Canadian Medical Association. The position of the Liberal party is clear. It believes in health insurance administered by the government, with emphasis upon dominion-provincial co-operation.

I am not taking time to state our C.C.F. position. This house and the country know that we have stood across the years for an over-all social security program, including a comprehensive program of health insurance administered in the name of the people by the government. We were pleased to discover in years gone by that the Liberal party seemed to be moving that way. I recall piling a number of reports up on my desk during another speech earlier this session which indicated the attention that had been given by parliament at the direction of the government to this question of health insurance. But the government seems to be backing away from this whole policy which it has adopted in black and white.

Last year in the special committee on old age security other matters that were not included in our terms of reference came up repeatedly. I think members of that committee will bear me out when I say that it was our feeling that at the earliest possible opportunity there should be established another committee similar to the one we had last year to do a job on this question of health insurance. But this year my questions to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) requesting that such a committee be set up were met with a point-blank "No" on at least two occasions.

Again this morning the Prime Minister simply brushed off my question by expressing satisfaction with the plan proposed by the Canadian Medical Association. I submit that this is an extremely important matter and I think those in this house who should be most concerned about the statement made this morning by the Prime Minister are the members of the Liberal party. The Liberals seem to take the view—

Mr. MacDougall: Let us worry about that.

Mr. Knowles: I am not only letting the Liberals worry about it, I am encouraging them to worry about it. I hope they will bring it up in a place where it may do some good.

An hon. Member: Not in Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Knowles: There are certain by-elections taking place just now—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: —and I have heard the Minister of National Health and Welfare speak in the glowing terms that he alone can use about what this government has done in the field of social security. I think particularly of a broadcast that I heard in Winnipeg two nights ago to the effect that we have social security; this is it; in other words there is to be no more. I submit that what the Prime Minister said this morning confirms that attitude, and what the Minister of National Health and Welfare said to me on at least two occasions this year also confirms that attitude. They seem to feel that because a fairly good report on old age security was made by the committee last year, which is now in process of being implemented, there is no need for us to concern ourselves about other measures of social security for a long time to come. That attitude is wholly wrong. I submit that just as Mr. Mackenzie King was concerned about this matter away back in 1919, just as the Liberal party reaffirmed its position in 1948, it is a matter of such serious consequence that the members of the Liberal party should read the answers which were given this morning and do their best within their own party councils to see to it that their party sticks to its declared policy of health insurance administered not by the medical profession but by the various levels of government in the interests of the people as a whole. Furthermore, I hope we will soon get a special committee to go into this very important question.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

General administration—

112. Departmental administration, $1,505,769.

Mr. Stanfield: Are the minister and his department thinking of taking any steps to support the price of dominion government bonds? I realize that there are many difficulties in the way of doing so, but at the same time many people when they bought those bonds were told that they could always get 100 cents on the dollar for them. I realize also that if they hold them to maturity they will get 100 cents on the dollar, but not everyone is able to hold his bonds. There are many small investors who for some reason or other find it necessary to sell $100 or $500 or $5,000 of their bonds. When they go to the bank and find the bond quoted at 96 or 97 or perhaps 98, they immediately wonder why they cannot get par for it. In fairness to those people who were told that Canadian government bonds would always be worth 100 cents on the dollar I believe those who have to turn in their bonds for one reason or another should be able to get their face value.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I dealt with this matter the other day in another connection. As far as Canadian government bonds are concerned, of course the government never gave any assurance to any purchaser that he would receive 100 cents on the dollar at any period of time other than maturity. The contract calls for payment of the face value of the bond at maturity and payment of the specified interest in the meantime. In the case of Canada savings bonds, they can be cashed at any time for face value plus accrued interest. Long term government bonds vary according to market conditions. Some of the victory bonds sold at substantial premiums, some as high as 105. At the moment, as I explained the other day, interest rates generally have increased, and the day to day price of government bonds is of course determined by the prevailing interest rate.

I do not know that I can add anything further. The government invests in bonds through various funds such as the unemployment insurance fund; the Bank of Canada invests in government bonds, but they are purchased at prevailing market prices. I repeat that the government never gave any undertaking except that an orderly and stable market would be provided for these bonds.

Mr. Stanfield: The government may not have given an undertaking, but when a great many people bought victory bonds they were given the assurance by those selling them and by the banks in general that they would always be honoured at 100 cents on the dollar.

Mr. Abbott: They will, in accordance with the terms of the bond.

Mr. Stanfield: I think they should be so honoured now.

Mr. Abbott: No government I know of issues a long-term obligation with a relatively high interest rate and guarantees the face value at any time. You cannot have absolute security, absolute liquidity and a high interest rate all at the same time.

Mr. Graydon: Surely the minister does not suggest the government has not given some support to these bonds in order to keep them up to where they have been. It is one thing for the government to say now that they did not give any guarantee the bonds would always sell at par, but the minister will hardly tell the committee that the government has not given some support to these bonds. Having established that principle I should not think the minister is in quite as good a position to back away as he seems to think he is.

Mr. Abbott: It all depends on what my hon. friend means by support. The government has been a purchaser and seller of government bonds in line with prevailing interest rates, but it has never attempted to maintain an artificial support for government bonds.

Mr. Graydon: None?

Mr. Stanfield: Oh, yes, you did.

Mr. Graydon: There will be wide disagreement with that statement.

Mr. MacInnis: I suppose the minister is quite right when he asserts that the government never gave any undertaking that the bonds would always remain at par. It was always understood, of course, that if the bonds were kept to maturity they could be cashed for their face value. But I do not believe that is the whole story, or that the case of the ordinary person who bought these bonds is put in quite the right light. It is quite possible that when people were going around selling the bonds they may have given the assurance that the bond could always be sold at par, though I never heard that assurance given; but we must remember that many of those who bought victory bonds during the war were not people who usually buy and sell bonds of that kind. They were people who really did not know anything about bonds, who perhaps had never had a bond before. They bought these bonds because the government pointed out that it was desirable to save, that it was necessary to do so in order to win that war, and all that sort of thing.

Today the person who bought $100 or $500 worth of these bonds sees those bonds being depreciated on the market. Perhaps that does not make very much difference to him, but in addition those bonds are depreciating every day in their purchasing value as prices rise, so the purchaser is being caught both ways. He is being caught with a bond which is depreciating in market value, and with a bond the money value of which is depreciating so fast that neither interest nor anything of that kind can keep up with it. I really think the government should do something, because it is the little fellow who does not specialize in the buying and selling of these bonds who is taking the rap, as it were. He is being disillusioned as to the stability of the world about him, and his mind is being prepared for any kind of disruptive philosophy that may be put forward. I do not know if the minister or the members of the cabinet understand the harm that is being done to the minds of people because of what is happening today.

Mr. Low: I was very much interested in what the minister had to say about the withdrawal of support on the market. I thought he indicated to the committee that the government or the Bank of Canada, whichever one it is that has been maintaining the support on the market to keep the price of bonds fairly stable at or just about par, withdrew its support. Is it not true that action was taken to withdraw the support about two years ago as a means of establishing a new interest rate, perhaps the first step in a deflationary program?

Mr. Abbott: No; speaking from memory I think the change in interest rates on government bonds followed the increase in interest rates on long-term government bonds in the United States, which was within the last six or seven months. I remember our last issue of bonds, which was a little less than a year ago, was made at approximately 2¾ per cent, which reflected nearly the lowest interest rate we had had in the post-war period.

Subsequent to that, as my hon. friend will recall, there was an increase in the long-term interest rate in the United States, following a long wrangle between the treasury and the federal reserve. At or about that time interest rates in Canada on long-term government bonds moved up pretty much in line with the movement and the price which the government of the United States offered for government bonds, and which presumably the Bank of Canada was prepared to pay.

Mr. Low: About two years ago, I think it was in the spring of 1949, did not the Bank of Canada announce that it was withdrawing its support?

Mr. Abbott: I think what the hon. member has in mind is that about two years ago the Bank of Canada ceased issuing a daily quotation for government bonds.

Mr. Low: That is right, and since that time they have gradually withdrawn their support of the daily market?

Mr. Abbott: I would not be prepared to say that. There is a difference between publishing a daily price which the bank would be prepared to pay for bonds, and simply allowing the normal processes of the market to operate, and the bank purchasing whatever bonds it wished in that market.

Mr. Low: Is it not true that the bank did not buy any bonds, at least all the bonds, which were offered to it at certain rates? It runs in my mind that the whole trend has been to allow the price to decline in order to bolster interest rates generally. That being the case, Mr. Chairman, I am just wondering if the minister and his department have been closing their eyes to this. Not only do people feel that they were guaranteed, in some respects at any rate, one hundred cents on the dollar when they bought those bonds, but they are now coming to realize that if they bought the bonds some years ago they paid dollars that were worth one hundred cents. Those who are forced to sell their bonds now are forced to accept a dollar which will only buy 53 or 54 cents in terms of the dollar of 1935-39. That is a serious thing for bondholders. It is going to make it very difficult for governments to finance the sale of bonds in the future unless something is done to treat the bondholder properly.

It seems to me that that sort of thing is destroying the faith of the people in government. One of two things can be done to restore that faith. The first one is that the government can take steps to restore the value of the Canadian dollar and to stabilize more or less at a uniform level over the years. It seems to me that is one of the responsibilities of government. To put cents back into the Canadian dollar seems to me to be a very important responsibility of government. The second alternative would be to have the Bank of Canada support the price of bonds in the market so that if people need to dispose of their bonds at any time they will be able to get one hundred cents on the dollar. Is that not one of the government's responsibilities?

Mr. Abbott: I must confess that I do not believe, and have never believed, that a government, by governmental action alone, could maintain a stable purchasing power for its unit of currency. Inflation is a most unfortunate phenomenon. I agree with the member for Vancouver East that it is extremely unfortunate that since the end of the war, but really as a result of what happened during the war, we have sustained a substantial measure of inflation. The government is doing what it can or what it believes is possible to check these forces. One of the weapons being used is to permit a mild increase in the interest rates. So far as we are concerned, under the system under which we operate, I do not believe it is possible to control absolutely the internal purchasing power of our unit of currency. We might if we had the Russian system, but without adopting a completely authoritarian system and shutting ourselves off from the rest of the world, I do not believe that is possible.

Mr. Gibson: I wonder if the minister would state whether there is any reason why the holders of these bonds should not be able to go to a bank and obtain a loan of up to ninety per cent of the face value of the bond? Have any instructions been issued by the government which would militate against obtaining loans of that kind?

Mr. Abbott: No, the government has not issued any instructions to banks in connection with credit. As I explained before, the banks were asked by the Bank of Canada to endeavour to maintain the over-all level of their credit at approximately what it was at the end of the year. They have not been able to achieve that, for reasons which are no doubt good and sufficient. So far as I am aware the banks are prepared to lend on government bonds within proper limits, and I have no doubt they are doing so.

Mr. Stanfield: I should like to point out to the minister that a lot of people borrowed money from the banks at that time to buy those bonds. They were encouraged to buy the bond and they borrowed from the bank or anyone at all. They always thought they could get 100 cents on the dollar for them. I do not believe it is fair now when people have to turn in a $100 bond they only get $96. I believe they should be given a 3¼ per cent bond in exchange for their present bond so they would get 100 cents on the dollar. It is not right for the government to allow the people to take a depreciation on their bonds. I do not think it is good faith or good business.

Mr. Wright: When these bonds were being sold in 1943 I raised with the then minister of finance, Mr. Ilsley, the question of whether or not these bonds could be guaranteed at par. At that time he stated it was impossible for the government to give that guarantee, but he said it would be the policy of the government to maintain that price as close to par as possible. He also said it was unthinkable —I think those were the words he used—that there should be any very great depreciation so far as the value of these bonds was concerned. I do not suppose the present minister thinks that $2 or $3 depreciation is any very great depreciation. But that depreciation has come about as a direct result of the action of this government.

Mr. Abbott: No, it has not.

Mr. Wright: It certainly has.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend is completely wrong.

Mr. Wright: The government has, through the Bank of Canada, instituted a policy of a higher interest rate which has the result of lowering the price or value of these bonds. There is no doubt about that. The minister himself stated that.

Mr. Abbott: The Bank of Canada was simply recognizing what had taken place elsewhere.

Mr. Wright: It was the policy of this government.

Mr. Abbott: That may be all right for a by-election in Saskatchewan, but it does not mean much to me.

Mr. Wright: The minister has stated it himself in this chamber. Certainly these bonds were sold to people, and they have depreciated in value. One of the reasons why the minister wants a higher interest rate in this country is to stop inflation. Perhaps by stopping inflation he may in the long run increase the purchasing value of the dollar, and the man who has these bonds may be better off than he would be by selling them at 97, provided the cost of living goes down as a result of this action. But the cost of living has not gone down to date as a result of the action of the government. The cost of living is continuing to rise; and not only is the man who purchased these bonds losing in the value of the dollar if he cashes them, but he is losing in the value on the bonds themselves.

Mr. Abbott: Not unless he sells them.

Mr. Wright: Certainly not unless he has to sell them. But in many cases if he is to continue to give his family a decent standard of living today, he has got to sell those bonds. Certainly if he wants to purchase any amount of goods or if he wants to extend his business, if he has bonds the only way he can extend his business or the only way he can purchase these goods is, in many cases, by selling those bonds. The people who buy them are certainly guaranteed, as the minister says, one hundred cents on the dollar.

I can remember quite well what happened to these bonds after the first war. They went down to about 85 cents or 87 cents on the dollar. Many of us who had sent home the bit of savings that we had during the war and purchased those bonds came back to Canada and had to sell the bonds for 85 cents on the dollar. The banks or the institutions that purchased them obtained 100 cents on the dollar, and 5 per cent on them as well. To a lesser extent the same thing is taking place right today. I say again that it is the policy of this government, through its action through the Bank of Canada in increasing interest rates, that has depreciated the value of these bonds.

Mr. Quelch: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister a question regarding the effects of their anti-inflationary policy. We all realize that there is a great change in the economic picture in Canada since June of last year. Prior to that time everybody was worried about the possibility of a depression. The Minister of Resources and Development was warning that unless people started to spend their money more freely we were likely to have a depression. He made such a speech before the advertising club in Toronto. The situation is completely different now as a result of the war in Korea. Defence expenditures are competing with private demand for goods. There is a certain amount of what you might call war mentality among the people. They are afraid that goods are going to become scarce so they try to buy in advance in order to make sure that they will get them before they disappear from the market. In addition to that, the kind of talk that is being carried on by several ministers of the government with regard to the fact that we are not having price control today but we may have it in the near future, I think caused many industries to try to jump the gun and raise prices in anticipation that price control might be brought in. I think all that added to the inflationary pressure within the country.

The government's policies today are for the purpose of trying to counteract that inflationary trend. They brought in credit restrictions, and one of the effects has been that car industries are laying off men. I think the minister will agree with me that one thing that we cannot afford today is to have idle men and idle machines. It is bad to have inflation; that is true. But the greatest evil today is idle men and idle machines. The world today needs the greatest production that the countries of the world are capable of carrying out. The minister must admit that the laying off of men in the car industry is a direct result of the government's policy in restricting credit.

Mr. Abbott: I would not admit that. I would say that it is a bit of anticipation of demand.

Mr. Quelch: The minister said there was—

Mr. Abbott: When you sell 50,000 units in one month, that is a great many units.

Mr. Quelch: The minister has suggested that there was overproduction; yet I waited three months to get a car. There did not seem to be overproduction.

Mr. Abbott: You can easily get one now.

Mr. Quelch: Exactly; because the car industries are claiming that as a result of the credit restrictions they cannot sell their cars. They claim that if the restrictions were removed, they would immediately be able to sell them.

Mr. Abbott: They may use that as an excuse.

[Mr. Quelch.]

Mr. Quelch: Apart altogether from the reason, the point we must keep in mind is that today we have idle men and idle machines in certain parts of this country. Many people fear that situation will increase. The question is this: What are we going to do about it? I thought that part of the idea behind the government's policy was to try to curtail demand for goods utilizing a large percentage of steel, as steel is needed for war purposes. It seemed to me that perhaps the government had sort of jumped the gun and that they had started to curtail demand before defence expenditures were such as to take up that slack. I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce pointed out that large orders for defence would perhaps be placed with some of these car industries in the near future. But in the meantime these men and these machines are idle. I think that is a point that the minister should be able to give some assurance on. Are we going to see in other industries a repetition of what is happening in the motorcar industry? I am sure the minister will agree that it would be a most deplorable situation if, at a time like this, there continued to be idle men and idle machines. We must have an increase in production. The best way to combat inflation is to expand our production. Can the minister give any assurance that that slack will be taken up?

Mr. Abbott: I quite agree with my hon. friend that it is most undesirable that we should have idle men and idle machines. But to take the specific case that he mentions, namely the automobile industry, and as to the lay-off of a week or ten days, or even if it were longer, I am led to believe that there are other fields of endeavour in Canada in which these men could be rapidly utilized.

It is not absolutely essential that we go on, month after month, producing an increasing number of motorcars. There are a great many other things that are needed, and that are not entirely related to defence. For instance, in the month of March almost 50,000 new motor vehicles were delivered through retail channels. By all accounts that was an all-time high, as compared with the same month of last year, when the figure was about 35,000; and that in turn was much higher than the year before. In April the figure was almost 47,000; I have not yet the figures for May. But I believe that motorcars have been turned out rather more rapidly than the community is perhaps able to absorb them. It may need a little bit of averaging for a few months.

But on the general point raised by my hon. friend, we should of course do everything possible to utilize all our men and machines. But the government policy at the moment is intended to try to utilize the price system to some extent to achieve that redistribution of labour.

Mr. Low: I have often wanted to have the minister get into a real fundamental debate on his financial policy. On various occasions since 1945 we have asked the minister to bring forward his estimates early in the session so that we could get down to just such a debate, because there are a great many things that I should like to know and that I am sure that other hon. members would like to find out. However, here we are again on the home-stretch and we are just now getting these estimates before us. I see some hope, however, of getting such a full-dress debate because on the order paper there is a motion—I think it is No. 22 on today's order paper—that in committee of the whole a certain resolution will be moved for the introduction of a measure to consolidate and revise the Department of Finance and Treasury Board Act and so on. I said to some of my colleagues just a few days ago, when I saw this motion on the order paper, that I felt that this would perhaps offer the very finest opportunity for a full-dress debate on the financial policy of this government. Since it is possible that this bill will come forward at some time in the near future, perhaps in the fall session, if not earlier, we think that we should take advantage of it, and I should like to serve notice on the Minister of Finance that that is when we intend to usher in a full-dress debate. We would like him to be prepared and get his armour on.

Mr. Abbott: I will be ready.

Mr. Low: I am glad to have him accept, because there are a good many things that we have brought forward over the years, which, while they have not been successfully denied, have not been admitted, and I should like to have some of these things admitted by the government or to have it shown where we are wrong.

However, there is one thing I should like to have the minister do tonight. I wish the minister would take just a few minutes to tell the committee what part the Bank of Canada plays in the formulation of his financial policy. I should like to get clear in my mind just who sets the policy. Is it the Bank of Canada? Is it the treasury? Is it the treasury and the Bank of Canada combined, or what? If the minister would oblige us—I do not ask him for a long detailed exposition—with at least something to help me to get my thinking straight on this whole matter, I should appreciate it.

Mr. Abbott: The responsibilities of the Bank of Canada of course, as my hon. friend is well aware, are set out in the Bank of Canada Act. It is a corporation which is independent of the government as such. The government owns all the shares of the Bank of Canada and is entitled to the profits, after certain reserves have been established. Under the Bank of Canada Act the governor and the directors of the bank are given specific statutory responsibilities with respect to the issue of currency, and among their responsibilities is to do what is possible within their sphere to maintain the integrity of the currency.

Naturally the governor of the Bank of Canada, the Minister of Finance and his permanent officials operate in very close consultation, and the relationships are very close. The Bank of Canada has certain defined statutory responsibilities which, under the statute creating it, it is obliged to carry out. The government has other responsibilities, and among other things I suppose government policy can inevitably affect the value of currency, and to that extent could negative action which the bank might attempt to take. Frankly, I did not come prepared this evening to engage in detailed analysis of the relative relationships between the Bank of Canada and the government. I have not the Bank of Canada Act here, but broadly speaking they are parallel responsibilities. The government, of course, if it were not satisfied with the action taken by the governor and the directors of the Bank of Canada, would have to change the management of the bank.

Mr. Low: Yes.

Mr. Abbott: So that I suppose it is fair to assume that the ultimate responsibility must fall upon the government.

Mr. Low: That is the point that I am glad to have. The minister says that he did not come prepared tonight to go into detail with respect to the relative responsibility, and so on, of the treasury and the Bank of Canada. I would like to serve notice on the minister that we would like to go into that in fair detail at a time when it is propitious to do so.

There is one thing further that I should like to have the minister discuss just briefly before the committee. I think he has said on a number of occasions in this committee that he felt the Bank of Canada could quite successfully control the credit policy of the country so as to prevent any undue inflationary effect of the issue of credit. I believe that one of his anti-inflationary measures was to advise the chartered banks, through the Bank of Canada, to begin some curtailment of credit. I think that has been done. The policy is now in effect. I have discussed it briefly with bank managers, and they say that while the order, or the advice, if you want to put it that way, from the Bank of Canada is causing them no end of grief because of necessity for sending to headquarters a great many applications for loans that may extend over let us say twelve months, yet it is working to some extent. If we do grant that the Bank of Canada has some effective control of the amount of credit which the chartered banks can issue, and thus may have some sort of braking effect upon inflationary tendencies, at a time like this, the question that I would like to ask the minister is this: If the reverse situation came about, that is, if we ran into a period where the surpluses of goods in the hands of producers and distributors throughout the country become such as to bring about a threatened period of unemployment and recession, will the minister tell us what mechanism the Bank of Canada has to see that we do not get into a period of disastrous recession or depression.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend has asked me what the Bank of Canada should do under these circumstances. As he pointed out, following consultation with the chartered banks, the Bank of Canada felt that economic conditions were such that the chartered banks would be well advised to curtail any further expansion of credit, and I think that by and large the banks are beginning to achieve that end.

Mr. Low: They are.

Mr. Abbott: If conditions were somewhat the reverse of what they are today and the deflationary forces were paramount, then I have no doubt that the governor of the Bank of Canada, and the officials of the Bank of Canada as competent technicians in this field, would discuss with the chartered banks and would suggest to them that under these conditions—they would encourage them, shall I put it this way, to pursue a more expansionist policy. These things are all in the exercise of judgment on the part of those who have to make these decisions.

Mr. Low: I think that is put very well. But the minister knows that when surpluses begin to appear and we face possible deflationary conditions confidence is lost very rapidly. It is easy to put a brake on the issue of credit, but does the minister feel that there is a sufficiently strong mechanism closely enough integrated with his own department's control so that they could prevent a serious loss of confidence and bring things back to a level of economic stability?

Mr. Abbott: I will answer my hon. friend in this way. I think today we have organizations, knowledge and techniques in this field which we did not possess in that unfortunate period from 1930 to 1935 or 1936. We have a central bank. We have a central bank now with considerable experience. We have a central bank with management in which I for one have the greatest confidence; and while, as I say, these questions are all matters of judgment in the use of these weapons, they are pretty blunt weapons. I agree that when deflation sets in deflationary forces are created rather easily, and then confidence is lost. But that is where the exercise of judgment comes in. One must be sure that one does not push either on the contraction side or on the expansion side too strongly.

Mr. Sinnott: I hear some of my colleagues condemning me for saying a few words; but this is a very important matter and I think it should be discussed thoroughly.

An hon. Member: By you.

Mr. Sinnott: I agree with the minister when he put his curtailment of credit on cars. In the long run I think the majority of Canadians will benefit a lot from it. If this policy of easy credit were to go on those who want to purchase cars now but have only small down payments would have to go to those financial institutions charging 12 or 14 per cent for the balance of the money. The financial institutions would be the ones who would benefit. With the policy of the government today credit controls will be effective until purchasers of cars have enough money for a down payment.

The hon. member for Peace River has raised the matter of municipal financing. It was only this afternoon that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni referred to my municipality of Brokenhead.

Well, I have had some experience along these lines, and I should like to pass on that experience. During my term of office in the municipality which, after ten years, I still have the honour to represent, there were changes in the debt position. When I took office we had a debt of $366,000. After a period of ten years of good financing we do not owe a dollar to anybody.

I notice according to the public accounts that in 1867 at the time of confederation Canada had a national debt of $75,728,641. We operated at a deficit for the first four years. In the fifth year there was a net decrease in public expenditures so that the national debt was reduced by $503,224. Then for some years we were in the red. But later, in 1881, there was surplus of $1,734,000. They went on for ten years with a deficit every year until the year 1900, when there was a small surplus of $779,000.

Mr. McIlraith: That was under a Liberal government again.

Mr. Sinnott: I am not talking about Liberals or Conservatives, because I am going to advocate a national policy to reduce Canada's national debt to nil. Then we come down to 1914 when, at the time of the first great war, we had a deficit, and that continued for ten years. After the war was over there was a decrease in the national debt for a period of seven years, which was followed by a period of deficits.

I agree wholeheartedly with the Minister of Finance in the policy he has followed in the last four years. This year while we have very large expenditures to take care of war requirements we are still able to finance those requirements and have money left in the coffers for a reduction in Canada's national debt. I am not saying that it is either good or bad when either of the major political parties is in office; but I do say that with a definite policy for twenty years we would not need to levy one cent more than we are levying right now, with our heavy war expenditures. With an amount of $782 million a year plus interest for a period of twenty years Canada's national debt would be reduced to nothing. I trust the opposition will keep in mind that the surpluses we have had in the last few years, and for which they have criticized the government, are to be used to reduce Canada's national debt, and they have done so to a considerable extent. I would hope that in the next twenty years, whether the Liberal party is in office or not, Canada's national debt would be reduced so that the money we are using to pay interest charges could be used for other social purposes.

Mr. Quelch: I would ask the Minister of Finance whether there has been any change in attitude on his part regarding the effect of financing through the Bank of Canada. He will recall that in the depression years we advocated that the government use the Bank of Canada to finance public works so as to provide employment. That was at a time of large-scale unemployment. The argument his predecessor used, and one which he himself has used, was that if that were done and the money issued reached the chartered banks they would then be in a position to expand their loans ten to one, and thus cause inflation.

I notice however that the officials of the Bank of Canada have never agreed with that statement of the minister or his predecessor. They take the stand that just because money was issued would not necessarily mean that the chartered banks would expand their loans ten to one, because all that would be necessary would be for the Bank of Canada to advise the chartered banks that they did not want them to expand their loans, and that in this way it would not be done. In other words, the Bank of Canada believes there is sufficiently close co-operation between themselves and the chartered banks to avoid action of that kind.

I wish to assure the minister than I am not at this time advocating the use of the Bank of Canada, because this is an entirely different situation. But in case that situation does develop, and in case war develops and we find ourselves in a position where, in spite of heavy taxation and heavy borrowing from the people's savings, we still have to have a degree of monetary expansion, as we did in the last war, it might be wise and, in my opinion, would be wise, to use the Bank of Canada rather than the chartered banks. I was wondering if the minister would agree that in that case there is a sufficiently close co-operation between the Bank of Canada and the chartered banks to assure that if we did finance to a certain extent through the Bank of Canada rather than through the chartered banks it could be done without expanding the amount of money issued by ten to one.

Mr. Abbott: I should not like to commit myself to agreeing completely with the hon. member on the point. As he has indicated, I have had occasion to discuss it at another time. It is a complex and technical matter. The relationship between the Bank of Canada and the chartered banks might be very close; but if the expanded currency credit by the Bank of Canada were to get into the hands of the chartered banks and could not be used by them I would think it would be extremely difficult to prevent their expanding in approximately the ratio he has suggested. However, I do not think it is wise to be too dogmatic in these matters. If a condition such as he suggests were to develop again I have no doubt that, as was the case in 1939, some moderate expansion might not only be necessary but might well be desirable.

Mr. Low: Through the Bank of Canada?

Mr. Abbott: Well, it was done that way.

Mr. Fleming: I believe my observations might apply to either item 112 or 113. On more than one occasion the minister has made a good deal of the government's efforts, so called, to reduce expenditures. One would have expected that, with that policy originating in the Department of Finance, there would have been reductions in the expenditures of that department, and that it would have led the way. I notice that the two items under the heading of general administration total this year $13,590,710, whereas last year they were only $12,758,245, or an increase of $832,465. I realize, of course, there has been an increase in salaries paid to civil servants, and those increases were accepted by all members as timely and well warranted. But I was wondering why we do not find in the estimates of this department any perceptible decrease in expenditure.

We listened with interest to the observations of the hon. member for Springfield, and recalled what had been said on many occasions by the Minister of Finance about the fruits of the policy of high surpluses, even if not budgeted for, and debt retirement. But when we come to examine the public debt charges at page 17 we find that the charges being provided for this year actually show an increase over last year. Last year the total was $423,710,000 and this year they have risen to $427,363,000. I am quite sure that the increase in the interest rate on government borrowings, which has been evident in the past six months, is not reflected as yet in these estimates and there must be some further explanation for the increase.

Mr. Abbott: The increase in the general administrative item, as in the earlier items, is due entirely to increased salaries. In the case of the general administration vote we have 51 positions less than last year. Notwithstanding that reduction in staff, our payroll will be $50,000 higher. In the case of the comptroller, which of course is a very large establishment, we have 275 positions less than last year, or 3,897 positions as against 4,172. The increase in that branch is almost entirely due to general salary revisions together with the increased cost of office supplies and equipment, new cheque writing equipment and additional mailing charges in respect to larger volume of family allowances cheques.

In the case of charges for interest on the public debt, the increase there is due entirely to involuntary borrowings. By involuntary borrowings I mean payments made into our pension fund, and into the annuities account. When we sell annuities we have to pay three per cent, or credit three per cent interest to the account. Then there is also the interest on Canada savings bonds. The increase in that item is due entirely to this form of involuntary borrowing.

Mr. Fleming: Even taking into account these forms of involuntary borrowings, we must remember that the debt was lower at the end of 1950 than it was at the beginning.

Mr. Abbott: This does not show as part of the funded debt.

Mr. Fleming: Even taking account of the surplus that the minister has mentioned and which we were given to understand went entirely for debt reduction—

Mr. Abbott: Net debt reduction.

Mr. Fleming: I think most members of the house understood that it was in fact a net debt reduction. Are we to understand that because of these involuntary borrowings there was no net debt reduction?

Mr. Abbott: I know my hon. friend appreciates the difference between gross and net debt. While on the one side of the balance sheet, in the case of these pension funds, and so on, we have an obligation which is part of our gross debt; in the net debt we take credit for the asset which is the amount in the fund.

Mr. Quelch: I should like to refer to the FAO for a moment and I know it may be said that this is part of the Department of Agriculture or the Department of External Affairs. The matter I wish to deal with has to do with the financing of exports of commodities. Two days ago I quoted from the report of the director general of FAO for 1949-50 where he referred to the fact that there is far too little food for the world's hungry mouths and that an increase in production would not be enough to keep pace with the number of human beings. Then he went on to say that more and more people realized that such conditions were no longer necessary.

I think the food and agriculture organization has done some fine work in the past but unfortunately much of that work has been nullified by the member nations turning down its recommendations. That same report refers to the fact that two or three proposals were made to deal with the distribution of surplus food to the hungry people of the world, and I quote from page 13 of the report as follows:

> The first proposal for a world food board which would buy supplies during periods of surplus and release them during periods of scarcity, was turned down by governments.

The next proposal of the FAO was for an international commodity clearing house, with much narrowed functions.

Mr. Abbott: Item 96 deals with the food and agriculture organization of the United Nations. I am afraid I am not prepared to discuss this matter under my estimates.

Mr. Quelch: I am simply giving a background for the question I am going to ask which I think comes directly within the minister's sphere. As I mentioned, the international commodity clearing house was turned down. Here is an interesting point. Canada's delegate to the food and agriculture conference, the Minister of Agriculture, took the stand that there was nothing in the international commodity clearing house that could not be done individually by a nation. That was one argument he presented for turning down that proposal.

We may soon face a situation where we have surpluses of food in Canada and there will be certain countries in the world where people are starving but where they will be unable to finance imports of our food. The Minister of Agriculture said that there was nothing in the idea of an international commodity clearing house that we could not do by ourselves. The conditions out west never looked better. I do not want to be too optimistic because as a farmer I know how conditions can change, but there is more moisture this year than we have had for many years.

If we have large crops with resultant surpluses, if we are faced with the fact that people are starving in a country like India and India is unable to pay for our surplus food, will the minister give us the assurance that his department will provide the means by which exports of food to needy countries can be financed? I have great confidence in the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but after all his job is to trade our food for the products of other countries. If a country has no commodities to trade with us the Minister of Trade and Commerce will not be able to trade with them.

The responsibility will then lie with the Minister of Finance to find ways and means of getting the surplus food of this country to the nations that need it. Mind you, our delegate turned down the recommendation for an international commodity clearing house which would have provided the means by which that surplus food could have been delivered to needy people.

Mr. Abbott: I am afraid that I am not familiar with the proceedings of FAO and what methods are adopted to finance foreign trade at some future time. I do not think it would be appropriate for me to give an assurance now as to what we would do. That would be a matter of policy that would have to be decided at that time. We were discussing export credits a little earlier, and by means of loans to the United Kingdom and other countries we have assured a fairly steady market for our export products. I would not attempt this evening to forecast what the policy of the government would be under some future set of conditions.

Mr. Quelch: If in the future we have a surplus of food and if there are people in any part of the world needing that food, all I want the minister to do is to assure us that his department will see that ways and means are found by which that food can be got to those hungry people. In other words, we want assurance from the minister that his department will not allow food to rot while there are hungry people in any part of the world needing that food. I am not asking the minister to declare what his policy will be; I am just asking for that assurance.

Mr. Abbott: In the ten or eleven years I have been a member of this house there has been no case in which food has rotted because we have been unable to find a means of disposing of it to people who needed it, and I hope I will not have that experience during such time as I remain here.

Mr. Quelch: That may be true about Canada, but food has been allowed to rot in the United States. They had a great many surpluses which were stored; eggs, for example, were kept for so long that they rotted, and today they are giving food away.

Mr. Abbott: I have enough troubles of my own without looking after any in the United States.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Just as a point of interest I may tell the minister that fish was dumped in Newfoundland last year.

Mr. Wright: Under what item does the Canadian farm loan board come?

Mr. Abbott: I am told there is no item covering it. That is a separate corporation, as my hon. friend knows, and there is no vote for it. If my hon. friend wanted some information I would be glad to have him ask for it now on the general item.

Mr. Wright: It is not exactly information; I want to make a suggestion to the minister. The Canadian Farm Loan Board Act was passed in 1929, and under it loans were made on farm lands of up to 50 per cent of the appraised value of the land. The total amount of the loan that could be made to any one borrower was $5,000. In 1934 the act was amended to permit a second mortgage loan of up to $2,000. Since that time there has been no change in the amount that can be loaned, and today we find that these amounts are not large enough. The value of land, of machinery and of everything the farmer has to buy today has doubled or tripled since 1929, and many young farmers find it impossible to obtain an economic farm unit with the amount of money that can be borrowed under this act.

Until 1945 these loans carried interest at the rate of 5 per cent on first mortgages and 5½ per cent on second mortgages. At that time the interest rate was reduced to 4½ per cent on first mortgages and 5 per cent on second mortgages. The difficulty today, as I am sure the minister will realize, is that the amount that can be borrowed is really too small to obtain enough land. The cost of land is greater, and all the expenses that go into the establishment of an economic unit for farming are easily twice today what they were when this act came into force. If this legislation is to do the job it should do I believe the maximum amount that may be borrowed must be increased.

There is a demand for these loans. The 1950 report states that the board carried forward 565 loan applications not disposed of during the previous fiscal year, and received a further 4,639 applications. It states further that the loans granted amounted to $5,189,400 as compared with $4,919,300 the previous year. So there is a demand for this type of loan. The purpose would be served much better, I believe, if the minister could see his way clear to have the amount of the loan that can be made to one applicant increased to at least $10,000 instead of $5,000, because today $10,000 will not do any more than $5,000 did when the act was passed in 1929. I just want to bring this to the attention of the minister and ask him to consider it—

Mr. Abbott: I will be glad to do that.

Mr. Wright: —and see if something cannot be done to increase the amount of these loans.

Mr. Abbott: I will be glad to take these representations into consideration.

Mr. Blackmore: I would like to ask the minister one or two questions before the item carries. I gathered when the minister replied to the hon. member for Peace River that he intimated, if he did not state, that one of the functions of the Bank of Canada was to guarantee the integrity of the Canadian currency. Is that correct?

Mr. Abbott: I do not know that I put it in just those terms. I do not remember exactly what I said, but what I intended to say was that one of its functions was to see to the management of the Canadian currency, that it should be issued in proper form, not to excess, and so on.

Mr. Blackmore: I would like to know whether the minister would agree that the expression "integrity of the Canadian currency" would be accurate. Would he accept that as being an expression of the concept that is in his mind?

Mr. Abbott: I do not know whether or not I used that term. I think perhaps that word might be just a little too strong. There is a limit to what the bank can do. I gave a fairly carefully worded offhand explanation and pointed out that whatever the bank might do or whatever it felt it might do could be negatived by government policy, and that therefore in all these matters the ultimate responsibility would have to fall on the government. I really do not think I can elaborate on that very much tonight.

Mr. Blackmore: I would like very much to have the minister tie himself down to a definition.

Mr. Abbott: He never ties himself down.

Mr. Blackmore: I am quite sure of that. He dashes along very cavalierly and never commits himself to anything. Now let him commit himself. Would he accept the expression "the integrity of the Canadian currency"? A moment ago he said that currency would not be issued to excess. What does he mean by that? I want something we can get our teeth into.

Mr. Abbott: I am sorry; would the hon. member repeat his question. I was checking on something with my experts.

Mr. Blackmore: I would like the minister to check with his experts, the very best he has, because he will need them. I want to know whether the expression "integrity of the Canadian currency" would be the one the minister would choose rather than "soundness of the currency".

Mr. Abbott: I would prefer "integrity".

Mr. Blackmore: So do I. Then would you just tell us what you mean by integrity.

Mr. Abbott: I have not the Oxford dictionary here, but I would be prepared to accept the definition it contains.

Mr. Blackmore: The minister has his experts there; they must have an Oxford dictionary. How would his experts define the integrity of the Canadian currency?

Mr. Abbott: I do not know that that is their responsibility. I will have to assume responsibility for what is meant by that.

Mr. Blackmore: Then let the minister take the responsibility right now and tell us the meaning of that phrase as applied to Canadian currency.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Blackmore: No, Mr. Chairman, and it is not likely to be carried for quite a while. We want something we can get our teeth into. One of the biggest troubles when many people talk about money is that they are just not careful about the words they use. If we can get some words we can actually rely upon we can use them as a base from which to begin. Would the expression "integrity of currency" be one that could be substituted for "soundness of currency"? In the days of R. B. Bennett we had a tremendous amount of talk about sound money, and Mr. Dunning carried on the expression, sound money. What does sound money really mean?

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Blackmore: No. I would like the minister to answer that.

Mr. Abbott: As Mr. Bennett would have said, I think sound money means sound money.

Mr. Blackmore: I wonder if the minister could not improve upon that definition.

Mr. Abbott: I doubt it. I do not believe I could.

Mr. Blackmore: Then would the minister say a sound dollar is one that retains a constant purchasing power for a given length of time, so that a dollar in 1949 would buy practically the same amount of wheat or any other commodity as a dollar in 1939? Would that be a definition of "sound" that we could accept?

Mr. Abbott: Certainly that would be the counsel of perfection; it would be a splendid thing if money retained a constant purchasing power, but in this imperfect world unfortunately it does not.

Mr. Blackmore: We could more appropriately say under this exceedingly imperfect financial system under which we work it is almost impossible to obtain. The minister evidently agrees that a sound dollar is a dollar that retains its purchasing power at about the same level over a period of years. I believe the minister will grant that since 1939 the Canadian dollar has been exceedingly unsound.

Mr. Abbott: I would not say that.

Mr. Blackmore: You would not say that?

Mr. Abbott: Oh, no.

Mr. Blackmore: Let us examine that matter for a moment or two. The soundness of a dollar is to be determined by the price of goods, is it not? If the price of goods doubles, the value of the dollar is halved. In other words, a dollar is by no means sound which does not maintain its purchasing power. Now, the price of goods in Canada has not quite doubled in these ten years but it has come very close to it. The Canadian dollar failed completely to remain sound. Would the minister challenge that statement?

Mr. Abbott: All I can say, Mr. Chairman, is that I have listened with great interest to my hon. friend's views for eleven years, and he has been listening for about the same length of time to mine. I do not believe either of us has been able to convince the other.

Mr. Blackmore: That is quite right, but there is still time. We are still young. I should like to read into the record what has happened in respect to prices according to the figures I have here which appear in a publication of the government of Canada. It is entitled "Prices and Price Indexes", February, 1951, published by the dominion bureau of statistics, covering wholesale prices, cost of living, security prices and exchange rates. I am reading from page 14, the second column:

I do not believe the minister would care to say that the Canadian dollar remained sound during that period. Its value has been steadily falling. The minister will say, "Well, that is the result of inflation." Will the minister tell us exactly what inflation is, the way he uses the word?

Mr. Abbott: I do not know that at this late hour of the evening I should attempt to embark on that subject. I shall use the short definition, although it is an oversimplification. It is a case of too many dollars chasing too few goods.

Mr. Blackmore: The minister says it is too many dollars chasing too few goods. Let us examine this thing with a little care. In April of 1946 the price of steel advanced $5 a ton in Canada, I presume as a result of a request of the three steel companies and with the consent of the Canadian government. Will the minister show how the amount of money then in circulation had anything to do with that increase in the price of steel?

Mr. Abbott: It is not my department, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Blackmore: It is very vital to the question under discussion. According to the minister's definition that increase in the price of steel ought to have been the result of a surplus of money in circulation. It was nothing of the kind. That advance of $5 in 1946 was manipulated apparently or demanded by the steel companies and permitted by the government. The money in circulation had nothing to do with it at all.

During the year 1946 the steel workers struck. As a result of that long strike of about eighty-two days they obtained an advance in wages. The advance in wages increased the cost of the production of steel and everything else all over the country, because the people all over the country began demanding comparable increases in wages. Those increases in wages forced up the cost of production and forced up the prices of commodities. Will the minister show how the money in circulation had anything to do with those advances in prices? Will he show how too many dollars chasing too few goods had anything to do with that increase in price?

Mr. Abbott: I thought everyone knew that there was not enough steel.

Mr. Blackmore: It is a most remarkable thing that there was not enough steel in 1946 when we had enough steel to carry us through the tremendous war effort! One would have thought that in peacetime there would be a surplus of steel, but the price was forced up. It does not make sense, does it? That was not given as a reason when the steel people came before the industrial relations committee. I was a member of that committee and I believe I attended every session. I do not recall that they advanced as a reason for increasing the price of steel that there was not enough steel or that there was too much money in the hands of the people demanding steel or that they could not produce enough for the Canadian people. As I recall it, their statement was that they had to have an increase in price so as to put them in a strong competitive position with United States steel producers. From that I gather only one possible meaning, and that is that the United States steel producers, having a surplus of steel after the war, would likely be penetrating into Canadian markets and underselling our people unless our people were in a strong competitive position.

If the minister or any of his friends can explain how too many dollars chasing too few goods had anything to do with that advance in the price of steel, I shall be a most humble and interested listener. Up to the present time I have not found one person in Canada who could explain that advance in the price of steel by reference to this rule of too many dollars chasing too few goods that has been bandied about and accepted by everyone.

I am going to give the minister two or three other examples. We have to examine this matter carefully, because if the price of steel was deliberately advanced by the people who produce steel, how many taxes does the minister think he will have to levy on the Canadian people before he can force that steel price back the $5 per ton? The producers would simply close down their plant or they would restrict production, and that is exactly what the companies in Canada now are in a position to do. In other words by the very measures which the minister is proposing to use to combat inflation, it would be a matter of utter impossibility to force the price of steel back that $5, for the simple reason, as I said a moment ago, that the companies would restrict production rather than let prices fall or increase production. We had that thing happen in the case of agricultural implements and we had it happen in the case of many other commodities. The manufacturing producers seem to be getting an organization by means of which they can do that on a wide scale, and they can keep goods off the market thereby increasing their inventories. They can resort to several devices to resist the application or influence of this rule of decreasing the amount of money and thereby forcing down the price of goods. There is one of the difficulties.

May I just show a little further what this so called "inflation" looked like when it was in progress? May I refer to some figures that I have used before on the floor of the house. It is best to use them here. I should have kept them for this occasion. Let us take as an example the price of bread last year. It advanced one cent. The price of bread advanced one cent, according to the information which I have here signed by Arthur May, who is executive secretary of the National Council of the Baking Industry, for this reason: The price of bread advanced not because there were too many dollars in Canada chasing too few loaves of bread—not by any means—but because the price of lard, as an ingredient, had advanced from 12½ cents per pound to 22½ cents per pound since June—this letter of Mr. May's was written in September—the price of shortening had increased from 26 cents to 32½ cents per pound; the price of sugar had increased from $8.40 to $9.86 per hundred pounds; the price of milk powder had increased from 8½ cents per pound to 13-14 cents per pound. The price of the spray process had increased from 10 cents to 16 cents per pound; the price of malt products had increased about one cent per pound; the price of raisins had increased from $11.76 per one hundred pounds to $14.50; the price of salt had increased by 33 cents per hundred pounds because of the freight rate increase; the price of shipping cartons had increased on September 4 by approximately 10 per cent; the price of waxed paper had increased approximately 3 per cent.

The minister will have to do a great deal of careful research in order to show that the price of bread advanced one cent a year ago because there were too many dollars chasing too few loaves of bread or too few bushels of wheat. I wonder if the minister has given this matter careful enough study? Has the minister given the whole matter sufficiently careful study to tell us why lard advanced, as I have indicated, from 12½ cents per pound to 22½ cents per pound since June of the previous year? I wonder if it was because there were too many dollars chasing too few gallons of lard or was it because the cost of producing lard had increased? And so with shortening, sugar, milk powder and so on. The minister will remember that in the case of salt the 33 cents per hundred increase was because of the freight rate increase that his government allowed the railways to make. Imagine that, Mr. Chairman! What word can you use, when a government will allow an increase in freight rates to force up costs and then will try to pretend to the people—and delude them with the story—the nonsense that the rise which resulted from freight rates was the result of too many dollars chasing too few goods?

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Chairman, I know that my hon. friend does not want to delay unduly the passage of these estimates. I hope that he will not feel that he should engage in a long discussion as to freight rates at this hour in the evening and at this stage in the session. We have had quite an extended discussion on inflation and its causes, both on the budget and at other times. I would appeal for his co-operation and for the co-operation of other members of the committee, in seeing that we try to stick as closely as we can to the item under discussion. We have had well over an hour of discussion now under the item of departmental administration. I am not attempting to curtail that discussion, but I would hope that we might try to keep it as closely as possible to the item that is before us.

Mr. Blackmore: I sympathize deeply with the minister, because the minister is in the awkward and untenable position of attempting to defend an utterly indefensible financial system. That is just exactly where his trouble lies. It is not his fault. It is the fault of the financial system under which he is attempting to act. As to delaying the estimates, I will tell you what I will do. I have been waiting for a long time to get a talk with the minister, and the opportunity has finally come. I am sure he has also been waiting a long time to get a talk with me. The opportunity has now come. I am right here, and I am going to stay right here so he can get at me.

Mr. Abbott: I would not want to get at my hon. friend. I think too highly of him for that.

Mr. Blackmore: I will agree with the minister to allow his other items to go through, if he will hold this one and let it stand so that we may finish up this discussion in a workmanlike fashion some time a little bit later on. I would be quite willing to do that, or I will continue now what we are at present discussing, namely this item of inflation.

Mr. Abbott: No, we are discussing an item of $1,500,000 for departmental administration.

Mr. Blackmore: Oh, yes; but under departmental administration is included everything pertaining to the minister's department. Certainly one of the minister's responsibilities has to do with the price structure, the control of inflation, the maintenance of the "integrity" of the Canadian dollar or the "soundness" of the Canadian dollar, or any other less objectionable or more accurate word the minister can find.

Mr. Hansell: Out of this amount the minister pays his advisers for bad advice.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend is within his rights. I appeal to him, however. As I say, we have discussed this question for eleven years now. But in those eleven or almost eleven years I have never succeeded in completely convincing my hon. friend; and he has never succeeded in convincing me that the financial system is wrong. He may be able to do it tonight, but I would doubt it.

Mr. Blackmore: What I am trying to do tonight is to find out whether the minister can laugh off or explain away irrefutable facts; and what I am giving him now are irrefutable facts pertaining to the so-called "inflation", the rise in prices. The matter is fundamental and it is exceedingly serious because as long as we go forward cavalierly, in the face of facts, saying that this increase in prices is a result of too many dollars chasing too few goods, we shall in the next few years make the most ghastly economic blunders that it is conceivable for a government to make. But if we face the fact that this increase in prices is not a result of a scarcity of goods but is a result of deliberate manipulation upwards, of deliberate profiteering; and if we grant that, then we shall adopt an entirely different method of dealing with the matter of high prices.

As I said a moment ago, Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to hold up these estimates. I have a happy home to go to and a lovely province to live in. I should like to get back there. But I also have a job to do here, and it is vital to the interests and the welfare of Canada, that I do my job so far as I can see. If the minister feels that he would rather have all this out on item one, we will have it out on item one; because I think I am strong enough to last until eleven o'clock.

Mr. Abbott: I am sure of that.

Mr. Blackmore: I should like to go on one step further. I could give a number of other details that I have here as to the increase in the cost of clothing which occurred this very year. I have letters right here from Lethbridge people about the advances that were made by the wholesale companies to the retail companies. No mention is made of too many dollars chasing too few goods. In every single letter the company concerned says: Our costs have increased until we cannot stand it any more and we have raised the price. Then we have the absolute hypocrisy —and that is the only word you can use—of the Department of Finance, the bank managers and all the financial people of that kind all over this country, in trying to delude the people of Canada into believing that the present increase in price is and has been the result of too many dollars chasing too few goods! That is one of the most consummate falsehoods ever perpetrated on a people.

Let us face facts just exactly as they are. Let us take the last rise in prices, namely, the one in wood pulp. Can anyone possibly show how that increase in the price of wood pulp for paper was the result of too many dollars chasing too few rolls of paper? Well, what utter nonsense! The Minister of Trade and Commerce stood up in his place the other day and explained the increase in that price. I thought he made out a pretty good case. He went on to show that the costs of these pulp companies had increased so much that, although they had heroically absorbed a number of these costs, the time had come when they simply had to have an increase in the price of their wood pulp and paper. I imagine that every hon. member in the committee tonight heard him do that and will testify to what I say. That is the last one I have.

What is going to be the result of this increase in the paper price? It is going to cause an increase in costs all across the board. All we need is just two or three more increases like that in major commodities in Canada and we shall have an irresistible demand on the part of labour for an increase in wages, just as we had an irresistible demand last year for an increase in wages on the railroads. We realized it was irresistible and we yielded. Can anyone say that the cause of the increase in railroad freight rates is the fact that we have too many dollars chasing too few railroad cars, or too few engines? What utter nonsense!

The minister has left the committee.

An hon. Member: He could not take it.

Mr. Blackmore: He could not take the facts. To me a fact is simply this—

Mr. Sinclair: The minister has been sitting here seven hours today and I think he is entitled to go out and stretch his legs.

Mr. Blackmore: I am glad the parliamentary assistant said that. I myself have been here seven hours today. I realize the minister has the right to go out and stretch his legs. It is well to be known that he is not here, while these important questions are being asked.

Mr. Sinclair: The hon. member could go out and in during the seven hours, but the minister has been piloting bills and his estimates throughout the entire sittings of this house this morning and afternoon and evening. I think it is most unfair to suggest that the minister went out simply because he was upset by the remarks of the hon. member. He has been listening most intently all through to the comments of the hon. member.

Mr. Hansell: While the minister is out stretching his legs, Mr. Chairman, perhaps the assistant to the minister would not mind answering a question or two. Since his advisers are sitting in front of him it is quite likely that he can answer the questions just as effectively as the minister himself. I should like to ask this question. Assume that the minister is right in his answer—I am not saying he is, because the hon. member for Lethbridge says he is not—that there are too many dollars chasing too few goods. Does the minister absolve himself from all responsibility for the expansion of credit that has taken place throughout the last number of years? For instance, toward the end of the war there was a loan floated by the government. Bond salesmen were out to raise this loan. Of course it was raised. They tagged the office girl; they tagged the man in the factory; and they said, you can even buy bonds on the instalment plan. What happened? The minister floated that loan. He permitted people who wanted to buy bonds to go to the bank and borrow money to buy those bonds. The banks encouraged them to buy through them, and when the bond purchaser went to the bank to borrow the money for bonds, new money was issued. The minister knows that. If new money was issued, then new money was put into circulation, when goods should have been coming off the assembly line, if there was a deficiency of goods.

That was his plan; that was the government's financial policy, and I wish hon. members would recognize this. I notice that when questions are asked sometimes and there is persistence used in attempting to extract an answer from the minister, there is some levity in some quarters. The minister himself rises and says: "Well, the hon. member for Lethbridge and I have been talking about this for the last eleven years, and we do not understand each other." That does not answer the question.

Mr. Abbott: That was not what I said. I said, neither of us had been able to convince the other.

Mr. Hansell: I see. Well, I did not scrutinize the answer so carefully but that does not change my point. Simply because they are not able to understand each other does not answer the question. I am asking a definite question on the basis that the minister believes at least that his answer was right in respect to too many dollars chasing too few goods. Does he absolve himself in that?

What I was going to say to hon. members is this. A certain levity exists because hon. members take the present financial system for granted, and assume that there is nothing wrong with it; that the government only errs in too much taxation or too little taxation, or taxing here instead of taxing there. But that is not the thing that is basically or particularly wrong. That is the boil that breaks out on the back of the neck. It wouldn't matter if it broke out somewhere else. If the blood is wrong in the system then you cannot cure the boils. The fact of the matter is that there are certain basic and fundamental things that are wrong with the financial system followed by the government. One thing that is wrong is—hon. members do not recognize this. I am certain that the evidence is there and the minister knows it. When the minister goes to the bank to borrow freshly created money which is lent at an interest, that freshly created money cannot be paid back without interest being created too. That is only a remark in passing.

Hon. members assume there is nothing wrong. Hon. members assume that when banks lend money they lend their depositors' money. They do not. The minister knows that they lend freshly created money which they themselves create with a stroke of a pen in their books. The minister knows that. I am asking him whether he absolves himself from all responsibility when he knew that goods were in short supply? He himself admits that he encouraged the expansion of money in this country. You have to fix the blame somewhere. It is all right to say: Well, there is too much money chasing too few goods. Who is responsible for too much money? It does not drop down from heaven; it does not grow on trees. Somebody gave instructions to expand the credit of the country just as the minister gives instructions to restrict credit expansion. They cannot tell us there is too much money chasing automobiles. For the last day or two we have read in the newspapers that some of the factories are going to close down because there are too many cars.

I would like to focus the blame. Who is responsible? Does the minister absolve himself from all responsibility in not being able to manage the financial affairs of the country and to restrict credit at the proper time?

Mr. Abbott: I am a modest man and never try to absolve myself from responsibility. I am prepared to take my share of responsibility for such things as I, as Minister of Finance, have done in matters of financial policy during the five years I have been Minister of Finance. But I like to believe it has been pretty sound financial policy, and I am quite prepared to stand on the record of it.

Mr. Hansell: We will have to accept the minister's answer, but I certainly expected one with a little more strength to it than that.

Mr. Abbott: It is a little late in the evening.

Mr. Hansell: Is it a sound financial policy when people with money in the bank ten years ago find that today that money is worth only half what it was worth then? If the minister will call that a satisfactory policy, then I will eat my hat, right here in the middle of the chamber of the House of Commons.

Mr. Blackmore: Now that the hon. member for Macleod has joined me in the argument, and I appreciate very much that he has, I should like to focus attention of the committee on the two points I was making.

The first of these was the point on which the hon. member for Macleod closed his speech, namely that the Canadian dollar has not been kept sound.

Mr. Low: Nor wholesome.

Mr. Blackmore: And if the Canadian dollar has not been kept sound we certainly cannot say that the Canadian financial system, which is based upon that dollar, has been kept sound.

Mr. Gibson: Fixed assets have doubled, though.

Mr. Blackmore: Probably; but that is not money.

Mr. Blue: There are four times as many dollars.

Mr. Blackmore: But the dollars are worth only about half. Let us keep our eye on the ball—and the ball in this case is the dollar. I maintain that the government has not a policy whereby it can keep the dollar sound. In the depression the dollar was appreciated until it was worth about twice what it was worth in 1927, so that people who contracted debts in 1927 had to pay the full amount of the debts plus interest in dollars that were twice as hard to get as in 1927. This brought about an almost inconceivable destruction of wealth and well-being in the country.

Then, a few years after that, the value of the dollar went down, so that those who had saved a little money have had it stolen from them in the last five years.

Mr. Low: The same system both times.

Mr. Blackmore: The next question was one of inflation, and I wish to concentrate on it again. The hon. member for Macleod said he was not assuming that there are too many dollars chasing too few goods. I am not, either. When we closed the war in 1946, let it be borne in mind that our productive capacity was geared to the conduct of a war. We had 1,250,000 of our finest producers in the war. Some 750,000 of them were overseas fighting, and the rest of them were in war plants. All those people came out of the war and entered the productive forces of the country.

Are we to be told that, with all that additional productive capacity to be applied to the production of consumer goods, we could not produce enough goods? What nonsense! If we could produce enough goods in 1946 for the demands of this country, then there must be something radically wrong with our financial and economic system if we cannot produce enough now. The men came back from war. We stopped producing munitions of war. No longer did we operate in the activities of war, but rather concentrated on our domestic economy. In the name of common sense, if we did not produce enough to keep up with the dollars seeking goods, then whose fault was it, and how in the world did it come about?

Mr. Blue: Working twelve hours a day, seventy-two hours a week.

Mr. Blackmore: We were working plenty of hours in 1946 to produce all the goods we needed in Canada. And just in a little while I will show plenty of evidence of a surplus of goods.

Only the other day we had the Minister of Trade and Commerce making a very positive statement. Perhaps I should read it.

Mr. Sinclair: Dispense.

Mr. Blackmore: No; we do not like to be told these things! But I am telling you that we are getting at the facts and we are getting some truths, and from someone who knows. That is a sufficient answer—and he is telling someone who apparently does not know. Maybe that is a sufficient answer.

I am quoting from good authorities recognized in this country. In this connection I would refer to the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce on June 14, where he says:

> There is another important element in the defence production program, and that is manpower. We have a tight manpower situation. As civilian producers, with exceptionally heavy stocks, run into consumer resistance, they may find it necessary to cut back staff.

Did the Minister of Trade and Commerce know what he was talking about when he spoke about exceptionally heavy stocks in the hands of civilian producers, or did he not?

Mr. Blue: No one in Canada did.

Mr. Blackmore: I am assuming the minister did know. He goes on to say:

> I am satisfied, however, that such personnel will be absorbed quickly into defence or defence-supporting industries. There will be minor dislocations, but I am satisfied that there is sufficient labour of the right kind in Canada to support our defence program as well as a flourishing civilian economy.

What does "flourishing civilian economy" mean? Is that one in which there are not enough shoes being produced, enough stockings, enough bread and butter, enough fish, or one in which all those things and other goods are being produced in abundance? It can only mean that we are producing in abundance, and that we have already in store an abundance.

The only reason that that abundance has not been manifested in the market is that the people processing it are fearful they will break the market and bring down the price of these goods to a ruinous level. That is all. They are deliberately holding their goods off the market.

I should like now to turn to one other aspect of this whole matter of the responsibilities of the Department of Finance. I am sorry the minister is not in his seat, but I am glad he has the opportunity to go out to stretch his legs. However, the parliamentary assistant is a very promising young man, and his answers ought to be just as acceptable as those of the minister.

It is recognized I believe that if you are going to have your dollar completely sound, you must have enough dollars in your economy and they must be circulated in the right places. You must not have too many, and you must have enough.

Mr. Blue: When did the average Canadian people have more?

Mr. Blackmore: I do not believe they have had more. I agree with the hon. member.

Mr. Low: You have made another convert.

Mr. Blackmore: He is simply a man who faces facts. He has not been carried down the primrose path by the minister, that is all. We have much more money in circulation now than we had in 1939 or 1945, yet we have not more than enough to consume the goods which are in store if the goods were made available.

Mr. Blue: You have plenty, haven't you?

Mr. Blackmore: We have plenty, that is all right. I am quite interested in the hon. member's questions. I do not want to repress any question just as long as it is honest. This is a most important matter. A few minutes ago the hon. member for Peace River asked the minister if the Bank of Canada had any mechanism whereby it could increase the number of dollars in circulation if it should be found that there were too few dollars chasing too many goods, which was exactly the thing that happened in the depression.

Just as soon as you have too few dollars chasing too many goods you have a fall in price, there is an increase in unemployment and you have a depression. Up to the present time under the present financial system the only means that mankind has discovered to get a nation out of a depression is to go to war. That is the only means that has been used up to the present time to get people out of depressions.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Low: Name a time when they did not.

Mr. Blackmore: There was 1914. We do not want to go too far on that. I repeat that the only way you can get people out of a depression is to increase the money in circulation as you increase it through war. If the minister had been here I wanted to ask him a question. I do not know whether I will ask the parliamentary assistant, or whether I will just answer the question. Suppose that the Bank of Canada was being managed by the two gentlemen who now sit in front of the parliamentary assistant and who I think are pretty high in the confidence of the Bank of Canada. Suppose that we found in Canada that there were too many shoes, too many clothes of all kinds and too many hats. Would they advise the chartered banks to lend money to anybody who wanted to produce more shoes or more clothing or more hats? Would they? Not by any manner of means.

That was exactly the trouble in 1931, 1932 and 1933. All hon. members of this house can remember how in those days it was said that we had overproduction. The result was that no bank in the country dared lend to produce anything because there was already in the economy of Canada more of everything than could be bought by the people. Will the experts who sit in front of the parliamentary assistant tell us how in the world the Bank of Canada by means of an "expansionist" policy could cause the banks to lend money and get it into circulation when they dared not lend money because of overproduction? There will be no answer because the Bank of Canada has no answer. The Minister of Finance has no answer.

The present financial system has no answer. The question is just not answerable under the present system.

Suppose the Bank of Canada, realizing that say one billion dollars more of purchasing power had to go out into circulation in order to have enough dollars chasing the goods there were, how would the Bank of Canada proceed to get those dollars out into circulation?

Mr. Low: That was the question I asked the minister.

Mr. Blackmore: That is what the hon. member for Peace River asked.

An hon. Member: Carried.

Mr. Blackmore: I know you would like to have it carried because the pressure is getting worse all the time. You are getting into difficulties deeper and deeper. Of course you would like to have it carried, but it is not going to carry until some of these questions are answered. Last December the best informed producers in Canada were worrying for fear there would be a depression. What we want to understand is what will be done if a depression comes on? A depression will come on just as soon as you have more goods in circulation than you have dollars to chase them.

Mr. Blue: Who will be the judge?

Mr. Blackmore: I should like to quote from a press dispatch which has an important bearing on this matter. The Lethbridge Herald contained a Canadian Press report of December 4 from Montreal headed, "Sees recession soon unless war grows worse." This reads:

> Alexander Gray, Sr., Toronto industrialist, Friday night predicted "a definite recession within twelve months if the war situation . . . does not grow worse."

There are a lot of people who are almost afraid we are going to have peace in Korea, that we are not going to be able to use all these war munitions.

Mr. Blue: I hope you are right for once.

Mr. Blackmore: There are a lot of people who are wishing that down underneath because they realize that if we do not go to war we are going to be plunged into a depression and under the present financial system they would not know what to do.

Mr. Blue: Who are those people?

Mr. Blackmore: The article continues:

> Mr. Gray, president of Gray-Bonney Tool Company Limited, and a director of the Canadian Exporters' Association, addressing the Society of Automotive Engineers, added:
> "This boom is built on uncertainty, on fear of the unknown, on credit. When you read of what our government is going to do, and what the United States government is going to do, it changes from week to week, from month to month. News of probable defence orders is announced months before actual orders are placed.
> When you talk to business executives they throw up their hands. Their plants are running to capacity."

I do not think I need go on any longer with that particular article because that is sufficient to establish my point. Let us suppose that we increase our productive capacity in Canada fast enough to supply all the needs of the men overseas and more goods than all Canadians need. Can the Bank of Canada suggest a single means whereby adequate money could be put into circulation? No, it cannot. That is what raises the whole question of the Social Credit contention concerning debt-free money. I would like to ask the parliamentary assistant a question, but first let me say what happened. As most hon. members know, in 1916-17, during the war, under the Finance Act of 1914 the dominion government issued and spent into circulation $26 million. It was debt free. No bank printed it; the treasury did, and the government spent it. Would the parliamentary assistant say one of those twenty-six million dollars was a sound dollar?

Mr. Gibson: It contaminated all the rest of the dollars.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Blackmore: Of course the parliamentary assistant dare not give the answer. The answer would have to be that it was. A sound dollar is a dollar that has stable purchasing power. In other words it has enough goods at stable prices behind it for it to chase and not too many. This $26 million was issued and spent by the government of the time. Will anyone dare say—I know the parliamentary assistant will not—that one of those dollars was unsound? It would have exactly the same purchasing power as the dollars already in circulation, dollars that had been loaned there. Very well. The soundness of a dollar depends upon the goods and services available for it to chase and upon the price structure. There is no answer to that; that must be a sound dollar. In other words the soundness of a dollar must depend upon the amount of goods in the community and the price structure. If the debt free dollar spent into circulation does not cause prices to increase, then that dollar is just as sound as though it had been loaned by a bank. There can be no other conclusion. The minister has come in now; I would ask him that question.

Mr. Abbott: I am going to say to my hon. friend that I think it is an imposition upon the members of the committee that one member should take up the time he has taken today in constant repetition. He made a forty minute speech this morning on gold which was out of order on the housing bill. Since nine o'clock this evening he has been talking almost incessantly, and I think it is an imposition upon the other members of the committee.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Low: May I just say to the minister in reply that if he and his parliamentary assistant would show some disposition to answer the questions which have been asked probably we would be through in half the time.

Mr. Blackmore: Or some ability to do so.

Mr. Low: It is coming to a pretty pass when an hon. member has to work as hard as the hon. member for Lethbridge has worked to try to get answers.

Mr. Abbott: He has had his question answered a dozen times, and I do not intend to answer it again this evening.

Mr. Low: The discussion that has taken place has been absolutely fundamental to the financial policy of this country, which is before the committee in the first item of the minister's estimates. For months we have been trying to get him to face this situation. We have told him for the last three years that I know of that we were going to force him into a position some time where he would have to answer these questions, where he would have to defend his policy. It is no defence to just sit there and give a general brush-off, and drag red herrings across the trail; nor is it a defence to protest to you, Mr. Chairman, against a person taking time. What are we here for but to take time to get satisfactory answers to the questions the people of Canada want answered? I like my hon. friend; I have always admired him, but I have warned him time and again that this was coming and he should have been ready. He is not ready, as he said tonight; and it is high time he was ready.

Mr. Abbott: I did not say any such thing. I answered questions for an hour, and I have answered about all I can answer this evening.

Mr. Low: The people of this country will be able to judge the style of those answers. They will be able to judge whether or not the minister has the information. When they look over the record of the debate this evening they will say the Minister of Finance did not know anything, he did not answer anything. From the answers that have been put on the record tonight the people of this country who read this debate will say the Minister of Finance did not answer a single question. He tried to brush us off. To begin with tonight I tried to get the minister to delve into these things and give us something like a reasonable answer. I told him we were looking forward to the time when a certain resolution now on the order paper would be called, and I said at that time we hoped to launch a full-dress debate on the government's financial policy. But in order to get some information I thought I would like to have, I asked some questions. That was followed by questions from other members of the group.

Mr. Abbott: Mostly by one member.

Mr. Low: I think the hon. member for Lethbridge tried valiantly to get answers to the questions. He was not given satisfaction in a single one, as the record will show. He is entitled to satisfactory answers to those questions, and so is the country. As far as I am concerned, since the minister is taking the position he is, I am not going to attempt to call off the dogs here at all. I say to my hon. friend, go to it, and if you want to keep going here until next Christmas go ahead. As far as I am concerned I would like the minister or someone from his department to give us satisfactory answers to these questions. Go into detail on them. The hon. member for Lethbridge started out on a very important line of questioning about inflation and the integrity of the dollar. If the people of this country, who are labouring under the highest costs in history, take a look at the kind of answers that have come from the government side, the only conclusion they can reach is that nobody here gives a damn whether or not they have to go on paying these high prices.

An hon. Member: Watch your language.

Mr. Low: I think I have the right to punctuate my remarks a little; and inasmuch as "dam" means to stop, I guess I can use that word. I am taking this position with respect to the assertion made a moment ago by the minister. If he and his department will take a few minutes to get right down to the questions and give us sensible and suitable answers, their estimates will not be held up at all. That is all I am going to say.

Mr. Blackmore: I thank the minister most sincerely for putting on record indelibly a statement to the effect that I have done my best in the time at my disposal. I have worked very hard. It does not mean very much to people who have not enough sense to appreciate it, and there are plenty of such people. The important fact is that these questions simply have to be answered.

An hon. Member: Who is the judge?

Mr. Blackmore: I am the judge. If you can defend yourself get up and do so; don't yap like a lot of silly pups. Get up and say something.

The Chairman: Order. I would ask the hon. member to address the Chair.

Mr. Blackmore: Thank you, sir. Of course the chairman will understand that I was not addressing him when I spoke as I did a moment ago. I was asking this question. I asked the parliamentary assistant whether or not one of those $26 million that were created by the finance department of Canada in 1916 and 1917, and spent into circulation, was sound. It is a simple matter to answer that, if he knows how to answer it. If he says it was unsound he knows I shall ask him to prove it, and that he cannot do.

Mr. Dewar: Why ask him then?

Mr. Blackmore: Just to show him up. That is what he is here for, is it not? Why do you ask questions of any government minister? To find out whether he knows his business. Is that not right? You ask questions to ascertain whether he knows his business, and that is exactly what I am doing here. We want to know whether or not he knows his business.

Mr. Blue: He knows his business.

Mr. Blackmore: He should be able to prove it then, and he has not done it thus far. He has not shown he knows anything about it. He does not know anything about sound money, and does not dare even try to define it. He does not know anything about this inflation. He would pretend it is the result of too many dollars chasing too few goods, but we have proved by point after point, what he cannot disprove, that it is a direct result of the profiteering which has forced up the cost of producing and thus of living.

I ask the minister whether one of these $26 million was sound. He knows it was sound. He does not dare say it was sound, however, because if he does he will get into trouble with St. James street and the press all over the country. He does not dare say it was sound, because the very minute he says it was sound he knows that I shall ask him why he does not create a few of such dollars now and put them into circulation. He may say that it would cause inflation. I have already proven, what he cannot possibly disprove, that the so-called inflation is not inflation at all but is the result of the manipulation of prices upward and that there are plenty of goods. I am going to ask the minister once more—he says he has answered the question but he has not answered one of my questions in a straightforward manner—I am going to ask the minister to tell the committee, if he dare, whether or not one of those $26 million which were created and spent into circulation under the Finance Act of 1914 was sound. Such dollars could be created and spent now.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. Riley: Would you mind repeating that?

Mr. Abbott: At the time to which my hon. friend refers I was in France, but I think the dollars were probably sound.

Mr. Blackmore: I believe the dollars were sound, too. I believe those dollars were sound, and I believe similar dollars issued today and spent into circulation would be sound. I shall defy the minister and all his associates to prove that one of them would not be sound today.

Mr. Riley: That is the way to talk.

Mr. Blackmore: I have issued that defiance several times, and I issue it right now in the presence of plenty of witnesses.

Mr. Abbott: It sounds like the marriage ceremony.

Mr. Knowles: There will be a divorce on Friday night.

Mr. Blackmore: This morning I spent some time of the house, and I apologize if I have offended any hon. members, showing that the Bradbury which was the war currency that Britain created through her treasury by means of a treasury bill was sound. It was a one pound note. I showed that 354 million of those one-pound notes were printed and circulated in Britain during world war I and up to 1920. I adduced evidence from William A. Shaw's book "Currency, Credit and the Exchanges", and his excellent book "The Theory and Principles of Central Banking" to show that those pound notes were sound.

Mr. Riley: Go into that a little deeper.

Mr. Blackmore: Yes, I shall be glad to do that. They were sound. I do not believe the hon. member was here—

Mr. Riley: I was here, but I did not quite understand it.

Mr. Blackmore: If the hon. member will take Hansard tomorrow and read the speech I made about the Bradbury's, then go to the library and get this book "Currency, Credit and the Exchanges" which tells about the Bradbury's; if he will get the book on "The Theory and Principles of Central Banking", which was written by the same man in 1930, read the quotations I gave and read the books, he will find beyond any shadow of doubt that William A. Shaw considered that money absolutely sound.

Mr. Riley: Would you mind analysing it?

Mr. Blackmore: I shall gladly do that. I do not want to burden anyone, because I went to the trouble of analysing it this morning.

Mr. Riley: I am interested.

Mr. Blackmore: I shall quote something in addition that William A. Shaw said. Here is a quotation from page 66 of "Currency, Credit and the Exchanges":

> The issue of currency is not the affair of a bank. It is the affair of the state, and now that we have established that principle, if we go back on it and sacrifice it we may go still further and sacrifice the automatic principle which is enshrined in the treasury note, and the discovery of which is the greatest achievement of modern economic practice.

Let me analyse that for a minute or two. The hon. member, who has asked me that question so conscientiously, realizes that in this nation today the state does not issue any of the money. The money is issued by the Bank of Canada, and the Bank of Canada, no matter whether or not the government owns it, is a bank. Consequently, the principle which William A. Shaw lays down is violated with the issuance of every dollar that is issued in the Dominion of Canada. Now, that is rather important, is it not? The $26 million in Canada and the treasury notes in Britain that were issued and spent during world war I were issued without any debt. The government did not borrow them; it created them and issued them just the same as the Bank of Canada could create and lend money or issue it.

Some hon. Members: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. Blackmore: It reads:

> This theory of money rests upon one basic principle—viz., that goods purchase goods. In this axiom the word "goods" is used for brevity's sake as comprehending all economic goods or services, which as possessing economic value, possess thereby exchange value.

Let me point this out, Mr. Chairman. As I have said time and again from April 19 onward when I started this campaign, the basis of money ought to be goods. This statement about too many dollars chasing too few goods or too few dollars chasing too many goods indicates quite clearly that the real purchasing power in a community is goods and services. This author clearly lays down that principle.

Some hon. Members: Eleven o'clock.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall take up three resolutions, two in the name of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, one concerning old age assistance and the other concerning allowances for blind persons. In the past everyone favoured the principle of these resolutions, and I think we should have a short debate because the bills will come up on Saturday. Then, we shall take up the resolution in the name of the Prime Minister concerning the Federal District Commission Act, 1927. We shall then go into supply, and take up the estimates of national health and welfare, public works and the secretary of state. If the committee on veterans affairs complete their work by tomorrow and report the bills they have before them, on Friday we intend to take up the estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs and all the bills relating to veterans.

Mr. Graydon: May I ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) whether the three resolutions which he named will be taken up in that order?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Yes.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, June 21, 1951

The house met at eleven o'clock.

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS

Eleventh report of standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. Croll.

STATEMENT AS TO WITHDRAWAL FROM MEMBERSHIP ON COMMITTEE

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of the session I was made a member of the committee on miscellaneous private bills, but I resigned at the first meeting held in March. Though I have written the chairman of the committee twice to this effect, I am still receiving notices of the committee meetings. I should like to be on record as having resigned as of that date.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. L. Philippe Picard (Bellechasse) presented the second report of the standing committee on public accounts, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

THREATENED STRIKE IN WEST COAST SHIPPING INDUSTRY—STATEMENT AS TO CONTINUANCE OF NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Yesterday the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) inquired as to the dispute between the coastal shipping companies in British Columbia and the seafarers' international union. This dispute concerns certain uncertificated personnel of Canadian National Steamships, Canadian Pacific Railway Company (B.C. coast steamship service) and Union Steamships Limited. Negotiations for the revision of the existing agreement between these companies and the union representing them have been under way for some time. Wages, hours and union security issues are involved.

The senior industrial relations officer of my department in British Columbia was assigned to this dispute when the parties themselves had been unable to reach agreement, and the department has been kept continuously informed of all developments in the joint efforts being made to effect a settlement. All those concerned are aware of the public interest involved and every effort is being made to resolve the dispute. The union has taken a strike vote, the result of which gave union officials authority to call a strike. A strike deadline was set for midnight Friday, June 22. However, I am happy to say that notice of the definite strike deadline has been cancelled and negotiations are continuing. I am sure hon. members will agree with me that it would be inadvisable at the present time to discuss the details of the proceedings.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

C. D. HOWE COMPANY LIMITED

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State): I wish to table parliamentary return, reference No. 93: During 1935 to 1951 inclusive, for what projects has the firm of C. D. Howe Company Limited been retained by the government, etc.

The necessary information from the board of grain commissioners was received only yesterday afternoon, and the return is now complete.

QUESTIONS

JUDGES FOR NEWFOUNDLAND DISTRICT COURTS

Mr. Browne (St. John's West):

What is the reason for the delay in the appointment of judges for the district courts of Newfoundland?

Mr. Garson: This matter is still receiving consideration by the government.

HEALTH AND WELFARE—PUBLICATION "GOOD TEETH"

Mr. Diefenbaker:

How many copies of the folder "Good Teeth" issued by the Department of Health and Welfare, were distributed, French and English, and what was the cost of preparing, printing and distribution?

Mr. Martin: Seventy thousand copies in English and 1,500 copies in French have been distributed to the provinces, on request. Twenty-six thousand copies in French, which had been distributed but in which there was later found to be a printing error, are being recalled. Repeat orders have been received from some provinces.

The printing order, against which only partial delivery has been made, was for 100,000 copies in English and 35,000 copies in French. The expected total cost is approximately $2,000.

This folder was prepared by the dental health division to meet the request of provincial health educators for dental health material designed specifically for junior elementary school children.

During preparation, draft texts and layout were sent to the Canadian Dental Association for evaluation and criticism. Additional drafts were sent to the provincial health educators with the request that evaluation reports as to accuracy and suitability be secured from provincial directors of dental divisions, from public health departments of provincial dental associations, from parent-teacher groups, public health officials, etc. In response 33 reports were obtained; there was no criticism of the technical content—in fact the folder aroused very favourable comment. There was complete agreement on the part of dental bodies consulted that the pamphlet was factual and technically correct.

HEALTH GRANTS—NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Carter:

What assistance, if any, has been granted under the national health grants program toward the development of health services in outlying areas of Newfoundland?

Mr. Martin: The sum of $200,000 has been made available to the province of Newfoundland for the following purposes: (a) assistance in developing the south coast health services by the employment of additional medical staff; (b) additional staff and equipment for the Bonne Bay cottage hospital; (c) to facilitate transportation within the divisional health inspection service which has been inaugurated for the west coast, the purchase of equipment such as a boat and snowmobiles, and support toward the provision of air service.

MING SUNG INDUSTRIAL COMPANY

INQUIRY AS TO SHIPS IN OPERATION BETWEEN HONG KONG AND MACAO—SEIZURES BY COMMUNISTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport, notice of which I sent him this morning. Which of the vessels mentioned in the return tabled by the minister yesterday are still operating between Hong Kong and Macao, and which are the two ships reported to have been seized by the communists on the Yangtze river?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): The hon. gentleman telephoned my office a short while ago and indicated that he was going to ask this question, and I received notice of it about five minutes ago. I will give him such information as I have at the moment, and if there is some I cannot give him, I shall be glad to obtain it later.

The question is: Which of the vessels mentioned in the return tabled yesterday are still operating between Hong Kong and Macao? In the return which I tabled yesterday seven vessels were mentioned, and the return indicated that those vessels operating between the ports of Hong Kong and Macao had been exempted from the operation of sections 113 and 114 of the Canada Shipping Act. My understanding is that five of them are operating on that run and that two of them are not, although I should like to verify that. In the few minutes at my disposal after I received notice of the question, I was unable to verify it, but I understand that is the position.

The second part of his question was: Which are the two ships reported to have been seized by the communists? That I am unable to say, but I am informed that the ships to which my hon. friend has reference have never been registered under the Canadian flag, and neither is there any indication or evidence of Canadian registry here.

Mr. Pearkes: May I address a supplementary question to the minister? Can he name the five ships which are now operating?

Mr. Chevrier: I think I can, but I would not attempt to do it now.

Mr. Pearkes: The minister will give me that information later?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. As soon as I can get the information, I will give it to the house.

[Later:]

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have now the information which was requested by the hon. member for Nanaimo, and with the consent of the house I should like to put it on record. The question was: Which of the vessels mentioned in the return tabled on June 20 are still operating between Hong Kong and Macao, and which are the two ships reported to have been seized by the communists on the Yangtze river?

I have been informed that two vessels, the Lung Men and the Chien Men, are operating between Hong Kong and Macao; two vessels, the Hu Men and Yu Men, are laid up at Hong Kong and have been laid up there for the past ten days. I am further informed that three vessels, the Shih Men, the Chi Men and the Yen Men, are operating between Hong Kong and Canton but not on a regular service. And I am informed that two further vessels, the Kuei Men and the Ching Men, are, it is believed, those that were seized, and were never placed under Canadian registry.

Mr. Pearkes: The last two were the vessels referred to by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) as operating up the Yangtze, then?

Mr. Chevrier: I could not say. I was not here when the Minister of Trade and Commerce made his statement. The question put was as to which vessels had been seized by the communists on the Yangtze river, and I am not able to say with any assurance. I am informed that the two last named are the ones, but I must point out that they were never placed under Canadian registry.

Mr. Pearkes: On June 14, at page 4125 of Hansard, the Minister of Trade and Commerce said:

> There are five ships; two others have been seized by the communists.

That is what I am asking. Apparently the five should have been seven, trading out of Hong Kong.

Mr. Drew: I should like to ask a supplementary question, because it is desirable that there be accuracy of terms so that we may understand the situation exactly. When the minister speaks of the two ships he understands are in the Yangtze, he has quite clearly stated he has not full information. He speaks of them as having been seized by the communists. Is it not correct to say that the situation is quite the contrary, that those ships were being operated by the Ming Sung company in the communist part of China and that they are simply still being operated by the same company, with its head office at Chungking in the communist area?

Mr. Chevrier: Is the leader of the opposition making a speech, or does he want some information? I was answering a question asked by the hon. member for Nanaimo, who put it in these terms: Which are the two ships reported to have been seized by the communists in the Yangtze river? My reply was that I was not sure of the position, but I had been informed that those two ships were the last two I mentioned a moment ago, and that they were never under Canadian registry. I cannot answer the question in any clearer or more definite manner than that.

Mr. Drew: I do not think the minister should take my remarks in the way he has, or I should be called upon to reply in like manner. He used the word "seized", and I was referring to the fact that these ships were operated with his knowledge by a company in China, with its head office at Chungking. Has the minister any evidence that this operation is not being simply continued by the parent company, of which the Ming Sung Industrial Company of Canada Limited is a subsidiary?

Mr. Chevrier: I used the word "seized" because it was in the question; that was the only reason.

FISHERIES

NEWFOUNDLAND—LOSS OF CODFISH ON ACCOUNT OF SCARCITY OF SALT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): In the absence of the Minister of Fisheries and his parliamentary assistant, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. Is he aware of the fact that at Placentia and Fortune bay there is a scarcity of salt, with the result that thousands of quintals of codfish have had to be dumped? Is the government aware of that situation, and has it taken any steps to relieve it?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I was not aware of the situation to which the hon. member has referred. There are, of course, many things which occur in this country of which I am not immediately aware. I will bring the matter to the attention of the Department of Fisheries and see if they have any information about it.

OLD AGE ASSISTANCE ACT

PROVISION FOR AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES—PAYMENTS AT AGE 65

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

> That it is expedient to bring in a measure respecting old age assistance and to provide for the payment to the provinces out of the consolidated revenue fund of amounts in respect of old age assistance paid by the provinces, to certain persons who have attained the age of 65 years and who are in need of such assistance, not exceeding, in respect of any recipient, fifty per centum of forty dollars monthly or of the amount of old age assistance paid by the provinces monthly to the recipients, whichever is the lesser; and to provide for the making of agreements with the provinces in relation thereto and for the conditions and duration of such agreements.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Is it the intention of the minister to make a statement on this resolution?

Mr. Martin: I had not intended to do so. I had understood that there was a sort of understanding that the statement I would make would be on the bill which I propose to distribute at the earliest opportunity.

Although I have just returned to the city, I understand that the arrangement is that the second reading of the bill is to be given on Saturday and I would naturally make a statement at that time. I would hope that the discussion might take place then. I am of course in the hands of the house, but I think that such an arrangement would meet with the convenience of most hon. members.

Mr. Fleming: I suggest to the minister that it will save time in the long run if we have his statement this morning. It would be a guide to the house as to what to expect in the terms of the bill. May I ask the minister if he will make his statement now?

Mr. Martin: No, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate my hon. friend's view, as I know that he has given this matter some thought. I believe, however, that the statement would be better given when the bill is before the house and when the details are before it. I think that is the best way in which to develop the discussion of this extremely important problem which engages the attention of the house and of the country at this time.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, the minister has indicated his decision in this matter. I think the alternative which I have suggested, that of having his statement now, would have contributed to a better understanding of the bill and to more orderly treatment by the house of the resolution before us this morning. After all, the purpose of introducing such a resolution is, as I understand it, to permit discussion of the subject, and, if it is not too late, to permit suggestions to be made from the floor of the house as to what the bill might well include.

May I say at once, and with emphasis, Mr. Speaker, that I am sure there will be the readiest co-operation in all parts of the house —certainly there will be on the part of the official opposition—in furthering this measure and in bringing about, at the earliest possible opportunity, assistance of the kind outlined in the resolution. As to a number of aspects of the matter I think it would have assisted in furthering the bill and in expediting its passage had we been given more detailed information at this resolution stage.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has indicated that next January 1 is the earliest date at which such a scheme could possibly be brought into effect, even with the most rapid action on the part of parliament. Certainly, so far as the official opposition is concerned, there will be genuine and ready co-operation in bringing this type of assistance into effect at that earliest possible moment.

There is difficulty, of course, in seeing the problem as a whole when we have not before us the details either of this measure or of the accompanying measure to provide the universal pension at age 70. Certainly this is a problem that does not admit of being divided up in that manner into watertight compartments. I wish the government had proceeded by laying before the house at one time its entire proposed legislation with respect to the whole problem. The special committee of both houses of parliament on old age security which sat last year saw this matter as one entire problem; and one regrets to see the treatment being accorded to the problem now and parliament's approach to it chopped up as it has been, with the resolution on this one aspect of the problem being put before us now, and the other one, providing for universal pensions at age 70, being held back until October.

There were three pressing questions before that committee in regard to priorities; and that problem as to priorities thrust itself upon the committee time after time, with witness after witness, and day after day. Three principal needs were made clear by all those who contributed their ideas or the results of their studies for the assistance of the committee. The first was in reference to the means test; the second was the question of lowering the age, and the third was the adequacy of the amount of the pension. At various times the committee had to ask different witnesses who came before it—some representing organizations, and others persons who, by reason of their special study and experience, qualified as experts in this field—how they arranged these three urgent problems in order of priority. There was not absolute unanimity in the reaction of these witnesses to that question, but there was almost entire agreement. When the committee came to address itself to establishing the priority among these pressing aspects of the problem, the committee was able to do it, I think, unanimously. The committee said in effect that the most urgent problem is to eliminate the means test; the second is to find a means of lowering the age and bringing assistance to those in the age group 65 to 69, and the third problem is to find a way of providing an adequate amount. With each of these three problems was associated the problem of financing.

When the committee came to report its findings, having indicated its view as to the relative urgency of these three major problems or aspects of the problem, the committee refrained from indicating any hard and fast method of raising the money required. I think it is fair to say there was a strong difference of opinion in the committee as to what was the proper role of the committee in reference to financing the scheme. The committee eventually wrote a report in this respect, in which it said, in effect: We cannot lay down any particular method to be recommended as to raising the money. When he spoke on this subject in the house on June 4, the Prime Minister indicated something in this respect that has a definite bearing both upon this resolution and also upon the consideration the house will give to the other problem of financing the universal pension at age 70, which will come before the house in the fall. At page 3665 of Hansard the Prime Minister said:

> Moreover, as hon. members know, the universal pensions are to have right from the start a contributory basis. Now, we have not yet completed consideration of the normal budgetary program of the current year, and the government believes it would be an advantage to have a few months to observe the effect of the recent changes in the tax structure before reaching a final decision on all the precise details of the contributory system to be recommended to parliament.
> It will be recalled that the joint committee made no precise recommendations on that point, because it was recognized that it was the inescapable responsibility of the government. We want to be as sure as we can that we are making the right proposals for a plan which is going to affect, far into the future, the provision for old age security of the whole Canadian population.

I take it that the Prime Minister's observations there apply to the universal pensions at 70 and over. He does not indicate what is to be the basis of financing the program of old age assistance at ages 65 to 69, and that was one of the matters that I had hoped the Minister of National Health and Welfare would make clear to the house this morning in the statement that he has chosen not to make at this stage.

There are other questions which naturally present themselves to hon. members in relation to this aspect of the problem that is presented by the resolution this morning, namely, the assistance that is to be provided to persons aged 65 to 69. At once, sir, we ask what is the basis upon which persons are to qualify. The resolution is not too clear on this point. It speaks of providing old age assistance to certain persons who are "in need of such assistance". That is a very vague expression. I expect many people in all age categories would disclaim an absence of need of such assistance; but we are given no basis of conjecture, no inkling whatever in this resolution as to what is to determine the basis of the need.

One turns then to the Prime Minister's statement in the house on June 4, and one reads at page 3663 the following:

> In conformity with that statement of the government's position, I wish to state at this time that it is proposed to introduce legislation at an early day to enable the government to make agreements with the provinces to provide old age security to persons in need between the ages of 65 and 70, and to provide authority for the registration of persons over the age of 70 for the universal old age pensions. That legislation would probably also at the same time provide for the continuance of federal assistance in the payment of pensions to the blind.

The minister has given no indication whatsoever as to whether the test of need is to be the present means test, which the committee felt itself obliged to condemn, and which it recommended be discarded as to the ages of 70 and over. There was a difference of opinion on this point in the discussions in the committee. Broadly speaking, a number of us on the committee, having seen the means test condemned as to ages 70 and over, felt that it would be most inconsistent to recommend a retention of the means test for ages 65 to 69, and that was said repeatedly.

An hon. Member: The report does not say that.

Mr. Fleming: The committee report does not say that. I am speaking of the discussions in the committee, and there was a good deal of discussion on the point. Nevertheless, when the committee came to write the report the problem confronting it was twofold. First of all, as to the method of financing, was this to be a contributory system in the orthodox sense, or was the committee to subordinate the contributory principle in favour of universality? In the second place, how were we equipped as a nation to meet the cost of a scheme of old age pensions which would place those 65 to 69 on the same basis as those 70 years of age and over, with a view to complete abolition of the means test?

The committee on the whole felt that it was prepared to go as far as the report indicates, and not to go farther at this stage; and some of us in the committee, who had expressed our views as strongly as we could on this point, supported, and I may say were quite happy to support, the report of the committee in principle and on balance. Because this report, while it does not represent a hundred per cent of the views of all members of the committee or of all political parties represented on the committee, does represent a very high common factor of agreement; and when the committee as a whole was prepared to go this far, all members of the committee, representative of all political parties, were glad to give the report unanimous endorsation as far as it went.

I did not hear that any member of the committee, even those who felt the committee went as far as it should go in the circumstances, was prepared to say that this was the last word on this subject or the last step that should be taken in the field of old age security at any time. We were dealing with the situation in the year 1950. The committee did, so far as the report goes, achieve unanimity in backing the recommendations that the report contains. I think that members of the committee are free individually to ask for better terms, if there is any practical hope of achieving them under present circumstances; but may I make it quite clear, Mr. Speaker, that the members of the official opposition did give unanimous support to this report as far as it went. We would have liked to see it do things other than it did in many respects, but we did give it unanimous support as far as it went. That was our position at the time; that is the position I am putting before the house today.

Now, sir, so far as the means test is concerned, if that is the method of determining need contemplated in this resolution, all I can say at the moment, lacking any information on the point from the minister, is that the means test which the committee discarded in the light of experience as to the age group of 70 and over, is not likely to prove more satisfactory as to the age group 65 to 69. We will continue to have, with respect to the lower age category, the same objections as have been levelled at the means test as applied to the age group 70 and over. It penalizes thrift, and creates unwarrantable intrusions into the affairs of private citizens.

If that type of test is to be enforced by the government in the legislation to be introduced, I want to make an observation with regard to the income that persons of this group are entitled to receive. I think we recognize in the first place that the present allowable income to persons receiving the old age pension at the present time is entirely inadequate.

Mr. Martin: If the hon. member will permit me to interrupt, I think he will find, when the bill is introduced and the details are before him, that these points are adequately covered, along the lines of the committee's recommendations. I am sure that when the hon. member sees the bill he will realize that the discussion he is launching at present could be more effectively pursued with the bill before him. These points are all dealt with in the bill and for the sake of orderly discussion I should point out to him respectfully that that would be the more satisfactory course to pursue.

Mr. Fleming: The minister confirms the very reason I put forward earlier as to why his statement should have been made this morning. These are points of great importance, points in which hon. members are bound to be interested, in respect of the legislation outlined in the bill. I am not going to attempt to anticipate everything in the bill—far from it. But I am indicating to the minister that that is one of the things we are looking for.

I hope nothing is going to be done to discourage people in the age category 65 to 69 from working, if they are able to do so, because of the need of expanding our labour force, and because of the evidence given to the committee as to the beneficial therapeutic effects upon persons in that age category who continue to feel that they are useful members in society and that their contribution to the labour force of this country is necessary.

I hope we are to have a statement from the minister very soon as to what is to happen to such benefits as the medical services available hitherto for persons receiving the old age pension. Is the intended application of the principle of universality in the category of 70 and over going to affect the medical services and the availability of medicines to persons who receive old age pension today, and who qualify for it under the means test? In the second place, is anything to be done in this respect for persons qualifying under the means test in the category of 65 to 69?

We shall also look to the bill with interest to see what it provides as to terms, conditions and duration of agreements which will be authorized with the provinces. May I pause here to comment that I think the ready co-operation of the provinces in connection with the type of assistance provided here has been altogether commendable. Those of us from Ontario take great pride in the leadership given by the government of our province in encouraging the extension of security to our aged citizens.

There are many questions in this field that will not be settled conclusively by the legislation indicated either in the present resolution or the one following which deals with assistance to the blind, or in the bill to be introduced in the fall for universal pensions to persons 70 years of age and over. There is still a great field of insecurity of which the committee was conscious in its review of the problem of old age security last year. Repeatedly the committee brushed up against the rather narrow confines of the field of inquiry assigned to it. That field of inquiry was strictly confined to old age security, and we had to ask ourselves many times how far the committee should go in that respect, when it was not permitted to inquire into, but nevertheless could never dismiss from its mind, the problem of persons for whom no provision is made at all under our present system of state-assisted security.

We had the question of persons who, by reason of chronic illness or permanent disability, at any age, are unable to provide for themselves. We do make provision for those who suffer from the special disability of blindness. But there are others in our society who suffer from disabilities which are equally damaging in preventing them from providing for themselves, and for whom no provision is made today.

I say this by way of reminding the house that while these measures on the order paper, and the one to be introduced in the fall to provide for universal pensions for those 70 years of age and over, are altogether commendable and will, I am sure, receive the sympathetic and unanimous support of the house, we must nevertheless not close our eyes to a field that is still there calling for attention. We must not assume that we have completed our task.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say at the outset that there is some merit in the suggestion of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) that at least the main debate in connection with this matter should take place when we have the bill before us. On the other hand I feel I must say that I regard the position taken by the minister as plausible, at best. After all, if it can be said today that we should not debate the resolution preceding a money bill, that is an argument that can be taken with respect to any resolution preceding any money bill.

Mr. Martin: Am I not right in understanding that, when I had the opportunity to discuss this matter with the hon. member a few days ago and told him of my intention, he concurred in the procedure which I have just now suggested as the more orderly one? I just mention this because it was as a result of that discussion that I decided this was the best way to proceed.

Mr. Knowles: So far as any private discussion the minister had with me is concerned, I believe the understanding was as I have just now stated it, that the debate at this stage could be brief and that the main debate could take place on the bill. But for the minister to stand in his place now and say that there should be no debate at this time is to ask the house to forgo one of the rights and duties set out for us not only in our standing orders but also in the British North America Act. If the committee dealing with the rules of the house recommends that one of these stages of debate be dispensed with, that is another matter. As a matter of fact the last committee on procedure did recommend that this one stage be determined by a vote, but without debate, but that recommendation was not adopted. As it stands it is still the case that parliament has the right and duty to inquire into the terms of resolutions preceding money bills.

The other point that I feel should be made at this time is that this is our only opportunity before a bill is actually placed before us to express our views as to some things that should be in the bill, or indeed to express our views as to some things that should not be in it. We all know from experience that once a government bill reaches the floor of the house the chances of getting any changes made in such a bill are indeed slim. We still cherish the hope that by making suggestions before the government has committed itself in the form of a printed bill some of our suggestions may be taken into consideration.

As I see it, this is an historic occasion. We are so used to historic events in these buildings that sometimes we are not aware of great moments. With all its shortcomings, the legislation forecast in this resolution, long overdue though it may be, is of historic significance. When this legislation is finally passed by this parliament, and the complementary legislation passed by the various provinces, the payment of old age pensions to some Canadians at the age of 65 will be taking place in January for the first time in our history.

We in this group are particularly glad to be partaking in this forward step. As the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) has indicated, and very properly I think, the members of last year's committee had different views as to what should be in our report. Some of us thought that the recommendations in that report should go further than they did, but we recognized also that the chances of our recommendations being acted upon were much better if we could agree unanimously on certain recommendations to go at least so far. It was in that spirit that members of all four parties, and members of both houses, reached agreement on the report that was tabled on June 28 of last year.

When the matter was the subject of brief discussion in parliament last June I made it clear, and I have made it clear since both in and outside the house, that I will do nothing to jeopardize the possibility of the recommendations of that committee being implemented. Along with that statement I have made it clear that there are some things with which I am not satisfied and that I for one will continue fighting for improvements in our old age security legislation. Members of the committee know that I took that position, as indeed did others. Members of that committee know the points concerning which I feel changes will have to be made after this legislation has come into effect.

Right now, however, our job in this parliament is to get this legislation on the statute books and to lay the basis for the wider program of old age security recommended last June. I feel that one of our immediate tasks in this House of Commons is to make sure that the legislation to be brought in by the government measures up to the recommendations of last year's committee. The Minister of National Health and Welfare suggested to the hon. member for Eglinton that if he would wait until the bill comes in he would find the various points that he was discussing dealt with in the bill. However, the minister has not seen fit to give us the kind of detailed information that would enable us who were members of the committee to determine whether or not the bill does measure up to the recommendations made by the committee.

For example, we recommended quite clearly that the means test which is to be applied to pensions to be paid to those from 65 to 69 years of age should be less stringent than the means test in effect for those 70 years of age and over. I regard it as extremely important that the bill to be brought in should implement that recommendation. On that point I should like to quote from the report of the committee. Paragraph 48 on page 107, under the heading, "Committee's opinion", reads:

> These considerations have led the committee to the view that any program of old age security to be applied to persons in the age group 65 to 69 should involve some principle of selectivity, and this, in the committee's judgment, involves the application of a suitable test of eligibility, designed to ensure assistance to persons in this age group most in need of it.

Then over on the next page we find paragraph 51(b) which reads:

> For the age group 65 and over not eligible for the universal benefit, old age assistance at the rate of $40 a month should be available, subject to an eligibility test—

Notice how we steered clear of the words "means test".

> —in some respects similar to that which exists under the present old age assistance program, but modified to take account of the different characteristics of the age group to which this test is to apply,—

Then follow these most significant words:

> —and adjusted in such a way as to recognize to a greater extent than at present the desirability of encouraging recipients to earn supplemental income.

In other words, our recommendation that the means test to be applied to those 65 to 69 years of age should be less severe than the means test now in effect was not just in blank form; we spelled it out. We suggested that it should be designed in such a way as to encourage the earning of supplemental income by persons in the group 65 to 69 years.

I submit that if the bill to be brought in has in it a means test like the one now in effect with respect to those 70 years and over; if it has a means test that permits them to have only $10 income per month and still draw a full pension, that bill would not be an implementation of the recommendations of the committee. If by any chance the bill is drafted along those lines—this is the reason I chose to speak at this stage of the debate—I urge the minister to see that it is changed so that the government's bill will correspond to the recommendations of last year's committee.

A great deal has been made, and properly so, out of the fact that this report was unanimous. It was not easy for some of us to agree to the report in view of the fact that it did not go further, but we recognized the strategic importance of unanimity, and we agreed. I suggest, however, that it would be breaking faith with that committee if the government does not go the whole way with the recommendations that were made.

Another point that we made with respect to those 65 to 69 years of age is to be found in paragraph 70, on page 111, which reads:

> With respect to an old age assistance program for persons 65 years of age and over on the basis of an eligibility test, it is the committee's view that a requirement of fifteen years' residence should be considered.

I draw attention to that, because as hon. members know, the present residence requirement for those 70 years and over is twenty years residence in Canada previous to the date of application. It was felt that twenty years might still be the required period of residence for those who would qualify for the universal pension at 70 years or over, but we felt that in order to qualify for the pension at 65 years on an eligibility basis, fifteen years should be sufficient residence. The resolution now before us does not comment on that point, and this is one point that will have to be discussed when the bill comes in. But this is our only chance to remind the government of that recommendation and to urge that it be included in the bill.

As I have already said, I regard this as an historic occasion in the life of the Canadian parliament. I welcome this change, and I do not want anything that I may say from here on that may sound like qualifying that statement to detract in any way from the importance of the step that we are taking. I for one am glad to have had some part—I think hon. members will agree that I have the right to say that much—in fighting for this kind of change down through the years that I have been a member of the House of Commons. But, Mr. Speaker, I think that all of us would be making a great mistake if we were to assume that we can now rest on our oars, if we were to assume that this gives us the finest social security legislation in the world and that there is nothing more for us to do.

May I point out that last June when the committee made its report we did not change the amount of the pension from the $40 figure. It can hardly be said that we approved the $40. The committee simply did not make any recommendation that the figure be changed. In other words, we accepted that figure as the basis for this new legislation, recognizing that the first two hurdles to get over were the removal of the means test for those 70 and over and the starting of the pension at age 65. I still take the view I took in the committee that these were the two points of greatest importance, and indeed their importance was in the order in which I have just named them, and if we were not able to do something on the third point, namely, the amount of the pension, at least the committee was unanimous with regard to the first two points.

But let us take a look at this $40. Look, for example, at the changed situation between last June, when we made the report, and today. Last June the cost of living index stood at 165·4. Today it stands at 182. In other words, entirely apart from the value of $40 today in terms of the 1935-39 base used by the dominion bureau of statistics in computing the cost of living index, just in terms of what has happened since the committee made its report, there has been a drastic decline in the value of the $40. In fact it would take slightly over $44 today to purchase the same amount of goods that could be purchased only last June for $40. In other words, looking only at that period of time it becomes evident to anyone who is not simply going to sit back and be satisfied with what we are doing, that we have yet to deal with the problem of the amount of the pension, both with regard to those from 65 to 69, and with regard to those 70 and over concerning whom there will be legislation when we come back in the fall. If the cost of living index continues to rise at the rate at which it has risen during the last twelve months, by the time we come back in the fall we certainly will be in a situation where we will require not a $40 pension but at least $50 or, for that matter, if we are going to talk in terms of adequate old age security maybe the time has come to talk of a pension of $60 a month.

Let me give one other figure in this connection. In terms of the 1935-39 cost of living index, $40 today is worth only $21.97. In other words, we are doing something historic; we are starting a pension for people 65 years of age. That is good. I am glad to be here today when we are taking this step, but what are we doing for the people 65 years and over? We are starting them off almost exactly where parliament started people 70 years of age and over back in 1926 and 1927. That is when the Old Age Pensions Act first came into being. It was passed in 1926 and became effective in January, 1927, at least in some of the provinces. What was the basis? It was $20 a month at age 70, with a vicious means test. We are now doing the same thing for those 65 and over. Yes, we are taking an important step. We are starting a pension for Canadians at 65, but in terms of the values of 1935-39 it is a pension of only a few cents more than we gave to those 70 and over back in 1927. We are giving them a pension that in terms of purchasing power is worth $21.97, and there is to be a means test attached to it, the terms of which we will not know until we get the bill, first reading of which will take place as soon as this debate is over.

With respect to the means test on those from 65 to 69, although I state again that I was one of those who agreed unanimously to this report, and my whole concern since the presentation of the report has been to get it implemented, may I state that it will not be long until many Canadians will be wondering why parliament imposed a means test on pensions for those from 65 to 69. Here is what is going to happen. You are going to have people retiring from industry at the accepted age of 65. They will be people who in some cases will have a little outside income. They may own homes and they may have small industrial pensions. The result of that home ownership, the result of those small industrial pensions, or whatever savings they may have, depending upon the terms of the means test in the bill to be introduced, will mean that between the ages of 65 and 69 these persons can draw either no old age assistance at all, or something less than $40. There will be people drawing $20, people drawing $25. Then when they turn 70 they can suddenly draw the full amount of $40.

You will have married couples who between them will be able to draw only $20, $25, $35, or possibly $50 in old age assistance between 65 and 69, but when they reach 70 that will increase to $80 a month. People are going to see a strange anomaly in that. We are going to provide less to people between 65 and 69, people compulsorily retired, than is available to them when they are 70 and over.

Some people are going to say: You give us less between 65 and 69 when we are alive than you are prepared to give us at the age of 70 or over when we may be dead.

It is also the case that when people first retire the difficulties of getting along are more severe than as they get on to later years. I think that anyone who has studied the problem realizes that we shall be confronted very soon with the need of reviewing the decision to apply a means test to the group between 65 and 69. Members of the committee know, and I trust this house knows, that once this legislation is in effect I will still be in the thick of discussions and arguments about old age security. It will still be my contention that the means test should be completely done away with, that it should be removed at 65 as well as at 70.

It will also be my contention that the amount of the old age pension should be increased to a figure that will provide decent security in terms of today's cost of living and in terms of the standard of living that is now possible.

I know that every time anyone argues for a more adequate measure of social security, such as my suggestion that the old age pension should be $60 a month at 65, there are those who say that it is the old story of trying to get something for nothing. Not at all, Mr. Speaker. I have said repeatedly, and I hope it is beginning to get across to some hon. members, that I feel this way about it: that all we are asking is that the Canadian people, who in our cities and on our farms do the real work of this country and produce its wealth, should have the chance to share in the wealth that they produce, not only in the enjoyment of proper wages and a decent standard of living while they are working, but in the enjoyment of that kind of security in the retirement which they have earned. No matter on what basis the payment for social security is placed, the plain fact of the matter is that the people do pay for it, and those who are on in years have paid for it by the contribution they have made to the wealth of the country. What I complain about is that far too many people have contributed to the wealth of the country but do not share adequately or fairly in the wealth they have helped create. It is on that basis that I shall continue to advocate adequate measures of social security.

I welcome this move. I am glad this legislation is being proceeded with during this part of the session, so that the provinces will have an opportunity to pass their complementary legislation and so that there need be no delay in going ahead with this matter. I am delighted that at last we are getting rid of the means test at age 70; I am pleased that we are getting a pension started at 65. But let it be clearly understood that this parliament should be satisfied even now with nothing less in this bill than the committee recommended in its report last June. Furthermore, once this legislation is in effect this parliament must face the fact that there are still other improvements which must be made before we can say that we really have an adequate program of old age security, or indeed an adequate program of over-all social security.

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): My colleagues and I welcome the action of the government in bringing this resolution before the house for consideration at this time. We had expected and hoped, however, that the minister would make a rather comprehensive statement. As indicated by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), it is virtually impossible for us to proceed now without basing our observations upon certain assumptions. I wholly agree with those who have spoken previously that now is the time for all members of the house to have an opportunity to consider the provisions which should be included in the bill that will be placed before us.

I have heard certain very disturbing rumours, on the basis of which I could probably develop a forty-minute speech. I will go so far as to suggest that at the moment I almost fear that some of those rumours are going to prove to be realities. On innumerable occasions we have made reference to the means test. Many times in the committee last year we stressed the complete viciousness of that test as it has been applied down through the years. However, as a basis of compromise, realizing of course that we are entering a new field in which we must acquire experience, we did agree to the imposition of a means test upon the sixty-five to sixty-nine group. We believed, and in fact were firmly convinced, that it would be a modified means test. Now I suspect that when the bill comes before us we shall find that the means test which is to be applied will be in most respects similar to that which has been applied to our pioneer citizens over 70 years of age.

Mr. Martin: The bill will indicate that my hon. friend is quite wrong.

Mr. Shaw: I am very glad to hear that. As indicated by a previous speaker, we should have been told that at this stage. If the minister had indicated that the means test would be modified in keeping with the feeling of the committee, of course I would not have had to make any reference to it.

I noticed that the minister as well as the two previous speakers referred to recommendations of the committee. I find no recommendations in the report. I find summaries of submissions that were made, summaries of our own investigations, and a summary of the constitutional position. The report ends with two sections, one dealing with findings and the other with committee opinions. There are actually no recommendations cited as such. It is, however, a fact, that all members of the committee assumed that the committee's opinion in fact embraced the recommendations of that committee. I am not going to make further reference to the means test, but I should like to advise the minister that if, when the bill is placed before us, the changes in the means test do not seem to be in keeping with the recommendations of the committee, we shall certainly have plenty to say in that respect.

May I refer to this $40 payment. As indicated by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, we were dealing with the $40 a month as of one year ago when the cost of living index was 165·4. Today, with this resolution before us, the cost of living index is 182. So far as I am concerned, that fact places an entirely different complexion upon the $40 a month which was a suggested amount incorporated in our report of last year.

I have already pointed out in this house that, on the basis of today's cost of living index and in relation to the base period 1935-39, $40 is worth only $21.97 today. The $480 payable to a single pensioner now has a purchasing power of $263.73, which is a wholly inadequate amount so far as I am concerned. I must advise the government now that when the bill is before the house we shall have to take strong exception to the payment of $40 a month. In fact we are convinced that as long as the government fails to take appropriate action to stabilize the value of the Canadian dollar, there is only one fair method by which pensioners can be treated, and that is by incorporating an escalator clause in the schedule of payments. We feel that that is the only just approach to this matter. Even if the government and the house were to agree that we should, as suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, change the $40 to $60, with the way things are going now, in a matter of six months or a year that $60 would be wholly inadequate to meet the basic requirements of those aged people. We therefore think that the only proper method by which to deal with the matter is, as I say, to include the escalator clause in the schedule dealing with the amount paid; in other words, to tie it to the cost of living.

We fully appreciate the fact that in dealing with this 65-69 group—which is certainly a step in the right direction—we cannot be unmindful of the requirements of other persons within the nation. It is true that when we take in that 65-69 group we shall be taking care of a great many incapacitated persons within our country. But let us never forget that we still have in Canada thousands of persons under 65 years of age who are wholly unable to provide for themselves owing to physical incapacitation. Certainly the solution of that problem should be one of our prime objectives. While we of course realize that this matter is not tied in closely with the resolution which is before us, we think that in considering it we should not be unmindful of that problem which will have to be dealt with soon.

I do not intend to take up more of the time of the house on this occasion. Hon. members have the report of the committee on old age security. They are in a position to familiarize themselves thoroughly with all that is contained therein. It seems unnecessary for me to read extracts from the report in order to remind hon. members of what the committee's opinion was. It seems unnecessary to remind hon. members what the various interested organizations across the country said with respect to this whole matter. I am therefore not going to indulge in the reading of extracts from the report. I am not going to repeat what I shall probably have to repeat on Saturday when the bill comes before the house.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would urge the minister to give re-consideration to this $40 payment, which today is wholly inadequate. We sincerely trust that, as he has indicated, the changes in the means test—which we of course prefer to call something else—will be in keeping with the recommendations of the committee.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member who spoke first stated, this is really an historic occasion.

Mr. Knowles: It was I who said that.

Mr. Fleming: It was the hon. member who spoke second who said that.

Mr. Martin: In February, 1927, there was introduced into this house the first Old Age Pensions Act. It was an act which at that time was thought by many to go too far in the direction intended. The important measure that is now before the house is one that has been criticized in certain quarters as going too far in one direction and not far enough in another. It may be that the most commendable feature of the legislation is that it takes a position midway between those two extremes. One is somewhat comforted, I think, in the knowledge that since an extreme position is never a sound one, the government has been sound in accepting the general recommendations of the parliamentary committee and in not giving in to the extreme position.

We are dealing with a matter that is of great concern both from a social and from a financial point of view. This measure is part of a program that is going to involve an expenditure in this country of over $400 million in ensuing years, and certainly close to $400 million in the year after the measure is adopted. Those are considerations which must be borne in mind at this time. We are not launching a measure of modest proportions. We are initiating a program of the greatest magnitude, and one which, within the very confines of the committee's report, may be looked upon as perhaps the most comprehensive effort of its kind ever made by any country in the world. It does not come to us as a measure foreign to our interests. The government was responsible for the original act of 1927. It was the same administration and the same political view that prompted various amendments to the Old Age Pensions Act from time to time. Since I have been Minister of National Health and Welfare I have expressed the point of view of the government legislatively on a number of occasions when we increased the basic amount of the pension and when we increased the permissible income thereby providing for some liberalization of the means test. Then we made additional amendments that provided for a reduction in the qualifying age for blind persons from 40 to 21 years of age; so that those of us on the right of Mr. Speaker approach this problem not as ones who have been prodded into it, but as ones who have consistently taken the initiative in this matter. That is to be expected of a party that is responsible for family allowances, for unemployment insurance, for the veterans charter, and for the national health program.

Mr. Knowles: Where is it?

Mr. Martin: But I do not want to depreciate in any way the contribution that has been made by all members of the house to this important matter.

The history of this particular measure, the house will recall, goes back to a motion made by myself on March 10, 1950, on behalf of the government, urging that there should be set up a parliamentary committee to consider and study this matter of old age security. We had a long debate on that subject in the house, and finally the committee was set up. As I said, speaking in this house toward the end of June last year, I doubt whether any committee in the history of this House of Commons has ever more diligently, industriously and purposefully pursued its assignment than that committee. The result was that in a spirit of collaboration with regard to this important problem it came forward with a unanimous view as to what should be done.

And as I congratulated the committee, its chairman and its members last session, I do so again.

Since that time the government has given consideration to the committee's report—and I may say not only the government, but other countries have given consideration to that report. The congress of the United States has allocated some funds for the purpose of giving study to the type of program that is developing here, realizing their own measure's shortcomings and deficiencies, and for the purpose of ascertaining whether the sort of program we are initiating today might not be advantageously employed in that country. That is a tribute to the work of the parliamentary committee representing all political parties in this house.

After the committee made its report I stated outside of this house that it was the government's intention to go ahead with the committee's report, and to implement it. Shortly thereafter the Korean situation developed, and the government was faced with the obligation of providing in very great amounts for the defences of this country. The question arose in everyone's mind whether or not, in the face of these unforeseen financial obligations at that time, the administration would carry on with its old age security program. I want to say this, and I say this for Canada: I think it is a great credit to the capacity and to the courage of this nation that when faced with a commitment of almost $2 billion for national defence, the Prime Minister of this country (Mr. St. Laurent) should have been able to say to the ten provincial governments sitting in this very room last December that notwithstanding those formidable obligations the government intended to go ahead with this important program of social security.

I personally believe that you cannot triumph over communism by force alone; that in the long run the victory over that ideology will be won by the determination of the free nations of the world to use their own capacities, economic and otherwise, to provide within responsible limits for the social welfare of the masses of the people. That is what we are doing in this program, the cost of which, I must repeat, will be greater than the total cost this year of family allowances.

Reference was made by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) to the non-separability of the features involved in this program. A few days ago in the house the Prime Minister said what our program was. We propose to proceed with that portion of the committee's recommendations, adopted by the government and now put forward, having to do with the age group between 65 and 69. In addition we propose to bring in a measure affecting blind persons. In the fall we will proceed with that portion of the program relating to persons 70 and over which will be the exclusive responsibility of the federal government, providing at the same time for the measures by which the principle of contribution is to be recognized.

We also propose to bring in shortly a supplementary estimate to provide for the registration of those persons 70 and over who will qualify for the universal pension. We are doing that so that there will be no delay in bringing into operation at the earliest possible date, January 1, 1952, this important measure. That will affect some 410,000 additional individuals in the 70 and over age group. At the present time there are approximately 305,000 individuals in receipt of old age pensions under the present legislation. That number will be increased in 1952 to 715,000 persons. That is a social consequence of the greatest significance, one that is going to give a greater measure of security to many classes of people who otherwise would never have been covered, and who were never intended to be reached by the original Old Age Pensions Act.

The security that it will provide for teachers, for railroad and other workers, for those groups in the nation whose incomes are such as to require supplementation, will give the act a scope which I am sure the original proposers of the Old Age Pensions Act did not contemplate. The measure that we are dealing with, providing for assistance in the 65 to 69 age group, will bring the total number benefited to 860,000 persons in the first year of the complete plan's operation. It is estimated there are approximately 450,000 persons who come within the 65 to 69 age group. It is calculated that of that number roughly 145,000 will qualify for pension in the legislation covered by the resolution now before the house.

This measure, sir, is one that was arrived at not without much co-operation, particularly between the two senior levels of government in Canada. We recently had a conference in this building with the ten provincial governments, in which I outlined in principle the legislation covered by the resolution now under discussion. I did not give them the actual details of the bill: that is something which, in accordance with our constitutional practice, must first of all be given to the House of Commons. But I did outline the government's intention with respect to the 65 to 69 age group. And I want at this time to pay tribute to the spirit of harmony and the spirit of co-operation which prevails between the two senior levels of government in this particular matter, as I find it in respect of other matters having to do with the department I have the responsibility of administering.

Hon. members who have already spoken may say that they would prefer to see this or that. I would remind the house that when we come to consideration of the legislation we shall have to recall that this is legislation based upon financial contributions made in equal terms both by the provinces and by the federal government. This is a scheme that is going to be paid for, fifty per cent by the federal government and fifty per cent by the provinces. If the pension amount were to be increased, or if the eligibility test were to be varied, the changes would increase the financial responsibility of the provinces, just as it would ours.

I may say that every principle that will be found in the bill, the details of which will be given when introduced, was discussed with the provinces, and represents, as closely as it is possible to do so, an agreement and understanding between those ten governments and the federal government.

I do not want to anticipate the details, but because of some things that have been said, and because I think it is desirable that they should be dealt with, I say in general terms that in this legislation we are following almost to the letter the recommendations made by the parliamentary committee. In fact in some particulars it will be found that the government has decided to be a little more generous than the committee, on which all parties in the house were represented. It will be found, for example, that while the committee recommended the continuation of the principle of an eligibility test in the 65 to 69 age group, there will be provided in the bill a degree of liberalization somewhat broader than the recommendations made by the parliamentary committee. Likewise there will be something that perhaps the committee did not fully deal with, having to do with recoveries from estates. It will be seen that we have reached on this point agreement with the provinces, which will be incorporated in the legislation, and which undoubtedly will be regarded as a progressive step. The treatment that will be accorded Indians will also, I am sure, win the favour of the house, and, I think, of most people in the country.

These are matters to which I have referred in general terms because they have been referred to in the debate thus far; and if I did not answer, undoubtedly a wrong impression would go out to the country. I do not think anyone in the house would really want that to happen.

Then of course the proposed legislation will deal with something that has been sought for some time by a section of our population, having to do with blind persons. Requests have been made from time to time by the Canadian National Institute for the Blind and by other organizations looking after the interests of blind people in this country; and it will be found that in the appropriate legislation, which is not covered by this resolution but which forms part of the whole scheme, we shall have taken account of almost all the recommendations made by serious-minded persons interested in doing something to improve the lot of the blind.

I give these advance indications at this time so that they may stand side by side with observations made this morning, with a view to placing them in their proper perspective.

This measure is one of the greatest significance. It is one that is going to impose on all of us an obligation to realize all of its implications. I have faith in the capacity of this nation to bring this kind of measure forward at this time. I know there are many serious-minded people in the country, people whose judgment we must respect, who, in the light of our great obligations in other fields, have some concern as to the action that is now being taken.

This is no effort to create a welfare state. This is no effort to impose greater powers on the state. We still maintain our freedoms. In the light of the growing productivity of this nation, in the light of its growing national income and national productivity, we feel it is possible to bring forward improved measures of social security, as in this particular instance we are doing for our aged citizens.

I am sure the house is seized with the importance of this occasion and of this measure, when we realize that we are going to provide assistance for close to 900,000 out of the 14 million of our population, and give them increased security. I am sure the house and the country will look upon this measure as one having the greatest significance at this time. It is a measure which is in keeping with the responsible policies of the government, in this instance supported by a parliamentary committee, and kept within the bounds of what we feel as a nation we can financially do to live up to our obligations as a country that wants to provide a proper balance between freedom on the one hand and security on the other.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Apparently a number of members are questioning whether the debate can continue. Under standing order 43 the minister does not, on a resolution preceding a bill, close the debate, nor has he a right of reply. This is not a substantive motion. The leader of the opposition and other members who have not spoken have a right to speak at this time.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) has said, this is a most significant step. The motion now before us is the customary motion which declares that it is the opinion of the house that it is expedient to introduce the appropriate legislation to implement the recommendations of a committee which was fully representative of all parties in this house. There can be no disagreement among hon. members on the question whether it is expedient that this legislation be introduced. In fact, the members of this house have been urging that this legislation should be proceeded with as soon as possible. I welcome it; and members of this house will recall that only a short time ago I expressed the hope that the government would reconsider their apparent intention to defer consideration of these bills until the fall. I welcome the fact that they have changed their minds and that we are to have an opportunity to deal with them now.

Mr. Martin: We always intended going ahead with these two measures.

Mr. Drew: At any rate I welcome the fact that we are proceeding with this legislation at this time. I indicated the great importance of having before the members of this house and before the ten provincial legislatures the actual wording of the legislation which they will be called upon to consider. The step which is being taken already indicates the advantage of this course, because dates have been set for the meeting of some of the provincial legislatures early in the fall to deal with this subject.

As the minister has pointed out, it will be possible to deal more satisfactorily with the provisions of the bill when the printed bill is before us. I have no thought of attempting to interpret the remarks of the minister as to the details of the measure. We know the general intention of the legislation, and with that knowledge it is possible for us to express our approval of the step which is being taken in so far as there has been general agreement in regard to old age pensions.

The minister has stated that the legislation to be introduced substantially interprets the recommendations of the committee, which once again demonstrates the value of committees of this nature. Over and over again we have been given evidence of the unanimity which can be attained when members on both sides of the house meet to discuss subjects about which they are in agreement in principle.

In this particular case the one point that has come up for discussion this morning which perhaps raises any question at all is in regard to the provisions that are proposed to be made for those between the ages of 65 and 70 years. The discussion of that can also be much better carried forward in detail when the legislation is before us and when the actual procedure to be followed can be carefully analysed. However, I do submit that as we take this important step we should bear in mind the reasons for the contention which has been made that at the appropriate time, and when a similar measure of unanimity can be achieved, old age pensions should be extended to those of 65 years and over without a means test.

The minister has pointed out that there are those who talk about the welfare state and who see in legislation of this kind a tendency to place too great a dependence upon the treasury. After all, this principle has been recognized for a long time, without regard to party and without regard to whether it was carried on at the national or the provincial level. For many years the principle of old age pensions has been accepted, and for many years there have been expressions regarding the obvious objections to the means test, and it has been contended that it should be removed.

The question every hon. member will be called upon to ask himself as he considers such legislation is whether any argument that was ever made against the means test at the age of 70 years does not apply with equal force to the application of the means test at the age of 65 years. I should like to point out that on different occasions I have referred to this matter, and for that reason I have strongly emphasized my own belief that the means test should be abolished wherever it is agreed that old age pensions should be paid.

I would recall to hon. members that at the time I had the privilege of placing the position of the government of Ontario before the dominion-provincial conference in 1945, I used these words—and I quote from the submission that I presented to that conference:

> The province of Ontario agrees that old age pensions should be extended to all citizens over 70 years of age without a means test, but disagrees with joint dominion-provincial contributions to pensioners under the age of 70 with a means test.
> It is recommended that old age pensions should be paid to all citizens over 65 without a means test. It is recognized, however, that heavy expenditures are involved in this proposal, and it is therefore suggested that the extension to cover all persons over the age of 65 should be made as soon as the dominion finds that it has the necessary financial resources.

Mr. Martin: As my hon. friend knows better than I, because of his actual experience, the attitude of the provinces would have to be taken into account, because they would have to share in this.

Mr. Drew: I was simply reading into the record the statement I had made, on behalf of the province of Ontario, to the conference in 1945. Having read that into the record, I wish to point out that I stated clearly six years ago my own belief that there should be a general application of the principle that at whatever age it is agreed old age pensions should be paid, they should be paid without a means test.

In response to the remarks made by the minister that this must be done in agreement with the provinces, I certainly recognize that, and I recognize also that neither the legislation nor the administration can be satisfactorily carried out at any time unless there is agreement with the provinces. There are very good reasons why there must be general agreement, because it would be most unfortunate if we created different levels of social security throughout Canada, with the obvious disadvantages that that would create. I think it is appropriate that, when we all express our opinion that it is expedient to proceed as rapidly as possible to take final steps at this stage, we should clearly analyse why it is that the means test is objectionable. Many people still seem to think that the withdrawal of the means test is a concession which places in the hands of people of substantial means payments that they do not require. Undoubtedly there will be those who do not require these payments, and who probably will not welcome the receipt of them. I am quite sure there are many people whose convictions are so strong on this subject that they will not accept the payments. We must remember, however, that the number who can be included in that group is a relatively small part of the population.

I for one would be very reluctant to see this or any other government take any step which would discourage people of any age from using their physical and mental abilities to the very last hour that they can use them. There is nothing more pitiful than to see people lose their confidence in themselves, lose their happiness and their gaiety of spirit simply because they feel that they are unable longer to be engaged usefully in some occupation. Far from discouraging people in any occupation, I think it should be the role of government to say to people of 65, 70, 75, 80, yes, of any age: We want to see you work in any way you can to the very limit of your capacity. Undoubtedly those people who engage their brains and their bodies throughout the longest term of years are those who gain the greatest happiness out of life.

But I submit that the means test is one device by which we actually discourage saving rather than encourage it. Those who have had the responsibility for the administration of legislation of this type—the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll), as well as the Minister of National Health and Welfare, has had that responsibility—know that there is an almost irresistible temptation for people to divest themselves of any small holdings they may have if those small holdings are going to deprive them of old age pensions with a means test, when the savings that they have are at the same time inadequate to maintain them.

In our complex society, even with high wage levels it becomes increasingly difficult, with the taxes and other obligations that people are called upon to assume, to make savings at a level that will give the individual continuing security throughout his declining years. That does not mean that people should not save. They can and should be encouraged to save, but at this very time we see what inflation does to an income that twenty years ago might have been regarded as a safe and secure income for the remainder of the life of an aged couple after their working years. The trouble is that if you impose a means test you then force people who have saved to use up their savings, and you ultimately place a very large number of them in precisely the same position as those who have not saved a cent. That should not be the result of government action at any time.

Let us see exactly what happens with respect to the payment of old age pensions with a means test at 65 carrying on until people are able to receive a pension without a means test at 70. At 65, in industrial work generally men and women find that their engagement is terminated. Perhaps that does not apply so much in times of abnormal demand for workers, but ordinarily, whether or not we think 65 is the maximum limit of physical fitness, the fact remains that industry very largely has established that as the age level of employment. Consequently if that is the level that industry is going to establish, it is the level at which we must recognize that some payment is necessary. If a means test is applied then those who have saved are going to be called upon to use up their savings, and, unless they have made quite substantial savings, when they reach the age of 70 they will be in the same position as those who have saved nothing up to the age of 65.

That is a situation which I do not think any hon. member in any part of this house can contemplate with satisfaction. I am not disregarding the heavy financial obligations involved. I have emphasized my own belief over and over again, in this house and elsewhere, that we should seek in every way we can to make our whole system of old age pensions a fully contributory system, operating on an actuarial basis as far as possible, always recognizing that through periods of enforced unemployment and otherwise it cannot be rigidly on an actuarial basis similar to that employed by an insurance company. I believe, however, that step by step from this point, gaining experience as we proceed with the administration of this type of legislation, we should seek more and more to make it a fully contributory system so that the people themselves who will ultimately benefit will recognize that we do not get anything for nothing, and also so that they themselves will feel that this is in fact a payment as of right and not a payment ex gratia. Everyone then realizes that they are contributing directly in some way towards a fund which will give them a measure of security throughout their declining years.

I welcome the introduction of this motion which indicates that we will be proceeding with this legislation. There is no part of our community more deserving of the thought and consideration of every hon. member than the older generation who have contributed so much to the advancement of the nation which we collectively represent. Every consideration should be based on the idea that we are not extending charity but that we are simply extending that measure of basic security which the people of this nation have the right to expect that they will receive.

in Russia or elsewhere what our system does for people who are old or blind or incapacitated in any way. In the legislation we are all going to support, with whatever discussion of detail there may be, we are making a great advance; but I urge that we recognize the principles involved and that we do not discourage saving by asking anyone to use up his savings and reduce himself to the same position as that of those who have not saved. We should work for that day when, at whatever age pensions are paid, they will be pensions as of right, without a means test, payable to those who have earned the respect and support of the country.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Beaudoin in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the resolution carry, or shall I call it one o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Knowles: One o'clock.

Mr. Martin: Would my hon. friend not let the resolution carry? I am sure that after this adequate discussion he will be glad to give me the measure of co-operation that he usually affords.

Mr. Knowles: No, Mr. Chairman. I have two or three questions, and I do not think it fair to Hansard that we stay longer now.

Mr. Martin: Ask them now.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. Knowles: At one o'clock, Mr. Chairman, I suggested that we give a few minutes consideration in committee to this resolution, because of a few questions that are of concern to the people affected by this legislation. As the minister can well understand, I have a fairly heavy volume of correspondence on this subject. I may say further that, like the Minister of National Health and Welfare, I recently spent a few days in Manitoba. In fact, I was there for the same purpose that he was there.

An hon. Member: Not quite.

Mr. Knowles: Somebody says "not quite." In other words, I was there for the opposite purpose. While I was there, a considerable number of people asked me questions about this legislation, and they are the kind of questions that are being put to me by correspondents. They are questions that accept the basic framework of the new program but seek information as to details that are important to the people affected.

In the first place I find that people are anxious to know when and how they will go about applying for each of the pensions now envisaged. Some publicity has been given to the fact that there will be a registration for the pension for those 70 and over; and I take it that we may get information about that matter later in the present session. So far as I can ascertain, however, no information has been given as to how and when people are to go about applying for this new pension for those from 65 to 69. Can the minister say something on that question?

Mr. Martin: To answer the second part of the question, they will apply in the way that they apply now. Persons who have reached the age of 65 will apply through the provinces, as they do now, subject to certain procedures that will be adopted as a result of discussions that we shall be having in the month of July when, in conformity with an undertaking given to the provinces, the interprovincial old age pensions board will meet.

As to the group 70 and over, I stated this morning that a supplementary item will be presented asking for finances and authority to take steps to provide for registration of those who are qualified for the universal pension at 70. In that connection may I say that we already have arranged, with the consent of the provincial departments concerned, to send officers to examine their present files in order to preclude any undue delay. We propose to use our ten regional family allowance offices as centres from which to conduct the operations in each province. The more than 300,000 people now in receipt of pensions will not have to register in the usual way, because they are known to be qualified for the pension under the existing act. The 400,000 or so others who we estimate may qualify will apply for their pension on forms that are now being printed. Through the press, the radio, and any other means it may be thought desirable to acquaint the general public with the requirements, ample notification will be given, so that on January 1, 1952, these people will be fully registered and will be able to qualify.

Mr. Knowles: That registration will start some time fairly soon, will it? I believe July has been mentioned.

Mr. Martin: As quickly as we get the authority, we will act. We have already started, as a matter of fact.

Mr. Knowles: From what the minister said with regard to the group from 65 to 69, I take it that those in that bracket who wish to apply for the pension will, in effect, have to wait until the discussions with the provinces have been had, and, perchance, until the provinces have passed any supplementary legislation that may be required. That means that it may be later in the year before they can apply. I hope that the minister's department, in the publicity that it gives to these two plans, and to the registration and the making of applications for these two pensions, will do its best to avoid confusion. There is already some confusion in the public mind. I take it that registration for the 70 and over pension is likely to start fairly soon,—

Mr. Martin: I have said that.

Mr. Knowles: —but that the making of applications for the 65-69 pension will be delayed for a few months. I hope that the advertising done with regard to this matter will clear up these various points.

Mr. Martin: There will be no delay whatsoever on our part with regard to the 70 and over group. With regard to the 65-69 group, my hon. friend knows that we are not in full control of the situation. The reason why this legislation is being introduced today is to ensure that, as soon as it is passed, we shall be in a position to conclude agreements forthwith with every one of the ten provinces. Whether or not these agreements are concluded will depend upon the decision that each province takes in the light of its obligations, as it sees them, and in the light of the circumstances attending in that province. As soon as this legislation is passed we shall lose no time in getting agreements with each province. In fact, the agreements are already partly formulated. In some provinces there will be a desire—and I suppose in some cases there will be the need—to call the provincial legislatures. From my discussion with the provinces a few weeks ago, I understand that will be done forthwith. The provinces and ourselves, subject to what I have said about their authority and their having the final control, will not, I feel sure, sponsor any delay whatsoever in this matter.

My hon. friend will understand that the extent of fulfilment of the agreement depends upon the other contracting party, both as to the fact and as to the extent of its participation. So far as we are concerned, we are putting on the statute book enabling legislation to provide old age assistance at the age of 65, operative as of January 1, 1952. It could be—I do not say that it will be the case—that some provinces might wish to begin at a higher age. If they do, that would not prejudice the operation of the plan to begin at 65 in any other province that wanted to do so. It could be also that some provinces will not be disposed—and again I am not saying that this will be the case—to accept the financial responsibility involved in some of the amendments with regard to permissible income and the like, and would prefer to have a lower figure. If such a province wanted an agreement of that kind, we would not stand in the way. Our hope would be that there would be uniform adoption of the legislation by all provinces but naturally each of them will have to assess this matter in the light of its commitments and of its own situation. In the recent conference with the provinces, while there was a disposition on the part of some of them to delay the application until April 1, I told them that the government's position was that so far as we were concerned the operation of the whole scheme, both for the universal pensions and the pensions for the sixty-five to sixty-nine age group, would be operative as of January 1, 1952.

Mr. Knowles: I will not pursue that matter any further except to say this to the minister. I for one would not object if he asked parliament for sufficient dollars to advertise this whole matter properly so that the people affected will know precisely where they stand.

Mr. Martin: We will.

Mr. Knowles: I have a second question and then one more that the people are asking me. The first of these two questions relates to the time when the first cheques will be issued. A good deal has been said about January 1, 1952 being the effective date of both pieces of legislation. Those who are experienced with old age pensions know that under the present plan the cheque for the month of January is not received until the last day of January—at least that is the case in most provinces. People who will qualify for the new pension, free of the means test, at age 70 or over are wondering when they will get their first cheque. Will they get it at the end of January, the middle of January or the first of January? Some hon. members are acting as if these are not important questions, but they are very important to the people affected. I ask the same question with regard to those in the group from 65 to 69. Will the payment that they receive for the month of January be as it is at the present time, at the end of January? Will it come along in the middle of the month, as in the case of family allowances, or could it not be on the first of the month?

Mr. Martin: As I said, the operation of the whole scheme comes into effect on January 1, 1952. The cheques will be payable around the end of the month.

Mr. Knowles: I will pursue that when we get the bill. That was not a very satisfactory answer.

Mr. Martin: Let us wait until we get the bill.

Mr. Knowles: This gives the minister a chance to make some changes in the bill. The other question that I wanted to ask is one that has been put to me by a great many people and it is this. What will happen to liens that are registered against the properties of old age pensioners at the present time? I shall ask a similar question with regard to property of people who will qualify for pension in the case of those 65 to 69. Will liens be placed on their property? If so, will these liens be cancelled at age 70? But more important, with reference to people in the age group 70 and over who have property against which liens are now in effect, will they be cancelled when this legislation comes into effect?

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend had better wait until we get the bill and deal with the question of recoveries from estates, which I have generally noted.

Mr. Quelch: One question; can the minister say whether or not this legislation is intended to affect in any way the recipients of veterans' allowances?

Mr. Martin: It does not in any way affect it, but when we come to the bill I will deal with that aspect of it. It is not going to take away from the veterans anything that they now have under existing legislation.

Mr. Quelch: Will the veterans who are today in receipt of war veterans' allowances—

Mr. Martin: If my hon. friend will wait until we come to the bill and he sees the provision before him he will agree that that is the best way of dealing with it.

Mr. Graydon: I want to ask the minister to consider the question of a change in the bill, if it is not already printed and ready for distribution. I think I may have a very large majority of the committee with me on this, and that will be an unusual thing, to say the least. I do not like the name of old age pensions. The name ought to be changed. It is outmoded and has connotations that ought not to be perpetuated in legislation at this time.

Mr. Martin: Would my hon. friend care to wait until the bill comes before him? He may find something in that regard that he would want to deal with.

Mr. Graydon: I want to make a suggestion. I know the minister may not have adopted the same phraseology as I think ought to be adopted, and this will at least give him an opportunity of comparing my suggestion with his own. Perhaps I am fighting a losing battle on that ground, but I know that the broadmindedness of the minister will come to the front when a decision is made.

I do want to suggest to the minister that the connotations of old age pensions ought to be dropped once and for all from any legislation of this kind. I fancy my suggestion is one that would be acceptable at least to the far corner of the house, and I do not know any reason why it should not be acceptable in all corners of the house. In view of the fact that a great number of people are coming under the arrangement whereby this assistance is automatically paid without a means test when they reach the age of 70, I think we ought to call it a national dividend, because it is a national dividend. I have made a study of it with some care and I am of the opinion that no better name could be applied to this assistance, because in a very large sense that is exactly what it is. I do not think you could go wrong by calling it what it is. I make the suggestion to the minister that he abolish all this phraseology about old age pensions and call this new legislation legislation with respect to national dividends.

Mr. Fair: I want to support the suggestion made by the hon. member for Peel.

Some hon. Members: You would.

Mr. Fair: Some hon. members have said "you would". It looks to me as if we are making some progress, anyway. While some of our friends across the way may say "you would", perhaps I should remind them that we are now supplying a national dividend to Canadians up until sixteen years of age. Prior to that we were paying national dividends to people of seventy and over with a means test. The legislation that is being introduced today will provide a further national dividend for the group age 65 to 69, so I think we are making fairly good progress.

Whether our friends across the way realize it or not, they are getting along in our direction. These things are possible. I might say that many people are opposed to the title "old age pension". We have had the Barr colonists in Lloydminster, Alberta and Saskatchewan. They have been in that part of the country since 1903. Some of them are my very best friends, and some of them who have done a lot to bring Canada to its present position think that we should have a change of name to the one mentioned by the hon. member for Peel, which is a good one. If we do that it will perhaps educate us and some others who do not realize the fact that we should have national dividends for everybody.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Martin thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 395, to provide for old age assistance.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the second time?

Mr. Martin: Next sitting.

BLIND PERSONS ACT

PROVISION FOR AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES—PAYMENTS AT AGE 21

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure respecting allowances for blind persons and to provide for the payment to the provinces out of the consolidated revenue fund of amounts in respect of allowances for blind persons paid by the provinces, to certain persons who have attained the age of twenty-one years, and who are blind and in need of such allowances, not exceeding in respect of any recipient, seventy-five per centum of forty dollars monthly or of the amount of the allowance paid by the provinces monthly to the recipients, whichever is the lesser; and to provide for the making of agreements with the provinces in relation thereto and for the conditions and duration of such agreements.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Mr. Knowles: I think a word should be said to the effect that this resolution and the bill based upon it are indeed welcome. As a matter of fact those interested in the welfare of our blind persons have for a considerable time been requesting that the legislation respecting the blind be put in a statute separate from the legislation respecting our elder citizens. I take it the reason for that request is the force of circumstances.

Indeed, now that the old age pension plan is being put on a different basis it becomes necessary that our legislation respecting blind allowances be taken out of the existing legislation and put in a statute by itself. That, I take it, is also made necessary by reason of the fact that the resolution we passed a few moments ago specifies that the federal government shall pay 50 per cent of the pension paid to those from 65 to 69. Obviously in respect of blind persons it would be unfair to the provinces to put that division into effect. Rather it is only fair to the provinces that the present relationship of a payment of 75 per cent by the federal government and 25 per cent by the provinces should be continued.

I take it however that although this bill will meet the requests of those interested in blind persons, so far as it goes, in that it separates their legislation from old age pension legislation, there is nothing in the bill to be based on the resolution which makes any change in substance so far as allowances for blind persons are concerned. Could the minister say whether that is so? So far as matters of substance are concerned, will the bill simply carry forward what is now in our legislation respecting the blind?

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Knowles: Could the minister answer my question?

Mr. Martin: I wished to make sure no one else wished to speak. If no one else is speaking I will say briefly this, that my hon. friend has welcomed with pleasure, as I am sure the country will generally, this measure separating assistance given to blind persons from assistance given to the aged. This is in keeping with the request made to me by the various organizations representing the blind over the period of the last few years.

Unlike the bill based on the resolution we have just passed, the contribution of the federal government in this instance is not, despite the higher commitments involved in the total program, being reduced. It continues at 75 per cent.

I am not so sure after listening to my hon. friend this morning whether he and I will agree as to what changes of substance mean. But certainly as I understand the word he will find that the bill when presented does have very important modifications that are changes of substance and that will improve the situation so far as blind persons are concerned.

In any event my hon. friend will realize that, as in the other instance, the extent to which we have taken action in the bill is largely dependent upon the agreement we were able to obtain with the provinces whose financial responsibility in these matters varies in accordance with the terms, particularly, of the permissible income section.

Mr. Fair: In connection with the permissible income section I suggest there are one or two changes which should be made, and which I would ask the minister to consider. I refer to blind farmers. As the minister and other hon. members know, there is no set income formula on the farm. In one year there may be a profit while in the next year there may be a loss. If a farmer has a profit in one year his pension is cut, whereas in the next year he may have a loss and there is no increase in the pension.

Blind farmers have suggested to me that I bring to the attention of the minister the necessity for the levelling off of incomes for pension purposes, as it is done for income tax purposes. This seems to be a reasonable request. People who are farming, and who have all their senses, are having a bad enough time; but for blind farmers it is worse.

Mr. Blair: Mr. Chairman, I am sure there is nothing controversial in the bill, and I am sure hon. members will be in complete agreement that anything suggested for the benefit of these unfortunate people who happen to be blind should be done. I do not think there is anything to be said at the present time, or that anything need be said until we have the bill before us. I cannot see any reason for further debate, because I believe we are all in complete agreement.

Mr. Graydon: How many blind persons, from the age of 21, on, will come under this measure?

Mr. Martin: We estimate there are about 18,000 blind persons in the country and, roughly, 11,000 between the ages of 21 and 69.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. Martin thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 396, to provide for allowances for blind persons.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the second time?

Mr. Martin: Next sitting.

FEDERAL DISTRICT COMMISSION

INCREASE IN NUMBER OF MEMBERS—POWER TO CONSTRUCT RAILWAYS, ETC.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Federal District Commission Act, 1927, to increase the number of members of the commission from nineteen to twenty; to provide also that the commission may construct in the national capital district railways and related facilities and, for this purpose, acquire land and real property and enter into agreements with railway companies for the use, maintenance and operation of such railways; and to provide further for the payment of limited grants to the appropriate authorities in municipalities in respect of property situated therein and acquired for inclusion in Gatineau park.

Mr. Drew: Is the Prime Minister going to make a statement at this point?

Mr. St. Laurent: I had not intended making any statement as the resolution is quite self-explanatory. There are three points dealt with in the resolution. First, it is intended to increase the members of the commission by one. By the 1946 amendment it was provided that there would be a member on the commission representing each of the provinces, and the number provided for was nine. It is felt that Newfoundland now being one of the provinces should also have a representative on the commission. The first purpose of the bill to be founded on this resolution is to make provision for the appointment of a member to represent the province of Newfoundland.

The second purpose is to take advantage of the fact that we are amending the act to provide for something which has heretofore been provided for by a dollar item in the estimates. In the 1950 estimates and again in the estimates for this year a dollar item was provided to authorize the federal district commission to carry on that part of the recommendations of the joint committee that had to do with providing facilities to improve the railway situation in Ottawa and ultimately to do away with the trackage that leads into the Union station in the heart of the city. It being necessary to amend the act it was felt that it would be more proper to have this in the act itself rather than to rely from year to year upon the dollar item in the estimates.

The third has to do with Gatineau park. Gatineau park is planned to include an area something over 70,000 acres, and some 30,000 acres or more have already been acquired in rural municipalities. The assessment and taxes on these lands would have amounted to something less than $5,000 distributed among a few rural municipalities While that amount is not large it is felt that there was some hardship on those municipalities to decrease their tax revenue from the land to be included in the national park out of which they do not derive any special benefit at the present time. The bill to be founded on the resolution will empower the federal district commission to make grants to these local municipalities not exceeding what the taxes would have been before the lands were taken over to form part of the park.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I realize that it will be much better to discuss the proposals in detail when the bill is before us. It is recognized that there will be a desire on the part of hon. members to proceed with the consideration of the bill. One reason why I raised a question as to whether the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) proposed to make a statement at this time was that the powers that appear to be conferred are so extensive that one does come face to face with the possibility of being called upon to consider some special relationship between this commission and the municipal council of the city of Ottawa. It surely must be coming to the point where the municipal council, without in any way diminishing its ordinary authority, will be called upon to assume certain obligations which may be greatly affected by this bill. I do not know whether the Prime Minister felt that this was the time to make any remarks relating to the possibility of some new plan of administration of this area.

Motion agreed to and house went into committee, Mr. Dion in the chair.

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Chairman, I shall deal first with the remarks of the leader of the opposition. I think both he and I read the same newspaper. I was a bit concerned the other day, as possibly he was, when I read that article saying that so long as Mr. Bronson was chairman of the commission there would be no cause for anxiety as to the extent to which the powers of the federal district commission might be exercised, but that it might be that under the legislation to be proposed they were going to have power to enter into businesses that might go beyond what was really required for their purposes. I immediately got out the bill to see whether there was anything to justify apprehension of that kind and I found that there was not. This is strictly related to the implementation of the recommendations of the joint committee with respect to the changing of the railway location.

Since I have mentioned his name I should like to take this opportunity to express on behalf of the government, and I think on behalf of all members of the house, very sincere appreciation of the great devotion which Mr. Bronson has brought over the years to the implementation of the recommendations of the joint committee of the two houses of parliament. I do concur with the writer of an article which I saw in a newspaper the other day, no matter how extensive the powers may be, as long as they are being exercised under the control of Mr. Bronson no one will have any occasion for anxiety. In addition, however, I think that the terms of the statute are such that there is not apt to be any conflict with any municipal authorities. Frequently there are discussions with the municipal authorities, and it took some time to reach an agreement upon the contribution that the city of Ottawa would make to the bridge now being constructed over the railway yards in the heart of the city. But that has been settled by an agreement which I think is working out very satisfactorily both for the federal district commission and for the civic authorities.

I think it would be proper for me to say at this time that the federal district commission has had the fullest possible co-operation from the municipal authorities of the city of Ottawa and from the municipal authorities of the other municipalities having territory within the federal district. It is for the purpose of maintaining these good relations that the commission feels that it should make grants to those rural municipalities, with respect to the large areas that are being taken over for the Gatineau park that would be such as not to occasion them, at least until such time as the park is completed and in operation and they derive some benefits therefrom, any loss in their municipal taxation.

I think all who are interested in the development of the capital owe a debt to the chairman and members of the federal district commission for the manner in which they have succeeded in enlisting the good will and in conserving good relations not only with the municipal authorities but also with the people of the districts where the work is being carried on. I think it is a very happy example of the kind of co-operation that can be brought about between different levels of government, and I should like to include in my tribute an expression of gratitude for the co-operation that has been obtained from the provincial governments of Ontario and Quebec. I think that at every level there has been the most satisfactory degree of co-operation and helpfulness to each other that could be desired in carrying out that kind of a plan. It seems to me that it is being felt by them as it has been felt in every quarter of this house that what is being done here is something of national scope that will be a source of satisfaction and pride for every Canadian citizen.

Mr. Drew: The Prime Minister was correct in the assumption that my question had been prompted by certain comments I had read in different articles which suggested the possibility that the bill, which I have not seen, would be extending the powers to an extent that they might limit or impair the authority of the municipal council. That was the reason for my question, and the Prime Minister has answered the question that I asked. I should like to join with him in an expression of very real tribute to Mr. Fred Bronson and the other members of the commission who, with great unselfishness and with a great amount of effort, have gone much further—

Mr. St. Laurent: And intelligence.

Mr. Drew: —in carrying forward this development than may generally be realized throughout Canada today. It is noticeable that people visiting the parliament buildings are greatly impressed with the model of the ultimate plan which is available for examination. A considerable part of that has already taken form, and I think that this is a fine example of how it is possible to enlist the services of unselfish citizens in the fulfilment of something that is not only to the advantage of the people of Ottawa and the surrounding country but will be of advantage in the years ahead in giving to Canadians a capital of which they will all be proud.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. St. Laurent thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 397, to amend the Federal District Commission Act, 1927.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Dion in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

255. Departmental administration, $869,901.

Mr. Blair: Does the minister wish to make a statement?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, I thought I would deal with things on the various estimates as we go along.

Mr. Blair: Mr. Chairman, every year on these estimates I have usually made an appeal for a national health plan for Canada. In fact I have made this appeal year after year on behalf of this party. At times I have thought that these continuous appeals would become tiresome to members of the house, but I came into the house in 1945 with the idea in mind that I would try to do something for the people of this country by attempting to add my voice to those who felt that a national health plan for Canada was a necessity. Year after year since that time, and two or three times a year, on behalf of the Progressive Conservative party I have spoken on the necessity of a health plan for Canada, a plan that would bring treatment to every person in Canada no matter in what district he or she resides. But I was amazed last night to read in the evening press the remarks made by one of the cabinet ministers in the Waterloo by-election campaign. I am perfectly aware that in general elections or in by-elections parties debate certain things to their own advantage, but in this case when it comes to a matter of the policy of a party that is an entirely different thing. I admit we have all made statements for our parties and that we have argued in election campaigns, but this thing seems to be something entirely different in that it affects the policy of this party. Before entering into any discussion, however, I intend to again clarify the position of this party as far as national health insurance is concerned. I intend to quote from an article which appeared in the Toronto Telegram of June 20. The Telegram was absolutely fair at that time; the Liberal meetings were covered by one correspondent, the account of the C.C.F. meetings was written by another, and the Conservative meetings were covered by still another. I was amazed to read what the minister of immigration had said at a meeting in New Hamburg. The first matter he dealt with was export markets, and that was perfectly normal. But I am going to read some of this report dealing with the second matter he referred to, and some of it is in quotation marks:

> He assured his farmer audience that the government is soon to propose a national health scheme—as promised earlier—and he added that he expected the Progressive Conservatives would "oppose it at first, then try to take credit for it after."

Mr. Sinclair: Finish the quotation.

Mr. Blair: That is all I have here.

Mr. Martin: Perhaps I could put the quotation on record:

> He added that he expected the Progressive Conservatives would oppose it at first and then try to take credit for it, as they did with family allowances.

Mr. Drew: Then that just shows how inaccurate it was.

Mr. Sinclair: Perhaps I might just repeat what the leader of the opposition said about family allowances: "This bill is an outrageous bribe—"

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Lanark has the floor.

Mr. Blair: I am going to quote from a speech I made in this house on June 30, 1948, when the matter of national health grants was being brought into the picture. Hon. members will remember that national health grants were announced by the Prime Minister in May, 1948, but we did not get around to discussing them until the last day of that session, which was June 30. At that time I said:

> In May the Prime Minister announced increased grants for national health. We welcomed the introduction of a plan that would help out national health. The Progressive Conservative party, realizing this need, has long urged a broader program for national health and for increased grants. During the time I have been a member of this house we have repeatedly drawn the attention of the members of the house to the urgent necessity of action to overcome the deficiencies in our national health services. No later than March of this year I spoke on this matter in the house; I stated that the time had come to enunciate and put into effect a national health program for Canada. I further stated that the objective plan of this party was one which would bring health services to every Canadian citizen regardless of race, economic status or geographical position.

Then I went on to deal with the matter of the health grants:

A year ago I drew the attention of the house to the necessity of a national stocktaking with regard to health. There is nothing new in the program that has been introduced. We welcome it and we welcome the increased grants. I believe that every member of this house, regardless of his political affiliation, approves any measure which will cut down mortality rates and relieve human suffering. Consideration of national health measures and anything that will better the condition of the people in regard to national health should be far above any political considerations.

I simply want to put on record that through the years, and certainly since 1945 when I came into this house, this party has advocated a national health program for Canada. I personally have advocated it at every opportunity. So in regard to this statement I thought our position should be made clear as far as national health is concerned. Sometimes these matters do become open to debate, and sometimes government members or even opposition members make certain statements for the sake of their party. In connection with national health grants and grants to hospitals I remember a speech made on the budget last spring by the hon. member for Mount Royal, a gentleman for whom I have the highest regard but who, I am quite sure, misunderstood the situation. At page 2328 of Hansard for April 24 of this year the hon. member said:

Another important medium of communication is the field of public relations. Are we doing a job in this field? No one will accuse the Department of National Health and Welfare of hiding its light under a bushel nor should they do so because their work is both instructional and educational. But how many persons realize that in the last two years, through the initiative of the department, the federal government has been responsible for the construction of 27,000 new hospital beds, many of them in my own constituency, in a total of 40,000? I doubt if the people of this country realize the revolution which has been brought about, nationally speaking, in national health and public welfare owing to the initiative and research policies of the department.

I am sure the minister himself would refute that statement in what was otherwise a really good speech. I feel sure the hon. member for Mount Royal misunderstood the whole situation when he suggested that this department was responsible for providing 27,000 hospital beds. I have mentioned this matter on other occasions. In my own province of Ontario grants are given for the construction of hospital beds, and the grants given by this department do not begin to cover the cost of constructing hospitals. I remember that in a speech some time ago on the estimates of this department I pointed out that in this province the average cost of a hospital bed, over and above any grants that might be made, was something like $7,500. That is in addition to the amount given by the federal government and, in our case, the provincial government. I am familiar with what is happening in one town in my own constituency, where they are working on the idea of building a hospital. This town has a population of 5,000; they are very anxious for a hospital, but the question of financing has made it very difficult. In order to keep this matter clear, while we certainly approve of the grants given under the health plan, at the present time it is difficult for municipalities to obtain the money necessary to build a hospital. It is a difficult job to raise the thousands of dollars required, because hospital construction is very expensive.

I was rather pleased yesterday to read of some of the research being carried on at the present time. This was brought out at a meeting of the Canadian Medical Association in Montreal. It may be of interest to hon. members to learn that 2,000 doctors at a convention in Montreal were able to witness by television operations performed in various hospitals, some of them a mile or more away. Apparently the television camera was placed above the operating table, and thus they were able to get a view that would be open only to a doctor assisting at the operation. This, of course, has nothing to do with the Department of National Health and Welfare or the consideration of these grants, but it does show what progress is being made and indicates that some of the things being discovered now will mean a great deal to the medical profession in future and, by means of further education, will be of assistance to those who may be suffering.
